Designing securities and calculating credit ratings

The securitization of residential mortgage loans started a number of decades ago in the United States, but was nonetheless said to be at the origins of the global financial crisis of 2007-present. I will examine the importance of information and the argument that securitization per se was not the problem, but that securitization got out of hand when securitizers and credit rating agencies ignored the fundamentals of mortgage lending in the production of residential mortgage-backed securities (RMBS). My research demonstrates how RMBS were co-designed by credit rating agencies and their ratings were co-produced by investment banks, thereby highlighting the importance of local socio-technical chains in global finance.

Young people's aspirations in the context of intergenerational relations

Parental support is one of the central resources in negotiating outcomes and life chances. Further, imagining of 'possible futures' has been claimed to take place primarily within the context of family relations. The aim of this study is to analyze young people's future aspirations within this particular context. It looks at the practices, motivations, and emotions related to intergenerational relations and transmission. In this paper we ask how resources and positions are handed down, how parents support their children and how children use, need or reject the resources and examples of the parents. First, we describe the different sorts of futures that young people perceive feasible, and how these are patterned by family background and parenting styles as well as whether these have changed over time. These analyses are based on two surveys conducted in the school setting in 2004 (N=2420) and in 2010 (N=2012). Second, drawing on qualitative biographically focused interviews with young people and their parents, our aim is to investigate how hopes, resources and options concerning the future of young people are negotiated in a family context. The interviews of young people (N=32) and their parents (N=15) were conducted in 2008-09. All young participants were in their final year of the lower secondary school, around 15-years-of age and about to make the transition to post-compulsory education. By applying mixed methods, the study aims to unravel what is the role of family in shaping the aspirations of young women and men, in their dealing with the weight of the past and calculating the feasibility of different choices concerning their future.

Producing knowledge for justice? Gender/sexuality studies and the consumption of Arabs and Muslims

Focusing on gender/sexuality dynamics in Arab uprising and drawing on pedagogical lessons learned during other intense political moments while teaching a diverse body of students with a wide-range of disciplinary and multi-disciplinary majors, this paper will discuss how U.S. college students receive, consume, and reproduce Arab revolutions in different contexts and historical moments. The paper will further speak to several issues at the heart of intellectual and pedagogical praxis:

- Does the acquisition of knowledge lead to a heightened awareness of the humanity of all people and their right to justice, as conventional wisdom would have us believe? Or does knowing the subject at times reinforce dogmas and/or normalize hegemonic discourses that become "ordinary parts" of everyday life? If so, what are the necessary conditions to favor the knowledge-leads-to-justice equation instead of the second alternative?

- Do critical issues facing Tunisian, Egyptian, Yemeni, Bahraini, Jordanian, Libyan, Palestinian, and Syrian people retain their criticalness as they travel across the seas and land in U.S. classrooms? If so, when and for which students? If not, how do we at the very least explain the sense of urgency people in Arab lands feel?
- How do we negotiate the nurturing of student critical thinking, on one level, honor victims of sexual (and gender, racial, ethnic, or religious) violence on a second, and highlight their agency, on a third without inadvertently fueling the expected dose of conclusions that usually accompany discussions of gender and sexuality dynamics in Arab and Muslim communities?
- Is it possible this time around to expect a defeat of the doctrine of exceptionality of Arab and Muslim communities, their inferiority and backwardness; and the many deficiencies from which people populating these lands are supposed to suffer?

Sensory entitlements, infringements, and religious 'harmony' in everyday life

In multi-religious and multi-ethnic societies, the state actively seeks constructive engagement with religion in its nation-building agenda to ensure that religious 'harmony' and 'tolerance' are maintained. At the same time, it simultaneously acknowledges that the realm of religion can often be seen as a site of tension and contestation, particularly over the entitlement to use spaces for religious practice. The 'battle' over the access of such religious spaces and religious practices extends into perceived sensorial transgressions where different religious practices infringe on personal and group 'sensory entitlements'. In line with the rhetoric of religious harmony and religious pluralism in Singapore, this paper attempts to show how the state intervenes in religious practices at the everyday sensuous level. In this context, the political leadership in Singapore has never assumed that religion and politics are distinct spheres of influence and experience. In fact, the government constantly urges faith communities to observe studiously the ground rules for sustained religious and ethnic harmony. Three religious practices that infringe these 'sensory entitlements' are critically interrogated in contemporary Singapore – the use of joss-sticks and burning of paper money in 'Chinese' religions; the call for prayers in Islam; and Hindu public processions. Through these religious practices and the perceived aural, olfactory and visual transgressions, this paper intends to illustrate how such sensory encounters illustrate the manner in which the state governs the everyday under the potent discourse of 'harmony' while at the same time legitimising the existence of such governance for the 'good' of all religious communities, thereby rendering its position nebulous.

Working conditions and the desire to reduce working hours due to family responsibilities

Not only mothers wish and need to combine paid work with their family responsibilities at home, but also fathers increasingly want to engage in child care activities. Reducing working hours is one common strategy when responsibilities at work and at home are difficult to combine. Thus, explaining the determinants of the desire to reduce working hours due to family responsibilities helps to understand the time squeeze between work and family life, which is often posed in research and public debate. Existing research has investigated the determinants of the general desire to reduce working hours, neglecting the fact that it could arise from various reasons. Hence, to understand the desire to reduce working hours due to family responsibilities needs distinctive analyses specified to this reason. Using an approach based on social exchange theory, we not only investigate explicit resources and demands at the workplace, but also implicit psychological contracts (e.g. assumed behavioral expectations from the employer) for the desire to reduce working hours due to family responsibilities.

For this research, we make use of unique data of the German study "employment relationships as social exchange" (beata). First results based on logistic regression analyses of 471 employed mothers and fathers with and without the desire to reduce working hours due to family responsibilities support our expectation. Missing resources at the workplace (e.g. flexible working arrangements) as well as work demands (time pressure or late working hours) increase the likelihood to have the desire to work reduced hours. Interestingly, missing resources are more important than existing demands. Besides, implicit assumptions about the expectations of the employer (e.g. about steady presence at the workplace) matter too.

"Magic triangle" science - Universities – High-tech business: Case of Siberia

The paper focuses on analysis of contemporary transformations in the relationship of basic science, university education and high-tech business as an example of scientific centers in Siberia: Novosibirsk, Krasnoyarsk, Tomsk, Irkutsk. The material for the analysis will be the results of our investigations held in 2001 - 2011's.

Organized more than 50 years ago, Siberian Branch of RAS, Akademgorodok in the first place, was created as a scientific structure of new type, where would be complex solved the problem for research, preparing new scientists and the implementation of scientific achievements in the economy. This scheme, named the "triangle of Lavrentiev", in the honor of Michael A. Lavrentiev, the founder of Siberian Branch of Russian Academy of Sciences (SB RAS), was the development of ideas and models of Humboldt University and Moscow Physicak-Technical Institute, which became a succesfuk attempt to implement the ideas of Humboldt in the Soviet Union. The main task of this paper - to show how the transformation undergone this scheme in recent years, the difficulties and problems arise in the relationship between academician institutes, universities and commercial companies. These changes most clearly seen in the example of Akademgorodok, where there is a struggle about the leadership, about who will shape the future: leaders of SB RAS or management of Akademgorodok – the main player on the field of high-tech business. The analysis is planned in the context of the modern state science policy, in the conditions of priority the development of the universities, including university research area, through federal (Krasnoyarsk), or national research universities (Novosibirsk, Tomsk, Irkutsk).

The culture of crime control in nigerian traditional society: Exploring the oro cult of ijebu communities of Western Nigeria

More than ever, the growing loss of confidence of the Nigerian public in the formal means of social control have heightened, and led to the soaring of the popularity of informal social control methods. This paper examines the dynamics of the Oro festival of the Ijebu communities as an informal social control mechanism of deviance and criminal behaviours within the Kingdom. This examination draws theoretically on the concepts of organic and mechanical solidarities, referencing different examples of social control constructs within specific Ijebu communities, and drawing conclusions regarding various subcultural structures and deviance more broadly. Using qualitative information gathered from selected priests of the cult, opinion leaders, community heads, and a cross section of the public, the study examined the roles, responsibilities and operational mode of the Oro cult in preventing, apprehending and punishing deviant and criminal behaviours. In the observed settings, the belief in the efficacy of the Oro cult in maintaining social order within the communities was found to be strong as the festival remains highly revered. Further findings suggests an interaction between the Oro cult and formal social control that results in a dynamic reciprocity between the two control mechanisms. In recent times, the Oro cult is especially noted to have succeeded in reducing the spate of armed robbery incidences within the communities, after efforts of the Nation's law enforcement agents appeared to have failed. Due to the increasing rate of criminal activities, the cult presently gives more attention to crime fighting than other deviant behaviours. Notably, there are lines of departure between the formal and the Oro cult penal system, which has legal implications. Both methodological and theoretical implications were discussed with emphasis laid on the importance of the opportunity for criminology to harness the traditional methods of social control in maintaining social order.

Welfare societies in new democracies: Comparing regional developments in

This paper applies bot a regional and a comparative perspective on contemporary welfare state development. Taking off from comparative analyses of economic development and social rights in Europe, Central America and East Asia (Abrahamson 2010a, 2010b, forthcoming) this study seeks to understand welfare development through comparing developments between regions rather than within regions. The focus is in the first place on selected countries in East Asia and Latin America, and secondly, if time allows, on selected Central- Eastern and Southern European countries. It, thus, follows in the footsteps of those relatively few scholars that have gone beyond Eurocentric, or even Swedocentric, analyses such as Ian Gough (2006), G. Woods (2004), Armando Barrientos (2011), Stephen Haggard (2008) and Huk-ju Kwon (2010).

- Developments within these three regions of the world have a number of things in common: late welfare state development; recent authoritarian political pasts; export substitution economic strategies and social insurance only for privileged segments of (public) employees. Their welfare states have within the welfare modeling business been considered to be under developed and productivist.
- The paper seeks to contribute to the ongoing debate on welfare under globalization by moving focus from the North to the South and by viewing globalization as regionalization.

The genealogy of childhood in Brazil: The contours of childhood

The present work has the central focus towards composing the field of sociology of Brazilian childhood in what refers to the concept of childhood through a literature review and analysis of articles, books published since 1947 and interviews that were performed with some national researchers related to themes of children, childhood, early childhood and sociology of childhood. We intend to analyze how Brazilian childhood has been discussed from 1947 to 2011, who are these researchers, what are the publications that identify how belonging to the sociology of childhood, what methodologies, epistemologies, theoretical references used, as well as, the thematic that elect in order to configure the field of childhood in Brazil. The time frame was chosen because we consider the article written by Florestan Fernandes entitled "As trocinhas do Bom Retiro: contribuição ao estudo folclórico e sociológico da cultura e dos grupos infantis" (The trocinhas of Bom Retiro: contribution to the sociological study of culture and folklore and children's groups) as a starting point of discussion in Brazil about the culture of childhood. The theoretical work is intended to show from published articles and interviews that were undertaken in the field of childhood setting, seeking to indicate how this field is constituted, its ruptures, themes and outlines. That is, we intend to verify if the contemporary and neo-liberalism are promoting a reconfiguration of the concept of childhood.

Migrant trafficking and sexual violence against women in Mexico: A qualitative analysis on consequences

Trafficking of women whether internal or international for the purpose of sexual exploitation continues to be a major cause of concern to the international community. This phenomenon has affected all over the world and Mexico is not an exception. During the last few years, internal trafficking of persons especially of women in Mexico has grown up at an exponential rate due to increasing sex tourism. Thus, in this paper we have tried to analyze what are the basic causes behind the internal trafficking of women in Mexico and how this phenomenon is leading to health consequences. We have interviewed thirty internally trafficked women in Monterrey city during the year 2007-2010. The study found that trafficking of women in Mexico is a multifactorial phenomenon. Women trafficked from various states of Mexico and lured through false promises of employment, high quality living status in Monterrey, migration to USA among others. Once reached to city, they are enslaved and forced to work in sex market. Obtained information indicates that trafficked women are suffering a wide range of physical and sexual violence, with severe health (sexual and mental) consequences, which has direct implications to sexually transmitted diseases.

Is retirement income at risk? A study of economic conditions amongst ethnic groups in the UK

The research examines employment patterns, pension participation and retirement incomes for ethnic groups in the UK and highlights differences in their economic conditions. We use data from the Family Resources Survey (FRS) and show that there still are important differences in terms of employment, income, pension contributions and benefits between ethnic minorities and the white majority. We use socio-economic and demographic variables to explain differences in individuals' retirement income. We show how disadvantages and uncertainty in life pre-retirement affect retirement prospects of ethnic minorities. By comparing the white control group to ethnic minorities in terms of employment, income and pension contributions, we provide an insight into the retirement behaviour of ethnic groups and show that their welfare post-retirement may be increasingly at risk with the new trend towards Defined Contribution pension schemes.

La fertilidad política de las representaciones. Hegemonía y resistencia en la lucha por la "representación laboral" de las pasantías universitarias en Argentina

Las pasantías universitarias constituyen un dispositivo de inserción laboral formativo dispuesto por el Estado para estudiantes que estén atravesando los últimos años de su carrera. Se encuentran insertas en un doble campo del espacio social: el campo educativo y el campo laboral. En cada uno de estos campos se establecen diferentes intereses en disputa, donde la posición de los agentes condiciona sus representaciones y prácticas sociales.

Desde el discurso estatal y empresarial, las pasantías universitarias son representadas como prácticas formativas que no implican ningún tipo de relación laboral entre el empleador y los pasantes. Esta situación los exime de beneficios sociales propios de una relación de trabajo formal. Sin embargo, los pasantes se reconocen como trabajadores, ya que realizan prácticas laborales, cumpliendo rutinas y horarios, aunque sin recibir la misma retribución material ni los mismos derechos laborales que los demás trabajadores. En función a esto los pasantes han desplegado diferentes prácticas de resistencia y organización colectiva para lograr su reconocimiento.

El objetivo de esta ponencia será indagar, a la luz de la categoría bourdieana de "campo", las disputas y resistencias que se dan entre los pasantes, los empleadores y el Estado en relación a la representación laboral de la pasantía universitaria. Buscando analizar las repercusiones que estas luchas tienen sobre las condiciones de trabajo y los derechos laborales de los pasantes. Entendemos que esta lucha simbólica nos da cuenta de la disputa por la visión hegemónica del mundo social y también nos habla del carácter dinámico e histórico de los campos en la continua construcción y reconstrucción de sus relaciones de fuerza.

En términos metodológicos se recurrirá a un abordaje de tipo cualitativo, buscando recuperar los discursos de los principales agentes en juego, por medio de entrevistas en profundidad y análisis de documentos legales y periodísticos.

La tecnología en la transformación del sistema democrático

Los recientes movimientos populares en los diferentes países en el mundo, aunque tengan diversos matices y propuestas, parecen tener una similitud con socavar el sistema democrático en que vivimos hoy. Sea resaltando la falta de legitimidad de la representación política de los ciudadanos, sea criticando a la desregulación del poder financiero especulativo, pone de relieve la demanda por una nueva forma de construcción del espacio público.

En paralelo a los movimientos de protesta en las calles, nuevas experiencias democráticas de inclusión de la población en los espacios de toma de decisiones se consolidan, traendo cambios en la vía que conecta Estado y Sociedad, incluso con cambios constitucionales. Los países latinoamericanos figuran en la vanguardia de este movimiento, retratando la experiencia de presupuesto participativo en Brasil, los gobiernos ecuatorianos indígenas, la lucha por la plurinacionalidad en Bolivia, los consejos comunales de Venezuela.

En este contexto, defendemos la necesidad de nuevas herramientas para apoyar este movimiento de cambio. Presentamos una discusión sobre la tecnología de la información (TI), con el argumento de ampliar el vínculo en su diseño, construcción y uso con la sociedad y sus demandas reales. Negando el concepto de neutralidad de la ciencia y entendiendo que el desarrollo tecnológico ha estado siempre vinculado a la mejora del capitalismo monopolista, se propone una nueva línea de acción de TI, conocida por Tecnología de la Información para Fines Sociales (TIFS).

Traemos este análisis articulando con la práctica realizada en proyectos de la universidad que utilizan la tecnología para mejorar la calidad de vida de la población. Por lo tanto, este artículo reflexiona sobre el papel de las TI en el contexto de transformación actual y los caminos para la transformación del modelo de desarrollo de la tecnología y en particular la tecnología de la información, acercándose al concepto de las TIFS.

The bases for experiences of participatory democracy in Latin America

Since the late eighteenth-century, the occidental society is developing its model of democracy. First, it was consolidated a democratic system where representation was the main pillar. If, on the one hand, that system made undeniable progress in structuring solid states, on the other hand, portrayed serious limitations for the effective articulation between state and Society. In Latin America, the recent construction of democracy faced tough obstacles, mainly for its colonial heritage and for the occurrence of military coups that have blocked the slow process of democratization. Over the past 30 years, some experiences that aimed at democratizing the political system appeared on different countries and realities of the region. Connected to a second democratizing wave, these practices are linked to a more qualitative proposal (instead of a struggle for universal suffrage), looking for a more diverse and deeper possibility of participation of ordinary citizens in local administration. Through the implementation of participatory decision-making spheres over public affairs, and especially over public budget, it was possible to advance towards a stronger interference of people in public policies. In this article we analyze two experiments of participatory democracy in Latin America. First, Cotacachi in Ecuador, where the indigenous movement, that was growing and gaining strength since the 1990s, succeeded in establishing some practices of participatory local governance. Second, Torres in Venezuela, where, driven by the national context of changes, it was structured a democratic decision-making method, based on a participatory budget and the Consejos Comunales. Through these experiences, we try to analyze what were the main factors that allowed the emergence and consolidation alternative democracies. Considering aspects such as historical background, national political context, local political culture, we argue that there are some essential elements for the construction of lasting and effective experiences of participatory democracy.

Sport, leisure and women's in(ex)clusion: Reflections from a land where (almost) all the guys play soccer...

On a typical Sunday morning in the largely poor and working class outskirts of a Brazilian state capital, Curitiba, men and boys are at play in the (often but not always improvised) soccer fields that dot the neighborhoods, but where are the women? Fifteen years of research on Brazilian equestrian sports enable me to identify this particular sporting field as one in which not only middle class but also – and perhaps increasingly – women from poor and working class backgrounds are able to carve a unique place for themselves, a new position from which to challenge longstanding notions of what a "female person" can/should be/do. In this paper, I discuss young women's participation in rodeo (calf-roping and reining) competitions and how this may be contributing to forms of empowerment, even within the semi-rural settings to which sociological literature has not customarily looked, in its search for sites in which ideologies and practices of male dominance are being challenged.

The primeiro comando da capital (PCC) and the articulations between the world inside and outside of the prisons: A new paradigm of public safety?

The prison system of the State of São Paulo currently has about 170,000 inmates under custody, one third of the Brazilian prison population. In order to tackle the growth of crime the state government has been making investments for the expansion of the capacity of the prison network as well as in the modernization of the surveillance equipment. Nevertheless, serious problems of social control and respect for the rights of the prisoner remain untouched, such as overpopulation, inadequate infrastructure, lack of services for the education, professionalization, social and legal assistance of inmates, as well as the hardening of the internal discipline to deal with the rebellions. Paradoxically, these policies contributed to the emergence of the Primeiro Comando da Capital (PCC), a group that, in less than a decade, articulated the inner world of prisons with external networks of support, located in popular neighborhoods. It was this intense communication between the inside and outside of the prisons that enabled the attacks in May 2006, that paralyzed the city of São Paulo and resulted in 436 deaths. This event suggests a series of changes that the prison system of the State of São Paulo is going through under the domain of PCC: changes in the profile of the prison population, use of technologies such as cell phones, development of urban economy in the surroundings of the prisons, relations between prisoners, families and life in neighborhoods. The purpose of this paper is to analyze the increase of the articulation between the internal world of prisons and the free society in order to check which new questions are being posed in the field of sociology of prisons, rethinking hypotheses that assume a rupture between these two worlds, as suggested by the concepts of Clemmer (prison culture), Sykes (society of captives) and Goffman (total institution).

How trust begets deviance: Social and institutional trust as explanations for engagement in informal economic activities

Explaining why people engage in informal economic activities such as tax evasion is a hard nut to crack. Neoclassical economic theories and their behaviourist psychological counterparts explain noncompliance with the help of fairly parsimonious theories that mainly rest on taxation levels, deterrence and risk aversion. In a more institutional strand of theory construction, Alejandro Portes (e.g. 2010) develops an evenly parsimonious model introducing the regulatory intent of a country, the enforcement of its rules, and finally the social wiring of a society and the groups it is built upon. This agenda setting text suggests that trust may have a paradoxical effect on informal activities. Social trust enhances people's ability to withstand the enforcement of regulations, fostering informal activities. Trust in the official bodies of the state on the other hand, has the opposite effect. When citizens and groups put a lot of trust in the polity, i.e. see government regulation as legitimate, this will curb engagement in informal activities.

Although this line of thought has been developed from the 1990's on, nobody seems to have tested the theory with the help of the available comparative data sets. That is exactly what this paper aims for. Next to a set of items of both kinds of trust, the ESS data of round 2 collected data regarding respondents' self-reported tax evasion. This survey collected data in 24 countries, and serves as the basis of our analysis. The ESS survey will be complemented with data estimating the regulatory and taxation burden and the effectiveness of enforcement in those countries. The Portes thesis is tested with the help of a multilevel (multinomial) logistic regression analysis.

Democratization or liberalization? Understanding the politics of inequality

The liberalization of the global economic system run in opposition to democratic forms of inclusion, empowerment and social justice and substantially thwarted demands by civic groups which were related to generating effective policies for marginalized and discriminated groups. And, in turn, liberalization further fragmented the public sphere and compartmentalized civic groups and organizations, rendering them weak in dealing with domestic actors (such as states), international institutions (such as the EU, or IMF) and global markets. The rhetoric of enlarged democracy and civil society participation was never really translated into political practice.

For the past decades, the Western states and the international institutions that provide financial assistance to the developing countries promote solutions to political inequality which are based on two ideas. The first is related to the notion of economic liberalization, which would unfold the potentials of the market and minimize the role of the state in the economic sphere. The second is that Western support to the embryonic civil societies of the developing world would give voice to the populations of these countries and would change the nature of the authoritative political regimes that govern for years many countries. These ideas continue to inform the debate about the development of the North African countries after the Arab Spring.

This paper will present and analyse how regimes of North Africa (specifically Morocco and Egypt) used to exploit the new global economic situation and how they have benefited from the openness of the markets. At the same time, these regimes offered some political freedoms to the people of their countries, but they were not democratized.

Therefore, the paper attempts to critically examine and distinguish the notion of (economic) liberalization from the idea of democratization by exploring the ways regimes use to handle fundamental notions of political equality.

Jumping scale, crossing space: The JfJ and organizing cleaners for global strength

Arguably neoliberalism has done the most damage to the already vulnerable workforces in the economy. Building cleaners, as part of this workforce, have suffered from privatization, contracting out, as well as post-industrial labour legislation and the fiscal crisis of the welfare state. The result is a sweatshop citizenship (Aguiar 2006) bordering on 'advanced marginality' (Wacquant 2008) threatening to permanently expulse cleaners (and other low wage workers) to the desertion fields of (neo)neoliberalism (Crouch 2011; Boltanski and Chiapello 2004; Bauman 2007; Agamben 2005).

To counter this assault on cleaners, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) has globalized its justice for janitors organizing model for the purpose of building global strength to deal with the neoliberalism of global cleaning companies, and in the process, secure protection and achieve gains for cleaners everywhere. Is the justice for janitors (JfJ) model the model for organizing in the 21st century? How is this model transitioning into transnational organizing and places, and by what mechanisms and structures is this being done, is the focus of this presentation. So, I examine (1) the JfJ model, (2) mechanisms and structures of transnational organizing and (3) the meaning of partnerships between the SEIU and partner unions (e.g. FNV Bondgenoten in the Netherlands; LHMU in Australia [and perhaps the SIPTU in Ireland]) set-up to arrest the erosion of cleaners' rights and stymie the proliferation of the sweatshop citizenship status. Through interviews at the SEIU HQ in Washington, as well as fieldwork in Australian, and Amsterdam, I seek to understand the flexibility of the JfJ model and the meaning of partnership in the context of a union with global ambitions. This presentation ends by discussing the idea of "solidarity transformed" (Anner 2011), and the extent to which the SEIU's globalizing of the JfJ is an example of this concept.

Political context, social stratification and inequality perception: A comparison of recent democracies in the cases of South Africa and Brazil

Economic wealth and income distribution with large middle-classes have been considered long term characteristic of some western countries like the US and several European countries. Other societies in Latin America and Africa, late comers to democratic processes, with social structures characterized by sharp stratification profiles, may be studied throwing light on recent demands for democracy. The paper deals with the perception of social distance and the support expressed in relation to social policies to curb inequality, according to the position of respondents in social stratification scales (occupational, educational and income), gender and race. It explores the historic processes of democratization of the two societies and their social policies to explain the differences encountered in the perception and willingness to act and curb social inequality by the population of the two cities. The paper is based on a comparative and representative public opinion survey conducted in the cities of Belo Horizonte, Brazil, and Cape Town, South Africa. Multinomial models estimate the effect of class, race and gender upon the perception of the society's shape. The paper demonstrates that although these societies are sharply unequal, the respondent's perception of social inequality is distinct in the two societies. Brazilians perceive the shape of their society as more polarized than South Africans. South Africans also showed to be more inclined to contribute to social policy, at personal cost, than Brazilians. While in Brazil social class and schooling are the major determinants of this inequality perception, in South Africa race and social class are the main explanatory factors. Social class, however, is negatively related to inequality perception in Brazil and positively in South Africa.

Articulating ghostly bodies and corpses with social remembrance. How senses of bodies and embodiment embrace a new home-grown politics of love

Body is defined as a kind of extension of the ultimate space where cultural normalization takes place. This paper focuses on three main features of significances. It starts and ends with an elemental notion of body, which leaves out the binary representations of it, and invites us to think about the human body as a holography where social relations are carved and new socialities are coming up, and whose epidermis surface bounds a psychical unit. Finally this is a concept which contents the limits of social experiences, subjectivations and perceptions of our basic drives.

In the context of social practices, I will explore how notions as "ghostly memories" have emerged from local cultures, and have recently become part of memory struggles where the body becomes a bystander of the past and a spectral construction. By taking some contributions from the so-called field of haunting memory I will connect notions of absent bodies and current visualization of corpses as a key to remembrance (to recollect) society, as a way to recollect remains of social.

A component of this paper will be not just to analyze the newest place of corpses as part of a global iconography where they have took part of an alienating implosion of meanings, mainly when they have been exposed to a media-gaze and signed the landscapes of violence, but to emphasize how bodies and embodiments of different kinds are functioned to open set of neighborhood, and perhaps (as Kenneth Reinhard has mentioned) of a new social narrative where a sense of love is able to begins where politics ends.

The exemplary adults and the challenge of seeking care for sexually transmitted infections among older adults in Nigeria

Achieving age-friendly primary care system requires right-based therapeutic encounter between the physician and older patients. This study explores the Yoruba cultural notion of exemplar older adult within the context of seeking care for sexually transmitted infections in Nigeria. Four vignettes based focus group discussions on age categories and gender basis were held with 39 middle and older adults (50-75years) in Ibadan metropolis, an urban city in southwest Nigeria. Findings showed notable gender/age variations in perceptions of exemplary adults, sexually aging well and seeking help due to sexuality problems. Middle aged male than their older counterparts related sexually ageing well with desires and actual engagement in heterosexual relations; and absence of sexually dysfunctions in old age as good masculinity. Older females emphasized expressing sexual desires within socially restricted context such as marriage and suppressing such desires in old age as more representative of sexually ageing well. Older females that behave contrary were stigmatized than their male counterparts. Other important sub-themes include: having a positive social outlook, and absence of sexually transmitted infections. To promote healthy ageing among cultures, sexual health services should create avenues for old people infected with sexually transmitted infections to seek appropriate treatments without stigmatization.

Marriage norms, social sanctions and honour killings in Haryana

The institution of marriage has emerged as a subject of critical investigation in the social sciences due to its close links with processes of historical change and forms of social organization. In that large segment of an individual's life, which constitutes his social life and involves relationship with another individual, this institution assures extreme significance. Significant aspect of north Indian marriage and kinship pattern pertains to certain rules and prescriptions observed while fixing marriage. Caste endogamy, gotra exogamy and village exogamy are strongly prescribed norms for marriage. Marriage and kinship regulations specify the norms and restrictions observed such as prohibition of marriage with in the same or other prohibited gotrs with in the caste group called biradari. The present study is based on ethnographic survey conducted in one of the affluent northern states of India i.e. Haryana which is fast urbanising with extensive consumerist culture and individualism, grappling with all sorts of issues of tradition and modernity. There is a paradoxical situation in the sense that on one hand, there are constitutional provisions and safeguards to protect the rights of the women/girls by ensuring equality of opportunity and building gender just society. On the other hand, it is known as a state for rampant foeticide, honour killings, dictates by kangaroo panchayats, violence against women outside as well as in natal families on the choice of their marriage partners.. Thus, there is limited choice available to boys and girls to select their own partners, with strict marriage rules, customary traditions and already skewed sex ratio.

Keeping in view the emerging scenario in Haryana, an attempt has been made to examine crucial questions such as importance of marriage, diverse marriage norms, restrictions, customary practices, and new phenomena taking place across caste/class/community.

Politics of inclusion and local governance in India

Panchayati Raj Institutions are entrusted self-governance at the village level in India. It provides an ideal forum for decentralised planning and implementation for development work in accordance with people's needs and aspirations at the grass root level. With this assumption the government of India made 73rd Constitutional Amendment in December, 1992. It was a landmark event in which over a million elected representatives in India made efforts in planning, monitoring and implementing the development programmes through village councils known as gram sabhas, thus making India as the world's largest functioning democracy.

The main focus of the present paper is to address the question of empowerment of scheduled castes and women. In this context examined the extent to which the new provisions have enabled the hitherto excluded underprivileged groups or categories such as SCs and women, to be included in the rural power structure. To what extent and in what way they have been empowered? And if not, what are the socio-economic factors leading to their exclusion? What is the response of the dominant communities to the inclusion and participation of excluded groups? Lastly, we propose to examine and explain the impact of these changes on the social structure and ethos of the rural society at various levels. These questions have been explored during the second panchayat elections (1999-2003) and also in 2011 during the forth panchayat election Haryana. The process of social inclusion was in its initial stages during the first phase of study so an attempt was made, after a decade in order to examine the changes in the power relations at the grass root level (rural settings) of an Indian state.

The policies of nationalization and privatization in India: Anti-poverty or anti-reservations

Globalization of science and technology research & development

In the eloquent phraseology of Derek Price (1975), "Science since Babylon," modern science and technology have their antecedents in the historical development of ideas from antiquity to the present times. According to Joseph Needham (1990), scientific ideas from China flowed to Europe prior to the Industrial Revolution. In his Atlas of the Islamic World, Francis Robinson (1984) suggests that the Moorish renaissance in Spain (8th through 16th centuries) lit the torch that led to the Renaissance and Reformation in Europe. Following the Industrial Revolution and colonialism, a great divide separated Europe and America from rest of the world. Scientific knowledge flowed unidirectionally for nearly 200 years from West to the East, from North to the South, until recently. Contemporary science and technology developments are marked by multidirectional flows of knowledge and movement of scientific workers on a world scale.

Starting with weapons research and development during and after the Second World War, contemporary generation of scientific knowledge is truly global in character. Some of the most visible evidence of multinational "big science" includes international space research, the Human Genome Project, AIDS and malaria research, and physics at CERN and the Hadron Collider. This paper will argue that the rising cost of research, cross-cultural movement of scientists and engineers, the power of Diasporas, and above all the forces of globalization, the global economy, and global competition for markets, materials, and manpower per se are propelling international cooperation of science and technology and are expected to so at all levels in the foreseeable future.

Intra- and interpersonal risk trade-offs

Moral intuitions about intra- and interpersonal risk trade-offs diverge. While merely weighing possible benefits against costs seems justified in a single person case, the same does not apply when the costs fall on one person and benefits on another. This poses a well-known problem to utilitarian theories which aggregate (expected) gains and losses without concern to distributional matters. Several other moral theories that pay heed to distributional matters, it has recently been argued, also face difficulties to accommodate these intuitions. In my talk I will apply specific versions of prioritarianism, egalitarianism and contractualism to a concrete case, and provide new insight into the question whether – and if so, how – the differences in the intuitions can be accounted for with a consistent underlying moral theory or set of principles. Practical implications for risk analysis will briefly be discussed.

"Las niñas y la cocina" y "los inspectores en los mataderos". Alcances de la educación alimentaria en el discurso pedagógico

Este trabajo presenta algunos resultados de un proyecto de investigación en desarrollo que indaga las concepciones, valores, normas, prescripciones, instituciones y prácticas referidos a la educación alimentaria que se integraron en el discurso pedagógico para las escuelas primarias y medias, en Argentina, en el período 1875-1960.

La historia de la educación alimentaria escolar, entendida como institucionalización y difusión de conocimientos y preceptos sobre producción, elaboración e ingesta de alimentos, da cuenta de la confluencia de concepciones e indicaciones de distinto orden, origen y localización.

Del análisis de dos revistas pedagógicas oficiales y de alrededor de cincuenta textos escolares es posible señalar que, a través de explicaciones científicas, recomendaciones sanitarias, relatos morales e imágenes de distinto tipo, el discurso pedagógico se orientó enseñar a los niños y las niñas que asistían a la escuela primaria qué, cuánto y cómo comer.

Simultáneamente junto con el intento de elaboración de un cierto régimen de ingesta - teóricamente adecuado a las necesidades de una sociedad moderna y civilizada - los saberes y prácticas referidos a la producción de alimentos y a la elaboración de comidas saludables tendieron a promover identidades diferenciadas ya fuera a través de distribuciones de roles familiares y sociales en clave de género como de inserciones ocupacionales con destinatarios de clase social definidos.

Effects of climate change on agricultural practice and quality of life of rural older farmers in Nigeria

Over the last five decades, Africa in general and Nigeria in particular has witnessed drastic decline in agricultural productivity and more than 200 million Africans suffer from malnutrition as a direct result of the declines. One third of the population in sub-Saharan Africa is malnourished, particularly the vulnerable groups (older persons, women and children) most affected. The "oil boom" with its sudden and unexpected wealth in Nigeria in the mid 70s seriously undermined the status of agricultural production and regrettably, succeeded in creating utter neglect for and relegation of agriculture to the background. Thus, by 1976 the declining rate of agriculture which was about 7.8% between 1970 and 1974 had reached an intolerable level. The decline in agricultural productivity, which led to hunger, poverty and malnutrition, is also attributed to several other interrelated and complex factors of climate change which include increasing deforestation and land degradation. The deforestation and land degradation is associated with severe droughts and desertification, escalating soil erosion, Stalination, soil compaction and poor soil fertility which are all by products of global warming and climatic change. Unfortunately, older farmers have limited access to financial and technological inputs necessary for sustained agricultural production. The livelihood of the older people is routinely being afflicted with the increasing poverty problems in the continent. This paper examines the effects of the phenomenon of global warming on agricultural practices, its effects on the food production and the quality of life of the older rural farmers in Nigeria. It adopts critical theory to extrapolate the issues. It also relies on both primary and secondary data as its methodology. The paper concludes that Nigeria government needs to ensure the development of an effective policy framework that includes bio-safety and biotechnology development that can guarantee food security in the continent.

Gender differentials in the socio-economic well-being of older persons in Lagos state, Nigeria

National and international organizations continue to express concerns on older persons worldwide, and have suggested measures for improving their lives and overall well-being within the framework of sustainable development. However, a common experience is that of disempowerments of the older persons regarding their person and other rights. Theoretically, older persons are not a homogenous group. It has been observed that the gender of the individual affects access and opportunities to the available old age security system. For a significant proportion of older persons in Nigeria, socio-economic, socio-demographic, and socio-cultural factors play important roles in influencing their life-course experiences and overall socio-economic well being in later life. This study focuses on the differentials in the situations and capabilities of older persons in Lagos State rather than viewing them as a homogeneous group. The triangulation method was used for the collection of research information. A multi-stage sampling procedure was adopted to select the respondents included in the study. The data collected were analysed using the Statistical Package for Social Sciences (SPSS) version 10.0. Cross-tabulations of social and economic characteristics were done to allow for a general description of the respondents and their household characteristics. Hypotheses testing were done at two levels, using both the chi-square and logistic regression analysis. Chi-square was used to test the level of significant relationship between independent and dependent variables; while the logistic regression technique was used to determine the net effect of explanatory factors on the probability that the gender of the older persons would influence their overall socio-economic well being. This study found that male and female older persons exhibited differences in socio-economic well-being in their later lives. The study further found that inequality in personal income and socio-economic well being is influenced by gender and life course experiences.

How society is producing its own crisis: A systems theoretical case study of Japan

In Japan, the triple crisis after the March 2011 disasters (earthquake, tsunami and nuclear disasters) is still going on. Then why can't this problem be solved promptly, and why is such misery continuing in spite of Japan's desire to revive? This paper tries to answer these questions from the viewpoint of Niklas Luhmann's sociological systems theory, especially his theory of the mass media system.

Luhmann defined the system of mass media as a particular function system of society. It consists of a series of communicative events and constructs its own reality by using the distinction of information and non-information.

As for the situation after the Earthquake, the word hisai-chi (disaster-hit areas) has become a cliché in Japan. Here this word becomes the focus because it seems to indicate a defect of the mass media system in Japan. In Japan's mass media system, the Tohoku area tends to be identified as hisai-chi, however strictly speaking, a large part of the Tohoku area is not damaged. In addition, other areas suffering from the disasters, such as Kanto's coastal areas, are rarely mentioned as hisai-chi. In this case, by drawing a distinction, the mass media system separates the audience from the hisai-chi areas and makes them feel safe. By using the word, the system has been producing a sense of security whereas people may actually be in insecure areas.

In conclusion, on one hand the mass media system as a function system of society has always been behaving normatively as if it is going to make those that are suffering overcome this crisis, and on the other hand, it is producing and promoting a system-specified reality that obstructs recovery at the same time.

The exceptional migrants?: The regularization of migrant domestic workers in Turkey

Since 1990's, Turkey has become a country of immigration, with domestic work emerging as a major realm that attracts migration. Currently Turkey lacks a migration law that would grant migrants some kind of regular status and a series of social rights. This situation consequently renders an overall framework that reproduces and fosters irregularity. Domestic work however presents an exception to this larger system of governance by ambiguity. Starting in 2007, the government introduced a policy to semi-legalize specifically domestic workers. Under the sponsorship of an employer, a migrant domestic worker is permitted to extend her tourist visa, valid for one or two months, and turn it into a residence permit that is valid up to a year. Although the current legislation requires the foreigners to have work and residence permits to acquire legal status, this semi-legalisation via residence permits renders domestic workers an exceptional status among migrants. The reasons behind this exception are multifold. On the one hand, there is the implicit recognition that the migrant domestic workers have presented a remedy to the problem of care deficit. On the other hand, the fact that they are exclusively women who are employed by families and in the security of homes altogether make migrant domestics less of a "threat" in comparison with other communities and more "apt" to legalise, if the boundaries are well-defined and asserted. By focusing on this exceptional practice of the semi-legalization of migrant domestics, this paper aims to scrutinize how the feminization of migration into domestic work, that occurs in a larger context that is adverse to immigration, should be analysed.

Housing and sustainable development: Reflection on urban women's rights to real property in Eastern Nigeria

Housing problems among women in eastern parts of Nigeria seem to be cumulative effects of long term placement of women in disadvantaged positions. For instance, female children were not encouraged to have formal education and could not inherit landed properties. They were made to accept that the society did not expect them to own houses; this is because any man living in his wife's house was seen as living on dunghills.

This present study aims at examining changes that have occurred to some of the cultural beliefs and practices; and the effects of these on the state of house ownership of women in the region. This is with a view to recommending programmes that will ameliorate, specifically, women's housing problems and other problems arising from unequal access to societal resources in general. The study will attempt an adoption of both quantitative and qualitative techniques to obtain data on a target sample of 200 women drawn from two of the states in the region.

Fumbling in the dark: A study on the participation of Iranian refugees in Ankara (Turkey)

Turkey is one of the most important countries for transit migration as it's on the route from Middle East to Europe. To compete with the pressure brought by the huge numbers of asylum seekers who are willing to reach Europe, Turkey put "geographical limitation" to 1951 Convention in Geneva, so as not to give any rights to Non-European asylum seekers (NEAS) to stay in the country permanently. Hence, all the NEAS are resettled to a third country (USA, Canada or Europe) after they are recognized as refugees by UNHCR office in Turkey. Nevertheless, the difficulties in obtaining refugee status combined with the hard living circumstances (e.g. there is no integration programme for refugees in Turkey) limit their participation in society. In order to comprehend their participation strategies, this research focuses on the Iranian asylum seekers and refugees, who are one of the most populous refugee groups in Turkey, in the capital city of Ankara. By using snowball method, 15 in-depth interviews are conducted with political, religious and Lgbt refugees from Iran. According to the results, although interviewees officially have rights to work and benefit from the health services and education (main articles of 1951 Convention), they are not able to practice them due to government's incomplete legislation. In this respect, the role of cultural and social capital of Iranian refugees emerges as a very significant instrument to overcome livelihood problems and enable them to participate in the society socially and politically. Last but not least, while social networks are considered to have positive results on migrant's social capital, it seems not to be congruent with the case of Iranian Refugees' due to the lack of trust towards each other within Iranian community.

Women's role in the current social movement in Yemen

Since Dec. 2010, Arab region has been going through a tremendous social change. This significant social movement has resulted in different levels of revolutions. Women at different ages have been considerably engaged in such a phenomenon. This paper aims at exploring the role of Yemeni women; examines the implications of having a large number of women take a substantial role in the process of social uprising. Will this contribute to a major social change of the traditional gender roles in Yemeni society? The paper intends to address the reasons behind the integration of gender roles in this episode, social transaction and women's social status in Yemen. Meanwhile, the paper takes the liberty to identify ways in which feminists can utilize this revolution as a tool for self and collective empowerment. To justify its data collection, the paper utilizes the ongoing occurrence and examines women's manifestation. To achieve its objectivity, a historical analysis is carefully implemented in this study.

Linguistic integration of the descendants of migrants in Catalonia

This paper presents the results of a quantitative research which analyzes the linguistic integration of the descendants of migrants in Catalonia (a bilingual society) departing from the segmented assimilation theory. The main objectives are: 1) identify factors associated with the acquisition of written skills in both official languages of the host society (Catalan and Spanish languages) and, 2) Know what factors affect language preferences towards Catalan, Castilian or another languages of origin, when it is other than Castilian. The main hypothesis relates socioeconomic status to preferences and language skills. The data used in the analysis were from the first stage of a longitudinal study in Barcelona of a statistically representative sample of second-generation students in public schools located in the metropolitan area of Barcelona. The study replicates the CILS project methodological design. The survey was conducted during the fall of 2008 and allows a sample of 3578 cases, which are statistically representative of the universe of young second generation of the Metropolitan Area of Barcelona. We analyze data through bivariate analysis and multivariate logistic regression analysis. The results show significant differences among the factors that influence the skills and language preferences determine. Language skills are mainly determined by variables related to the time of entry into the educational system, observable by age and year of arrival in Spain. The Spanish-speaking origin is shown as a negative factor that operates in the subjective assessment of competition in Catalan. In contrast, the Castilian language preferences to their main determinants family composition and family socioeconomic status. National origin shows significant effects on preference for Castilian. This leads us to conclude that although the education system operates in the equation equal language skills, the formation of preferences is more linked to family structure and position in the host society.

El movimiento social por los derechos de los niños y adolescentes en São Paulo: Su momento y su sitio en la construcción de la política pública de derechos

Este artículo analiza el movimiento de los derechos de los niños y adolescentes en São Paulo (Movimiento DCA, sigla en portugués) frente a dos cuestiones: la primera es el hecho de que se trata de una red de actores heterogéneos y estos actores desempeñan papeles diferentes en la dirección del objetivo principal del movimiento: la construcción y cumplimiento de los derechos y políticas de los niños y adolescentes, que están vinculados a la implementación del Estatuto del Niño y Adolescente (ECA en portugués). La heterogeneidad del movimiento se identifica como un problema, sino también como su "carácter innovador y diferenciado". Hemos tratado de identificar los diferentes actores en la línea de valorar esta heterogeneidad y la relación entre actores societales y estatales. La perspectiva teórica de "redes" o "comunidades de política pública" presentase como una posibilidad a explorar en la análisis de la relación entre los actores sociales y estatales que conforman la "comunidad" de la política de derechos de niños y adolescentes, que coincide con el Sistema de Garantía de los Derechos de Niños y Adolescentes, de acuerdo con la Resolución 113 del Consejo Nacional de los Derechos de Niños y Adolescentes (Conanda en portugués). La segunda cuestión es la posible oposición entre los repertorios de lucha más centrada en la protesta y presentación de denuncias, y las formas de acción más enfocadas en la articulación, elaboración y negociación de propuestas de políticas públicas. La presencia de estas dos formas de acción política, una más conflictiva y otra más constructiva, es una característica de muchos movimientos sociales en Brasil, que han estado muy involucrados en la formulación y el control social sobre nuevas políticas sociales de derechos. Estos movimientos se han caracterizado por la articulación entre los "ciclos de de confrontación" y los momentos de negociación, y entre la ubicación en el lugar social e institucional. La metodología de esta investigación fue la pesquisa bibliográfica y documental, acompañada de visitas de campo (al Foro municipal de los derechos de niños y adolescentes), así como entrevistas informales con algunos de sus miembros. El resultado obtenido fue la caracterización del Movimiento DCA sobre las dos cuestiones planteadas y la identificación de una bibliografía apropiada para tratar de una manera productiva estos dos temas.

Nuevos actores en el movimiento por los derechos de los adolescentes en São Paulo: La cooptación, el corporativismo, la institucionalización - una confrontación entre las evaluaciones académicas y de los propios activistas

El Movimiento por los Derechos del Niño y del Adolescente siempre fue formado por la articulación de diferentes Foros que agregan actores distintos. La heterogeneidad ha sido considerada un problema y, a veces por el contrario, una riqueza, como un desafío de diálogo con las diferencias. Con las tendencias actuales en la contratación de las organizaciones sociales para la prestación de servicios públicos, estos Foros están incluyendo numerosas entidades que tienen contratos o convenios con el Estado, y los problemas de la institucionalización del Movimiento y de una actuación corporativa e cooptada por el Estado, son cada vez más señalados en la literatura y también por varios miembros del Movimiento. El municipio de São Paulo se caracteriza por una presencia intensa de las organizaciones sociales en la política de bienestar social, que incorporó en los últimos años la política para el adolescente infractor, a través de la municipalización de la política y las sanciones socioeducativas en un entorno abierto. De esta manera nuevos actores están participando del Movimiento por los Derechos del Niño y del Adolescente, especialmente en la cuestión de los adolescentes en conflicto con la ley. Este artículo presenta los resultados de un estudio que analiza los actores que conforman este movimiento, en dos de sus espacios significativos en São Paulo, el Foro Municipal de los Derechos del Niño y Adolescente (FMDCA) y el Foro Municipal de Servicios Sociales (FAS, siglas en portugués), analizando su relación con espacios de participación y control social sobre la política de derechos, en especial al Consejo y la Conferencia Municipal de los Derechos del Niño y del Adolescente. El estudio tuvo como objetivo captar la voz de esos actores sociales a cerca de la institucionalización y sobre los problemas de una posible acción corporativa y / o cooptada por los gobiernos como resultado de la relación de contratación entre ellos. Se buscó escucharlos sobre la pregunta: ¿es posible para las entidades contratadas el ejercicio crítico de control social sobre las políticas públicas?

El ingreso al mercado de trabajo científico y la elección de los temas de investigación en Argentina: Perspectivas de becarios doctorales de ciencias sociales y humanidades

Este trabajo se propone analizar las perspectivas de un conjunto de jóvenes investigadores en formación pertenecientes a las ciencias sociales y las humanidades y que se desempeñan en un Consejo de Investigación argentino, acerca de las estrategias que pusieron en práctica para la obtención de sus becas doctorales y la selección de los temas que se encuentran abordando en sus respectivos proyectos de tesis. Tales estrategias van delineando los comienzos de su carrera profesional como investigadores académicos, articulando tres tipos de aspectos: primero, aspectos cognitivos relacionados con los problemas de estudio; segundo, aspectos culturales relacionados con las formas de trabajo y los valores de los directores, grupos de investigación y comunidades disciplinarias en los que se están insertando; y tercero, aspectos normativos relacionados con los requerimientos que identifican como determinantes para obtener evaluaciones positivas en la organización en la que se desempeñan como becarios y a la que esperan pertenecer como investigadores de carrera.

Los datos provienen de veinte entrevistas en profundidad a becarios doctorales Tipo I (que se encuentran en los dos primeros años de la formación doctoral) del Consejo Nacional de Investigaciones Científicas y Técnicas (CONICET) de Argentina pertenecientes al campo de las ciencias sociales y las humanidades, que tienen como lugar de trabajo un instituto o universidad situado en la Ciudad Autónoma de Buenos Aires, y que ingresaron al Consejo de Investigación entre 2008 y 2010. Las entrevistas fueron realizadas y transcritas a comienzos de 2011 por estudiantes avanzados de sociología de la Universidad de Buenos Aires en el marco de un proyecto de investigación de cátedra dirigido por las autoras.

Globalizaciones y nuevas diplomacias en las Américas. La implementación de políticas públicas para la inclusión de sociedades civiles en las agendas de política exterior, política internacional y agendas gl Esta investigación se enmarca en los estudios globales y analiza transformaciones de procesos de acción colectiva en las Américas. Aquí, identificamos el desarrollo de "ventanas de oportunidades" para la inclusión de actores de sociedades civiles en temas de política exterior, política internacional y agendas globales en Argentina y México.

El análisis entre globalización y sociedad civil en las Américas, suele centrarse, mayoritariamente, en cómo lo global impacta en las sociedades civiles. Los análisis donde las prácticas de los actores de sociedades civiles forman parte de la constitución de lo global son poco desarrollados. Aquí, nos enfocamos en la dimensión política de las globalizaciones; dentro de los Estados, gobiernos y sociedades están cambiando como parte de un marco global. Así, el estudio de la acción colectiva en las Américas no se limita a mostrar cómo los actores de sociedades civiles "resisten" o "protestan".

Desde las dimensiones de la acción colectiva (estructura de oportunidades políticas, estructuras de movilización y análisis de marcos) evidenciamos cómo las sociedades civiles en las Américas contribuyen a la construcción de nuevas instituciones y redefinen la relación entre sociedades civiles y gobiernos. Aquí, en términos de oportunidades políticas en las globalizaciones, los gobiernos readaptan y rediseñan la gestión de las políticas públicas que contribuyen a la democratización de lo público. En este sentido, en la relación entre gobiernos y sociedades encontramos expresiones de estos cambios que se enfrentan a sus propias resistencias por diferentes inercias culturales, por intereses o por las novedades mismas del cambio.

Con las Nuevas Diplomacias retratamos un espacio de interacción donde gobiernos y sociedades civiles desarrollan transformaciones sociopolíticas innovadoras. A través de la implementación de políticas públicas en las cancillerías argentina y mexicana exponemos los desarrollos incipientes de políticas globales como ejercicios de democratización en las Américas.

Los vínculos de respeto en la experiencia de los estudiantes del nivel secundario

Esta ponencia se propone presentar los avances preliminares de una investigación en curso sobre los vínculos emocionales de respeto en los estudiantes de escuelas secundarias de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires (Argentina). Desde una aproximación cualitativa, dicho estudio se propone comprender los sentidos y las formas prácticas de expresión de respeto, así como también aquellas situaciones y prácticas cotidianas que logran poner en riesgo este tipo de vínculos, en la experiencia de los estudiantes que actualmente se encuentran cursando sus estudios secundarios y participan –por fuera del horario escolar– de propuestas recreativas con intencionalidad formativa.

En el marco de este proyecto, se entiende al respeto como una de las formas por medio de las cuales se expresa el reconocimiento de los otros y, simultáneamente, indica una forma específica de aceptación de sí por otros, en la medida en que se confirma el sentido del valor que uno (o muchos) se reconoce (o reconocen) para sí mismo (o para nosotros). Se trata de un vínculo emocional que raramente es estable y que se expresa en el marco de configuraciones singulares producidas en el interjuego de determinadas condiciones históricas, sociales, espaciales y subjetivas. De allí, la matriz tanto social como individual constitutiva del respeto.

La presentación estará estructurada en torno a dos bloques. El primero, aborda algunas conceptualizaciones teóricas en torno al respeto como forma del reconocimiento. El segundo bloque, avanza a partir del material empírico recolectado sobre cómo los vínculos de respeto que forjan y sostienen estos jóvenes entran en relación con procesos de construcción identitaria.

Los bienes religiosos y sus formas de producción. estudio del complejo editorial católico y evangélico en la Argentina

Desde una sociología económica de las industrias culturales podemos reconocer que el libro religioso no es sólo un "nicho" de consumo, o sea, un espacio diferencial del mercado con una oferta distintiva. Las editoriales componen un complejo editorial, con sus redes estables de productores, distribuidores y puntos de venta, su cuerpo de representantes en la cámara del libro religioso e, incluso, su propia feria del libro cristiano en donde se reúnen anualmente empresarios, pastores y librerías. Ahora bien, el entramado de relaciones económicas se configura, a veces directamente como prolongación, y otras como un juego de articulaciones y superposiciones dinámicas con el conjunto más o menos estable de instituciones (iglesias, productoras, fundaciones externas, agencias publicitarias etc.) que comprende el universo religioso. El objetivo de la ponencia consiste en explorar las formas de producción de objetos culturales que emprenden las principales empresas editoriales católicas y evangélicas de la Argentina. Ellas se caracterizan por producir y distribuir no sólo libros, periódicos y revistas, sino también DVDs, películas, artículos de librería y distintivos cristianos. Por lo tanto, se encuentran con la difícil tarea de articular contenidos religiosos, con su propio sistema de referencias y legalidad, bajo el formato de mercancías dirigidas al mercado, o a un nicho dentro de él, del cual dependen -siempre en distintos grados- para reproducir sus condiciones de existencia. La investigación presenta, por el momento, 20 entrevistas en profundidad y análisis de documentos de diferentes editoriales (San Pablo, Paulinas, Certeza, Peniel y Kairós), localizadas dentro de lo que denominaremos como el circuito religioso y el circuito secular del mundo del libro.

Memoria e identidad religiosa

El autor indaga en los modos de construcción y negociación de la memoria religiosa en la Escuela Científica Basilio. A partir de los aportes de

Maurice Halbwachs se intentará analizar las distintas formas en que dicha institución religiosa negocia su identidad en la configuración de una memoria colectiva. Los modos locales de experimentación del pasado y vinculación con lo sagrado conforman los dos grandes ejes de interés de esta investigación, relevados principalmente bajo las técnicas de observación participante y entrevistas abiertas, extensas y recurrentes a informantes calificados. La organización expositiva del trabajo comienza reseñando brevemente la historia de la institución y sus principales ejes cosmológicos en torno a la conceptualización del sujeto y su relación con la potencia sagrada. En una segunda parte se describe la fiesta espiritual de aniversario número 92 de la institución, en donde un conflicto interno se resuelve a en el terreno de la memoria.

Shifting realities: Dislocating Palestinian Jerusalemites from the capital into the edge

The idea of the right to the city expresses a new political point of view regarding citizenship and residence (Khamaisi, 2007). According to Lefebvre (1996), the construction of citizenship is based on space inhabitance. Lefebvre underlines the importance of space since it plays a key role in localizing citizenship. As Purcell asserts, this concept empowers urban inhabitants and argues that the urban citizenship is not an accident of nationality, yet it is through utilizing space and time and interacting within a social fabric (Purcell, 2002:102).

In the light of an Israeli occupation of East Jerusalem[1], a geo-political reality was imposed on the Palestinian inhabitants, where land appropriation, laws and legislations, the segregation wall and confinement of Palestinians into fragmented ghettos were all leading drivers in changing the boundaries of Jerusalem as a whole and altering the Palestinian social fabric present there. This entails weakening Palestinian inhabitants' status to mere permanent residents rather than citizens (OCHA, 2011), contradicting Lefebvre's concept, in which he argues the rights of the citizen as an urban dweller and user of multiple services (Lefebvre, 1996).

Within the session, we would like to propose a case study dealing with the unequal urban dilemmas in East Jerusalem by deeply examining the case of KufrAqab, a neighborhood which currently is administrated by the municipality of Jerusalem yet residents lack basic civil rights. Nevertheless, this neighborhood is aggressively dislocated physically by the segregation wall from the rest of East Jerusalem. We seek to put forward a specific question: is KufrAqab phenomenon asserting the right to the city or is part of a mechanism of systematic displacement and isolation?

[1] In 1967 Israel occupied East Jerusalem which was under Jordanian rule and annexed it to West Jerusalem which was under Israeli rule. The Palestinian population by end of 2007 is 256,820.

Deviant or distinctive subcultures? Translocal subcultural trends in Eastern European context

Youth subcultures are often considered deviant and associated with violent behaviour. The latter is especially the case in Eastern Europe, where the society is not used to pluralities of lifestyles and differences are often demonised. While in today's Western world various youth lifestyles tend to be seen as consumer networks with varying style preferences, in Estonia they are more often associated with rebellion, acts of vandalism, violent rituals, etc. by the wider public.

This paper investigates the reasons behind the negative images of subcultures and explains it through deviant origins of subcultural trends. The paper focuses on the changes that translocal subcultural trends undergo when diffused to a new society and on the meanings attached by young people to their participation in global subcultures using the case of Estonia. The empirical part of the paper is based on open-ended interviews and results of participant observation of three subcultures (hip-hop, metal, bikers) conducted in Estonia in 2008.

The analyses show how contemporary subcultural trends have departed from their original norms and values and how the symbols and meanings within subcultural trends have changed. However, it is possible to interpret the same symbols differently, which might be the cause of the negative image for the wider society.

Disciplining spaces and spaces of insurgence: Neoliberal restructuring and workers' socio-environmental struggles in the urban South

In the last forty years or so, the traditional workers-capital struggle has somehow lost its analytical appeal, in favour of new angles to social struggles, such as those introduced by the feminist, racial justice and environmental movements. Drawing on the aforementioned critiques and acknowledging the intersectionality inherent in the social construction of social relationships and subjects formation, this paper revisits class politics through a socio-environmental struggle prompted by flexible accumulation in the urban context of the global south.

Focusing on the neoliberal restructuring process of the Argentinean fisheries sector in Mar del Plata city (historically, the national epicentre of the activity), the paper examines how workers' struggles over urban-based production are regulated and mediated at multiple scales and spatial configurations (the household, the factory, the harbour, the sea). The analysis covers almost a decade of conflicts labelled by the media as the 'Fisheries War', extending from the late 1990s to the first decade of the 21st century. It explores thematerial and discursive practices of female and male workers both in adapting to and resisting two articulated processes: the precarisation of work through the creation of 'pseudo-cooperatives', a façade through which wagedemployment was replaced by piecemeal contracts, and the plundering of nature through the depletion of the main commercial species. The analysis aims to shed light on how apparent 'permanences' formed through long processes of social change are subject to processes of dissolution and reformulation that give rise to new forms of resistance and subordination and reshape the relation between workers, capitalists, the state and the urbancondition.

The heuristics of place-making: Mapping the spatiality of urban (in)justice

Rapid transformations in the urban global south are creating 'hot-spots' where various interests, discourses and practices are contested, shaping the distribution of resources and opportunities, but also activating/disactivating the political agency of certain social groups and urban territories. This paper examines how place-making mapping by ordinary citizens might reinforce, resist or transform the reproduction of injustice in contested spatial interventions, where everyday practices are confronted with planned market-led strategies of regeneration.

Drawing on a number of participatory projects dedicated to map place-making and building on Lefebvre's and other scholars work on the 'spatiality of injustice', the paper examines the extent to which mapping of place-making can unleash the agency of collective landscapes and ordinary citizens in the co-production of space, place and knowledge. It departs from the premise that because maps have the ability to construct spaces as well as social relations, they have agency, and as tools of knowledge, are able to open up spaces to influence decisions making processes, challenge mainstream social constructions and denounce and transform the spatiality of urban (in)justices.

The discussion explores three specific dimensions in the political act of mapping place-making. First, mapping as 'enframing'/reframing: examines the capacity of maps to enframe landscapes, that is to shape them in a form they never had before. Hence it is argued that maps also construct and can reframe the 'conceived' and its teleological nature. Second, mapping as exclusion/ inclusion reflects on how decisions about what and who to exclude/include are made, why and with what consequences. Third mapping as enabling transformation: examines the ability of maps and map-making processes to contest discriminatory power and produce collectively negotiated outcomes. The paper concludes by assessing the potential of mapping to enable the transformation of spatial (in)justices by activating the political agency of misrecognised actors and urban territories.

Home economics: Organising the household for global finance

Financial markets are increasingly integral to daily life. Relatively routine financial practices such as the purchase of houses, cars, consumer goods, and the payment of insurance, phone and utility bills are connected to globally integrated financial markets through processes of securitization. Moreover, finance itself is constituted in important new ways through the borrowing and saving practices of ordinary households. Market logics are therefore reshaping the organisation of social life more broadly, extending to social domains once thought to be outside, beyond or in opposition to the spheres of 'the market' and 'the economy', as they are commonly understood. This entanglement of financial markets with spaces and activities not previously associated with processes of calculation, measure, and economic value suggests a considerable challenge to received understandings of the relationships between economy and society, production and reproduction, and life and labour.

This paper explores these shifting relationships between the household and financial markets. It suggests that the organisation of contemporary global finance cannot be adequately understood without taking into consideration the redistribution of financial risks and responsibilities onto the household and the implicit expectations that it will perform in particular ways. As a site of mediation between individuals and markets, the household is a space not only intimately entwined with such major political and economic shifts: it is also where assumptions of responsible self-management are located and therefore a site upon which such processes are effectively dependent. Ordinary households, for example, have been exhorted to perform their own kinds of 'calculative agencies' in their efforts to function as competent financial subjects. We have already witnessed how some of these agencies played out in relation to the global financial crisis; we can also see them at work in other less spectacular events.

Fragmentation of the medical profession and CAM: A consequence of CAM 's closure strategies in Portugal

Recent sociological research has shown that complementary and alternative medicine's (CAM) recent strategies of closure have had an impact on the medical profession, as the latter has shifted from a position of rejection to a position of selective incorporation of CAM in many Western countries. The consequences of this shift, such as the destabilisation of group cohesion and collective identity within the medical profession, have not been properly analysed and understood. The proposed paper is part of broader research that has been conducted in Portugal about the current relationship between CAM and the medical profession. A main research concern has been answering the following research question: To what extent have the medical profession and CAM been cohesive in their interplay in Portugal?

This study concentrates on two main CAM therapies, acupuncture and homeopathy. Data are derived from documentary search and in-depth interviews with 10 traditional acupuncturists, 10 traditional homeopaths, 10 orthodox medical doctors not committed to CAM and 11 orthodox medical doctors committed to CAM. The data analysis suggested that a main consequence of the closure strategies enacted by CAM has been that the medical profession and CAM have broken up into diverging factions with fragmentary views on CAM. First, the adoption of different stances towards CAM has been evident in the context of the relationship between the institutional elite of the Portuguese Medical Council and the rank and file medical doctors. Second, medical doctors committed to CAM called themselves 'rule breakers'. This suggests looking at these professionals as being in a transitional or liminal stage i.e. in betwixt and between their profession.

Third, CAM practitioners' views on their scope and standards of practice and on their credentialism-making were far from uniform. The proposed paper aims to analyse this professional fragmentation in more detail.

Strategies of CAM to cam'ise health-care in Portugal: The case of acupuncture and homeopathy

Recent sociological research has shown that complementary and alternative medicine (CAM) has enacted a number of strategies of inclusion and demarcation to achieve occupational closure and therefore legitimacy within mainstream health-care worldwide. The proposed paper reports on research conducted in Portugal about the strategies used by CAM in order to achieve occupational closure within health-care. It aims to answer the following research question: What have been the main strategies of CAM to promote alternative conceptualisations of healing within mainstream health-care in Portugal? Through an analysis informed by a social closure framework and Abbott's system of professions, this study identifies main closure strategies of two CAM therapies, acupuncture and homeopathy, to acquire legitimacy and occupational closure within the mainstream health-care system in Portugal.

Data are derived from in-depth interviews with 10 traditional acupuncturists and 10 traditional homeopaths, and also from documentary search. Three similar multi-level strategies were identified in both CAM therapies: expressing countervailing values, professionalising and allying with the biomedical science. A new concept is introduced in this analysis to highlight the desirable outcome of CAM's recent strategies of closure in the country. This concept is CAM'isation, and refers to the process of promoting CAM treatments and solutions to everyday human problems (either previously medically or non-medically defined problems). At a definitional level, this process is similar to that of medicalisation (Conrad, 2007), in that it offers a treatment framework for everyday human problems. Although at the moment CAM'isation seems to run more in parallel rather than in an opposite direction to medicalisation, this process can have as a consequence the reverse of medicalisation, i.e. demedicalisation. Having said this, recent strategies used by CAM in order to 'CAM'ise health-care in Portugal will be analysed in this paper.

Challenges related of retention and professionalization of lower-income students in higher education in Brazil: The case of students at a private university

In Brazil, in just over 30 years, and especially from the 90s after the sanction of the Law of Guidelines and Bases of Education (1996), which accelerated the expansion and the consequent increase in the number of vacancies, the Brazilian high education system has been through a series of changes, with the incorporation of students from lower socioeconomic strata, many of them older and already integrated into the labor market. Despite this expansion, the enrollment net rate of higher education in Brazil, that is, between 18 and 24 years old who attend undergraduate courses, is only 15%, one of the lowest in Latin America, despite the goal of the National Education Plan of 2000 to raise this percentage to 30% in 2010.

The need to review the strategies of graduate programs to provide an effective inclusion of these new students in higher education in Brazil and thus ensure their stay in school and so later on, a qualified insertion in the labor market, is what motivated the research that led to this paper.

Our paper is based on the results of research being carried out since 2008 and has, as main base, the database pertaining to socio-economic information, retention and dropout, academic performance, access to scholarships and paid undergraduates activities, internship and extent of all 688 students (most of them from families with incomes up to 5 minimum wages) that attended the course in Social Science from a private university of Minas Gerais, Brazil, from 2003 until the first half of 2009. By crossing and analysis of these data, we established a relationship between the socio-economic profile and the participation in paid research activities, internship and extent with increased chances of retention, improved school performance and employability of students, especially the poorest.

Tercer sector y el cáncer en Brasil

Trabajo con el presupuesto de que el tercer sector es una construcción político-económica del Estado para implementar el programa neoliberal de reducción de la acción social del Estado, ya que es un fenómeno complementario del proyecto neoliberal de reducción del papel del Estado en la intervención social para crear una demanda lucrativa para el mercado. Esa definición del tercer sector pone en consideración la creación de una cultura del voluntariado, la promoción de la reestructuración del capital, a través de los valores de solidaridad voluntaria y local. En el caso específico del Brasil, desde 1995 hasta la actualidad, la transferencia de los servicios sociales y científicos del Estado para la sociedad se ha convertido en uno de los pilares de las políticas estatales. En este contexto, el Instituto Nacional del Cáncer está relacionado con la reconfiguración de la relación entre los servicios privados de salud y salud pública. Las reformas en el campo de la salud se proponen como: enfoque, la privatización, la descentralización de los servicios a nivel local y alianzas con la sociedad, con el incentivo de la refilantropización. Esta perspectiva refuerza la desprofesionalización y la desinstitucionalización en el campo de las políticas sociales, que tienen lugar simultáneamente con la disminución de la legitimidad de la participación del Estado en la solución de los problemas inherentemente social. En el análisis relativo a la reforma del Estado, se puede observar que los servicios de salud están en las llamadas Organizaciones Públicas No-Estatales (OPNES), empresas privadas, sin fines lucrativos, administradas con fondos públicos. El IncaVoluntário, al actuar con cerca de 600 voluntarios conluga dentro del INCA, agente director de la Política Nacional de Atención Oncológica en Brasil, la no garantía de los derechos sociales y la implementación de las políticas sociales de manera fragmentada y localizada.

Articulación interjurisdiccional de las políticas sociales

En el contexto de un Estado federal como el argentino, cobra cada vez mayor relevancia académica y política indagar sobre los desafíos que la necesidad de articulación interjurisdiccional le plantea a la gestión pública. Más aún cuando los procesos de descentralización de competencias y servicios hacia las unidades subnacionales han sido características destacadas de las dos décadas recientes. Este proceso complejizó aún más la trama estatal de las políticas sociales. Ésta dejó de unificarse en torno a un centro y se constituyó en un campo de tensiones entre los niveles interjurisdiccionales. Por ello, estudiar hoy los modos de intervención pública sobre la cuestión social en el nivel local nos llevará a indagar prioritariamente sobre cómo se resuelve en este nivel el problema de la articulación con los otros niveles jurisdiccionales (Nación y Provincia). Para la realización de este objetivo tomaremos como estudios de caso a los municipios de San Martín, Morón y Avellaneda, ubicados en el conurbano bonaerense.

The Brazil imagined in Latin America

Based on cinema critique of three countries – Mexico, Cuba and Argentina – the work aims to present the Latin-American reception of two Brazilian filmmakers: Glauber Rocha and Walter Salles. The first represents an important culture/cinematographic movement of the 1960s called Cinema Novo, and the second is the one of the most important directors of the "cinema da retomada" – a phenomenon of the 1990s that means, in other words, a resumption of Brazilian cinema. From this reception I try to comprehend identity constructions through four categories regularly mentioned by the critics: the filmmakers "names", the "real" represented by their films, as well as the "space" and the "time" revealed. Nevertheless the temporal gap that separates Glauber Rocha's films of the 1960s and Walter Salles' works of the 1990s/2000s, and the spatial distance that involves the four countries (including Brazil), the critics brings to evidence two main ideas: a Latin-American community and the persistence of some aspects and sceneries. I ask then how and why such ideas are legitimized, trying to understand relevant agents of the circuit that checks the predominance and the permanence of a Brazilian singular representation, to the detriment of an identity multiplicity.

Ampliación de sentidos sobre las prácticas políticas de los jóvenes vinculados a siete movimientos sociales en Colombia: Jóvenes performando lo político, construcción social de identidad y subjetividad

En este texto se presentan los resultados logrados en el marco de la investigación "experiencias alternativas de acción política con participación de jóvenes en Colombia[1]". Para tal fin se recogen los principales hallazgos en términos de cuatro ejes de comprensión y sentido; el primero hace a alusión a los procesos de construcción social de la subjetividad e identidad de los jóvenes que participan en estas experiencias. El segundo eje tratará sobre los marcos colectivos construidos por los sujetos de las experiencias para orientar y significar sus prácticas políticas en términos de acontecimientos, objetivos y acciones.

El tercer eje de comprensión tiene que ver con la ampliación de los sentidos de lo político que estas experiencias han ido configurando a partir de sus afectaciones, relaciones, movilizaciones y creaciones. Finalmente, el cuarto eje de comprensión alude a la relación potenciadora entre el movimiento social y el sujeto político en la construcción de las identidades y subjetividades juveniles, a partir del reconocimiento de las prácticas, discursos y sentires desde los cuales ellos y ellas tensionan y resignifican el lugar que tradicionalmente se les ha asignado en la política y lo político.

Human rights in pink tide regimes

Since the election of Hugo Chávez in 1998, a gradual leftward shift in the political landscape of Latin America has been taking place. The degree and manner in which the Pink Tide phenomenon may be responsible for administrative and consequent sociopolitical change in 21st century Latin America is the focus of this analysis of the régimes in nineteen Hispanophone countries in the Western Hemisphere during a twenty-nine-year period. The quantification and disambiguation of the Pink Tide phenomenon is discussed both in historical context and in light of its application in contemporary politics. To determine whether Pink Tide governments are protectors of—or threats to—personal liberties, various indicators of human rights, such as torture and freedom of speech, were examined compositely via a t-test as well as individually with c² analyses. Overall, the t-test reported the mean composite score for political rights to be significantly lower when Pink Tide administrations seize majority control of a government. Though not all analyses proved to be statistically significant, most overwhelmingly support the case that Pink Tides are detrimental to human freedoms. Only in the cases of disappearances and women's rights do Pink Tide régimes report more favorable numbers than their counterparts.

Participación de la familia en la escuela

Las transformaciones sociales acontecidas principalmente en el transcurso de las cuatro últimas décadas han cambiado el estatuto y la capacidad de intervención de las instituciones. Dentro de ese escenario, este trabajo se concentra específicamente en dos instituciones paradigmáticas dentro de las sociedades modernas: la familia y la escuela y los distintos modos en que se desarrolla su articulación y se la procesa simbólicamente.

Esta ponencia presenta los avances del proyecto de investigación "El lugar de la familia en la escuela" que se desarrolla en la Universidad Católica de Santiago del Estero (UCSE), Departamento Académico Buenos Aires (DABA), Argentina. El trabajo de campo, efectuado en un colegio de clase media alta de aproximadamente tres mil alumnos, permitió el hallazgo de un actor familiar que, por su presencia en la institución educativa y por sus formas organizativas, se constituyó como unidad de análisis, principalmente, debido a las formas novedosas e infrecuentes en que las familias han construido un lugar activo de participación en la escuela. El interrogante que nos guía en esta etapa se refiere a si los modos de organización familiar son posibles por la estructura que aporta la institución escolar o si son formas de autogestión producidas por las mismas familias.

El concepto moderno de comunidad

El concepto de comunidad nace en la modernidad y como si dijéramos con ella, llegando a formar parte de sus múltiples derivas, sus infinitos pliegues, sus cambios y transformaciones, sus numerosos orígenes y sus supuestos fines. Sin embargo, el pensamiento de la comunidad, en el sentido amplio de la palabra, tiene raíces más profundas y remotas en el tiempo. Es sabido que de Platón a Hegel y más allá el pensamiento occidental se ha representado una enorme variedad de motivos de la comunidad. Precisamente, en esta exposición nos proponemos distinguir a grandes rasgos entre, por un lado, la idea general de comunidad que atraviesa las épocas desde la antigüedad y a la que se suele considerar como una de las ideas rectoras de la cultura y la civilización occidentales y, por otro lado, el concepto moderno de comunidad, asociado como está a un momento delimitable de la historia del pensamiento, a ciertos textos emblemáticos que reenvían de inmediato a nombres propios bien conocidos tanto dentro como fuera de la disciplina sociológica, y a una variedad de idiomas y escrituras singulares. Distinguir entre una cosa y otra nos compromete, asimismo, a reflexionar sobre el punto de inflexión histórico y epistemológico a partir del cual la comunidad es redescubierta por las nuevas ciencias sociales, y proclamada por las teorías sociológicas emergentes como uno de sus conceptos fundamentales.

From the goal of regulating to the emancipatory capacity of participation in health

Citizen participation in health has been designed in three conceptually distinct dimensions. The first is related to politics and organization of the health care system. This one represents an extension of democracy, organized in down-top movement from the bases to governments, acting more on the control of the management system than in the definition of health strategies. The second is top-down, from services to the people, conceived as a means of gaining the adherence of individuals to the agendas of health promotion. It represents an extension of medicine in the colonization of life through scientific rationality. The third type is horizontal and reveals the citizen initiative, conceived as groups of 'friends/families of patients and / or of claiming rights activity.

In Portugal, the bottom-up participation has been rising in legislation, as a formal representation and giving population an advisory role or approval to decision makers, and the descendant participation is programmatic of 'health promotion' and is addressed to specific population groups. The horizontal participation is present but undeveloped. What is the impact of participation in terms of the presence of a plurality of rationalities about production methods of health?

The (sociology of) participation in health focus only in a secondary way on the field of the conceptualization of what is health and medical rationality that supports the therapeutic view - areas that sociology of health focuses. In this area, participation is of (self) – excluding type, present in the sketched 'movement' around the 'alternative medicine' and its holistic look on the individual.

Our empirical research on lay rationalities of health and disease emphasizes the importance of recognizing cultural subjectivity and its assertion within the system. This is the field of participation related to knowledge (scientific - lay) and represents an extension of knowledge.

New challenges in the policies of mental health care - Comparing the situation of Portugal and Poland

The history of the institutionalization of the mentally ill overlaps their social exclusion. Portugal and Poland have followed (with delay) the evolution of European policies, defined the closure of psychiatric hospitals and the de-institutionalization of their patients during the second half of the twentieth century. The focus of this paper is on the history of mental illness in Portugal and Poland, giving special emphasis to the period between the XIX - XXI century. We try to reveal and discuss the socio-cultural processes underlying the impacts of the confrontation and coexistence of plural models to explain and deal with madness, between tradition and modernity. What is the role of psychiatry and science? What is the role of the state? What is the role of the civil society and the families? How lay people incorporate those different models in everyday life and deal with mental suffering?

In Portugal and in Poland, the de-institutionalization in practice never occurred while successively fully legislated. This contradiction is based on the role of the welfare society as compensation for deficiencies of the state intervention that penalized families in the Portuguese case. Indeed, although civil society embodied some social responsibilities (more in Poland than in Portugal), namely the organization of social facilities, only at a very partial level of those incipient responses corresponds to the needs identified as gaps in social policy. In fact, what it means in both countries talk about community integration of people with mental illness?

Work, alienation and subjectivity

Our goal is to present some critical reflections on the social morphology of work that emerges from the new restructured workplaces. This so, we will seek to identify the new character of the precariousness of work that comes with the new prevailing wage instability in global capitalism. We underline the precariousness of work not just on the point of view of labor force as commodity, but the precariousness of work in the dimension of the man-who-works as a human-generic being capable of responding to the movement of capital. Finally, we redefine the concept of precariousness of the human experience of work while individuals in a particular class of personal historical context-specific: the historical context of capitalism manipulative.

The city and the World Cup: Exceptions of the state and the right

This paper intends to provide elements for analysis of the contemporary city and its transformations to receive a mega sports event: the 2014 FIFA World Cup.

The text is based on the systematization proposed by Edward Soja (2008). Thus, [1] the processes of post-Fordist restructuring, [2] and the spatial segregation [3] the mechanisms of incarceration are important categories to understand the urban transformations in the cities that will host football matches in 2014.

We intend to identify the changes of the State and the Law to take care of the interests of the Fifa and the capital. Thus, the text will identify the rules recently approved, as well as public resources and infrastructure projects - all oriented by the demands of a private international organization.

These changes in the State, in Law and in the City tend to reproduce an urban entrepreneurialism (Harvey, 2005) and adopt rules of exception (Vainer, 2011). However, we call the debate right to the city (Lefebvre, 2001) and insurgent citizenship (Holston, 1996).

In the end, we hope to contribute a little to reveal the complex relationship between the City and the World Cup. Indeed, the capitalist restructuring, the socio-spatial segregation and the security mechanisms modify the urban space according to the interests of FIFA.

However, citizens insurgents congregate the transformative potential when they occupy the City and oppose the State and the Law that remained after the mega event in 2014.

Para contribuir en este debate se tomará como estudio de caso la Organización Barrial Tupac Amaru. Por el otro lado, se aspira a indagar y reflexionar sobre las acciones colectivas de dicho movimiento social (MS), sus discursos y su participación en la toma de decisiones políticas en los gobiernos Kirchneristas. Programa conectar igualdad: Impacto y recepción del modelo 1:1 en el cunurbano Bonaerense

El presente trabajo tiene como objetivo analizar el Programa Conectar Igualdad (PCI) que forma parte de una política nacional de inclusión digital educativa en la Argentina. Se crea a principios del año 2010 y consiste en la distribución de una computadora portátil a cada estudiante y docente de las escuelas de gestión estatal de Educación. Se prevé para 2012 haber distribuido tres millones de computadoras. Además de las máquinas, se proveen servidores y routers para garantizar la conexión a Internet y la implementación de una red escolar en cada establecimiento educativo. Se gestiona por cuatro organismos nacionales: el Ministerio de Educación de la Nación; la Administración Nacional de Seguridad Social (ANSES); el Ministerio de Planificación Federal, Inversión Pública y Servicios; y la Jefatura de Gabinete de Ministros.

En la ponencia se realiza un breve recorrido por las experiencias rotuladas como "modelo 1:1" en América Latina, destacando la peculiaridad del PCI. Sobre ésta política nos interrogamos acerca de cuáles son las áreas prioritarias y como se corresponden con la realidad cotidiana y las necesidades de los actores involucrados, especialmente cuál es la recepción e impacto en las escuelas del conurbano bonaerense.

Dada la reciente aplicación del programa nos proponemos realizar un estudio exploratorio. Para ello tomaremos como estudio de caso una escuela de educación secundaria perteneciente al partido de Moreno. Mediante la toma de entrevistas y la observación nos proponemos indagar en la caracterización que hacen del programa los distintos actores involucrados (directivos, docentes y estudiantes) y cuál es el grado efectivo de aplicación que posee el mismo. Por último, dado que las netbook pueden ser llevadas por los estudiantes a sus casas, se observará si esto genera una ampliación de su uso y la generación de oportunidades para la reconstrucción de prácticas relacionadas con las TIC en la dinámica familiar.

Professional ethics in the social sciences in Mexico

In Mexico, in the beginning of the 21st century, young adults face big challenges to be able to access to the level of higher education and to good jobs. People who have not had the opportunity to study are devoid of a proper instruction to exercise an economic formal activity. When they interrupt their studies they will lack the knowledge to perform professional activities. Even when they have concluded his university studies, not many will have a vocational training adapted to the requirements of the new society. In this context of social exclusion we ask the following question: How can we contribute to the integral preparation of young adults to help them obtain a better life and work?. This goal should consider teaching ethical contents, which can generate social action, based in scientific knowledge and respect for fundamental rights. To answer this question, we will present a comparative analysis of the ethical values of social scientists in five fields of knowledge: Administration, Communication, Law, Education and Sociology in five open education systems of public and private universities.

Large scale data for analyzing sentiments of sub-cultures

A long research tradition has been started on affective connotations of language since Osgood and colleagues provided good evidence of the universality of three affective dimensions – evaluation, potency and activity. Primary cross cultural research has shown that affective meanings depend on the cultural and social background of individuals. In this tradition, sentiments have been shown to be quite stable within societies, thereby ignoring possible differences within culture.. Nevertheless, in his research approach David Heise takes into account potential influences of sub-cultures. Yet due to lack of appropriate data his assumptions haven't been explored in greater detail.

In our Project we want to explore such differences on affective meaning of words between sub-cultures with unique data we recently conducted. A Germany wide sample of 3000 participants rated 910 words in total on three affective dimensions. Additionally we asked for various social characteristics of the participants. The quoted sample captures the social diversity in Germany very welltherefore it is highly appropriate to explore the varieties of affective connotations within the German culture.

In this contribution, we introduce our large scale data set as a promising basis for sociological investigations on the affective foundations of sociality. We further suggest different strategies for analyzing these data. One strategy is to identify word fields whose affective meanings vary with social environments like milieus or lifestyles. A second strategy is to relate affective meanings to attitudes, norms and action tendencies. As a third strategy, we try to locate the individual's social position in terms of affective meanings.

Sentiments and social stratification

Affect Control Theory (ACT) argues that language based sentiments are systematically associated with specific social actions. Through socialization, individuals acquire culture specific norms and attitudes manifest in the affective meanings of language. Therefore, knowledge of and the sense for affective meanings are socially shared phenomena that can be measured with Osgood's semantic differential technique. Cross cultural research has shown that affective meanings depend on the cultural and social background of individuals. In this tradition, sentiments have been shown to be quite stable within societies, where society is mostly equated with "nation" and assumed to be a cultural "container". We question this assumption by conceiving of culture not primarily in national or geographical terms, but in terms of meaning making. Ever since Marx, research on social stratification has shown that different cultures also exist within societies, which can be conceived of using concepts such as class, milieu, or lifestyle.

In this contribution, we explore the affective knowledge of different cultures within German society using data from a representative (quota sample based) survey we recently conducted. A sample of 3.000 Germans rated a total of 910 words on the three affective core dimensions of the semantic differential, i.e. evaluation, potency, and arousal. We demonstrate that sentiments are significantly associated with the social structural background of individuals. Likewise, we show that social stratification – and especially milieus – can be adequately described in terms of affective meanings. Our data show that various milieus are associated with different sentiments for at least some relevant words. According to ACT, these systematic cultural differences within society result from past experiences and socialization conditions.

La problemática del chagas en Argentina. Diálogos posibles entre actores involucrados

Este trabajo se inscribe en el marco de una investigación que estoy llevando a cabo para la realización de mi tesis doctoral donde se vincula la problemática del Chagas en Argentina, con las políticas públicas de salud y la Educación.

En esta exposición intentaremos construir un dialogo acerca de la situación actual de la enfermedad de Chagas en Argentina entre los dos principales actores involucrados: el Estado y las personas infectadas con la enfermedad que nos permita no solo comprender sino complejizar las miradas hegemónicas sobre dicha problemática.

Para construir dicho diálogo se indagará primero, acerca de cuáles han sido las políticas de prevención y/o promoción de la salud que se han llevado a cabo desde el Estado argentino en los últimos 25 años con respecto a esta problemática, haciendo foco en sus alcances, ventajas y desventajas. En segundo lugar se analizarán las diferentes miradas que tienen personas que padecen la enfermedad, ya sea sobre la misma, su realidad como su relación con las políticas públicas de salud.

Tal como lo plantea la Organización Mundial de la Salud (OMS) el Chagas, constituye uno de los problemas de salud pública más graves de América Latina, tratándose de una de las endemias más expandida del continente. Argentina, no se escapa de esta situación, es por ello que se presenta de especial importancia la construcción de este diálogo que pueda brindar no sólo una mayor claridad acerca del papel que tiene actualmente el Estado en cuanto principal impulsor de políticas de prevención y/o promoción acerca la problemática del Chagas sino también complejizar dicho papel teniendo en cuenta la perspectivas de las propias personas infectadas con la enfermedad.

La participación de mujeres en sindicatos de trabajadores rurales modifica las relaciones de poder en el medio rural? Un análisis en el sindicato de los trabajadores de espera feliz-minas gerais-Brasil

Se investigó la participación de mujeres en el Sindicato de los Trabajadores Rurales de Espera Feliz-MG, con el objetivo principal de analizar si la participación en una organización asociativa como el sindicato, modifica las relaciones de poder en el medio rural, insertando a las mujeres de forma más amplia y constante en la esfera pública.

Se utilizó cuestionarios estructurados para surveys y, por muestra aleatoria, fueron seleccionadas las 28 entrevistadas. Esa muestra fue calculada basada en la fórmula estadística de proporción finita. Después de la colecta de datos, se realizó pruebas estadísticas por medio de software SPSS (Statistical Package for Social Sciences). Por tratarse de una investigación de abordaje cuantitativa y cualitativa, las respuestas discursivas de los cuestionarios fueron categorizadas y tabuladas para permitir la realización descriptiva y de frecuencia.

Los datos de la investigación demuestran la actuación de STR-EF en acciones instrumentales que movilizan a las trabajadoras rurales a afiliarse, promueven la inserción femenina en la dirección del sindicato, resguardan los derechos de pensión e incentivan la formación de grupos y asociaciones de mujeres. A pesar de eso, se identificó que el carácter de formación aun no es suficiente para que las mujeres se sientan motivadas a participar de forma más activa en las actividades del sindicato, como en reuniones y asambleas. No obstante que el STR-EF promueve la inserción de las mujeres en la dirección de la institución e incentiva la formación de grupos y asociaciones de mujeres, muchas de ellas no se sienten motivadas a participar de otras formas de organización asociativa, lo que limita la participación de ellas en los espacios públicos.

The institutionalization of civic participation of NGOs in Mexico: The paradoxes of inclusion of new elites in the political system

The emergence of complex solidarity networks in Mexico after the Chiapas' Zapatista Rebellion of 1994 has received much attention; including assessments of the new civic movement (Reygadas, Abriendo Veredas, CONVERGENCIA, 1998) and appraisals of its military significance (Ronfeldt et al, The Zapatista Social Netwar in Mexico, RAND, 1999).

Between 1995 and 2000, a multicoloured NGO coalition pressed federal and State congresses to pass legislation to regulate civil society institutions' access to public funds and tax privileges. Both Left and Right wing parties have supported these initiatives. Some State Governments (as Chiapas) have created non-estate public funding programs for NGO's between 2000 and 2011.

The paper presents an assessment of three recent institutionalization experiences (the Federal District's and the national laws; and the non-law Chiapas case) constructed upon data gathered from direct experience in the public agencies in charge of implementing the estatutes. It also analyzes the relations between NGO's and popular movements and associations using information collected on the field since 1994. Finally it provides a critique of how emergent elites used NGO networking as a means to get included into the post-Transition-to-Democracy establishment; and how the powers-that-be have managed to "tame" popular insurgency and simultaneously renovate public discourses.

Knowledge production and counter-expertise in transnational anti-sweatshop networks

Global supply chains linking suppliers in developing countries to lead brands and retailers in developed countries are incredibly complex and sometimes secretive. Therefore, collecting data to identify the relevant actors and points of leverage "requires the skills of a detective as much as a researcher" (Barrientos 2002: 61). This paper takes this complexity seriously and asks the following questions: How do participants in transnational antisweatshop networks know what they know about the state of working conditions in developing countries? How do they identify critical issues as well as the players and the points of leverage in global supply chains? How do they produce the information and expertise they use to attempt to improve working conditions overseas? What is the role of workers, academics, and NGOs in this process? This paper draws upon social movement studies, science studies, and the sociology of intellectuals so as to emphasize the "thinking work" of social movements and treat them as producers of knowledge and counter-expertise. It will address the above questions concretely by comparing the way in which the Worker Rights Consortium in the United States and the Clean Clothes Campaign in Western Europe have been producing the knowledge and expertise that have allowed them to effectively challenge lead brands and retailers in the global apparel and footwear industry.

The paradoxical autonomy of Nordic elite sport system

The aim of this paper is to compare elite sport systems in the four Nordic countries; Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden. Central questions are: Is there a Nordic model of elite sport? And how do national models of elite sport relate to international convergence of national elite sport systems? Studies of politics, welfare states and social issues often emphasize the commonalities constituting a Nordic model. The literature on international elite sport systems emphasizes the convergence of national systems, reflecting intense international competitive pressures. In the domain of elite sport there are commonalities across Nordic countries, reflecting the dominance of a broad voluntary mass sports movement, intertwined with social democracy and welfare states. Nordic systems integrate key component of international elite sport, but have developed quite differently over the last 30 years. However, these differences run counter to characteristics of the national social and political contexts. In Denmark, where the state has been most reluctant to intervene in economy and society, we find a state institution for elite sport supported by special legislation. In the other countries the state has retained an arms' length distance. Finland has perhaps the strongest tradition for centralization of authority, but over the last decades the elite sport system has become increasingly fragmented. In contrast, Norway, with the strongest tradition for decentralization and egalitarianism, has an elite sport with the strongest elements of central coordination. Sweden, known for its ability to adapt to international challenges has integrated changes in elite sport within a stable, but conflict ridden, overall system. In conclusion, the study points to a paradoxical autonomy of the Nordic elite sport systems, where entrepreneurial initiatives and the role of various contextual factors differ widely.

Incorporating human suffering in measures of human progress

While indicators of the reduction of pain and suffering obviously would contribute to improving measures of human progress, they have been neglected because of conceptual and measurement challenges. A project on measures of preventable suffering has developed measures of subjective and preventable suffering across nations using data on 123 countries from the Gallup World Poll of social well-being and the UNDP Human Development Report 2010 database. Using additional statistical data on calamities, both mental and physical, we examine the associations between indicators of preventable suffering and indicators of caring such as the amount of charitable giving as well, as well as measures of human progress and demographics. The Human Development Index in 2010 was adjusted for inequality; we add additional adjustments to encompass such considerations as human rights violations and rates of chronic pain. Major progress has been made in quantifying calamitous events and subjective suffering, showing their interaction with geography and social support systems. We found that the relationship between subjective suffering and charitable giving follows a decay function, such that those countries with greater suffering experience less charitable giving. Policies are needed that counteract this inequality process. By focusing on all those who suffer worldwide and improving measures of preventable suffering, measures of human progress can be made more compelling for policy makers and their publics.

Social well-being and gender equality's contribution to the growth of the internet globally

Theorists and researchers have debated the value of Internet and related technologies in the growth of developing nations. Its economic impact and social value depend upon a variety of socio-technical and cultural factors. Drior (2003) found Internet sophistication across about 100 countries in the late 1990s to be influenced by economic centrality and perhaps by level of democracy. This paper looks at the social as well as technical impediments to the growth of the Internet worldwide using data for 123 countries from the Gallup World Poll and the United Nations Development Project's Human Development Report 2010. The most interesting findings pertain to the propelling role of gender equality and life satisfaction versus suffering. These social forces appear to account for a country's proportion of Internet users even more so than economic development. The implication of these findings is that diffusion of the Internet is driven by its perceived role in improving social well-being, not just by its economic value. By analyzing the patterns continent by continent, the role of gender and gender equality becomes clearer as well. Women are more likely than men to be responsible and practical Internet users. Consequently, in nations with higher gender equality and higher social well-being, Internet usage will be higher and digital exclusion lower.

Beyond the inter-faith agenda: Secular and religious divisions in urban Britain

Since it emerged that the perpetrators of the 7/7 London Underground bombings in 2005 were residents of Beeston, an inner-city suburb of Leeds, inter-faith initiatives have been seen as key interventions to prevent terrorism, improve social cohesion, and promote good intergroup relations in this northern English city. Yet, in this paper, we argue that the emphasis on the inter-faith agenda is to some degree inadequately targeted in terms of where persistent (and arguably growing) tensions are currently being played out. Drawing on focus group research with the city's three largest faith communities (Christians, Jews and Muslims), as well as with non-believers and organised atheist groups, our findings suggest that the most difficult conversations are not between members of the Abrahamic faiths, but rather between those who have religious convictions and those who do not. Hence, while our respondents frequently drew on negative stereotypes to describe those on the opposite side of the religious/atheist divide ("aggressive atheists", "religious fundamentalist"), understandings of other faiths were typically described as relatively good. To further illustrate this tension, we deploy ethnographic and interview-based observations from an inter-faith initiative that brings together Jewish and Muslim teenagers, but where the atheism of some Jewish participants has resulted in confusion, misunderstandings and friction. Reflecting on these findings, which form part of a longitudinal study funded by the European Research Council, we conclude that an effective social cohesion policy must move beyond a narrow focus on inter-faith relations, and create inclusive spaces for dialogue across the religious/atheist divide.

Questioning our own textual practices in the service of social justice Institutional Ethnography provides us with a method of inquiry that can show how barriers in the form of organizational and textual practices happen as a result of the everyday work of institutions. The institutions that organize and coordinate the work of public education (state legislature, trustee boards, school districts, universities, etc.) often claim a social justice agenda as part of their institutional mission. However, institutional ethnographic research has uncovered the many ways in which people at work in organizational settings, as participants in the textual practices that make up their work, can, often unknowingly, limit access to resources, contribute to exclusion, and in essence undermine the very social justice values they include as part of their institutional goals. This paper will show how institutional ethnography and text analysis can be used to question and uncover the ways in which different organizational settings in public education can contribute to social injustice. It will provide a reflection on how the people at work in these educational settings might rethink and challenge existing practice, and textual practices, in particular, so that the work they do is, indeed, in the service of social justice, access and inclusion for those historically underrepresented and underserved in public education.

Photovoice as activism

A major social justice issue in the 'Western' world today is the alienation of migrants, asylum seekers and refugees. For the academic researcher it is an issue that cannot be approached in an objective, or purely theoretical way, since the mere act of recognizing that alienation is taking place is political and requires social action. Visual sociology is a particular useful approach to explore how this alienation, which is a lack of belonging, is experienced but also to show how different types of belonging are constructed and maintained by those who are alienated. My current work focuses on the phenomenology of belonging for men with a refugee background in Australia. As a postcolonial country Australia has been struggling with how to approach asylum seekers and refugees. It has been a 'hot' political topic for a long time and it has exposed what Ghassan Hage calls a 'paranoid nationalism' not dissimilar to many other 'Western' countries, which has reinforced certain barriers to belonging. Because alienation, or a lack of belonging, is exasperated when you are devalued and misrecognized, I will argue it is crucial to employ a participatory approach that both values and recognizes the participants and their experiences. As a professional photographer who has stepped into the academic world I will discuss how 'photovoice', a participatory action research method, can provide research participants with a voice and an opportunity to tell counter hegemonic narratives about belonging and alienation. This presentation will provide an insight into this experience and how visual sociology can be combined with participatory action research to become a tool for visual participatory activism.

La importancia del territorio en materia de empleo: De la estrategia europea de empleo a las políticas activas locales

La Estrategia Europea de Empleo orienta las acciones de todos los estados miembros en materia de empleo y de cohesión social. Dicha Estrategia fijó una serie de objetivos para el conjunto de la UE en el horizonte del 2010 y así lo ha hecho también para el 2020. Uno de los principios rectores básicos de la Estrategia Europea de Empleo es el paradigma de la activación, a partir del cual se tiende a responsabilizar al individuo de su situación respecto al empleo. La activación es, igualmente, el elemento que guía la aplicación de políticas activas de empleo; cuya concreción se lleva a cabo en el territorio, en el ámbito local.

El ámbito local es, precisamente, el lugar donde puede delimitarse mejor la adecuación entre la oferta y la demanda de trabajo y, también, es donde pueden satisfacerse mejor las necesidades del tejido productivo, al tiempo que se atiende a las características y expectativas de las personas. Las políticas activas de empleo locales, negociadas y articuladas por los agentes sociales presentes en el territorio pueden, asimismo, favorecer la cohesión social en ese territorio y eludir alguno de los elementos negativos que se asocian al paradigma de la activación. En la comunicación se presentarán ejemplos concretos en esta dirección. Ejemplos que derivan de investigaciones específicas sobre la temática abordada y que indican que la aplicación de políticas activas de empleo pueden coadyuvar al bienestar local.

Explaining Mexican communities' contrasting relationships to the U.S. illegality state

In California, Mexican migrants' 'illegal' status excludes them politically, makes them vulnerable as workers, and subjects them to fear of deportation. Nevertheless, relationships vary between Mexican communities and the US state. In this research, I compare the experiences two rural, Oaxacan hometowns. On one hand, migrants from the community of Cajonos, living in Los Angeles, called the United States their "second motherland" and supported reformist shifts in migration policy. They tended to cooperate with the police and recur to legal channels to contest employment violations. Despite their poverty, they also rejected welfare services. Finally, several spurned immigration protests as a tarnish on their reputations. In these migrants' lives, the state intervened as beneficent regulator, "protecting" them from ills ranging from traffic violations to violence. Its power operated through migrants' consent. In contrast, in nearby Vista, California migrants from Tlacotepec described US life in terms of suffering and the state as despotic. They pursued radical change in the migration regime, protesting border policies and demanding support from the Mexican consulate. They avoided and felt persecuted by the police. For this community, the state acted as punisher and threat, fragmenting migrants' political organizing and exerting power through coercion.

I argue that migrant communities' divergent relationships to the US state reflect their contrasting, local-level systems of US migration. In the case of Los Angeles-Cajonos, migrants operated in a linear migration system, wherein they opted into migration for social reasons such as feminism and personal escape from the social environment of their home village. In the other case, Vista-Tlacotepec, migrants were part of a historically circular migration system that linked them to the US for economic reasons, often dividing families across borders. These systems channeled them into different parts of the US state apparatus and labor structure, and organized their relationship to illegality differently.

How Mexican hometowns engage development and "manage" migration

This research, based in an in-depth qualitative comparison of two communities, asks why rural, migrant sending communities in Southern Mexico develop contrasting politics to regulate their own migrants (Mutersbaugh 2002), as well as different approaches to state-sponsored development projects. Using two years of participant observation and in-depth interviews, I contrast the trajectories of two indigenous, rural migrant-sending hometowns in Oaxaca, Mexico. In the example of Tlacotepec, migrant farm workers regularly circulated between the United States and Mexico and sent money to their families back home. These migrants exerted strong influence in the hometown government. However, while the men were gone, their wives who stayed behind also sought out state-sponsored "women's empowerment" programs to support their own influence and autonomy. In contrast, in nearby Cajonos, children often left their parents behind, migrating for good. The people who stayed behind in the village felt abandoned and received fewer remittances than in the other village. Therefore, in this case, the hometown demanded that migrants contribute money to the village government or lose their rights to visit. The villagers who stayed behind also rejected state development programs, worried that such programs would corrupt their cultural traditions, coopt members, or even push young villagers to migrate. Previous scholars have debated the "impacts of migration," particularly the potential development effects of remittances. However, I contend that to understand who sends remittances and for what, how hometowns address migration, and how migrant hometowns deal with development programs, we must look at each community's particular system of migration – whether linear (migrants abandon the village) or circular (migrants go back and forth). In turn, we must consider the efforts of those who stay behind to regulate and respond to these migrant flows.

Facilitating transition to fatherhood the role antenatal education classes

Background

Antenatal education classes emerged as a means of preparing women for childbirth. Over the past 20-30 years men have been invited to attend these classes, however, their needs and concerns are not always targeted as many feel spectators as the content and discussion is orientated towards the women.

Aim

The aim of this presentation is to highlight the strengths and deficits of antenatal education classes in facilitating men's transition to fatherhood and make suggestions for improvement.

Method

This grounded theory study explored men's transition to fatherhood. Thirty five, first time fathers were theoretically sampled from two urban maternity care sites and interviewed before and after the birth of their baby. The data were analysed using the constant comparative method. Ethical approval was received from the University and both maternity care sites.

Key Findings

Men stated that attendance at antenatal education classes was contingent on their partner and the range of classes offered by the maternity hospital. They want to be encouraged to attend by their partners and the providers so that they can be involved in the childbearing process. Men find information about their role in labour useful. However, they identified that detailed information on the emotional issues surrounding pregnancy, birth and the postnatal period could have been discussed in greater depth. They also want more information on the practical issues (e.g. infant feeding, infant wellness and support services), realities of a new baby and their role as a new father.

Conclusion

Antenatal education providers need to take account of men's needs so that they can then be effective supporters to their partners. Men want to feel included and involved in the classes. A men's only class where men can discuss their specific needs could also be an option for some men.

De la confrontación a la cooperación. Los cambios en las estrategias y marcos interpretativos del movimiento de derechos humanos de Argentina frente al "Kirchnerismo" (2003-2011)

El 24 de marzo de 2011 se realizaron en todo el país distintos actos al cumplirse treinta y cinco años del golpe militar. El acto principal se realizó en la histórica Plaza de Mayo y durante el mismo las distintas organizaciones del Movimiento de Derechos Humanos (MDHs) expresaron distintas posturas frente al gobierno nacional. Por un lado, un grupo de organismos encabezados por la Asociación Madres de Plaza de Mayo manifestaron su identificación política con el gobierno y su defensa irrestricta respecto a las políticas gubernamentales. Frente a estos los organismos nucleados en el Encuentro Verdad, Memoria y Justicia expresaron su rechazo a estas políticas, y calificaron la adhesión a las mismas como una "traición", una "cooptación". A su vez, una tercera postura sostenida por Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo, HIJOS y Madres de Plaza de Mayo – línea fundadora- se manifestó a favor de los avances realizados mientras exigían la profundización de los mismos.

Estas posiciones expresan dos rasgos característicos del MDHs en la Argentina contemporánea: la existencia de un fuerte conflicto en relación a las maneras de entender el proceso político inaugurado en 2003 y la decisión de incorporarse al mismo, mediante su participación en distintas instancias gubernamentales, de una parte importante de los organismos de derechos humanos. Tomando esto como punto de partida, en el trabajo que aquí propongo, me centraré en analizar algunos aspectos de los cambios en las estrategias, marcos de acción colectiva y claves interpretativas acerca del Estado y la política que elaboraron algunos organismos del MDHs durante el periodo 2003-2011 con el objetivo de comprender los factores que explican el pasaje de una estrategia dominante de confrontación a una de integración al Estado por parte de distintos integrantes de organismos de DDHH de Argentina.

Los juicios por la verdad y la justicia post-transición en la Argentina

A finales de los años 90' hicieron su aparición en distintas ciudades de Argentina los denominados "Juicios por la Verdad" (en adelante JV). Estos juicios fueron impulsados por organismos de derechos humanos, instituciones públicas y organizaciones de la sociedad civil y constituyeron una novedad a nivel mundial pues eran de procesos judiciales penales, pero sin un horizonte punitivo, con el objetivo de conocer la verdad acerca del destino de miles de desaparecidos durante la dictadura militar que gobernó la Argentina entre 1976 y 1983.

A mitad de camino entre una "Comisión por la Verdad" y un proceso penal pleno, desde un comienzo fueron objeto de numerosos conflictos jurídicos y políticos. Aunque en algunos casos estos conflictos culminaron con la suspensión de estos juicios, sin embargo, algunos juicios se extendieron por más de diez años y actualmente uno de ellos continúa con el desarrollo de audiencias.

El objetivo del trabajo que aquí presentamos es avanzar en una discusión respecto a cuál es el lugar de estos Juicios en las luchas políticas por la justicia que se desarrollaron en la Argentina con posterioridad a la primera etapa de la transición democrática. Para ello, en una primera parte presentaremos sucintamente los antecedentes jurídicos y el contexto político de la aparición de los JV en la Argentina. En un segundo momento revisaremos críticamente los distintos aportes que desde las ciencias sociales han intentado analizar los JV y, finalmente, analizaremos testimonios de promotores de estos juicios con el objetivo de problematizar el sentido que esta modalidad jurídica presentó para éstos.

El humor hegemónico: Producción y estigmatización de referentes identitarios vascos por medio de discursos paródicos

En la actualidad, la búsqueda de un único referente identitario común y válido para toda la sociedad vasca resulta prácticamente estéril. La proliferación de distintos nexos de identificación (como el sentimiento de pertenencia) así como la dilatación en los ya existentes (idioma o geografía) ha permitido una multiplicidad de formas de identificación dentro de esta misma identidad. Esta variedad permite que las fronteras entre lo vasco y todo lo demás se difuminen, de modo que a excepción de clichés culturales o símbolos estereotipados la identificación de lo "propio" y lo "ajeno" se ha complejizado en la mayoría de los casos. Ante esta situación los discursos institucionales crean una solución de continuidad, por un lado, mediante una gestión estigmatizadora de distintos referentes vascos, en el que se establecerán diferencias y categorías dentro de las diversas maneras de identificarse como vasco; y por el otro, mediante el fomento de un tipo ideal de vasco más "globalizado" y/o "neutro".

Esta tendencia quedará patente en los discursos de los programas humorísticos que se emiten en la Televisión Autónoma Vasca. Las parodias televisivas logran reproducir estas inquietudes siendo parte del discurso nacionalista vasco, ya que administran sus contenidos satíricos a favor de una devaluación humorística de ciertos referentes identitarios (como la figura del agricultor o incluso el propio idioma vasco), logrando a su vez, realizar un imaginario colectivo concreto sobre esta identidad.

Esta idea se ha trabajado en el estudio de caso ¿La risa redentora? Reflexión sobre las representaciones paródicas televisivas en el caso de "lo euskaldun", en el que se ha pretendido esclarecer por qué y cómo los vascos aceptan y se apropian de los discursos humorísticos televisivos que aparentemente anulan o infravaloran muchos de sus referentes identitarios.

Reconsideration of health and welfare policies: If they are always social justice and democratization

The origin of the present world-wide social insurance schemes dates back to the early 1880's in Germany where the 1883 Sickness Insurance, the 1884 Workmen's Accident Compensation Insurance and the 1889 Disability and Old-Age Pension were enacted under the Bismarck Administration. The Bismarck Administration had enacted the Socialist Suppression Law in 1878 before a series of social insurances. This series of social insurances was the carrot and the Socialist Suppression Law was the stick.

A similar situation happened in Japan when the first Health Insurance Bill sneaked through the Diet in 1922 in the shadows of the contentious debates which attended the passing of Peace Regulation Bill in 1925 which took the nation into the 'dark valley' under the militaristic totalitarian government.

The author will discuss how health and welfare policies can be carrots with sticks to suppress people and how to democratize those policies.

Transnational actors and pension policy: The cases of Argentina and Greece

Pension reform has been high in the agenda of countries around the world as a result of demographic ageing and its subsequent impact on the financial sustainability of pension systems and public finances. Consequently, reforms have been undertaken by countries in different regions over the last twenty years. At the same time, there is evidence that pension policy is increasingly becoming a multi-level process involving the interaction of domestic and transnational actors such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank (WB) and the European Union (EU).

Against this background, the present paper seeks to analyze the influence of transnational actors and their interaction with domestic ones in the pension reform processes of two countries from different regions: Argentina and Greece. In both cases, international financial institutions (primarily the WB and the IMF) have played an influential role. Both Argentina and Greece adopted significant reforms, the former in the early 1990s and the latter in 2010, justified by the need to curb public deficits following (in both cases) an economic crisis and a long tradition of mismanaged and very generous pay-as-you-go public pension systems. Our analysis shows that the variation in the outcome of the reforms undertaken in the two countries is the result not only of the different interaction of transnational and domestic actors and the ability of the latter to block reforms, but also of the ideological change concerning pension policy which is evidenced in the two reform episodes. Thus, while in the 1990s the WB and the IMF favored pension privatization; more recently they seem to focus on ensuring the long-term sustainability of public pension systems through a range of measures aimed at reducing the impact of such systems on public finances.

Irregular activities on the Russian labour market

At present time it seems that the growth of irregular activities is global trend. This fact was predicted by Anthony Giddens, Ulrich Beck and other sociologists. Does this trend exist in modern Russia? According to our investigation, there are a lot of forms of irregular activities on the Russian labor market.

Irregular activities include part-time employment, overtime employment, temporary or fixed-term employment, casual employment. Often researchers include in this term secondary and informal employment. But the question is whether these forms are positive effect of national economy or they may be considered as indicators of market problems? Before 1990 in Russia was built socialism. Since 1991 an attempt to create a democratic society was made. Does a democratic society exist in Russia now?

Non-standard employment may be, on the one hand, an advantage if, besides the required level of income allows the employee to regulate, for example, working hours. On the other hand, it may be a necessity, if non-standard employment is a consequence of employee's impossibility to find a work with a standard schedule.

It seems true that the benefits of non-standard employment can be used by highly skilled workers in certain occupations, on the contrary non-standard work is usually used by retiree, students and professionals without work experience, pregnant women and so on.

Thus, in this work a goal to investigate the nature of unemployment are set.

The main purpose of the study is to describe forms of irregular activities on the Russian labor market (since 2005) and reveal workers with which social, economic, and demographic characteristics seems to have an irregular work.

Research methods: quantitative analysis of statistical data, depth interview.

The last Soviet generation: Biographies of the lost

The break-up of the Soviet Union in late 1991-early 1992 affected the lives of the whole generation born in the late 1960s and early 1970s. This generation consists of the young people who left secondary school and entered the universities under the USSR, but on completion of their degrees found themselves in a completely different country. This generation is identified in my work as 'the Last Soviet Generation.' It may be described as a transit generation, the biographical study of which is important for a better understanding of social-identity change after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

These social upheavals, which are still unfinished, are best investigated through the medium of individual biographies. The only serious research on the subject so far has been done by Alexei Yurchak (2006) in his book, Everything was forever, until it was no more: the last Soviet generation. Although an excellent anthropological study of the late Soviet time, this book focuses on the older generation, whose careers successfully started in the late USSR and then naturally transferred to the 'Post-Soviet' stage. In my research, by contrast, I am focusing on the younger generation.

I argue that this last Soviet generation, aged now between, say, 37 and 43 years old, is distinguished by the following characteristics. First, from the demographical viewpoint, it may be regarded as a 'lost generation' in the sense that its proportion is the lowest among the other sectors of the population in active employment. Second, it has an ambiguous social identity, having lost a previous Soviet identity without gaining a new identity in the present Russia. Third, this generation is not active in the political life of contemporary Russia.

A series of biographical interviews should help construct an anthropological picture of the last Soviet generation, and hopefully clarify several of the issues raised in a project of this nature.

Survivors and migrants: A dialogue between disaster and migration in light of the case of Haitians in Brazil

Since ancient times, natural disasters have constrained people to move across borders in search of more favorable surroundings to carry on with their lives after experiencing the destruction caused by natural hazards. If it is clear that natural disasters have always affected Earth's inhabitants, it is also undeniable that international mobility has increasingly become easier during the last decades of transportation's progresses. While victims of different manners of forced displacement – such as individual persecution and armed conflicts – have benefited from efforts launched by the international community half a century ago with the establishment of a regime that obligates States to fulfill minimum standards of protection, on the other hand people compelled to leave their countries due to natural disasters so far remain at the margins of any international coordinated response system. The lack of a global regulatory framework dedicated to safeguard victims of natural disasters, especially those who engage in transnational movements, is reflected at the mixed pattern of policies adopted by States regarding the arrival of such foreigners at their territories. In Brazil, since January 2010 a steadily influx of at least three thousand Haitians fleeing an earthquake-torn home country and in search of an opportunity in a booming economy has posed challenges to local and national authorities; as formal responsibilities persisted uncertain, host communities in the Northern region of Brazil have provided assistance to the Haitians despite their own deprivations. Bearing the international regulatory gap in mind, this paper intends to discuss the impacts on the Brazilian society of the recent disaster-led Haitian immigration, including Brazil's migration policies and immediate and long-term reception provisions. Reviewing formal and informal responses, this paper ultimately proposes a closer look at the relationship established between immigrated Haitians and the Brazilian society in the course of two years of migration flow.

The third sector, patient communities and the changing NHS in England

'Third sector' organisations are being drawn into the heart of healthcare provision under new financing and delivery arrangements for the English NHS. Yet we know little about the effect of the new market upon the relationship of such organisations with their clients and with local community bases. This paper addresses this issue through a case study of the reconfiguration of provider arrangements under the Health and Social Care bill in one English city, drawing on research conducted in 2011 (focus groups and interviews).

We explore third sector stakeholders' concerns and strategies for their organisation in the run up to the expected NHS reforms. Specifically we consider whether existing forms of connections between organisations and their local client bases are likely to change and, if so, whether they will be lost, diminished or enhanced and the implications of that this may have for the kind of care provided.

Our analysis shows that respondents have a highly developed sense of their difference to the NHS (typified as money-obsessed, target driven, controlling, failing to provide choice) and the voluntary sector (typified as empowering, working in partnership with clients, engaged with local communities, appreciating the person holistically). This distinction is fundamental to establishing a unique provider identity. However it is not easily sustained and indeed may need to be broken away from in a climate of fiscal constraint which calls for strategic engagement under new contracting arrangements. In this paper we explore the struggle by third sector organisations to maintain their unique identity as they seek to either i) 'survive on the outside', ii) become part of or to inhabit the NHS, or iii) try to change NHS working practices by working in partnership as 'equal but different'. Each of these carries implications for their relationship with existing communities and the kind of care provided.

Social movements and social policy: The Bolivian case

The influence of social movements on the formation of social policy is challenging to measure. Yet, recent scholarship shows that social movements do exert significant political influence on social policy formation (Amenta 2003, Andrews 2001). This presentation shows how the use of process tracing and content analysis allows for assessing the causal influence of movements on social policy formation. Bolivia's old-age pension reform, the Renta Dignidad, is an important case for examining the impact of social movements on social policies. On the one hand, Bolivia can be seen as a political laboratory for the study of social-movement outcomes, as movements have become the dominant form of political engagement in the country in the aftermath of neoliberalism. At the same time, Bolivia was one of the first Latin American countries to implement a universal old-age pension scheme, which is the outcome of our interest. We contend that social movements have been critical for determining this outcome. Indeed, we find that the combination of leftist partisanship and party structure (embodied by the Movement Towards Socialism), policy legacies and, particularly, the influence of progressive social movements, explain the enactment of the universalist-oriented Renta Dignidad.

Gendered violence in Kashmir: A case study of half widows in Kashmir

The armed conflict in Jammu and Kashmir has entered its 21st year. Years of strife took toll on the lives of women who became the soft targets in the conflict situation, they become victims of violence, which has made them widows, half-widows and have been labeled as mothers of disappeared sons; wives of militants; women victims of physical abuse; women heads of households, etc.

These "Half – widows" of Kashmir lead a more miserable life than widows. They keep running from pillar to post to get some information about their husbands. As their husbands have not been declared dead, though missing, they are not entitled to the relief given to dependents of militancy victims.

Half widows face various economic, social and emotional insecurities. These various insecurities are compounded rather than addressed by the legal and administrative remedies currently available to half widows. Further, children of half widows are often particularly traumatized, showing extreme resentment and loneliness and are vulnerable to impoverishment and exploitation. While most half widows show immense strength and resilience acting as the sole breadwinners for their families and overcoming massive trauma, they continue to be deprived of the assistance and justice they deserve.

This Paper explores a women's perspective in analyzing that how did violence shape women's lived experience and responses and how did women forge survival strategies? Can we see structural changes leading to shift in gender roles? In a highly militarized and masculinised struggle is there the possibility of space for women's agency for resistance and conflict transformation?

In this paper narratives gathered from field have been used in conceptualizing theoretical frame work of discourses of the collective violence which is at the heart of the problems of gender discrimination in a war zone.

ANSARI, Arvinder* (University, arvinder2009@gmail.com)Preception of leisure among working women: A sociological perspective

Leisure is an important factor in determining our quality of life. Leisure is about choice. Most of us acknowledge that some form of leisure is important in our lives but we don't always have the time or resources to fully enjoy it. Our leisure activities and lifestyles are also important in defining our identities. The influence of gender roles in leisure behavior has also been a topic of research interest. The investigation of gender differences in the perception of leisure needs to account for the social context in which men and women live and interact with each other. Given the dynamic nature of the social context and of male/ females interactions, leisure is then a dynamic concept rather than a static one. The concept of leisure has taken new meaning in the life of working women with the rising responsibilities at work, tight deadlines, work pressures, and cut-throat competition have forced the current workforce to rethink about leisure more specifically. The conceptualization of leisure as a social experience is adopted in this paper. It also presents and discusses the concepts of gender identity and gender role attitudes as a way to investigate gender differences in leisure perceptions. Generally, investigations of gender issues in leisure behavior have established differences between the leisure patterns of men and women. In addition to understanding the nature of the expression leisure, it is important to understand the factor that shape and constrain. A constraint to leisure is anything that inhibits a person's ability to participate in recreation activities. The factors that shape and constrain women's leisure are often attributable to social expectations that regulate women's role within the home and in the public sphere.

Para tal argumentación, se recurre a las reflexiones de Yves Dezalay acerca de la circulación internacional de las ideas, entendiendo que, como señala Bourdieu, el "mundo social" propone y dispone de todo un tipo de instituciones de totalización y de unificación donde se torna importante encontrar en el "habitus" (irreducible a las percepciones pasivas de la unificación de las prácticas y de las representaciones) el equivalente, históricamente construido, históricamente situado de un "Yo" cuya existencia tiene que postularse para sacar a la luz de la síntesis del diverso sensible dado en la intuición y del vínculo de las representaciones en una conciencia.

Drawing on research data from two comparative research projects in Europe it discusses how migration and experiences of racial and ethnic exclusion, as well as counter-strategies by migrants, need to be incorporated into the analysis of social stratification in modern societies. It looks particularly at the revival of class analysis found in the more culturally inflected approaches and suggests how ethnicity, racism and their intersections requires moving away from a traditional class based paradigm. In addition the paper looks at conceptions of cultural and social capital and how they need to be embedded more carefully within approaches to inequality and hierarchy. In this way the paper attempts to contribute to the important debate on the ways in which social identities and hierarchies can be understood.

Our starting point is that we don't consider DPP as part of the broader concept of traditional political participation, but we consider it as a form of participation in itself. Despite the importance of the phenomenon, no validated tools are available in the literature for its measurement. Thus, the objective of this study is double. On one hand, the elaboration of the construct of DDP. To accomplish with this objective we will present a review of the literature, extracting the relevant dimensions of the construct and explaining our proposal for their measurement. On the other hand, we want to assess the validity and the technical qualities of the elaborated questionnaire. [This abstract can be sent in English]

La recherche à la base de cette communication s'intéresse au processus d'orientation idéologique des programmes scolaires de « sciences-humaines » dans l'enseignement secondaire, et se compose d'une analyse de documents d'organisations internationales et nationales, de programmes et livres de cours, ainsi que d'une socio-ethnographie de plusieurs classes de secondaire supérieur d'écoles socialement différenciées à Bruxelles et São Paulo.

Le défi analytique posé par la recherche consiste à rendre compte du processus de valorisation idéologique de contenus de cours, tant quant à la dynamique globale du système-monde capitaliste que dans le cadre de la relation sociale pratique entre élèves et professeurs. Il s'agit de saisir comment les orientations pédagogiques « d'éducation à la citoyenneté » (UNESCO, 1996) sont rendues dominantes sous la forme d'une certaine conception de la morale, de l'histoire ou de la société. Mais il convient aussi d'appréhender sa dynamique conflictuelle où l'imposition de l'ordre social hégémonique dans la sphère idéologique fait l'objet d'une résistance, ouvrant sur des interprétations alternatives.

Pour ce faire, les contributions de la philosophie du langage matérialiste de Vološinov permettent de saisir l'énonciation comme un rapport social lors duquel se définit l'indice de valeur sociale du signe, ce à quoi il renvoie dans le réel. Liée à la conception matérialiste dialectique de la société, la comprenant comme structurée par des rapports sociaux antagonistes, une telle analyse permet d'étudier la définition de la signification comme un processus conflictuel, « réflexion et réfraction de la réalité sociale dans le signe ».

La communication consistera ainsi en la présentation succincte de cette « méthode sociologique en sciences de la langue » (1929/2010), de ses apports dans le développement d'une méthode sociologique d'analyse qualitative et de la manière dont elle contribue, dans une recherche socio-ethnographique, à saisir le processus quotidien de reproduction idéologique, et ses contradictions, au sein de l'appareil scolaire.

Development at the margins and the margins of development: Tourism and local livelihood system in southern Philippines

This paper explores local-global relations in the context of eco-tourism development in the Philippines. The discussion mainly focuses on the case of Eden, a remote village located in the periphery of a forest reserve in southern Philippines. The community was the site of a vast banana plantation that was established in the 1970s, over an area that was left open by a logging company. During the heights of the Asian Miracle in the early 1990s, the area was again redeveloped into what is now called Eden Nature Park, a popular tourist destination.

This project drew different reactions among the local residents. Some believe that tourism development enabled their locality to tap into a new resource that brought opportunities to many people. Among them were local villagers who through training and experience were able to get more stable sources of income by working in the tourist resort. For other residents, however, it mainly reminds them of how they were marginalized by the establishment of the banana plantation in their locality several years earlier. Particularly, many older generation men were resentful as more educated young residents, immigrants, and women have overtaken them in securing employment in the local tourism industry.

Looking into the impact of tourism development on local livelihood system involves a whole range of issues that comprises environmental sustainability, resource-use conflict, and social marginalization. It tries to demarcate the "margins" of development and globalization through the analysis of the strategies of engagement employed by local people as their community is drawn into a complex globalizing process brought about by tourism. This local-global nexus can be a source of valuable knowledge on how global, macro-level paradigms resonates at the grassroots level, exposing important lessons on local participation, conflict resolution, and the local people's conception of environmentalism.

The difficult dialogue between exclusion and inclusion of individuals with mental disorders

This article aims to discuss a thorniest subject: the human rights of a person with mental illness. This is challenging for two main reasons. First is the difficulty to deal with a matter that moves through such vast areas that would be sufficient alone to work the issue such as psychiatry, psychology, social science and Law. The second one is the shortage material concerning the legal aspects of the problem which seems to demonstrate the marginality of the subject for legal theorists.

A person with a mental illness isn't considerate as a citizen as a person without it in the sense that he isn't an agent of his own existence, because the condition of being mentally ill is associated with the idea of submission to others, sometimes entirely, who may be the family, the state or the health professional who decides why, when, where and how is going to be the treatment and which social role this individual can have.

Very little progress has been made in terms of ensuring human rights for people with mental disorders. The usual "treatment" for a person with this condition is the isolation usually in conjunction with psychiatric care associated or not with drugs, often in precarious institutions, submitting the patient to a degrading situation, sometimes a fatal one, such as the famous case of Damião Ximenes in Brazil.

In a context of a democratic society who has to deal with the pluralism is essential to rethink the question of the rights for mental illness people, which must be increasingly committed to the idea of autonomy of the person and less with the idea of submission, recognizing their right to be different, but equal.

The place of the other: The difficult dialogue between exclusion and inclusion of individuals with mental disorders

This article aims to discuss a thorniest subject: the human rights of a person with mental illness. This is challenging for two main reasons. First is the difficulty to deal with a matter that moves through such vast areas that would be sufficient alone to work the issue such as psychiatry, psychology, social science and Law. The second one is the shortage material concerning the legal aspects of the problem which seems to demonstrate the marginality of the subject for legal theorists.

A person with a mental illness isn't considerate as a citizen as a person without it in the sense that he isn't an agent of his own existence, because the condition of being mentally ill is associated with the idea of submission to others, sometimes entirely, who may be the family, the state or the health professional who decides why, when, where and how is going to be the treatment and which social role this individual can have.

Very little progress has been made in terms of ensuring human rights for people with mental disorders. The usual "treatment" for a person with this condition is the isolation usually in conjunction with psychiatric care associated or not with drugs, often in precarious institutions, submitting the patient to a degrading situation, sometimes a fatal one, such as the famous case of Damião Ximenes in Brazil.

In a context of a democratic society who has to deal with the pluralism is essential to rethink the question of the rights for mental illness people, which must be increasingly committed to the idea of autonomy of the person and less with the idea of submission, recognizing their right to be different, but equal.

Gender empowerment and microfinance: Theoretical and empirical perspectives

Micro-credit has become a common tool in the development kit and is commonly offered up as an anti-poverty and empowerment strategy for women. The assumption is that women's access to economic resources will increase their income and, more broadly, increased economic power that will be the basis for their enhanced ability to act in ways that are beneficial to themselves and to their families. The expected ripple effects of micro-credit therefore include physical (material), economic, social and political benefits fanning outward from the women, to her children and family, and to wider society.

The paper makes a contribution to research and practice around micro-credit interventions by critically examining the mechanics through which micro credit can be helpful to clients. Among other recommendations, we suggest that the use of micro-credit for consumption should be considered as a legitimate anti-poverty strategy; and further that the organization of loans and repayments should be customized to the circumstances of different categories of women.

"Las mujeres deciden, el estado garantiza y la sociedad respeta" algo mas que una utopía?: Tensiones entre derechos reconocidos y políticas de redistribucion

Las relaciones entre demanda feministas, Estado y sociedad son por demás complejas y forman parte de una dinámica contradictoria (exclusión/inclusión, reconocimiento/distribución, cuerpo/ política, dimensiones estructurales/ transformaciones históricas, inercia/transformación) en la cual las políticas sociales son parte intrínseca.

Desde la reinstauración democrática en Argentina (1983), hemos asistido a la sanción de leyes y políticas que establecen derechos para grupos sociales con rasgos específicos vinculados a la diferencia de género sexual; a la vez que desde 2004 se han introducido reformas en las políticas sociales de redistribución desde un enfoque de derechos y crítico de la lógica neoliberal instalada en los '90. El mantenimiento de esta apariencia de compartimentos separados entre la lógica del reconocimiento y la lógica de la redistribución, continúa eximiendo a la burocracia estatal y a sus funcionarios/as de asumir que la clase y el género están fuertemente imbricados, les permite tomar medida evasivas ante reclamos como el derecho al aborto y promover (por acción u omisión) la profundización de la división sexual del trabajo y las desigualdades que implica.

En esta ponencia nos proponemos debatir en torno a las tensiones entre derechos adquiridos/garantías concretas, que se cristalizan en las relaciones que entabla el Estado con la sociedad civil a través de políticas públicas destinadas a mujeres. Consideramos que abordar el tema de las formas en que se piensan las políticas sociales, como problemáticas generales que invisibilizan las relaciones de género y ocultan el papel complejo que juegan las mujeres en la relación capital/trabajo/Estado, es significativo para dar cuenta de manera cabal de la relación Estado, mercado y sociedad civil que estructura el sistema capitalista y sus articulaciones con las relaciones de dominación patriarcal.

A luchar, a luchar, por el aborto legal!: Acciones y procesos de instalación del derecho al aborto legal en Argentina en el siglo XXI

A inicios de los años '70 en Argentina, muchas feministas y sus grupos enarbolaron la bandera del aborto legal y gratuito en los hospitales públicos, reclamo que quedó silenciado durante la dictadura militar y que una vez reinstaurada la democracia, le tomó casi dos década volver a reinstalarse de manera legítima en el movimiento.

De la mano de la protesta social y en el marco de la revitalización de los movimientos sociales y sus organizaciones, el derecho al aborto se volvió una demanda legítima por sí misma para el movimiento feminista del nuevo siglo. Nuevas experiencias y articulaciones locales y nacionales se comenzaron a tramar para conquistar la despenalización y la legalización, pero también para aprovechar las grietas de la ley en los casos de aborto no punibles e informar a mujeres que deciden abortar aún en clandestinidad, para que lo hagan de manera segura.

En esta ponencia nos proponemos contribuir al debate en torno a las acciones y a los procesos de instalación, en el debate social y en la agenda política, del derecho al aborto en Argentina. Hablaremos sobre la Campaña Nacional por el Derecho al Aborto Legal, Seguro y Gratuito, surgida en 2005, impulsada por organizaciones feministas articuló fuerzas y recursos de las acciones que muchas organizaciones venían desarrollando localmente desde 1985. Nos detendremos en casos de incumplimiento de la práctica de abortos no punibles, que cobraron estado público y, que esta Campaña denunció y acompañó. Finalmente reflexionaremos en torno a cómo estos procesos, unidos a las experiencias de solidaridad con mujeres en situación de aborto, nos llevan a repensar y profundizar argumentos en torno a la necesidad de una ley que garantice el acceso a abortos legales, poniendo el foco en las nuevas formas que nos agenciamos para significar las prácticas de abortar.

Do people support nuclear power generation for reducing greenhouse gas? Risk tradeoffs among climate change and nuclear power generation

In "the implementation plan for preventing global warming", the Government of Japan chose nuclear power generation as a "key" against climate change. On March 11th, the Fukushima Daiichi nuclear power plant had been seriously damaged by the earthquakes. Government ordered to examine "Stress Test" for all nuclear plant in operation, and stop operation to the Hamaoka power plant, which is the one of the oldest plants in Japan, addition to the annual regular inspections that has been ordered in the law of the power plant utilities.

As of the end of September, 3 plants out of 54 are currently stop operation due to regular inspection and 39 out of 54 are waiting governmental permission for operation after the inspection. Due to this, Japan's Kyoto target is now in danger. According to the Ministry of the Environment, additional 20-30 million ton-C (approximately equivalent to 12-14% of 1990 emission level) will be emitted every year.

Under those conditions, can the Government of Japan still put priority on the nuclear power generation? If so, will people support this choice? Do people support nuclear power to tackle climate change, or vice versa?

For this situation, we carry out an opinion poll on July 2011. Interviews for this study were conducted during middle of July 2011 for respondents drawn from nationally representative sample of 1,399 people among 4,000 aged 16 years and older through face-to-face in their own homes

The results show as follows.

1. Japanese people perceive higher risk perception in both climate change and nuclear power plants.
2. After 3.11, Trust in management system for nuclear power plants has been lost.
3. As a result, people see higher risk in nuclear power generation than climate change. And people seem to see some hopes in renewable energy, such as solar, wind and biomass.

The impact of media on public attitudes towards the environment: Actors and institutions

We are following the response rates of "The most important issues in the world (and "in Japan)" by the nationally representative respondents drawn from 20 and over Japanese from the spring of 2005. Those response rates reflect from those impacts such as media reporting, especially mass media (television programs, newspaper articles), and international and domestic events, such as important political events (G8 summits) or disasters (earthquakes, tsunamis).

We used the opinion poll data referred above and media reporting data (newspaper & television news coverage on the environmental issues, climate change issues).

The impact of the East Japan Earthquake in March of 2011 is huge. We could not carry out nationally covered opinion poll until May 2011. Even two months after this event, more than 40% of our respondents answered this event is the most important issue in Japan, and still more than 35% in September. Along with those impacts, climate change is also a issue. Media coverage is still not low and important. We examined the "importance" of climate change issue in the national agenda, and its changing position. As a result, the environmental issue including climate change established its position in the national agenda since January 2007, and the highest in the summer of 2008, but declined 2008 autumn, but still keeps higher position compare to other issues. We saw global institutions and actors were playing important role for this change, such as Al Gore, G8 summit, disasters.

Agrochemicals, science and policy making: Contesting boundaries in Argentina

Argentina is the third world producer and exporter of genetically modified (GM) soy. The transgenic modification allows the field to be sprayed with glyphosate-based herbicide Round-up, killing all plant life except soy. The industry and the World Health Organization claim that glyphosate is safe for people and breaks down rapidly and harmlessly in the environment. But a large and growing body of scientific research challenges these statements. The widespread spraying of glyphosate on GM soy, often carried out from the air, has been linked to severe health problems for villagers and farmers. In 2009 an Argentine scientist and physician announced new research findings according to which glyphosate causes malformations in frog embryos, in doses much lower than those used in agricultural spraying.

Strong conflicts arose in the country around this issue. Political struggle and scientific controversy converged in the same contentious arena. Peasants, neighbours, environmental movements, organized mothers as well as national and international associations of physicians, scientists, lawyers and intellectuals, challenged the Dominant Epidemiological Paradigm and joined the claim to ban the use of glyphosate. From a political process perspective, this paper analyses different types of "scientific activism" promoting the struggles as well structural obstacles faced in a "peripheral" context. The paper draws on qualitative secondary data analysis and in-depth interviews.

The travelling city, transfer and reception of modern urbanism in Latin American cities Theories, practices and methods travel in different ways. As Le Corbusier and the CIAM (Congrès International d'Architecture Moderne) movement members went around the world they carried ideas and theories to the cities and places they visited. In this paper I study the transfer of Le Corbusier's and the CIAM's urban theories to Latin America and specifically I analyze the projects for Buenos Aires (Le Corbusier, Ferrari Hardoy and Kurchan) and Bogota (Le Corbusier, Wiener and Sert).

The paper starts with a general reflection on the transfer of European urban theories to Latin America during the first half of the twentieth century. The purpose of this part is to understand the political and professional context in which these ideas were presented. This first part is based mainly on secondary sources by authors such as Liernur, Pschepieurca, Alamandoz, Gutiérrez, Tsiomis, Benton and Hofer. In a second part I analyze the reception of the two urban projects. The comparative perspective allows us to understand how this urban theory was interpreted and applied in divergent manners in different socio-political configurations. The sources used are mainly official publications, general press and professional and specialized journals.

These projects were not physically developed in either city. Nevertheless, they served as vehicles, accelerators and pretexts to create a new urban doctrine –both in academic and non-academic circles– that played an important role in the debate on how cities should be understood, organized and built. The new ideas, however, were interpreted in Buenos Aires and Bogota in ways that differed from Le Corbusier's and CIAM's original thoughts. Local actors, therefore, applied these theories in their own ways and finished the process of reception and cultural transfer by creating and adapting methods and forms of action based on divergent interpretations of a foreign theory.

Colliding perspectives on police training and practices: Analyzing Ronda do Quarteirão

This research approaches the Ronda do Quarteirão (which may be translated to Block Patrol program), a segment of the Military Police conceived and implemented in 2007 in the state of Ceará, located in the north-east of Brazil. Ronda was presented by the state government as the "good neighbor Police". Television and radio advertisements emphasized the modern equipment made available for this program, as well as the content related to "human rights" and "conflict mediation" incorporated to the training education of its agents. Soon after its implementation, Ronda enjoyed high rates of approval. The population was satisfied with the increase of in flagrante delicto arrests and the display of a sophisticated working infrastructure in the hands of a "new Police". Since 2008, however, events have come to "tarnish" Ronda's image. Car accidents as a result of the agents' lack of preparation conducting modern vehicles were greatly widespread. The disastrous police approach that resulted in the death of a teenager mistakenly considered a robber, shot to death while he sat on a motorcycle with his father, generated intense commotion. Not to mention the embarrassing images featuring police officers in intimate contact with two young women inside a patrol vehicle. These episodes have triggered discussions on the viability of this "new Police" and their training. This paper analyzes approximations and distances among the arguments of social assistants, sociologists and journalists who have expressed their thoughts in the local press and also among the voices of our research participants (agents and police officers of the Ronda do Quarteirão) about the practice and training of this segment of police. While the first set of people emphasized values associated to human rights not yet incorporated by the police, the latter protest on teachings related to the approach of people and the handling of guns.

The dynamics between state and civil society: Limitations to human rights' effectiveness brought by the conditions of sociability reproduction

This article discusses how the laceration of social reality in two fields, state and civil society, leads human rights, as legal norms, to present validity and, meanwhile, insufficient levels of effectiveness. The dichotomy between state and civil society, typical of occidental European's social formation in Modernity, has been universalized through capitalism's expansion. Individual's social life is torn in two strange fields: political society or public life, essential plane where individual is a citizen equal to others under law; and civil society or private life, existential plane where individual is a concrete person, subjected to substantive inequality resulted from the typical aspects of bourgeois' sociability reproduction. In this context, dichotomy suggested by Marx between political emancipation and human emancipation is explanatory: political emancipation is the relation between individual and its own freedom through state and is based on the recognition of the individuals' rights (included human rights); human emancipation is the relation between existent individual and its own freedom through the realization of its human potentialities, which are characteristic of its essence as active being and constructor of its own social and historical reality. Marx's thesis is that the individual politically emancipated – the individual as someone who possesses rights and participates of the state as a citizen – is not humanly emancipated under the existential conditions in bourgeois' civil society, which is full of processes of alienation, reification and fetishism – and that happens because civil society disposes of ontological primacy over state in the reproduction process of social life. Then, thinking about the dynamics between political emancipation and human emancipation – or the dynamics between state and civil society – is thinking about the social conditions that nurture and sustain human rights: social condition in which individuals are not subjected to the bourgeois' logic of sociability reproduction.

La constitución estamental de los grupos profesionales en Chile: Qué posibilidades para la democracia?

En el contexto de una sociedad donde no sólo las desigualdades de ingreso son flagrantes, sino que también su justificación se encuentra en una realidad simbólica que tiende a moralizar las diferencias en términos económicos, de tal modo que riqueza y pobreza terminan encontrando fundamento en la calidad moral de los sujetos, resulta relevante comprender cómo se constituyen simbólicamente los grupos que, en principio, no tienen una adscripción de clase, como son los grupos profesionales. A partir de la distinción clásica weberiana entre estamento [Stand] y clase, y a través del análisis de entrevistas semi-estructuradas realizadas a profesores de universidad, miembros de fuerzas armadas, sacerdotes, artistas, diplomáticos y políticos en Chile, hemos identificado una fuerte coherencia entre los mecanismos ideológicos de justificación de la existencia de clases sociales y de estamentos, de tal modo que éstos últimos reposan sobre la idea del sacrificio de sus miembros, valores morales considerados elevados, la determinación total de la vida por parte de la actividad profesional, una visión unitaria de la sociedad, el gusto desinteresado por la actividad y, finalmente, la constitución de un mito fundador de los estamentos en Chile que se basa en la superación de los mecanismos de clase, lo que sin embargo contrasta con los datos cuantitativos. La coherencia simbólica y material entre la pertenencia a estamentos y a clases sociales plantea finalmente serios desafíos a la democracia en Chile, entendida tanto en términos de participación política como en términos de equidad en lo económico, por cuanto la estructura simbólica profunda de los chilenos justifica y valida moralmente no sólo las diferencias de clase, sino que también la realización de carreras profesionales que reproducen las bases morales de estas diferencias.

Public administration teams: Leadership and motivation

This presentation is based on the observation of the response of Public Administration team leaders in Latin America to a virtual course in leadership and motivation conducted since 2007.

The course was thought as a contribution to the cultural transformation within Public Administration organizations, that beyond requiring the deepening of improvements in other concepts, relies on the requirement of the creation of motivated teams.

The work environment in public organizations in Latin America is politics dependant, which makes more difficult the relationships between people with different levels of power.

Nevertheless some public work teams have a mystic that allows them to achieve extraordinary results.

These examples show that their results are more related to the attention given to human potential awaken through effective communication and participative leadership than to the use of management technologies or the application of rules of public bureaucracies.

When awaken and promoted this gives way to enhanced participation, emphasizing in democratic values and avoiding authoritarian practices. An increase in motivation is thus expected.

Participant comments on their results of the application of several practices to increase participation, refer to this impact in different types of Public Organization teams.

De las cuotas a la paridad política, un largo recorrido hacia la equidad de género

Durante los '90 se sancionaron en los países de América Latina acciones afirmativas de género conocidas como leyes de cuotas, las cuales establecen porcentajes mínimos de mujeres para incorporar en las listas de candidatos. Catorce países de la región promovieron la participación de las mujeres en las cámaras legislativas con diversas leyes de cuotas. El impacto cuantitativo en los parlamentos fue importante aunque heterogéneo.

No obstante, la efectividad de las leyes de cuotas encontró barreras difíciles de sortear. Los obstáculos que afectaron su efectividad han abierto el debate sobre la incorporación de la paridad política de género en las legislaciones. Es decir, la exigencia de diseñar las listas de candidatos/as con 50% de cada sexo en forma secuencial y alternada.

Bolivia (2008), Ecuador (2009) y Costa Rica (2009) realizaron modificaciones en sus normas incorporando la paridad en el ámbito legislativo. A esta agenda se suman actuales debates en México, Venezuela y Panamá. Si bien las leyes de paridad permiten superar muchas dificultades que presentan las leyes de cuotas también se enfrentan a barreras semejantes, en particular las que imponen los sistemas electorales.

El objetivo de este estudio es analizar la relación de las normas paritarias con los sistemas electorales y sus resultados en las últimas elecciones a fin de señalar los obstáculos que persisten para alcanzar una mayor participación y acceso a la representación de las mujeres en la política.

Jóvenes y trabajo en la España de la crisis: Entre el desempleo y la precariedad laboral

El aumento exponencial y sostenido de la tasa de desocupación a partir del 2008 en España, ha impactando con mayor intensidad en los jóvenes, transformándolos en un colectivo de especial vulnerabilidad social. Asimismo, los jóvenes que logran tener trabajo, se insertan en empleos en gran medida temporales y precarios o no acordes con la formación adquirida.

En esta investigación, nos proponemos reflexionar acerca de la situación e inserción de los jóvenes en el mercado del trabajo en España, considerando el fuerte impacto que la crisis financiera internacional actual tiene en ese país. Buscamos describir las dificultades de inserción laboral de los jóvenes, así como también conocer qué hacen en la actual situación: cómo buscan trabajo, qué ocurre con los estudios y la formación, la emancipación de la familia, dónde y en quienes buscan apoyo, que estrategias movilizan.

Consideramos que el modelo de integración social español se ha venido apoyando en la familia como sostén frente al desempleo o la pobreza de los miembros, sin embargo, en el contexto actual comprobamos que ha aumentado la cantidad de hogares con todos los miembros desocupados, por lo que pensamos peligra la protección para los jóvenes que provienen de este tipo de hogares. ¿Cómo están reaccionando los jóvenes en este contexto de crisis y desempleo de larga duración? ¿Cómo se están produciendo estas transiciones a la adultez?

La investigación se ha realizado desde un abordaje metodológico cuantitativo longitudinal, con datos de la Encuesta de Población Activa (EPA) del Instituto Nacional de Estadísticas del 2006 al IV trimestre del 2010, datos del Instituto de la Juventud, del Consejo de la Juventud de España y EUROSTAT. Asimismo se realizó un abordaje cualitativo a través de entrevistas a jóvenes e informantes clave.

Crossing methods: Exploring visuality in digital practices

In recent years, digital media technologies have facilitated participative forms of content creation and production that undertake different ways of involving social agents, including audiences, fans and amateurs, and other collaborations between artists and industries. Thus, merging visual and digital technologies have transformed everyday people practices as well as the circuit of cultural production. At the same time, social scientists, are using the very same visual and online devices for recording and studying people's activities. Visual social scientists, as well as many virtual ethnographers, have faced this question of the two-fold dimensions of the use of technological aids: visual media and the Internet are, at the same time, the object of research and the method for gathering data, not to mention that both media are also used for knowledge production.

Drawing on our experience in ethnographic fieldwork in digital media production, circulation, domestication and consumption such as self-production videos, everyday digital photographic practices, collaborative creation and code creation in mapping art, we will explore different methodological challenges regarding to: a) visual code sharing (Benjamin, 2003); b) layers of visual data analysis (Pink, 2009); c) cross-methods (Ardévol, forthcoming); and d) ethics and digital agents (Markham, 2008).

Seeking for social change, struggling for culture: Collaborative creation as political action and moral orders in the case of free culture movement

Based on an ongoing ethnographic experience among Free Culture Movement's activists we propose, building on Luc Boltanski's notion of test and moral justification (2006) and Benkler (2007) conceptualization of social production in the context of a networked information economy, to challenge the category of "social movement" to be useful to understand all the complex spectrum of current collective political action.

Free Culture Movement claims that the development of participatory model of cultural production is in danger, since its basic conditions of popular creation are being constrained by intellectual property laws, market regulations on cultural production and revile of values such refuse and share. The battle for the future is taking part now (Lessig, 2005).

In their forward for social change, political action is understood through their own practices of collaborative creation and the commons as their principal value (economic and moral). They do not see themselves as "militants" or even as "activists" (although some participate in movements like the 15M) because they move on horizontal network structures of sharing that oppose the classic conception of social movement as which links together structural organization, collective identity and political goals.

This case study, situated mainly in Spain, offers an example of new forms of mobilization that question the current frameworks of "social movement", an de-centre the focus of analysis from the organized "political action" to the everyday practices that entails to look at materiality, space, sociality and expectations of future.

Alceu amoroso lima (1893-1983): Contrainte et liberté

Ce travail essayera de analyser les contradictions vécus par Alceu Amoroso Lima (1893-1983) pendant les deux périodes les plus autoritaires dans l'histoire de l'État brésilien : le « Estado Novo » (1937-1945) et la dictature militaire (1964-1985). Cela va entraîner une réflexion sur le délicat équilibre entre son désir d'autonomie d'action et les contraintes exercés sur lui par les institutions desquelles il fait parti, mais aussi par un État attaché au contrôle des libertés individuelles. Le texte est structuré dans l'analyse de ses livres, y-inclût des autobiographies.

Durant le « Estado Novo », l'Église catholique est une institution assez dynamique au sein de la société brésilienne, soit par son presence pluriseculaire, soit par son singuliere amplitude nationale. L'hierarchie ecclesiale soutient le status quo et choisit Amoroso Lima comme son principal représentant dans ce qui concerne la politique et les mouvements sociaux, spécialement ceux liés au mouvement ouvrier et à l'éducation. Cependant, Amoroso Lima joue un rôle ambigu, parce qu'il accepte l'ordre en vigenca mais se démontre soucieux de préserver sa liberté d'action. De cela résulte son action de recruteur de fonctionnaires pour les Ministères de l'Éducation et du Travail sans qu'il accepte lui-même l'invitation pour devenir Chef du Gouvernement en 1935 ou Ministre du Travail en 1938.

Différemment, en 1964, l'Église perd space en faveur d'une croissante industrie culturel secularisée. En plus, elle ne jouit pas de la confiance des militaires, parce que trop impliquée dans la crise d'identité exprimée par les tensions du concile Vatican II. Amoroso Lima est du côté de ceux qui défendent le aggiornamento et se montre critique au régime face à la présence de la torture et de la censure. Paradoxalement, c'est dans un moment de relative fragilité de l'institution à laquelle Amoroso Lima s'est dédié pendant décennies qu'il obtient plus de force et admiration.

Talking the talk and walking the walk?: Non-profits and the contradictions of New Orleans' post-Katrina coalition to stop the demolitions

In the aftermath of hurricane Katrina state and corporate elites in both New Orleans and Washington used the disaster as an opportunity to quickly and massively close and privatize public services. A prime target of this agenda was the city's public housing communities that provided shelter for mainly low-income African Americans families. Neoliberal reforms over the previous decade had slashed the number of apartments, but the post-Katrina plan envisioned a clean sweep of the city's remaining five large public housing developments. While a number of NGOs eagerly collaborated in the privatization and displacement initiative —euphemistically referred to as "deconcentrating poverty"—some of the progressive variety joined the movement to defend public housing. The progressive NGOs employed a human rights and right to the city framework and language to legitimate their advocacy work. At the same time, the funding these NGOs received from foundations that were involved in the privatization of public housing and the larger neoliberal makeover of the city placed real constraints on how far they could go in defending public housing. In this paper I analyze how these contradictions were expressed and managed through an examination of the intense battles over the demolition of public housing between November 2007—when the courts gave the green light to the Bush and Nagin administration's demolition plans—and March 2008—when demolition on the last remaining development began.

Data for this study is drawn from four years of participant-observation, from 2004 to 2008, of New Orleans' pre and post-Hurricane Katrina public housing movement. This data is supplemented with documents distributed by activists and lawyers, participation in and study of activist email discussion list serves, newspaper articles, and interviews with key participants.

The contested terrains of public sociology

In this article I argue professional and policy sociology are antagonistic, rather than compatible with the theory and practice of a critical, organic, public sociology in defense of human rights and social justice. Employing an auto-ethnographical methodology that draws upon my graduate school experience and relationship with New Orleans public housing movement in the late 1990s and early 2000s, I show how practicing public sociology in various terrains required unmasking and opposing the apolitical pretences of professional sociology and the agenda-setting of neoliberal government and corporate patrons of policy sociology. The current global economic crisis and assault on university budgets is strengthening the policy and professional sociology tendencies of the discipline. If public sociology is to have a future, its practitioners must immerse themselves as integral components of a working class, counter-hegemonic challenge to global neoliberal capitalism, rather than play support roles for various foundation and NGO funded and directed single issue campaigns.

Disability rights movement in Spain: From the UN convention to the "indignation" in the streets

The United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities is now the main tool for persons with disabilities in their political struggles for equal opportunities. It reaffirms the legislative renewal process that has been going on in the last decade in relation to disability. In Spain, the normative framework is the LIONDAU (2003), which enacts equality of opportunities and non-discrimination as regulatory principles, leaving behind the previous biomedical and care-oriented approaches. However, those changes have had little impact on the daily lives of persons with disabilities, who have also recently extended their claims by joining the Spanish 15M movement.

In the midst of the severe economic crisis, the 15M movement began in May 2010 with a series of massive demonstrations in Spain. Organized through the Internet, the movement was embodied by a network of camps in public places of a large number of cities, which were transformed into multitudinous spaces of participatory and deliberative democracy. There, political action was developed outside the traditional representative model, thus allowing participation to a great diversity of critical voices against the current economic and social systems. Once the camps were dismantled, the movement has remained alive through the Internet and as a decentralized network of local and neighborhoods assemblies, as well as in its transnational version actualized by the Occupy movement.

This paper is aimed to show how Spanish persons with disabilities have joined their efforts to this new movement of social transformation, given the lack of impact of the UN Convention in their daily lives and the inadequacies of the traditional ways for channeling their claims. It will also explore how this alliance with open and participatory politics brought by the 15M movement places disability at the core of a new concept of citizenship, making it more complex and radical.

Meaning of work and elderly

The Empirical Study of the Meaning of Work for the Elderly in Precarious Jobs

In Monterrey, México, local governments and labor unions have begun to encourage people over sixty to take informal jobs, for example as baggers in supermarkets or guarding parked cars—an informal-street work called cuidacoches. For the past two years, I have been conducting research on the meaning of work for the elderly in these occupations. Both are informal activities and are defined explicitly as voluntary: they involve an income dependent altogether on tips. Problems arise when conducting research with populations that are sometimes reluctant to participate in in-depth interviews, as I have encountered with some cuidacoches. At the other extreme, some baggers are excessively enthusiastic participants: I do not have time enough to interview all those interested. Despite the differences in the two occupations, there are some points in common regarding procedures and problems with the vocabulary used in the interviews. In Mexico there are many euphemism to refer to the elderly: viejito (little-old-people) or abuelito (grandma or grandpa), for example, and even the institutionalized vocabulary has changed in recent years: the actual term to refer to old people is adulto mayor ("greater" adult), a term with no explicit reference to aging. In my ethnographic work (participant observation and in-depth interviews), it has been fruitful to leave people free to refer to themselves in their own words, and to talk about themes even if they were not originally in the script of the interview, and even if they are not relevant—in principle—to the research questions. Follow-up interviews have also been valuable to let people re-think their participation in the research, and even to read their own life stories and be coauthors of them.

Jose sedano: Pedagogy of answer and social participation

Jose de Jesus Sedano González was born in Bolívar, a small town located in the south of the department of Santander, Colombia, on February 25th 1922. He enters the Dominican Novitiate in 1939 and is named priest eight years later, on the 5th January 1947 in Bogota. Influenced by the French liberating movements, he will manage to approach the renovating currents of theology and the new Thomistic thought that will give a singular stamp to his future intellectual work.

On the pedagogical front, Sedano develops an innovating experience at the Apostolic Seminary Jordan of Saxony (Bogota), of which he becomes rector in 1954. After the passing of the years, the alternative regency of this work combined with the maturity of new vital experiences, will be gathered in one of his main works, Pedagogy of Answer.

It is also important to note his participation and understanding of the main social problems of the Latin American and Colombian society of all times but especially of the Sixties where the first popular organizations and the movements of resistance against the oppression of classes encourage an ecclesiological model of participation and fight for social justice. Sedano knows the substrate of these transforming dynamics and sympathizes with them, as shown by his proximity with Camilo Torres, who will be later known in the history of the continent as "the guerrilla priest".

In this way, the present communication aims at outlining the intellectual history of Sedano's Pedagogy of Answer from three central contexts that allows us to understand his work: the French libertarian context, the new pedagogy in Colombia and the awakening of social movements in Latin America.

Migration and "well-being" - The experience of mixtec migrants in the United States and Mexico

This paper will argue that a human-centred approach provides key insights into the developmental or transformative impact of human mobility.

Building from the premise that the transformative impact of migration -and migration itself- is contingent on a vast number of social, economic and political factors, this paper will assert that an approach which neglects the broader social reality of migrants at their country of destination -as well as that of relatives or communities of origin- is insufficient in capturing the complexity of this phenomenon.

This paper will focus on the migratory experience of Mixtec migrants residing in the United States, as well as that of relatives or members of their communities of origin in Mexico. It will provide an initial evaluation of the perspectives and experiences of Indigenous individuals and organisations regarding the value of human mobility and its transformative impact. This paper has three inter-related objectives. First, it seeks to reflect on some of the epistemological and methodological issues that arise when studying the transformative impact of migration. Second, it aims to provide an example of the manner in which these issues can be addressed in practice. Third, it aims to provide a number of initial insights into the meaning and determinants of what "well-being" or "development" means for this particular community of migrants and the extent to which the experience of migration is conducive or detrimental to this.

This paper will draw from the initial stages of my fieldwork in both Mexico and the United States. While the findings presented in this paper will not be conclusive, they will nonetheless provide an example of the insights that can be drawn through a human-centered analysis of the transformative impact of migration.

Marketing and advertisement evaluation practices: The making of the Chilean middle class consumer

This paper presents the firsts of findings of a two year funded research project on marketing and advertisement knowledges and practices in contemporary Chile. Concretely it explores how marketing and advertisement enact lower middle class consumers in contemporary Chile. It is argued that marketing practices, knowledge's and devices not only contribute to describe and characterize different "targets" but also play a central role in assembling a particular version of middle class consumers. In doing so, the papers attempt to deploy a sociology of market professionals and devices as cultural producers. The paper relies on three different theoretical approaches to analyze how these market experts enact middle class consumers. a) Lamont's works on the production of symbolic boundaries (Lamont and Molnar 2001); b) the literature on social categorization and classification as spaces in which social groups are produced (Boltanski 1982) and, c) a cultural economy approach that understands markets relying on process of qualification (Callon, Méadel et al. 2002).

Against this theoretical backdrop, the paper discuss some of the first empirical outcomes after carried out more than 40 interviews with advertisement and marketing experts and spent several weeks doing ethnographic fieldwork in advertisement agencies. Based on this material, it describes marketing and advertisement expert's process of evaluation and qualification of middle class clients. In doing so, it analyses how different arrangements of devices, professional practices and knowledge's helps experts to define a final middle class consumer.

Social Security's reform impact in Argentina (1996-2010)

In the beginning of the Twenty-first Century, Argentina suffered a profound economic, political and social crisis known as the "2001 Crisis". The previous decade was determined by the implementation of adjustment policies centered in the privatization of the social security system and the reform of labour conditions, among others, which created a progressive growth in unemployment, labour precariousness and a decrease of the pension system's coverage. With an unemployment rate of 21.5% and more than half the population under the poverty line, the social integration paradigm based in ascending social mobility, due to stable labour access and social security, was replaced by another one based on social segmentation, exclusion and inequality. Policies intended to improve employment levels, increase formal labour conditions and favor access to social security for vulnerable and older workers, through early retirement and payment plans (moratoriums) where implemented in order to overcome this crisis, thus allowing a revert in the exclusion process and the begging of inclusion. However, levels of inequality and social segmentation remain to be overcome. The goal of this presentation is to analyze the role of pensions as the individual and familiar assets to face aging, poverty and vulnerability. The first part includes a brief description of the regional context in terms of demographic transition, poverty and social security coverage. In the second part, the analysis focuses on the situation of labour and social security of the urban older adults of Argentina during the process of exclusion, crisis and recovery, and its association with the entry or overcoming of poverty and vulnerability. This includes gender perspectives and intergenerational exchange using as source microdata from the Permanent Household Survey (EPH) carried out by the National Statistical Office (periods 1996-2002; 2004-2006 and 2008-2010).

Religious symbols and state secularization: A discussion in the context of public liberties

In the last years, strong debates about religious symbols in public space have been taking place in democratic states. The legitimacy of those symbols, in the light of constitutional principles, has been evaluated by courts. The diversity of jurisdictional solutions shows how wide the variations in the relation between religion and the state may be, and points at the problem of the compatibility of those religious expressions with individuals' religious freedom.

Besides its juridical dimension, that case-law is related to a broader process of state secularization. Indeed, modern secularization trends have affected individual behaviour and social practices, and have been reflected in the public institutions through the principle of separation between churches and state. However, this process has not been homogeneous, and has produced different models of separation that have resulted not only from the specific orientation of societal secularization in a particular geographical context, but also from deliberate political projects which intended to shape public institutions.

The persistence of religious symbols in public space expresses the maintenance of a particular link between the state and some religious beliefs. This shows, on the one hand, that secularization may be an unachieved and gradual process. On the other hand, it means that the translation from societal to state secularization is not automatic: it requires a permanent negotiation that must take into account the activity and the pressure of religious actors in a democratic system.

Subjectivity and video-based studies: The intercourse between ROM culture and forms of expressions and resistance by dancing

Our contribution aims to quest about the relationship among the body postures and final scopes of cultures: dance may prove a valid tool to resist to possible cancellation of Rom culture.

For a long time (probably since the well-known paper by Marcel Mauss about the body techniques), anthropologists had thought of human body as an evident tool related to expressions and scopes of any culture. The way of moving, of walking, of dancing, show a proper development for any different culture: dance and music of Rom show then a steadiness which can't be reduced by external pressure.

Our video-based study follows a method of observing participation (as with Boas).

A first step of our field work was obviously been gaining trust of the Rom community: our basic material has come out from shooting of live events, both from Rom festivals, or from official stages of professional teachers, Roms and non-Roms.

At first, we tried to identify the general techniques up witch Rom dances are shaped. A main topic has appeared to us the non-formalization of the teacher's figure, also of variability of used techniques.

So, our paper shows the way of a research about capability of Rom culture to face dangers of homologation, although absorbing some degree of contaminations with conterminous cultures, as it also happened with other aspects of the Rom life.

We find proper to refer, at the end of this short summary, the words of a contemporary Rom master: "I will have you dancing even as I am absent, whenever you have this music: it is nice to dance together, to be together..."

El sindicalismo de movimiento social después del neoliberalismo. Una exploración sobre los empleados públicos Argentinos afiliados a ATE y la CTA

En la Argentina, el sindicalismo de movimiento social ha tenido un significativo éxito en la experiencia de la Central de Trabajadores de la Argentina (CTA). Surgida a comienzos de los 1990s como respuesta de un grupo de sindicatos de la administración y la educación públicas que se oponían a la implementación de las reformas neoliberales, experimentó durante toda esa década un crecimiento organizativo y una influencia pública-política notables. Sin embargo, en los 2000s se vio alterada su marcha ascendente, entre otras razones por la condena generalizada al neoliberalismo y por la asunción de gobiernos nacional-populares que, en el país y en la región, promovieron políticas favorables al fortalecimiento del estado en la economía y en la sociedad.

El objetivo de esta ponencia es explorar los desafíos que enfrentan las organizaciones sindicales enmarcadas en el sindicalismo de movimiento social cuando ocupan el poder gobiernos afines a los trabajadores. Para ello, analizamos el derrotero de la CTA como organización típica de esta opción en los 2000s y de uno de sus sindicatos fundadores, la Asociación Trabajadores del Estado (ATE), en el contexto de los gobiernos de Néstor Kirchner (2003-2007) y de Cristina Fernández (2007-2011).

Vicisitudes de la democracia sindical en Argentina. El caso de la CTA en los 2000s

Es un hecho frecuente que las organizaciones sindicales enmarcadas en el sindicalismo de movimiento social promuevan la democracia sindical. Sea porque, con ese gesto, denuncian una realidad insatisfactoria en otros sindicatos y de la cual quieren distinguirse, sea por la diversidad de grupos a los que procuran representar y la porosidad mentada de sus fronteras organizativas, los movimientos que emprenden este tipo de sindicalismo hallan en el ejercicio de la democracia interna un resorte importante de su fortaleza. Ello obedece a las mayores garantías que se brindan a la participación de los distintos niveles de militancia y que legitiman así los procesos de selección de las conducciones y los mecanismos de deliberación y decisión asamblearia sobre sus estrategias organizativas, conquistas sociales y proyectos políticos.

En esta ponencia nos proponemos explorar las vicisitudes que atraviesa la democracia interna de las organizaciones sindicales enmarcadas en el sindicalismo de movimiento social. De ese modo, procuramos indagar acerca de sus potencialidades y limitaciones. Para ello, analizaremos el caso de la Central de Trabajadores de la Argentina (CTA), con especial atención a su derrotero en los 2000s.

Dispositivos pedagógicos, cultura mediática y subjetividad. O de cuando las tecnologías invadieron las aulas

Durante largo tiempo (tiempo de predominio de lo que Foucault llamó lógica disciplinaria), la escuela se afirmó como uno de los dispositivos de mayor eficacia en la configuración de un tipo de subjetividad: aquella que caracterizó al ideal de hombre "moderno". Es evidente, sin embargo, que desde hace algunas décadas, y en el marco de profundas transformaciones sociales, políticas, económicas y culturales, dicho dispositivo se ha visto tensionado por la emergencia y veloz propagación social de un conjunto de tecnologías de la información y la comunicación. En este marco, estas prolíficas tecnologías informáticas y la creciente expansión de la cultura mediática han alterado y alteran las formas en que los jóvenes se vinculan con el conocimiento y con las instituciones encargadas de transmitirlo. Así, una de las preguntas que surge es aquella vinculada a las formas que asumen la producción y transmisión de la cultura en nuestro presente. Específicamente, ¿qué características asume el dispositivo escolar cuando –sin mayor mediación– las tecnologías invaden su territorio? ¿De qué manera resuelve la escuela la tensión entre su gramática disciplinaria y una cada vez más presente lógica del entretenimiento, el espectáculo y el consumo? ¿Cómo registrar, a su vez, un modo contemporáneo de configuración política? Serán estos interrogantes los que guiarán el presente trabajo.

Evolving online society and the transformation of political organization in internet

In the full-blown online society everyone is expected to be available all the time everywhere. Online society is expected to develop an m-etiquette of its own, involving norms for reciprocating the messages/calls you get and to be always available. This may accelerate the communication so that copresent interactions and mediated distant exchanges may at times seem to be woven into a seamless web. There are varying views on how political organization will be affected by the evolving online society. Positive views stress empowerment through increased possibilities for participation. The information and communication power of people may be increasing, which enhances potential for democratization; the Arab spring might be considered a supporting case. The negative visions emphasize the side effects of filtering and mass customization that tend to split society into increasingly smaller social groups. The resulting development may cause "balkanization" where society is fragmented into same-minded groups that are incapable to communicate with each other; further, the heightened global competition together with balkanization may lead to "Ozwardization", i.e., communality that is degenerated into most primitive identifications resulting premodern group structure, in which groups are inherently hostile to each other. In this presentation, the theoretical visions are tested with the help of empirical data from online debates concerning immigration. Politically, the presentation deals with the rise of new right in Europe, the Finnish new nationalism as a case study. The features of online society, such as the increased speed of communication and related online affectivity are addressed. Eventually the presentation concerns the question whether Internet communication can be domesticated, i.e., can the net behavior become civilized due to course of time, and phenomena such as hate speech overcome?

Hate speech and the transformation of political organization in internet

Hate speech is any communication that disparages a person or a group on the basis of some characteristic such as race, color, ethnicity, gender, sexual orientation, nationality or religion. It exists world-wide, and one of the terrains, where it is common, is Internet. It is not yet widely discussed whether and to what degree hate speech is connected to an alleged transformation of political organization through new social media. This paper has two-fold purposes. First, this is a case study on the use of language in web discussion on "immigration", which is one of the issues that divides opinions sharply, and thus is prone to "hate speech". Second, the language use in the web is theoretically contextualized with the help an analysis of historical change of media. Applied conversation analysis (CA) is used for exploration of patterns of linguistic features of turns in an online debate. Data consists of blogs and online-comments of a debate related to an publishing of a newspaper article: "Immigration is a good enemy". The analysis explores discursive features of online language, including denigrating categorizations, victimization, demonization, hostile humour, manipulation of joke/serious relationship, negative bonding and trolls. The aim is to articulate the critical characteristics of online hate speech, and subsequently discuss whether and to what degree the empirical observations fit to a theoretical understanding of the media change, including filtering, mass customization and shifts in the gate keeping. Ultimate goal is to check, refine and revise the contemporary understanding of the media change.

A comparative perspective on the identification of minorities by governments in the Americas

The basic challenges faced by public institutions in recognizing and accommodating the identities of minority groups are now common to all countries in the Americas, but obviously their expression take different forms in different contexts. Demography and history are critical, but so are national imaginaries, political dynamics, and cultural patterns. The "Other" that needs to be named by the state – in order to be protected, integrated or separated – becomes a key aspect of policy-making and public debate: complex and diverse issues such as immigration and naturalization reform, the application of antidiscrimination norms, the implementation and assessment of affirmative action, curriculum guidelines for education, language use and bilingualism, religious freedom and secularism, etc. require facing the question of "who are they?" This paper will focus on the ways in which several countries in the Americas seek to identify the "Other" through a very particular institutional process: the construction of census categories. This seemingly straightforward administrative task is actually reflective of deeply entrenched notions of nationality and ethnicity. "Race" in the United States, "Visible Minority" in Canada, "Color" in Brazil, as well as language, ancestry, culture, etc. are some of the traits that are used to identify, classify, and quantify "otherness" in the Americas, a continent originally defined by ideals of racial/ethnic fusion and mestizaje (United States' "Melting Pot", Mexico's "Cosmic Race", Brazil's "Racial Democracy", Argentina's "Race Crucible", etc.) It is particularly telling to examine the evolving nature of this tool of state management of diversity in North and Latin America in the last few years, as we can observe certain common trends – probably resulting from the unifying standards of multiculturalism and human rights – and also several diverging approaches to diversity.

La complementariedad entre comunidad y sociedad según weber

El presente escrito analiza la tensión entre los conceptos weberianos de "comunidad" política nacional y "asociación" política estatal. Hace hincapié en la nación entendida como comunidad cuya exclusiva referencia es el poder, en contraste con el Estado donde se condensa la aspiración de predominio y la organización necesaria para alcanzarlo, ponderando la reciprocidad entre fines y medios, racionalidad formal y material, intereses particulares e intereses generales, sentimientos subjetivos y propósitos objetivos.

Tomando ese planteo como punto de partida, avanza hacia la distinción entre comunidad y sociedad en el sentido que Weber atribuye a tales términos: no como conceptos antinómicos sino complementarios, tampoco como relaciones orgánicas y cálidas en oposición a lo mecánico y frío. Más que oponerse a sociedad, comunidad se opone a lucha, de modo que la modernidad implica la coexistencia de comunidad (acciones tradicionales y racional-valorativas) y sociedad (acciones racionales según fines). Esa combinación es la que da el tono a la sociedad moderna y a las formas históricas de dominación legítima, así como a la formulación teórica de la tipología de la dominación, donde sociedad se acerca a dominación legal-racional y comunidad a dominación tradicional o dominación carismática. Asimismo, conecta dicha formulación con el politeísmo valorativo, la autonomización de la dependencia de la religión y la retirada de los valores más elevados de la esfera pública. Concluye con una especificación que pretende dar cuenta de la imposibilidad de un regreso a relaciones comunitarias amorfas, imprecisas y sentimentales, dado que la preocupación weberiana radica más en lo asociativo que en lo integrativo. Por último, sigue el curso del pasaje desde la pregunta "cómo se hace" al "qué se hace y para quién", pues ese recorrido introduce la lealtad, un valor opuesto a la impersonalidad de las leyes que origina sentimientos de comunidad en medio de la sociedad.

Creencias biografiadas: Reflexiones metodológicas sobre la pluralización confesional en Brasil

A través de la discusión metodológica, presentaremos las bases de una investigación sociológica cuyo objetivo fue comprender en su lógica inherente el proceso de constitución, en Brasil, de un mercado competitivo de bienes de salvación caracterizado en su fase inicial por la pérdida del monopolio de la Iglesia Católica y el surgimiento de nuevas creencias y doctrinas. El método se basó principalmente en el análisis de encuestas y de biografías de los agentes religiosos cuyas acciones fueron responsables por componer poco a poco un medio específico de actuación: el campo religioso brasileño. Antes de "reducir" o "destruir" la originalidad creativa de los agentes - acusaciones frecuentes a la sociología - tal abordaje puede traer algunos beneficios para el análisis sociológico de la religión, siempre que aplicada de manera reflexionada. Porque si pensamos en la biografía de cada agente en particular, corremos el riesgo de dar demasiada importancia a los casos aislados y llegaremos a la conclusión inoperante según la cual ningún agente es igual al otro. Pues si respetamos sin restricciones su integridad, desistimos de comprenderlo, o lo que podría ser peor, podemos incluso atribuirle habilidades extraordinarias, dando demasiado énfasis a su individualidad, como si estuviera desplegado del mundo social y desposeído de toda y cualquiera disposición. Sin embargo, si ascendemos al razonamiento más general, disolviendo el agente en las categorías de clasificación, lograremos manipular la realidad con cierto éxito, pero atropellaremos la verdad singular. Esta operación que consiste en describir la trayectoria de cada uno tratando de conciliarla con el significado que ha adquirido en el proceso histórico resultó ser algo delicado y difícil de alcanzar. Pero creemos que este es el reto de hacer sociología, y una sociología de la religión que lleva en cuenta no sólo los agentes, sino también las relaciones objetivas que establecen entre sí.

Leisure as construction of distinction: A case of Ankara, Turkey

This presentation aims to discuss "leisure" as the construction of class distinction in contemporary Turkish society in Ankara, the capital city of Turkey. Firstly, theoretical frameworks and methodology of the study is described to examine the relations between leisure activities and the classes. Secondly, the Turkish middle class and its fractions are constructed analytically according to social, cultural and economic capitals. Thirdly, leisure activities are analyzed and matched with the middle class fractions. Finally, leisure is presented as way of the construction of class distinction among the Turkish middle class fractions.

There are two main general theoretical bases of this study: First one is Bourdieu's theory on social, cultural and economic capitals, habitus, class fractions and positions. Bourdieu's theory is supported with literature on the traditional and new middle classes. Second one is leisure theory. Addition to these, literature and the empirical researches on leisure and middle class are critically reviewed to scrutinize and understand the association between leisure and classes in Turkey.

This study depends on the field research of my PhD thesis, which sampled 421 household questionnaires in two districts, Çankaya and Keçiören, in Ankara, 10 unstructured interviews and observations. After quantitative data was collected, data from the field were coded and analyzed in SPSS.

For this conference, this presentation provides an important opportunity to share the findings from an empirical case study on leisure and class distinction from Turkey.

Interculturalidad, violencia y creación social

Las interpretaciones tradicionales de la violencia apuntan a considerar como factores de su producción, por un lado, las características socioeconómicas de los autores de la violencia y, por el otro, los valores y normas de quienes son los perpetradores de la violencia. De este último grupo puede desprenderse en todo caso dos subtipos de modelos de interpretación: los que atribuyen los actos violentos a una llamada cultura de la violencia, o los que consideran que el cambio en los valores y su pérdida generan violencia. En general, ambas interpretaciones tienden a considerar las condiciones de la violencia, pero no explican cómo emerge, lo que resulta en interpretar la violencia como un fenómeno secundario, un epifenómeno, y no un hecho social autónomo. Siguiendo el planteamiento de la sociología cultural se pretende desarrollar un modelo interpretativo de la violencia como expresión creativa de la acción humana y no solamente como efecto de una acción orientada racional y normativamente. Se pretende observar el papel de la interculturalidad como eje central que permite entender las lógicas de la violencia, pero de igual forma el papel que juega en la definición de escenarios de diálogo.

Surveillance and information: The north and south connection

The emergence of violence in Latin America during the last decade has caused the implementation of different surveillance technologies with the goal of reinforcing public security policies, in particular, the control of the population through the use of national identity cards. These technologies have been imported from the Global North, in particular, although not exclusively from the United States, which opens up the possibility that information is transmitted together from southern countries to the northern ones helping to guarantee a supposed hemispheric security. In this sense, two dynamics are analyzed. The first one is directed at establishing the criteria that are used to build a citizenship identity in Latin America, especially its effects in a contextual framework for the shortage of citizen's rights before the State. The second one has to do with legal regulations which guarantee the flow of information from identity cards from countries of the Latin American region toward countries that transfer the technology and the "know how" of surveillance. Understanding both dynamics allows us to realize in which way they are defining the logic of surveillance and democracy in Latin America.

Towards universal protection for older adults? The expansion of old age pensions in Latin America

In Latin America, old-age social protection systems have followed the social insurance model attaching rights to contribution history. In largely informal economies, this model resulted in a segmented system of welfare protection. Workers and families outside the formal labour market lacked protection for the risks of old age, unemployment and sickness, typically covered in social insurance system for formal workers. Over the 1990s, the privatization of pension schemes strengthened the contributory logic of existing systems but replaced social insurance for individual savings. By and large, it did not help expand social protection rights in the region. After over a decade of structural pension reforms the limitations of existing arrangements to include the majority of the population have become an issue of concern for policymakers and policy analysts alike. In recent years, through various institutional designs and contrasting political processes, a number of Latin American countries have initiated a pathway towards the extension of old-age pension benefits to the population who were left unprotected. In Bolivia, Argentina, Brazil and Chile, different reform models have expanded coverage to a significant number of elder adults who became subjects of public attention. Has this process headed towards the expansion of social citizenship rights for the people of Latin America? Are these new developments leading to unconditional basic income protection for the elderly in Latin America? Will these policy innovations modify the social insurance paradigm on which Latin American social protection has traditionally been based? By examining the institutional features guiding the distribution of rights, resources and risks embedded in these new policies of old age income protection, the paper evaluates the extent to which recent developments could lead to enhancing social citizenship rights for the elderly in Latin America, replacing the social insurance paradigm with a new paradigm more closely connected to basic universalism.

Health policies and the contradiction of health seeking behaviour in Nigeria

Neoliberal reforms in Nigeria's health sector emphasize the enhancement of health care provision that encourages public-private partnership with the aim of providing quality health services to the populace. However, the efforts of government to disaggregate health services for an expansive health care regime have paradoxically led to the exclusion of a significant cohort of the population, and the choice to use other forms of health services becomes more alluring than ever before with deleterious effects on the overall health status of citizens. This circumstance is not unconnected with the failed efforts of government to officially recognize other forms of health services and incorporating them into the insurance scheme and for the need to understand the health seeking behavior of citizens in a plural state such as Nigeria. The limited scope of Nigeria's health policy complicates the problem such that resolving the health dilemma is critical to ensure a universal health care coverage in the country.

Experience of the 3.11 disaster and mental health among adolescents in Fukushima, Japan

Disaster struck on March 11, 2011 when Japan was struck by a massive earthquake and tsunami, followed by a meltdown of nuclear reactors in Fukushima. Japanese people and society will struggle with this natural and technological disaster for the foreseeable future.

- According to a report by the National Police Agency on October 6, 15,828 were died and 3,754 were missing; 71,578 people are living in temporary houses; and about 113,000 people were forced to evacuate from special alert areas because of serious radioactive contamination. Furthermore, a substantial number of people fear for the effect of radioactive nuclides in food on health.
- Despite this severe disruption, the social order was maintained and suffers and victims alike experienced solidarity and reciprocity amid a chaotic aftermath. It is surprising that not only despair or fragile-ness but also hope or resilience emerged simultaneously among people who were affected by the disaster.

- In this presentation, we will show how high school students experienced the disaster and following recovery process and how their experiences affect their physical and mental health from both qualitative and quantitative research performed in a public high school located at distance of about 26 miles from the Fukushima Daiichi Nuclear Plant.
- We performed three-month follow-up study targeted on more than 900 students to clarify connection of typical victim patterns created by adding up four different disasters, that is, the 3.11 earthquake, aftershocks, tsunami, and radioactive contamination, with their health. We also examined changes in their health between May and July in 2011.
- Based on findings of a qualitative study using a self-writing questionnaire, we will perform a quantitative study to investigate relationship of their perception of the damage in their lives caused by the disaster and recovery from it to their health and hope.

Multiple selves and identity capital among Japanese university students

In this presentation I will examine the relationship between multiple selves and 'identity capital'. From Riesman in 1960s to Gubrium and Holstein today, multiplicity of self has been one of the most important topics in the field of self study. On the other hand, as the transition process became unstable, and life course became more liquid, individualized, and fragmented in advanced countries, the concept of 'identity capital' started to be seen as important, because it contains an ability to cope with rapidly changing social environment and to design their carrier and life plan. Identity capital is a concept which has been formed upon the heritage of identity theory of Erick Erikson. From Eriksonian perspective, multiple selves are seen as deficient identity, as he harshly criticized 'Protean self'. It seems to mean that multiplicity of self is incompatible with identity capital. So, research question here is

Is multiplicity of self functional or dysfunctional to identity capital?

To answer this question, I will use the dataset which was collected from university students all over Japan. Around 2830 respondents from 26 universities, which cover wide varieties in terms of location, national/private, and coeducational/women's college, answered the questionnaire. I construct two groups of scores from several questions. The first group contains scores related to multiplicity of self, and the second one related to identity capital. Then I examine the relationship between those two from several angles. As a result of analysis, answer to the question is affirmative. That is, at least among Japanese university students, the more multiple their self is, the more identity capital they are likely to have.

Collective action and contentious politics: The right to health in Brazil and Portugal

With the transformations of the Welfare State and the contemporary societies related to the enforcement of rights, there have been a shift on the structure, action dimensions and claiming strategies. In the case of the right to health, the comparative debate between Brazil and Portugal allows the research about the interface between State, Judiciary and society, as well as about the participation culture and solidarity nets that are constituted in the local space. Although the similar institutional design of health and Judiciary in these countries, the diversity of repertoires of collective action was the tonic of this research, that was developed in 2011. Its objective consisted in researching the strategies and contentious forms adopted in order to discuss the limits and possibilities of using the state and non-state mechanisms related to the right to health. For such, a qualitative and quantitative research was carried through, with the objective to comprehend comparatively the right to health challenges with focus in the access to justice and the repertoires of collective actions. The hypotheses were: a) there are differences in the itineraries of the health care: one emphasizes the state centrality in the care (Brazil), other emphasizes the individual responsibility for his proper health (Portugal); b) there are differences in the relation between society and Judiciary: one establishes politics of proximity with the citizen (Brazil), other establishes the de-judicialization politic (Portugal); c) there are differences in the health system construction: one had been constructed predominantly by international influence (Portugal), other had been constructed predominantly by social movements (Brazil). The results allow to argue that there is a social complexity on the election of a state or non-state strategy in health which is strongly related to the citizens' legal culture and to the economic and political opportunities structure of each country.

The new status of Russian science: The results of reforms for last 20 years in the scientific sphere

The paper is based on an annual sociological monitoring of science transformation in Russia, which has been carrying out by the Center for Sociology of Science and Science Studies of IHST of RAS.

This research helped to retrospectively analyze reforms in Russia's science over the period of 1991 to 2011. The reforming period of Russian science may be defined by stages as crisis (1991 to 1996), transformation (1996 to 2001), stagnation (2002 to 2005), a new phase of reforms (2006 to 2011).

The special attention is spared to the stage of new phase of reforms. Its measures to reform science are the most significant ones. Their implementation is supposed to crucially enhance the role of science in the Russian society and facilitate Russia's transition to a stage of stable economic development and helps Russian scientists to become members of international scientific community.

This research reported will also highlight science & technology policy in Russia, mechanisms of interaction of science, government, industry and society, transformation of science, changes in organization and administration of science, system of financing, scientist staff, disciplinary structure of science, science in centre and periphery, training of young scholars, professional and in-patrial mobility, international mobility, connection with scientific diasporas.

Las élites económicas y políticas en el Brasil contemporáneo

El 1980 y 1990, respectivamente, marcó una transformación de la conducta política y económica en América Latina y particularmente en Brasil. Estos cambios económicos en Brasil fueron impulsados por acciones que en décadas anteriores hacían parte de las ideas del milagro económico y del intento de modernizar la economía brasileña. En este contexto las ideas liberales ya existentes en los países desarrollados son el conductor, posteriormente en 1990 lo dicho neoliberalismo adentra con más fuerza las políticas de los países en desarrollo objetivando racionalización y modernización del Estado para llevar a cabo nuevas conductas. Este nuevo marco promueve una reconfiguración de la composición de las elites de Brasil y lo que se ha defendido como prevalente en la sociedad brasileña.

Un escenario interesante para el análisis del tema es el debate sobre la regulación del sistema financiero en Brasil desde 2003 - la creación de un espacio en que tradicionalmente se oponen puntos de vista sobre el comportamiento político y económico de Brasil que se enfrentan y se configuran tanto como divergentes, como similares.

Lo que hace este escenario relevante es la observancia de una clara diferencia de opinión entre el gobierno (Lula) y oposición (Fernando Henrique Cardoso) y la legitimidad que este último mantuvo en el desarrollo del debate que se produjo poco después de la propiedad del nuevo gobierno. Ahí se enfrenta la legitimidad electoral de Lula con la legitimidad cultural, económica y política de la oposición y hay también la conformación de las elites en favor de una u otra posición.

Este escenario adquiere mayor denotación por el método de Lula para aproximarse de los mercados financieros durante su administración y las consecuencias de tal posicionamiento. En este sentido, la comprensión de la sociedad brasileña a partir de la idea de dominación financiera es interesante.

1968 and the modernity's crisis: The Brazilian students movement as a new "social actor"

In "From Violence" Arendt (2009:18) points out that the common thread to the different student uprisings around the world was "contempt" for the traditional forms of participation and political practice - which for her meant the process of emptying political action, a situation common to Western society since the second quarter of the twentieth century. The critical feature of the student rebellions is that they were directed against the ruling bureaucracy: the youth revolt in Eastern Europe claimed the freedom of speech and thought as elementary condition for political action, while young people of the West, most of whom were living in freedom of expression and thought, revolted because such conditions were no longer able to open the channels for action, and the exercise of true freedom. From this perspective, both students who lived under socialist regimes in Eastern Europe, and those living in liberal democracies (and also those who had lost the democratic condition, such as Brazil and Mexico, for example) fought through direct action, without intermediaries, that is, participatory democracy. But it was a revolutionary movement? Arendt's theory points to the rising violence in the anti-establishment movements of 1968 and condemns the violent action as a political tool. But what is the explanation for violent social upheavals occur simultaneously around the world? Some lines of research on this question work essentially with the question of the role of the subject in modern society - the possibilities and limits of its action in the political arena. A "new" concept of the subject emerges in industrial societies considering political participation other than that defined by liberalism, dating back to the classic definitions of democratic constitution, putting into question the model of representative democracy

Condicionantes sociales y educativos de las metas de futuro profesional entre mujeres y varones estudiantes del último año de estudio de la secundaria

En Argentina, la obligatoriedad legal y la masificación del acceso a la educación secundaria parecen haber elevado las expectativas y demandas de educación superior. Entre los estudiantes de escuelas secundarias estatales de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, se halla extendida la idea de continuar estudiando. Esto se ve propiciado por la devaluación progresiva de las credenciales educativas en el mercado de trabajo y por la existencia de una variada oferta estatal de educación superior, de carácter gratuito e irrestricto de ingreso.

El análisis de los planes de futuro de los estudiantes que finalizan la escuela media da cuenta de los aspectos que resultan privilegiados por los jóvenes al pensar en rumbos posibles o deseables. Independientemente de que distintas condiciones vayan luego mediando entre las expectativas y las posibilidades de concreción -alentando o restringiendo los planes originales-, se trata de observar en tiempo presente cómo se estructuran las expectativas de los estudiantes.

Esta presentación refiere a los planes profesionales de los jóvenes que a fines de 2008 cursaban el último año de estudio en escuelas secundarias estatales de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. Se pone el foco en los objetivos estructurados en torno a itinerarios formativos pos-secundarios con vistas a algún desempeño laboral, despejando en su explicación la contribución relativa de distintos atributos de tipo contextual (relativos a la oferta jurisdiccional), institucional, social y biográfico. Por ejemplo, se analiza en qué medida las elecciones resultan explicadas por el sexo, el origen social, la escuela o la biografía escolar-laboral.

La fuente de datos utilizada es una encuesta a estudiantes relevada por el Ministerio de Educación del Gobierno de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, en una muestra estratificada de escuelas-modalidades-turnos de gestión estatal. Se aplica una técnica estadística de regresión logística multivariada, considerando en el análisis la complejidad del diseño muestral utilizado.

Transformation of curricula under the influence of the academic capitalism

The academic capitalism assumes commercialisation of educational processes:

1. Expansion of paid educational services and reduction of the state budget;
2. Active inclusion of professional corporations in educational process, namely, working out of educational programs and participation in their realisation;
3. Control from professional corporations and a labour market behind quality of vocational training.

In these conditions at individual level democracy becomes rather limited as granting of equal possibilities for all in reception of vocational training. At level of educational institutions, for example universities, democratic processes amplify, as the academic freedom increase.

Modern process of universities democratization depends on understanding of an ultimate goal of training. The model of the future expert depends on a set of competences which reflect requirements of a labor market. From what follows that curricula will be essentially changed: theoretical and common humanitarian disciplines will be pushed aside on older years, and the first course will be entirely devoted studying of methods of sociological research.

La niñez en la ruralidad, desde instituciones estatales y no estatales en Colombia

Las difíciles condiciones actuales por las que atraviesan las culturas rurales motivan a reflexionar desde este escenario las condiciones que han llevado a tal situación. El presente documento recoge la reflexión sobre algunas de las propuestas gubernamentales y no gubernamentales relevantes que han tenido que ver con la niñez en el contexto rural como un hecho socialmente construido, reconociendo desde aquí que las condiciones de la infancia develan el tipo de sociedad que tenemos. Se centra en el análisis de algunas respuestas desde sectores y/o campos como Educación, Salud, Familia, Seguridad Alimentaria, subsidios, y la Academia, para analizar desde allí cómo algunos programas y proyectos colocan al niño y a la niña como objeto - receptores pasivos no como sujetos de derechos, se evidencia además cómo la respuesta de las instituciones frente a la situación de la niñez que habita en la ruralidad se ha reducido a programas y proyectos de momento fragmentados que desde la perspectiva de sus derechos no concuerda con el principio de la indivisibilidad. Se reconocen también los logros de algunos de ellos que fueron exitosos, pero que por diversas circunstancias llevaron a su muerte prematura.

Los programas así vistos, aislados, difícilmente pueden reflejar una respuesta a una realidad social rural que permita fortalecimiento donde estén involucrados los actores sociales incluyendo por supuesto los niños y niñas, que tengan injerencia en las decisiones y acciones y políticas públicas. Plantea la necesidad de conocer las condiciones, lógicas socioculturales, realidades de la niñez en la ruralidad, aspectos que deben concluir a la acción que garantice sus derechos económicos, sociales, culturales, civiles y políticos, derechos que trasciendan la simple supervivencia. Las propuestas se siguen consolidando en una crónica y perversa dependencia al considerarle al niño como objeto de Compasión y no como sujeto de agenciamiento de derechos.

Socio-demographic factors and son preference in India: An overview

India is a country where women are worshiped as a deity. At the same time birth of the girl child is not welcomed by the family. Previously she was killed after her birth and several methods of such act were noted down by researchers in their studies. After advancement of medical technology new methods are adopted for female feticide and it is being done as son preference. This is not only leading towards the end of women in particular but it throws light on the violation of child right as a survival. As per the UN Population Fund in India up to 50 million girls are thought to be "missing" over the past century due to female infanticide and feticide.

The phenomena of female feticide may be a personal domain, but when it directly affects on the sex ratio of society, it has become a social domain and the great concern to the sociologists. The religious impact, son preference, family pressures contributes for female feticide. In addition, the medical practitioners, health polices are associated with this problem.

The present article is focused on the analysis of the socio-demographic factors responsible for son preference in India as well as its consequences. It is based on the secondary published and unpublished data.

Faith tourism and spiritual leisure in Turkey

This presentation will center on the notion of "social capital" as a mechanism to discuss the importance of faith tourism in Turkey. A number of historic settings are marketable and turned into leisure attractions. Turkey is the cradle for many civilizations and is at a crossroads for major religions. Turkey is a unique country, as it possesses rich historical and cultural resources where different civilizations lived in harmony in the region and left a wealth of heritage to present future generations. Having this rich heritage, Turkey can be presented as a source for social and cultural capital. Due to this historical legacy, the land may present peace and conciliation for the future. This presentation will review the characteristics of faith tourism in modern Turkey. How religion plays an important role for Christians, Jews or Muslims' leisure activities in Turkey will be examined. While having historical importance for Christians, Jew and Muslims, the country lacks in the promotion of its touristic attractions and celebrating their spiritual importance. Turkey should pay greater importance to the faith tourism and market its resources more effectively because there is a need for world peace and people are exploring unique ways to connect with one another through using spirituality.

Prevención del delito y construcciones teóricas: Tres momentos para su problematización

En el presente capítulo reconstruiremos tres momentos dentro del discurso criminológico en los que se configura lo que entendemos como una formación discursiva que tiene fuertes enraizamientos con las construcciones de sentido que se articularon en la emergencia de estrategias de prevención del delito en la Argentina de la última década. En este sentido nos planteamos la pregunta de cuáles son los sedimentos discursivos que resuenan en la interpelación de las "causas sociales" del delito y de las estrategias para conjurarlo en las políticas de prevención social desde los años '80. En este trabajo de reconstrucción de dichas elaboraciones conceptuales nuestro objetivo será crear una clave de inteligibilidad para los debates actuales en los que se inscriben las políticas de prevención social del delito. Como parte de una investigación mayor que tiene como objetivo analizar las formas en que es problematizada la relación entre condiciones de vida y prácticas delictivas en las políticas de prevención social del delito en Argentina durante la primera década del nuevo siglo, en nuestro trabajo fijaremos tres "mojones" sobre la diversidad del discurso criminológico: en primer lugar la sociología criminal de Enrico Ferri, en particular su teoría de los "equivalentes de las penas"; la problematización de la prevención del delito en la sociología de la "Escuela de Chicago", particularmente en el trabajo de Frederick Thrasher; y por último, la mirada sobre la "intervención multiagencial" contra el delito en los autores inscriptos en la criminología realista de izquierda, especialmente sobre Jock Young, Roger Matthews y John Lea.

The risk of neglecting uncertainty when using happiness rankings for public policy

Global happiness rankings have flourished during the past decade, getting increased attention in public policy debates throughout the world. Policymakers and academics are demanding new measures of societal well-being that go beyond income. International organizations such as the UN and OECD are supporting the development of multidimensional measures of well-being, including happiness indicators together with more traditional indicators such as GDP per capita. The media has been very receptive of the newly developed happiness indicators and published numerous colorful maps that illustrate national levels of happiness across the world. Unfortunately, these rankings and maps have been repeatedly misinterpreted in public policy debates, treating differences between countries as if they were estimated without uncertainty. Ignoring the uncertainty underlying happiness rankings inevitably leads us to exaggerate differences between countries. That is, countries ranked in different positions in a happiness ranking may be treated as if they were statistically different from each other when they are not. Therefore, we argue that happiness rankings—whether presented in maps, figures, or tables—should always account for uncertainty by including confidence intervals and a reference point to assess statistical differences across countries. Using the World Values Survey cross-national data on life satisfaction for 91 countries, we illustrate how to build happiness ranking that correctly account for uncertainty. We take Chile as a reference point to make comparisons, and repaint the world map of happiness by classifying countries as statistically happier, unhappier or not different from Chile. The results suggest that when looking for lessons to become a happier society, Chile should mainly look to its Latin American neighbors, rather than to many higher income countries around the world that rank above Chile in the happiness ranking. Overall, these results suggest a serious risk of neglecting uncertainty when using happiness ranking to inform public policy debates.

Lightning kidnapping: Violent interactions

"Sequestro relâmpago" (Portuguese for Lightning kidnapping) is a type of criminal violence that affects the Brazilian middle class since the mid-90s and is known by other Latin American countries as "secuestro exprés". This paper's main objective is to understand this contemporary type of violence by analyzing its dynamics. We developed an exploratory study with a qualitative method, in which we investigated the subjective experience of thirteen victims of lightning kidnapping through individual interviews.

We describe the event in four stages, in which the social interactions take place. The first stage is prior to the arrest (pre-approach); second, comes the phase in which the roles of victim and offender are initiated (capture); then begins the longer phase during which offenders expose their intentions and oblige the victims to agree on a cooperative-coercive contract (the compulsory ride); and finally the event ends (closure), with this being one of the most tense moments for the victim. Generally, the lightning kidnapping may be identified as what is named by scholars as kidnapping for robbery. It is an offense that requires a common means of action – the forced confinement and transportation of the victim – and can follow distinct and complementary scripts (ATM withdrawals, purchases, stealing of personal property, vehicle theft). It is characterized by reduced temporality, the "movable prison" and the dyadic relationship between offender and victim. A cooperative-coercive contract imposed by the offenders can be continuously negotiated, since victim and offender keep a prolonged and constant face-to-face interaction. Furthermore, the victims believe that police intervention may result on harmful outcomes.

Surviving a movable prison

This paper presents the experiences of thirteen people victimized by a crime called "sequestro relâmpago" in Brazil, somewhat similar to "sequestro exprés" in Venezuela. It is characterized as a type of kidnapping for robbery that has become part of Brazilian urban violence, also found in other countries in the Americas. The victims' post-event experiences, portrayed through their reports, point to significant physical-mental-social consequences to them and their families. The narratives show the existence of immediate repercussions to their lives – such as fear of retaliation, sleeplessness, immediate changes in routine, reality disconnection, remembrance and suffering renewal; and repercussions that last longer – such as damage to social life, an identity re-elaboration, widespread mistrust and hyper-vigilance. Fear becomes a persistent feeling expressed by these victimized persons, as part of their daily lives; everyone becomes a suspect, to the extent that a transformation occurs in the "way of looking at people."

La biographie sociologique: Le cas des "filhos de criação"

Issue d'une pratique commune jusqu'à la fin du XXe siècle, on trouve encore aujourd'hui à l'intérieur de quelques états brésiliens la catégorie "filho de criação"[1]: personne donnée, encore bébé ou très jeune par la famille biologique à une autre famille. Les familles qui accueillent ces enfants (rien n'est légalisé) les présentent comme leurs "enfants", en éliminant toute distinction par rapport aux enfants biologiques. Cependant, cet enfant est élevé dans le but d'assumer les tâches ménagères et le soin des parents adoptifs (jusqu'à leur mort), se privant d'école, de loisirs, de mariage, de travail formel ou de participer à tout autre contexte d'action que celui de la famille. Rien ne lui est explicitement imposé par la famille d'accueil ni perçu comme injuste par les filhos de criação qui, au contraire, affirment se sentir comme "des enfants de sang", comme "s'ils étaient de la famille" malgré le traitement inégal. Dans les villes de la "Zona da Mata" de l'état de Minas Gerais, Brésil, où l'ethnographie a été développée, la catégorie sociale "filho de criação" est considérée positivement comme une personne "bonne", "spéciale", "toujours prête à aider". A leur tour, les filhos de criação interviewés (la plupart des femmes âgées de 20 et 82 ans, noires et issues de la classe populaire) construisent leur identité selon le discours social et jouissent de la distinction évidente de ce status bienfaisant. A travers les biographies, cet article analyse les schémas domestiques et sociaux qui aboutissent au fort sentiment d'appartenance familiale et à la subordination involontaire des filhos de criação.

[1] Nous avons décidé de ne pas traduire la catégorie native "filho de criação" parce que ce terme n'a pas d'équivalent en français étant donné l'abîme culturel qui sépare les deux réalités. Une approximation en français serait "enfant accueilli", fils ou fille.

Settings for "cultural justice" on sheltering cases: The fostered children role in Brazilian rural areas

This is to set on an analysis of the moral and habitual methods by means of which people from the interior of a Brazilian state recognise the "fostered children" and establish imagery of principles and rules of a code that outlines identity and the social & familial relationship behavior. "Fostered children" categorises those who were given away when babies or in early years by their biological family to another family, which shelters them (not documented) and presents them to society as part of the offspring, suppressing any difference from the biological children. However, only the fostered child is raised to execute the household chores and parents care (till their death), giving up school, leisure, marriage, formal work or any action in a context beyond family. Nothing is explicitly imposed by the sheltering family nor seen as unfair by the fostered child and the latter even states to feel as a "blood brother", "one of the offspring". In rural society, where the research was conducted, the "fostered children" category is positively marked as "good", "special", "always willing to help" and one who must take the traditional "mission" of "caring for parents until death". Despite of the suffering from imprisonment/submission, in underlying evidence, interviewed fostered children (3 men and 5 women, all black, ranging from 20 to 93 years of age and come from popular layer) understand their serfdom as a matter of honour, necessary to achieve social recognition and acceptance, so much that they do not even consider the rejection of that mission. Quite the opposite, they reflexively build on their identities by tuning them up to a social-cultural model, benefitting of an obvious distinction of their kind status.

The reconstruction of Latino ethnic identity in northern countries: USA and Sweden

The importance of the topic is well established in the research community and in public opinion, due to the political implications of ethnicity, ethnic identity and identity policies in the contemporary social agenda. We readily observe the growth of ethnic intolerance, xenophobia, cleansing, ethnocide, discrimination and violence and walls built in border areas to stop unwanted immigration in the name of "national security." In this new century, we witness racist murder with impunity, criminalization and deportation of Roma people, along other manifestations of ethnic intolerance and the growth of extreme rightist groups, that exert political influence much beyond their numbers in the European political agenda. A socio-political development reminiscent of older forms of white populism and racism, today exemplified by the Tea Party in the US and the so-called "Swedish Democrats" in Sweden, with a primary focus on "illegal aliens" being blamed as the main cause of criminality, street violence and public insecurity. Harsher measures are taken against national minorities, immigrants and political refugees with darker phenotype and/or Islamic religious/cultural affiliation. Social policies and institutional practices once again are defined in terms of the "color" and ethnic lines. These conditions structurally permeate and stratify social opportunities and quality of life for ethnic minority group members along cleavages of social inequality and exclusion (apartheid-like): different and unequal. US and Swedish societies are selected as the national contexts for the present study of Latino identity, that historically reproduce unequal patterns of differential access and exposure to structural conditions of material and subjective discrimination. "Anglos", "Swedes" and "Latinos" are the significant segments of the population in this study. Significantly, American and Swedish Latinos identify and report repeated experiences/perceptions of ethnic discrimination as a main factor explaining their own ethnic identity process.

Estos testimonios han sido producidos en el formato de entrevistas audiovisuales realizadas en el Archivo Oral de Memoria Abierta. En este marco los testimonios adoptan el formato de entrevistas narrativas cuya característica central es la de proponerse como mediopara la rememoración y reflexión subjetivas.

El carácter particular de estas producciones es una oportunidad para revisar algunos supuestos del estatuto del testimonio en las ciencias sociales (particularmente la sociología) y en el debate cultural y político sobre el pasado reciente en Argentina, así como discutir los paradigmas de la relación entre narración y experiencia. Para ello recurro a los aportes de las teorías feministas al estudio de las subjetividades (centralmente Judith Butler, Adriana Cavarero y Joan W. Scott) así como a la perspectiva de Hannah Arendt en torno al relato, la memoria y la historia.

Vida cotidiana y riesgo en sectores populares. Misiones, Argentina

Nos proponemos analizar desde la perspectiva de la percepción del riesgo las prácticas cotidianas que comprometen el bienestar y la salud en dos conjuntos sociales residentes en áreas periurbanas y rurales de Misiones, Argentina: mujeres tabacaleras de la zona del Alto Uruguay y empleadas domésticas de barrios de la zona suroeste de Posadas. La población sobre la que nos proponemos trabajar se conforma con base en investigaciones realizadas entre los años 2007 y 2011, en contextos de frontera y en relaciones de precariedad.

Entendemos que cada institución social plantea las eventualidades y las incertidumbres que acepta enfrentar así como percibe los peligros que la amenazan; y al hacerlos públicos, los reconoce y designa los actores significativos en cada ámbito de la vida cotidiana (Douglas 1973, 1985; Calvez 1998). Asumimos que la percepción del riesgo y, por consiguiente, su aceptabilidad, depende de los saberes disponibles sobre los procesos o fenómenos que potencian o producen riesgos y/o daños, y que a la vez significan y generan prácticas preventivas, en la estructura social.

Adoptamos una estrategia cualitativa, en proceso, que nos permita seleccionar casos, comparar las prácticas y representaciones en distintos contextos; y reflexionar sobre los problemas y las relaciones que la estructura social genera. (Menéndez 1994, 2002; Breihl 2003; Fassín 1999). Nos proponemos superar las limitaciones de los métodos de análisis causalistas de la epidemiología tradicional, que identifican el riesgo centrado en probabilidades y la prevención, en elecciones "racionales", privilegiando la perspectiva socio-cultural como el complemento necesario de las políticas públicas en salud.

La reactivación de la acción colectiva en Chile: Una mirada desde la sociología analítica

Dado el reciente y espontáneo aumento de la actividad colectiva opo- sitoria al modelo neoliberal imperante en Chile, creemos necesario proponer una ponencia en donde se expongan: las causas de dicho actual incremento, los contenidos de las demandas de promoción de estos movimientos (que -según nosotros- se relacionan con un modelo económico post liberal), como algunas consecuencias de dichas movilizaciones para el presente y el futuro de la convivencia democrática en el país. Esto, bajo los supuestos de que: (1) el actual modelo institucional chileno responde a un modelo de acumulación capitalista instaurado ilegalmente tras la violenta disolución de los lazos de cooperación y coordinación logrados por el mundo popular entre comienzos del S.XX y comienzos de los 70; y (2) que éste -mediante la modificación de estructura de incentivos- desincentivó la acción colectiva de las clases medias y bajas como ejercicio efectivo para la consecución de resultados socialmente relevantes para sí, generando como resultado enormes procesos de transferencia de riqueza desde abajo hacia arriba en la estructura social desde hace 30 años (redistribución de renta hacia arriba). Mientras la apuesta teórica es la necesidad de un análisis mixto entre las variables clase y generación como ejes de análisis relevantes, la perspectiva teórica a utilizar son los fundamentos propios de la sociología analítica (mecanismos de psicología política y micro fundamentos de la acción propios del individualismo metodológico) y sus vínculos con el análisis normativo del marxismo analítico, instrumentos de alto rendimiento informativo para explicar la acción colectiva y el diseño institucional.

Migrantes limítrofes en comodoro rivadavia. Etnia, clase y nación

La ciudad de Comodoro Rivadavia (Chubut, Argentina) se encuentra atravesando un proceso de profundización de sus rasgos de segmentación y fragmentación social. Dicho fenómeno se encuentra asociado en parte a su "matriz fundacional" ligada al crecimiento urbano que se desarrolló paralelo a la producción petrolera y por otra parte, por la ausencia de políticas sociales atentas al crecimiento poblacional vinculada con la expansión del mercado de trabajo regional. Los grupos sociales que mayores desventajas poseen para insertarse en una ciudad donde el proceso de legitimación de las desigualdades -en parte- se organiza a partir de las ventajas que brinda la antigüedad de residencia, son los grupos de migrantes limítrofes, en particular bolivianos y paraguayos. A pesar de llevar adelante prácticas sociales de "invisibilización" los migrantes bolivianos y paraguayos adquieren rasgos de visibilidad a partir de un complejo proceso de etnicización en clave nacional que los ubica en situaciones de discriminación y abierta xenofobia. Ante dichos escenarios los agentes estatales responden con acciones de control que reproducen las representaciones de estigmatización y victimización.

Se considerarán como unidades de estudio aquellos espacios donde los migrantes limítrofes desarrollan actividades cotidianas o que no forman parte de su rutina, de este modo podremos ingresar en el análisis de las prácticas sociales que componen el "mundo de la vida" de los informantes. Se utilizará la observación participante por brindar la posibilidad de obtener información tanto discursiva como simbólica, mediante la participación en actividades diversas.

The language of nationalism in postwar reconstruction: Sierra Leone, Liberia and Cote d'Ivoire

West Africa has seen major civil wars and significant international efforts to rebuild war-torn countries. This has been the experiences of Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Cote d'Ivoire for most of the past two decades. Amidst the tragic stories of humanitarian disasters, there are critical debates about the state and the issues of political, economic and social justice, which led to the wars. The peace agreements that ended the wars and the subsequent postwar reconstruction plans address many of the political, economic and social problems that undermined the state. The extant literature on West Africa typically focuses on the causes of wars, the political, economic and security stabilizations, and the postwar institutional mechanisms, such as elections, humanitarian assistance, resettlement of displaced persons, war crimes trials and reconciliation. However, the underlying philosophical visions of the states and social justices have largely been missing from the literature.

This paper seeks to examine the underlying philosophical assumptions of the state and social justice as manifested in the peace processes and postwar reconstruction efforts of Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Cote d'Ivoire. These philosophical assumptions are firmly embodied in the language of development, peace, democracy and equality, which are often invoked in the peace agreements and key postwar reconstruction plans. This language not only speaks to the broader issues of political, economic and social justice that led to the civil wars, but it is also rooted in nationalist sentiments of patriotism, progress and freedom from aid-dependency.

The paper will address the nature and implications of this language of nationalism and social justice. Methodologically, the paper will be a content and hermeneutic analysis of the key national documents on the peace processes and the postwar reconstruction efforts (e.g. peace agreements, World Bank approved development plans, and reports of the Truth and Reconciliation Commissions).

The Australian union movement and paid parental leave: Strategic coalitions and campaigns

The Australian government announced a new paid parental leave policy on Mother's Day 2009. The day was significant not only because of its maternal symbolism, but also because the onset of the global financial crisis had raised concern about the feasibility of such a scheme. The Australian scheme is funded by the federal government and provides 18 weeks pay at the minimum wage (currently $589.40 per week). The stated objectives of the scheme are threefold and address health, economic and gender issues. They are: to improve maternal and child wellbeing; to increase workforce participation by women; and to improve gender relations at home and at work.

In this paper we focus on the role of the labour movement in the campaign to achieve paid parental leave; a campaign that built on and complemented earlier campaigns to win job protected unpaid maternity leave and improved work-family flexibilities for union members. Utilising a broad range of documentary evidence and interviews with key advocates, we show that although there were points of difference within the union movement about aspects of the paid parental leave scheme, the relative success of the campaign can be attributed to some important factors, including the strategic building of a coalition of interest between labour and women's advocacy groups, feminist academics, some key employers and the Australian Human Rights Commission.

We argue that when a historical perspective is added to the contemporary analysis, the campaign for paid parental leave demonstrates the union movement's recognition of the changing gender profile of the paid workforce and of union membership. Moreover, and very significantly given declining unionisation levels in Australia, the campaign reflects recognition by the union movement of the need to strategically campaign for changes in public policy in addition to collectively bargaining for better working conditions.

This geography belongs to us... what I am, is...who calls for? : Belonging and national identity in Southeast Turkey

This paper will try to challenge the claim of national belonging as revealed by the official discourse of Turkish national identity, through an exploration of narratives of belonging among the Kurdish, Arab, Assyrian populations of Turkey inhabiting three south-eastern cities of Turkey, namely Diyarbakır, Mardin and Urfa. Identical for these groups are their autochthony and long standing cohabitation on a geography perceived by each as being of theirs. Depending on a qualitative fieldwork in these bordering cities, which is conducted between February-October 2011, this paper will base its argument on an analytical framework which conceptualizes belonging as multilevel, multidimensional, historical social fact articulated vis-à-vis the power relations.

For some decades now, we are familiar with the debates on the erosion of the national borders and shrinking importance of the nation-state as the ultimate ground of political communities, with vital consequences on belonging and national identity. The established understanding of Turkish national identity is, also, challenged in the de-national order of things, due to various factors, one being the ongoing war between Kurdish 'illegal' military organization and Turkish state military power. And war, more than often, imbues identities with black and white! What I will do, regarding such a socio-political space of contestation, is to confront the assumptions of uniqueness, homogeneity and fixity of the Kurdish, Arab, Assyrian "Identity" vis-à-vis a uniform "Turkishness"; and, instead, point at of identifications and belongings of the "members" of these groups in the face of alternating discursive forms and historical operations of Turkish national identity and state. Consequently, I will reveal how these differentiating positions provide for perceptions and experiences of continuities and discontinuities of geography, ambiguity of boundaries between "us" and "others", inside and outside.

Civic participation to make local governments child friendly : A case study from Kerala

Local governments in Kerala are entrusted with a greater part of the responsibility of development of children of 0-18 age group. They are shouldered with the responsibility to carryout programmes related to maternal and child health, ICDS, education and disability. These powers empower LSGs to develop a Comprehensive Child Health initiative in State. The mainstreaming of child development programmes, need to be meaningfully integrated in all development sectors like Agriculture, Education, Health, Social Security, Child Development, Women Component Plan, Public Works, Sanitation, Drinking Water and SC development and ST development. Local governments have appropriate environment for devising child development programmes and now giving more thrust to matters like upgrading the quality of services provided through Anganwadi network emphasizing health, nutrition, pre-primary education and infrastructural up gradation. Local Self Governments in Kerala have the constitutional mandate to implement programmes for local economic development and social justice. Thus they can effectively interfere in various fields of human development areas and can achieve desired results. This enables Local Governments in Kerala to come up with local- specific solutions. As a result, the issues relating to child development could be addressed effectively in the present Kerala context. Redefining the existing practice to evolve a comprehensive child development plan serious efforts has been undertaken by the local bodies to develop status report, identify problems, identify gaps and make appropriate intervention plans. The criteria followed by the local governments to declare as child friendly local body will be analyzed in detail.

Right to health and sanitary democracy: Bridges to citizenship

Rights are the democratic centerpieces of contemporary society, which major challenge is the strengthening of participative social forums as spaces that shape the contents of such rights. This is the subject of research project "Right to Health and Sanitary Democracy: Bridges to citizenship", advanced by the Center for Study and Research on Health Law at Universidade de São Paulo (Brazil). We note the associated development of new institutions involved in policy-making alongside a process leading to an essential role of judges in the recent changes in our democracy. Also in this direction, the expansion of public policies managing experiences by the local councils (Law n. 8142/90), in consonance with the social participation established by the Constitution. Our main objective is identifying the recent status of institutional and/or legal recognition of health as a right, as well as qualifying the social participation mechanisms used by the Judiciary for realizing of the social right to health. We also aim to examine the way deliberations in participative social forums are regarded in legal decisions and how those decisions can interfere in guaranteeing the right to health. In this study, we examine the understandings by judges from the Regional Federal Court from the 3rd region, paying special attention to the reasoning behind the decision they made, incorporating the advice from R. Posner, the way "how judges think". We applied questionnaires to collect information about each judge and their modes of organization, enabled the conception of "ideal types". Judges responded to hypothetical study cases related to the right of health, drawn in a way to allow the observance the reasoning behind them, noting also the foundations of the judges' answers, which provides us with a panorama of how legal decisions can be helpful in the implementation of public policy.

Traditional public performances and their link to ethnicity and citizenship. A comparison between Italy and Australia

In this paper we analyse political negotiations about the participation or exclusion of migrants to a traditional historical procession - the 'Corteggio storico' - held in the Italian city of Prato (Tuscany-Italy). In last years Prato has witnessed massive immigration, especially from Chinese community. Traditional rites and ethnicity are closely linked and we take the ethnographic case of the Corteggio storico as an emblematic example of the Italian understanding of ethnicity, which doesn't include the notion of mixity. Understandings of ethnicity can vary significantly among different countries: national citizenship laws provide a window onto the tangle terrain of identity and ethnic politics and national histories. We compare citizenship law in Italy and Australia and discuss its practical implications in community life and public initiatives. Nation-states emerging from settler colonies like Australia tend to confer citizenship by ius soli. With its history of 'populate or perish', Australian governments offered incentives to preferred migrants to settle permanently. Australia has a multicultural rhetorics and practices and a culturalist and relatively celebratory approach to concepts of the second generation and ethnicity. Australia's approach to citizenship and ethnicity contrasts sharply with nation-states like Italy, which typically have not had long experience with immigration. Citizenship in Italy is defined by ius sanguinis and is conferred only when a person can prove ten years residence and demonstrate a medium-high income. In contrast to Australia, Italy is home to significant numbers of 'illegal' immigrants with no rights even to apply for citizenship. In addition, the concept of the second generation is highly contested and disputed and the concept of ethnicity is generally frowned upon as essentialist and regressive. In this paper we explore these contrasting theoretical conceptualisations of citizenship, ethnicity and we link this to the performance of an historical procession.

La "plaza del sí": Medios y reformas estructurales en los años 90 en Argentina

Gran parte de la literatura sociológica que se ha ocupado de las transformaciones estructurales suscitadas durante los años 90 en Argentina, coincide en señalar que si bien éstas se expresaron principalmente en el plano macroeconómico su concreción fue posible gracias a un cambio de paradigma político. Entre mediados de los años 80 y durante la década de 1990 una serie de actores diversos coadyuvaron, a través de sus intervenciones en el espacio público, a universalizar y legitimar las demandas de reforma estatal y económica de corte neoliberal. Este proceso supuso, a grandes líneas, la elaboración de un diagnóstico sobre los obstáculos del pasado que el país debía superar y la propuesta de una nueva orientación política a seguir.

Así, diferentes estudios se han ocupado minuciosamente del papel que jugaron empresarios, dirigentes políticos, economistas e intelectuales en este proceso de legitimación política de las reformas estructurales (Beltrán 2005 y 2006, Camou 2006, Heredia 2006). No obstante, menor atención han recibido los actores de los medios de comunicación que ayudaron a darle voz pública a las demandas de reforma y, por tanto, a instalar esta problemática en la agenda pública. Buscando contribuir al conocimiento de esta dimensión poco atendida, la presente ponencia tiene por objetivo analizar la participación del periodista Bernardo Neustadt y de importantes empresarios de medios en la convocatoria, en 1990, a la manifestación de apoyo a las políticas emprendidas por el entonces presidente Carlos Menem, realizada en Plaza de Mayo y que sería conocida luego como "La Plaza del Sí". El análisis de esta convocatoria, que de hecho fue la única de apoyo a Menem durante su gestión, nos permitirá así realizar algunos aportes sobre el papel de los medios en la construcción de consenso para la implementación de reformas económicas.

Families under the sun: Implications of a conditional cash transfer in Montes de María, Colombia

This paper explores the implications of a Conditional Cash Transfer policy in a Colombian region –Montes de María- that has suffered massive violence and forced displacement. On the one hand, it addresses some of the adaptations national policy makers have made to the CCT model, particularly with regards to the network of leader-mothers, meetings of care and municipal assemblies. On the other hand, it explores how these adaptations have evolved locally in Montes de María, in a context of contested legitimacy and intense government intervention seeking to secure the territory, improve governance and respond to the situation of recurrent human rights abuses.

The humanitarian catastrophe in Montes de María has made it the focus of different types of regional, national and international interventions. Stemming from different expertises and orientations, they often clash and produce unexpected results. What practices are being consolidated and what opportunities are opened with this CCT in this context?

Based on fieldwork research and ongoing conversations in the region with program functionaries, beneficiaries and leaders of social movements, supporters and detractors, this research focuses on the controversies surrounding the Colombian version of CCTs, Familias en Acción. Do conditional subsidies undermine a rights-based approach to citizenship? In the context of the quest to rebuild their lives, what do social movements in the area -heirs of a strong collective mobilization tradition- think about the subsidies given to each family individually? What is the impact of this CCT inside the household, and with regards to female participation outside of it? What is the role of CCTs in a context of high rates of unemployment that are fruit not only of the conflict but of a change in the model of rural development in Montes de María - from peasant economies to large export-oriented agribusinesses?

Gender perception of crime and its reduction amongst white South Africans in the province of KwaZulu-Natal Perceptions of crime is constructed on the basis of an individuals personal estimation of the nature and incidence of crime in their environment; the perceived risk of becoming a victim of crime and on the basis of perceptions of significant others around them. The likelihood of a person becoming a victim of crime is strongly influenced by, among other things, gender, age, income, place of residence and race. Although the latest crime statistics in South Africa reveal that levels for certain categories of crime have decreased, rising levels of insecurity have become a key concern in society, posing a threat not only to social order and the economic well being of the country, but also to the quality of life for people. Public perceptions about the risk of criminal victimization and the fear of crime are influential in shaping policy and the priorities of state expenditure on law and order initiatives. If public concern about crime is driven by an exaggerated assessment of the risks of victimization then strategies need to be put in place to address the situation.

This paper explores gender perceptions of crime and its amelioration obtained from interview surveys conducted with the White populace in three different localities within the Province of Kwa-Zulu Natal at the scale of a city, town and a rural location. It highlights varied responses for the different gender groups based on their personal experiences which shape perceptions on strategies needed to address the overwhelming incidence of crime in the province.

Carmen miranda between the desires of two nations

This exhibition aims at exploring Carmen Miranda's characters in cinema, connected to national projects in two moments of her career: the Brazilian moment, featuring the Baiana, and the international moment, with her Hollywood Latin-American characters. I propose demonstrating how her characters reassign a colonial desire representing a national (Brazilian) identity or a regional (Latin-American) identity. This presentation makes use of film analysis paired with social-historical analysis, using bibliographic and documental research, linking her representations with power relationships and political interests in both national and international contexts. A contrastive approach is used in both contexts, exploring Miranda's life and her constitutive shifts. The focus is on the cultural and political character of the national and regional identities alongside with their tensions and ambiguities. In a Post-Colonial approach, I intent to examine the intersection of the following categories: race, gender and sexuality in the representations of nation and region.

After the Brazilian movie Banana da Terra (1939), Carmen Miranda incorporated the character of Baiana in her performances, one of the crucial figures of national narratives that combine sensuality, blackness and femininity. This character is an actualization of the "mulata" figure (a racially hybrid woman), whom, in the Brazilian imaginary would associate herself with a white man to create a "whiter" nation. In a specific form of manipulating racial tensions and miscegenation, Carmen Miranda represented the possibility of valorizing a national identity that was characterized in that period as a "racial democracy" and, concomitantly, made-up by the nation's wishes of a white future, as of the Baiana's whiteness interpretation. When Carmen Miranda moved to the USA, she became the stereotype of a Latin-American woman. Nicknamed "Brazilian Bombshell" and representing several Latin-Americans characters in cinema, Carmen Miranda means in the USA the actualization of colonial desire: a feminine, racialized and sexualized representation of Latin-America.

El trabajo "a façon" y los ritmos de la vida asociativa en una empresa recuperada del conurbano Bonaerense

Con una perspectiva que considera las sedimentaciones y transformaciones históricas como base y contexto de la propia experiencia social y cultural de los trabajadores que recuperaron empresas, proponemos describir el modo en que una cooperativa del Gran Buenos Aires desarrolló, por varios años, un proceso de trabajo "a façon" de calzados deportivos.

El trabajo "a façon" es aquel en que una persona o empresa recibe materiales que transforma con su propio trabajo, conocimiento y herramientas. Por el producto final de este proceso, que es entregado a quienes proporcionaron los materiales, la persona o empresa recibe una retribución económica. Los que suministraron los materiales (llamados "fasoneros") generalmente se encargan de la comercialización y distribución del producto final.

Sea entendido como forma de tercerización o como modo de tener trabajo, este vínculo genera un tipo de relación específica entre los trabajadores autogestionados y el o los "fasoneros" ("socios capitalistas" que les ofrecen trabajo, materias primas, capital). En esta presentación, planteamos realizar una descripción etnográfica de esa relación. Los hechos, y las narrativas de los trabajadores, serán analizados a la luz de su cultura y experiencia laboral, haciendo foco en cómo la vida asociativa de la recuperada bajo estudio se vio transformada a partir de ese vínculo.

"I love my American job" Professional prestige and the western halo in the developing country context

The impact of Western influences in shaping global attitudes and preferences has been studied in a range of contexts. Pertinently, in the labor market context, researchers (Nadeem: 2009) have shown that cultural processes and identities of people and institutions alike are continuously shaped and resisted by globalized influences – especially when Western jobs are "shipped" out for organizational and economic efficiency.

For the most part, however, research on the global offshoring of jobs has been portrayed as a transformation of low-wage, low-prestige jobs to what are considered high wage, high-prestige jobs in the outsourced country (Friedman: 2005). This simplistic transformation story is problematic for a variety of reasons, prime of which is the fact that it fails to incorporate efficiently the effect of globalization in reshaping traditional markers of prestige.

This paper uses field data from the Indian legal outsourcing industry to show the ways in which association to the West has emerged as a marker of prestige and how, while important, traditional understandings of prestige markers (e.g. Abbott: 1981) are not enough to explain this transformative function. Universality of professional prestige has traditionally not taken into consideration the effect of globalization as a prestige factor in and off itself. I offer here that in addition to the markers used (for e.g., level of skill, monetary rewards, etc), and especially while trying to understand the emerging-industrialized world, an approach more reflective of the "halo" effect of the West is crucial.

Gender and the advantage of new institutional frameworks: The legal profession in India

Gender scholars have offered distinct accounts at different levels of analysis (individual, interactional and institutional) to explain how gender based inequality at the workplace is created and reinforced. Most inclusive of these accounts have been those that integrate all three levels of analysis and urge us to think of gender as "structure" (Risman: 1998) or a "frame" (Ridgeway: 2011). These explanations are compelling because they illustrate the persistent nature of accepted gender hierarchies and the challenge of overcoming these set societal beliefs and expectations.

While much of this research about the structure and creation of gender based distinctions in the workplace is both relevant and important, I only use it as a background for pursuing my more limited research question which concerns new institutional sites where gender stereotypes are not set and where gendered expectations have not yet been formed. What happens in such "sites of innovation" (Ridgeway: 2011)? Is the diffuse background characteristic of gender always salient? Or is there some leeway in negotiating new gender expectations in new institutions that do not have a precedent for gender-based inequality? When the work being done is not determinately sex-typed, can women take advantage of the ambiguous culture?

Over the last two decades, India has responded to its call as an aggressively emerging economy by creating a new set of "global" law firms that attract and offer seemingly gender neutral advantages for its associates. Preliminary interviews with female lawyers in these firms suggest that women are not disadvantaged in these firms in the same ways that traditional accounts of the legal profession suggest. My research attempts to navigate this new territory innovation and inequality in the legal profession.

Tradition and innovation in diasporic Turkish Alevi identity

Since the 1980s, Alevi communities in Turkey and across the diaspora have been engaged in an intense project of identity revival and a transnational quest for recognition. A number of its features make it a particularly interesting case of the rise of the salience of identity in social, cultural and political life in the contemporary era. The revival has involved a reconstruction of collective identity which itself traversed the shift from 'ideological' to identity politics characteristic of the latter part of the 20th century, its political context has been very influential, and it has faced challenges arising from its historical roots in an oral tradition largely practiced in secrecy. These very characteristics have led a number of commentators to invoke the idea of the 'invention of tradition' to describe the processes involved. In this paper, I argue that overemphasis on this notion obscures important aspects of the revival, and suggest that the 'multiple modernities' approach associated with S N Eisenstadt and Johann Arnason offers a more comprehensive and insightful framework for its analysis. More generally, I argue that the paradigm of multiple modernities provides important insights about the relationship between tradition and modernity that are relevant to the analysis of collective identities more broadly.

Profesiones y estado de bienestar: Lecciones para América Latina

Los problemas que orientan el análisis en el presente trabajo se sintetizan en las siguientes preguntas ¿Estarán los partidos políticos en América Latina listos para incluir en sus agendas las legítimas demandas de los movimientos sociales que urgen la atención a las necesidades más elementales, como una buena educación, seguridad social, empleo, etc.? ¿Estarán listos los gobiernos latinoamericanos para institucionalizar los programas sociales más allá del "asistencialismo" como política social predominante? ¿Es necesario en América Latina profesionalizar a la política social, lo que significaría también formar profesionales para el Estado de Bienestar y con ello garantizar el acceso a sus beneficios de manera universal?

El trabajo se estructura a partir de tres ideas principales: 1) la relación de los profesionales con los ciudadanos en el contexto de la sociedad de bienestar, 2) la necesidad de impulsar los estudios sobre los profesionales en América Latina, para dar cuenta de su papel estratégico en el sostenimiento y articulación de las políticas sociales, y 3) a partir de un balance sucinto de la experiencia europea de los Estados de bienestar, se identifican aquellos aspectos clave que pudieran ser útiles en el rediseño y mejoramiento de políticas públicas y en particular sobre el funcionamiento de las instituciones principalmente sociales en América Latina.

La representación de la globalización y el multiculturalismo en los libros de texto de historia mexicanos

Este trabajo busca analizar cómo se ha buscado democratizar el currículo escolar de historia de México con la inclusión de la multiculturalidad y la globalización en los programas educativos en las últimas décadas. Por consiguiente, se estudiará cómo se ha mantenido el difícil pulso entre la inclusión de estos procesos globales en los planes de estudio y el mantenimiento del discurso nacional del México "único" (en lo que se refiere a su excepcionalidad y a su unidad identitaria).

El sustento teórico del que se parte es la teoría de la reproducción de Bourdieu y del estudio de los dispositivos de Foucault. Para realizar este trabajo, se empleará como sustento empírico el análisis del discurso de las entrevistas a actores implicados en estos cambios curriculares, de los planes y programas de estudio de la asignatura de historia de México de educación secundaria, así como de una muestra de los 68 libros de texto autorizados por la Secretaría de Educación Pública para dicha materia desde 1993 hasta 2010.

Con el uso de estos manuales y entrevistas se pretende aportar un rico panorama de cómo los actores implicados en la producción del currículo escolar y de los propios libros de texto se debaten entre la inclusión de la globalización y el multiculturalismo en las aulas, al tiempo que intentan mantener la función tradicional de la escuela, en general, y de la enseñanza de la historia, en particular: producir una identidad homogénea y nacional. Al ser la educación secundaria la fase final de la educación obligatoria, este medio es la última oportunidad de las autoridades educativas y académicas para reproducir e imponer a todos los escolares su visión de este México dividido entre su pasado y su futuro.

Transportation in the city with a taxi is one of these spheres and highly visible in Istanbul. It has some particular features in the market. Informal economy is constructed or regulated socially with survival strategic behaviors, social network and interest as formal economy is. In this paper firstly we try to understand which dynamics of economy –such as economic crises, poverty, social relationships, and internal migration or just interests- affect the emergence of actors' informal transportation which is called "pirate" taxi drivers. Secondly we emphasize how the pirate drivers survive in this an unsafe and a secret sphere. Moving from with these two points, the resources –financial capital, physical capital, social capital and skills- to access the informal market of taxi used by drivers will be illustrated.

We used first the participant observer techniques to obtain an extensive fieldnotes and some questions were directed to the actors in the natural flow of daily life as a costumer. These observations lasted between February and December 2010. The actors are both formal and informal taxi drivers. Later on five informal and five formal cabstands were selected for depth interviews with 20 drivers from different part of Istanbul. In these interviews using the semi-structured question form, open-ended questions were directed to the drivers to illuminate their economic and social life. The pirate taxi drivers participate to the informal spheres both rational and survival reasons. At the same time their social networks play an essential role to participate in this sphere.

Decent work as a measure of social progress: Discussion about indicators model for performance analysis of government policies

Over the last decade, the International Labour Organization (ILO) has promoted initiatives to stimulate worldwide commitments to the "Decent Work Agenda", based on respect for the statements expressed in the Declaration of Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. Several governments in South America, especially Brazil, have developed national programs that agree the Decent Work Agenda as a means to economic and social development. Having this context in view, this paper aims to analyze how an index developed to measure decent work can also measure changes in quality of life, social progress and national development. Brazil is taken as a reference point in order to measure the variables, using the RAIS / CAGED data bases, maintained by Brazilian Ministry of Labor and Employment (MTE), and the census of IBGE (Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics). The study seeks to define a model that correlates selected dimensions of decent work, like provision of suitable jobs for men and women, the extension of social protection, a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, among others, with the variables that measure social progress and quality of life. This paper discusses the methodological implications of this model in comparison to some different proposals for indicators disseminated by the International Labour Organization (ILO). The central question discusses how the different dimensions of decent work can be integrated into an index for monitoring the development and social progress. Along with a theoretical and methodological discussion, it is intended to advance the creation of indicators that can effectively monitor the performance of policies and government actions for promoting decent work as a way to attain social progress, which may serve as a tool for comparison, analysis and questioning of social development at national and regional levels.

A subjective measure of inequality in quality of life. Longitudinal relationships with income and happiness inequality in post-Communist Romania

Inequality in happiness is a rather new social indicator. It is generally negatively correlated with the average level of happiness in a country. However, in post-communist societies, this relationship seems not to be true at longitudinal level. In Romania, for instance, it was shown that even when happiness levels rose after the decline in the nineties, the happiness inequality was still increasing. This is linked with the changing socio-economic climate in post-communist countries, which also make the transition from a rather homogenous to a very heterogeneous society. Indeed, it was supposed that increase in income inequality levels may be only a particular aspect of the heterogeneization of these societies. Is the concept of inequality in quality of life useful to study this general trend? To prove this, I used data on income inequality in Romania after 1990, in conjunction with subjective data obtained by the national survey program Diagnosis of Quality of Life (1990-2010). Specifically, I analysed trends in life satisfaction levels, and also in life satisfaction inequality. For inequality in subjective quality of life, I developed an index based on 15 subjective items such as satisfaction with housing, family, earnings, health, and educational services. Results seem to show that inequality in quality of life is a better measure of social heterogeneity than income or happiness inequality.

The social indicators monitor: Simon

Simon is an online information system and allows comfortable access to the time series data from two systems of social indicators developed and maintained by the Social Indicators Research Centre of GESIS (<http://www.gesis.org/en/services/data-analysis/social-indicators/simon-social-indicators-monitor/>):

The German System of Social Indicators is an instrument that has been developed with a view to monitor well-being – in terms of objective living conditions as well as subjective quality of life – and social change in Germany. Covering 14 life domains, the System includes almost 400 indicators with a total of more than 3000 time series. The European System of Social Indicators is an instrument to be used to continuously monitor and analyze the individual and societal well-being of European citizens in terms of quality of life, social cohesion and sustainability as well as changes in the social structure of European societies. The European System of Social Indicators covers the current EU-27 member states, Norway and Switzerland as well as Japan and the United States as two major reference societies. At present there are time series data available for roughly 650 indicators from 9 out of the projected 13 life-domains.

The Social Indicators Monitor - Simon

- allows to browse and select indicators according to users' needs (hierarchical and geographical data selection modes)
- allows to visualize and display data as charts (e.g. line chart, bar chart, scatterplot, boxplot), maps and tables
- provides tools for table manipulation and basic data analysis
- allows to print and export data and charts in different formats (PDF, Excel-Tables, JPG, HTML) to be used in other applications
- provides efficient search and help functions
- allows bilingual utilization (English, German) for the German Indicator System

El lazo social de la ilegalidad en la industria farmacéutica

La producción de medicamentos ha recorrido, como la medicina, un proceso de progresiva mercantilización, lo que habilita que los medicamentos ocupen un lugar destacado en el tratamiento de las enfermedades. De este modo, la salud se convirtió en objeto de consumo, en producto que puede ser fabricado por laboratorios farmacéuticos, droguerías, empresas alimenticias, y consumido por otros, los enfermos posibles y reales.

El mercado de los medicamentos es uno de los que generan mayores ganancias independientemente de que el acceso a los mismos sea limitado. En este sentido es interesante indagar acerca de las diversas estrategias que despliegan los laboratorios a fin de introducir sus medicamentos en la población. Las mismas son tanto legales como ilegales, no siendo éstas últimas penalizadas por el orden social ya que gozan de inmunidad social penal. En este sentido, el control social punitivo se ejerce de manera diferencial -reprimiendo, tolerando y encubriendo- sobre acciones ilegales y cumple así la función de mantener un orden social desigual.

A fin de dar cuenta de las estrategias desplegadas, es necesario abordar la relación existente entre los empresarios de esta industria y los funcionarios del Estado. Tal relación se constituye como "lazo social de la ilegalidad". De este modo, las partes involucradas obtendrán beneficios por medios adecuados a su finalidad, medios que pueden ser considerados legales o ilegales. Uno de los frutos de estas relaciones es la progresiva "captura del Estado" por parte de empresarios que intentan que sus intereses privados integren las políticas públicas utilizando al lobby como estrategia fundamental. El mismo es considerado como un delito de "cuello blanco" que involucra actores sociales organizados que transitan desde la actividad privada a la actividad pública y viceversa.

Schooling practices in democratic South Africa : What education policy and fieldwork say about social justice and equity

Post-apartheid South Africa has entered a global world and has adopted the international principles and semantics relating to democratic schooling: right and access to free and quality basic education for all, freedom of school choice, community participation, among others. All of these target social change in South Africa. Yet too many children do not have access to quality education; and the doors of parental participation are only open for a happy few.

Based on an empirical study conducted in the primary schools of a semi-rural community in the province of KwaZulu-Natal, this article analyses the conditions of access to quality education. By exposing the socio-economic realities of schooling and the obstacles to equity, it questions the education policy and the State's conception of social justice and cohesion.

Data was collected in all the six primary schools of the locality by interviewing school staff, parents, SGB and community members and through questionnaires given to each primary school learner, i.e. 2300 learners.

By showing the social backgrounds of the pupils and their social distribution amongst the schools, evidence has been made of the ways access inequalities occur within the locality. Moreover, parents participating in school governance make choices and adopt strategies which are not necessarily conducive to democracy and equity. Although all children have theoretically the right to access quality education, only those from high socio-professional origin have an effective access to it. Poor children of the locality remain disadvantaged and, de facto, social discrimination still takes place.

The educational policy neglects major issues involved in implementing access to quality education for all. A comprehensive approach of schooling practices would prevent from dissociating schools from their social environment and from ignoring their role in shaping social dynamics that yet need to be understood in order to promote equity, social justice and cohesion.

Revolution and enlightenment

This paper outlines the general scope and dynamics of the relation between the ideology of the Arab revolutions and their method. It also suggests how qualitative differences between the revolutionary and post-revolutionary phases ought to be approached. The revolutions themselves may be described in a general sense as "liberal" in ideology and "anarchist" in method. This liberal ideology is evident in the common slogans of all Arab revolutions in 2011, which highlighted democratization, limited executive power, new constitutions, more civic liberties, the concept of "popular will," and mechanisms of accountability to guard against corruption as well as the excesses of the state security apparatus. These demands for a "civic" state appear to have influenced even the religious participants, many of whom found themselves compelled to respond to the environment by liberalizing religious thought itself. In this sense, the liberal revolution may in one sense be seen as a resumption of the Arab nahda heritage, which had dominated intellectual and cultural life under colonialism and also in the postcolonial period up to 1973. On the other hand, a persistent preference for an anarchist method in revolts is evident in how they have resisted the temptation to give rise to savior leader figures or collective parties that would stand in for the revolution, even after their success. This resistance to leadership needs to be understood in light of earlier regional experiments in which anti-colonial movements have in fact highlighted the opposite tendency--namely revolutionary dictatorship. I propose that a new memory has formed as a result of past revolutionary experiences, and surfaced as a rare combination of liberal theory and anarchist method. This combination, in turn, proved uniquely suitable to undoing the ideological heritage and institutional structures of the most recent phase of the authoritarian age (1973-2011).

Law, culture and driving habits in Iran

Iran has the highest rate of road traffic accidents (RTAs) worldwide. Iranian studies of the growing levels of RTAs are often conducted by medical doctors, who view them in light of the increase in the production and ownership of cars and the changed lifestyle of many Iranians, and discuss them in terms of pathology, morbidity and epidemiology. This paper argues that although the high levels of RTAs in Iran are new and reflective of the changing character of Iranian society, the habit of reckless driving is not. Using open and semi-structured interviews, it explores how Iranians describe their driving habits and experience RTAs. Placing the results of the interviews in the historical context of Iranian society, the paper goes on to examine driving as a form of behaviour with legal and cultural dimensions indicative of how Iranians interact with each other and with the normative structures of the legal system, the state and society to create a form of social order. Being mediated through the use of automobile, driving habits also throw light on how Iranians relate themselves to an aspect of modern technology. Thus, this study will treat Iranians' driving habits as an empirical manifestation of one aspect of their legal culture, which is mediated through the technology of the automobile.

Religious beliefs and practices in the application of maria da penha law

The deployment of the law 11.340 in 2006 in Brazil, known as the Maria da Penha Law, represented a major advance in the claims of the feminist movement and in women's rights. The law considers all acts of physical, moral, psychological and sexual violence against women, within the context of intra-family and domestic relationships, as crimes. However, its application by women in situations of violence have faced difficulties due to the resistance of people in general and even of public officials in the police and in judicial institutions, who should make the law be complied. These resistances are caused, among several reasons, by conservative religious beliefs existing in the Brazilian patriarchal culture and prevent the exercise of full citizenship by women. The analysis of interviews with law and sentences operators, expressive of the national scene, aims to show the logic and the content existing behind such backward practices in the face of an original and innovative law in the Brazilian context of social struggles; an initiative praised around the world.

Through subaltern frames: Postcolonial and decolonial knowledges

'Coloniality of power' has been used widely by sociologists and intellectuals of Latin America from the mid 1990s, in order to designate processes – much wider than empire – that transformed modern colonialism into global colonialism both in an epistemological and a historical frame. It follows that decolonization did not bring an end to 'coloniality', an integral feature of modernity. This is to say that decoloniality is a project of struggle that seeks to delink coloniality and modernity on two planes. First, a relocation of thought in order to unmask the limited and situated nature of modern knowledge(s) ever linked to coloniality; and second, 'an-other thinking that connects real experiences with intellectual and intercultural dialogue, particularly within the South'. Such focus on experiences of decolonization and anti-colonial struggles all over the world has intimate links with strands of postcolonial thought and subaltern theory, in particular their recent insistence on the significance not only of experience but also of affect. My paper will explore these links in order to bring postcolonial thought and decoloniality into a critical dialogue and creative tension, teasing out the possibilities of both for future work entailing epistemological, ethnographic, and historical understandings.

Si el desarrollo y la disponibilidad global de herramientas tecnológicas amplían las posibilidades de un desarrollo social y económico, la pregunta que orienta este trabajo gira en orden a pensar cómo ingresa la formación y el uso de la tecnología en la escuela del siglo XXI. Para dicha indagación, se parte de la muestra estadística provincial realizada a padres-docentes y estudiantes, en el marco del PICTO "Dispositivos Pedagógicos y Territorio en la EGB de la Prov. de Santa Cruz".

Una vasta producción académica ha dado cuenta de las transformaciones que ha producido el desarrollo tecnológico en el mundo productivo, en la configuración de nuevas subjetividades y en la construcción de "realidades". La pregunta entonces en dicha investigación, consistió en relevar información que diera cuenta sobre los usos de la tecnología en el dispositivo escolar y en las prácticas de la vida cotidiana de niños/as y adolescentes y, los discursos que se construyen desde y en el dispositivo pedagógico en torno a la tecnología y sus efectos en el futuro. Comprender las relaciones entre los usos de la tecnología por dentro y fuera de la escuela, y el lugar de la tecnología en el dispositivo pedagógico posibilitará dar respuesta a la pregunta que orienta el trabajo.

Transnational solidarity in organizing against Wal-Mart

This paper explores transnational solidarity in the recent global work against Wal-Mart. In particular, I look at how the UFCW and UNI Global are bringing together unions, academics, and NGO's in countries where Wal-Mart has opened. I was fortunate enough to live in Santiago Chile for 7 months in 2011 and work with the UFCW, unions in Chile, and unions in South Africa on anti-Wal-Mart global solidarity work. Wal-Mart opened in Chile in January 2009 and since then has used Chile as a model for good labor relations. Using Chile as a model was particularly important for the recent acquisition of Massmart by Wal-Mart in South Africa. Wal-Mart's labor relations were used in the competition tribunals as a way to ease South African unions' anxieties about the transnational giant entering the country. This paper explores how relationships were built between the UFCW and Chilean Unions, and Chilean and South African Unions. I worked with a group of Chilean unions who wrote a report showing Wal-Mart's blatant anti-union and anti-worker practices in Chile. In addition to the solidarity work between Chilean and South African Unions, I discuss the ongoing work of the UFCW with Chilean unions. Finally, I discuss challenges and opportunities in transnational labor solidarity work.

Migraciones, informalidad y industria de la confección: Reflexiones acerca de Brasil

El proceso de reestructuración productiva y la flexibilización de la regulación del trabajo impactarían en la industria de la confección en Brasil. Tareas antes realizadas por los empleados en la fábrica, actualmente están en manos de una red de empresas que van desde multinacionales, empresas nacionales y pequeños talleres que funcionan a través de redes de barrio y familiares en una dinámica de subcontratación e informalidad. En esta cadena, la actividad de la costura representa 80% de la fuerza de trabajo empleada, que a su vez, se compone de mujeres e inmigrantes latinoamericanos sometidos a malas condiciones de trabajo. La formalización y / o mejora de las condiciones de trabajo y remuneración de los inmigrantes depende de varios factores. Lo más inmediato es la regularización migratoria, un proceso burocrático y costoso respecto a los salarios recibidos. Ante la ausencia de una política de migración inclusiva, los inmigrantes recurren a organizaciones no gubernamentales, marchas de protesta, y foros regionales para avanzar en sus reivindicaciones. La Amnistía migratoria de 2009 y el Acuerdo sobre el libre tránsito y residencia del Mercosur - nuevas vías para la regularización migratoria – son resultado de estas manifestaciones. Otro factor necesario para mejorar las condiciones de vida y de trabajo sería el establecimiento de una política industrial eficaz que pueda revisar el proceso de tercerización e informalidad. Hasta ahora, la acción del Estado contra esta realidad de explotación laboral y violación de los derechos humanos es solo represiva. En este artículo se pretende analizar la actuación del gobierno brasileño ante esta dinámica de informalidad. Objetivase evaluar también cómo las restricciones legales impuestas a la actividad política de los inmigrantes en Brasil, en cuanto a su participación en las estructuras sindicales y partidarios en el país, influyen en este cuadro.

School climate and conflicts among pupils

The presentation reports on empirical research which examined pupils', teachers' and principals' perceptions of school climate related to conflicts among pupils and peace education as a means of the development of peace oriented pupil behaviour. The focus of the presentation is on the pupils' perception of school climate which is relevant for occurrence and resolution of conflicts in schools. Pupil conflicts were explored from an ecological-developmental perspective (Fraser, 1996; Holtappels and Meier, 2000; Khoury-Kassabri et al., 2004), including a sample of 370 pupils in their final year of compulsory schooling across 10 schools in Zagreb county. Questionnaires administered to pupils consisted of scales "measuring": (1) relations among students, (2) relations between students and teachers, (3) the incidence of conflicts in schools and (4) the presence of peace education themes in classroom teaching. Pupil responses indicated that both conflictual and cooperative relations exist in schools. In relation to teacher-pupil contact, pupils reported they perceived teachers as people they could rely on for support in conflict resolution, but at the same time expressed lower estimates for teachers' respect for pupils. The research identified girls in comparison to boys as "more sensitive" to violence in schools, as well as a more positive perception of the school environment by pupils with higher grades and pupils who less often experienced violence in schools. The most often taught themes relevant for peace education are issues related to human rights, while the least taught themes are those concerning groups at risk (e.g. persons of different sexual orientations). The results will serve as an analytical basis for the development of peace education curriculum and improvement of the violence prevention programmes in compulsory schools.

The Tugen community's fragile food security situation: Experiences of a marginalised community of eastern Baringo, Kenya

The Tugen community inhabiting the eastern part of Baringo County in Kenya have gone through an enduring period of food insecurity. The community has suffered and experienced hunger that at times culminated in severe consequences on the inhabitants, who continue to suffer helplessly. As a coping mechanism, women resort to boiling poisonous fruits from wild trees to feed the hungry children and old people for survival. Furthermore, the community faces harsh environmental conditions and challenges of cross-border conflicts with their neighbours from the Pokot county a situation that aggravates the already fragile food shortage situation and thus marginalises them further in terms of food accessibility. The objective of this study is therefore to assess the frequency of access to food by households, to investigate the role of the government in food security, to establish the level of agricultural extension department in food production, to analyse the government's food distribution policy to the marginalised communities in Kenya and to establish the structural impact of food insecurity to the community. Using a survey design, data will be obtained by use of an interview scheduled from a sample of 100 respondents drawn from a sample frame of desegregated households selected using a proportionate sampling technique. The study hypothesises that there is an association between the Government's inability to distribute relief food to the marginalised communities and lack of food among the Tugen community, there is an association between lack of agricultural extension services and food insecurity in the area. Data will be analysed both qualitatively and quantitatively. The Chi-Square χ^2 will be used to test the variables at a significance level of 0.05. The study will assist the government to redesign its food distribution policy within the framework of enhancing the food security situation in the country in marginal areas.

Regímenes de bienestar latinoamericanos y transferencias monetarias condicionadas. Nuevamente el dilema: Universalismo o focalización?

Los programas de transferencias monetarias (TMC) han logrado un gran prestigio en todo el mundo como mecanismos capaces de romper la reproducción intergeneracional de la pobreza. Las TMC han logrado una cobertura de aproximadamente 70 millones de personas en América Latina (AL). Algunos autores de esta región consideran que esta clase de programas son herramientas cruciales para reorientar la política social hacia una perspectiva universalista. Este trabajo se propone analizar a las TMC en términos de sus potencialidades para apoyar al universalismo. El análisis enfatizará el caso del programa mexicano "Oportunidades", particularmente en el área de los servicios de salud. Este programa es reconocido como uno de los más exitosos del mundo. La idea fuerza de este trabajo es que la cobertura creciente, el enfoque integral del programa en materia de educación, salud y nutrición, su eficaz focalización, transparencia y resultados cuantificables, aunque son logros muy importantes y constituyen condiciones necesarias para avanzar hacia el universalismo, no son suficientes para impulsar un cambio profundo de la política social en AL o México, debido a dos obstáculos muy importantes: primero, en términos de derechos sociales esta clase de programas se acercan mucho al extremo de la focalización debido a que utilizan prueba de medios y son condicionales; segundo, para lograr compatibilizar focalización y universalismo hace falta desarrollar una estructura de servicios universalistas, que garantice la misma calidad de servicios (no servicios de segunda para los pobres), promueva la equidad tanto de estatus como de derechos para todos los ciudadanos. En el caso específico del sector salud, compatibilizar la focalización de las TMC con los servicios universales implicaría necesariamente actuar decididamente en contra de la fragmentación de los sistemas de salud, pero las TMC sólo garantizan acceso a servicios básicos de baja calidad.

El pozo y el péndulo. Políticas de protección y control social dirigidas a la adolescencia en infracción a la ley penal en el Uruguay actual

En el Uruguay actual, las políticas dirigidas a niñas, niños y adolescentes tienen como horizonte el nuevo Código de la Niñez y Adolescencia (2004), pieza jurídica esencial en la redefinición de su ciudadanía y en la elaboración de las políticas dirigidas al cumplimiento sus derechos. Pero el pasaje de una ciudadanía tutelar a una ciudadanía plena no puede lograrse solo con cambios en la normativa.

Al proceso anterior, se agregan los cambios a nivel de la conflictividad vivida. En los últimos años, la violencia social y la inseguridad –su percepción– han incrementado su presencia en el clima de opinión. En este contexto, el miedo a un "otro" diferente es un elemento articulador de la sociabilidad, miedo que, junto con la falta de reconocimiento y la crisis de las instituciones de disciplinamiento y protección, configuran el contexto estigmatizante en que se construye un discurso acerca de la juventud en tanto victimaria.

El tema de interés es el de las políticas de protección y control social a la adolescencia. Para abordarlo, se ha elegido como campo de investigacción el Instituto del Niño y Adolescente del Uruguay, en tanto institución rectora en nuestro país en materia de adolescencia en situación de amparo e infracción a la ley penal.

Socialmente, se busca contribuir a la comprensión de la situación actual del modelo de atención a los jóvenes en infracción, así como al diseño de las políticas dirigidas a ellos. La propuesta es cuestionar las instituciones de encierro desde un punto de vista sociológico, en el sentido de las posibilidades de que éstas no reproduzcan la lógica carcelaria y logren 'humanizarla', en el marco del endurecimiento de la mirada hacia los jóvenes. Finalmente, interesa explicitar que teóricamente se pretende aportar al debate en torno al control social y a la violencia ejercida desde el Estado.

Councils and equality principle between government and civil society in Brazil

This paper analyzes the functioning of the equality principle between state and civil society in national councils of public policies, an important constitutional proposition appointed in the literature for its full success. The research was performed using the quantitative method, so that was collected in the councils official websites the number of seats held by representatives of civil society and government on the councils, i.e., how many members can be elected for representing their interests in these spaces. These two categories were defined according to the division of representation under the Constitution and bylaws of most councils. If the number of members is equal in both groups, the equality principle is respected. With the information collected were calculated: the general sum of representatives in each category of analysis, the general sum of members on the councils, the mean and standard deviation of total members. Such processing of the data allowed us to assess the implementation of the principle of parity in the national councils, leading to the conclusion that most council do not adopt the equality principle. It is important to remember that this research does not take into account the daily discussion of national councils, the way of choosing its members (election, appointment, etc.) or what each character takes, consultative, deliberative, or both. To address these issues would require more extensive research than that proposed in this paper. This research aimed to draw attention only to the number of seats reserved for members in the councils of government and civil society, which are institutionalized by official regulations and statutes. It is possible that the day-to-day in these spaces, the number of seats provided by institutional category is not respected.

Participation in the higher education chamber of the national education council during Fernando Henrique Cardoso administration

After the creation of the Law 9.394/96, which established the bases of Brazilian education, it is noted that government policies initiated at Fernando Henrique Cardoso government reinforced the education decentralization process, combining higher education reform with state reform ruled by neoliberal policies. The literature about Higher Education contemporary problems points to three central themes: access to higher education, academic organization and public universities privatization. Therefore, it is important to analyze the public space of relationship between state and civil society constituted for making decisions in this area because its deliberations directly affect public policy development. This paper aims to examine the capacity of Higher Education Chamber of the National Education Council to consolidate civil society participation in decision-making issues concerning Higher Education in the period that includes 1997 and 2002. The National Education Council was selected because it is the highest forum for participation: it discusses the problems involved in national education, especially in higher education, whose decisions are taken by Higher Education Chamber. The period 1997-2002 was defined because it is the period of President Fernando Henrique Cardoso government, after the creation of Law 9394/96. The official documents and Council documents analysis showed that this public space consolidates the participation because there is an educational process of recognition of civil society issues, although there are restrictions imposed by the government.

The professional law training in Brazil, human fundamental rights and the persistence of liberal bacharelism: A reading from the book "os aprendizes do poder" (the apprentices of power) by sérgio adorno

Recent analyses show that the legal education in Brazil is still based almost exclusively on a traditional model, which emerged with the creation of law courses in the second half of the nineteenth century. This model is clearly technical and it is possible to identify a highly formalistic and depoliticized legal culture, whose political paradigm is the liberalism and scientific paradigm is still the legal positivism. If such model was the best to serve the Brazilian liberalism of the Second Empire and Old Republic, it doesn't fit anymore. Since the second half of the twentieth century and especially after the enactment of the Federal Constitution of 1988 became current the demand for material realization of human fundamental rights, which the traditional model of legal education is unable to satisfy. Therefore, it is essential to investigate the different elements that make this traditional model of legal education, the presence of such elements and the functions that they currently play on non-promotion or on promotion of human fundamental rights. Among these elements, one stands out: the liberal bacharelism. This can be defined as the central cultural element of Brazilian law and that is the result, according to Antônio Carlos Wolkmer, of the intersection between legal formalism and political individualism. The book "Os aprendizes do poder" (the apprentices of power) by the Brazilian sociologist Sérgio Adorno can provide a safe path to understand the emergence of liberal bacharelism and the permanence of it in the current legal education, as well the restrictions to the effectiveness of human fundamental rights that it carries, mainly the persistent characteristics of legal professionals steeped in legalistic formalism and empty rhetoric, besides the ever present uncritical importation of principles and theories from alien legal systems, especially from European law.

Aspects of the relaxation of labor laws and Brazilian competitiveness in international markets

Since the Industrial Revolution and the French Revolution, the world witnessed a rethinking of social and political structures hitherto dominant. In Brazil was no different, although changes have occurred later, but influenced by the revolutionary thought of the European immigrants who landed in the country. The labor in Brazil was predominantly rural, scenery amended by the expansion of the industrial sector in the 40s whose working conditions repeated degradations tackled in European revolutions. Given this new reality, it became clear the need to modify labor laws and ensure a minimum of dignity to the worker, changes implemented by means of state intervention in labor relations, guided by the principle of protection. Thus, was created the Consolidation of Labor Laws-CLT- in effect until the present date. However, the businessmen say they are hurt by labor laws protectionism that impedes competition in the global market, especially when faced with products from countries that do not excel in protecting their workers through legislation and for this reason they achieve greater competitiveness in international trade. To try to alleviate this situation, much has been discussed about the relaxation of labor laws in Brazil through grants of rights under the CLT in exchange for other benefits, given the evolution of society, when there weren't protectionist rules, Brazilian workers lived a precarious situation, absolutely different from the current reality of most workers in the country. Then comes the controversy: the relaxation of labor laws is a viable solution to the competition of Brazilian products in the global market? What is the situation of the employee in relation to human rights? There is disagreement on this topic, which will be exposed in research that is proposed.

The rootless copy: An approach to the counterfeit consumption in Rio de Janeiro

Counterfeit consumption is, today, a common practice in the streets of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Although a very familiar theme, the subject has not been submitted to a wide, systematic approach of the local social sciences yet. Counterfeit is either shown as an example of globalisation, since it mobilizes long-run networks of production and transportation of commodities, or as a very specific pratique that demands an expert for being distinguished from the original, as seen in the painting counterfeits. On the other hand, counterfeit is also connected with informal work and popular consumption; the common sense being that this kind of acquisition intends to puzzle the middle class. This work presents the partial results of a master's degree research on the theme, focusing on the legal definitions of "counterfeit" or "pirate objects" ("pirataria", in portuguese) in Brazil, the different agents and techniques involved on the definition and legitimacy of a precise object as fake or not. We deal therefore with consumption, and legal networks, and our goal is to show that counterfeit goes beyond an expert pratique and that most products aren't bought as a replacement for a "lacking original". Our methodology consists on fieldwork on a popular market of the centre of the city, the Mercado Popular Uruguaiana, which is known for its reputation of counterfeit offer; in-depth interviews with different agents; and analysis of legal documents related to the matter. We intend to contribute, by doing so, bringing new data to a field much filled by common sense, and illuminating a globalisation phenomenon on its micro level.

The limits of academic entrepreneurship in emerging economies: A case study in public universities in Brazil

The objective of this study was to investigate the institutionalization of academic entrepreneurship through the participation of scientists in activities of technology transfer and knowledge to companies in a public university in Brazil. The starting point of the research refers to the discussions around the relationship between universities and companies, studied by different perspectives that highlight the emergence of new paradigms in the production of scientific knowledge, such as the arguments of the entrepreneurial university, even more critical analysis, sometimes stressing negative effects, sometimes demonstrating the maintenance of institutional boundaries between the two organizations. The research used two methods: 1) raising the participation of scientists in the process of technology transfer to industry, using secondary data and 2) qualitative research using semi-structured interviews, identifying the different types of institutional logics handling practices academic, one time focused on marketing, another immersed in science. There has been considerable growth in the university's interactions with industry. However, two aspects are considered. The first concerns the predominance of traditional mechanisms of technology transfer, compared to other types of interactions. The second refers to the low level of legitimation of entrepreneurial practices in the academic space, since the defense of scientific logic on the business logic. From the results, we conclude that the argument of the entrepreneurial university has serious limitations, since the low legitimacy of new processes of technology transfer. Thus the diffusion of new scientific practices oriented more contact with the economic demands, not necessarily express a process of institutionalization of academic entrepreneurship, such as the incorporation of new values, norms and scientific guidelines.

Community policing in Australia's aboriginal communities

The policing of Australia's Indigenous people has a long and troubled history, reflected in the perpetual over-representation of Aboriginal people within the criminal justice system. However, over the past two decades, community policing initiatives have been developed by Aboriginal people to enable their communities to be more effective in preventing crime and provide effective models of sanctioning and rehabilitating offenders. These initiatives are often grounded in models of restorative justice. This paper discusses three of these initiatives, namely: circle sentencing, Aboriginal Community Liaison Officers and community night patrols. In particular, we critically examine community night patrols, drawing on data from an evaluation of night patrols in the state of New South Wales. We argue community policing can be successful in reducing crime because it draws on one of the most important (and overlooked) forms of social capital among rural Aboriginal people – strong social and kinship networks. However, we also highlight the different capacity of communities to regulate conflicts, support victims and offenders and resource reintegration, noting that communities are not a natural set of relations, but constructed on broad terrain of history and politics.

Características del saber compartido que hay que observar en una oficina universitaria

Esta ponencia describe los aspectos fundamentales que debe observar (en el doble sentido de seguir una pauta y de mirar) una etnografía, que tiene un enfoque etnometodológico, y que ha de realizarse en una oficina universitaria donde se gestionan los recursos para que los científicos académicos puedan llevar a cabo sus investigaciones. Se trata de un avance de una investigación de tesis de doctorado que, a su vez, se inscribe dentro de un proyecto mayor, que trata sobre los desarrollos y transformaciones que se han dado en los procesos de producción de conocimiento científico, en las universidades argentinas, en los últimos veinte años (proyecto UBA-CyT 2011-2014 [20020100100486], dirigido por Carlos Prego).

Decir que el enfoque adoptado es etnometodológico quiere decir, entre otras cosas, que se parte del supuesto de que las actividades humanas se sostienen por un activo compromiso de sus miembros y porque tales miembros son portadores de una cantidad de saberes compartidos, que se manifiestan a través de los procedimientos y métodos que emplean (pero que no perciben porque los dan por descontado), y que son los que les permiten entenderse y comunicarse, coordinar las actividades que los ocupan y alcanzar los objetivos propuestos.

Siendo este un supuesto fundamental del enfoque empleado, la observación etnográfica de las prácticas de los empleados y funcionarios de la oficina deberá, además de discernir las condiciones materiales del escenario, permitir determinar, en la medida de lo posible, qué consideran los miembros de la oficina un trabajo bien hecho, de qué manera se dan los sobreentendidos y de qué manera los malentendidos entre ellos, cómo se procesan los cambios en las actividades, y qué suponen sobre las personas con quienes se relacionan, pero que no pertenecen a la oficina (científicos, autoridades universitarias, autoridades del gobierno nacional [SPU]).

Textile industries of surat and migrant laborers: Narratives on deprivation of basic rights in a civil society

The present paper is based on the authors research on Oriya migrant laborers in Surat in the Gujarat state of India, during the last two decades. The textile industries of Surat accommodate around ten lakh migrant laborers from Orissa and house them spatially distributed in the entire city. Majority of them work on casual basis and are paid on daily attendance. The laborers work for twelve hours per shift in a day against the official eight hours with an unpaid holiday on Friday. Medical help is a luxury in most of the industries. The temporary and ad-hoc nature of employment, low wages and poor housing conditions lead to serious health hazards. Hardly, any laborer is aware of any trade union in their industries and let alone in the textile city. Although, the different trade unions have their own units but none is politically active and lack wisdom to safe guard the interests of the laboring class. Hence one can easily notice that there are frequent changes of employment without any adequate changes in the way of life. The laborers rationalize the situation and accept the process of migration as it provides employment opportunities and better wages compared to what they are used to receive at their village surroundings. The above facts vividly narrate how the migrant laborers are deprived of their basic rights in a civilized society.

2001 as the year of disability protests: Diffusion of the "Arab Spring," political opportunity, or the UN convention?

The year 2011, in addition to being the year of "Arab Spring," appears to be the year of disability protests. Data from news reports of protests show that, outside of the US, more disability-related protests have occurred than in any previous year. This is true in developing countries in general, in countries which have had democratization protests, such as Egypt, as well as in developing countries without such movements. In some developing countries where disability protests had occurred in the past, they became more prevalent.

Why did this change? Was it related to the Arab Spring protests and their success? Was it because of the 'revolution of rising expectations' formed by democratization protests and their short term successes? Was it related to the "Occupy Wall Street" and other economically based protests such as the ones occurring in Spain?

Many of the protests were related to local issues such as accessibility, sign language recognition or discrimination against guide dogs. While some protest demands were economic in nature, most were not. [Disability protests in the US in 2011, however, were overwhelmingly related to economic issues.] The Arab Spring and the economics protests seem unlikely to explain more than a few of the non-US protests.

However, it is also clear that the political opportunity structure for disability protest expanded in some places. The 2006 UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities produced political opportunities at the local and national level in some countries. It may have produced cultural shifts towards recognition of disability rights in some. In others, political opportunities such as a new government, in Egypt, or a new country, in South Sudan, produced new opportunities.

Overall, this paper analyzes instances of disability protest in 2011 and attempts to classify their causes.

Deafness and disability discourses: Implications for activism, policies and programs

In the past, most disability advocates in the US have included deaf people in their constituency and have claimed some deafness protests as their own. Additionally, deaf advocates participated in many disability related protests, including an important set of protests in 1977, and they were also mostly aligned with disability advocates in the fight for the ADA. However, deafness discourse has diverged recently from disability discourse. Many deafness advocates viewed deaf culture as separate from disability culture, some view deaf people as a linguistic minority instead of a disability group, and a few have suggested the phrase 'deaf gain' as the framework through which to view deafness. With this linguistic shift, the groups are necessarily moving away from each other in political activism, especially in protest activity. This separation of discourses could challenge whether the legal and financial protections offered to disabled people should apply to deaf people.

This paper analyzes changes in both rhetoric and protest actions over time since 1970. It shows the increasing disconnect between the disability and deafness related social movements in both rhetoric and action. It shows changes in protest demands made by the two movements, based upon over 1200 cases of protest during the 40 year period. It suggests that deafness advocates may need to identify new legal and political avenues for policies and services if their rhetoric diverges too much from that assumed by these policies and programs.

This paper traces the historical shifts in the types of social ties integrating corporate directors and patterns of political donations in the United States during the latter half of the Twentieth Century. Given that corporate networks express demographic and political changes in society, this research on the different configurations of social ties and political contributions represents an important complement to analyses of the social and demographic characteristics of board members. Utilizing historical data on corporate interlocks and the contributions recorded by the Citizens Research Foundation and the Federal Election Commission, this paper explores whether political activism, as indicated political contributions, is influenced by whether corporate ties are reinforced by mutual affiliations formed through nonprofit foundations, cultural organizations, university boards, policy planning boards, or membership in social clubs.

El papel del movimiento de derechos humanos en la reconstrucción del consenso hegemónico en la Argentina post 2001

Desde su nacimiento, el actual régimen democrático argentino no pudo ocultar, u ocultó mal e intermitentemente, la profunda relación de consecuencia que lo unía a la Argentina antidemocrática anterior a 1983. Más allá de que el Estado democrático burgués intentara constituir una representación de sí mismo como negación del Estado terrorista burgués, la "asignatura pendiente" que constituían las reivindicaciones irresueltas del movimiento de derechos humanos impedía una cristalización profunda y duradera del consenso hegemónico. Es así como estas reivindicaciones se constituirán progresivamente en el eje aglutinador de todas las demás reivindicaciones sociales originadas como consecuencia de la continuidad neoliberal. Como claro ejemplo de este papel contrahegemónico del movimiento argentino de derechos humanos puede citarse el rol de la organización Madres de Plaza de Mayo antes, durante e inmediatamente después de la crisis de 2001-2002 como referencia moral tanto del movimiento piquetero como del movimiento asambleario e incluso de la mermada izquierda partidaria argentina. Sin embargo, es justamente ese capital de legitimidad moral el que el movimiento de derechos humanos no podrá transformar en capital político por sí mismo, sino que servirá de base para la refundación en 2003 de la democracia en la Argentina por el nuevo gobierno justicialista. La presente ponencia intentará echar luz sobre el fenómeno de reconstitución del consenso hegemónico en la Argentina posterior a diciembre de 2001 y sobre el papel jugado por el movimiento y las reivindicaciones de derechos humanos en dicho fenómeno. Para ello recurriremos a los aportes teóricos de Antonio Gramsci y Ernesto

Laclau en torno a la noción de hegemonía y basaremos nuestro análisis del movimiento argentino de derechos humanos como movimiento social en el de Franz Joseph Hinkelammert sobre el cristianismo antiguo como movimiento social y su papel de erosionador y luego legitimador del poder imperial romano.

Desafíos y retos en la gestión de recursos naturales: Movimientos ambientalistas en la provincia de misiones en el marco de la construcción de obras hidroeléctricas

La necesidad de obtener energía suficiente y a bajo costo para "mantener" los niveles de producción industrial y por ende de "desarrollo" conlleva a la búsqueda de nuevas posibilidades por parte de nuestros países. En ese marco, los presidentes de la Argentina y Brasil, firmaron un Convenio para los estudios y construcción de la Obra Hidroeléctrica Binacional Garabí, con dos cierres, sobre el río Uruguay. Esto inició de manera inmediata una serie de controversias y conflictos entre diferentes actores en el territorio de provincial, especialmente entre los que se definen como parte o miembros activos de los movimientos ambientalistas y los representantes del ámbito político-estatal.

En este escenario, la trama discursiva y acciones, colocan como foco de interés a las políticas y modelos de gestión, explotación y apropiación de los recursos naturales. Justamente, a los fines de esta ponencia, interesa indagar y explicitar el locus de enunciación de los discursos y prácticas ambientalistas, políticas, científicas y mediáticas, en un contexto de frontera y binacionalidad. Conceptos como lo "medioambiental", la conservación de la "naturaleza", o lo "ecológico", adquieren diversos significados. Así, la irrupción de los movimientos ambientalistas expresan no solamente nuevas demandas sociales, sino que fuerzan o refuerzan la formulación de políticas públicas, especialmente aquellas relacionadas con el cuidado medio ambiental.

La reconstrucción de este proceso nos interesa especialmente, explicitando la relación de fuerzas, su visibilidad mediática en relación con la posición del movimiento ambientalista en torno a los impactos ambientales, sociales y económicos que producirá la instalación de la represa en el territorio provincial y todo lo que ello acarrea.

Revisamos estos movimientos indagando su trayectoria organizacional y política, estrategias y su locus de enunciación.

Problemáticas y desafíos regionales en contextos de desigualdad y dominación: Movimientos sociales ambientalistas en oposición y articulación con otros actores políticos

La ponencia presenta un análisis crítico respecto a las posibilidades de diversos actores en el nuevo escenario planteado a partir de la planificación y diseño de nuevos proyectos de gran escala como son las represas hidroeléctricas, ubicando a la Provincia de Misiones como protagonista para el desarrollo sustentable de la región.

Argentina enfrenta una crisis en materia de energía, con una matriz energética que depende casi en su totalidad de combustibles fósiles escasos, agotables y con costos crecientes. Por ello, el gobierno argentino anunció la terminación del Proyecto Yacyretá (Argentina/Brasil), y el inicio de estudio de factibilidad de obras como Garabí (Argentina/Brasil) y Corpus (Argentina/Paraguay) –recientemente licitadas y adjudicadas- coloca a la Provincia de Misiones como un escenario particular, en el cual se desarrollarán fenómenos sociales que por su magnitud y consecuencias son inéditos para nuestro país.

La construcción de estas represas hidroeléctricas producirá un impacto social y económico a escala nacional y un impacto de la misma naturaleza y de significativa magnitud en el ámbito regional. La necesidad de contar con la activa participación de diversos actores en la planificación integral, que contemple aristas económicas, sociales, políticas, culturales, ambientales, y que incorpore como sustento básico la participación democrática en los procesos de toma de decisión, es fundamental para alcanzar la sustentabilidad energética del país.

En este contexto, nos interesa analizar el proceso de lucha de los movimientos sociales ambientalistas, la correlación de fuerzas con otros actores, entre ellos las organizaciones estatales, que produjo como resultado la sanción de leyes que impiden la construcción de represas sin la consulta popular (plesbítico).

Unethical actions of professors in the communication discipline at the National Autonomous University of Mexico

This paper is part of the research project and thesis that is being developed to obtain the degree of PhD in Pedagogy, in the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM), entitled Professional Ethics of the Undergraduate Students in Communication at UNAM. The unethical actions of the teachers were pointed out by students of the B.A. in Communication, who are attending the eighth semester, enrolled in the three faculties where this professional discipline is offered in UNAM (Political and Social Sciences; Professional Studies Aragón and Professional Studies Acatlán). A specific questionnaire was designed. It refers to three areas: profile, professional values and codes of ethics. The instrument was answered by groups of students in 2010. The total of the sample was of 305 (125 in Aragón, 75 in Acatlán and 105 in the Faculty of Political and Social Sciences). One part of the questionnaire directly required the students to identify three unethical actions performed by their teachers. The resulting data consist of 735 answers. The information is revealing and similar in the three Faculties, as follow: accepting bribes, selling grades, having preferences for favorite students, to give an improper grade, evaluating arbitrarily, skipping classes, not teaching, getting late or being unpunctual, lacking of preparation, not being updated or lacking of knowledge or experience, engaging with the students, harassment, abuse of power or authority and having no commitment to the group.

The psychogenesis of obedience to social order through punishment justification: Psychological obstacles for the development of political consciousness in social groups

A complex comprehension of the genesis of political consciousness in different social groups necessarily involves the understanding of emotional, moral and epistemic processes that constitute it; the comprehension of the psychological mechanisms of human consciousness. This paper presents research results on the psychogenetic development process of representations of social world, that attempt to understand the relationship between collectively constructed knowledge and the individual conceptualization process. We study the developmental processes of punishment's justifications in children and adolescents (n= 216) from Buenos Aires, Argentina, oriented by Jean Piaget's suggestions about the psychogenesis of moral judgement of justice and Norbert Elias theory on social construction of emotional self control. The instrument utilized in our study is an interview based on piagetian clinically research method. Results show three types of punishment's justifications: utilitarian, retributive and mixed, which are present across the age groups. However, differences have been identified in the evaluation of future consequences of punishment (into mixed and utilitarianism justifications). We conclude that the psychological process of conceptualization and the appropriation of collective knowledge would not be mutually exclusive, but it would be two dialectical poles with alternation in relative dominance over each other. Besides, the predominance, even in adolescence, of justifications linked to childish idea about an order in the world and retributive justifications highlight the individual appropriation of historically legitimated arguments. The object's action on the subject, theorized by Piaget in this case would not be metaphorical, because children's embodiment experiences with punishments constrains their possibilities to carry out an epistemological detachment process, which will enable them to think autonomously about this moral problem. Our research shows that - through the progressive appropriation of the justifications historically constructed by dominant social groups - the individuals become obedient to established social order.

Covariates of weight loss among a Mexican American population in the US Southwest Recent efforts to curb the current rising trend in adult obesity globally and in the United States in particular have focused mostly on a variety of weight loss interventions at various levels of individual and group participation. Despite the increasing attention that these programs have received, identifying significant predictors of weight loss outcome remain important questions in behavioral health research. The recent alarming rates of overweight and obesity that characterized the US Southwest are also experienced in Mexico where obesity is not only a major risk factor associated with diabetes, but also other major chronic conditions.

In this article we address questions of obesity and weight change in a sample that is inclusive of native and foreign born Mexican Americans in the Southwestern United States. This paper uses data from the Border Epidemiologic Study of Aging (BESA), a four wave, random sample of Mexican Americans on the US Mexico Border to examine the possible covariates of weight loss for baseline obese respondents who lost weight in subsequent data collection points.

Results from three separate logistic regression models controlling for variables such as age and gender indicate that age was statistically significant in all three logistic regression models; self rated health status was statistically significant and inversely associated with weight loss, other considerations of serious risks such as death or serious illnesses of friends and kin were also significant.

Creative tourism: Buenos Aires and the authenticity production of tango dance tourists

„Tango is the soy of Buenos Aires“, affirmed the current mayor of Buenos Aires Mauricio Macri. Just as the export of soy benefits Argentina's overall economy, the local government sees the worldwide 'export' of Tango as benefiting the city's urban economy. Indeed, the revalorization of the formerly neglected Tango culture reveals a profound shift in the urban development, which transformed Buenos Aires since the 1990ies into the most important tourist city in South America. The Tango culture, in turn, was intimately embedded in these urban tourist transformation processes. In this context, the social phenomenon of tango dance tourism emerged as a specific form of "creative tourism". As it will be argued in the presentation, this tourism requires a different approach to the conceptualization of the social production process of tourist 'authenticity' and its socio-normative implications. While the critical 'postmodern' turn in the urban studies of the 1990ies focus mainly on the symbolic or iconic production of authenticity, emphasizing commonly a type of collective 'tourist gaze', the specific case of tango dance tourism illustrates the more active and individualized involvement of tourists in the city. Thereby, urban theories on tourist authenticity, so the argument, needs to transcend their iconic presuppositions and widen their conceptual scope.

The future of leisure in a city in transformation: The case of Rio de Janeiro

In this work, we bring the classical definition that associates the leisure to all that the individual does in the free time, after fulfilling his/hers obligations. Updating this definition in the context of Rio de Janeiro, we reflect on the current forms of recreation in a city where urban violence and the feeling of insecurity affect daily life, encompassing the forms and types of leisure in the city. We propose a case study of the city of Rio de Janeiro, which has a pattern of segregation and intense self-segregation, typical of few Brazilian cities, and forms of leisure that we consider 'tailored' to the context of a city undergoing profound social and environmental transformations. The Rio de Janeiro is, for all these reasons, a "city in transformation". We emphasize forms of recreation that occur in spaces as centers of consumption supposedly safe, large private condominiums, parks and gardens surrounded by railings, among others. The search for security seems to be the primary motivation for the choice of these spaces as places for leisure. The 'city on the move' is also the city of challenges. Rio de Janeiro is traditionally the scene of major international events, as the Conference of United Nations Rio + 20 (2012), is now becoming the host of major sporting events such as World Cup Soccer (2014) and the Olympic Games (2016). The main challenges are to improve the public transport system ground (as well as the civil aviation system) and restructure the public safety, as well as developing the city's potential for different forms of leisure.

Mixed families and their every day life in California, USA

The present economic crisis in the USA has increased the xenophobic feelings towards migrants that has led to the implementation of a series of policies in different states that has made life harder and more violent for many migrant families. Supposedly these policies are directed towards the undocumented migrants, however it has been proven that most Mexican families living in the USA are mixed families, that is, they have undocumented and documented family members that have been living for several years and even decades in the USA.

These policies are affecting families in many ways and are provoking all sorts of problems inside the family. Our objectives are the following: to study the effects a different legal status has on family members and their relations; how they affect the power relations between generations; the differences in academic and job opportunities for the young generations. We hope this paper will help to understand the injustice done to these families by the recent policies implemented by state and federal governments.

This paper is based on qualitative data gathered during fieldwork carried out in California among Mexican families that live in the Valley of Santa Maria, Central Coast, California, USA. Participant observation and open-ended interviews were done to 20 families.

Declining university participation in demographically shrinking regions?

Tertiary education systems are regarded as crucial factors influencing the inequality patterns of individuals and regions in the so called 'knowledge society'. Several waves of falling birth rates have produced series of smaller age cohorts in many European countries and other parts of the world. As these age groups mature the question arises how tertiary education capacities geared towards certain cohort sizes are being changed or maintained in order to respond to the new demographic situation.

Political decisions on tertiary education infrastructure influence participation opportunities because most of the students subscribe to regional institutions for graduation. On the one hand side smaller age groups could imply fewer students and hence facilitate educational savings for the welfare state. On the other hand side the demographically shrinking workforce calls for further investments in education infrastructure in order to maintain comparative advantages in the global competition for the allocation of locations.

The analysis applies a mixed methods case study design (statistical secondary data analysis, expert interviews) on an exemplary region of East Germany (Saxony-Anhalt). Post-communist regions are especially interesting in this regard because of the pronounced fertility decline after the breakdown of the Soviet Union.

Results show that the analysed regional tertiary education system was able to decouple itself from the demographic decline. This decoupling can be attributed mainly to three factors: Rising participation rates are due to a catch up effect in educational expansion after reunification. At the same time savings were realised through lower administration intensity in organisations of higher education. Thirdly a federal policy was set up mobilising eligible tertiary students across the country in order to fill vacant university places. Reflecting upon these results there seem to be also limits to educational expansion decoupling education systems from negative demographic trends.

Demographic change and educational reform in times of new public management

Many European countries have seen waves of falling birth rates during the last decades. This trend is most pronounced in post-communist countries but other countries are affected in a similar way. In the context of significant budget constraints for many states and years of discussion about how to realise a New Public Management this new demographic trend creates political pressure for educational downsizing. On the other hand falling birth rates diminish the economically active population in the long run which creates political pressure for investments in human capital in order to sustain high productivity levels. Hence potential savings in education systems resulting from declining age cohorts can also open up chances to expand education services in terms of quality and wider access to tertiary degrees. Which policies are chosen in this demographically new situation?

According to Durkheim growth in population density and volume creates a diversification of occupations. Applying this argument to the situation of demographic decline I suggest that a shrinking size of age cohorts triggers a reduction of institutional diversification in educational systems and a concentration of formerly separated educational tasks in multifunctional organizations. This hypothesis is analysed through case studies of the education system in East Germany, West Germany, and Poland. The sample allows for comparisons with minimal and maximal contrast in terms of demography and institutional context.

Based on quantitative secondary data analysis and expert interviews, the results show that demographic change affects education systems very differently. Both the reduction of institutional diversity among secondary schools in East Germany and the expansion of institutional diversity among secondary schools in Poland are only related to demographic decline by later co-incidence. Contrary to this non-intentional path a current reduction of institutional diversity in West Germany has been triggered by smaller age-cohorts.

The impact of interpersonal trust and economic performance on political support: Evidences from 38 European countries

It is well known that interpersonal trust is a relevant predictor of Democratic support and democracy. The lack of trust leads to less prosperous and ungovernable societies. According to several scholars (Offe 1995, Uslaner 1999, Warren 1995), the main mechanism through which trust leads to a functioning democracy is by extending the interpersonal trusting ties (horizontal trust) from familiar circles to those individuals we don't necessarily know, starting from other individuals up to impersonal entities such as institutions. Democratic institutions will then act as an umbrella to protect the interpersonal trust relations generating exchange and certainty in social relations (Fukuyama 1995). If these conditions of persistence of trusting ties and democracy do not exist, support for the democratic process tends to rely in short term evaluations of the economy. It is expected that high trust will be found in more stable democracies whereas more recently established democratic regimes will present low levels of trust. There is empirical evidence that in longer established democracies, the impact of trust is higher than in more recent democracies. This paper analyzes the impact of interpersonal trust on support for the democratic performance, and explores the effect of trust on political support at the individual level, controlling for other predictors for support for democracy, and also controlling for other variables at the aggregate level, such as persistence of democracy, post-communist legacy etc. In order to test the hypotheses, multilevel analysis will be conducted and data from the European Value Study 2008 will be used.

Trust and interethnic contact in european neighbourhoods: Evidences from six European cities

European societies and cities are getting more multicultural and heterogeneous. With the years, many European Neighbourhoods have seen how their population has become more multiethnic and multicultural, and the traditional inhabitants of those Neighbourhoods, as well as the new inhabitants, have to adapt to a new environment creating modes of coexistence. The aim of this paper is to test whether in European Neighbourhood interpersonal trust is widely shared by all citizens, or, on the contrary, it is a fragmented trust, shared only by specific groups. We will confront contact theory and conflict theory to test whether contact among different groups at the Neighbourhood level is generating trust, or whether, on the contrary, contact is creating conflict and therefore, is fragmenting social trust in the Neighbourhoods. In order to test these two conflicting hypotheses, we use data from the European project GEITONIES ("GENERATING INTERETHNIC TOLERANCE AND NEIGHBOURHOOD INTEGRATION IN EUROPEAN URBAN SPACES") conducted between 2008 and 2011 in 6 European cities (Bilbao, Rotterdam, Warsaw, Vienna, Lisbon, Thessaloniki), interviewing 300 natives and 300 immigrants in each of the cities. The method for the hypothesis testing will be multilevel analysis, taking into account both individual and Neighbourhood level variables.

Alienation and the ambivalences of "freedom from work": An investigation of Haredi Jewish men in Israel

In its original/classical formulation, alienation is a matter of estrangement from "species-being": wage labour entails alienation because the employee controls neither the labour process nor the destination/use of the product. Insofar as alienation is a subjective experience (not merely a theoretical construct), wage labour is deeply dissatisfying.

In advanced capitalist societies where paid work is the norm (particularly for men), one then wonders whether people who choose not to be in the labour force experience alienation. One such group is "Haredi" (ultra-Orthodox) Jews in Israel. Many Haredi men spend many years studying in yeshiva instead of holding jobs; their understanding of religious obligation leads them to reject "profane" work in order to devote themselves fully to religious activities. (These are large families whose income derives from state support gained via the power of their representatives as "swing parties" in parliament.)

In devoting themselves to religious study, Haredi men do not experience the alienation of wage labour; indeed, they are free from the need to work in the normal sense. On the other hand, their activities put them at some distances from Marx's notion of species-being (a point apparent from the traditional Zionist perspective in which manual labour itself was the path away from the alienation of conventional European Jewish occupations).

The paper explores that latter point by considering recent trends in which some younger Haredi men in Israel (perhaps experiencing alienation in their yeshivas) are rejecting non-participation and are seeking ways to reconcile religious obligation with paid employment. These efforts suggest that even people who do not have to work might prefer the alienation of wage labour to the "alienation" they experience by absenting themselves from the labour market. The paper concludes with reflections on how we might advance the (oft-lamented) empirical investigation of alienation.

Religious obligation, secular work, and citizenship: The material poverty and spiritual riches of ultra-Orthodox Jews in Israel

Citizenship ideals in western capitalist countries put great emphasis on the notion that adult individuals should be self-sufficient, meeting their own material needs through income from paid employment. These ideals conflict with the religious beliefs of certain minority groups whose understanding of religious obligation leads them to reject "profane" work in order to devote themselves fully to religious activities. The poverty that results from these choices can then become a matter for welfare state institutions – and the assertion that this poverty results from choice points to the controversy that typically follows from providing public support in such instances.

This paper explores these issues by analyzing the situation of ultra-Orthodox Jews in Israel. In these groups men spend many years studying in yeshiva instead of finding paid work; while their wives sometimes work, they lack advanced education and their wages are low, and in any event they shun contraception, have very high fertility rates (mainly by choice), and thus have intermittent employment at best. These are large families with little or no income from work; they survive on state support gained via the power of their parliamentary representatives as "swing parties" in successive governments. These arrangements are bitterly resented by the secular (tax-paying) Israeli population, who sometimes express their opposition in language that bears traces of anti-Semitism (e.g. "parasites").

This situation points to important questions about the rights of religious minorities. Do such groups have a right to expect public support (i.e., money) when their religiously prescribed way of life excludes work and thus conflicts with secular notions of citizenship? To what extent must religious minorities accommodate their religious views and practices to the demands of secular norms and institutions? This paper addresses these questions via comparison with other examples (including counterfactuals) in which need/poverty is arguably rooted in choice.

Argentina: A successful case of post-neoliberalism?

There have been debates about the end of neoliberalism and the beginning of a neo-developmental stage in Latin America, portrayed as a successful alternative to the current picture of crisis and stagnation in core countries. These debates have mostly revolved around the progressive Latin American governments emerged after the crisis of neoliberalism in the region, their links to social movements and the scope and limitations of the processes of transformation led by these governments. But the attention given to governments, social movements and progressive political projects has tended to leave aside the study of the current patterns of capitalist accumulation in the region and the role of Latin American states against the backdrop of the global crisis of neoliberalism.

Taking this lack of attention into account, we will review the transformations occurred in Argentina after the economic, political and social crisis of 2001 to reflect about the scope, limitations and contradictions of the 'neo-developmental' or 'post-neoliberal' path of recovery initiated in 2003 and to the role of the state in it. We will raise questions about the similarities and differences between the post-war ISI and the current development strategy of growth in an economy that has largely remained open and integrated within neoliberal globalization.

Our analysis would be based on the assumption that development—and the role of the state in it—is not a mere technical issue and cannot be reduced to economic theories, institutional practices and/or personal links between state officials and economic elites. Rather, development involves conflictive processes of capitalist reproduction and crisis, of changing relations between capital and labour whose specific features are shaped by the peripheral location of the country, and by the balances of forces underlying a particular development strategy.

Art works and communicative process of knowledge co-creation

The paper proposes a perspective to theorise the relation between knowledge creation and art works based on a synthesis of systemic, phenomenological and constructivist approaches. Art works are considered as knowledge objects that carry significant appresentations and thus allow correlations between individually embedded meanings building the ground for knowledge. The latter emerges and evolves through continuous use of art works as mediums of communication between artists, creative communities and publics in common experience spaces. Therefore, to explain how artists, creative communities and publics co-create knowledge using art works we analyze the communicative process centered on art works creation, promotion, discussion, perception and (re)interpretation at three interconnected levels. At the first level is the artist, who expresses his/her aesthetic experience of the world using tacit knowledge of the artistic techniques and being influenced by the existing body of knowledge. At the second level we find creative community that joins the communicative process of knowledge creation and puts professional restrictions on the legitimacy of art works and appresentations they carry. The third level is comprised of publics consisting of other artists, art specialists and audiences, who express evaluative opinions and implicit requests for representation in art works. Audiences get involved in the development, reproduction and promotion of correlations of meanings suggested by the artists and creative communities. We argue that to succeed art works are to provoke an inclusive 'democratic' communicative process of knowledge co-creation at all the three levels described above and thus promote social knowledge creation.

University science in heterogeneous intellectual landscape

Our paper analyses intellectual landscapes, extensive dynamic non-linear intellectual communication network structures that penetrate present day societies and generate heterogeneous knowledge in various social arenas. We argue that it is heterogeneity of communication network structures covering various cultural environments create areas, where diverse knowledge is generated by various means. For instance, as our research shows the areas with low intensity of communication and low network density are more likely to produce novel breakthrough ideas, while the areas of intensive communication and high network density generate incremental knowledge developing the existing ideas. Highly centralized network areas generate well-structured knowledge fields, while decentralized structures create more diverse though internally contradictive knowledge fields. We show that various types of intellectual communication structures are necessary for the evolution of the whole body of knowledge. In this context the role of networked university science of the 21st century is, we argue, to stimulate interaction between the different areas and types of structures to help them co-evolve promoting a balanced model of knowledge democracy based on multiple legitimacy. It means not to concentrate all knowledge processes within the "walls" of academic and research institutions to gain the only "True" knowledge and then "democratically" disseminate it through society, but to coordinate knowledge creation networks that penetrate society providing conditions for the variety of knowledge to emerge. It implies considering every actor a potential knowledge creator and every region as potentially significant for the evolution of the global intellectual landscape, creating loci of knowledge growth, as well as developing institutional tools to stimulate and coordinate intellectual communication networks in society.

Dimensions of integration: Second-generation African youth in France

This research examines second-generation sub-Saharan African youth living in France, considering structural dimensions (i.e., interactions with the government, social class, race and coloring) and of cultural dimensions (i.e., culture and normative behaviors, religion). By considering more than one dimension at once, it is possible to understand how the youth of Cliché-sur-bois were crying out for help on the eve of the riots in Paris' suburbs in 2005. For example, because of economic constraints, women seek and may find work in housekeeping, where they may clean buildings at night. Parents work at night cleaning buildings, and their children's education suffers as a result. Additionally, other structural dimensions are considered to understand children's interactions with the government and formal institutions in French society as well the import of race and coloring. Adding to this, culture dimensions such as normative behaviors and religious expectations come together to construct different life chances for second-generation immigrant African youth in France. This chapter utilizes the interview data gathered of the life experiences of first and second generation children and youth to disentangle the dimensions that shape the varying integration pathways for African immigrant youth in France.

Exploring the expectation of financial well being upon retirement

While much has been written about retirement planning for the US older population, most of this literature has concentrated on retirement planning and financial well being among older whites. Lately, this topic has been investigated for older African Americans, yet there is a significant dearth in the literature that explores retirement planning and expected financial well being among older Mexican Americans, the largest Hispanic origin group in the United States.

Results presented here employ four waves of the Border Epidemiologic Study of Aging (BESA) to explore self reported expectations of financial well being at retirement. We further investigate this question by formulating and testing a construct on the expectation of preserving their current lifestyle upon retirement.

The BESA is a four wave prospective study of 1299 Mexican Americans randomly selected from three counties along the US Mexico Border when weighed, the sample represents approximately 300,000 middle age and older Mexican Americans residing in the region. After categorizing cohorts by country of birth, those respondents who report low income and are US born are more likely to expect Social Security payments upon retirement than the Mexican born. While the US born population who report better health and more years of education expect pension and annuities upon retirement, the Mexican born cohorts do not share such expectation. In sum, among the Mexican American middle age population, those who are native born expect to maintain their current lifestyle upon retirement while those who are born in Mexico do not share this expectation. Other findings of interest are also reported.

Connecting crime and society: An investigation of specialized police department in cybercrime

The advent of digital technology and the convergence of computing and communications have begun to change the way we live. These trends have also created unprecedented opportunities for crime. Criminal activities that were not foreseeable two decades ago have become facts of life today. Digital technologies now provide ordinary citizens, even juveniles, with the capacity to inflict massive harm. As never before, and at negligible cost to themselves, lone offenders can inflict catastrophic loss or damage on individuals, companies, and governments from the other side of the world. The continued uptake of digital technology will create new opportunities for criminal exploitation. However, when considering the sheer magnitude of technology that can be exploited across a global crime scene, then investigating cybercrime becomes a complex task. To compound the challenge further, there is considerable debate surrounding the term 'cybercrime'. The question about the novelty of crimes committed through electronic, digital devices or computer-mediated, raises questions on what is illegal and considered illicit in cybercrime, and puts in conflicts the frame "old wine in new bottles". Following the literature and theory discussing the issue of cybercrime, we try to shed light in the process of legislation on the theme in Brazil, and by the creation of police department specialized in resolving cybercrime. The research proposes to discuss the impact of crimes committed through digital e computer networks on society by the ethnography of the police department, subscribing the representations the police officers have on the theme, the repertoire to combat and apply the law enforcement.

Aportes conceptuales y empíricos para analizar el fenómeno del ausentismo laboral desde una perspectiva de género: El caso de la industria láctea en Uruguay

A pesar de que en las últimas décadas se constata un aumento de la participación femenina en la fuerza laboral, las mujeres continúan experimentando barreras para acceder a puestos de calidad en el mercado. Algunas de estas barreras se expresan a través de estereotipos que condicionan la contratación de mujeres. Especialmente negativos son los discursos basados en supuestos mayores niveles de ausentismo laboral de las trabajadoras. Estas argumentaciones suelen derivarse de valoraciones negativas sobre el rol de las mujeres como responsables del ámbito doméstico y su relación con el desempeño laboral, así como de supuestos mayores costos de contratación dado los derechos laborales en torno a la maternidad, la salud de las mujeres y la de sus hijos/as.

El objetivo del trabajo será aportar al análisis del fenómeno del ausentismo laboral desde una perspectiva de género, a partir de tomar como caso la Industria Láctea en Uruguay, sector donde llama la atención la persistencia histórica de la menor contratación de mujeres. ¿Podría estar afectando la percepción de un mayor ausentismo laboral la decisión de los empleadores a la hora de contratar mujeres? De ser así, ¿Cuál es el sustento empírico de estas? ¿Se constata un comportamiento diferencial entre mujeres y varones con respecto al ausentismo dentro de este sector de actividad?

Para avanzar en la comprensión de estas interrogantes, en primer lugar, se sintetiza un marco analítico con énfasis en la construcción del ausentismo como fenómeno multicausal y en el análisis de las políticas de seguridad social en Uruguay. En segundo lugar, se retoman tres fuentes de datos a nivel nacional para analizar la incidencia y la intensidad del ausentismo según sexo en esta industria. Por último, se presentan recomendaciones y conclusiones, se discuten las limitantes del análisis presentado y se plantean futuras líneas de investigación.

Envejecimiento, cuidados y género

En las últimas décadas las crisis en Latinoamérica, las transformaciones de los Estados y la orientación de las políticas sociales se encaminaron a privatizar la responsabilidad por el bienestar social, transfiriendo a otras esferas –familias, comunidades y mercado– tareas que en ciertos casos los Estados dejaron de cumplir. La desigualdad es una de las características principales en la región, que se expresa entre otros elementos en un acceso diferencial a los recursos de acuerdo al nivel socioeconómico, al género, a la etnia y la edad de las personas. E Surgen también nuevas necesidades que se vinculan al aumento de la población dependiente de adultos mayores, a la reconfiguración del cuidado infantil y al incremento generalizado de la actividad económica de las mujeres. Esto plantea en nuevos términos la pregunta de las obligaciones y los derechos al cuidado de los integrantes de las familias y de las responsabilidades estatales en este terreno. El trabajo de las mujeres y las transformaciones del mercado laboral y de las familias ponen en cuestión los supuestos del bienestar basados en la familia y en el ciclo vital característico. Los cambios en las formas de vivir en familia y los cambios en el mercado de trabajo no han provocado acciones públicas suficientes para atender a las nuevas necesidades sociales emergentes, especialmente las de cuidado. En efecto, la preocupación explícita por los problemas del cuidado en las agendas públicas de los gobiernos de América Latina es incipiente y heterogénea entre países. Los marcos normativos de los países de la región, así como el abanico de programas sociales existentes relacionados con la protección de la infancia, la vejez y la dependencia, revelan una creciente concentración en la familia de los riesgos asociados al cuidado. Estos serán los temas que se aborden en la ponencia.

Inclusion and belonging of young residents with a precarious status on the move? Evidence on their unequal vocational participation opportunities in Germany

Education and training are often cited as key factors for opportunities in life. Although the international human rights framework recognizes an universal right to education independent on a person's resident status, nation-states either directly or indirectly limit access to the corresponding institutions for non-citizens as part of their internal migration control policies. While minors with a precarious status find it easier to access education, their older counterparts have traditionally been excluded to a great extent from a central element of the secondary education system in Germany: the dual system of vocational training. Being based on education at school and in companies, dual apprenticeships touch upon a highly sensible field in migration control policies, namely labour market participation.

Due to the impending shortage of skilled workers in Germany, legal changes at the federal level have been introduced in 2008. They are to reduce vocational training boundaries for a specific group of young precarious residents and opening up new legal avenues to transit to a legal migration status in the aftermath. This marks a sweeping novelty in German migration and asylum policy that mainly focused on the deterrence and marginalisation of this group. The question emerges in how far this policy change can be transformed into practice.

Empirical evidence from our ongoing qualitative-explorative research project reveals a very heterogeneous situation across Germany. In our presentation we would like to touch upon the following questions: How differently is the policy change being implemented on the local level? How do these differences come into being? What does this mean for the educational and life opportunities of the target group? To answer these questions, we outline the current legal framework and present central findings of our comparative regional case studies that are based on document analyses, semi-structured individual interviews and group discussions with experts.

What is the value of keeping patients at home if informal caregivers become exhausted to the detriment of their own life satisfaction?

Cerebrovascular diseases like Alzheimer's disease increase among European populations, and the number of patients living at home, with domestic support is growing. Our study analysed, two years post-stroke, the life satisfaction (LS) and its relationships with the quality of life (QoL) of the survivors and their informal caregivers, and socioeconomic characteristics, and impaired functions.

All stroke survivors admitted in hospital from the 1st July 2006 to the 30th June 2007 were selected by the National Health Insurance of Luxembourg, using the administrative reimbursement database: patients living at home and their main caregivers were interviewed with questionnaires assessing LS (one question as the European survey), survivor's Newsqol, and caregiver's Whoqol-bref.

Ninety-four survivors (65.5 years) and 62 informal caregivers (59.3 years) were included in our analyses. Sex and occupational status had a positively effect on patients: their LS was higher in women and retired people. In opposite, patients at home without a professional activity had a much lower LS score. Adjusted for sex, occupational status and impaired motor and memory functions, patients' LS was higher for higher scores of Newsqol dimensions of feelings, sleep, emotion, cognition, and pain, but was not correlated with any of the caregiver's Whoqol-bref domains.

Informal caregiver's LS was negatively associated with female sex and care taking of patients with impaired memory. Similarly, it was related to feelings and emotion Newsqol dimensions and to all Whoqol-bref domains: social relationships, psychological, physical health, and environment.

The needs, resources, skills and will of the informal caregivers for taking care of the other must be better taken into account. The informal caregivers represent a "population at risk" who European health systems need to consider. Coaching patients and informal caregivers with socio-educational activities that foster positive attitudes and provide motivation, reassurance and information can help sustain home-based rehabilitation and maintain patients' LS.

The place of ethno-religiosity for Armenian identity in Turkey

It is difficult to evaluate the competing identities of minority groups in Turkey with the multi-ethnic, multi-religious legacy it holds. Relative to that, studying Armenian identity in Turkey necessitates dealing with a multi-layered structure and differentiated processes as well. The aim of this paper is to analyze varying boundaries of Armenian identity in Turkey as an ethno-religious identity and to investigate the dynamics influencing its formation by means of a field research conducted between May 2010 and November 2010 in Ýstanbul, Yeþilköy, one of the districts where most of Armenians in Turkey live. The paper especially examines whether the relationship between ethnic and religious sense of belonging is hierarchical, context-dependent or both. Self-definition of the respondents in terms of the religion or ethnicity, the political reflections it brings, the priority of public or private sphere may be mentioned as some of the determinants of that relationship. In the study, language, traditions, perception of homeland together with myths and collective memories will be considered as markers of distinctiveness in Armenian identity. Anthony Smith's book 'Chosen People' will be taken as a point of departure to elucidate the intersection of religion and ethnicity in identity construction of Armenians of Turkey.

The role of transnational bonds in self-positioning of Armenians in Turkey

It is difficult to draw a clear-cut framework on Armenian identity in Turkey and to position Armenian community in Turkey due to geographical, historical and cultural dynamics. Related to that, various senses of belonging provide possible grounds for the creation of multiple Armenian identities. Being a citizen, being a member of a minority group, being a part of an Armenian nation creates this complexity. The impact of transnational relations as well as transcommunal encounters are worth to be considered in order to clarify the picture. This paper examines the self-positioning of Armenians in Turkey and the impact of their relations with Armenians of Armenia and diaspora on their identity construction process. A fieldwork conducted between May 2010 and November 2010 in Yeşilköy; one of districts of Istanbul where a considerable part of Armenians lives, constitutes the basis of the study.

Palestinian dwellers as activists in the old city of Jerusalem: Politics as escape

My presentation addresses – on the basis of biographical case reconstructions and thorough reconstructions of so-called small life-worlds – the biographical functions of political activism in an ideologically and geographically dense space.

In the Old City of Jerusalem a Palestinian majority forms a figuration with a minority of Jewish Israelis, wherein the latter are the established and the former the outsiders. The Palestinian groupings are exposed to and have to come to terms with unpredictable politics and oppression. Together with changing or insecure family relations as well as the requested commitment to religious and social principles this enlarges the burden on dwellers to help stabilizing symbolically loaded “communities” in familial, religious, social, and national regards – a critical role which makes the individual face manifold negotiations and obstacles.

Thus, political/communal activism for a national cause arises not only out of state-political oppression, but transcends the “big” conflict. It may also have a biographical function of tackling, fleeing, or surpassing other confining issues mentioned above; with political activism becoming a foil on which these are projected. This can for example be familial control, difficulties within one’s own life or with one’s family history, etc. Concentrating on the present or decontextualizing history from one’s own experiences serves to essentialize belonging to the Palestinian nation.

The biographers’ narrations about political activism, however, implicitly highlight these issues. For example, the discussion of various forms of resistance (e.g. of passive or active forms as “traditional” or “modern”) reveals conflicts between generations or political outlooks.

My paper is based on fieldwork in the Old City of Jerusalem, which is part of my PhD-project as well as a larger Israeli-Palestinian-German research project, funded by the German Research Foundation.

“Caliban” scientists: Latin American social sciences within the international academic-publishing system

In the last two decades, bibliometrics has expanded as a relevant indicator to measure scientific trends, individual performance and research capacities. Citation data has become a universal pattern to define what is publishable and which journals have more impact. This paper intends to discuss the “universalization” of these publishing standards and the international hierarchies that this system has built –not only among geopolitical areas but through disciplines. It analyses the role played by Latin American journals and scientists in mainstream databases such as ISI-Thompson & Reuters, CSA-ProQuest, SCOPUS-Elsevier and Ulrich in comparison with local databases (open access) such as SCIELO, LATINDEX and REDALYC. It also analyses collaborative research in comparison with other Southern databases, such as AFRICAN JOURNALS ON LINE (AJOL). The main issue of the paper is the supremacy of English in the international academic-publishing system and the situations of academic dependency emerging from linguistic limitations in graduate and postgraduate training and the fact that Latin American journals are mainly edited in Spanish.

L'éducation comme stratégie de mobilité sociale dans les familles marginalisées à la ville de bogota

L'éducation est depuis plusieurs décennies considérée comme le mécanisme d'émancipation par excellence dans les milieux populaires de l'Amérique latine. Ainsi, la représentation et la projection de l'avenir des jeunes scolarisés au niveau du secondaire se construisent autour de l'espoir d'accès à l'enseignement supérieur. La scolarité constitue de ce fait un fort enjeu autour duquel les familles mettent en place des stratégies dans le sens de modèles de comportement, d'action ou de conduite, de manière consciente ou inconsciente[1], visant à court terme la réussite scolaire du jeune, et à long terme l'amélioration de la position du cercle familial dans l'espace social.

A l'appui des résultats d'une enquête quantitative[2] et qualitative menée dans la ville de Bogota, nous montrons comment le cercle familial, analysé comme agent/acteur dans l'univers scolaire, s'organise autour de la scolarité des jeunes. Nous nous intéressons à certains comportements des familles, par exemple l'investissement actif/passif dans le parcours scolaire, mais aussi nous montrons comment, au fur et à mesure de l'avancement du secondaire, l'avenir scolaire du jeune se construit. Nous traitons de manière particulière le choix de formation (technique, universitaire) et son domaine (santé, sciences économiques/sociales, etc.).

Les résultats de cette recherche permettent de proposer une typologie des familles, en prenant en compte des variables renvoyant au milieu d'origine ainsi que plus largement des variables en lien avec la configuration familiale. Etre une fille ou garçon, issu d'une famille dont les parents comptent (ou non) un certain nombre d'années de scolarité ou un emploi, constituent certaines variables explicatives des résultats.

Environmental policy and the limits of neo-institutionalism

Over the last two decades, trends in environmental policy have focused on institutional development, amounting to incremental improvements within a technocratic government paradigm revolving either around a centralist, science-driven, top-down governance style or else around a de-centralized, flexible, market-driven framework of ecological modernization, leaving the citizenry largely reduced to a role of passive recipients and consumers (Bäckstrand & Lövbrand, 2007). However, civil society involvement in the environmental policy field has recently increased in frequency and intensity, ranging from street protests to more stable and organized configurations in the form of Civil Society Organizations (CSOs), but with one common denominator: the resolution to challenge the current state of affairs and the oligarchization of politics that continues to dashing the hope of billions for a safeguarded habitable biosphere for us and for the generations to come. In this paper it is suggested that environmental politics will need to move beyond the delegation-control logic and open up to move from popular consultation to civic involvement mechanisms in the spirit of Nancy Fraser's "participative parity", and from the refinement of accountability and transparency indicators to notions of co-responsibility and the public right to knowledge. Promising attempts for new forms of socio-ecological agency (Manuel-Navarrete & Buzinde, 2010) can be found in mediated forms of social movements and CSOs clustering processes and in the construction of common platforms for dialogue, where culturally diverse agents engage in "kaleidoscopic dialectical processes" (Rehbein, 2010) towards ever-increasing levels of understanding and learning of both sustainable practices and the up-building of collective agency.

Picturing families, making family memories

This paper employs a range of visual materials to explore memory, family, and biography. The materials include a snapshot and studio portrait, an antique gold pocket watch, and a scrapbook culled from the mountain of stuff collected by our parents' families over the past century. In a written dialogue, which is a modification of photo-elicitation, we reflect on each of the objects separately and then together. We use this format – of a written dialogue about each of the objects – to make sense of our family in the past and to consider how objects make family memories. Our process is iterative. First one of us writes a description of and response to an object, and then the other responds to the object and the other's written text. We follow each of the written dialogues by working together. Through our dialogue with objects, first in writing and then face-to-face, we tap into and recover individual memories, new understandings, and ways our personal experiences reflect cultural, historical, and institutional currents in the twentieth century U.S. Our methodology in this project is similar to one employed by scholars interested in a grounded approach to cultural memory. We conclude by reflecting on the place of visual materials in the social construction of family biographies and histories.

The acceptance and diffusion of Italian cuisine in the face of the xenophobic violence against Italian immigrants in post-war Switzerland

Today, Italian immigrants and their descendants are fully accepted in Switzerland and their cultural heritage is seen as an appreciated "Mediterraneanization" of the Swiss lifestyle. This acceptance and appreciation is the result of a long process of integration: Initially the Italians were considered "racially" inferior and culturally deviant, among other things because of their food.

As studies about Italian cuisine point out, Italians apparently show an extraordinary persistence to culinary conservatism (Helstosky 2004, Dickie 2007). So it seems that especially Italian immigrants cling to their native dietary with great tenacity (Levenstein 1990). In the 1960's this attitude wasn't tolerated at all in Switzerland. Therefore the repression of Italian culinary habits was considered a major factor in the "adapation" process demanded of immigrants in the postwar period.

Yet, at the same time there was a striking increase of recipes of "Italian" dishes and advertisement of apparently "Italian" goods in cuisine magazines and housewife-journals, which mediate a touch of dolce vita. Eating "Italian" meant in that context an attachment to a hedonistic lifestyle, perceived as fine distinction (Bourdieu).

My thesis explores this ambivalent attitude towards the Italian culture, and examines how a xenophobic discourse could prevail in spite of a certain increasing degree of "Italophilia". As an intermediate result my analysis shows that a native population constructs its identity through food differently from mobile persons, for example migrants. Nonetheless, both groups need these constructions to define their own memberships – be it to a culture or a lifestyle. Concretely my dissertation is fleshing out, how the concept of self and others, and hence of identity[1], is constructed through food.

[1] In this thesis, identity is understood as a shifting, dynamic and temporary construction. Hall Stuart, „Die Frage der kulturellen Identität“, in: Ders. (Hg.), Rassismus und kulturelle Identität, Berlin 1992, pp. 180-222.

Social cohesion and social mix: The seeking of a normative city? Historicity of the policy discourses in Saint-Etienne (France) and Barcelona (Spain)

The notions of social mix and social cohesion are gained widespread currency in both academic and professional debates. Historically, the development of a policy agenda devised to promote more socially balanced neighbourhoods and then to reduce the inequalities, is particularly contemporaneous of the emergence of the so-called "problematic neighbourhoods" in Europe and the increasing of the urban renewal programmes. However, the ways in which these issues have been framed and the interventions it has provided have varied considerably from the 70's.

The paper - based on a research in progress- deals with the place of social mix and social cohesion in the policy discourses. It focuses on different periods in which these concepts have gained prominence in policy debates in France and Spain. But globally, it is closely connected to a series of antinomies: thus social mix contrasts with segregation, "ghettoisation", gentrification, and generally with the idea of social specialization of areas.

Through two in-depth case studies in the cities of Saint-Etienne (France) and Barcelona (Lyon), this paper is aiming at:

- Showing how these concepts constitute a series of policy discourse by drawing up their genealogy within the political and academic fields,
- Examining the meanings and scopes of urban policies and how they relate to the causes of social segregation and/or social imbalances.

I propose to open a critical debate by questioning these concepts (social mix, social cohesion, gentrification and segregation) in order to describe the nature and the meanings of urban policies from the example of the two cities mentioned.

Accessibility of services «health centers» in Russia (on the example of the city of Moscow)

One of the strategic objectives of government social policy of the Russian Federation is to create conditions that orients citizens to a healthy lifestyle. Relevance of studies of healthy life due to a number of contradictions are: a healthy lifestyle, on the one hand, it is declared as a social value, its formation is urgently needed, a guarantee of preserving and strengthening the health of the individual, but on the other hand, the population of our country observed the prevalence of behaviors that destroy health .

Since 2009, the country implemented the program "Healthy Russia", whose main goal, the formation of respect for the health of citizens, based on the principle of a healthy lifestyle. To accomplish this objective, the Institute of Health set up and operate specialized agencies - health centers.

To determine the status and problems of functioning health centers in the area of healthy lifestyle of the population of Moscow, we conducted a case study case-study, including observation and role-playing interviews.

Despite the fact that the city of Moscow i whose population exceeds 10 million people in the city in early 2011 operated a total of 50 health centers. The study was conducted in March-May 2011 in 45 centers.

In the study, it was necessary to achieve the following objectives: to identify the conditions under which you can get information on healthy lifestyles, identify the manner in which such information is available, identify what the "School Health" function in the centers, to identify the conditions under which an individual program for maintaining healthy lifestyles. The study revealed several paradoxical problems with the health center.

La recomposición de la elite económica Argentina entre 1976-2001

Durante el último cuarto del siglo XX, la Argentina atravesó un período de profundas modificaciones producto de la implementación de políticas neoliberales. Las elites económicas, que en gran medida avalaron y propiciaron dicha transformación, no quedaron al margen de este proceso.

El objetivo de esta ponencia es mostrar los avances de un estudio de largo alcance sobre los cambios ocurridos en las elites argentinas entre 1976 y 2001. Puntualmente, se propone realizar un análisis empírico en la reconfiguración de las elites económicas, entendiéndolas como: a) el conjunto de individuos que ocuparon altas posiciones en las grandes firmas del país y b) quienes ocuparon puestos de dirección en las principales organizaciones empresariales. Este análisis permitirá identificar criterios de semejanza y diferenciación en las trayectorias sociodemográficas y ocupacionales, configuración social, y organizacional del conjunto de la elite económica; y dar cuenta del tipo de vínculos existentes entre la dimensión económica y la dimensión estrictamente política – su forma de organización, los puntos de contactos entre los espacios de representación de intereses y las grandes empresas, los rasgos definitorios de quienes asumen el rol de representar los intereses empresarios, etc. Finalmente, el análisis empírico permite construir un conjunto de hipótesis sobre los alcances y el sentido asumido por los cambios sufridos por las elites económicas, entre otros: que la transformación del estado debilitó relativamente las formas de representación corporativa y modificó la lógica del vínculo político de la elite económica con el estado; que la apertura de la economía puso a los actores locales a jugar más abiertamente en la competencia con actores globales poderosos y esto se tradujo en una profunda recomposición de las fracciones empresarias; y que la reconfiguración de la estructura productiva cambió también el peso relativo de los empresarios individuales al interior del conjunto de las elites económicas.

Youth transitions to adulthood in a globalized world: High- school graduates itineraries in Argentina 10 years later

As a consequence of globalization and technological modernization, transitions to adulthood have suffered substantial transformations. Further on, economic crisis in different world regions produce instability and lack of confidence among youngsters. For young people, coping with uncertainty has become a way of life; also new models of reference in growth processes and social integration of new generations are being spread. In this presentation, educational itineraries of young peoples' transitions to work and adulthood will be analyzed with reference to the "Argentine" case.

Background of the presentation is a study started in 1999 within a period of deep economic crisis. Here it had been possible to identify several transition routes to adulthood. In 2008 a new follow up study entitled: "Labor market integration of high-school graduates: 10 years later" was started at FLACSO aiming at a longitudinal analysis of changes in such transition pattern. The new quantitative follow-up was performed in March 2011 on the sample of youths who graduated from high-school in 1999. The paper discusses preliminary outcomes referring to educational and labor market integration as to autonomy processes from parental homes. Moreover, it discusses opinions and attitudes related to life conditions, family situations and role distribution in such homes.

Economic crisis and elder care system in Spain

This paper shows how the economic crisis has affected the evolution of Spanish elder care system. In the last 20 years, there have been several structural changes affecting how care is provided within the Spanish Welfare System. First, the increase of elderly population has multiplied the need of long-term care. Second, the dramatic decline of male bread-winner model, from 62% (1990) to 35% (2008), has reduced the women care supply. By the end of the 90's Spanish State adopted several legislative measures to deal with the new situation. Some (Law To Promote the Reconciliation Between Family and Working Life and Law of Effective Equality Between Men and Women) were introduced with the objective of facilitating the work-life balance and increasing gender equality. Others, as "Law of Dependency" represented an important turning point because it introduced the notion of "care" as part of citizens' right and as an obligation to provide it for disabled people and old age on the part of the state. This legislative effort has built a mixed care system. In fact, public involvement in the provision of elderly care services has increased after the laws, but family strategies stills the most important ones in the provision of care. Women within the family or hired immigrant women are the main care givers in Spain nowadays. The paper will explain, through secondary data and in-deep interviews exploitation, how the economic crisis has stopped the public involvement in the provision of elderly care system. On the one hand, new legal obligation to provide care on the part of the state is being questioned. On the other, State budget cuts to elderly care programs has revived the traditional relationship between Spanish Welfare System, as secondary caregiver, and family (women), as primary caregiver.

Le féminisme islamique : Un contre-public subalterne ?

Habermas considère que la construction de l'espace public libéral a permis la distinction moderne entre le privé et le public. Ceci remonterait au processus de délibération engagé dans les salons de la classe bourgeoise européenne du 18^e siècle (Habermas, 1962). Nancy Fraser estime que ce modèle libéral n'assure pas l'égalité d'accessibilité de l'espace public. Elle identifie des groupes marginalisés et des publics concurrents. Ils représentent des contre-publics subalternes et sont en mesure de porter un discours critique revendiquant leurs identités et leurs intérêts (Fraser, 2001). Ces publics existent dès qu'il y a rencontre entre un public fort dominant et un public faible résistant (Idem.), même dans un contexte non libéral. Dans le monde arabe, si la séparation entre le privé et le public connaît une géométrie variable, l'espace public semble avoir longtemps marginalisé les groupes de femmes. Cela dit, bien que certains espaces soient profondément sexués, il n'est pas évident d'associer le paradigme binaire du public/privé à celui de masculin/féminin comme l'a conceptualisé Bourdieu (1979). Sonia Daya-Herzerbrun souligne que les femmes ont une position stratégique dans les pouvoirs locaux et que la confusion entre public et privé réside dans l'exhibition politique (Daya-Herzerbrun, 2001).

Dans le cadre de cette communication, nous questionnerons le rôle des femmes dans l'espace public. Nous choisissons comme cas de figure le féminisme islamique en tant qu'acteur politique qui traverse le privé et le public et adopte un discours sur les rapports de genre dans des termes politico-religieux. L'objectif est d'analyser comment et dans quelle mesure se construit le discours féministe islamique en tant que contre-public subalterne ? À partir des discours et d'actions d'associations de femmes au Maroc et en Égypte- qui s'inscrivent dans la démarche du féminisme islamique (Cooke, 2005), il s'agira de déterminer comment elles se positionnent dans l'arène discursive et face à l'État?

La ponencia propone una reflexión en torno a los procesos de apropiación de las Tecnologías de Información y Comunicación (TIC) por parte de los sectores populares argentinos. El trabajo se sustenta en distintas investigaciones realizadas durante los últimos años, centralmente de corte cualitativo, donde se indagan las prácticas y representaciones tecnológicas de distintos grupos socioculturales (organizaciones territoriales, mujeres desocupadas, jóvenes). Al tiempo en que se recorren las tácticas de acceso, capacitación y consumo de la computadora e Internet, se revisan críticamente ciertas nociones utilizadas frecuentemente para conceptualizar dichos procesos como, por ejemplo, las de "brecha digital" y "pobreza digital". Como conclusión, se propone un conjunto de tesis significativas a la hora de comprender la apropiación de las TIC por parte de los sectores populares.

Tic, juventud y desarrollo. La apropiación de la computadora e internet por jóvenes de sectores populares en Argentina

El trabajo analiza las distintas modalidades de apropiación tecnológica por parte de jóvenes de sectores populares urbanos que acceden a las TIC en diferentes espacios de acceso público. En tal sentido, se procura establecer la contribución de cada uno de estos espacios sobre las siguientes dimensiones de la vida cotidiana de los y las jóvenes que las utilizan: sociabilidad, educación, empleo y participación política. Desde una perspectiva cualitativa, se indagó sobre tres distintos tipos de espacio de acceso público situados en el municipio de La Matanza: 1) una iniciativa comunitaria autogestionada por una organización comunitaria (el MTD La Matanza); 2) un centro privado con fines comerciales o cibercafé; y 3) un Centro de Educación y Acceso a la Informática (CEA) impulsado y financiado por un programa Estatal y gestionado por una organización comunitaria (Asociación Civil Cirujas). El trabajo de campo que sustenta la investigación se basó en entrevistas semi-estructuradas y grupos focales con jóvenes usuarios de los espacios de acceso público, así como en la observación no participante de los mismos. Complementariamente, se realizó una encuesta de 300 casos en el Barrio La Juanita (La Matanza), con la finalidad de generalizar los hallazgos de los estudios de caso.

Leisure in relation to religion as seen from the results of a transnational empirical lifestyle research of the "visegrad countries" (HU, PL, CZ, SK)

The liturgical disciple of the Church prohibits the performance of a so called "menial work" on Sundays, and at the same time allows the "free" activity, as a pursuit not connected closely to our subsistence counts as leisure (Somfai, 1993). In our postmodern society religiosity is characterised by diversity and complexity. According to Glock and Stark (1965) religion is a compound phenomenon with five dimensions: 1. the doctrinal, 2. the intellectual, 3. the ethical-consequential, 4. the ritual, and 5. the experiential. The Institute of Applied Health Sciences and Health Promotion at the University of Szeged has studied 485 Hungarian families in the framework of a transnational empirical lifestyle research among the families of the so called Visegrad Countries (HU, PL, CZ, SK). As part of the research topics the ritual dimension of religiosity was studied through the frequency of visiting church and the experiential dimension was studied reflected by the comfort provided by faith, and leisure habits – focusing on cultural habits – were analysed among those considering themselves to be religious (76% of the sample). According to our results, the spiritual nature of faith, its inward, mental experience, as well as its manifestation in practice is a life cycle phenomenon coming into view mostly at young ages up to 25 and in ages above 66 years (20,7% / 20,0% goes to church regularly, 67,9% / 78,6% finds consolation in faith respectively). 74,4% of those regarding themselves as religious consider their leisure habits traditional, and 68,1% of them consider their cultural habits traditional. Our paper will reveal the relationship between the above issues in details.

New trends in south-South Latin American cooperation

La ponencia explora las principales tendencias de la cooperación Sur-Sur en América Latina. Dilucidamos primero las ambigüedades que encierra el propio concepto de «cooperación Sur-Sur». Presentamos sucesivamente nuestra interpretación acerca de su nuevo auge en las relaciones internacionales, evidenciando sus principales características, vínculos y diferencias con la tradicional cooperación al desarrollo Norte-Sur. Indagamos, finalmente, las tendencias que se vislumbran en América Latina a la luz de los cambios que numerosos países de la región están experimentando, los cuales tienen un reflejo directo tanto en la fisonomía de un incipiente regionalismo "posneoliberal", como en las tortuosas dinámicas de los procesos integracionistas. Nos guiamos metodológicamente utilizando los tres criterios que Alfonso Dubois (2000) ha propuesto para caracterizar cualquier forma histórica de entender y practicar la cooperación en un marco internacional: 1. El concepto de desarrollo del que se parte; 2. El contexto y las modalidades en las que se forma la relación de cooperación entre donante y receptor; 3. Los contenidos éticos que definen los objetivos del desarrollo y el grado de responsabilidad que asumen los donantes en el cumplimiento de los mismos. A contracorriente de la mayoría de los análisis que actualmente se están produciendo sobre el tema, nuestro enfoque es menos optimista respecto a los alcances y potencialidades que la cooperación Sur-Sur presenta en América Latina, debido precisamente a su relación con la espinosa cuestión del "desarrollo". Si bien en diversos casos cumple una función indudablemente positiva - especialmente en términos de reequilibrio de las relaciones internacionales e impulso a la regionalización -, enmarcada dentro de un paradigma y concepción capitalistas del desarrollo, está inevitablemente destinada a contribuir a la generación de más competencia, asimetrías, relaciones de dependencia y conflictos socio-ambientales. O, en el mejor de los casos, resultará desprovista de instrumentos para incidir significativamente sobre ellos.

Facebook: Automated structures and reflexive social practices

During the last few years, numerous journal articles aiming at discerning the impact and possible meanings of social network sites (SNS) such as Facebook and Twitter have been published. It is often argued that SNS significantly diverge from earlier forms of web communities since they are centred around the individual actor rather than themes of interest. An important aspect of these changes is that SNS allow for the construction of a public or semi-public profile through which it is possible to put on display a list of shared social connections which, in turn, makes it viable to browse the social connections of other users. Although being important aspects of SNS, these observations do not account for the automated data processing of harvested personal information that constitute the very motor of these sites. Drawing on an analysis of an extensive empirical material consisting of approximately 470 self-reflexive diary entries authored by people between the ages of 22 and 68 together with an exploration of the ways in which Facebook gathers and processes personal and interactional data in order to provide what is assumed to be an enhanced user experience, this paper aims at establishing a sociological understanding of the interrelationship between social practices and automated social structures on Facebook. This paper provides an important contribution to contemporary sociological studies of new media by relating social practices to the automated social structures that (for commercial reasons) emerge within social network sites thus rendering creative identity performances problematic.

RC13-489.2BERG, Martin (Halmstad University, martin.berg@hh.se)Interpassivity and social network subjectivity

During the last few years, a steady stream of journal articles and conference papers with the aim of discerning the impact and possible meanings of social network sites (SNS) have been published. It is often argued that SNS diverge significantly from earlier forms of web communities since they are centred around the individual actor rather than themes of interest. Although providing a solid understanding of the social dynamics surrounding identity performance and self-presentation, most researchers have not sufficiently assessed the interrelationship between the conditions of social interaction on SNS and subjectivity. Being of crucial importance for any understanding of the relationship between participatory action and identity performance, an analysis of the conditions of subjectivity illuminates fundamental social processes of importance to the general understanding of the implications of SNS. Drawing on an analysis of an extensive empirical material consisting of approximately 470 self-reflexive diary entries authored by people between the ages of 22 and 68, the purpose of this paper is to explore the changed conditions of subjectivity on SNS by addressing two interrelated themes. First, this paper aims at understanding the possible implications of the fact that social and symbolic content increasingly becomes delivered to the individual through personalised feeds, thus invigorating a state of interpassivity through which the social network acts on its own behalf. Secondly, this paper strives at understanding what it means that other individuals occupy a salient role in the individual self-presentation. In what ways does this state of affairs affect the processes through which individual subjectivity is continuously enabled and negotiated? This paper explores crucial aspects of the social and interactional terrain of SNS thus attempting to provide a theoretical and conceptual apparatus, mainly by the concepts interpassivity and social network subjectivity, that can further strengthen research on SNS.

RC09-37.1BERITAN, Saim Can (John Jay College, City University of New York, sberitan@yahoo.com)The transposition of the public sphere: From public space to cyberspace

The notion of public sphere has been attracting the attention of the sociology discipline since the 1960s. In the Turkish case, the notion of public sphere became salient after 1980 and primarily in relation to the question of Muslim headscarf. The question was so central to Turkish politics even in early 2000s that the country's previous President would not invite the Prime Minister's wife to the ceremonial events in the "official public sphere."

What is public sphere? This concept can be seen as simply the non-private space in the general sense. But it is in fact a very contentious notion as most social scientists would testify. Its meaning changes according to time, place, and society. Today the term has gained new meaning and it is to be transformed into a radically new form that is politically significant. My paper examines the transposition process of the public sphere. I will begin with an Arendtian perspective and discuss the views of Habermas, Sennet and Sassen respectively. Besides I will address to questions of democracy in the context of the public sphere in Turkey.

I argue that the cyberspace is replacing conventional public sphere with the advent of Twitter and Facebook. I will draw attention to the power of social networks more as new efficient spheres in relation to the Tahrir Square democratic revolution in Egypt.

This paper outlines selected theoretical and practical approaches of anthropology to the study of narrative, social memory and ritual practice, and offers an example from the Japanese context. Unlike sociology that uses quantitative methods, anthropology is based on field research in which participant observation and the collection and interpretation of narratives are central methodological concerns. When one is dealing with the analysis of social memory and ritual practice, one is presented with the difficulty of interpreting others' interpretations of symbols in relation to the form and meaning of ritual acts. As ritual may change despite its conservative imagination as a repository of cultural knowledge practices, there is the danger of dehistoricizing the referential tools for a grounded understanding in society and culture—namely, ritual form and its range of meanings. Anthropological approaches suggest that a focus on narrative is key to any analysis of longitudinal change in the form and meaning of ritual acts, whose evolving interpretations, both within the community and beyond, are deeply implicated in the construction of social memory. This paper presents one case study from the Shinto community (Japan).

RC22-152.4BERNARD, Rosemarie (Waseda University, rosemarie_bernard@hotmail.com)Shinto, environmentalism and informal diplomacy

This paper addresses the issue of how religious groups are engaged effectively in informal diplomacy in the era of the globalization of Asian religions. It considers the history of Shinto, Japan's nativist religion, in contemporary environmentalist and indigenist politics in the world beyond Japan's borders. A particular case is explored in detail: that of the activities of Shintoists among the Inuit people of Nunavut in Canada since the late 1990s. The Shinto community in Japan, burdened by the legacy of its wartime support for the cult of emperorship, has actively promoted itself as a "green" religion, something which it sees itself as having in common with the aboriginal peoples of the Americas. In this spirit, it has actively sought out links with native groups and has sent delegations to meet with their leaders overseas. In these meetings, shared customs (ancestor worship, for example) have been promoted as environmentalist and history conscious. In this process a global "nativist" and "green" cosmopolitan religious identity is created, that overrides national boundaries or cultural and linguistic difference. At issue is how a religious organization, that has identified with the nation-state, can be involved in informal diplomatic activities that promote instead international cooperation for the sake of both nostalgic cultural recuperation and the critique of capitalism and individualism.

Cultural diversity and journalism in Canada

In its 2009 report on migratory perspectives, OECD wrote that international movements to its country members have considerably increased in the last two decades. Thus, populations of those host countries are more and more diversified. For example, in 1984, there was 88 276 immigrants in Canada and 24 years later they were 247 243. Among others, the increase of immigration and the diversification of populations affect the media sphere. In particular, researchers observed impacts on the representation of immigrants in media contents. We think that productions and practices of professionals of media are also affected since more and more immigrants work in that sphere. Who are those actors of media? What is their journey and how did they induct the media sphere. Did they innovate and have new practices? Do they produce different messages and points of view? These are the questions a research on the media sphere in Quebec and on its actors is actually investigating. Methodology of this research uses a qualitative approach. The study includes interviews, content and documentary analysis. For instance, media productions are analysed, as well as biographies and rewards. In-depth interviews with immigrants working on media are also conducted. This paper presents a review of literature on the subject and preliminary results. In particular, the case of journalist immigrants is discussed here. Results show differences in productions and practices depending on the country of origin and generation of immigrants.

City building at the periphery of metropolitan Buenos Aires: Local community, political leadership and state intervention

In a context of selective metropolitanization and urban segmentation, the steady growing of big cities brings about the unequal provision of public services. While in the better-off sectors of the city public services are provided through "standard" channels (i.e. state intervention or market access), in the poorest quarters that provision is usually left in the hands of the local community. Based upon the study of a favela in Metropolitan Buenos Aires, this paper examines how poor people solve the access to essential public services.

As local efforts need to be complemented with outside inputs (e.g. running water can only be furnished by the sanitation company), we contend that local capacity to secure urban services in a periphery neighborhood depends a great deal on political leadership and brokerage. We both focus on the importance of local leadership and deny the absence-of-the-state thesis. This paper shows how "non-standard" state intervention and local leadership combine and reinforce each other, and in doing so nourish the profusion of competing neighborhood organizations that undertake on their own the building of the city.

Regulating financial markets with financial knowledge

Knowledge produced in financial markets is not only used by market actors themselves, but also by financial market regulators, like the US Securities and Exchange Commission or the European Commission. One example for the use of financial knowledge in regulations are credit ratings produced by rating agencies like Standard&Poor's and Moody's. Credit ratings have been used in many regulations to set minimum capital requirements for banks, or regulate institutional investors and other financial market actors. Since the harsh criticism of rating agencies that followed the financial crisis, the US and the European Union have started massive financial regulatory reforms concerning the role of rating agencies and their credit ratings. In this paper I argue that these reforms, while aiming at preventing conflict of interests, fraud, and other criminal behavior of rating agencies, focus too much on the individual rating agency. The reforms neglect more systematic problems, like differing and competing rating methodologies and assumptions within rating agencies, or contradictions between their First Amendment protection and the regulatory use of ratings. Using comments on proposed rules and interviews with credit rating analysts and other experts, this paper addresses these issues and raises questions concerning the outsourcing of regulatory power to financial market actors.

The distinction between risk and uncertainty among credit rating analysts

The idea that risk can be calculated is central to financial markets. The overwhelming amount of available financial data and ever more sophisticated mathematical models to process the information seem to make the transformation from uncertainty into risk feasible and unproblematic. Since the 1980ies, credit rating agencies have used more and more of these models to transform the assessment of creditworthiness from a simple ordinal evaluation scale (from AAA to D) to a calculated probability of default risk. Since the crisis however, rating agencies have replied to criticism by claiming that they only give simple "opinions", not probabilities of default. They often emphasize the "qualitative" or judgmental aspect of credit ratings and rebut the idea that they calculate the risk of default.

Using semi-structured interviews, I show how credit rating analysts themselves deal with this tension between officially declaring ratings as "opinions" and their highly sophisticated rating methodologies and practices. Two narratives can be extracted from the interviews conducted. Some analysts explicitly make a distinction between risk and uncertainty. They argue that there will always be a certain amount uncertainty that cannot be transformed into risk. Accordingly, their ideas to improve the rating process is to make it even more "qualitative" and less dependent on sophisticated financial mathematics. Others, especially analysts from smaller rating agencies suggest that it is exactly this qualitative aspect in the methodology of the big rating agencies that produces uncertainty, while their own – more stochastic and feedback sensitive – methods can calculate the risk of future default of financial products accurately.

The research project and academic careers

The "research project" has become a widespread form of financing and coordinating research activities. This is not only true for the natural sciences, but also for the social sciences and even the humanities. The institutionalization of project work transforms the practice of research, which no longer takes place as a "freely roaming" activity guided by the interests of the scientists, but as a sequence of clearly defined tasks delineated by deadlines and milestones. In this context, one may ask: do projects change academic careers as well? The hypothesis is that they are relevant in different respects: 1. Projects require new competences. As projects should be carefully planned and monitored, researchers must be able to behave as managers. Moreover, in order to obtain project grants, it is necessary to have the ability of translating complex findings into convincing statements. 2. Projects also influence scientific reputation, which no longer relies exclusively on publications, but also on project funds obtained. 3. At the beginning of academic careers, projects provide more people the chance to engage in research activities and be socialized in science practices in an early phase. Later on, projects allow more experienced researchers to obtain funds to engage in autonomous research on specific issues. 4. Since project planning and financing require time, the number of academic positions with managerial and administrative tasks increase in both universities and funding organizations.

Under certain circumstances, project work opens up new opportunities and scientists become an autonomous "self-entrepreneurial" workforce. In other cases, researchers experience these new arrangements as a burden, e.g., researchers who collaborate in many different projects over the years require a good deal of flexibility to adapt to the different project aims. This can be very onerous and entails the risk of losing a specific disciplinary profile as a scientist.

Transforming risks into moral issues in organizations

Management systems seeking to forecast and/or contain risks are prolific in organizations. However, there is another way to deal with risks: to transform them into moral issues. Instead of calculating possible courses of action and deriving subsequent measures, organizations call on the responsibility and diligence of their members to abate risks. This can be seen, for example, in cases where technological failure is attributed to the incorrect behaviour of employees (Perrow 1987). The implicit assumption is that if organizational members behave in a morally correct way, risks can be avoided.

This is often considered a problem because when they recur to morality, organizations avoid the search for systemic deficiencies in structures or in decision-making processes and therefore renounce efforts which could lead to their own improvement (Ortmann 2009). This contribution examines from a sociological perspective how, in uncertain situations characterised by conflicts and divergent opinions about specific technical questions, moral communication can become a functional manner of dealing with risks. By identifying and sanctioning scapegoats, organizations can display themselves as moral actors and acquire the internal and external backing necessary to continue operating. This is vital in the short term, but can be dangerous over time, because morality sets high expectations but gives little specific advice for action in complex systems.

Signing up for an early clinical trial: How important is the physician-patient relationship in the patient's choice?

A precondition of any clinical trial in the biomedical area is the signature of the informed consent form by the patient. Through his signature, the patient engages in a mixed process of treatment and research. The specificity of early phase trials is to recruit therapeutic failure patients usually looking for the yet unestablished efficacy of a new drug while these trials relates to its toxicity. We consequently expect the patient's decision to join the trial to be the result of his perception of the situation, that is an overvaluation of therapeutic effects. Our work aims to shed some light on to what extent the physician-patient relationship, as a generative factor of the patient's perception, is involved in the production of the rules enlisted by the patient during the face-to-face signature consultation.

We investigate this issue through the case of a French research unit devoted to the early clinical trials in oncology, with observations during patients' inclusion consultations and semi-structured interviews both with patients and their regular physician. In this research unit, the patient undergoes a double-break: he leaves his regular physician for a new one and moves from a cure-oriented process to a research program. This double-break allows an observation window of patient's self-presentation during the signature consultation. Those observations induce a natural analysis in terms of micro-sociology by using Goffman's symbolic interactionism and Becker's perspective on learning and social control.

This research, carried out with an interactionist approach, mainly will have two degrees of results. First, it will clarify what appears as a form of social control – the physician-patient relationship – in the face-to-face interaction of the signature. Second, it will be an empirical contribution to the analysis about free consent, often left to philosophers and bioethicists.

Inside the black box: College graduation and civic engagement

Scholars agree that college graduation is positively associated with civic engagement. They are less certain about why. College graduates are more likely to grow up in advantaged households and have higher household income and access to social capital after graduation than non-graduates. These pre and post college factors are positively related to civic engagement. However, some suggest that college itself encourages graduates to be more involved. The goal of this study was to compare the pre college, college and post college predictors of civic engagement using data from surveys of over 5,000 alumni of a large U.S. public university. Results show that college extracurricular activities and discipline studied in college, and post college social capital are the most important predictors of graduates' civic engagement. These findings help explain why college graduates are more involved, advance social capital theory, and suggest strategies for increasing civic engagement.

La desaparición de investigadores en la CNEA durante la última dictadura cívico-militar

En este trabajo, continuando con las líneas de investigación entorno a las consecuencias negativas que la última dictadura militar en Argentina generó sobre las condiciones de trabajo por tratarse de un plan sistemático de modificación del sistema sindical de la época así como la cultura sindical de la Argentina entre 1974 y 1983, se busca indagar acerca de la repercusión en el ámbito de los organismos de ciencia y la tecnología. En ese sentido, el caso de la CNEA resulta paradigmático por varios motivos. En primer lugar, se trataba de un organismo que desde su génesis tuvo una enorme importancia estratégica; en segundo lugar, cuando se produce el golpe militar sus autoridades pasan a ser miembros de las fuerzas armadas; en tercer lugar, durante el período mencionado se producen la desaparición forzosa de varios de sus investigadores. A partir de lo mencionado, consideramos importante interrogar acerca de la violencia laboral dentro de esta institución que alcanzó la cúspide con la comisión de delitos de lesa humanidad. Por otra parte, consideramos relevante incorporar nuevas categorías de análisis vinculadas con la ciencia y el trabajo. Cuando hablamos de científicos e ingenieros también hablamos de trabajadores de la ciencia, y en tanto tales éstos y aquéllos no están inmunes a la violencia laboral y menos aquella que se llevó a cabo de manera sistemática en el seno del terrorismo de estado.

The uniqueness in the patterns of Latin American happiness

Although seldom explicitly, the majority of global studies of happiness show that Latin America is an exceptional case. The region denotes higher levels of happiness than Western Europe and the United States; however, Latin America has lower per capita GDP, higher levels of poverty, worse education, weaker political institutions and a poorer health system. In this context, the question arises: what are the factors that explain the abundant happiness in Latin America, those that allow satisfaction with life despite the low objective indicators of quality of life?

This presentation explores the uniqueness in the patterns of Latin American happiness. The evidence that pertain to Latin America as a special region in terms of their levels of happiness is first classified, providing new data and explanatory maps. Then, the differences in the determinants or correlates of happiness that the region has in contrast with Western Europe and the United States are explored. These differences would explain the seemingly strange situation in Latin America, because factors like money, health and appreciation for the institutions in this region have a different impact, allowing happiness in a situation of apparent low quality of life.

To understand and explain the uniqueness of these patterns, social data and cultural literature are used. Here social relations appear as an essential explanatory factor: they are a key for understanding the unique effect that in Latin America have money, health and appreciation of the institutions.

Note: This presentation is based on two studies on the subject. First, the thesis "The impact of social context on individual determinants of happiness" (available in Spanish). Second, the article "The uniqueness in the patterns of Latin American happiness" in preparation for the book "Happiness Research in Latin America" to be published by Springer in 2012.

Cronies in gendered practices in the hey-day of globalization and new technology

Information and Communication Technologies (ICTs) as the most important catalyst in the process of globalization has generated enthusiastic anticipation that they will empower women by transforming gender relations while eradicating gender inequalities. The purpose of this Sociological reflection is to debunk the myth of 'gender neutrality' in the halcyon days of globalization, that digital technology is pure and unbiased and hence free from any gendered implication. Judy Wajcman points out that the mutability of gender discourses in the virtual world is severely inhibited by the 'visceral, lived relations of the material world'. Even Second Life, a virtual online world with over two million registration and recognized as champion of anti-establishment values is major source of virtual pornography. The paper demonstrates that the global communication network, within the process of capitalist globalization, has emerged as a sort of global marketplace for selling and buying of commodities --- human bodies, their parts or images of both women and children. The Internet has grown into an inviting medium as a marketplace for sexual partners and pornographic goods and services of every conceivable kind.

The study, thus questions the disembodied character, neutrality and gender blindness of cyberspace. It unfolds the deeper point of making women's bodies as the target for commodification and female body parts subject to a virtual panoptican gendered gaze, and therefore, continually re-erecting a new-fangled gendering process through ICTs in the zenith of Globalization. The massive literature on both Globalization and ICTs paid only scanty attention to this particular gendering of new technology and thus, hopes for gender-neutral democratization of science and technology remains a pipe dream. The paper is premised upon feminist post colonial perspective(s) which indubitably rejects widely assumed neutrality of male relations/technological practices, and successfully unveils the hidden power relations underlying technological knowledge and skill.

Postcolonial studies is most usually associated with the triumvirate of Edward W. Said, Gayatri Spivak, and Homi K. Bhabha, although contributors to the field both pre-date these theorists and are disciplinarily more diverse. While postcolonial studies can be seen to have emerged within the humanities, more recently it has begun to influence the disciplines of the social sciences, particularly sociology. Decoloniality is the name given to a similar movement emerging in Latin America and focused, in particular, on the experiences of this continent in the context of understanding modernity. This presentation addresses both developments and seeks to examine the productive tensions between them.

Yoga--- An universal spiritual leisure value

Yoga is as timeless and ageless as life itself. It is a way of life so to say as a style of living. India is the holy land of the genesis of this science. Yogic culture and spiritual values are the principal reasons why the western and other non-Indian cultures are so attracted towards India. Westerners are not only attracted to yoga but they are also deriving the maximum benefits out of it. India has a plethora of various cultural and spiritual practices that have empowered mankind to face the challenges of the modern world.

Leisure can be understood as the time utilized fruitfully which is non-remunerative but which energises us by regular practice and thus equips us to straddle both the material and spiritual realms effectively. The world is slowly awakening to the fact that the human body needs its moments of relaxation and nothingness to come back revitalized. The umpteen opportunities and options available to people to relax their mind and body can be understood by the sheer variety of gyms, ayurvedic retreats, spas etc. Yoga seems to be the only indispensable, cheaply available and permanent ashram of learning. Though Yoga originated in India, it has been popularized by the West by innovating it and marketing it under brand names like Power Yoga, Hot Yoga. It is interesting to note how our basic human values like Truth, Non-violence, Peace etc are incorporated as Yogic Niyamas and and it is these Niyamas alongwith Yamas that govern our life patterns.

This paper makes an attempt at understanding Yoga as a leisure -time activity which not only reflects the cultural and ideological values but also has a great impact on human life in modern times.

Constitution of youth in fast food culture: An inquiry into global-local dynamics in contemporary India

It is intriguing that subsequent to the arrival in India of global corporation McDonald's, fast food bespeaks a culture hitherto referred to as 'fast food culture'. This culture strikes a relationship of identity with young people, via media advertisements, promotional campaigns, restaurant practices and eating practices. These young people comprise boys and girls who are student-customers as well as part-time employees. Interestingly, while this characteristic of fast food culture makes it a target of vandalism at the hands of Hindu Right activists, young people have taken to it enthusiastically.

This innovation attributable to McDonald's has been adopted by popular indigenous eateries as also by coffee chains leading to the creation of a youth-centric fast food cultural context which is global-local.

Predicated on a democratic work environment as also on relationships of friendship prognosticating romance, the distinctive way of life fashioned for youngsters is decidedly modern. This development signals the advent of a distinct life-course category ---youth---identified with a distinctive way of life in spheres of work and pleasure.

I hold that it is imperative to investigate the role assigned to youth in the structure of modernity purveyed by McDonald's. Against the backdrop of the demographic dominance of young people is demography in the service of a politics of a consumerist culture?

However, notable is the fraught relationship between this politics and prevailing gendered cultural norms about growing up, working and career choices which are governed by caste, class and familial aspirations.

I hold that the contemporary India is in the throes of a global-local dynamics; and this provides an occasion to capture the constitution of youth at this juncture. It goes without saying that such a constitution offer analytical views into important theoretical questions.

Eating out and the lifecourse: Childhood in globalizing India

The arrival in India of global fast food corporation McDonald's is a harbinger of a global fast-food culture. A distinctive feature of this culture manifested in products (Happy Meal, toys), advertising, promotional events, restaurant practices (birthday parties, Roland McDonald shows, rewards for performance at school) and restaurant presentations (play areas, child-chairs) is that it puts the spotlight on children.

My doctoral study of fast food eating practices in New Delhi, India, post-liberalization of the economy, sheds light on how these child-centred practices instituted by McDonald's have caught on with Nirula's--a popular indigenous fast-food eatery I investigated, as well as several others I observed. Whereby, it is imperative to recognize that, without encountering any social or political resistance, this child-centric fast food cultural context has expanded. Its unqualified acceptance and warm reception by the consumers is self-evident in practices such as treating children, rewarding children, celebrating birthday parties and participating in Roland McDonald Shows. Thus, the expansion as well as the popularity of this culture compels us to treat it as a global-local context.

I hold that this development provides an occasion to examine the contours of childhood in contemporary India. My contention is that contemporary childhood is constituted amidst a global-local dynamic that is played out in the fast food cultural context.

This paper demonstrates how contemporary childhood is ridden with conflicts and contradictions. On the one hand, it is a phase of play; while on the other hand, it is fraught with pressures of schooling and excelling.

This observation points to the salient aspects of the contours of this childhood viz. a pivotal role in class formation; gendered politics and transgression.

Child labour in India: Role of state and NGOs in protection of rights of children

Childhood is the most innocent phase of any individual. Every child deserves healthy and normal childhood. But for many children, the reality of childhood is altogether different as they are employed as labour and their childhood is disturbed. There are 250 million child labour according to UNICEF estimation. The UN and ILO consider child labour as exploitative. The UN Convention on the Rights of child considers that 'states parties recognize the right of the child to be protected from economic exploitation and from performing any work that is likely to be hazardous or to interfere with the child's education, or to be harmful to the child's health or physical, mental, spiritual, moral or social development'.

Child labour is one of the very crucial issues currently confronting India and many other South-Asian countries. According to 2001 Census, India had close to 13 million child labour. Children work for long hours with small wages and are more docile and easier to manage than adults. As a consequence, large number of children lacking in skills and education, grow up as unskilled workers. With no access to quality education, millions of children are left to work, often in dangerous and exploitative conditions. The poverty of the family and lack of education are the most significant factors of child labour. The attempt has been made in the paper to examine the demography of child labour, impact of poverty on child labour and child schooling. It also identifies the rights of children and the initiatives taken by state authorities and NGOs for the protection of the rights of children.

Social representation of water and ecological paradigms in urban cultures of Argentina and Brazil

This paper examines the social representations of water in selected urban cultures of Argentina and Brazil. Some questions have guided this investigation. What is water for the urban dweller? What are the actions that a citizen is willing to exercise?

We developed a methodological triangulation (qualitative- quantitative) with the aim to broaden the understanding of the social representation of water and the environmental paradigms of the selected urban cultures.

A qualitative research with an exploratory descriptive design was initially conducted in two cities of Argentina—Gualeguaychú (Entre Ríos Province) and Buenos Aires—to detect the social constructions the inhabitants developed about water. We selected a single case study with multiple units of analysis (according to Yin's case analysis methodology) as we were looking for a holistic, in-depth investigation of the potential mechanisms of social commitment.

The preliminary study conducted in Argentina helped review the empirical dimensions of the typology of ecological paradigms (Dunlap and Van Liere) and the new versions of that theoretical construction of the human-nature relationship.

After three qualitative rounds we conducted a quantitative research with a sample of 800 citizens of Buenos Aires.

The study was replicated in the city of Salvador (Brazil) with a sample of 419 people. The comparative research offers interesting insights of the ecological values, beliefs and conducts from the Latin American culture points of view.

Certain variables of the old and the new paradigms appeared in the same person at different points of the conversation. However, the dominant paradigm in terms of ideas and beliefs concerning water was the ecocentric model.

The quantitative research showed the weakness of the citizens' self-control concerning water conservation. Up to this moment our results are similar to other studies, meaning that the diffusion of environmental values and beliefs has not crystallized in a stable process of pro environmental behaviors.

Crisis, alienation and self-management praxis

In the contemporary context of mutation of the capitalist system and its socio-metabolism in times of crisis, centers as the U.S. and the European Union, register high remarkable destructiveness phenomena in the world of work and subordination of everyday life. This work proposes, in contrast, to analyze the experiences and actually self-managed labor movements in Argentina comprising -hologramatically- these practices as possible resistance laboratory in front of alienation and social modulations imposed by the neoliberal hegemony.

Beyond the local character of the same, may be indicated by hypotheses, these alternative essays alternative host operating characteristics as resistance to friction between labor and capital, and place under discussion in their own daily practice the alienating the buying and the selling of force work, even if this relationship is mediated by the market and their endless demands of subordination. From this perspective, theoretically and empirically will focus on three relevant dimensions of self-managed work conflict that make for the reappropriation of the collective, for the recovery of the production process and the aggregation and subjectivity of knowledge.

These dynamics shape the processes of change against the destructiveness generated by today's capitalism and connote the tensions of the split social subject, estranged from its being generic and alienated of biopolitical power. The singularity of this research proposal is developed with a co-research methodology, which epistemic practice includes workers participation as a condition of dialogical creation of knowledge. Consequently, it is placed in question the potential of these processes and their intellectual innovations that help to reverse the above processes destructiveness, as well as to incorporate comprehensive approaches with the emerging contributions of Latin American critical thought.

The quality of social-health services and the role of social activism in Tuscany

The Associations for Social Advancement (ASAs), instituted in Italy with the law no. 383/2000, have their own specificity, in terms of advocacy, within the Third Sector, in relation to their specific activity of social intervention on behalf of the collective population in various sectors, among which the social-health sector.

Because of this formal recognition, the ASAs have taken on an increasingly relevant role in the current mix of welfare services as well as in governance of social-health, assuming in some cases as citizen/users representatives, like in Tuscany. With the emergence of the public health consortium called "Società della Salute" (SdS) that is, from 2008 (law no. 80), the ordinary form of management and programming of the regional social-health system, Tuscany intended to propose a redistribution of powers among the different actors in the field – the medical profession, the state, the health-industrial complex, the citizen/users (Light, 1995) – to orient the Priority Setting to the citizens' needs and to improve the quality of services.

Our paper critically considers this configuration through an analysis of the role of ASAs in the governance of SdS (Contandriopoulos, 2004) and of the "type" and "level" of ties between these associations and the local community in connection with an evaluation of the ASAs' management of power, through the category of gender.

The analysis has led to highlight as too often the APS play a role that is almost completely autonomous from the local community, in that they tend to represent yet a further pole of attraction of power within the "field", transforming the tetrahedron of Light into a hexahedron, in which the portion of power gained by the ASAs is subtracted from the other actors; and how this trend is in inverse relation to the active participation of women in the ASAs' management (Biancheri, 2000).

Stereotypes about fathers and family planning

Analysis of parents' roles may be derived from diverse theoretical approaches operating in the field of human reproduction. They can be categorized as the evolutionary-biological, theory of rational choice, social norms and value of the child approaches. Our own stance is mainly drawing from social norm approach, stressing the importance of parental stereotypes.

Data from a pilot study (4 "task" focus-group discussions: 2 male, 2 female, aged 25-32, with a play-role instruction to simulate family-planning negotiation between two engaged partners) confirm the importance of stereotypes – mainly about men's untrustworthiness. Paradoxically, women on the one hand feel limited by expectations that they should have dominant responsibility for childrearing, on the other hand they reproduce and foster negative stereotypes consisting of assumptions that man: (1) excuse from conceiving a child because of feeling not prepared/mature for fatherhood, (2) prefer enjoying life and seek work-fulfilment, and (3) are unreliable and threaten the family by leaving the women with full responsibility for offspring. All these components may serve women (a) as a base for hesitation to found a family and reproduce, and (b) to raise the value of marital status as compared to alternative forms of unions.

Our data also suggest that there is an important challenge to the above described stereotypes: participants-fathers who actively reflect their own responsibility/commitment in family, reproduction and childcare and behave according to it, were highlighting the value of the child. Moreover, these men actively question the overall distribution of the negative stereotypes about men in general. Deconstruction of the negative stereotype about men's fatherhood potential may be a key element in pursuing a sustainable reproduction. These preliminary findings are further explored on a broader sample consisting of ten focus groups, where the different perspectives of women and men are compared.

Thus, as a result of social and spatial ruptures which has been produced in the city during the process, some of the low income communities have been threatened, and others have been evicted during the implementation of the facilities linked to the mega-events.

This paper deals with a case in the Vila Autódromo community, located in Jacarepaguá region in Rio de Janeiro, which, since 2007, under different justifications, is at risk of being dislodged.

The main objective here is to present part of the building process of what has been called as "conflictual planning" as an instrument to support the Vila Autódromo community struggle in order to avoid to be evicted. In order to achieve that, we recover part of their struggle history, which has lasted approximately 30 years, focusing the different positions that have been taken by different social actors involved in the conflicts related to the right of staying in the land they live.

Considering the main demands of the community involved in the process, a group of students and researchers from two federal Brazilian universities expanded the collective resistance, exercising a way of planning that combines different kinds of knowledge aiming at a popular project that could effectively represent an important tool for their struggle.

This case study is particularly important due to its symbolic and political dimensions in the dispute among conflicting city projects.

Diversity and homogeneity: Reflecting on the production of housing

Popular settlements are heterogeneous environments where a pre-modern way of life has lived alongside advanced technology. Such settlements have encompassed a wide range of families from different social profiles which, in turn, have developed different roles in the community. The needs and interests of these families can also be opposed to the interests of rest of the community. However, examining the public housing stock for low income people has not pointed out the same diversity that we find inside the community. This paper argues that as housing project solutions have been repeatedly standardized, they have not solved the needs required by the social diversity of the communities for which they were designed. The study focuses on examples of regional municipalities in projects to remove families located in areas threatened by any kind of environmental risk. The two cases here studied suggest that in order to reduce costs, the houses offered for these low-income families tend to be homogenized, not responding to their needs, and often do not maintain any correspondence with their previous living space. The main characteristics of residents and the built environment of popular settlements will be examined in comparison with the proposals for new homes offered to eliminate the risk situations. This paper tries to provide inputs for the treatment of working class housing, deepening the knowledge about the self-produced and informal spaces of this social group, and also a critical view of current housing production for low income populations in the state of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. The data here presented is part of the findings of a research projects developed by the Núcleo de Estudos e Projetos Habitacionais e Urbanos da Universidade Federal Fluminense, Niterói, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, which has had as its main role the provision of technical assistance to social urban movements.

Why are we doing it? Negotiating expectations in the PV process

One of the most recurring strengths attributed to the use of Participatory Video is its ability to enable social change, advocacy, activism and empowerment. Yet, to what extent is this a joint vision of all parties involved in the PV process? Why do researchers and participants do Participatory Video? What are their differential motivations and how does this affect decision-making during the PV process? In this paper, we reflect on these questions through discussing PV experiences of research carried out by the authors in collaboration with indigenous communities in the North Rupununi, Guyana and in Tumucumaque, Brazil. PV formed part of a project involving local communities, local, national and international civil society organisations and academic researchers. We evaluate the different perceptions and distinct worldviews of the individuals, groups and organisations involved in the PV process, and attempt to trace these to decisions made during various stages of the PV process, from training to film editing. We conclude that a significant component of the PV process needs to include the iterative surfacing of individual motivations and worldviews using an adaptive research approach. This helps to negotiate expectations of all researchers and participants at different stages of the PV, enabling greater outcomes for all participants, while at the same time producing more nuanced and grounded academic research.

Social aspects of sustainable progress

The report by the Stiglitz Commission on the Measurement of Economic Performance and Social Progress highlighted the idea that sustainability in essence is about quality of life. This presentation discusses and elaborates this notion. It argues that sustainable development should be seen as a process which does not focus on economic development alone, but which also includes well-balanced ecological and social development. Social aspects of sustainability deserve attention because of their instrumental and intrinsic relevance. A society needs a sense of community and commitment. The presence of social capital is very important for the liveability of a society. It is argued that the amount of social capital may fluctuate over time. This means that in the long term, future societies may be better in a social respect (more trust, more participation, less inequality) than today's. Ensuring social sustainability is thus not only a matter of ensuring that present social cohesion is preserved, but also ensuring that this cohesion will increase or improve. The presentation ends by addressing lines of research on social sustainability. The following research themes are mentioned: (1) Quality of life, social capital and social cohesion in a longitudinal perspective. (2) 'Sustainability of what, why and for whom?' Sustainability as an issue of choice: trade-offs. (3) Civil society and governance aspects of sustainability. (4) Public perceptions, values and opinions with regard to sustainability issues and (5) Fairness and inequality in relation to sustainability policy, both nationally and internationally.

The impact of new intimate relationships in later life on social and filial relationships

Lots of prior social gerontological research has focused on filial relations in informal care as well as the impact of widowhood on social relationships in later life. In this paper we instead ask how a new intimate relationship in later life effect relationships with children, relatives and friends. In particular we focus on the effects that a new intimate partner in later life has on filial, social and care obligations. To answer these questions, qualitative interviews were conducted with a strategical sample of 28 Swedes, 63–91 years, who had established a new intimate relationship after the age of 60 (or who are dating). We found that the respondents describe changes over their life-time in what we conceptualize as the 'relationship chain' – a hierarchy in social and care responsibilities – where the new partner in established relations steps in at the very front of the chain. This is positively perceived by the informants, who recurrently describe their partners as a resource for their own autonomy as well as that of their children, relatives and friends.

Time as a structuring condition behind new intimate relationships in later life

Mobility in and out of intimate relationships has become more common in late modern societies also in later life. However, it has been a neglected issue in social gerontology and sociological studies on ageing. In this paper the research questions are: What characterizes the formation of new intimate relationships in later life? Are there any specific, more or less universal, conditions that separate them from relationships in earlier life phases? Qualitative interviews was used with a strategical sampel, consisting of 28 Swedes, 63–91 years, who have established a new intimate heterosexual relationship after the age of 60 or who are dating. The results showed Time constituting a central structuring condition for new intimate relationships in later life. In the results three aspects of time – Available free time, Lived time and Remaining time – which all have a constituting and an important formative power on new late in life relationships are discussed in relation to theories of late modernity and the Third Age and in relation to changing demographical conditions.

Mapping Quebecois sexual nationalism at times of "crisis of multi-cultural accommodation"

The language of gender equality and sexual emancipation has become increasingly pivotal to western citizenship and migrant integration debates, giving rise to a new brand of nationalism in which women's rights and gay and lesbian rights are construed as the core civilizational values of the West, while migrant communities, particularly Muslims, are cast as threatening them. Operating through a re-configured Orientalism and the rhetorics and politics of "clash of civilizations", this incorporation has serious national and international consequences and constitutes a new inflection of racism in an era boisterously asserted as committed to diversity though anti-multiculturalist and post-racial. Yet, such enrolment also needs to be read in its connections with neoliberalism, which links biopolitics to geopolitics (Grewal 2005) and has made an array of social movements, such as feminism and gay and lesbian movement, marketable. Expanding on this critical framework inspired by postcolonial feminist and queer anti-racist writings, this paper uncovers the ways in which gender and sexuality have become a key mode through which technologies of governmentality have come into existence via doxic frames and assumptions pertaining to "secularism", "modernity", "sexual freedom", "human rights" and "feminism versus multiculturalism". The context of this inquiry is the recent Quebecois debate over "reasonable accommodations" which concerns the extent to which minority religious accommodation should be practiced.

Crisis, public debt and financialization of the Brazilian economy

Departing from the global context of substitution of liberal Keynesian ideology by the monetarist neoliberal one, the text tackles crisis phenomena and capitalist reconstruction which contributed to the financialization of the Brazilian economy. Our hypothesis is that such a process occurred in a context of socioeconomic reorganization, in which the state's role was fundamental, despite the neoliberal discourse sidelined by the intention to restore the level of wealth to classes whose incomes were reduced by welfare policies. In Brazil the neoliberal ideology and its monetarist logic started to become consolidated in the middle of the 1990s, with the Real Plan as its main landmark. Besides inflation control, that plan aimed to ensure Brazil as destination of financial global capital which was suffering from few investment possibilities. To do so, besides measures aiming for status as market economy, Brazil started to attract short-term capital through inflating interest rates to among the highest in the world. Reproducing the historical connection between capitalism and state, financial expansion of the Brazilian economy also occurred under this association in which public debt was the great engine of the process. If on one hand Brazilian public debt is not too high amongst the main world economies, on the other hand, interest expenditure is the country's second greatest expense, beaten only by public pension expenses. It is in this point—besides the crises that tend to be catastrophic for the poorest—that fictitious economy reveals its concrete face. If public debt is not concrete in a strict economic meaning—production of value—it is concrete in its capacity to impose material restrictions to large social segments. Finally, another effect of the substitution of ideologies was moving the old polarization 'capitalism versus socialism' into another polarization within the former. Hence, neoliberalism was actually a conservative revolution inside capitalism.

Reforming the welfare states in new growth economies and mature welfare states

Welfare states are being reinvented in some of the new "growth societies". And they are being reformed in the old welfare states. The pressures for reinvention and reform are the same forces of globalization, demography and cost increases, although they work in opposite ways in the two different, contemporary groups of societies.

The new growth economies are in a sense 'pre-modern': individuals are still not liberated from their traditional, local and/or family backgrounds, and societal institutions remain to some degree undifferentiated. In those societies, the challenge of providing for the daily needs of individuals is being met by institution-building: new groups of actors are being empowered in connection with institutional reform and process optimization. This is a costly process, stressing the fiscal capacities of the political economy.

The old welfare states are 'post-modernizing' - industrial structures are morphing into a service and knowledge society, and cost pressures are escalating. In those societies, New Public Management has been applied to combat those cost pressures for two decades; efficiency has improved, but the fiscal squeeze remains. In several quarters, the idea of finding innovative means to handle these pressures, has grasped some of the policy makers. Searching for new ways of organizing services is commonplace, but a new trend is to deliberately look for "radical innovation" instead of optimizing tools and processes, a radical innovation will alter the value definition and basic organization of welfare functions. Actors must take on new roles, and the traditional core processes of markets and bureaucracies must be supplanted or supplemented by new forms of cooperation and interaction.

Between clientelism and universalism: The political dynamics behind social policy change in Argentina and Venezuela

During the last 15 years, Latin American governments have significantly expanded social expenditure as well as the scope of social policies directed towards the poor. The cases of Argentina and Venezuela stand out in the region for the magnitude of resources devoted to these policies. In both countries alike, the socially marginalized groups that constitute the main target of the new social policies have become a substantial base of support for the current governments. Nevertheless, the organizational characteristics of these policies in Argentina and Venezuela differ considerably. Whereas Argentina seems to be gradually moving towards more universalistic provisions, a largely "clientelistic" system of social assistance is consolidating in Venezuela. How can these differences be explained?

The present paper analyzes the political dynamics, social alliances, power balances and institutional structures which underlie the recent development of social policy in Argentina and Venezuela. Resorting to the concepts of "critical juncture" and "power resources", the paper argues that the social policy implemented during the last decade was profoundly shaped by the type of relation that the emerging governments and the socially marginalized groups established during the reconfiguration of the political regime since the late 1990s.

The analysis focuses on the differences in the organizational resources and the level of autonomy acquired by the marginalized groups through the emergence of social movements, the position that these groups assumed in the governing political parties since their coming to power at the turn of the century, the institutional structures and political legacies that channeled the contradictory relation between marginalized groups and national governments, and the differences regarding the aspirations of the national governments to gain the support from the middle sectors which tend to be critical of clientelistic social policies.

Adolescents' occupational aspirations: The changing nature of family and individual influence

Previous studies on the occupational aspirations of adolescents have noted that contemporary teenagers tend to have somewhat materialistic desires in regard to their future jobs and careers. Using data from a nationally representative sample of high school seniors (The Monitoring the Future Project), this study examines how such aspirations have varied over recent years. The responses of high school seniors are examined for each year from 1990 through 2010. While adolescents do appear to have placed greater emphasis upon the extrinsic (e.g., income), intrinsic (e.g., self-satisfaction), and influence (e.g., authority) characteristics of future jobs, there has also been an increase in adolescents' desires to obtain jobs great altruistic rewards (e.g., helping others). The analyses suggest that the relative influence of familial characteristics on adolescents' occupational aspirations has waned over the years, and that individual traits bear greater influence in the development of such aspirations. Furthermore, notable differences are also evident between the occupational aspirations of adolescent females and males. Teenage girls report having a substantially stronger preference for obtaining a professional job, as compared to teenage boys. Adolescent girls also appear to have a stronger preference for occupations which allow them the opportunity for both social and altruistic rewards. The analyses are presented within the framework of a life-course paradigm, and the implications for both adolescent development and the structure of the paid labor force in the future are discussed.

Mercados ambientales y desarrollo sostenible

El estudio empieza de la constatación de que las consideraciones teóricas existentes sobre los mercados ambientales (por ejemplo en Giddens, 2009) y, más concretamente, sobre los mercados de créditos de carbono (objeto de investigación de este estudio), tienden a centrarse principalmente en los aspectos referentes a la transferencia de tecnología involucrada entre los países en desarrollo y los ya desarrollados, pero carecen de un mayor análisis sobre la creación de los proyectos que dan forma a los mercados a nivel local, en el sentido de analizarse los distintos actores locales y las argumentaciones que son movilizadas en el proceso tecnológico con fines a la promoción de un desarrollo sostenible. Una alternativa teórica para la investigación de este aspecto es la perspectiva de redes socio técnicas (Callon, 2004) y del debate sobre democracia técnica (Callon; Lascoumes; Barthe, 2001), que será en este estudio referencial teórico para tratar de responder a la siguiente cuestión: ¿cuál es el papel de la interacción y convergencia de conocimientos, en los procesos tecnológicos, de laicos y expertos en la construcción de mercados ambientales en los países en desarrollo? O más específicamente, ¿en qué medida las redes socio técnicas que generan los proyectos de mecanismo de desarrollo limpio (MDL) en Brasil son capaces de promover una experiencia de democracia técnica? El estudio propuesto utilizará una metodología cualitativa, teniendo como datos secundarios a todos los 266 proyectos aprobados por la Comisión Interministerial sobre Cambio Climático Global para componer el mercado de créditos de carbono en Brasil – en el período de 2004 a 2011 – y, como datos primarios, entrevistas recogidas por el método "bola de nieve" con ejecutivos, consultores, representantes de la sociedad civil y ministeriales que participan del mercado en cuestión. Debido al carácter inicial de este estudio, no se presentan todavía resultados.

Can public policies catch up with the "silent revolution"? Responses from Latin America's "best case" scenarios

Latin America has undergone a "quiet revolution" (Goldin 2006) over the past two decades, at the intersection of work and family, resulting from women's massive participation in labor markets along with a dramatic change in family composition. While scholarly and policy attention has begun to catch up with this transition, to date we have little systematic analysis on how governments have responded, and the determinants of their responses, except that, over-all, they have been very slow in recognizing the changed social realities. Our project seeks to fill this gap by addressing the following questions: Why have policies on work-family reconciliation specifically taken so long to catch up with social structures? Under what circumstances and with what results is policy catching up with deeply transformed families and labour markets? When do these issues make it onto the political agenda, and how do policies, policy reforms, and lack thereof, vary across these countries, both in terms of policy adoption and policy implementation? What are the effects of different policies on both gender equity and social equity? How salient are social factors (structural changes, public opinion) versus political factors (interest groups, government ideology, women's policy machineries, etc) in driving policy responses? And finally, what factors explain the similarities across countries as well as policy variation?

To address these questions, our project focuses on the more advanced Latin American countries, Brazil, Costa Rica, Argentina, Chile, and Uruguay. We focus on the period between 2000 and 2010, distinguishing between policies that were already adopted and implemented by then, and policies that were introduced during the last ten years.

Building urban climate resilience in an unequal world? Towards a comparative sociology of world city eco-housing assemblages

With the importance of cities rising on climate governance agendas worldwide, promising new studies are emerging on the political, economic, and socio-technological factors shaping urban sustainability experiments and low-carbon transitions in world cities. So far, however, sociology remains marginal to these conversations. This paper suggests that an adequate sociology of urban climate resilience will need to address three core theoretical issues. First, we need to position urban resilience transitions within a changing moral geography of how climate change rewrites global socio-ecological inequalities. Second, to understand the impact of this moral geography of carbon within particular cities, sociology will have to adopt a city-based comparative methodology; not least in comparing cities across global North-South divides. Third, to understand how urban climate resilience activities work on the ground, sociology should embrace insights from urban studies on the importance of professional knowledges, material practices, and place-making assemblages in shaping trajectories of urban change. To elaborate the theoretical claims, this paper draws on on-going multi-sited ethnographic work on municipal climate planning projects in the built environment sectors of three world cities, positioned very differently in the moral geography of carbon: Copenhagen (Denmark), Kyoto (Japan) and Surat (India). In each of the three cities, I show, eco-housing is shaped through specific social, ecological and technological relations, materializing a contested set of professional knowledges that intermingle 'global' climatic risks into dense layers of localized matters of urban concern. Asking how climate change is (literally) brought 'home' in each city, I compare the power-laden ecologies of actors, sites, materials and knowledges that shape the climate resilience housing practices of each city. Overall, I stress how eco-housing makes for important sites of urban political ecology, allowing us to map how climatic concerns manifest themselves in cities and trans-locally, across a widening set of global socio-ecological inequalities.

Rights of fathers to leave in Denmark and Sweden – Why so different gender equality logics?

While both representing the Scandinavian welfare model emphasizing gender equality, Denmark and Sweden have followed different historical paths in the development of leave policies for families with smaller children. Whereas the Danish policies are not based on explicit expectations that fathers should take leave, Sweden has promoted gender equality and active fatherhood since the mid 1990s. Sweden has thus been much more active in transforming the gender contract. Interesting contrasts between these two national approaches are visible also in regards to the division of public/private responsibilities of care for smaller children. Denmark's lack of intervention in how parents share leave periods has been accompanied by an early and very extensive investment in public day care, also for the smaller children under the age of 3, while in Sweden the expectation is that parents are responsible for the care of the youngest children, exemplified in the long leave which extends well beyond the child's first year.

This paper seeks to understand the dynamics and processes of the development of the national leave legislation and leave policies in the two countries. We take in the paper a special focus on the actors who have driven the development, with an emphasis on the role of political parties, the labour movement and the workplaces, where the latter have at times been at the forefront of introducing gender equality incentives in leave rights. We apply the theoretical framework of historical institutionalism, and we discuss, whether the development has followed a dependant track and to which extent and why there has been path breaking developments. Our analysis is based on national parliamentary debates and policy documents of the two countries.

Exploring the nature, problematics and ethics of social activism for the disabled in virtual 3D worlds

Drawing on an ethnographic study of individuals and communities in Second Life who are engaged in social activism and thinking through a Deleuzian perspective of subjectivity (Deleuze and Guattari 1987; Deleuze 1997; Hickey-Moody and Wood 2008; Hickey-Moody, 2009), this paper explores the ways in which visual representations in the form of avatars might be used to challenge conventional media representations of otherness and difference particularly in the field of physical disability. Many associations around the world use the 3D world of Second Life (SL) to educate, raise and increase awareness of social problems. As part of this strategy they frequently garner and coordinate support and fund raising events. Recent examples concerning health literacy include the collaboration between the United Nations and the Aimee Weber Studio (www.aimeeweber.com) to bring the UN Millennium Development Goal to SL with the aim of increasing the global reach of their struggle to eradicate poverty. Perhaps, even more importantly, many grassroots communities themselves have used 3D virtual worlds such as SL to re-assert and reclaim their own sense of identity often in opposition to the limiting quotidian definitions of 'otherness' and difference, where 'some 'bodies are more able than others'. The particular focus here will be on communities self-defined through aspects of disability. One such is Virtual Ability, a unique orientation centre for SL residents offering a training course made especially for people with real life disabilities. While the aim of such organisations is to make the Internet immersive (ie virtual worlds) accessible and useful to disabled individuals, they are not unproblematic and their presence and tactics often lead to renewed debates and political controversies about how otherness should be represented to those both inside and out side of the particular groupings.

Playing for life: Reflecting on participatory video to research youth music and media practices

Once I feel myself observed by the lens, everything changes: I constitute myself in the process of 'posing', I instantaneously make another body for myself, transform myself in advance into an image. (Barthes 1982: 10-11)

Engaging participants directly with the processes of selection and creation of their video footage, its editing and distribution, as part of a comprehensive ethnographic research strategy, has the potential to reveal valuable new insights. However, perhaps even more importantly, the pro- cesses of gaining such knowledge can produce creative pedagogic sites in their own right. The shared, informed conversations which evolve through the inevitable affective process of ongoing contestation and negotiation, challenge conventional understandings of the relationship between the researcher and the researched and any notion of the objective and subjective divide. The processes also provide valuable perspectives on how knowledge is sourced and legitimated in the first place, in other cultural contexts. This paper draws on a number of longitudinal case studies from Australia, the UK, Europe and the US (Bloustien and Peters 2011; Bloustien 2012) to consider the significance and the efficacy of PV methodology to explore young people's out of school creative arts and music practices as strategic pathways to agency, employment and socio-economic inclusion.

What's in a name? Postcolonialism and decoloniality as difference within sameness

The decolonial perspective's gradual departure from subaltern studies and the „postcolonial studies“ label can be traced back to both formal as well as more substantial reasons. While some of the substantial ones, such as postcolonial studies' neglect of Iberian colonialism, speak to the very geopolitics of knowledge central to the decolonial approach, some important decolonial concepts, such as Occidentalism and coloniality itself, directly complement and refine notions already present in postcolonial studies. The paper argues that, as far as the most promising approaches within each of the two "camps" are concerned, there are more similarities than there are differences and that both approaches can make crucial contributions to an overcoming of sociology's Occidentalist premises. To this end, it focuses on the continuities between decoloniality and dependency theory as well as world-systems analysis in order to show how the decolonial perspective can be made fruitful for different strands of sociology.

Migration as self-sacrifice – For (whose) greater good? On the (dis)placement of well-being in the narratives of immigrant care workers in Italy

This paper aims to contribute to the debate on migrants' life quality and wellbeing, by revisiting the narratives of thirty migrant women employed in co-resident care work in a North Italy town. As female immigration for care exemplarily shows, a search for wellbeing marks all the steps of a migration process, and yet it is likely to prove elusive – for migrants at least – for the most of it.

A massive employment of live-in immigrant labour, in a country with weak and familist welfare arrangements, has proved critical to the everyday domestic care (hence to relatively better life quality) of the elderly. At the same time, it is an expectation to achieve greater well-being – first of all for those left behind – that has typically driven female migration flows from Eastern Europe and post-Soviet countries. How immigrant women construct their wellbeing – and often the lack of it – is however a less obvious point, which my paper will address. Is their family-oriented affective and moral commitment, and possibly the emotional support they receive from "home", enough for them to enjoy some wellbeing of their own, against a background of harsh or even exploitative work conditions? How does a tacit "externalization of wellbeing" – towards the homeland (i.e. in favour of their children left behind), and towards the future (as it is procrastinated to a supposedly "imminent" return there) affect their life quality, along with their perceptions and personal feelings of wellbeing? Would a "stratified understanding" of their wellbeing – possibly in perceptual, material and relational terms – provide a better account of it? Migrants' emic understandings of their well-being, along with some external indicators of it (such their access to social and health care, or the properties of their informal networks), will be explored in this respect.

The "capacity to aspire" in migrants' life projects and trajectories: A new lens on the migration-development nexus?

This paper explores the relevance of Appadurai's "capacity to aspire" to the migration-development debate. Migration, in this optic, can be helpfully understood as an aggregate, if uncoordinated exercise of individual (and familial) capacities to aspire, under a variety of external constraints. Its contribution to the homeland's development, while variable and case-sensitive, still seems relatively understudied with respect to migrants' capacities to cultivate a future-oriented agency, while potentially keeping connected with their home societies, even from abroad.

Building on my ethnographic and biographic analysis of the transnational ties between a group of Ecuadorian migrants to Italy and their non-migrant counterparts, I will understand migrants' capacity to aspire as a socially stratified and unevenly distributed resource – one that, however, deserves to be factored in the current M&D debate as far as three issues are concerned:

- the grassroots expectations of a better future, however vague, that drive emigration – hence the relevance of future life aims as a cognitive, emotional and moral anchor for migrants' life trajectories (and as a critical factor for "mapping" their position in the development field);
- the changes migrants' home-related inclinations undergo as a result of their exposure to different social networks, cultural milieus and life conditions abroad;
- importantly, and simultaneously, the faceted impact of emigration on the mindsets, social representations and capacities to aspire of those left behind.

The impingements of migrants' capacity to aspire on development, and social change more broadly, should be stratified in the light of its contents, transnational reach and differential potential to be turned into a "collective asset", rather than being (legitimately) circumscribed to one's personal or familial interests. How do migrants' physical detachment from home, and their social inclusion abroad, affect the "home-side" of their capacity to aspire? What are the consequences for development in home societies?

The German-American hyphen: Leading culture, parallel society and multiculturalism in 19th century America

The German-American Hyphen: Leading Culture, Parallel Society and Multiculturalism in 19th Century America

It might come as a surprise that with today's mainstream discourse condemning "parallel societies" of immigrant groups in Germany, the German immigrants to the US in the 19th century were themselves an example of a relatively closed group. German immigrants of that time period promoted a distinctive form of German "Kultur" and sociability, political clubs, separate German schools and holidays, and a flood of German language papers, beer and food. The receiving society was not especially accepting of this as German habitus and culture did not correspond to the Anglo-Saxon "Leitkultur." Around WWI, this culminated in a veritable oppression of all things German, culturally as well as politically, all the way to lynchings and book burnings. One or two decades later, in part because of anti-German policies, in part because of the assimilation among the later generations, the German ethnos, now without significant sustaining institutions, had practically disappeared from the surface of American life. This paper draws parallels to the current situation of Turks in Germany.

Comparing (In)security in public spaces

The transformation of cities challenged by phenomena of globalization brings along issues of conflicts and unrest. How does this process affect public spaces in cities? When global cities are confronted to risks and threats, do public spaces contribute to the problems and/or the solutions? Such cities are indeed the key targets of skilled terrorists, of violent organized gangs and, less dramatically, of actors exerting various forms of actions, 'voices' and protests in the public space. While there are convergences in social and economic forces at work, differences do occur in the public or private forms of control which are mobilized, according to country, region and city and they are best understood with a comparative approach.

The paper deals with contested definitions of public spaces and with ruptures in order. Public space is indeed a resource for political invention, for disorganizing society in view of a better world. Public space reveals the users' social competence.

Historically, bottom-up mobilizations and disorders have been checked by city officials in the name of order by all sorts of tools (among which municipal ordinances and stops and searches) with more or less tough or lenient efficacy.

Private actors are also worth studying. They develop their own strategies of appropriation of public spaces in order to maintain spatial hierarchies. New boundaries result from separate worlds having to share some of the city, one way or another. Control of heterogeneous users in public spaces is then more appropriate than a mere separation of worlds ignoring one another. But how does it affect public space? In brief, the general questions set by this paper are: Can cities solve social/political conflicts via public spaces? Which cities? What do we learn from comparisons?

Building and crumbling of solidarity: An examination of the Dutch campaign in the run up to the G8 protests in Heiligendamm

In this paper I focus on solidarity in its practical expression of willingness to join common campaigns and work together. I studied organizers of different leftwing groups in the Netherlands -ranging from large NGOs to small Marxist organizations and autonomous networks- in the run up to the G8 protests of 2007 in Heiligendamm, Germany. Some organizers aimed to unite all left-wing groups in a common campaign. This study describes the obstacles they encountered which made that many groups declined to cooperate, while others cooperated only in their own separate coalitions or networks. I identify specifically two factors that impacted on groups' decisions whether or not to join, and later, whether to stay or to leave the common campaign.

The first factor are pre-existing bonds. When groups did not know each other yet, they often held stereotypical ideas about each other, which –at least initially- stopped them from joining. Knowing each other however was not always conducive for cooperation either. Often previous attempts to cooperate had failed, leaving people with negative experiences, reducing the willingness to cooperate again.

The second factor I identify is identification, i.e. the perception to which network one belongs, regardless of whether one actually knows people in that group or not. Organizers who identified with universalistic groups, such as the alterglobalist movement, were willing to cooperate with others (whom they all saw as part of 'us') and they were motivated to include ever more groups in the cooperation and tried to keep everyone involved, even when cooperation was difficult. On the other hand, organizers who identified with particularistic groups, joined the cooperation to strengthen their own particular group and reach their own group's objectives. They were therefore less inclined to join, to listen to others, or to stay when cooperation got difficult.

Peace versus justice: The peace process in West Nile / Uganda

The paper will discuss the complex, difficult and often antagonistic empirical relationships between peace consolidation, state consolidation, and justice or "positive peace" (Galtung). For a number of decades northern Uganda, and to a lesser degree Uganda as a whole, has suffered from a long-term "cycle of violence" (Elias) that has apparently ended in 2006 when the last of the major active rebel groups, the LRA, moved its remaining fighters mostly consisting of previously abducted (former) child soldiers to the neighboring Congo and CAR. During this long-term process balances of power as well as codes of conduct and sentiment as well as agencies and procedures of conflict regulation, that is to say violence-control, have changed (at local, supralocal/regional, and suprastate levels). It is adequate to speak of a decivilising process in North Uganda that has changed its dominant direction only a few years ago. Until today the activities and world-view of the LRA marked the climax of this long-term process in which diverse governments as well as various rebel movements have been entangled. A recently concluded field-research project was focused on the West Nile region. The peace process in this province was made possible by military successes, amnesty offers by the government (including the Amnesty Act of 2000) and a peace treaty with local rebels signed in 2002. Our findings show that while the peace or de-escalation process in this province was successful, there remains a protracted antagonism between the requirements of a "negative peace" (i.e. the absence of collective violence) and state consolidation on the one hand and those of a "positive peace" on the other, that would be compatible with the demands of justice and democracy in a more emphatic sense.

Visions of the use of freedom: Competing concepts of socio-political order

The third wave of democratisation and especially the breakdown of the Warsaw Pact after 1989 led to Fukuyama's diagnosis that liberal democracy in combination with a liberal economy was the only viable option in the face of "a total exhaustion of viable systematic alternatives to Western liberalism". Twenty years after this statement we know better. There are still numbers of states with political and economic systems following different lines of thought. When the "Arab Spring" began in 2011 the hopes that democracy will be established in a quasi-automatic process came up again and the mixed outcome up to date shows that democracy does hardly establish itself quasi-automatically.

The experiences of Africa South of the Sahara after the democratic movements came up in 1989 offer a very good example for the changes of authoritarian socio-political systems challenged by democracy. We observe that once a certain political freedom was there - provided top-down or hard-won by protest movements - the unleashed political powers pursued competing models of socio-political order such as liberal democracy, neo-traditionalism, neo-patrimonialism, theocracy or socialism. The interesting point is, that in many cases the result of this competition is a society and a state with a plurality and ambiguous intertwining of orders implying frictions and contradictions and multi-polar balances of power. Contrary to what many expect, some of these pluricentric (or heterarchic) systems show a surprising permanence. Socio-political systems in modernity may be much more diversified than Fukuyama had expected.

Women entrepreneurs: Portuguese immigrants in Sao Paulo

This paper presents the trajectory of Portuguese female immigrants who came to the city of São Paulo in the last two decades of 20th century and records their surviving strategies, initially looking for work and subsequently as entrepreneurs in their own business: restaurants, travel agency, fado singer, and others. Its primary aim is to identify, from their narratives, the entrepreneurship level of these women and the capital stock equity of their ownership, use, and from which they could be able to develop over four decades living in this huge metropolis. In this context, it is also sought the way social networks supporting their arrival were accessed during their period adapting to the city and on performing their business ventures. The analytical and interpretative path from the face to face interviews with these Portuguese immigrants allow us to conclude that capital stock is an extremely relevant resource to entrepreneurship, which they know exactly how to deal and apply on access and development of social networks and also on empowerment inherent to Luso-Brazilian cultural dialog.

Zproblemas en el paraíso? Inseguridad y democracia en Uruguay

Según múltiples indicadores, Uruguay es uno de los países más democráticos de las Américas. Sin embargo, más de un tercio de sus ciudadanos están dispuestos a justificar un golpe de estado por parte de los militares ante mucha delincuencia.

¿Qué es lo que hay detrás de esta aparente disposición a traicionar los valores democráticos de los que se precian los uruguayos? Por primera vez en más de 20 años, la seguridad ha destronado a la economía como el principal tema objeto de preocupación; la inseguridad -real y percibida- crece y con ella las libertades a los que los ciudadanos parecen dispuestos a renunciar.

En este trabajo presentamos el mapa de actitudes y comportamientos ciudadanos ante la inseguridad de acuerdo a los datos de la ronda 2012 del Barómetro de las Américas, e indagamos sus consecuencias en materia de tolerancia política y apoyo a la democracia.

"Time is in your hands": Body, sensitivity and technique in Córdoba city

In the contemporary social forms, time vector orientations have been radicalized: considering from time related to daily shores, to its discipline in factories, and finally a tendency to "leisure time" -also productive-, changes have taken place in its forms, mechanisms and the agents for its regulation. At the same time, new forms of circulation between bodies, goods and ideas, hence affectivities, has been established. The development of technique is its main mediation.

In this article we analyze some of the cited transformations in Córdoba City, Argentina. We take two cases into consideration: some urban decisions that changed the order of the classist relation body/place -'flesh and stone' in Sennett's way (1997)- since the renovations for the Bicentennial celebration; and the consumptions of NTIC (New Technologies of Information and Communication) by the city's subaltern classes. Our hypothesis focuses on establishing a link between the two phenomena as spaces of the reconfiguration of social sensitivity: from architecture to 'customized objects' (such as cell phone) are oriented to optical and tactile reorganization of experience in which the 'time' dimension becomes essential. The feeling -allowed by the cell phone- of having 'time in hands' appears as a fanciful possibility of 'independence' experiences for the subaltern classes whose mobility has been stopped in the space of the city, from some operatories that fix in a classist way the limits and forms of motion.

Bodies, emotions and city(ies) in Latin American (1 st decade of the XXI century.)

Practices, smells, shapes and chromaticity update the itineraries of senses, fate and intensity of emotions that the city arouses, soothe or silence in the bodies that inhabit it. Assuming the existing dialectical relationship between the city (as materialities and images) and the senses (stimulated inside and by the bodies that inhabit it), the urban polysemy set up its base in relations of domination that shape the city in a given time-space.

Conceived as part of an exercise of reflexivity from Latin America city(ies) this session aims to bring some clues for the analysis of this locus, which in the fact of living (it) emerges as a whole, but that under the hiatus that configures it can only be apprehended and experienced in a fragmented way in different and unequal experiences of inhabiting, that is, as a place felt through the body in constant inter-subjective co-constitution.

From this perspective, feeling-in-body-with-other-bodies is the condition of possibility of the social interactions within the framework of material conditions of existence, emerging as the key analytical approach to the mechanisms and effects of domination that mark spaces and experiences 'with' and 'in' the neo-colonial city, both the bodies that travel around it with full enjoyment of their senses and those who just survive at its edges-limits.

Thus, the purpose of this session is to analyze the policies of bodies and emotions in the latin-americans cities that produce processes of imprisonment, segregation and territorial exclusion, observable from the corporeality of those for whom the 'access' to it (working, studying, organizing themselves, eating, etc.) has become a daily battle. Conversely, there are those others in which the fantasy of a 'neat and beautiful' city to everyone is established at the set of patterns that govern the real and mental walls through which a desirable or undesirable interaction develops a classist space-corporal geometry of its inhabitants.

Organizing with or without organization theory?

This paper originates in a curiosity as to how managers organize with or without organization theory. Doing fieldwork in a larger public sector institution there seemed to be some devices which could broadly be related to 'organization theory'. For instance, project work, risk assessment and change management ideas. These devices were indeed used to organize. However, a lot of organizing also seemed to be going on without any organization theory per se. A claim which can be illustrated by a manager saying that 'we don't use any such fancy concepts'. Based on these empirical observations I investigate how organization theory (or the absent hereof) relates to endeavors of organizing. The following set of questions are in focus: How are organization theories brought into organizations to solve particular problems? Which shapes do the theories take and what effects do they have? And, also, what about the areas cleansed from organization theory? What shapes the organizing in these areas? The implication of conducting such analyses is that we might see that organization theory operates in lesser important or 'wrong' areas. Hence, accepting the premise that central areas of organizational reality are cleansed from organization theory, the paper will discuss why organization theory is not present where the organizational problems are occurring.

Three sociological aspects of a political court

There is a significant growth in the political activity of the Brazilian tribunals. In this frame, it is possible to point out a particular actuation of the Federal Supreme Court (STF). At the last decade, the larger parcel of the social demands attempt on basic rights can be attributed to this institution. The lack of others branches is bringing this new panorama of activism of this Court and, at the same time, it is necessary to verify how often this activity can respond to individuals and social groups' expectation. The STF had well defined institutional functions. Recently, it is incurring in democratic responsibilities attributed to others department. This fact remakes a democratic difficulty, especially, in representative grounds. It seems like the legal sphere was placed in the background. However, it is necessary to observe – even with the eloquent silence of others branches – the possibility of an illegitimate political activity of Court. In this sense, the problem of legitimacy in the political activity of STF would be analyzed under three sociological aspects. First, the growth of this political activity of STF can be attributed to the absence of basic rights and the previous unsatisfactory concretization of constitutional norms. Second, when the Court is dodging from the legal sphere, the social facts involved in the matter must be taken as parameter of decision-making. Third, this political activity of STF must produce relevant effects in reality. This third sociological aspect, at turn, can be interpreted by two perspectives. Firstly, it must be faced as the principal objective with the assumption of political responsibilities. Secondly, the impacts of decision as benefit of facticity echoes positively throughout the political activity of Court, helping an approach to legitimacy sphere.

Brazilian judges in-between professionalism, gender and difference

This paper analyzes how Brazilian judges experience difference, focusing on how professionalism, gender, generation and diversity intersect in identity formation among women and men who are judges in the state of São Paulo, Brazil. In attempting to avoid attaching one fixed meaning to the concept of difference, we work with Avtar Brah's typology; this in turn enables us to capture how difference is perceived and experienced by our interviewees. Our results provide a look at how the specificities of the professionalization process influence the composition of the two courts we have studied (one at the state and another at the federal level), at how they increase or reduce the gender stratification within these careers. Being a judge is experienced through difference, in particular as the "other" to those outside the career and wherein identification is intersected by questions of gender, sexuality and generation. Although professionalism establishes boundaries between "us" and "them", it is also diluted through the ways in which the above-mentioned social markers and attributes permeate the self and professional groups. We interviewed 18 judges (women and men) from the São Paulo State Courts (Tribunal de Justiça de São Paulo) and 10 judges from the Regional Federal Courts (Tribunal Regional Federal) from the São Paulo circuit.

Analyzing migrant youth's patterns of social exclusion in Sweden: What role for ethnicization processes?

Starting from 1980s, the concept of social exclusion has become a buzz word in the discourse of international organizations and western-countries' policymakers and has often been narrowed down to the relation between the individual and the labor market.

The case of Sweden effectively illustrates this trend. Traditionally regarded as a model of tolerant and egalitarian multicultural welfare society, Sweden has recently seen the introduction in its political debate of the term utanförskap (outsideness), which is mainly used to point out the lack of employment among people with foreign background.

This paper aims at illustrating and explaining in a more comprehensive way the features of young migrants' "outsideness" in Sweden.

To this purpose, Amartya Sen's conceptualization of social exclusion as capability deprivation proves to be particularly useful, since it enables to distinguish among different modalities and levels of exclusions, i.e. active/passive exclusion and social exclusion/unfavorable inclusion, and to conceptualize social exclusion as a multidimensional phenomenon.

I apply such capability-based conceptualization of social exclusion to interpret the output of an exploratory Latent Class Analysis which maps the population of young people currently living in Sweden. More specifically, I cluster the outcomes of young migrants' trajectories of life in terms of different degrees and modalities of inclusion and distinguishing among the different life domains in which such inclusion/exclusion takes place (e.g. education, attachment to the labor market, housing). Exploring similarities and differences between the patterns observed among Swedish-born youngsters and those characterizing youth with migrant background, it clearly emerges that differences in youth's human capital or in the one of their parents do not justify my findings.

Indeed, as confirmed by a critical exam of the policies of integration implemented by Sweden since the 1970s, the actual practices of inclusions adopted by this country have been characterized by significant processes of ethnicization.

BONFANTI, Sara* (Umeå University (Sweden), sara.bonfanti@soc.umu.se)

Back to the "origins"? A capability-based assessment of the most recent migration policies in Sweden

In this paper I use Amartya Sen's Capability Approach as a framework to assess the impact of migration policies in a fashion that overcomes the limits of the approaches usually employed for this purpose. Indeed, despite being targeted to human beings all over the world, with a range of different characteristics, needs and capabilities, migration policies are usually evaluated from a 'high-income-nation' and capital centred perspective. The latter appraises the outcomes of people's international movement merely for the contribution it gives to the maintaining of "Northern growth and competitiveness".

Resting upon a person-centred, capability-based explanatory and normative framework, which conceives migration as a fundamental human capability, I examine the impact on migrants' multidimensional well-being of the most recent reforms implemented by Sweden in the fields of education for adults and labour market mobility.

My analysis shows that, in discontinuity with the tradition of highly inclusive migration policies Sweden has built since the 1970s, such reforms strongly contribute to de-construct migrants from third countries as denizens/potentially full citizens, bearers of rights and safeguards. In sharp contrast with the evaluation provided by the 2010 'Migrant Integration Policy Index' (MIPEX) - a survey of the integration policies implemented by 31 Western Countries funded by the European Commission - I argue that these measures, e.g. employability-enhancing devices and 'circular migration' schemes, tend to construct migrants as a cheap and 'silent' factor of production, conveniently exploitable within the second tier of an increasingly polarised labour market. In sum, these reforms, disenfranchising migrants of some fundamental capabilities, such as the capability for voice, autonomy and work and for affiliation/cultural freedom, risk bringing the country back to the epoch of guest-workers recruitment programmes.

Efectos del cambio estructural sobre las trayectorias ocupacionales de jóvenes de sectores populares en la Argentina de fines de siglo XX

Los cambios estructurales correspondientes a las últimas décadas del siglo XX produjeron significativas modificaciones en las formas de integración social de los jóvenes de sectores populares en términos de acceso al empleo y posibilidades de movilidad ocupacional ascendente. Consideramos en este sentido que el proceso de segmentación del mercado de trabajo y los efectos de las estrategias de los hogares en este contexto podrían constituirse como mecanismos que permiten explicar estos cambios. Sobre la base de esta hipótesis nos ocuparemos de analizar la forma en la que los procesos de desigualdad producto de las transformaciones en la estructura social de las últimas décadas impactaron sobre las formas de integración social de los jóvenes de sectores populares.

Los principales esquemas teóricos de los que partimos, son por una parte las perspectivas de la segmentación del mercado laboral para la caracterización de un proceso de creciente diferenciación al interior del mercado de trabajo producto de la evolución del régimen social de acumulación que predominó en la Argentina desde mediados de la década del 70, por otra parte, se toman las elaboraciones sobre estrategias familiares de vida para dar cuenta de los procesos que tienen efectos en el mercado de trabajo producto de las respuestas de los hogares a las transformaciones que tienen lugar en la estructura ocupacional y del empleo.

A partir de un estudio de caso se propone analizar en clave histórico comparativa las condiciones en las que jóvenes de sectores populares de distintas generaciones realizaron la transición al mundo del trabajo, teniendo en cuenta las condiciones de ingreso al mercado de trabajo, el balance de los primeros años de sus trayectorias ocupacionales y los factores que inciden en el éxito o fracaso de dichas trayectorias.

Globalisation and the work of South African textile designers

The work of South African textile designers has changed significantly over the last thirty years. Thirty years ago textile designers in the home sector market were recognised as skilled, professional workers. Primarily employed by large textile manufacturers, they were formally qualified, worked in large design studios, and had control over their work and creativity. Designing by hand, their creative abilities were recognised in the industry and they were accorded due status and respect. From the late 1980s / early 1990s technological changes began to undermine some designers' autonomy and control but there was still acceptance that those designing for the home/furnishing market were an elite and that the new technologies were not suitable for their type of work. But from the mid-1990s South Africa, and in particular the textile industry, began to integrate rapidly into the global markets.

This paper examines the impact of this globalisation on the work of South African home textile designers. It argues that the way in which the global integration of the textile supply chain has happened in South Africa has facilitated dramatic changes to the work of textile designers. As a consequence textile designers do not enjoy the status, autonomy and control of their work that was previously evident. Furthermore, the paper suggests, that just as the new technologies have played a key role in enabling the development of the global supply chain, so they have also allowed and even facilitated this marginalisation. The paper thus opens up a new area for discussion and draws attention to a different dimension of globalisation in impacting on the work of a particular profession.

The research is based on qualitative methodologies. Utilising snowball sampling, in-depth interviews have been conducted with South African textile designers and other key informants in the supply chain.

Sacred land and the politics of voice

This article investigates the environmental struggles of the Dongaria Kondh tribals in Eastern India as an example of resistance to Baudrillard's conception of the code by which modern industrial society speaks to and understands itself. Baudrillard explicates the code to be images or simulacra in the nature of floating signifiers into which meaning may be invested by capitalism's drive to reproduce itself. Refusing to allow their land to be acquired by a mining corporation called Vedanta Resources, the tribals counterposed their understanding of land as sacred, to the symbolic meaning ascribed to it by capitalistic logic – a valuable Resource which needed to be exploited for the projected global demands for Aluminium. Interestingly, this refusal to 'speak in code', was encoded by the several western activists who were associated with the struggle. This encoding took the shape of a mediated identification of the tribe with the Na'vi, the heroes of a Hollywood sci-fi blockbuster who too resist a mining corporation – with sacred discourse as well as all-out violence. The 'encoding' of their resistance was 'heard' by the government, with in fact more receptivity than was required for keeping the mining company away from their home in the Niyamgiri hills (several legal actions have been taken against Vedanta Resources by the Indian Government) – but does this speech act of allowing themselves to be represented as the real life Na'vi, constitute a victory over their subaltern status? Are the Dongaria Kondhs using simulacra to fight a mode of hyper-real (re)production that they do not wish to participate in? This article will explore these paradoxes and will attempt to contribute to the theorizing on social movements.

Between the university and the practice in journalism education: The contributions of the sociology of professions about the construction of the journalists' professional identity

In the matter of Sociology of Professions' studies, in general, the approaches are dedicated to understanding how the professions have been built and consolidated, analyzing how they have changed along this trajectory, and investigating how a particular profession or professional group obtained social status, and how it can socially construct its professional identity. Facing the new occupational structure of labor markets, in the last decades, the new Sociology of Professions' approaches are rethinking the bureaucratic professional model, according to which the professional value was built upon the diploma. In this level of research, regarding the relation established between the academic education and profession, Dubar's perspective becomes relevant, according to which professional identities are constructed in social interaction and the diploma is no longer seen as fundamental for the formation of professional identities. In debates about the role of universities in teaching journalism, some of the arguments support that the journalism career has a specific status as the social prestige of journalists is not achieved through regular diplomas or selective courses, but through other sources ("vocational skills", "quality of speech", "credibility of the comments", "the art of handling an article", "social visibility" and "proximity to the power"), which exceed the contents of the standardized academic programs. The reflections proposed in this presentation intend to answer the following questions: What are the criteria that indicate a professional value within the profession of journalists? What are the requirements regarding the admission control for this profession? In order to think about these questions, in this paper, the aim is to consider the contributions of the professions' studies to comprehend the profession of journalism, analyzing how this professional career, built in university courses of journalism, represents a significant feature of the social identity of professionals.

Gender inequalities among journalists in São Paulo - The Brazilian context of the increasing feminization of the profession of journalism and journalism education

Through recent decades, in Brazil, the world of communications is undergoing significant changes, characterized by the growth of women's presence in journalism and in university courses; increase of the level of education of journalists, specially the women professionals - in São Paulo, women predominate among journalists registered formally with higher academic degree of education -; the introduction of technology in the media; the concentration of journalists in the segment "extra-writing" (professionals who are not employed in journalism companies) and changes over regulations of this profession, questioning the admission requirements for this career. The aim of this paper is to understand, within this scenario marked by the feminization of the profession, the disparities present within the profession of journalism, in terms of unequal power, prestige, education and social recognition of professional qualifications, in order to test internal segmentation hypothesis of this profession, with a gender perspective. For this, data are presented to show the distribution of men and women journalists in São Paulo, analyzing the division of higher positions and the differences in average earnings by function, using as main source of information the Annual Social Information of the Ministry of Labor and Employment.

Planning for an (un)certain future: Choice within english end of life care

Over the last few parliaments, English healthcare policy has increasingly included neoliberal ideals nestled within the state-provided system. This has been particularly embodied through the use of the term 'choice'. Whilst in some sectors of healthcare choice carries consumerist connotations, within the relatively new field of end of life care, it serves to mark the last chance to express autonomy once one's inevitable fate is known.

Particularly, within the first national end of life care strategy (2008) choice represents planning the setting of one's death – one's preferred place of death – whilst delicately manipulating the timing and means of one's death through descriptions of refusing treatments (thereby sidelining discussions of assisted suicide). In order to enable choice, healthcare professionals are to openly discuss end of life care with patients who may die within the next year and/or suffer from a long-term illness. In turn, patients are expected to express their preferred priorities of care (and death), which can be documented and followed.

Through ethnographic research, it is apparent that although people (including patients and professionals) generally like the idea of choice, the notion of planning and documenting choice is less desirable. Many demonstrate that it is difficult to do as an action given the importance of relationships in shaping experiences of dying and the uncertainty that surrounds death. This creates an inability to plan and therefore choose. This paper explores these issues, demonstrating that this anxiety around planning and the rhetoric of choice in this context serve to illustrate deeper unresolved concerns about morality and mortality.

Issues of traceability and corporate responsibility

The objective of this paper is to discuss how and if corporations' strategies for traceability along their commodity chains may further corporate responsibility and, in the end, a more environmentally friendly production. The paper focuses on the case of chemicals in textiles; the textile production and commodity trading is one of the most global industries in the world with production and distribution lines spread over numerous regions with a multitude of production steps, suppliers and sub-suppliers. Moreover it has a great environmental impact coming from the use of toxic chemicals in both fiber production as well as in many manufacturing stages. During the last decade, there has been an increased pressure on companies to take accountability for the entire commodity chain down to the last sub-supplier. Accordingly, the textile companies today find themselves facing the difficult task of trying to manage very complex product chains. The concept of traceability is being seen by the industry to be a key issue when trying to take on a more responsible approach and in improving their environmental practices. The paper looks into the concept of traceability and discusses such strategies using a literature review and semi-structured interviews. The analysis also includes lessons learned from other sectors. A particular topic that is addressed is the role of stakeholders, such as the media, NGOs and political consumers, in formulating and working for the new business strategies.

Notas sobre el estado y la apropiación del excedente en las teorías neoschumpeterianas de la innovación y el desarrollo

En el trabajo exploraremos las concepciones del Estado y su rol en el sistema económico en las teorías neoschumpeterianas de la innovación y el desarrollo. De este modo, intentaremos echar luz sobre la manera en que se articulan desde estas perspectivas lo que los autores llaman el orden económico y el orden institucional al interior del sistema socio-productivo, lo que resulta fundamental para una comprensión integrada de la dinámica de los procesos de desarrollo. En particular, nos interesa la específica relación establecida a nivel conceptual entre el Estado y la cuestión de la apropiación del excedente económico surgido del cambio técnico, porque creemos que la manera en que se conceptualiza dicha relación conlleva implicancias relevantes para la comprensión general de los procesos de desarrollo en su vínculo con la dinámica de la innovación tecnológica. En este sentido, sostenemos que las teorías neoschumpeterianas abordadas proponen una visión restringida del Estado ligada a la ausencia de una preocupación por la teorización sistemática del problema de la apropiación del excedente, que dificulta una comprensión acabada e integral de la dinámica del desarrollo en los países de América Latina. Destacamos también que, con todo, proponen una serie de claves analíticas de utilidad para analizar las dimensiones económicas y tecnológicas de los procesos de desarrollo, muchas veces ausentes en las perspectivas sociológicas más tradicionales sobre estos procesos. Analizaremos en el plano interno o lógico las propuestas de B.A. Lundvall, R. Nelson, G. Dosi y C. Pérez, considerados como los referentes centrales de las teorías mencionadas.

La recomposition des solidarités ouvrières face à une délocalisation: Le cas de l'usine molex de villemur-sur-tarn

En septembre 2009, le groupe Molex, l'un des premiers constructeurs mondiaux de connectique, ferme son usine de Villemur-sur-Tarn, village rural du Sud-Ouest de la France, qu'il avait achetée en 2004, et licencie 283 salariés, après une année de conflit social.

Il s'agira ici d'abord de retracer la progressive atomisation des collectifs de travail et d'analyser les impacts, pour les salariés, des successifs rachats et réorganisations de l'activité et des espaces de l'entreprise. La spécialisation des postes, l'intensification des cadences ou encore l'individualisation du contrôle, assorties d'une restriction croissante des espaces de sociabilité ouvrière en marge du travail ont ainsi abouti à l'affaiblissement des solidarités instituées.

Puis nous montrerons comment la fermeture a donné lieu à une recomposition des solidarités ouvrières, et à une mobilisation qui s'est en partie internationalisée. Celle-ci s'est caractérisée par une visibilité médiatique et politique et une longévité notables. La recomposition des solidarités autour d'un discours commun (préservation de l'outil de travail, lutte contre les « patrons-voyous » étrangers) peut expliquer en partie une réussite « médiatique » qui a également permis l'inscription dans un réseau d'entraide syndical interprofessionnel, national et international. Des lignes de fractures préexistantes ont ainsi en partie été surmontées dans et par la mobilisation. D'autres sont néanmoins apparues une fois la fermeture effective, dans l'expérience différenciée de la perte d'emploi.

Pendant la lutte contre la fermeture et dans les mobilisations collectives ayant survécu au départ de Molex, l'opposition entre le local et le global a traversé tant les discours publics que les pratiques militantes. L'analyse de ce jeu d'échelle constituera un dernier point.

Le mouvement des travailleurs sans papiers: Quelle démocratisation pour les pratiques syndicales françaises?

Les grèves de travailleurs sans papiers qui ont mobilisé plusieurs milliers de personnes en Ile-de-France entre avril 2008 et octobre 2010 ont marqué une étape inédite de l'action syndicale française. D'abord parce que ces grèves ont allié la revendication traditionnelle du mouvement des sans-papiers – la régularisation – et un mode d'action propre au mouvement ouvrier, mais rarement mobilisé depuis le début des années 1980 – la grève avec occupation du lieu de travail. Au-delà de la visibilité qu'elles ont donné à des travailleurs souvent camouflés, malgré leur présence massive dans les secteurs du bâtiment, du nettoyage, de la restauration, de l'aide à la personne, elles ont également été les premières grèves coordonnées concernant ces secteurs, et plus largement des PME, le secteur de l'intérim et le travail au noir.

Ces grèves comportent des enjeux déterminants pour le syndicalisme, particulièrement en termes de démocratisation. Au fil des mois de grèves, plusieurs milliers de travailleurs sans papiers, majoritairement africains, ont découvert l'action syndicale, le fonctionnement des organisations de salariés, et des pans entiers du droit du travail. Plusieurs centaines ont appris à négocier avec leurs employeurs, à revendiquer leurs droits, à organiser une mobilisation collective. Pour autant, la direction du mouvement est restée l'affaire de permanents syndicaux français. Cet enjeu de démocratisation du mouvement a été et demeure essentiel pour l'analyse sociologique et la réflexion syndicale.

Enfin, le pari des syndicats était qu'au-delà de la revendication de régularisation, ces grèves ouvriraient les espaces productifs occupés par les sans-papiers à l'action syndicale, notamment grâce à la syndicalisation des grévistes. Nous examinerons ce qu'il en est, un an et demi après la fin des dernières grèves.

Cette communication s'appuiera sur une enquête ethnographique collective menée depuis février 2008, et discutera les constats empiriques français au regard d'autres expériences de syndicalisation de travailleurs étrangers.

Democracy in school

The International Civic and Citizenship Study (ICCS) of the International Association for the Evaluation of Educational Achievement (IEA) investigates how young people are prepared for their roles as citizens in a number of countries worldwide. The notions of civics and citizenship have different interpretations particular to a certain national context, and within a country they may have different meanings for students depending on their gender, ethnic, immigrant and/or socio-economic background.

The present study is a secondary quantitative analysis of data collected during ICCS 2009 survey from five countries: Sweden, Austria, Poland, Italy and Switzerland. The five countries were chosen on the basis of their different national context as well as migration history and current trends. The study aimed to bring out communalities and differences among civic and citizenship views of students with immigrant and non-immigrant background in selected countries. Variables reflecting social capital at student individual level, family and home background level, classroom and school level, and country level were selected from the International Student Questionnaire. Further, the principal component analysis was applied to single out the 'clouds of individuals' that would represent profiles of individual students. Mapping of student population groups around the principal components allowed to see certain trends emerging among different student population groups within a country as well as across countries at various levels.

The study results showed that on one hand, variations are present not only between native and immigrant students in a given country, but also within these groups, i.e. immigrant students themselves may differ in their civic experiences, attitudes and beliefs. On the other hand, similar components at various levels (e.g. support for ethnic and immigrant rights) were found for students with different immigration backgrounds coming from countries with different national context, in particular in terms of migration trends.

The practice of responsible procurement and global complex product chains

The management of social, environmental and health risks associated with products from global product chains is one of the most pressing task for contemporary society; a task that involves public as well as private actors and poses great challenges in terms of capabilities, knowledge, communication, collaboration, and policy instruments. In various sectors, public and private organisations face increasing pressure from the media, NGOs, political consumers, and other stakeholders to assume responsibility and deal responsibly with various risks in their procurement strategies. Given the huge social and ecological complexities and uncertainties involved, how are buyers coping with this intricate situation?

In this paper, we focus on public and private procurement organizations in the area of textiles (and chemical risks). We ask how private and public procurement organizations struggle to develop feasible practices in their efforts to achieve responsible (sustainable) procurement. The paper focuses on the interaction between procurement organizations and their suppliers and sub-suppliers. It pays attentions to such aspects as dissemination of information, learning, development of (reflective) trust, communication (barriers/bridges), and social and environmental monitoring. We refer to literatures on environmental governance, risk communication, and commodity chains. The paper builds on, firstly, a series of semi-structured interviews of staff responsible for environment, procurement, and CSR within Swedish public and private buyers, and secondly, detailed case studies of three organizations, one private and two public, which were selected because they had serious ambitions to engage in responsible procurement (challenges identified among these organizations are thus likely to be general).

Participación ciudadana en las decisiones sobre el uso de los recursos naturales. La experiencia de los movimientos socioambientales en Argentina

La explotación y exportación de bienes naturales no son actividades nuevas en nuestra región, por el contrario, ha sido la forma en la que América Latina se ha insertado históricamente en el mercado internacional. Sin embargo, encontramos que en los últimos años se han profundizado un modelo extractivo basado en la sobreexplotación de los recursos naturales. Como es el caso de los emprendimientos mineros metalíferos a gran escala, la expansión del monocultivo de soja, la deforestación de los bosques nativos, la construcción de grandes represas y obras de infraestructura, entre otros.

En la presente ponencia procuraremos caracterizar las experiencias de movilización que surgen a partir de la resistencia a diferentes proyectos de gran envergadura destinados a la explotación de los recursos naturales. Estos movimientos socioambientales inauguran un nuevo capítulo en la tradición de los movimientos sociales en Argentina.

Nos proponemos indagar en las particularidades que presentan estas experiencias que se definen por la defensa del ambiente y de los estilos de vida locales con cuestionamientos a las formas tradicionales de representación política y participación ciudadana. Las asambleas socioambientales proponen nuevas formas de participación a partir de la organización social y ampliación de las esferas de la democracia a través de distintas formas horizontales de discusión y decisión política.

Bibliometric analysis of research on health inequalities

Since the 70s, health inequalities have been recognized as a major public health problem worldwide. After the 1980 Black Report, which revealed health inequalities among different strata of the population, research and scientific publication has increased. The objective of the present study was to analyze the evolution of scientific production of health inequalities.

We used descriptive, relational and qualitative indicators based on the volume of publications and citations and collaborations between authors and citations practices and on key words and concepts. The references were taken from the Web of Science database, and Le Bibliothécaire software, was used to process bibliographic information. The search strategy used keywords related to the concept of health inequality, including equity and health, health inequities, inequalities and disparities.

The search identified 25 463 scientific papers with 65 547 authors and an average of 3.7 authors per article. Medicine, Public Health, Epidemiology, Social Medicine and Sociology/Anthropology were the disciplines most frequently involved in this area of research. The most cited papers were published in the New England Journal of Medicine, JAMA, and The Lancet. Social Science & Medicine had the largest number of publications.

The first article was in 1968 and focuses on civil rights in the United States and the elimination of racial discrimination in access to medical care. The concept of inequality was initially preferred by the authors but supplanted by that of disparity at the turn of 2007. The paper by Marmot (1991) is one of the four papers that hold the largest number of citations and contributes to the central perspective of social determinants of health and the British influence on the international status of research on social inequalities of health.

Équité d'accès aux professionnels et aux services de santé en langue minoritaire

Bien que le Canada se soit doté de deux langues officielles, le français langue majoritaire au Québec et l'anglais langue majoritaire dans le reste du Canada, un certain nombre de francophones et d'anglophones de ce fait vivent en contexte linguistique minoritaire. Des études antérieures ont montré que cette situation agit comme déterminant de la santé et entraîne un état de santé et un accès différentiel aux services. L'objectif de cette communication est de comparer la minorité à la majorité linguistique en termes d'accès aux professionnels de santé capable de desservir en langue minoritaire.

Nous avons utilisé le recensement de 2006 pour créer la base de données des professionnels, stratifiée par sexe, âge, capacité linguistique et la base de la population francophone et anglophone minoritaire. Nous avons construit un indice comparatif permettant d'établir le ratio du nombre de professionnels capable de desservir en langue minoritaire par rapport 100 000 de population minoritaire et majoritaire (IPSLOM).

Les minorités linguistiques sont désavantagées par rapport à la majorité linguistique en termes d'accès aux professionnels de la santé dans 8 des 13 provinces/territoires canadiens. La variation dans les valeurs de l'indice IPSLOM montre une variation considérable au niveau des régions socio-sanitaires. Les minorités linguistiques de l'Ontario sont désavantagées dans 12 régions socio-sanitaires sur 14, du Québec dans 18 régions sur 18 et du Nouveau-Brunswick dans 4 régions sur 7.

L'équité en matière de soins de santé est une dimension cruciale de la politique canadienne. De nombreuses études montrent que malgré un accès universel aux soins, des disparités importantes perdurent que ce soit en termes d'accès aux services qu'en termes des résultats escomptés en ce qui a trait à la bonne santé. Notre indicateur IPSLOM s'est avéré d'une grande utilité pour cerner les inégalités d'accès des minorités linguistiques aux professionnels et aux services de santé.

Older women's employment: Pension crisis and crisis of care

The political economy of pension issues is highly gendered but current approaches often assume gender neutrality. At these ages, 55-64, it is often assumed that women and men no longer have family responsibilities; thus gender differences are analyzed in terms of discrimination, labour market segmentation as well as overall earning disparities. Older women however, typically have responsibility for parent care, a responsibility which is growing rapidly with population aging. At the same time European Union (EU) labour policies are encouraging older women to stay engaged in the labour market under proposals to reduce their access to early retirement schemes. In many countries women's retirement age has been increased more than men's.

The impact of these policies will be dramatically different for women under different welfare regimes. The Nordic states already have relatively high employment rates for older women (Sweden 66.7%; Finland 56, Denmark 50.9%) but these welfare states have also provided for help with caring for elderly parents. In the Mediterranean states women's employment at older ages is quite low but the overwhelming responsibility for elderly family members falls on the women.

This paper reviews the employment rates for women age 55-64 in the 15 original EU countries using the most recent Eurostat data. The context is the availability of support available to older women for elder care under the different welfare regimes. Of critical importance in aging societies is the unpaid work of caregiving for the very old who need assistance in activities of daily living. Daughters and daughters-in-law overwhelmingly take on this role and this unpaid work needs to be recognized in current efforts to reduce public spending on pensions as well as other benefits, such as unemployment, which are currently supporting caregivers.

The South African new water act and its "ecological reserve": A case of international influence over a transitional regime?

In the aftermath of Apartheid era, the new democratic South African regime prioritized the adoption of reform Acts on land and water issues in particular. Indeed, water access especially has demonstrated the most striking inequalities among the South African racially-divided society (Schreiner and van Koppen, 2002). However the National Water Act voted in 1998 is renowned not only for its declared objective of fighting against injustices inherited from the past. It is also perceived as one of the most ambitious Act in the world from an environmental perspective (Biggs, Breen et al., 2008). Indeed, thanks to the introduction of a "Reserve" in the Act, both basic human needs and an ecological reserve are meant to be catered for. In addition, the human reserve and the ecological one are both considered to be constitutional rights, which also make it rather unique in the world. Such a progressive Act especially from an ecological viewpoint can be surprising for a country facing a tremendous social challenge, i.e. providing basic water service delivery in extensive third-world like areas of the country. This paper focuses on the actors and networks which have been instrumental in the adoption of the concept of an "ecological reserve". It examines whether or not this provision is the result of potential links with international/transnational coalitions or interest groups. The paper then studies the implementation phase and more precisely how the way the ecological reserve is being determined has evolved over time from considering the reserve with purely ecological criteria to seeing it through more societal and sustainable lenses. The extent to which there has been an outside influence on this shift is also investigated.

Climate science as a cultural contest

This paper explores the cultural contest over climate science with particular reference to the United States. Cross-national comparisons of public attitudes about climate change and climate science routinely find substantially higher levels of climate scepticism in the US than in other countries. The standard explanation for these findings points to a mixture of intentional disinformation (e.g., US energy industry interests that actively promote scepticism so they can continue burning fossil fuels) coupled with media practices (e.g., a journalistic norm to present both sides of an issue) which have facilitated the distribution of that misinformation. This explanation, however, appears inconsistent with evidence from the last few years. On the one hand, environmental and other groups expended large sums of money getting out their message leading up to Copenhagen. There was not, as the standard account suggests, an underfunded David valiantly trying to be heard over the well funded roar of the energy industry Goliath. Similarly, recent studies show that US media practices changed substantially following the release of An Inconvenient Truth and the publicity accorded Oreskes work documenting the level of consensus among climate scientists. At the same time this was happening, polling data show both an increase in the level of climate scepticism among the US public and in the rigidity and certainty with which those views are held by a certain section of the population. There is now less acceptance of climate science than of evolution among white evangelicals. In short, the extent to which the science is contested has increased at the same time that the mechanisms which supposedly fuelled the scepticism were losing power. An alternative explanation for the dynamics of American public opinion on climate change and climate science, one based on Douglas and Wildavsky's cultural theory of risk, is proposed.

Conceptualizing risk in conjoined socio-ecological systems: Causes, consequences and the potential for solution

Drawing on concepts from complex adaptive systems theory, the paper argues that a conjoined socio-ecological system has existed since the emergence of humans -- a species marked both by tool use and language as a mechanism that facilitates large scale coordination of activity. However, the human impact on the functioning of the ecosystem has not been constant. While the biosphere, as a system, has been governed by 'natural' processes at the micro, meso, macro and global levels since before the arrival of humans, human intervention in and interaction with these processes has expanded through time from the micro/local up to and including the global (e.g., climate change). An analytic schema, involving three kinds of activity (natural, technological, social) operating at four distinct scales (micro, meso, macro, global) is developed to conceptualize the trajectory of human impact on the conjoined socio-ecological system in relation to a variety of planetary boundaries. The analysis is used to argue: 1) that complexity and risk are increasing and that we face a growing number of planetary scale ecological problems, 2) that technological approaches to these risks, while necessary, are, without associated social innovations, unlikely to ameliorate the problems and 3) that the major impediment to dealing with these emerging risks is social (i.e., the lack of institutional structures designed to effectively coordinate action at the global level) rather than ecological or technological. Factors affecting the relative success (e.g., Montreal protocol) and failure (e.g., Kyoto protocol) of such institutional structures will be examined.

Destination Canada(?): Gender, race and changing policies for recruiting migrant domestic workers

The International Labour Organization (ILO) estimates that nearly 44 million persons over age 14 in 2010 are women domestic workers, accounting for 7.5 percent of female employees worldwide and representing eight out of ten of all domestic workers (ILO 2011). Many female domestics are international migrants, literally hidden in the households of destination countries, often lacking legal, civic and political rights given to their employers (Anderson 2006; Heimschoff and Schwenken 2001) and frequently without rights to residency status. Substantial concern exists over substantial human rights violations, the often ignored inter-country agreements designed to protect domestics, and the absence of regulations to ensure decent work conditions (but see: ILO Convention NO. 189 and Recommendation No. 201, June 2011).

Amid these global concerns, Canada is often singled out as an exception, if only because working conditions and the extension of rights in other countries are so much worse (Bakan and Stasiulis 1997). But Canada's history of domestic worker recruitment and related migration policies have been highly gendered and racialized. Starting in 2010, new major state initiatives appeared. By overviewing current Canadian policies related to the recruitment of migrant women to work in private households, three questions are answered. First, how and why did the current policies on live-in caregivers emerge? Second, who is recruited under Canada's caregiver policies? Third, what are the problems associated with the program and what have been the recent policy responses targeted at those women who are migrating to Canada as caregivers? Six problematic areas, with corresponding policy needs or actions, are highlighted: unscrupulous recruitment agencies; unscrupulous employers; time spent in carework prior to receiving permanent resident status; required medical examinations; family stresses caused by prolonged separation, and the growing educational levels of migrant caregivers accompanied by the increasing risk of downward mobility upon gaining permanent residence status.

The emergence of climate contrarianism as a 'wise (use)' social movement

Climate contrarianism as a social movement coalesced in the late 1980s, and has gone through many stages of expansion and prosperity, particularly in Anglophone countries. These 'contrarians' have laudably been deemed 'skeptics' as well as denigratingly been called 'deniers' over the years, as their stances have found common ground with many right-of-center ideological movements such as libertarianism and the US Tea Party. In addition, over time these groups have possessed varying degrees of power and influence on decision-making on climate change. This paper interrogates the growth pathways of this social movement, through interviews and participant observations at the 2011 Heartland Institute's Sixth International Conference on Climate Change. The project also draws on the tools of political ecology, sociology and psychology to help understand how these contrarians 'speak for the climate' in particular (and oft-amplified) ways.

This work seeks to better understand motivations that prop up these stances, such as possible ideological or evidentiary disagreement to the orthodox views of science (a.k.a. scientific consensus), motivation to fulfill the perceived desires of special interests (e.g. carbon-based industry), and/or exhilaration from self-perceived academic martyrdom and more general desires for notoriety. For instance, questions involve: to what extent have their varied interventions been effective in terms of sparking a new and wise Copernican revolution, or do their amplified voices instead service entrenched carbon-based industry interests while they blend debates over 'climate change' with other culture wars such as gun control, and abortion?

This paper is also motivated by the interest to better understand effects of this emergent social movement – sharing ideological kinship with the 'Wise Use movement' of the 1980s and 1990s – in terms of how it has contributed to (mis) perceptions and (mis) understandings that shape the spectrum of possibility for responses to contemporary climate challenges.

Pharmaceuticalization of society through the popular healthy life discourse: The case of Turkey

It has been discussed in the last two decades within the literature of sociology of health that the pharmaceuticalization of society has many aspects such as medicalization of the certain periods of life and daily life, health consumerism, promotions and marketing strategies of pharmaceutical industry and health policies of the state. This presentation is going to focus on the popular healthy life discourse in Turkey as one of the aspects and causes of pharmaceuticalization of society.

Popular healthy life discourse seems to aspire to make individuals live longer and healthier by informing individuals about the conditions of healthy body and invites them to control and discipline their bodily conditions and lifestyle choices. In Turkey, this discourse has pervaded through the popular medicine and anti-aging experts who show up in the television programs and write daily articles in the newspapers and internet since the last decade. On the one hand, these experts describe the symptoms of diseases such as cancer, AIDS, osteoclasia, chronic illnesses. On the other hand, they offer herbal remedy prescriptions by reference to the herbalist origins of traditional Turkish medicine. They don't only inform and alert individuals who suffer from a certain disease, but also the pre-patients and/or potential patients. At the first glance healthy life discourse seems as if it opens the way of one's becoming her/his own doctor. However, experts, who are the actors of the information bombardment of healthy life and creators of the lay explanations of sophisticated medical language in Turkey, make health fall under continuous scrutiny of individual her/himself and give support to the process of transformation of patients and pre-patients into consumers of health services and medical drugs. This presentation is going to investigate this process as a certain aspect of pharmaceuticalization of society.

Why the poor do not act against climate change: A class victimization narrative

There are many academic works dealing with public opinion about climate change. Most of them have previously shown that the vast majority of Europeans are concerned about it, and are afraid of a catastrophe to come; and yet they also emphasized that few ordinary citizens are willing to actually act. Why this gap between rhetoric and practice?

One answer lies in climate skepticism, a phenomenon recently highlighted by some sociologists; such an explanation is not enough to justify the wide gap between opinion and behavior. So we propose an alternative hypothesis: a large part of Europeans, especially among the lower classes, tell a story midway between that of the official IPCC scientists and the States on the one hand, and that of climate skeptics on the other hand. This account agrees with the concerns about climate and also predicts the final disaster, but it assigns responsibility to the State and big business, considering the sacrifices required from people as unfair. It claims a social class issue, which is not only a question of global warming, but of environmental justice, and in which the poor play the role of victim.

We propose to measure the importance of this story among European citizens. To do this, we will rely on Eurobarometer surveys of March 2008, and June 2011.

Information work and the proletarian condition today: The perception of Brazilian call centers operators

The increase in company outsourcing over the last 3 decades in Brazil has led to the development of a new type of worker on the margins of the productive system: the call center operator. Responsible for a wide range of information services, the rapid expansion in call centers has stirred the interest of a number of researchers in different areas of knowledge. Analyzing the work of the Brazilian call center operator, the proposal looks to deepen our comprehension of the changes currently affecting today's Brazilian working class.

Educación, formación política e internacionalismo en los movimientos sociales rurales latinoamericanos contemporáneos

Los procesos educativos y formativos son un elemento central en la configuración de los movimientos sociales rurales latinoamericanos, tanto en su interior como en su relación con otros actores sociales y la sociedad. En las dos últimas décadas, dichos procesos han ganado creciente relevancia, convirtiéndose en una de las principales herramientas de interacción de militantes de diferentes procedencias nacionales y contribuyendo, además, a la reconfiguración de las prácticas e imaginarios internacionalistas entre los movimientos sociales rurales latinoamericanos. Con este telón de fondo, esta ponencia pretende reflexionar acerca de la tensión entre la producción de conocimiento sobre los movimientos sociales y en/desde los movimientos sociales a partir del análisis de los espacios transnacionales de educación y formación política. Para ello, la argumentación se divide en tres partes: en primer lugar, se analizan las principales teorías del activismo transnacional contemporáneo vis-a-vis la experiencia y la auto-reflexión de los movimientos sociales rurales latinoamericanos; en segundo lugar, se examina la internacionalización de los movimientos sociales articulados en torno a La Vía Campesina Brasil, tratando de identificar las interacciones y dinámicas existentes con otros movimientos sociales latinoamericanos en el ámbito formativo y educativo desde un doble criterio: por un lado, examinando aquellos cursos, espacios y eventos de dimensión regional en los que participan los movimientos de La Vía Campesina Brasil y, por otro lado, analizando aquellos realizados en Brasil donde hay una dimensión latinoamericana en términos de interacción militante y producción de significados. Finalmente, esto nos lleva a reflexionar, a modo de conclusión, sobre cómo la generación de un internacionalismo complejo que articula escalas, redes, territorios y diferentes dinámicas de interacción y difusión afecta la (re)construcción de identidades y saberes que desafían el individualismo y el nacionalismo metodológico, reivindicando nuevas aperturas epistemológicas.

Rituales funerarios heroicos y memorial cívico

El siglo XIX hispanoamericano exhibe una verdadera saga de ceremoniales fúnebres destinados a enaltecer el papel de los grandes hombres en la configuración del arsenal simbólico que contribuyó a moldear la mitología fundacional de los estados nacionales. Sobre la base de la combinación selectiva de prácticas culturales heredadas de la tradición barroca, y de los nuevos contextos institucionales y políticos, el lenguaje estatal republicano hizo de la asociación entre individuo o héroe, cuerpo nacional y posteridad un recurso de afirmación de la autoridad nacional, y de cohesión social y política. Convertidos en piezas angulares en la fabricación del panteón nacional, los funerales de estado realizados a lo largo del siglo XIX en la mayoría de las repúblicas latinoamericanas, se convirtieron en instrumentos políticos formidables de construcción política y cultural por lo que su análisis resulta eficaz para examinar, entre otras cosas, las implicancias de la manipulación estatal y política destinada a dotar al régimen político de una meta narrativa articulada y espectacular, y su impacto relativo en la transformación del ritual funerario en memorial cívico. La ponencia se ocupa de contextualizar la dilatada empresa de colocación de San Martín como héroe nacional argentino en las coordenadas de los rituales funerarios del siglo XIX europeo y latinoamericano, avanza en la dimensión privada y personal de la construcción mítica, restituye la compleja ingeniería institucional, política y cultural que lo colocó a la cabeza del panteón de los padres fundadores de la nacionalidad argentina, y subraya las resignificaciones de su legado en el siglo XX.

Transnational family ties between Cuba and Germany: Isolation, restrictions and agency

Since colonial period, Cuba's economy and society have been organized around extended family networks. In revolutionary Cuba the role of the family has decreased substantially, as the state has assumed many of its traditional functions. But since the economic crisis sufficient social services could no longer be provided. Thus the family has regained its position as a primary force in society – now organized transnationally. In spite of the relative isolation of Cuba, an increasing number of families live in a transnational space. In the face of the economic crisis and the dual economy, these transnational households emerge as new sustainability projects for the families and the system. Simultaneously they pose a potential challenge to the status quo. This presentation will analyze the formation of transnational families between Cuba and Germany and their impact on social transformations in Cuba. I will address these phenomena drawing on results of reconstructive analysis (according to Rosenthal) of biographical interviews in the scope of my PhD-thesis. To trace the migration process and the negotiation of roles I opted for a 'multi-sited' cross-generational approach by interviewing Cubans in Germany and their family members in Cuba. The presentation provides insight into the dynamics of two selected transnational families. These cases will show how in spite of the apparently impermeable borders, migrants maintain transnational family ties. The crossing of national borders is connected with reciprocal benefits. Transnational relations are used for instance by immigrants to guarantee child caring and by the relatives left behind to consolidate the household income. The actions of migrants affect the lives of their relatives in Cuba. Financial support creates new social disparities. In consequence, the country is divided into those who receive remittances and those who are excluded from this possibility. Socialism is thus sustained and undermined by these transnational family networks.

Consuming neighborhoods: Aesthetics, reputation, socio-spatial change and belonging on local shopping streets

New York City, like many large American and some global cities, has experienced rapid socio-spatial change between the 1980s and today. Widespread market-led re-development and re-investment in the central areas of the city, combined with demographic changes through processes of both immigration and gentrification, have dramatically changed how the public spaces of the city look and feel. In turn, the aesthetic characteristics of urban space are central to how cities and neighborhoods are understood and inhabited by old, new, and potential future residents, and to a significant extent to residents' sense of belonging or exclusion.

These processes can be clearly observed – by residents, visitors, and sociologists – on local shopping streets. Storefront businesses (including retail stores and other public businesses such as restaurants and service establishments) are a highly visible spaces of public life in of many urban neighborhoods. Compared to residential or office spaces, storefronts are typically located in high-traffic areas at street level, and are designed to draw the attention of passersby. Moreover, changes in storefront aesthetics are highly legible to residents as weathervanes of broader trends of socio-spatial change, either in the present or the near future. As such, although their primary goal may be to advance their business interests and attract customers, local businesses and their owners play a central role in producing and disseminating markers of neighborhood character and neighborhood change.

This paper explores the relationship between street aesthetics, symbolic meanings, understandings of neighborhood character, and patterns of sociospatial change, belonging and exclusion in three New York City neighborhoods. Visual data on the exterior and interior aesthetic characteristics of stores is considered, as well as observation and interviews with proprietors, shoppers and local residents. This information is supplemented with quantitative historical data on changes in local businesses in each area from 1980-present.

Imaginaries, nostalgia, affect and sociospatial change: An embodied theory of belonging and displacement

Cities are, most fundamentally, spaces characterized by density and heterogeneity. As such, urbanites and visitors are regularly bombarded with a dizzying range of sensory experiences.

Prevailing understandings of how individuals navigate and situate themselves within complex spatial and social arrangements are primarily cognitive, focusing on the process of incorporating and making these stimuli legible to the experiencing subject. Yet, new scholarship on embodiment and affect provides a more robust alternative to this cognitive orientation.

Visual activism in Israel and the occupied Palestinian territories: New media technologies enable witnesses and visual citizenship

This paper will examine how Visual Activism impacts upon the visibility of the Israeli occupation locally and internationally. I will examine the relationship between Visual Activism and new media technologies in Israel and the Occupied Territories (Gaza and the West Bank), investigating how Palestinian, Israeli and international visual practitioners have engaged in anti-occupation political protest and collective action since the second Palestinian Intifada (2000-present), and specifically from 2004 onwards.

My intention is to frame Visual Activism as a tool which draws the addressee into a new critical paradigm of spectatorship; a perspective that contributes to, and enables the development of new political subjectivities. My contention is to examine what it means to be a visual citizen or an enabled witness through the use of interactive media technologies and networks related to activist activities in Israeli and Palestine.

The thrust of my research will focus upon the work of multinational visual activist collectives (Active Stills), individual Israeli practitioner David Reeb, the social-media resistance group for the protection of Bilin, Palestine (Bilib-village.org) who produce a sustained attention to the occupation, enabling a different type of visibility. Significantly, recent scholarly work by visual theorist David Campbell (2009) writing after the Operation Cat Lead, 2008, brought to question the need for what he called a 'continuous narrative' within the Occupied Territories. Campbell called into question the role of military censorship and visual reportage during the conflict as conflated and misrepresentative, suggesting the conflict exacerbated the normal conditions of occupational practices as temporal and exceptional. This paper will highlight the significance of Visual Activism as a tool which enables activists and visual practitioners to sustain a political visibility across a number of mediums and technologies, addressing the issues raised by David Campbell.

The role of support staff and social inequalities in UK secondary schools – Putting 'others' back into policy

This paper draws on a 2½ year qualitative study (2008-2011) in four 'ordinary' English secondary schools which explored how schools enact, rather than implement policy. Funded by the UK Economic and Social Research Council, the research worked on the interface of theory with data, arguing that it is only possible to begin to think sensibly about policy and its enactment if we work with an extensive and conceptually dense definition of policy and policy processes (Ball et al. 2012). Thus we recognise policy as a composite of regulation and imperatives; principles; and multi-level and collective efforts of interpretation and translation (creative enactment). Furthermore, policies are enacted in material conditions, with varying resources and set against existing commitments, values and forms of experience. They involve a variety of actors in the process of their production and this paper considers the role of some of those actors, support staff – often just described as 'others' in official documentation – who are omitted from most accounts of policy processes in schools.

In UK secondary school environments, it is in particularly learning support staff (teaching assistants, learning mentors, behaviour officers, etc.) who often have most contact with young people who are considered 'problem' students, therefore the policy sense-making (or enactment) of this group of staff can be crucially important to the school experiences of these marginalised groups. This paper will thus examine how policy translation(s) by support staff in the four case study schools may impact and interact with some of the social inequalities the schools are presented with. It will also ask whether some of these policy enactments may even be instrumental in creating school-intern social inequalities.

Vejez, género y pobreza: Estrategias de reproducción de los hogares en el barrio el Sur

La presente ponencia indagará las interrelaciones entre la edad y el género a partir del estudio de las estrategias de reproducción puestas en juego por unidades domésticas integradas por adultos mayores en situación de pobreza del barrio El Sur, ubicado en la periferia de la ciudad de La Plata, Argentina.

Las estrategias de reproducción, son entendidas como la trama de prácticas y representaciones puestas en juego por las unidades domésticas tendientes a su reproducción. Utilizar la perspectiva de las estrategias de reproducción posibilita estudiar las articulaciones entre las condiciones económico-políticas y las condiciones específicas de producción y reproducción social de las unidades domésticas.

En decir, el estudio de la vejez en la pobreza se abordará a partir del análisis de la reproducción de los hogares pobres integrados por personas mayores, estudiando las articulaciones económico-políticas generales y las condiciones específicas de producción y reproducción social de las mismas, indagando principalmente tres planos de manera articulada:

A nivel micro social, analizando a la unidad doméstica e indagando las relaciones entre las diferentes clases de edad y al interior de las mismas, a las relaciones intra e intergéneros, intentando visualizar impacto y reordenamiento del hogar por la presencia y/o participación de las personas mayores en el mismo.

A nivel meso social, se analizará dichas unidades domésticas en relación con otros actores, como otras unidades domésticas, organizaciones de la sociedad civil y las presencias estatales, ancladas territorialmente.

A nivel macro social, se analizará el impacto y las significaciones asociadas a las políticas sociales destinadas a las personas mayores.

La investigación, que forma parte de la línea de investigación que desarrollo como becaria doctoral del CONICET "Envejecer en la pobreza: estrategias de reproducción en hogares pobres con personas adultas mayores en Altos de San Lorenzo, Partido de La Plata", se realiza a partir de un abordaje cualitativo.

El cuerpo como manifestación política de las culturas juveniles

En este trabajo analizaremos la dimensión política del cuerpo, para lo cual comenzaremos analizando lo político desde dos puntos de vista: por un lado como expresión de los antagonismos sociales que nunca podrán conciliarse y por otro lado como lugar desde donde el deseo sirve de soporte a las luchas políticas y culturales, descubriendo en el goce un factor político que precisa ser tomado en cuenta. La política así entendida hace referencia tanto a los espacios de lucha social de grupos ubicados en posiciones discursivas distintas como también a la pantalla de deseo que sostiene las estructuras ideológicas. A partir de esto centraremos nuestra atención en las culturas juveniles para analizar como el cuerpo abre el horizonte de nuevas posibilidades de participación política y de ocupación en el espacio público. El cuerpo se manifiesta como un territorio donde las identificaciones que los jóvenes realizan se manifiestan y entran en contacto con otras presentes en el tejido social; el cuerpo es territorio, lugar donde las culturas juveniles se expresan e irrumpen en el entramado social. El cuerpo es territorio donde también los antagonismos sociales se encarnan en los cuerpos juveniles y a partir de éste se libra una lucha simbólica de carácter política; en el cuerpo se llevan las marcas de la exclusión, de la violencia y de las aspiraciones. El cuerpo de las culturas juveniles es también un cuerpo de goce, donde el deseo se conecta con la política. Nuestro estudio pretenderá hacer una lectura política y cultural de algunos de los aportes del psicoanálisis lacaniano tal como han sido elaborados por autores como Laclau, Mouffe, y Zizek con la intencionalidad de leerlos en clave poscolonial.

Linguistic diversity in urban spaces

Global migration processes created and create a huge variety of practicing different languages within urban social spaces. However, multilingualism has not considered yet as a resource of urban development in urban research. In colonial cities, as for example in African countries or India, multilingualism is educated and practiced as a resource of education and development. In comparison, in European societies, multilingualism is also increasingly practiced in everyday life, but language policies in general are still oriented at monolingualism. As a consequence, immigrants are considered as deficient speakers as long as they do not master the standard language proficiently according to the regulated formulated for incomings. Enterprises acting globally, already discovered multilingualism as a resource for their economic profit. This paper aims at developing perspectives how in different areas of urban policies the variety of language capacities of immigrants and residents can be valued in concrete action strategies. It is based on research in cooperation with linguists and ethnologists.

Visual dimensions of biographical processes – a conceptual approach

This paper aims at exploring general dimensions of constructing biographies in and with photographs.

In biographical research, narration based theoretical and methodical concepts have developed concerning the way how biographies are created, how experiences are communicated in narrative interviews, how the relation between a 'lived life' and a 'life story', its social contexts and embeddedness in societal discourses can be understood. But how can we conceptualize biographical processes based on pictures? What happens from a general biographical perspective when we use photographs or other visual material in our everyday life, placing them on book shelves, in pockets, creating photo albums, exchanging them in social networks, etc.? The paper aims at discussing distinctive features of visual dimensions in processes of constructing biographies.

Youth activism in political parties: A case study with university students

Part of the emerging field of youth studies in Brazil, this communication explores and analyzes the experience of young political party activists. These activists are changing how we understand political action. They are creating new groups and political demands engendering alternative ways of mobilizing political activism and transforming what occurs in traditional politically engaged civic practices, such as political parties, trade unions, etc. Interestingly however, the parties continue to rally the support of these young people. I here present a research that focuses on the experience of young activists, the paths they took in joining the political parties, their actual experience in the parties, the time invested and how the party experiences relate to other aspects of their lives. By individual interviews with university students it was possible to reveal their engagement in political parties. A range of selection criteria was developed that enabled bringing together a very diverse group drawing from all social backgrounds; young people of the intellectual elite, the middle and lower classes were among the 21 activists interviewed. The young militants fall into different categories of activism – Student Movement, grassroots organizations, social organizations, internal workings of the party, etc. They also relate their experiences: friendships, romantic relationships, family, career choices and labor market. The study, result of my PhD thesis, tracks the political engagement of these young activists, changes in their investment and mobility through various aspects of party activism composing a mosaic of experiences.

Becoming political: Teachers' activism in the face of Michigan's public education crisis

After eight years of Democratic leadership, in 2010 Michigan voters elected a Republican governor. Like his counterparts in Wisconsin and Ohio, Governor Rick Snyder has presided over a series of legislative and policy changes that would dramatically affect the strength and effectiveness of teachers' unions. Unions can no longer automatically collect dues from their members, for example, nor can they bargain over how to evaluate teachers' performance. Governor Snyder has also enacted measures that will dramatically affect the effectiveness of the public school system. He slashed the budget for public schools and is currently weighing legislation that would eliminate the cap on private charter schools. As such, public school teachers find themselves in a climate of fewer state resources and weaker organizational ability to advocate for stronger teaching and learning conditions.

While Michigan's teachers' unions have been active in mobilizing against these changes, the union response has not matched the intensity of Wisconsin's or the recent success of Ohio's. Indeed, not all teachers have been politically active or even supportive of their unions. Drawing on a series of semi-structured interviews with current and retired teachers from three school districts in south east Michigan, this paper examines how Governor Snyder's recent political decisions have influenced the activism of individual teachers. Reflecting on the experiences of teachers who have become newly, or differently, active in politics yields insights about the factors that have driven their activism. Moreover, teachers' experiences yield insights about the factors that are necessary for teachers' unions to become more successful, not only in terms of mobilizing against policies that weaken public education in Michigan, but in mobilizing their members to become active in the struggle to maintain strong public schools and teachers' unions.

Local effects of a diffused and misleading rhetoric: Social mix and local housing policies

The paper focuses on a specific dimension of the use of the concept of social mix, by discussing the results of intensive empirical work developed on the most recent program of municipal housing promoted in Milan (Italy). The paper will highlight how in the Italian context the social mix approach has been justifying not only actions oriented towards the residential de-segregation of low-income or ethnic minorities groups, but also projects aiming at answering to the housing needs of some specific medium-low income groups that are considered functional to support urban growth. After decades of institutional inertia of housing policies, this attention has been justified as an innovative policy orientation, opening to the involvement of private social housing providers and taking care of the needs of new vulnerable groups, while previous social housing policies were oriented only towards weaker social actors. In this conception, the concept of social mix has been represented as an innovative tool of social justice, among differently disadvantaged social groups. However, until now, this plan has represented a big failure in terms of results. Due to the high cost of the rents, only a part of the stock has been allocated, although a huge housing emergency in the city and a long waiting list of low-income inhabitants. By analyzing this case study, the paper attempts to highlight the existence of different rhetoric in the public debate about social mix, as well as its influence on the design of local public policies. Moreover, the contribution intends to analyze and discuss the possible negative consequences of these programs in terms of social justice. Starting from the research conducted in Milan, the paper will discuss the emerging criticalities with a more comparative perspective, in connection to research work developed in Toronto, Canada and Hamburg, Germany.

The organizing governance structure of a shadow financial market

Since the 1980s, a new market-based financial system has exponentially grown in size and has supplanted the traditional bank-based system as the dominant source of credit and liquidity for the global economy. The growth of this new financial system, however, has not been associated with an expansion in the formal laws and regulations that govern economic action. As a result, large sectors of the economy operate beyond traditional law and regulation, and pose systemic risks to the broader economy and society. The goal of my project is to investigate one of the four major markets in the U.S. shadow financial system—the growing and influential hedge fund market—to uncover what governing mechanisms have been created in the absence of formal regulatory institutions. My investigation uses a systematic application of sociological theory and methods to elucidate both the proximate and distal causes that institutionalize order and governance within hedge fund organizations and the broader organizational field. The empirical data come from 3 years of fieldwork, 40 semi-structured interviews with expert informants in the hedge fund industry, and a comprehensive quantitative database.

The project provides policymakers and federal regulators empirically-based insight into how powerful and opaque financial organizations in the shadow financial system avoid the formal institutional environment, govern in the absence of formal law and regulation, and have created a number of governance failures—which can potentially be mitigated to protect the broader economy and society. At the same time, the project provides sociologists and economists an empirically-based social laboratory to advance a theoretical understanding of how organizations actively construct governance structures within a shadow financial market, how informal governance structures are interrelated with the formal institutional environment, and how the interaction of multiple governance mechanisms converge to create a governing architecture with well-defined governance failures.

Deconstructing deviance and risk abroad: Ethnographic encounters with British holidaymakers

British youth have a notorious reputation for binge drinking, drug use, sex, violence, self injury and risk behaviours within most major European holiday resorts. Consequently, there is much concern about their social activities abroad - especially in the Balearics. While research has documented these behaviours among British youth on these islands, it has tended to rely on survey data and offered little understanding of why these behaviours might take place. This is the principle aim of my paper. My research aims were to examine risk behaviours among British youth abroad and investigate the reasons which underpin these attitudes. The paper is based on findings from ethnographic research with British youth in San Antonio, Ibiza over the course of 2010 and 2011. The data suggests that British youth engage in these behaviours because they are exciting; to escape the constraints of work and family in the UK; and because these behaviours are integral to the construction of their life biographies and identities. The data also indicates that these behaviours are aggressively and commercially endorsed by various aspects of the social context of Ibiza.

The Gross National Happiness (GNH), by analogy with the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) has occupied large space in the media, especially after the creation of a committee in 2008 to study the concept. This committee, which included two prestigious Nobel prizes: Joseph Stiglitz from Columbia University and former Director of the World Bank, Amartya Sen from Harvard University and Jean-Paul Fitoussi, Director for Research of OFCE and professor emeritus of IEP in Paris, made in their report twelve recommendations for the measurement of the subjective well-being. The authors emphasize that knowledge of GDP is not enough, making it necessary to collect additional information focused on the people welfare sustainability. Moreover the authors claim that happiness, as an expression of subjective well-being is a multidimensional concept based on eight key dimensions that must be considered simultaneously (Stiglitz, Sen & Fitoussi).

The purpose of this presentation is the operationalization of the synthetic index of subjective well-being proposed in the Report, based on information provided by the European Social Survey, round 5 (2010) and hence calculate the Gross National Happiness in the participating European countries.

L'objectif de ce travail est d'analyser le groupe de Capoeira Angola à partir de la ville de Lyon en France (Groupe de Capoeira Angola Cabula) et ses relations au sein de la communauté transnationale de la Capoeira Angola. L'analyse considère l'ensemble de règles ritualistes de la Capoeira Angola, appelé fondements, pour la formation des identités des sujets angoleiros qui sont organisées dans un système de lignée fondé sur l'idée d'ancêtre mythique africaine. On voit que le «système de lignée» élargit au monde, à travers de la formation de noyaux émergents et de son alliance avec des groupes de Capoeira Angola traditionnelles, selon la logique spécifique des fondements. Le système lignée fonctionne selon les fondements liés à l'ancêtre mythique africaine qui, à son tour, a également déclaré le fonctionnement du rituel Roue de la Capoeira Angola. Les fondements comme des symboles culturels arrivent jusqu'aux noyaux émergents emmenés par des sujets voyageurs, des images médiatiques et des travaux académiques qui forment un monde imaginaire de la Capoeira Angola. Ce monde imaginaire de la Capoeira Angola est vu comme un processus d'identité contemporain, dans lequel la tradition, la modernité, le local, le global, le sacré et le profane sont présentés comme des concepts en relation dialectique dont la synthèse arrange la Capoeira Angola Glocalizada.

Tourism and child beggary: The ambivalence of a vital and strategic relationship. a comparison of bangkok and Mumbai

The image of the interaction between international tourists and local beggars is a strong mark of globalization as it represents a split between two worlds. On one hand, the tourist symbolizes the cosmopolitan establishment that can move effortlessly across geographical boundaries. The other world, represented by the beggar, refers to social exclusion and a monotonous street life (Bauman, 1998). Tourism reconfigures the traditional nature of the begging interaction. Urban begging has often been described as humiliating since the passersby are indifferent towards beggars (Lankenau, 1999a), this situation is referred by Goffman (1963) as a nonperson treatment. In response, beggars enhance their image by building relationships with bystanders who become a source of social, psychological and financial support (Lankenau, 1999b). The latter situation does not apply to our setting which is not characterized by indifference; it relies on a unique cross-cultural interaction. More than never begging becomes a scheme that requires expertise, emotional control, identity management and dramatization skills (Lankenau, 1999b). This research focuses on communities where begging is based on child participation with a view to understand the determinants of child begging, explain the tourists' perceptions and reveal the impacts on family structure, education, and socialization. I have chosen a cross-cultural approach comparing fields from Bangkok and Mumbai combining ethnography and Grounded Theory. I consider that Grounded Theory has the potential to lead to better ethnography (Timmermans & Tavory, 2007). The data collection is based on participant observation conducted over a period of two years, and on a psychometric scale named "begging scale" created in order to measure the stigmatization of beggary. We will demonstrate that the begging encounter is a construction aimed to gain the tourists' sympathy. We will describe how the children stage their own identities in order to fit in the tourist's stereotypes on beggars and vulnerable children.

Against a new transcendental monster: Poor elias in Brazil and the dilemmas of figurational sociology

This work discusses the epistemological relevance of the "civilizing process" concept to understand cultural aspects of non-Europeans societies. Following the debates within the field of Figurational Sociology over the relevance of using 'civilizing processes' or 'process', the idea is to develop the theoretical implications of using such a theoretical model in the Brazilian socio-historical context. Drawing from Brazilian contemporary discussions on Elias' theory, mainly in fields of Sports and Education, rather than Sociology, the objective is to understand how the 'civilizing process' has been constructed to 'fit' in our particularity. Is it possible that in order to understand the balance of emotions, this usage of the idea of civilizing process concept is creating a kind of universal, all-encompassing process - another transcendental monster? Trying to criticize such interpretations of Elias' work that transcendentalizes a theory that is, in fact, radically historical in its core, we try to point some elements that could help to clarify the link between the foundations of civilizing processes theory and empirical research through the idea of a 'strong sociological agenda'.

Can the idea of risk be a threat to human rights? The answer is negative. By pointing out the risks, the only few certainties one can have are the human, the fundamental rights.

Which is the real threat to human rights based on the idea of risk? Can it be used as an exception to the full exercises of rights? The threat is the distortion about the contents of the human rights. By transforming its fundamentals, one can not only destroy them but also distort them. It must have been in mind that the full exercise of rights is a daily activity. Rights once forgotten are vague words of a past no one wants to learn.

By studying the jurisprudence of the regional human rights courts in a diachronic and synchronic perspective, it is possible the synergetic approach those cases and advisory opinions are able to tell about societies of a specific region of the planet and how those lessons can be learnt by other people in different parts of the world. The Inter-American court of human rights can be an important example.

Climate change, urban and environmental planning: Discussing the case of Rio de Janeiro

The literature about climate change identifies different impacts on large cities and urban agglomerations. Increased mean temperatures and humidity variations can lead to human health risks. The expected sea level rise and the predictable, and already detected, increase in the number of extreme weather events, like floods, also pose new risks. Rio de Janeiro City could have over 10% of its total area affected by the sea level rise; the metropolitan area 18%. Furthermore, in the last three years, this region has experienced a remarkable increase in the occurrence of extreme rainfall events, leading to flooding, landslides and other damage. Urban planning and city management have to deal with these impacts.

Upon issue of Law No. 12187 29/12/2009, Brazil's National Policy on Climate Change was established. At the local municipal level, until early 2011, only Rio de Janeiro (27/01/2011) and São Paulo (05/06/2009) established public policies on climate change with mandatory targets. Recently, in the case of Rio de Janeiro municipality, an urban development master plan has also been approved (01/02/2011). The purpose of this paper is to examine how these two instruments address the issue of adaptation to climate change. We also seek to examine discussion of the same issue in the context of participatory councils dedicated to urban policies (Compur) and environment policies (CONSEMAC). The decision to treat the adaptation issue is justified insofar as it is directly linked to that of territorial planning. It has the potential to bring the ways of thinking about territorial planning into question, and to integrate urban and environmental planning through implementation of the adaptive measures that are defined, in this paper, not only as investments in infrastructure, but also as non-structural measures.

Public water supply and sanitation policy in Rio de Janeiro: Discussing the emergence of new forms of inequality and injustice

In Rio de Janeiro City, access to water and sanitation services is still highly unequal. Many large areas occupied by low-income people suffer intermittent water supply and non-existent sewage systems, such as, the western area, where residents are predominantly low/middle-income. For many years, although recognized as a municipal duty, the various governments never assumed the respective service management. The delegation of services to the statewide public company, CEDAE, meant abdication on the part of the municipal government from engagement in service management. The prospect of the mega sporting events, namely the World Cup 2014 and the 2016 Olympics, are inducing change in this situation. Because of the environmental requirements related to these projects, and the logic of real estate valuation related to them, the Rio de Janeiro municipality has become more proactive concerning water and sanitation services by forming public-private partnerships. For instance, for expansion and management of the west zone sewage systems, a 25-year concession is to be granted to a private group.

The objective of this paper is to discuss the current municipal policy for water supply and sanitation services, examining the emergence of new forms of inequality and injustice. We also seek to identify obstacles concerning democratization of water services governance and management, considering that this policy has been developed without social control, guided by a fragile water and sanitation plan that does not include these principles. Our hypothesis is that the paths followed by municipal water supply and sanitation policy in the past four years have aggravated a situation of unequal access to these services, designed to treat such services as a commodity, not as a citizenship right.

Societal coercion of individuals into mental health treatment: Therapeutic innovations and ethical implications

As western societies move to centralization provision and control of mental health services, there is an increasing tendency for many persons who are reluctant to enter therapy to be assigned to psychotherapy professionals. Drawing on his 2011 book, "Therapy with Coerced and Reluctant Clients," Dr. Brodsky will discuss individuals for whom coercion may be indicated, the ethical issues of forcing people into therapy, and the effects on professionals who offer these services. Special emphasis will be directed towards the common and stereotyped ways in which services are offered. In place of automatic and often ineffective methods, three major approaches will be described: Not asking questions, constructionalism, and use of objective self-awareness.

The presentation will examine the ways in which so-called social deviants are defined and referred, often by the courts, by families, or by employers as a condition of continuing employment. The nature of coercion will be a particular topic of concern, with the development of a nuanced conceptualization of coercion as well as the ambivalence often experienced by nominally coerced clients.

The interaction of societal pressures and demands will be reconciled with the actual activities of service providers. This reconciliation will be demonstrated through the presentation of actual client-therapist dialogues with accompanying sociological commentary and constructs.

Possibilities and limitations of income transfer programs and social assistance services: Are we condemned to the punishment of sisyphus?

Programs of cash transfer have been a dominant strategy in the fight against poverty and a pillar of social protection on the continent. These programs break with the insurance model and innovate by requiring shared responsibility from the families.

Are recognized the impacts on poverty and inequality, education, health, nutrition, housing and in relationships within the family. What are the limits of this type of program to generate autonomy or empowerment of families and individuals? There is in poverty, especially the chronic one, the presence of psychosocial aspects that directly affect both its production and reproduction and the possibilities of overcoming.

In Brazil, Bolsa Familia transfers income to more than 13 million households and, together with the Social Assistance System (SUAS), respond for most of the social assistance policy that is centered on the relationship between income transfers and social assistance services, mixing universal and targeted strategies. The SUAS organizes and regulates the social assistance policies in all federative levels and defines the architecture and operation of protective services by levels of complexity.

The services are significant in promoting changes in the relational aspects and the benefits can avoid the misery of the beneficiaries. However they are insufficient to leverage a change in living conditions of families, a real empowerment. Deficits and demands not considered in education, health, housing and work define the limits of protection policies.

This paper examines these issues and presents the results of a quantitative (608 questionnaires) and qualitative research with beneficiaries of Bolsa Familia and social assistance services in Belo Horizonte, a Brazilian metropolis, measuring effects on relational dimensions and more intangible aspects. The results show such effects (measured by the relational index and the willingness to collective action), but point out the barriers - structural and systemic - that constrain the possibilities for effective poverty overcoming.

Thriving or surviving? Extending working lives in different occupational contexts

Older workers' choices to continue working are occupationally embedded and this paper is concerned with identifying their experiences of careers in three occupational contexts: aged care employment, health care and the energy sector. The paper asks: How does age intersect with varying occupational contexts to influence the extension or shortening of career trajectories? How do specific processes and experiences of employment shape the continued engagement of older workers in their careers within occupational contexts? And, which processes and experiences diminish older workers' engagement in work, potentially shortening their career trajectories?

The paper is based on 'Workability' (1) research project case studies collected in organisational surveys of older and younger energy sector workers (n= 200), health sector workers in rural facilities (n=160) and aged care personal care workers (n=69). Baseline data from the surveys are presented. The paper focuses on the findings of qualitative interviews conducted at multiple levels with workers across ages in these three organisations.

The findings reveal how occupational experiences influence perceptions of extending working lives. In the energy sector skills and access to training arose as critical issues for older technical workers, particularly in regard to learning in new technologies, whilst alternative 'youthful' career structures emerged; in the aged care sector, for personal care workers, managing the exhaustive physical demands of care work was critical to thriving or surviving in this occupation; while for hospital nurses in the health sector, the distribution of work tasks was a critical issue. These findings embedded in distinctive occupational contexts formed the basis for proposals to the organisations for future interventions.

Masculinity, moralities and being cared for: An exploration of experiences of living and dying in a hospice

Hospices are playing an increasingly important role in end of life care in Australia and internationally and the in-patient hospice experience has not been well documented by social scientists. This paper explores some important facets of the contemporary hospice experience through an examination of the perspectives of 11 male and 9 female Australian in-patients in the last few weeks of their lives. Through a series of qualitative in-depth interviews, we explore their conceptions of death and dying and their experiences of being cared for. The results illustrate a range of important themes including: tensions around what constitutes 'the good death'; dying and caring as moral practice; and, the centrality of gender identity and relations in shaping experiences of dying and caring. We argue for a sociological approach to death and dying that better elucidates the interplay of identity, morality and relationality at the end of life.

Investigating the 'neuro' in neuroethics: The implications for neuroethics of the multiplicity of neuroscience and the brain

Accompanying the recent proliferation of neuroscience, there has been a so-called 'neuro-turn' in the social sciences and humanities, of which the birth of 'neuroethics' is one example. Like many of the new 'neuro-disciplines', neuroethics makes bold claims about the implications of neuroscience in terms of, in this case, creating ethical dilemmas and changing how we understand ethics. Elsewhere, there is a growing critique of the enthusiasm for all things neuro, and calls for the meaning of this category, and of neuroscience itself, to be problematised. This paper interrogates the 'neuro' of neuroethics, drawing on data from a sociological study which used ethnographic methods to examine how ethics intersected with everyday work in a translational neuroscience group researching neurodegenerative diseases. The findings of this study debunk the monolithic construction of neuroscience within neuroethics: the daily work of this group involved a diverse array of practices and entities, which group members did not view as contributing to a coherent body of knowledge. Furthermore, the brain itself took on many forms in this setting. Following Annemarie Mol, it is argued that both neuroscience and its commonly understood referent, the brain, are not fixed entities, and are better understood as multiple, only being enacted through practice. This multiplicity calls for a re-evaluation of neuroethics as a meaningful pursuit, when its object of ethical analysis is no longer stable. Through this discussion, the paper contributes to sociological understandings of both neuroscience and ethics, whilst helping to take the 'neuro' out of its black box.

Accumulation by multiple dispossessions: The case of Porto Maravilha, Rio de Janeiro

This paper views the transformation of Rio de Janeiro for the 2014 World Cup and the 2016 Olympic Games as exemplary of current trends of neo-liberal governmentality (Swyngedouw). As urban politics are held hostage to the dictates of unrepresentative organizations like the FIFA and the IOC, and looming event deadlines provide the pretext for planning by state of emergency (Stavrides) and for the imposition of the state of exception (Vainer) in order to reconfigure the urban territory to serve the needs of capital, a series of dispossessions are taking place.

This presentation is based on David Harvey's concept of accumulation by dispossession, to explain the need of capital to colonize new territories and appropriate common goods in order to fructify. It examines the case of the planned dispossession of Rio de Janeiro port area with the Porto Maravilha project. The paper will focus on the multiple dispossessions that characterize this project: 1. A territorial dispossession, marked by planned gentrification and the expulsion of poor residents; 2. A historical dispossession, resulting from the combined effects of cultural instrumentalization and the silencing of the area's slave history; 3. A symbolic dispossession, with the appropriation of the identity and representation of local neighborhoods, such as Morro da Providencia and Morro da Conceição in their touristic commodification; and 4. A legislative dispossession with the passing of exceptional measures and legislative innovations that accelerate the redevelopment process while dismissing the democratic rights of the residents. The article concludes with a discussion of the diverse modes of resistance and social movements that seek to reappropriate the city and its public spaces.

Democratic revolution: Politicising the social or socialising the political

This paper compares the conceptions of democracy and democratisation that are associated with North American pragmatism and contemporary French theories of democratic creativity. I argue that Alexis de Tocqueville's notion of the 'democratic revolution' constitutes a shared point of reference for these two perspectives and that they likewise have in common an interest in the relationship between social creativity and democracy. In the case of North American pragmatism, these considerations inform John Dewey's suggestive, though incomplete, notion of creative democracy and George Herbert Mead's related interpretation of the intersubjective character of democracy. Creative democracy aims to enable individuals to reconstitute the relationship that they have to social institutions and Dewey's pragmatism subsequently influenced deliberative, associative and reflexive cooperative models of democracy. The contemporary French theories of democratic creativity, like those of Cornelius Castoriadis, Claude Lefort and Marcel Gauchet, were equally influenced by Tocqueville's notion of the democratic revolution and his interpretation of the French Revolution. French theories of democratic creativity initially developed in response to the distorted institution of emancipatory ideals during the twentieth century and this results in the somewhat different conception of democracy as a regime. My analysis details how these contrasting and overlapping perspectives contribute to the project of democratisation and provide novel interpretations of the very notion of democracy and its preconditions. In particular, I suggest that pragmatism's understanding of democracy as primarily a social and moral ideal leads to a notion of democratisation as resulting from the socialising of the political; whereas French theories of democratic creativity imply that democratisation involves the politicising of the social.

Educational opportunities distribution: Analysis elements over the access to public school of the Rio de Janeiro municipality

The study analyzes the composition of the groups of students that entered the elementary school between 2008 and 2010 in public schools of the Rio de Janeiro municipality. The study aims to identify distinction factors among the groups of students located in schools with better or worse results in the national evaluations. In the case analyzed, the rules to concretize the initial registry of the students consider procedures parents selection, with important alterations from 2010 on, and procedures of vacancies attributions by the municipality administration. It is well known that, the social differences create different chances of access to the schools that are considered the best ones and to the advantages that those opportunities create to the most favored groups. Hence, the results of the educational processes can be related to the opportunities provided by the family of the students, what points to the existence of advantages to the students that come from most favored families. The results point that, in schools with better results in the evaluations, there are more students with the following characteristics: 1) students that call themselves of white descent; 2) students whose mothers are graduates in college or high school; 3) students that live far from the school; 4) students that have the expected age to be in their first year of elementary school. The study, of transversal character, identified a trend to students' selection even in their very first registry in the elementary school, because the differences in the groups of people that are studying in the schools with better and worse results in the national evaluations can't be considered of random nature, what suggests the existence of selection procedures. The selection can occur in the family relation with the school or in the school relation to the students and their families.

Políticas migratorias y movimiento de trabajadores en el mercosur: Desde fines del siglo XX a la actualidad

En esta ponencia se tendrá por objetivo abordar el régimen jurídico que regula el movimiento temporal de los trabajadores a través de las fronteras estatales en el MERCOSUR. Para esto, se presentará un breve estudio de las diversas normas que se ocupan del fenómeno a nivel internacional, poniendo especial énfasis en las regulaciones adoptadas en el marco del MERCOSUR.

Nos proponemos demostrar que si bien el régimen internacional fue avanzando, las disposiciones establecidas sólo regulan el desplazamiento de un porcentaje mínimo de personas, centrándose en las más capacitadas. Normas jurídicas, que además, se encuentran fragmentadas en una enorme cantidad de tratados y acuerdos bilaterales y multilaterales. En este contexto, presentaremos tanto la legislación que regula la movilidad de trabajadores en el MERCOSUR como los factores que impidieron que en su seno se establezca un acuerdo que regule el libre movimiento de la totalidad de los trabajadores de los países miembros del bloque.

La huelga como la ficción institucionalizada de la participación de los trabajadores en los conflictos colectivos

El propósito de la comunicación es analizar la incidencia que tuvo el recurso a la huelga como forma de participación de los agentes sociales en un conflicto colectivo, objeto de estudio. Nuestra hipótesis de trabajo parte de entender que la ficción funcional del uso de la huelga permitió, por un lado, equiparar una negociación formal, por "traslado colectivo", a una reestructuración empresarial, basada en una precarización de la producción y justificar los costes de la misma de cara a la clase empresarial. Por otro, anular los intereses "económicos" y "sociales" de los diferentes representantes de los trabajadores (comité de empresa y asesor sindical); finalmente, permitió la "participación" de los trabajadores en la negociación del cierre de su centro de trabajo.

Una huelga que, entendemos, nos presentó la tensión entre la propuesta formal empresarial de negociación colectiva, "traslado colectivo", y su intencionalidad oculta, una reestructuración industrial de espaldas al mercado y a los consumidores. Asimismo sirvió, a los representantes de los trabajadores, para armonizar la visión "negativa" a la negociación colectiva del Comité de empresa, ante la rentabilidad del centro de trabajo, frente a la "necesidad" de sus sindicatos de referencia de conseguir, ante la "evidencia" del cierre, una ganancia económica cómo parece mostrar la presencia del canon sindical de negociación.

Desarrollo local y crisis económica: Nuevos escenarios?

Esta comunicación pone el énfasis en la relación entre la crisis económica y las políticas de desarrollo local formuladas desde la Unión Europea. El desarrollo local en su vertiente europea se entiende como la respuesta regional-local a los cambios que se están dando en el escenario comunitario desde los años ochenta: crisis y reestructuraciones económicas, cambios sociodemográficos y ecológicos, cambios en los estilos de vida y pautas de consumo, etc. La Unión Europea comenzó a complementar sus políticas macroeconómicas con políticas de desarrollo local como respuesta desde el territorio a estos cambios. Pero el desarrollo local (fundamentalmente, en su vertiente de políticas de empleo), lejos de adquirir rango de política europea, se convierte en un conjunto de iniciativas innovadoras con una serie de elementos comunes (gobernanza regional-local, lógica bottom-up, cooperación público-privado, etc.). Unas iniciativas que se desarrollan bajo la lógica de la subvención a partir de programas específicos de desarrollo local, y no bajo el paraguas de una partida presupuestaria propia. Esta forma de articulación entre la Unión Europea y los diferentes territorios comunitarios (sean éstos Estados, regiones o municipios) muestra una debilidad inherente al desarrollo local, en tanto que política europea.

Esta comunicación pretende plantear el posible escenario de las políticas de desarrollo local a partir de la actual crisis económica y financiera. Dado el débil carácter de estas políticas se hace pertinente estudiar el posible impacto de la crisis en ellas.

Energy consumption practices and social inequality: The problem of fuel poverty

People living at risk of poverty or in conditions of manifest poverty very often cannot satisfy basic needs such as being able to heat their homes adequately. These groups of energy consumers are vulnerable to the consequences of insufficient or insecure access to energy. Reports by social welfare organisations state that a large part of low-income households has problems in paying their energy bills, at least for some time, and that disconnections are more widespread than expected. Rising fuel costs, bad housing conditions, the use of energy-inefficient appliances etc. belong to the list of problems these vulnerable consumers face and which call for socio-ecological solutions that contribute to energy efficiency as well as to social empowerment.

The proposed paper presents results and policy recommendations from the project "Sustainable energy consumption and lifestyles in poor households" (German acronym: NELA) which investigates energy consumption in low-income households in the Austrian capital Vienna. The study is based on a broad, multidisciplinary approach regarding underlying social theories and guided by questions about the type of socio-cultural and everyday life images that shape energy consumption in low-income households and the target-group-specific strategies and measures that can be developed in order to combine energy efficiency and energy savings with an improvement of living standards. The methodological approach of the project is premised on the qualitative paradigm, and data was collected in qualitative interviews. In summary 50 interviews were conducted in low income households in Vienna, 10 interviews in more affluent households and subsequently analysed.

The main aim of the project is to identify potentials for energy efficiency and energy savings (and thus also of costs) and to develop and implement policy measures that help combat fuel poverty and social exclusion in close cooperation with key actors within the energy system (e.g. energy companies, policy makers, NGOs).

A ideologia da água: Considerações sobre pré-noções em voga nas relações internacionais

O presente trabalho analisa criticamente as pré-noções sobre a água doce nas relações internacionais. A "crise da água", as "guerras pela água", a noção de "escassez" e de "direito à água" se tornaram ideias recorrentes nos estudos, relatórios e recomendações produzidos no âmbito das relações internacionais. Em especial, a escassez apresentada de forma geral e abstrata possibilita a ocultação das opções políticas e econômicas de apropriação, de utilização dos recursos hídricos e de hierarquização desses usos, excluindo a possibilidade de reflexão sobre as suas verdadeiras causas. Implica uma série de propostas pró-mercado, consubstanciadas essencialmente na atribuição de valor econômico à água, dogma que se pretende uma solução ideal para racionalizar os usos da água. Configurou-se, desta forma, o fenômeno da mercantilização da água, que pavimentou o caminho para a difusão de seus corolários: a instauração de uma "governança"; a adoção de um sistema de full cost; a resolução de conflitos por meio de consenso; a gestão integrada com a participação de stakeholders; e o afastamento do Estado da função de prestador de serviços públicos para reduzi-lo ao papel de regulador e provedor da segurança jurídica necessária ao capital privado. Para os cidadãos, resta a possibilidade de se tornarem consumidores, condição indispensável para gozar do direito humano à água. Estas ideias em conjunto constituem a ideologia da economia ultraliberal aplicada à água doce, contribuindo para travestir os objetivos de determinados grupos sociais em definições do mundo social válidas universalmente, mascarando o sistema de relações objetivas dos quais decorrem. O referencial metodológico do trabalho é a sociologia de Pierre Bourdieu, em especial, as ferramentas teóricas da violência simbólica – como um conjunto de meios de coerção não materiais - e do programa de percepção, segundo o qual as palavras têm a capacidade de "prescrever sob a aparência de descrever ou de denunciar sob a aparência de enunciar".

De-politicizing uncertainty

In this paper we show how risk governance at an early stage of technological innovation effectively depoliticizes uncertainty. This is part of a larger investigation into the effects of health policy and risk communication on citizens' risk perceptions. We report on the interactions between key-actors of science, policy, industry and social movements in the Netherlands. They work on the uncertain health effects of electromagnetic fields (EMF) associated with mobile telecommunication technologies.

We align with work on risk governance which focuses on uncertainty (De Vries et al 2011) combined with an interpretive, relational perspective. Symbolic interactions in political processes establish or categorize both the risk object and the object at risk; in this way uncertainty-governance practices influence - and rely on - the shared interpretive resources to which citizens have access (Boholm 2011, Heyman et al 2010, Horlick-Jones et al 2003). We studied interactions between industry, science, politics and social movements via participant observation, interviews and policy documents.

Technological development shapes and is shaped interactively as these actors jointly depoliticize the technology. A coherent set of measures and practices effectively channels the uncertainty about EMF towards more research, more communication and care. Paradoxically, actors work hard to 'avoid politics' while acting in public (Eliasoph 1997). Although they explicitly seek public participation in decision making, deliberation with citizens is rather avoided while the consumer is sought for. When citizens do participate, dissonant frames and feelings are overruled by a strong moral narrative (a technological imperative). Sometimes citizens are able to counter this narrative by redefining uncertainty and by influencing the governance-practices.

Youth in Kyrgyzstan - structures, orientations, tensions

With this paper we aim to discuss the design of a recently initiated research project on youth in Kyrgyzstan as well as the underlying assumptions derived from preparatory fieldwork. The project called „Transitions into adulthood in Kyrgyzstan and their potential for generating tension – strategies, orientations, social rules and limited opportunities” was triggered by the June events of the year 2010 in which ethnic Kyrgyz and ethnic Uzbeks engaged in a bloody outbreak of violence which cost 2000 people their lives. These ethnic clashes were mainly acted out by young men. Nevertheless, our research doesn't focus so much on the „ethnicity” of this conflict but aims at analyzing the life situation of the young actors conducive to such destructive activity. This led us to a research design focusing on young people's conditions (including amongst others financial resources, labour market conditions, familial expectations, social capital) and their ways of coping with these conditions, their strategies and orientations to „work out” present decisions and a future perspective. We aim to identify certain problematic constellations of conditions and strategies/orientations which are likely to foster deviant behavior, and we wish to analyse how social inequality is (re)produced in this transitory society. From our preliminary field work phase, we derived several assumptions concerning these problematic conditions we would like to present as well. These include the high diversification of the educational system, expectations that are held towards young people by the family collective contradicted by a shortage of resources, and life planning strategies of the young actors trying to manage all of the above.

Pensar su tiempo, deshilar el orden social

Edgardo Antonio Vigo fue un artista plástico que utilizó distintas técnicas y formas de expresión, como la poesía visual, las performances urbanas, el arte correo, la escritura de manifiestos y otros textos, así como la edición de revistas, entre otras actividades. Vigo produjo su poética en clave de rebeldía de su tiempo, especialmente entre los '60 y '70, pero su rebelión transcurrió también por fuera del estereotipo más consolidado para la época. La obra de Vigo retoma algunos procedimientos de las vanguardias, como la utilización del objeto ya hecho, el uso de espacios alternativos de producción y difusión de sus obras, el abandono casi completo del formato de cuadro, entre otros. Interesa pensar en este trabajo de qué modo esta apropiación de técnicas y procedimientos previos, se combina con otra ruptura dirigida no sólo al sistema artístico, sino también al orden social. En este sentido, la obra de Vigo piensa su tiempo.

Así como tematizó ciertos acontecimientos de relevancia política de los ámbitos nacional e internacional, también realizó una operación novedosa en su obra: la utilización del discurso judicial-administrativo. Se analizan en este trabajo algunos de sus usos en acciones artísticas. Concluimos en que se trató de una materia que incorporaría en su poética para desnaturalizarla de su lugar original, aristocrático y privatista. En este sentido, toma un aspecto no menor del funcionamiento del orden social disociándolo de su lugar normal y, al ofrecerlo a todos a través de acciones artísticas, permite una apropiación descentrada, fuera de los límites impuestos por su naturaleza.

The labour movement and intellectuals in post-apartheid South Africa: A troubled relationship

Intellectuals played a pivotal role in the revival of militant trade unionism in South Africa from the early 1970s onwards. These intellectuals were located within the burgeoning movement as well as outside it in universities and a wide range of labour supporting organisations. However, since the advent of democracy the labour movement and intellectuals seem to have 'walked away' from each other with the result that the partnership witnessed during the heyday of the anti-apartheid struggle came to an end. Today the two sides maintain a dismissive attitude towards each other and thus none of the vibrant union revitalisation debates one observes among labour activists and intellectuals in some Northern countries are taking place in South Africa. This paper explores the reasons for this troubled relationship and identifies several historical developments that need to be taken into consideration. Among these are what I have referred to as the "contradictory location" of some of these intellectuals in the labour movement (Buhlungu 2006), the relationship of the unions to party politics, the relative legislative protection that South African unions continue to enjoy, the allure of the neo-liberal logic for some intellectuals, and the effects of academic managerialism on intellectual work. The article concludes by presenting a theoretical proposition on the relationship between intellectuals and the labour movement, namely, the most fruitful and vibrant relationships between labour movements and intellectuals occur when the movement is on the defensive and in desperate need of fresh ideas from outside of itself. Similarly, intellectuals find working with labour movements most attractive when no one else takes their ideas seriously.

Prácticas y saberes en la gestión de "jóvenes violentos": Ambigüedades en la aplicación de la ley en los procesos de adolescentes acusados de infracciones

Con la difusión de una retórica universalista de los "derechos humanos" y el surgimiento de nuevos sujetos de derechos a partir de mediados de 1980, la ley de protección de los niños y adolescentes brasileña surgió de forma pionera en América Latina para satisfacer las demandas de los activistas de derechos humanos. Buscando reconfigurar las prácticas de justicia al adoptar el concepto de "adolescentes ciudadanos" como "persona en desarrollo", la ley extiende la protección de los niños y adolescentes, así como la participación de la familia y de la comunidad en las políticas del cuidado infantil y de los jóvenes en el país. Sin embargo, la construcción de este aparato no ocurrió sin contradicciones y ambigüedades, sobre todo en lo que respecta a los jóvenes que participan en actos ilegales. Este trabajo propone discutir el paso de los debates político y discursivos para los términos jurídicos y prácticos, a través de la intervención judicial del Estado en la gestión de la juventud. Analizamos la construcción de un discurso represivo y la creciente institucionalización y control de una parte de la juventud caracterizada como "peligrosa" o "violenta" con el fin de comprobar cómo los preceptos introducidos por la nueva legislación son utilizados en el campo legal. Se utilizó como enfoque metodológico para esa investigación el marco teórico de las ciencias sociales en diálogo con la legislación, para analizar las prácticas cotidianas de los agentes estatales e instituciones en la producción de conocimientos centrados en los sujetos implicados. Tomamos como base para el debate y la construcción de las reflexiones el estudio de un caso que está en trámite en la justicia penal juvenil de un adolescente en un "conflicto con la ley", del cual traemos algunos elementos que parecen recurrentes en la políticas de gestión de "jóvenes violentos" en la actualidad.

Alienation, alienated labor and symbolic capital: A possible dialogue?

Alienated labor may be understood in two different senses, both present in the Marxian thought: one (present in the manuscripts of 1844) refers to the extent into which labor is estranged from its essence when his product becomes private property of someone other than the producer. The other (mainly present in Capital) refers to the way into which an amount of unpaid labor is appropriated by the non-producer (the capitalist) as if it was paid in the purchase of the merchandise labor force: since labor force is sold in the form of working-days, what happens is an exchange between nonequivalents. The first sense departs from the postulate of an essence of labor (that derives from the postulate of a human essence), understood as the very "human vital activity", conceptualized through an abstraction process that seeks to isolate the essential determinations from the accidental ones. Bourdieu reproaches this way of conceptualization as the "substantialist way of thinking", fated to produce ethnocentric idiosyncrasies. Although this sense is still present in the late Marxian formulation (particularly in his concept of labor), Bourdieu is sympathetic to the unveiling of the exploration in the process of sale of the labor force: he speaks of the way into which the "subjective truth" of labor conceals the "objective truth" of exploration. But for Bourdieu this is the way into which symbolic violence operates in the maintenance and reproduction of the distribution of symbolic capitals, and is not immediately present in its production: symbolic capital (cultural, social, etc.) is a concept he develops to understand the distribution of objective positions within symbolic fields and the social space as a whole. The paper will analyze the Bourdieusian formulation in order to understand to what extent the proposed dialogue is possible.

State regulation or public religion? Exploring the state-church nexus in post-apartheid South Africa

Many observers are still surprised by the high public profile religion has acquired over the last twenty years or so. Within sociology two approaches have emerged that interpret and explain the same, or at least closely related, sets of issues arising from these trends in very different terms: following Casanova theorists of "public religion" see these changes in emancipatory terms as the increased ability of religion to enter democratic public arenas and contribute to the public good; proponents of a "state regulation" approach (e.g. Jim Beckford) view them as effects of the enlistment of religion into governmental programs in the context of broader efforts to social control.

In this paper I explore the conceptual space opened through these hypothesis with regard to the relationships between state and religion in South Africa. The creation of a secular state after the end of apartheid has set the terms for state-church relationships relocating churches within civil society while offering them some space within the state. I reconstruct the above-mentioned conceptual space in terms of the far-reaching independence of the South African state from religious legitimation and examine the implications of this for the flexibility of the governmental management of religion and for religious positioning vis-à-vis the state. The empirical focus is on the most controversial themes such as same-sex marriage and abortion and on the shifting organizational ties between government and churches.

Media, risk and absence of blame for 'acts of god': Attenuation of the European volcanic ash cloud of 2010

This paper analyses the character, extent and patterns of media coverage of the 2010 volcanic ash cloud, comparing it with coverage of the Deep-water Horizon oil spill, Mexican swine flu outbreak, Chinese earthquake and later, 2011 ash cloud. It does so drawing upon sociological themes and concludes that the ash cloud was reported largely in its own terms rather than being amplified as a wider, uncertain threat. As well as the absence of major incident and casualties two interrelated factors are highlighted to explain this result. Emphasising the importance of hazard duration, the unexpected arrival and short lived character of the ash cloud was one important factor that limited the potential for sustained media amplification. More broadly, this was an 'act of God' with no clearly responsible agents. This preliminary study suggests that contemporary media risk narrative requires a focus for institutional blame attribution, and without a plausible candidate amplification may not acquire momentum.

Risk, ritual and health responsabilisation: Japan's 'safety blanket' of surgical face mask wearing

This paper develops understanding of surgical mask wearing in Japan, now a routine practice against a range of health threats. Their usage and associated meanings are explored through surveys conducted in Tokyo, with both mask wearers and non mask wearers. It contests commonly held cultural views of the practice as a fixed and distinctively Japanese collective courtesy to others. Historical analysis suggests an originally collective, targeted and science-based response to public health threat has dispersed into a generalised practice lacking clear end or purpose. Developed as part of the biomedical response to the Spanish flu of 1919, the practice resonated with folk assumption as a barrier between 'purity' and 'pollution'. But mask wearing only became socially embedded as a general protective practice from the 1990s through a combination of commercial, corporate and political pressures that responsabilized individual health protection. Developments are usefully understood amidst the uncertainty created by Japan's 'second modernity' and the fracturing of her post war order. Mask wearing is only one form of a wider culture of risk; a self protective 'risk ritual' rather than collective, selfless practice.

The cash transfer programs in Brazil, Mexico, Honduras and Nicaragua: Similarities and differences in the fight against poverty

Poverty has always been one of the most striking economic features of Latin America. Although the large numbers of poor still deserves much attention, in recent years many governments have obtained interesting results in the decreasing of poverty. Among other reasons, this change was due to conditional cash transfers programs, which have been implemented in many countries. According to recent data from ECLAC, currently 19% of the population in 18 Latin American countries receive the benefits of these programs. This article aims to compare four social policies that transfer income to the poorest by imposing some conditions for the receipt: Programa Bolsa Família (Brazil), Programa Nacional de Educación, Salud y Alimentación – PROGRESA (Mexico), Programa de Asignación Familiar – PRAF (Honduras) and Red de Protección Social – RPS (Nicaragua). These countries were chosen because they represent two distinct groups. Mexico and Brazil have more than 100 million people in large territories, and Nicaragua and Honduras, have less than 10 million people and smaller territories. These features allow to analyze different situations. And although conceptually similar, there are differences between the programs, and especially between the results achieved. The comparison was conducted in five major areas: types of conditionalities, beneficiary population, selection criteria, values of transfers and results. A sixth area of comparison is related to the integration of these programs with other social policies seeking to verify whether these programs could avoid the perpetuation of the vicious cycle of poverty and also, represent a hope for the next generations. The comparative study was based on official documents, evaluation reports and international data base, which contributes to analyze and understand whether these cash transfer programs can produce good results in building a fairer society.

Autores como Beck, Giddens y Bauman, entre otros, alertan sobre las transformaciones que lo que Appadurai llama la "modernidad desbordada" provocan sobre la política. En ese sentido, el problema de la representación política constituye una cuestión central para la ciencia social. En efecto, "los riesgos se han convertido en el motor de la autopolitización de la sociedad industrial moderna e incluso más, con esta sociedad varían el concepto, la localización y los medios de la política" (Beck)

Es objetivo de este trabajo explorar las nuevas fuentes de incertidumbre que se ciernen sobre la representación política, provenientes de lo que se denomina hoy sociedad del riesgo.

Martirio individual y colectivo como fórmula para la representación de masacres históricas

En el Antiguo (Macabeos) y el Nuevo Testamento (Hechos), el martirio es una expresión fundamental de las creencias religiosas. La masacre de los santos inocentes, en la cual Herodes supuestamente asesinó a los niños de Belén en un intento de eliminar a Jesús, fue analizada por los padres de la iglesia. Los mártires del cristianismo temprano eran creyentes que murieron o sufrieron por el sólo hecho de ser testigos de sus creencias. Este corpus real y mítico era esencial para la teología y fue representado con frecuencia en la iconografía cristiana. Pero una de las consecuencias de las guerras de religión y las conflictivas relaciones entre turcos y europeos durante la temprana modernidad fue que el martirio comenzó a usarse como metáfora para representar nuevas matanzas. Un hito de este desarrollo fue la serie de tres pinturas sobre la masacre de los inocentes, elaboradas por Matteo di Giovanni entre 1485 y 1495. La primera de estas imágenes mantiene las características clásicas del tema iconográfico, pero en la última la figura de Herodes se convierte en la de un sultán turco. Esta decisión incorpora eventos recientes (las masacres perpetradas por los turcos en Constantinopla y Otranto) en la masacre religiosa y mítica del pasado cristiano. Nuestro texto estudiará cómo se generalizó la representación de masacres reales como escenas de martirio en la Europa de la modernidad temprana y la época contemporánea. El análisis comenzará con los ejemplos de Di Giovanni, hará foco en el desarrollo de esta fórmula durante las Guerras de Religión en Francia e intentará una comparación entre estos usos tempranos y las referencias al martirio en la representación de genocidios contemporáneos. Finalmente, se buscará describir las relaciones entre esta metáfora y otros modos de describir y representar masacres históricas, principalmente como escenas infernales o cinegéticas.

(Re)constructing past and future in the settler colony

While the spatiality of settler colonial domination is well-explored, the temporalities that inform settler colonialism and its various assemblages of power are less so. In this paper, I consider how re-constructions of the past and claims over the future come to figure in assertions of ownership in the unique settler colonial space of Israel. I take as my focus two case-studies from the contested and conflictual space of Jerusalem: the 'City of David' archaeological park constructed in the Palestinian neighbourhood of Silwan, and the Temple Institute, an organisation dedicated to the rebuilding of the Third Temple. Although one is backward-looking and one forward-focused, I argue that both are indicative of a temporality of belonging that invokes past and future as a way to stake claim on the present. This temporality enacts exclusive ownership over space and nullifies alternate presence – namely, that of Palestinians.

As much as both organisations are admittedly on the extreme right of politics, I further contend that such a temporality nevertheless permeates mainstream Israeli society and is, indeed, productive of dominant contemporary variants of Zionism. This exclusive temporality not only precludes the diversities of connection to and in the city-space of Jerusalem, but also inhibits possibilities for future reconciliation. Unearthing and promoting alternate temporalities inside Israeli society, I conclude, is thus critical to the actualising of any imaginary that seeks a more inclusive, plurality-cognisant and hopeful Jerusalem.

Occupational gender composition and workplace support: The role of motherhood

This paper analyzes the dependency between working in a gender-segregated occupation and perceived workplace support. It also examines the extent to which this effect is moderated by motherhood. In line with expectation states theory, persons working in gender-atypical occupations (that is, occupational minorities) are faced with biased performance expectations because they are seen to be less suitable for the occupational role and less competent to fulfill the demands of the position. It is assumed that this leads to isolation mechanisms and lower support at the workplace for these persons. Furthermore, it is hypothesized that these isolation mechanisms are moderated by motherhood, which is culturally associated with particularly low performance expectations. Quantitative analyses of German data confirm lower perceived workplace support for men working in women's occupations, and - even stronger - for women working in men's occupations. In addition, the study provides clear evidence that for women the effect of being an occupational minority on workplace support is driven to a large extent by mothers with young children: For mothers, working in men's occupations is associated with especially low levels of workplace support; mothers show by far the lowest value compared to all other groups. Therefore, the motherhood role seems to work as an additional status characteristic besides gender, leading to a particularly low level of workplace support for women in typically male occupations. In addition, the model shows especially for women that the degree of perceived workplace support is significantly larger in firms that have a family-friendly climate: If job-family compatibility at the workplace is high, this has strongly positive effects on perceived workplace support. From that result it gets visible that a family-friendly climate is important when analyzing determinants of workplace support or related measurements like job-related well-being from a gender perspective.

Occupational sex segregation and management-level wages in Germany: What role does firm size play?

The paper analyzes the gender pay gap in private-sector management positions in Germany based on data from the German Socio-Economic Panel Study (SOEP) for the years 2000-2009 using fixed effects models and Heckman's correction. It focuses on the effect of occupational gender composition on fulltime wages, and the extent to which wage penalties to management-level employees working in predominantly female occupations are moderated by the firm size—an effect that has not yet been analyzed in the literature. Drawing on human capital theory, devaluation of women's work and organizational approaches, we find wage penalties for "women's work" in managerial positions only in large firms. This speaks for a pronounced devaluation of predominantly female occupations for managers in these firms, which might be due to the observation that large firms tend to be older and characterized by more formalized structures, more established "old-boy networks," and a wider gap between wages for predominantly male and female occupations. Interestingly we find a positive segregation effect in small firms for women, showing higher wages for those who work in women's occupations. More research is needed to explain this. One argument may be that in small firms—where larger proportions of women are managers and "old-boy networks" may therefore be less common—female managers have more power to overcome traditional structures of inequitable pay for women's and men's occupations and to give predominantly female occupations a slight advantage over men's occupations.

"The emotional costs of transnational fatherhood: Dilemmas of fathering from afar"

Fathers are expected not only to provide financial capital, but also to develop and provide emotional support to their children. This dual support gets at odds when labor migrant fathers ventured abroad to provide for their families leaving behind children and wife. Despite large volume of research on labor migration, the emotional costs associated with how fathers experience fathering from afar have yet to be studied, as migration research highlights (e.g. Deby 2010).

I argue that by focusing on gaining economic security in the U.S. to provide for their children left behind and on saving enough financial capital to bring the family to the U.S., fathers turn to the breadwinner role. Both the physical and emotional distance from their children make these men to embrace "breadwinnerhood"—which comes along with high emotional cost. This is particularly the case for families that are undocumented and for whom it is hardly impossible to move back and forth between their country of origin and the country of destination, like Peruvian immigrants in the U.S.

I found that while many of these working-class Peruvian immigrants delayed migration to be able to be with their children, the dare economic conditions in Peru made them accelerate the migration process. Once in the U.S., fathers concentrated in securing jobs. This fact limited their time to communicate with their children (and wife) distancing them from their families not only physically but also emotionally. Since fathering is a two-way street, for children left behind fathers become the image of the person they talk to once a day or a week, and who satisfies material needs. Consequently, fathering from afar fathers to retrench from their emotional connection and consolidate their breadwinner role. This paper is based on four-years of ethnographic work in the Peruvian community and their relatives in Peru.

Hacer escuela en territorios de pobreza urbana y degradación ambiental: Un estudio en torno de los dispositivos pedagógicos en José León Suárez

En este trabajo nos proponemos discutir primeros avances de investigación que estamos desarrollando en una escuela secundaria básica, ubicada en contextos de extrema pobreza urbana, José León Suárez- Partido de Gral. San Martín1.

Nos importa enfocar la mirada entorno de las particularidades que presenta "hacer escuela" en contextos de degradación ambiental y pobreza urbana; esto es, centrarnos en el devenir de la vida escolar a través de las prácticas, relatos y vivencias de los distintos sujetos escolares. Proponemos que en estos espacios urbanos, las instituciones escolares, han dejado de ser un espacio de homogeneización y encuentro de diferencias, en tanto forman parte integral de los procesos y lógicas que presenta la metropolización selectiva, social y ambiental de la ciudad metropolitana.

Es así como la escuela bajo estas condiciones y signada por la lógica del gerenciamiento, ha quedado en gran medida "librada a su propia suerte", por lo que suele enfrentar diariamente problemáticas que le son muy difíciles de abordar, ello tanto por las condiciones de vida de los alumnos, como por las condiciones y políticas de escolarización que, en estos espacios urbanos, se imprimen en el "hacer escuela". Así, a partir de observaciones y relatos obtenidos durante el trabajo de campo, procuramos describir las características que adquiere la escuela atravesada por la degradación ambiental, propia de los territorios urbanos más pobres (Davies, 2007).

Participation in the 'right to the city': Democratic imaginings and the role of collective action

In response to the rising significance of cities and unique manifestations of urban poverty, Henri Lefebvre's (1968) 'right to the city' (RTTC) holds the potential to operate as a powerful new articulation of rights for the disenfranchised urban poor. At its heart, this paradigm advocates for a conception of citizenship as participation, requiring a fundamental re-imagining of democratic processes at the city-level. With this in mind, this paper explores the institutional arrangements that facilitate this radical dialogue, making the linkages between democracy, collective action, and the RTTC.

Within informal settlements, one such 'democratic re-imagining' is represented by Shack/Slum Dwellers International (SDI)—networked residents that employ strategies of collective action to secure settlement improvements. The strength of their innovative methodologies is demonstrated in successful tangible outputs (improved access to water, sanitation, and housing) but also in its empowering effect, creating new spaces for resident participation in city governance. While these successes have been explored in detail, less attention has been focused on how the SDI methodology interprets the underlying normative and procedural debates on democracy, and the extent to which this orientation successfully stimulates radical transformative change as imagined by Lefebvre.

Focusing specifically on four elements: the design of democracy, collective identity, the nature of citizen-state engagement, and the role of institutionalisation, this article draws out the major theoretical discussions underpinning participatory processes. These debates and implications are illustrated through the case study examination of Muungano, the SDI-member federation working within the settlements of Nairobi, Kenya. Ultimately this article aims to reflect on the role of 'participation', exploring the ways in which the RTTC can guide a more transformative practice and contribute to the expansion of social justice in the city.

Gentrification, education and exclusionary displacement in East London

In this paper we address the issue of displacement which has been at the core of debates over gentrification. Taking Peter Marcuse's (1985) discussion of different types of displacement as a starting point, we draw on evidence from a recent study conducted in East London to argue that there is clear evidence of 'exclusionary displacement' and 'displacement pressure'. This however was found not in the field of residential and tenurial displacement but in that of education and specifically the choice of schooling. We draw on interview and other data to show how the incoming middle classes in the Victoria Park area of inner East London have not only displaced existing poor residents but also many of the less affluent middle class from the favoured state schools in the area by adopting some schools and demonising others through the use of their cultural power to define some schools as 'unacceptable'. Our argument is that the consequences of this can either take the form of direct exclusionary displacement when middle class pressure on favoured schools leads to local people being unable to get their children into them because of 'distance from school' selection criteria or, equally, by labelling other schools as unacceptable, they exert displacement pressure on those who send their children to them with the consequence that they leave the area.

'Coca-Cola quit India': Resisting CSR as a global management strategy

The Coca-Cola Corporation[1] promotes itself as a responsible company while protesters from India and Colombia to the United States and Europe criticize its business practices. Coke, like many other transnational corporations (TNCs), has adopted corporate social responsibility (CSR) policies to protect its revenue and the reputation of its global goods and brand. Using a social movement against the Coca-Cola Corporation in India as a case study, this paper examines the ideological tenets and social impacts of corporate social responsibility (CSR). Villagers in Plachimada and several Indian towns charged Coke with depleting, polluting, and privatizing the community ground water as well as destroying people's livelihoods. In response to the Indian movements and world-wide supporters, Coke instituted a water stewardship initiative as part of its CSR program. Unlike the majority of scholarship within critical CSR studies, this analysis illustrates the inability of CSR to limit the harmful effects of TNCs in underdeveloped countries.

In fact, rather than being used to curtail the harmful effects of economic globalization and transnational corporations, CSR is typically employed to limit governmental regulation, further neoliberal economic globalization, and justify increased foreign investment in the Global South. CSR helps companies, like Coke, appear environmentally responsible and to quell oppositional social movements without making meaningful changes to their business practices. As a result, CSR furthers the neoliberal agenda, which promotes economic globalization and foreign investment as the best means to achieve sustainable development. The paper concludes by positing that voluntary corporate self-regulation cannot achieve the same results as independent government oversight. This research is based on ethnographic evidence from eight months of field work in India and 105 in-depth interviews.

(Re)conceptualizing environmentalism in the global south: Lessons from India

This paper examines three popular water struggles in India and proposes that a new approach is needed to understand environmentalism in the Global South. Most scholarship on environmental movements in underdeveloped countries characterizes them as struggles led by marginalized local actors and suggests that protesters' participate in movements to defend their access to necessary resources. While this livelihood approach is useful, it ignores or trivializes the heterogeneous nature of participants, the meanings and cultural significance of resources, importance of broad-based coalitions, and influence of transnational discourses on movements. As a result, analyses are often one dimensional and provide a limited view of struggles. I move beyond the livelihood approach also known as "environmentalism of the poor" (Guha and Martinez-Alier 1997, Martinez-Alier 2002), and carry out a holistic assessment of the three water movements.

The water struggles all started between 2002 and 2005 as responses to the World Bank and Indian government's development strategy of foreign investment in public utilities (water) and private industry (the Coca-Cola Corporation). An in-depth analysis of the water conflicts in New Delhi, Mumbai, and Plachimada reveals the need to recognize the existence of a variety of environmentalisms in the Global South. This approach encourages researchers to consider the different actors, sites, interests, knowledge, values, and meanings within environmental conflicts. The paper, therefore, exposes numerous dimensions of movements including their livelihood, lifestyle, cultural, epistemic, and global struggles. This research is based on ethnographic evidence from eight months of field work in India and 105 in-depth interviews.

Consumo de sustancias psicoactivas en instituciones educativas públicas y su relación con las políticas públicas en Colombia

La presente ponencia pretende esbozar las dinámicas de consumo de sustancias psicoactivas (SPA) que se presentan en un colegio público de secundaria en Colombia, en el cual a pesar de ser una institución controlada por el Estado y cuyas programas control-consumo se evidencian fuertemente, las tendencias muestran un aumento en el consumo por parte de los jóvenes.

En ese sentido, la perspectiva teórica partirá del concepto de consumo de SPA y políticas públicas. El primero entendido como una serie de prácticas sociales usualmente estigmatizadas, las cuales se enmarcan dentro de un conjunto de representaciones -por lo general- stigmatizantes, que se regulan a través de otras normas sociales, las cuales son instauradas por pares. El segundo concepto consiste en aquellas políticas concebidas por un ente gubernamental con un carácter social y que se dirija a mitigar una problemática existente en la sociedad, de acuerdo al consumo tendrían que ver con las políticas de prevención y no legalización.

Cabe resaltar que para mayor claridad frente a las SPA, estas son entendidas como aquellas sustancias que alteran el sistema nervioso de un individuo, causando efectos diversos; algunas son legales como el tabaco (cigarrillo) y el alcohol, otras no lo son como la cocaína, la marihuana, la base de coca, entre otras.

En términos metodológicos para realizar esta investigación, que duró aproximadamente ocho meses, se aplicó en primera instancia una encuesta a 207 jóvenes de un colegio de secundaria de la ciudad de Cali, la cual buscaba indagar sobre las prácticas y representaciones del consumo de SPA. En segunda instancia, se realizaron una serie de entrevistas personalizadas en donde indagábamos sobre la trayectoria de consumo de los estudiantes de dicha institución.

Grief and empowerment in the migration process of leaving Brazil to Italy

Despite the fact that human life in itself can be defined as a process of ruptures and recreations, it is undeniable that in transnational migration this process becomes exacerbated provoking many mixed feelings related to instability. The aim of this paper is to discuss these feelings through the lenses of Elisabeth Kübler-Ross five stages of grief. To illustrate this author model, examples are given of a qualitative research with Brazilian immigrant in Rome, Italy in the years of 2003 and 2004. Interviews were then carried with forty six Brazilian women, thirty four men and three key persons. The results concentrate on the evaluation of meanings attached to life events and the social integration through work, living conditions, associations and education achievement. Since the process of inclusion in Italian society was not easy for most of them and many immigrants feel many moments of grief, the idea is to illustrate the negotiation of emotions lived by immigrants in the framework of the five stages of grief when people: negate what is happening and isolate themselves, feel anger, try to negotiate with reality, feel depressed and finally accept reality. Yet, because there are also feelings of empowerment, this paper will also describe a few success histories of empowerment and raise concerns of the difficulty of the process of becoming socially integrated in the country of destination being attached to the country of origin.

Three research traditions and their influences over the two major residential segregation studies in Brazil during the last two decades

During the 1990s and the 2000s, two Brazilian academic groups developed major research efforts in the field of residential segregation with outputs that became canonical in the country. In Rio de Janeiro, the Observatório das Metrópoles (OM) started its work in the 1980s checking the hypothesis of the dual social stratification in global cities, adjusting and applying theoretical and methodological inputs stemming from the French school. The Centro de Estudos da Metrópole (CEM), in São Paulo, followed a more empirically-based line of studies along lines of the US research tradition. However neither group abandoned the Latin-American influences of the 1960s and 1970s, founded in the works of Karl Marx and Max Weber. Later on, scholars from Uruguay and Chile developed theoretical and methodological frameworks that became influential in Brazil. Notwithstanding the leading roles and the invaluable knowledge that OM and CEM put out over this period, they stand as isolated experiences limited to certain academic and policy-making circuits. In this sense, their experiences demand a comprehensive analytical assessment in terms of their theoretical and methodological sources as well as their empirical results and policy implications. The objective of this article is to comparatively analyze the origins, influences, trajectories, and results of OM's and CEM's research endeavors on residential segregation in order to establish their convergences and divergences. This objective rises from the concern that the Latin American exchanges, influences, and implications of the works of OM and CEM are little-known and mistaken and hence have an underestimated potential. The consequence of this relative isolation is detrimental to the Latin American scientific community in the social science field as well as to policy-makers and the urban population of large urban areas of the continent.

La confluctualidad in America Latina

La conflictividad en América Latina comparte rasgos comunes: plataformas de exclusión y desigualdades crónicas mayoritariamente cuestionadas por la ciudadanía, conflictos complejos que asocian tales desigualdades con el número de conflictos y su intensidad, combinación de protestas sociales que se expresan tanto en el plano social-nacional como en el plano cultural-global, racionalidades prácticas en los conflictos por la reproducción social que conviven con demandas de mayor eficacia e eficiencia institucional y con conflictos culturales de carácter sistémico. Asimismo, Estados omnipresentes en todas las esferas de los conflictos con serias limitaciones para procesarlos y sociedades con conflictos cada vez más fragmentados, nuevos espacios públicos vinculados con sistemas de comunicación donde se representan de manera contradictoria los conflictos y conflictos que tienden a desplazarse crecientemente hacia las redes de información y comunicación con efectos multiplicadores en los nuevos escenarios de poder. En suma, existe una mayor complejidad social vinculada con sistemas políticos y Estados con relativas y limitadas capacidades de gestionarla. Las situaciones y los escenarios prospectivos son diversos y sus opciones abiertas.

Crisis económica europea y la ley de responsabilidad fiscal de Brasil

La búsqueda de ajuste estructural y su impacto en la acción individual y colectiva está presente en este momento de crisis sistémica (Luhmann). Los cambios culturales y estructurales son necesarios para la consolidación de la estabilidad social. Los nuevos modelos de paradigmas (Kuhnn) emergen en los escenarios de crisis. En un momento en que la crisis económica europea llama la atención del mundo, la Ley de Responsabilidad Fiscal de Brasil es citada como un posible modelo de estabilización y consenso social (Habermas). Esta ley es el resultado de un largo proceso de maduración de la sociedad brasileña, después de un período histórico de mala gestión de las finanzas públicas. Los efectos de la deuda externa provocaron cambios importantes en las instituciones brasileñas, como la conciencia de la necesidad de aumentar el control fiscal de manera permanente y duradera. Esta opción implicaba la adopción de una política de Estado más amplia que las políticas de gobierno, cuya transitoriedad en el ejercicio del poder no debería comprometer el diseño económico de la nación. Con esta perspectiva, se propone un examen de la Ley de Responsabilidad Fiscal de Brasil. Intenta-se, pos, presentar la Ley de Responsabilidad Fiscal y sus marcos normativos más importantes para una discusión respeto de nuevos paradigmas que contribuyan para el control de los gastos públicos, ampliando la participación ciudadana (Habermas) en los procesos de toma de decisiones que comprometan el presente y el futuro del orden macro social.

Palabras Claves: crisis económica, nuevos paradigmas, la Ley de Responsabilidad Fiscal.

Ouidoria: Apertura cognitiva y acceso a la administración de la justicia

En tiempos de acceso a La Justicia, preguntase se ocurren los cambios necesarios para democratizar el acceso de los ciudadanos a los servicios judiciales. La inestabilidad social y las transformaciones típicas de la modernidad hacen necesario la actuación de sistemas peritos (Giddens). El Poder Judicial emerge como un sistema perito que tiene como función interpretar los hechos sociales y aplicar el derecho objetivo según el principio de justicia. Pero la estructura judicial y su funcionamiento sufren las mismas interferencias negativas del retardo en solucionar las demandas sociales como ocurren con otros subsistemas sociales. El contexto actual de la sociedad moderna impone un canal de apertura cognitiva (Luhmann) que democratice el acceso tanto a la Justicia como al acompañamiento del trámite y funcionamiento transparente, célere y eficaz del Poder Judicial. Así, las OUIDORIAS en Brasil actúan como órganos de apertura cognitiva para democratizar el acceso de los ciudadanos (Habermas) al funcionamiento interno del Poder Judicial. La forma de gestión democrática e independiente de las OUIDORIAS puede posibilitar tipos de investigación con base empírica del tipo cuantitativo o con bases de observación directa del tipo cualitativo. Con esta perspectiva, inserida en la temática propuesta, intentase analizar aspectos novedosos de este órgano de apertura cognitiva y comunicación (Luhmann, Habermas) en lo sistema judicial brasileño, haciendo, cuando posible, análisis comparado con órganos de igual naturaleza en Argentina y otros países que adopten el sistema de más amplio acceso a una orden jurídica justa.

Palabras Claves: apertura cognitiva, accesibilidad y administración de la Justicia.

Pueblos indígenas, recursos naturales y conflicto social en México, Canadá y Estados Unidos 1945-2011

Este artículo analiza los vínculos entre los temas de pueblos indígenas, recursos naturales y conflicto social; considera que los pueblos indígenas en Canadá, Estados Unidos y México siguen siendo actores políticos en lucha y resistencia. El artículo analiza de forma comparada las formas de protesta y acción colectiva que comunidades indígenas en estos países han adoptado para defender sus derechos sobre territorio y recursos naturales. La hipótesis principal de este artículo sigue el tema planteado por UNRISD y su proyecto de investigación sobre Identidades, Conflictos y Cohesión Social; esta hipótesis sostiene que los derechos de los pueblos indígenas sobre territorio se ven amenazados por planes y políticas de conservación ambiental o explotación de recursos naturales promovidos por gobiernos nacionales, instituciones multilaterales y corporaciones multinacionales (Sawyer y Gomez 2008).

Conflictos y organización social en el interior del parque estadual da Serra do Mar, Sao Paulo, Brasil

El histórico de la relación entre los pobladores y los gestores del Parque Estadual da Serra do Mar (PESM), ubicado en el litoral norte del Estado de Sao Paulo, el más rico y desarrollado de Brasil, está caracterizado por los conflictos relacionados a los derechos de permanencia y de uso de los recursos naturales. Creado en 1977, durante la última dictadura militar y siguiendo las premisas proteccionistas venidas del Hemisferio Norte, el PESM permaneció en el papel hasta comienzos de los años 1980, cuando comenzaron los primeros contactos con los pobladores locales. Estos pobladores, trabajadores del campo y pescadores, vieron, entonces, deslegitimados sus derechos al trabajo y a la continuación de sus actividades productivas y culturales. La ley brasilera no permite la presencia humana al interior de los parques. Este conflicto originó nuevas formas de organización social en el PESM: líderes locales surgieron y se formaron asociaciones comunales que tenían por objetivo la lucha por los derechos que sentían violados. A lo largo de los últimos años, el diálogo entre la gestión y los pobladores se ha intensificado y nuevos espacios de discusión y negociación han aparecido. La misma gestión del PESM ha propiciado la creación de estos espacios, donde no sólo participan pobladores y gestores, sino otros actores, como ONG y científicos. El interés de los gestores con la creación de estos espacios era facilitar la administración del área, sin embargo, en algunos casos, el surgimiento de líderes cada vez más capacitados (precisamente por la existencia de estos espacios) ha hecho que las negociaciones sean más complejas. Por otro lado, algunos de los líderes comunales ahora trabajan para la administración del Parque, teniendo intereses encontrados con respecto a su acción política. El conflicto, en constante mudanza y resignificación, sigue siendo el principal propulsor de transformación social en el PESM.

Causal effects of retirement timing on health and well-being

OBJECTIVE: This article explores the relationship between the timing of retirement and subjective well-being change following that transition. Using longitudinal data from the Health and Retirement Study (HRS), we test four theory-based hypotheses about this relationship—that retirements maximize subjective well-being when they happen earlier, later, anytime, or on-time. METHODS: We examine individuals before and after transitioning to retirement and employ probit models with instrumental variables to estimate the causal effects of retirement timing on subjective health and mood after retirement. RESULTS: The results support the hypothesis that retirements maximize subjective well-being when they happen "on-time": Both very early and very late retirement transitions are associated with lower subjective well-being after retirement. DISCUSSION: Workers who begin their retirement transition around age 62--Social Security's early eligibility retirement age--experience the best outcomes in terms of subjective health and mood. This finding offers empirical support for the cultural-institutional theory that emphasizes the role of norms, expectations, and institutional cues. It highlights a tension between the economic gains of working longer and the subjective well-being benefits of retiring at early eligibility age. Raising the retirement ages would probably reduce well-being in the short run, but over time, cultural expectations would likely adjust.

Comparing Mexican young's household characteristics under various ethnicity criteria

Mexico is a country with a high presence and diversity of indigenous population. There are over 56 indigenous groups officially recognized, distributed all around the country.

Although the indigenous issue has been of permanent interest in all the country's population censuses, and these have been the principal source of sociodemographic indigenous data, there is still no consensus about how to identify the indigenous population. The main and traditional way to identify them has been through the spoken language, but this criteria has proved to be very limited, leaving aside important proportions of people who, independently of being or not indigenous language speakers, share other ethnic characteristics (beliefs, customs, values, traditions). The most recently Population Census (2010) included the criteria of self-identification as indigenous, widening the possibilities of correctly capture indigenous identity. Even more, beyond individual attributes, viewing the household as a socialization and cultural transmission space -specially important for the young-, a third criteria for indigenous identification can be the consideration of indigenous status of parents or other adults at home.

Based on a larger research aimed to analyze the family environment of Mexican youth, and using 2010 census data, the paper compares composition and structure of young's households using several criteria for defining indigenous population. Results provide a landscape of some family characteristics of indigenous youth, and differences found illustrate implications and relevance of criteria employed, all of which also constitute important inputs for the design of family and youth policies.

Retención de ingresantes universitarios. Dimensión pedagógica

Los procesos de masificación que se desarrollan en la educación universitaria en las últimas décadas conllevan cambios en la composición de la matrícula, se advierte una mayor presencia de jóvenes y adultos de sectores que no accedían tradicionalmente a la universidad. Al mismo tiempo las dificultades en el ingreso, el abandono, el bajo rendimiento y el retraso en el primer año de formación, fundamentalmente en estudiantes de sectores socioeconómicos en desventaja, constituyen uno de los problemas más frecuentes y complejos que enfrentan las universidades.

Las instituciones universitarias en el intento de dar respuestas a la situación establecen dispositivos que se concentran en funciones de información, orientación y apoyo académico y financiero a los estudiantes. Los diversos programas, centralmente, desarrollan acciones orientadas a compensar y complementar el déficit en el aprendizaje. El aula, como espacio pedagógico ha sido soslayada, la reflexión sobre la experiencia académica cotidiana no ha sido considerada como una clave para la incorporación efectiva y el avance en los trayectos formativos de quienes inician estudios universitarios.

Este trabajo sostiene que el factor institucional y su dimensión pedagógica poseen una influencia significativa respecto del desempeño de los estudiantes y de su permanencia. Desde este supuesto se pretende poner la mirada en las prácticas académicas que tienen como escenario privilegiado el aula. Establecer interrogantes que interpelen los modos de pensar la enseñanza y el aprendizaje de jóvenes y adultos: el currículum, los dispositivos y estrategias de enseñanza, los materiales curriculares, la evaluación, los vínculos entre docentes y estudiantes y docentes entre sí, el clima de trabajo, son los aspectos considerados. Estas dimensiones son abordadas desde los estudios realizados en los últimos años por algunas universidades argentinas y latinoamericanas teniendo en cuenta las experiencias en curso y las representaciones de los actores involucrados, docentes y alumnos ingresantes.

Image and consciousness: Che Guevara's face in the Arab revolutions

This multimedia presentation will first document, describe and show images of Che Guevara as seen in Tunisia, Egypt, Syria, Libya, Yemen and Bahrain and Palestine during the recent "Arab Spring" and since then. With particular attention to the cases of Egypt and Palestine, I will conduct an visual sociological asking: Why this? Why here? Why now? What is this image doing/being in the context of the Arab Revolutions? What are the implications for both viewers and those who "use" (or are used by) this image?

The visual activism of primarily youth on the street in conditions of conflict and crisis takes many forms. This paper delves into the visual vernacular of the mobilization and performance of the famous iconic image of Che Guevara that seems to mysteriously appear wherever and whenever there are revolutionary conditions and/or massive protests. In the 1980's being seen publicly sporting an image of the "infidel" Che Guevara, whether on a t-shirt or by carrying a poster, was a punishable offence in many Arab nations. Yet in Palestine there is graffiti with Che's image, Palestinian refugee camps also have walls bearing spray paint renderings of this portrait. The recent eruption of revolt across North Africa and the Middle East has also seen an explosion of this image's presence on the visual plane of the street. Using Alfred Gell's notions of art and agency (1998) focusing on the social context of image production, circulation, and reception as a theory of the nexus of social relations involving visual artworks, this presentation suggests that in certain contexts, images not only substitute for persons and thus mediate social agency but also perform and authorize certain subject positions. In these ways, the use of images is already action in the social sphere.

Public communication of science and the nuclear debate in Brazil: The risk communication links between public and government

The events in Japan (March, 2011) revived the controversy surrounding the adoption of nuclear energy on a global scale. With it, returns to the main stage the discussion about the limits and possibilities, risks and benefits and the transformations that technology brings to contemporary society. Thus, the controversy and the discussion about technological risks spread over and Brazil was not out, putting in review its nuclear program in terms of cost, technology and environmental impact. For authors like Rangel (2009), "society incessantly produces new risks, determine values assign and want to take risks. Seeks to control the risks, creates and commercializes control technologies. The State is responsible for regulating relations around the risks". Concerned about the Brazilian context, we want to link scientific policy and communication policy adopted by government to administer an insecurity that came back around the national energetic policy, not only by society, but in the political discourse. We intent to explore the interface between risk communication and public communication of science into this context, by a descriptive-exploratory methodology, based primarily on literature review, analysis of newspaper articles published about the subject by "Agency Brazil", a government Brazil's communication company and through interviews with relevant actors as journalists, politicians and others working in the area to map the scenario, the communication strategies and answer questions as: what model of communication seems to prevail when the goal is to communicate issues about the nuclear theme for the non-specialized public? How have acted different actors (society, media, scientists and governors) in this discussion and deconstruction of the concept of risk? How knowledge is produced through this channel? This analysis is supported by authors such as Kasperson (2005), Bradbury (1989), Covello, V. & Sandman (2001), Major & Atwood (2004), Wynne (2005), Lewenstein (1993), Jasanoff et al. (1995).

Technological challenges and uncertainties among social, scientific and politic governance: Brazil and the discussion about nuclear energy

Based on the literature of Beck and Giddens (1997) and Jasanoff (2003), this paper seeks to examine the arguments that have filled most distinct agendas, not only political, scientific, but either social and media, that happen with the background of the reviewing of the Brazilian Nuclear Program implemented after the nuclear accident in Fukushima. Above all, by sharing a number of uncertainties about the limits of risk and benefits that a particular technology, in this case nuclear, and their implications for society, environment and future. The current Brazilian context is marked by divisions and re-evaluation of its nuclear program beside the demand for new studies and debates. The decisions themselves are being delayed, and meanwhile what we see is that the scientific argument has not been enough against the uncertainty introduced that moves from the general population, among environmentalists and also among policy makers of the country that has increasingly thought of measures to make more effective public participation through referendum in decision-making moments and measures of compensation for possible victims of disasters related. In dialogue with the sociology of science and technology, environmental sociology and sociology of risk we seek to examine this scenario, showing how, in this case, the decision to insist and to invest (or not) in 'nuclear' is not only a scientific issue. This affiliation allows us to reiterate that science, technology and society do not stand in isolation and that a technological choice is not as neutral and objective as it may seem. Rather, they come through a negotiation game that can and should be thought as a social product and process, since the limits of scientific knowledge are linked to historical, cultural, social, political, economic circumstances, that embrace mutual influences.

The freedom of not paying for intellectual propriety rights: A comparative perspective between Brazil's and Ecuador's strategies for fostering local intelligency through free software

In the early 1980's, the Free Software Movement created a copyright license that uses the language and the copyright system to subvert its principles and pragmatics. Instead of creating a temporary monopoly to allow a creator to profit from her creation, the GNU/GPL ensures that the software licensed below its terms and conditions will be publicly available and free to be used and studied in a way the software's code can evolve through a shared social process. The ethical and philosophical principles of the GNU/GPL can be found in a famous Free Software Foundation's document known as the free software's 4 freedoms. In the late 1990s, the term free was considered ambiguous and harmful to the new business models that took advantage of the commercial and industrial potential of shared development recently discovered. The root of this consideration is that the term carries the idea of gratuity. The more radical activists of the movement then proceeded to defend the idea that the benefits and advantages of free software did not consist in a matter of price but of freedom. In this article, I seek to show that the second freedom of free software, the one that allows programs to be used without having to pay, is an essential factor for the understanding of the evolution of free software in South America. Through a comparative perspective between Brazil's experience and the recent experience of Ecuador I intend to show how gratuity and freedom get together, and I will also evaluate the extent in which this encounter fosters technological sovereignty in these countries.

Democracy and inequality: Socioeconomic impacts in the satisfaction with the regime

Latinobarometer Data shows that satisfaction with democratic regime in Brazil has increased on the last years. In the same time, poverty, unemployment and income inequality have decreased and education indicators, basic services and income average are growing. This article shows relationship between inequality conditions and democracy satisfaction in Brazil. Time-series analysis(2001-2009) on poverty, unemployment, income, basic services, satisfaction with the regime and a statistical analysis, Pearson correlation, verified a strong – moderate correlation between variables, confirming that one of central points that influence citizen perceptions on democracy is correlated with social and economic aspects. In this way, this research discuss on the difference between procedural and substantial democracy, confirming that the citizens need and want a democratic regime beyond free elections and freedom of the press. More than 60% of Brazilians support the regime, but the satisfaction is linked with a democratic regime that offers good conditions of life. This is a strong cause that explain why only 38% of population are satisfied with the Brazilian democracy.

What is social responsibility? The perspective of the researchers from the National Autonomous University of Mexico

Social responsibility is one of the most important traces of scientific ethics. Its main implications are related to the usage and generation of new knowledge and its consequences. According to the Declaration on Science and the Use of Scientific Knowledge (UNESCO, 1999), the practice of scientific research must consider the well being of human kind, this includes to fight against poverty, to respect human dignity and human rights, to ensure environmental development and to assume our responsibility towards present and future generations. The Declaration also entails the commitment to certain standards of quality and scientific integrity that researchers must respect when generating knowledge and socializing new generations of professionals. Therefore, it is important to investigate how researchers put into practice the aforementioned principles in their day to day labor.

This paper presents the results obtained from interviews made to researchers from the Institute of Biotechnology and the Center for Energy Research, both from the National Autonomous University of Mexico (UNAM). We asked researchers their point of view about the relation between responsibility, society and the principles that should lead education of new scientists. One of the most important results was the definition of responsibility given by our interviewees. They held that "being responsible" means to give back society what it is invested in research and the education of human resources. Talking about the values that underlie scientific ethics, the interviewees highlighted different aspects such as: autonomy, responsibility, respectfulness, honesty, creativity, accuracy to scientific labor and capacity for collaborative work. Finally, it should be noted that here we are presenting some partial result of a broader research carried out as part of our participation in a Doctoral Program.

Comunicación comunitaria y juventud: Zreconfiguraciones del ser joven?

El presente trabajo se inscribe en una beca de investigación de pregrado de la Secretaría General de Ciencia y Técnica de la UNNE. El mismo tiene por objeto comprender las prácticas de construcción de ciudadanía que un grupo de jóvenes ponen en juego durante el proceso de armado del diario "La Verdad del Barrio" en la ciudad de Corrientes - Argentina.

Aquí se sintetizará uno de los aspectos: reconfiguración de la condición de juventud por parte de los jóvenes, las nuevas formas de mirarse y construirse como jóvenes y de mirar al otro.

Al tratarse de un medio de comunicación comunitaria[1] que forma parte de una Asociación civil se plantea una lógica distinta en cuanto a los modos de socialización y a las estructuras organizativas en comparación con los medios tradicionales. Además, en él son los jóvenes de los barrios de la periferia correntina[2] quienes lo llevan adelante, plasmando en cada ejemplar sus formas de ver y comprender sus espacios, su comunidad, lo que ellos entienden que pasa por lo social y a sí mismos como actores políticos. Interesa pues analizar si los discursos y representaciones que allí se construyen y difunden rompen, reproducen y sostienen o en qué medida se alejan de los discursos hegemónicos sobre la condición de juventud.

A lo que se apunta es a tratar de comprender el proceso de construcción identitaria de los jóvenes, teniendo en cuenta los factores institucionales (a nivel de estructura que supone la organización), culturales, afectivos, entre otros, como marco de la participación y en qué medida éstos influyen.

[1] El diario "La Verdad del Barrio" es uno de los proyectos comunicacionales propuestos por la Asociación Civil Integración Solidaria de la ciudad de Corrientes.

Espacio público, dispositivos de seguridad y gestión de la exclusión: El programa de recuperadores urbanos

A partir del año 2001 y como expresión de las políticas neoliberales profundizadas en la década precedente, irrumpió en la ciudad de Buenos Aires el fenómeno de "los cartoneros", estableciendo cisuras nuevas en el espacio público y transformando el modo en que la ciudad era vivida e imaginada tradicionalmente. En tanto alteraba la organización socio-espacial previa, la presencia de estos "nuevos" cuerpos circulantes se transformó en una cuestión social relevante que se fue procesando, progresivamente, en términos de invasión, limitaciones a la circulación y la higiene, perturbaciones al orden urbano. En este marco, el Gobierno de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires establece en el año 2002 el "Programa de Recuperadores Urbanos" (PRU), que aparece como la primer política local que intentará organizar y formalizar la actividad en la ciudad.

La profunda transformación del modelo de acumulación producida por las reformas neoliberales había alterado las relaciones entre Estado y sociedad en un sentido que puede ser caracterizado en términos de "paradigma de inseguridad", introduciendo nuevas necesidades en relación a las "conductas desviadas" y delictivas que serán canalizadas, cada vez más, en el marco general de la "gestión del riesgo". En este sentido, nos proponemos analizar algunas características de la emergencia del PRU a partir de la grilla de inteligibilidad de un modo de gestión de las poblaciones que puede ser caracterizado como "gubernamentalidad", y que opera particularmente a través de "dispositivos de seguridad". Consideramos que las prácticas y sentidos que se despliegan en el PRU, así como los modos en los que interviene en las posibilidades de acceso, uso y ordenamiento del espacio público, pueden ser analizadas en este sentido. En este trabajo nos proponemos, entonces, realizar una primera aproximación al análisis del PRU en términos de "dispositivo de seguridad".

Avances de investigación: El imaginario social del movimiento arcoíris en Chile

La preocupación científica por los fenómenos colectivos, tiene larga data, configurándose desde los años ochenta dos grandes perspectivas de análisis. Las teorías de la estrategia y las teorías de la identidad (Cohen, 1985). Las primeras abordan cuestiones relativas a los recursos, conformación organizacional u oportunidades políticas; mientras que las se-gundas, ponen énfasis sobre aspectos culturales, tanto a nivel estructural como grupal, lo que nos permite observar, no sólo los momentos de visibilidad de los movimientos sociales (por ejemplo: protestas o declaraciones de prensa) sino también sus momentos de latencia, la red sumergida en la cual se van creando los lazos culturales que conforman la identidad grupal y colectiva. (Melucci, 2001)

Ahora bien, dichos procesos culturales poseen, siguiendo la noción de imaginario social de Cornelius Castoriadis (2008, 2007, 1997) dos dimensiones fundamentales. El ámbito de las prácticas instituidas, es decir sancionadas explícita o implícitamente por la sociedad; y el universo de significaciones que entretejen y se encarnan en aquellas prácticas.

En la presente ponencia abordaremos el imaginario social del movimiento arcoiris en Chile, en la dimensión referida a las prácticas instituidas. Ellas han sido indagadas a través de una observación participante efectuada desde febrero del año 2009 hasta la actualidad, en diversos ámbitos, entre los que cabe mencionar, los "encuentros arcoiris" de Coñaripe (2009) y Chanleo (2010) y visitas periódicas a la ecoaldea "Refugio del guerrero arcoiris".

De los análisis efectuados se han obtenido una serie de instituciones o prácticas sedimentadas, que relacionadas entre sí, intentan resolver cuestiones relativas a la economía, toma de decisiones, espiritualidad y vida comunitaria, entre otras.

Provisoriamente sostenemos que en el movimiento arcoiris se da un sincretismo de identidades colectivas (ecologistas, indigenistas y pacifistas) que generan un campo de subjetividades alternativo a la colonización del mundo de la vida por la razón instrumental. (Habermas, 1992)

Chile 2011, desde el largo letargo a la acción colectiva

Durante el año 2011, la imagen de cientos de miles de personas movilizadas en las calles de distintas ciudades de Chile, dio la vuelta al mundo. Y si bien, las demandas explícitas de los movimientos sociales lograban explicar el contenido de dichas movilizaciones, quedaba rondando la pregunta sobre ¿por qué ahora ocurría este fenómeno? Ya que muchas de las causas que las originaban, se venían arrastrando desde la caída de la dictadura militar (1990).

Esto es lo que se abordará en la presente reflexión y se hará, aplicando nociones provenientes desde las teorías de los movimientos sociales, entre ellas: ciclo de movilización, repertorios de acción colectiva, alineamiento de marcos y oportunidades políticas. Dichas nociones nos permitirán diferentes aproximaciones a las movilizaciones referidas.

Concluiremos nuestra presentación con una propuesta sobre algunas de las identidades y significaciones colectivas que los movimientos sociales estarían configurando.

The challenge of dropout in public elementary schools: A case study in the city of Rio de Janeiro

In this paper we present a critical reflection around a learning acceleration project directed to students of seventh and eighth school grades, with more than 2 years of age-grade gap. Created by a private institution, the Autonomia Carioca Project was recently implemented in the public municipal schools of Rio de Janeiro and has been developed from the perspective of public-private partnership with a specific pedagogical, with teachers who are able to focus on the development of different languages, emphasizing the construction of values and the recovery of self-esteem of students, encouraging the formation of studies habits. Aiming to tackle the dropout, the Project formed during two years eight thousand and five hundred students who completed the first stage of elementary education. From a brief of the Project objectives and methodology, we developed field observations and interviews with managers in a school unit in which the design has been applied, to identify and discuss the challenges and possibilities of success. By monitoring the different routines in a public school we came across to a peculiar way of develop the Project. From the proposal on paper to the implementation in classroom, there are many factors involved in the task of teaching those who for several reasons, were not reached by the traditional education. The support of school director, the pedagogical coordination attendance, the profile and teacher training, the classes arrangement, the partnership with families and the accompanying of different students are some of the aspects that we address in this case study. The results of our exploratory study point to the joint action of the agents involved in school as a determining factor for the success of this project.

Sostenemos que este reconocimiento de la democracia comunitaria ejercida principalmente por grupos indígenas, hace que se de una transformación de la democracia, especialmente su ampliación y la reconfiguración de la democracia pues tanto la comunitaria y la democracia representativa tienen que coexistir. Consideramos que el reconocimiento de prácticas de democracia comunitaria que de hecho se ejercían, ahora reconocidas constitucionalmente marca un avance de la democracia, que podría encontrar sus límites y potencialidades en la coexistencia con la democracia representativa de corte liberal.

Transformaciones recientes en las elites gubernamentales Argentinas. Orígenes, formación, trayectorias y experiencias de los miembros del poder ejecutivo nacional durante el último cuarto del siglo XX

Hacia mediados de los años setenta, la Argentina conoció una de las dictaduras institucionales más poderosas de su historia, cuyos propósitos refundacionales tuvieron profundas consecuencias; entre ellas, el agotamiento del modelo socio-económico de posguerra, y también, el del ciclo de alternancia democracia-dictadura que había caracterizado la escena política desde el menos 1930. También asistió, a partir de 1983, al restablecimiento y consolidación del régimen democrático, prisma desde el cual se pretendió establecer una decisiva frontera con el pasado, al tiempo que se lo concebía como la principal herramienta para paliar gran parte de las pesadas "herencias" del régimen autoritario. Y hacia 1989, el país emprendió un acelerado camino hacia la adopción del paradigma neoliberal, de mano del cual se operó una profunda reformulación del modelo de acumulación, con notables efectos sobre el sistema político, el Estado y la sociedad, y que llevaría a la Argentina a la profunda crisis de diciembre de 2001.

Con el objetivo de desentrañar cuáles fueron las principales transformaciones que estos vertiginosos procesos operaron sobre las características de las elites gubernamentales argentinas en la historia reciente (y si efectivamente lo hicieron), la ponencia reconstruye los orígenes, formación, trayectorias y experiencias de quienes ocuparon los más altos puestos del poder ejecutivo nacional durante el período mencionado: Presidentes y Vicepresidentes de la Nación, y Ministros del gabinete nacional.

Holy wars & dirty wars: Martyrdom as a form of social protest

My work examines why martyrdom remains a valuable notion in contemporary third-world Christianity, and simultaneously questions the structures in place that promote dying for one's death as a valuable and constructive enterprise. How many martyrs have been deliberately manufactured into martyrs, and how much of the process is unconscious? Examining the successful story of Carlos Mugica's transformation from man into martyr, and the actors involved in this transformation, demonstrates the intentional process of martyrdom in reaction to the oppressive milieu of Argentina's Dirty War and the years that followed. Lastly, in examining the current trajectories of "martyrs in the making," I simultaneously deconstruct and chart the progress of the narrative construction of martyrs. In doing this, I hope to provoke questions about martyrs in ALL religious traditions—how are martyrs made, why they are needed, and whether they can and should continue to be a valuable category for social protest in the religious realm.

On 'habitus', 'forms of sociation' and the future

This paper concentrates on the concepts of 'forms of sociation' (a term coined by Georg Simmel and which, for him, constituted the very object of sociology) as well as on Pierre Bourdieu's concept of 'habitus' as key sociological concepts which contain relevant insights about the ways in which the future can be incorporated into sociological theory and our researches in a fruitful way. The approach to the future which derives from the use of these concepts (and their related theoretical perspectives) avoids the temptation of prediction, but, at the same time, does not avoid the central importance of the future in our social relationships, but, to the contrary, helps us conceptualise and understand this central importance, offering patterns and tools to better approach, and research it. Examples stemming from my own research will help illustrate the arguments presented in the paper.

The communication of the invisible - The grounded theory and autobiographic interviews as a way for exploring the field of emotions

In this paper we will discuss the methodological approach that we have used in our research on love relationships, emotions and new technologies of communication. Thus we will elaborate upon the Grounded Theory as our main methodological approach for exploring the field of emotions. As already Strauss and Corbin claimed when they developed the Grounded Theory, this methodology is especially useful in those cases when we know nothing or very little about the field we are doing research upon, when there are neither categories nor a lot of useful data from earlier researches we can rely on.

Furthermore we will explain and argue why we opted for collecting autobiographical narrative interviews, and will show the ways in which we analysed them in order to research the emotions narrated and expressed in them. As we will show, autobiographic interviews offer the opportunity to gather information about the social and individual life-story contexts (which are necessary for understanding where certain emotions or feelings biographically come from and how they have been webbed and traced). The thick descriptions, resulting from these narrative interviews, offer the possibility to enter into the subtexts, hidden beyond that which interviewees produce as their main narrative. It is at the moments in which they speak without reflecting upon everything they are saying (and about that which we, as researchers and interviewers, might expect from them) that emotions can be better grasped. An additional analysis of body movements and gestures recorded in field diaries has proved to be crucial for our analyses.

Social movements in belo horizonte, Brazil: Conflict and community association in the re-creation of a public sphere in the housing milieu (2006-2010)

Since the 1990s, public administrations have been putting collective efforts and movements in general under scrutiny, leaving our cities up to private interests, irreparably submitted to the big capital. Against all odds and interests embedded in this process and aiming at re-creating housing opportunities, housing related social movements have been building alliances and proposing conflict both as a struggle vehicle and as a dialectical instrument to interact with the State. Within the social realm, manifested conflicts have also constituted a public sphere where differences can be presented.

This essay intends to present and discuss the urban conflicts scenario in Belo Horizonte, capital city to the state of Minas Gerais, Brazil, having as focus those related to housing, especially the community-settlements that have been working under conflictual planning principles, and have been receiving great recognition and importance within the local social movements network. This study sheds light into the ways in which grassroots struggles present themselves through manifested conflicts in the city and how the housing problem is managed by social movements and by different forms of association in the community-settlements. It also intends to explore how the city, structured by the inequality of its places, interacts with its social movements. The main forms and strategies adopted by such struggles will be discussed, at first using a quantitative approach and secondly presenting a couple of brief qualitative reports.

Results show that the Community-settlement Dandara works as the possible dialectical construction antagonism-unity to which Simmel makes reference, as a possible durkheimian social cohesion or as a possibility of eliminating social fear through the exposition to differences, as Bauman would propose. It offers a vivid example of the potential embedded in social conflicts when it elects the dialog as the route to get other sectors' support, re-creating the public sphere.

The impact of cultural capital on secondary students performance in Brazil

The main goal of this study is to verify the effect of cultural capital on the student's performance in an official test applied by Brazilian government (Brazil Test) which is part to the Brazilian Elementary to High School System (SAEB). The data set used is from 2003 year and involves 52.434 students. The standard test is applied each two years in the fields of mathematics and languages. Along with the test a questionnaire is applied to measure student's characteristics as well as their families' profile. The research question is: what is the impact of cultural capital on student's performance in the SAEB test controlling for their demographic characteristics and relations with other students and their teachers? The theoretical background is based on James Coleman (1997), Pierre Bourdieu (1982, 1998) and Basil Bernstein (1997). And among Brazilian scholars the study includes the ideas of Nelson Silva and Carlos Hasenbalg (2000) and Maria Ligia Barbosa (2009). The study model has as the dependent variable the student's grades in the SAEB test and the cultural capital as the main independent variable along with the controls. Descriptive analyses are used as well as regression models to obtain the effect of the independent variables on the dependent one. The preliminary and main results show that there is significant association between levels of cultural capital and student's performance in the SAEB test. Specifically, there is a significant and positive correlation between parent's education, ownership of computer and access to the internet and newspaper reading with the performance in the SAEB test.

Fuegos cruzados. Sentidos en disputa en torno a un estallido social en la provincia de Buenos Aires

En el lapso de 330 días la ciudad argentina de Baradero ha sido el epicentro de dos actos de violencia institucional y policial de gran impacto. Por un lado, los acontecimientos que rodean la muerte de los jóvenes Miguel Portugal y Giuliana Giménez en marzo de 2010, en donde se encuentran implicados funcionarios municipales. Cobran importancia en el marco de esta ponencia los hechos que tomaron lugar luego de la muerte de estos jóvenes (quema del Palacio Municipal y oficinas públicas) los cuales han provocado un fuerte impacto a nivel local. Por otro lado, el reciente asesinato del joven Lucas Rotela, víctima de un caso de gatillo fácil, ha colocado nuevamente el tema de los abusos y violencias policiales en el centro de la atención tanto mediática como política.

Las movilizaciones y protestas que repudiaron ambos acontecimientos desplegaron una multiplicidad de formatos entre ellos las marchas y concentraciones como también acciones de violencia colectiva contra símbolos e instituciones del Estado. En esta ponencia buscamos dar cuenta de las representaciones y sentidos puestos en juego en estas acciones de protesta. Esta indagación se hará a través del análisis de entrevistas en profundidad y observaciones participantes. Asimismo, se analizarán las percepciones que se esgrimen en torno a las formas de protesta y activismo, como también los sentidos que los actores sociales despliegan en torno a nociones de violencia(s) y memoria(s).

Public intervention and divine mission: Global dynamics in the construction of evangelical networks in politics

In recent decades, the political participation of evangelical actors in Latin America has - diversified, as a consequence of the consideration of the worldly structures as mission spaces and the consolidation of an agenda of public intervention. In this work we will analyze the interference of global dynamics of circulation of people and resources in the praxis of evangelical agencies that participate in the political sphere in contemporary Argentina. We will focus on two lines of investigation. On - one hand, we will analyze the circuits of formation and transnational exchange of leaders and shepherds with partisan trajectory, in order to establish the gravitation of the global contacts in their political performances and the production of speeches referring to the importance of - ethics and - Christian principles in the power spheres. On the other hand, we will approach the morphology and the activities of two international evangelical organizations, oriented to the mission in the space of politics: Youth United for One Mission (JUCUM) and Capitol Ministries. We will determine the central axes of their institutional objectives, and the areas of influence to the interior of local political and religious spaces.

In the conclusions of this work, we will compare the political performances of these religious agencies and we will evaluate their incidence in the construction and maintenance of transnational networks; that believe in the construction of a communitarian identity based on the defense of crucial values.

Transnational corporate elite networks in Latin America

Business or corporate groups –set of corporations of diversified sectors bounded together by formal and informal ways such as interlocking directorates– have historically dominated Latin American economies. Grupo Empresarial Antioqueño and Ardilla Lulle in Colombia, Luksic and Falabella in Chile, Carso and Cemex in México, Vale and Votorantim in Brasil, Techint and Arcor in Argentina, and Romero in Peru are some examples of large business groups in Latin American nations. However, economic internationalization, regional political integration, and global financial crisis have triggered questions about the organization of corporate elites at international level and the evolution of national business groups. In this research we wonder if there is a transnational corporate community in Latin America, and where the large Latin American business groups are in the transnational corporate network. So far, scholars have already shown the existence of a transnational business community linking North Atlantic elites, but we still ignore how Latin American corporate elites are organized at international level. Using network analysis we aim to investigate interlocking directorates in one of the still unexplored lands: Latin America.

Globalización creencias sanaciones y milagros

Globalization and new consumption patterns influence daily life, the postmodern human being lives an existential angst, the awareness of living here and now, in a violent and hostile world, the struggle for survival after the basic needs. Given this, options or alternatives present themselves as a way of life. Sociological changes of globalization include religions, we can mention the phenomenon of transnational and transcontinental networks.

In Argentina, particularly Buenos Aires as the case observed, is considered a religious metropoli where different offers coexist: the Catholic healing circuit including San Cayetano, San Pantaleon and the Virgin "Desatanudos"; St. Expedite, charismatic healers, electronic ministers, rabbis, Islamic, Hindus, Buddhists, schools of spirituality, new age, indigenous healers, "manosantas" (healing hands), holistic therapies, tarot, parapsychology, etc.

The mapping of religious groups in the city of Buenos Aires highlights some areas such as Almagro, in the geographic center of the city, and Liniars on the western edge with the Church of San Cayetano and the burgeoning Bolivian community. This paper addresses the case study of the neighborhoods mentioned and the opinions of experts on the subject of sociology.

Construcción social de la infancia ciudadana

Este trabajo forma parte de la discusión teórico conceptual de mi tesis doctoral.

Parto de la idea de que así como la configuración de la infancia moderna se dio sobre la base del replanteamiento entre lo público y lo privado, en esta época cabría pensar que estamos en los albores de la constitución de una nueva infancia, que está re-armándose sobre la base de la discusión acerca de la ciudadanía, los derechos y la democracia, una recomposición de fuerzas en las que se ponen en juego las condiciones de vida presentes y futuras para un sector de la población históricamente excluido.

Se analiza la noción de ciudadanía de la infancia pensándola como un núcleo detonador de las discusiones entre modelos de pensamiento. El propósito es reflexionar acerca de ¿Cuáles son los discursos y las prácticas que le dan forma? ¿Cuáles son las tensiones, contradicciones y paradojas que se generan con este planteamiento? Así como también cuáles son las oportunidades y los obstáculos para la constitución de relaciones intergeneracionales más justas, es decir, que faciliten el ejercicio pleno de sus derechos.

A lo largo del trabajo se reflexiona acerca del cambio de pensamiento, de este tránsito de paradigmas en el cual coexisten el modelo Tutelar del Estado nacido del proceso de institucionalización de la infancia y el modelo del Sistema Integral desarrollado a partir de la Convención de los Derechos del Niño.

Se entiende a la infancia como una categoría sociológica que puede ser estudiada como campo social conformado por la acción de fuerzas diversas como la del Estado, sus instituciones, las organizaciones sociales, la familia y el mercado. Un campo que se dinamiza a partir de la disputa por el sentido y el control, que se analiza a partir de la dimensión político ideológica así como también la histórica-cultural.

Professional women, integration work and risk management in contemporary Chile

One of the most difficult and complex tasks for individuals today seems to be the simultaneous organization and coordination of their everyday life with their biography. During the post-war era, modern social institutions like wage labor, the nuclear family, the life course and professions did regulate people's lives and made them predictable (Kohli 1985, 1986). Nevertheless, these institutions are currently being deeply transformed (Beck 1986, Beck/Beck-Gernsheim 1994, Kohli 1989, 2007). In this context, women that participate or want to participate in the labor market have special difficulties in dealing with the organization and coordination of everyday life and their biography. Although the institution of the "nuclear family" is being re-defined, the traditional gendered division of labor (at least in Latin America) still prevails, with women mainly in charge of their families' care needs. Drawing on theories of individualization (Beck 1986; Beck/Beck-Gernsheim 1994; Bolte 2000; Sopp/Beck 1997; Giddens 1996; Bauman 2000), the life course and biography (Böhnisch 2001, Hitzler/Hohner 1994; Hitzler 1999; Pohl/Walther 2006; Kohli, 2007) and everyday life (Jurczyk/Rerrich 1993, Jurczyk/Voß 2000, Voß 1991, 1997), this contribution analyzes the findings of two empirical studies based on 10 life stories of professional women with young children and 7 semi-structured interviews with home-based female professional workers. The research focuses on how professional women confront the organization and coordination of their everyday life and biography in contemporary Chilean society and the risks that underlie and result from their "integration work" (Cárdenas 2010). As this concept suggests, female workers simultaneously carry out synchronic and diachronic actions via the "identity work" (Keupp 2003, 2005) that defines and redefines the risks they face.

New democracies and respect for human rights: Does a culture of respect for human rights naturally evolve with the return to democracy?

This paper discusses the obstacles to the development of a culture of respect for human rights in Brazil as identified in a series of surveys carried out in the last decade (2001 to 2010) as well as by national data (1999 and 2010) and data from Latinobarometro.

It is a widely shared assumption that in democratic regimes there are less human rights violations, in particular of violations perpetrated by state officials. Still wide respect for human rights, though essential for democracy to prosper, does not seem to be a mandatory result from the process of democratization. In fact this process seems to be more complex involving both internal and external sources of pressure. Incomplete democracies, such as Brazil, contrast with the "good" democracy- the ideal that is to be pursued -defined as presenting "a stable institutional structure that realizes the liberty and equality of citizens through the legitimate and correct functioning of its institutions and mechanisms" (Morino, 2004; p. 12).

In Brazil it was expected that improved access to socio-economic rights, as well as some improvement in the control of urban violence would have a positive impact on support for rule of law and in development of a culture of respect for human rights. Continued monitoring of society's support for human rights and for rule of law indicate otherwise. A reduction in the public's exposure to violence is not followed by a growth in the support for rule of law or for greater control over the use of force by law enforcement agents. Worse still it appears that new generations born after the return to democracy do not express greater support for human rights than that of their parents.

Video surveillance in Rio de Janeiro: Technological modernization in a sport's mega events city

The paper discusses police video surveillance in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, through ethnographic research conducted in control rooms in 2008, focusing also on some recent important transformations, as the relative success of the "proximity policing" strategy (the local category is UPP – Pacifying Police Unit), unprecedentedly. From the last years, technological modernization has its importance increased in security investment of Rio de Janeiro, in contrast with the traditional policy of the public security institutions, where the discursive emphasis was on a purely repressive model and investments were mostly in warfare.

External factors also contribute to this transformation, mainly Rio's choice to host the 2016 Olympics Summer Games, and 2014 football World Cup final match – as well as the event's media center. Host two Sport Mega Events (beside them it will be held also in Rio the World Catholic Youth Journey – with the presence of the Pope, in 2013), brings important financial resources to local security policies, and also introduce a new concern, until then absent among the many security problems of the city: international terrorism. The main local security problems are, for some decades, common urban crime, the armed occupation of poor territories (favelas) by drug dealers gangs and police violence and corruption. However, the Sport Mega Events always entail technological collaboration and international securitization (being quite marked the difference in position between the Global North, as the supplier, and the Global South, as a customer, consumer), in some cases determining how you investments should be made (the case of the Athens Olympics, in 2000, is a prime example). The main question concerning control technologies, especially video surveillance, on this paper is how international Sport Mega Events and local security demands specificities can be brought together, to leave a legacy to the city?

La participación de los inspectores del trabajo en Brasil para la promoción del concepto de salud: El desafío del acoso moral La sociedad del trabajo es caracterizada por las diferencias socio-económicas de las partes presentes en sus relaciones. La búsqueda constante es por la superación de esa desigualdad y el Estado impone a los miembros de la sociedad principios y normas de protección destinados a la parte que se considera menos favorecida: el trabajador. La presencia estatal – con vistas a garantizar los derechos de promoción de la igualdad – se manifiesta por diversas maneras (legislación, acción sindical, negociación directa con el empleador, acciones judiciales), pero la inspección del trabajo merece destaque, desde la óptica de la Sociología de los Sentidos. Las relaciones de trabajo se desarrollan en el contexto económico y la Economía, hacia los años 50 del siglo XX, ha definido a ella misma como una perspectiva abstracta direccionada a las conductas de los actores económicos ficticios (SWEDBERG, 2011, p. 4). Según el autor, el objetivo es analizar cómo superar la ruptura entre objetos materiales y la vida mental o entre los objetos y sujetos. La conexión entre las dos esferas es posible por lo medio de la noción de los sentidos, pues ellos establecen la relación entre el mundo exterior y el mundo mental interior SWEDBERG, 2011, p. 6-7). Ese es un desafío que los inspectores del trabajo viven en su cotidiano, especialmente en el trabajo de identificar la presencia del acoso moral y sus impactos sobre la salud del trabajador. El objetivo, por lo tanto, es analizar cómo la inspección del trabajo promueve condiciones saludables de trabajo desde la óptica de la Sociología de los Sentidos.

Desde mi punto de vista, no es posible abordar el fenómeno de los barrios privados sin comprender su articulación con ciertas formas de concebir y practicar la ciudad, a la vez que su interdependencia con otros hábitats urbanos.

¿Cuáles son los límites éticos de construir el sueño de libertad de unos por sobre la libertad de otros? ¿Por qué las clases media y alta son concebidas como "auténticas" portadoras del miedo, en tanto los sectores populares ni siquiera son percibidos hegemónicamente, en ocasiones, como sujetos dotados de agencia? ¿De qué modo la beneficencia puede ser un instrumento para diluir conflictos con las poblaciones pobres de los entornos de estos barrios amurallados? Criminal experiences of youth: Investigating reasons and sentiments of young offenders

Brazil is facing an increase in crime rates in recent years, posing an alarming security problem. As a result, crime prevention has been one of the most promising security policies, since part of the concept of prevention is focused more on the conformation of crime than in criminal actions. In this on-going research the main objective is to map crimes through the analysis of a Facet designed questionnaire based on the narrative of inmates that will investigate young offenders regarding their emotional involvement in criminal activities in crime zones of Recife, Brazil. Participating groups were composed by convicted minors that were selected amongst volunteers from a Correctional Custody Unit population of Recife. The research also aims a more subjective understanding of individuals through an analysis of the sentiments expressed by these young people during their narratives, regarding their lives and to acts offenders who committed. To this end goal of this study is to investigate how aspects of personal or collective feeling are associated with crime and which cultural and social mechanisms are involved in this process. The relevance of the research is to provide a greater understanding about the profile of criminal actions and their offenders, as well as mapping criminal actions in the city of Recife. The goal is to follow the development of studies on crime and risk, performing a contextualization of internal and external problems to this phenomenon. The central idea is to understand the criminal actions as well as those individuals who commit them with the intention of investing in prevention policies in public safety to mitigate the facilitating and attractive conditions of infringing actions and converting crime into an action that involves risk and consequences for potential offenders.

The stigma of being "overweight" in three European countries

Prevalence of overweight and obesity has increased significantly over the past thirty years in Europe. While numerous studies have shown the importance of discrimination and stigmatisation experienced by obese people, few studies have analysed the experience of overweight people (BMI 25-30). This last category is nevertheless associated with obesity in media and public policy discourses. But can we really assimilate them? And what does "being overweight" mean from a sociological perspective?

In order to address these questions, we will analyse three culturally close countries that differ in terms of prevalence of overweight and obesity, which are France, England and Germany. Using a qualitative and micro-sociological approach, 60 semi-structured interviews were conducted with French, English and German overweight women, with different social-economic statuses, ages and various personal situations.

First, the objective will be to trace the history, the current medical controversies as well as the representations of this medical category of overweight as opposed to the social representations of obesity.

Second, we will observe the social consequences of overweight in the everyday life of respondents, in terms of social discriminations or stigmatisation, both within the family and at work, but also in social interactions and with nurses or doctors. These consequences will be compared with the data known on the obesity.

Finally, because a physical difference exists only when it is designated as significant by a culture, it will be interesting to understand the influence of national culture on the rejection or the acceptance of overweight. Is the socially admitted "threshold" of weight in public places different in these three countries? This question will allow us to analyse the notion of physical (ab)normality and will explain some difficulties of public policy devoted to preventing obesity.

Jóvenes, familias y elección de escuelas secundarias: ¿Quién elige?

Chile implementó hace 30 años un sistema de vouchers y competencia entre escuelas. Así, la elección de las familias es un componente central del vínculo entre sistema escolar y sociedad. Teóricamente, la elección escolar ha sido estudiada desde enfoques de "elección racional", sobre supuestos de consumidores informados, que actúan motivados por búsqueda de calidad educativa. Este trabajo discute tales nociones sobre la configuración de mercados educativos, explorando su construcción práctica y relación entre sistema escolar y adolescencia. El análisis se basa en un seguimiento etnográfico con jóvenes buscando una escuela secundaria. Se plantea que los jóvenes juegan un rol central en proceso de elección y, por tanto, la tradicional noción de "elección parental", es más bien una "elección juvenil" o al menos una combinación, no exenta de tensiones generacionales. Este ejercicio de consumo escolar repercute en la reconfiguración de la experiencia escolar y adolescencia ante un sistema educacional competitivo que clasifica tempranamente. Los adolescentes se ven forzados a calcular anticipadamente su identidad, proyecto de vida educacional y laboral futuro, acelerando la vida adulta y demandándoles un conocimiento de reglas del juego tanto del sistema educativo como de estrategias de posicionamiento social.

Sumado a categorías de clase, las decisiones juveniles están marcadas por visiones sobre la movilidad social y su conocimiento práctico de las reglas eficaces para el éxito en la elección. En consecuencia, el mercado educativo beneficia a aquellos jóvenes que conocen y llevan a la práctica los ideales y mecanismos de una sociedad meritocrática. Mientras tanto, aquellos jóvenes que desconocen o no practican estas reglas de juego encuentran desventajas en la elección y posibilidades futuras. La presentación ofrece proposiciones sobre la manera en que la 'elección juvenil' constituye un nuevo factor de inequidad de los sistemas educativos contemporáneos.

The transformation of public action legitimacy in risk society. The case of French and Quebec Ministry of Transport

This paper aims at presenting the social change in risk society through a comparative empirical study between French and Quebec Ministry of Transport.

During the last years, Quebec and French Ministry of Transport have incorporated the road safety audit in order to renew assessment methods of road infrastructures. Road safety audit reaches to transcend limits of technical knowledge by the use of driver experiences in an interactional expertise framework (Collins & Evans, 2007). In this way, road safety audit appears as a radical cognitive transformation. But, during this empirical study, we highlighted the predominance of technical knowledge in the interactional expertise. We analyse this technical centrality by the return of road safety engineering cognitive traditions (Giddens, 1994). So, the interactional expertise, used in the audit, seems to be less a cognitive change than a transformation of the expert social role in front of a new social order.

In this way, this paper will present first of all, the interactional expertise as the consequence of three structural transformations: the sub-politicization of road safety field, the French and Canadian devolution policies and the neoliberal turning point of public action. Then, we will analyse the position of driver knowledge in the expertise in front of the return of technical tradition, specifically in the drawing up road safety audit report. Finally, we will show that road safety audit is used to ensure new forms of legitimacy: impartiality legitimacy in Quebec and proximity legitimacy in France (Rosanvallon, 2008).

"Majority age and exclusion of poor youth in Brazil"

This paper aims to debate how civil and criminal majority age in Brazil becomes a practice of criminalizing and punishing poor Brazilian's youth. The objective is to understand how the experience of reaching majority age, 18 years old in Brazil, becomes a punishment and how it impacts the trajectory, the socialization and citizenship of youth. The aim is to debate how, in this context, happens the transition from youth to adulthood and the political and social world.

The question arises because children and teenagers have some special protection in Brazil, with benefits of legislation or public policies. But youth in vulnerable situations is out of "complacency" only because of majority age, which states that a person over 18 is considered "capable".

If a young person turns 18 and lives in a shelter must go away. If a crime is committed one day before reaching the majority, a young person is judged according to some special law, but if the crime is committed one day after, the young person will be judged by the Criminal Code and receive the punishment of an adult. In the same way, if a young person is over 18 years and lives on the streets, he will not have access to many policies, although there is criticism about them.

The data for this paper were coded from a documentary research on the Brazilian legislation and studies to map the poor Brazilian's youth, as well official statistics and surveys about youth. Three situations of personal and social vulnerability will be considered: youth crime, street youth/homeless and youth shelters. In addition, it will be analyzed the strategies of these young people to build their own citizenship.

South-south development cooperation under analysis: Paradigmatic rupture or reproduction?

The present paper deals with the initiatives on international cooperation in the scope of North-South cooperation. Based on the analysis of the logic and the knowledge that support such initiatives, and drawing on the thinking of Boaventura de Souza Santos, the article challenges the capacity of cooperation between peripheral and semi-peripheral countries, that is, "South-South" cooperation, for giving birth to the emergence of a new perspective on "development", one which would be based on the understanding that there is not a single model and that it refers to a process dependent not only on the recognition of and respect for the plurality of knowledge owned by its participants, as also on their capacity to build together new kinds and forms of knowledge.

Embedding postcapitalist alternatives: The global network of alternative knowledge production and mobilization

Since the 1970s, transnational alternative policy groups (TAPGs) have emerged as a component of global civil society generating visions and strategies for a 'globalization from below' which is also a process of transnational class formation. Such groups as the Transnational Institute (Amsterdam), Focus on the Global South (Bangkok), International Forum on Globalization (San Francisco) and the Centre for Civil Society (Durban) have served as 'collective intellectuals' in facilitating the construction of a counter-hegemonic bloc that transects national borders and poses democratic alternatives to neoliberal globalization.

This study proceeds from an understanding that hegemonic think tanks and TAPGs are embedded in opposing historical blocs, as they develop and deploy knowledge with the intent to make their respective blocs more coherent and effective. Transnational alternative policy groups appear to be well placed to participate in the transformation of the democratic globalization network from a gelatinous and unselfconscious state, into an historical bloc capable of collective action toward an alternative global order. Empirically, we map the global network of TAPGs and kindred groups – alternative media, social movement organizations, NGOs and INGOs – in order to discern whether and how TAPGs facilitate political development beyond the fragments of single-issue politics encased within nation states. Do TAPGs, like their hegemonic counterparts, serve as 'brokers', bridging across geographic spaces (e.g. North-South) and movement domains to foster the 'unity in diversity' that is taken as a criterial attribute of a counter-hegemonic historical bloc? Alternatively, are there ways in which the global network is factionalized by structural holes and cleavages, as in the fissure between ecological and social justice politics that characterized activist networks in the 1990s? Using network-analytic methods, we draw some guarded inferences that are intended to enhance both sociological knowledge and movement practice.

Children's perceptions about being hospitalized and the hospital environment

The current study seeks to understand how children interact with and interpret the therapeutic environment in hospitals, and the extent to which they perceive it as physically threatening and/or safe. It has been well documented that hospital stays for children can lead to separation anxiety, post-traumatic stress disorder, and other psychological sequelae. This study's purpose is to identify aspects of the hospital's physical environment that promote a sense of well-being as well as aspects that are frightening, threatening or stressful.

Fifty children (ages 5-17) were asked to participate in a photography project that documented their perceptions of the physical environment of the hospital. Children were provided cameras and a checklist of items to photograph (the checklist included items such as: "Something that makes you happy," or "Something that makes you scared") as a part of three photo activities. The first activity involved taking pictures of their hospital room, the second activity involved taking pictures in a common area (a medical-free play area for children located down the hall from the patient rooms), and the third activity focused on their bedtime routine.

The analysis will examine children's understanding of their therapeutic environment. Children's concerns about the presence and sounds of medical equipment will be explored in the context of their perceptions of non-medical parts of their environment (the view out the window, art, personal items such as stuffed animals). We will compare the responses for children who are experiencing their first hospitalization, and for whom hospitalization is very traumatic, to those who have experienced many hospitalizations, for whom hospitalization is typically a less traumatic experience. The purpose is to explore ways in which the physical environment can be modified to promote an improved sense of safety and wellbeing and to reduce the likelihood of psychological trauma resulting from hospitalization.

What researchers bring to communities, and what may or may not be left behind when their work is done

The United States is now experiencing a substantial expansion of community-based participatory research (CBPR). Much of the new CPBR work builds on the multiple decades of accomplishments in the field of evaluation research. Researchers from many different disciplines (medicine, psychiatry, public health, social science, genetics) are being asked for the first time to partner with community organizations in health disparity communities in the hope of developing more effective disparity-reduction strategies.

Researchers who are new to community engaged research would benefit from briefly reflecting on how the research process itself (beyond any particular intervention being studied or planned) impacts the community over the short and long term. Such a reflection serves as an orientation to and cautionary tale about the radical and political nature of the community research enterprise – an enterprise which often leaves both the researcher and the community changed in unexpected ways.

This paper will focus on a specific problem in community-based participatory research and in evaluation research: the decision to leave a community at the close of an evaluation project or CPBR project. Neither CBPR nor the field of evaluation provides guidance for the researcher, but nonetheless it is commonplace for researchers to leave communities, typically, as funding for a specific project dries up. A great deal of energy is spent on describing how to begin working with a community and how to work with a community, but little is spent on the process of leaving. Studying the process of leaving a community, I believe, provides a window onto how theoretically thin the role of the research can be in these disciplines and how clinical sociology has resources that can expand, enrich and clarify that role.

Reducción de las desigualdades de género en el trabajo: Un análisis del 'programa nacional trabalho e empreendedorismo da mulher'

El mundo del trabajo está pasando por transformaciones significativas en las últimas décadas. No existe realidad que haya sido ahorrada a esta dinámica, cada una contestando con sus singularidades en el enfrentamiento a los desdoblamientos por ella provocados. La realidad brasileña ha enfrentado también los desafíos puestos por este escenario mayor. Los nuevos inventos tecnológicos llevan a diferentes formatos productivos, ha respondido por la supresión de puestos de trabajo. La entrada de las mujeres en el mercado de trabajo es ejemplo de estas transformaciones, buscando formas de enfrentar la situación de desempleo. Como tentativa de superar los efectos de precariedad y de exclusión, varias políticas públicas son elaboradas, que el Estado adopta para disminuir las desigualdades entre hombres y mujeres, y mejorar sus condiciones de existencia. Este trabajo presenta una política pública de género del Gobierno Federal Brasileño: el Programa Nacional Trabajo y Emprendedurismo de la Mujer. Este tiene como objetivo alterar la interrelación presente en los procesos de desarrollo local y las cuestiones de género, atendiendo mujeres pobres que desean crear o desarrollar negocios, y mujeres extremadamente pobres, participantes o no de los programas de inclusión social. Tal iniciativa surgió de la Secretaría Especial de Políticas para las Mujeres, de la Presidencia de la República, y contempla todas las regiones del país, en los estados del Rio de Janeiro, Santa Catarina, Distrito Federal, Pernambuco y Pará. En el período en que el Programa está en cada Estado, son ejecutadas Reuniones, Seminarios, Cursos, Oficinas e Foros. El Programa presenta oportunidades de alternativas de generación de renta, inserción en el mercado, no por el ángulo de la competitividad, característica de la sociedad capitalista moderna, pero en el fomento al emprendedurismo y la recurrencia al auto-sustentación. Esto se traduce a través de la organización de estas mujeres en Asociaciones y Cooperativas.

Alineamiento o involucramiento?

Como extensión del concepto del Alineamiento Estratégico en las organizaciones, se ha incorporado el de alineamiento del personal, aludiendo a la necesidad de "tirar todos juntos para el mismo lado..." etc.

La lógica sinérgica y sistémica de las organizaciones, enmarca la necesidad de alinear o integrar componentes aislados en un sistema mayor. Sosteniendo que la relación entre las partes supera en importancia a las partes individuales por sí mismas. De la misma forma, el concepto de alineamiento se construye bajo el criterio de que para lograr la visión, estrategia y los resultados que la organización persigue, deben sincronizarse los esfuerzos individuales en un proceso continuo que requiere de constantes ajustes (relineamientos) que garantizarán la excelencia organizacional. Esta línea discursiva convoca a compartir y asumir responsabilidades. Como corolario de estos enfoques metodológicos y estas líneas de análisis, resulta habitual escuchar a mandos medios y jefarcas "arengando" a sus empleados a alinearse detrás de la visión y misión de la empresa o de un proyecto determinado. Sin embargo, a poco de andar se aprecia que éstas no calan hondo y es allí que los sociólogos organizacionales nos vemos en la necesidad analizar las causas de esto.

Por qué resulta insuficiente que la alta dirección exprese sus deseos, planes o proyectos para que el personal de la organización se pliegue inmediatamente detrás de ellos? Cómo no comprenden la mejor vía para alcanzar los objetivos de la organización y por ende de los suyos propios?...

Esta ponencia pretende abonar la discusión sobre las razones por las que las convocatorias de alineamiento resultan insuficientes e intenta hacer algún aporte para la búsqueda de estrategias alternativas.

Past, current, and future representation of identity: Skin colour declaration on birth certificate in Brazil

Skin colour declarations are collected in Brazilian census since 1872. There is no official definition of the five skin colours categories offered to respondents in national surveys. On a daily basis, more than hundred categories are used to describe population miscegenation. Black movements criticize what is sometimes called a "skin colour continuum": they promote a binary classification (Black versus White).

Skin colour is indicated on birth certificate. This information is not used apart for statistics to describe population evolution. Initially this declaration of skin colour for new-born babies was done by a doctor, or its equivalent within health administration. In practice, this nomination results from an arguing with the mother (or the parent who is present at the moment of the declaration). This discussion deals with several issues. First, it addresses the legitimacy of the child within her/his parental lineage, especially the relationship with the father. Second, there is a dimension that questions the identity the body support directly. Indeed, parents pass their own conception of skin colour representations on to the child: the declaration may reveal an affirmative positioning (choosing the binary classification) or it may underline a non conflictive perception of racial relationships in Brazil.

Given new-born baby skin colour quickly changes, a gap might exist between the skin colour declared at birth and the one individual chooses from themselves. For adults the skin colour indicated on the birth certificate is something they cannot change from an administrative point of view. They should deal with the potential discrepancy between their own skin colour declaration and the declaration at birth: to accept, to criticize, to deny it.

This research is based on a field research conducted in São Paulo (city) (2006-2007): 48 interviews were realized to collect skin colour declarations and discourse on these declarations.

Where are you from? The case of France

Focusing on the case of France, this research is based on literature (autobiographic evidences, researches, conference papers, and magazines), informal and spontaneous talks, and my own experience. The material I use benefits the respondent point of view, which is more accessible through published autobiographic evidences (Belhaddad, 2001, Kelman, 2003, and Xenakis, 2004/2005), and novels (Mansouri, 2011: 95). However, the reported reaction following the answer to the "Where are you from?" question reveals the asking person point of view.

The "Where are you from?" question occurs when "you" is identified as different by the asking person. The later might not be aware of the assignation to otherness, which belongs to the "Where are you from?" question. Moreover, she/he might be benevolent while asking this question, for example, demonstrating openness and interest regarding another culture.

The respondent learn the real meaning of the "Where are you from?" question by iteration. Initially, she/he can commit a naïve answer. But the repetition of this question clearly invalidates such an answer. During childhood and adolescence, respondents learn first that this is an assignation to otherness, and second that asking persons might be unaware of this meaning. They learn what a good or a bad answer is with regard to this question. They learn that this assignation to otherness refers to what make them identified as different. They learn that this question refers to a founding event. They learn that they are expected to report this event. They learn that they can even reduce themselves to this founding event. They learn that belonging to the nation will be always a challenge, whatever their efforts. Nevertheless, respondents to the "Where are you from?" question still believe in the French republican project, either requiring to become "transparent" (Silva, 2007), or focusing on equity promise through collective strategies.

The technologies of internet in the contentious repertoires: Clues and signs of avaaaz in a multi-sited fieldwork

The article turns to the relationship between the communication power of the internet (CASTELLS, 2009) and the contentious repertoires (TILLY, 1995) in the field of transnational activism (TAROW, 2000). By following clues and signs of a global online community of mobilization, called Avaaz, the paper emphasizes the forms of belonging to this organization as well as the campaigns reported in frames at Avaaz' portuguese-language website (www.avaaz.org/pt) as means of understanding new forms of protest, political participation and even an enlargement of the idea of public sphere that seems to be taking place in contemporary societies. The multi-sited ethnographic fieldwork and the evidentiary paradigm lead to plots in which the bricolages are produced in an exercise of observant participation in frames on the website of this organization that was formed in 2007. In this sense, since the new interaction practices seem to increase the velocity of publicizing the campaigns and sparking off public protests, by way of mobilization networks that are more symmetrical and less hierarchical than those configured up to the early 1990s, we can argue: do these connections extend possibilities of political participation, as well as extend the public sphere itself, signaling innovations in the contentious repertoires?

on explaining discourse

After four decades from Foucault's inaugural address on the order of discourse and Widdowson's paper on the distinction between text and discourse, there is no common definition of discourse among scholars. Nor is there a clear view on what they ought to account for and explain.

Each of the most frequently found conceptions of discourse^[1] captures different intuitions of discourse users, as well as different contributions from general research on language and from specific research on discourse; but all contradict equally important intuitions and ideas, too. I have proposed^[2] a definition of a discourse as a complex sign, which integrates the valid and relevant points of those conceptions and avoids their problematic ones: a set of articulated signs whose signifiers are themselves signs (situated utterances) and whose signifieds are pragmatic vectors (combinations of references and predications with epistemic, deontic and evaluative attitudes).

In this paper, I will summarise the research that has lead to those results, elaborate on some fine issues and, from there, propose that the main data a science of discourse should be concerned with are discourse users' judgements on discourse properties, and not frequency distributions of linguistic items, which today receive most of the attention in many quarters. I will claim that, for such a discipline, accounting for singularities will be at least as crucial as accounting for regularities. I will argue that the main problem that ought to be addressed now is the form of rules that could explain systemic couplings (mainly among systems of language, speech situations, knowledge and social relations). And I will suggest some examples of such rules.

L'insécurité, problème social ou instrumentalisation politique ?

La question de la sécurité est devenue en Europe Occidentale, et spécialement en France, un thème récurrent qui domine le débat politique. Elle est aussi un enjeu des politiques urbaines en se cristallisant autour de ce que l'on appelle « le problème des banlieues », ou « des quartiers sensibles » dont les habitants, surtout les jeunes, sont souvent accusés d'être les principaux responsables des désordres qui menacent l'ordre social.

On proposera la thèse que, pour prendre au sérieux le problème de l'insécurité et le combattre d'une manière efficace, il faut distinguer différents types d'insécurité. Ainsi l'insécurité civile qui menace l'intégrité des biens et de personnes et l'insécurité sociale qui condamne un nombre croissant de gens à la précarité, n'ont rien de commun. La première pose la question du maintien de l'ordre dans un Etat de droit et la seconde celle d'une distribution plus équitable des ressources par l'Etat social. L'insécurité civile et l'insécurité sociale ne peuvent donc pas être combattues par les mêmes moyens.

Les politiques sécuritaires font comme si la lutte contre la délinquance était l'objectif suffisant à poursuivre pour combattre l'insécurité en général. Elles ciblent ainsi des groupes particuliers comme « les jeunes de banlieue », surtout s'ils sont « issus de l'immigration », qui font fonction de classes dangereuses parce qu'ils seraient à l'origine de toutes les formes de violence menaçant la cohésion sociale. On voudrait au contraire montrer qu'il faut à la fois distinguer les formes d'insécurité et comprendre comment leur confusion surdétermine « la question de banlieues » en lui faisant porter la responsabilité de tous les désordres sociaux. C'est leur distinction qui devrait permettre de mettre en œuvre les moyens différents nécessaires pour combattre les formes différentes de la violence. Donc il faut prendre au sérieux la spécificité de l'insécurité civile et de l'insécurité sociale.

The dissonance between secularism and religious speech in a public school kindergarten in the municipality of duque de caxias

The present work aims to analyze the presence of religious discourse in a public kindergarten school in the municipality of Duque de Caxias. A field survey was conducted for that purpose involving participant observation in a class of 5 year-old children. The religious discourses in the institution under investigation were found during exploratory study as part of the research entitled "Childhood, language and school: from books and reading policies to children literacy in Rio schools." By referring to secularism as a precondition of a democratic lawful state, the study raised the following questions: What religious discourses circulate in the institution? Who do they intend to reach? What are their purposes? Is the democratic principle of secularism being considered? What about religious freedom? In an attempt to answer these questions we carried out an ethnographically inspired qualitative research drawing on literature review of studies on language, public policies - especially those that discuss the presence of religion in public schools - , early childhood education, anthropology and childhood sociology. In addition to field observations at a public kindergarten school in the Municipality of Duque de Caxias caring for children 2 to 5 years old, interviews and other discursive productions were conducted and recorded in order to identify religious discourses. The observations revealed the naturalization of the presence of religious speech in public schools in disregard of religious freedom, coupled with the absence of secularism in that public space acting as a promoter of a given religious faith over other beliefs.

Social representations of Latin American migrants in Argentine newspapers (1999-2007)

Los flujos migratorios no pueden ser explicados sólo por la pobreza o el desempleo, sino que éstos se encuentran condicionados por dinámicas económico-políticas más amplias y abarcadoras, en las que se sitúan las decisiones de los migrantes. Sin embargo, esta relación entre la migración reciente y el modelo neoliberal, es decir, el contexto que la promueve, era sólo analizada en textos de teoría crítica, pero no aparecía ni en los medios de comunicación ni en el discurso de los entrevistados.

Elegimos el período 1999-2007 en Argentina, a fin de comprobar si las connotaciones negativas en torno a la temática migratoria seguían operando y de qué manera lo hacían: uno de los principales objetivos será estudiar si esta forma de representación es coherente con las líneas perfiladas por el neoliberalismo, modelo en el que los diarios están insertos, operan y se desarrollan. Dichas líneas requieren de un aparato ideológico constante de creación y mantenimiento de grupos y sujetos subalternos. Decidimos indagar si los medios incluían en la puesta en sentido de estas noticias la tensión que produce el tema migratorio en el seno de las sociedades neoliberales, que oscilan entre la necesidad del mercado ilegal y paralelo y el discurso que demoniza estos movimientos humanos que el mismo sistema promueve.

Trabajaremos con artículos periodísticos bajo un enfoque cualitativo, dinámico y relacional, en el que estos "paquetes textuales" de operaciones discursivas, al mismo tiempo, se encuentran insertos dentro de un modelo de producción, distribución y consumo. Es decir, todo sistema social subsume un producto discursivo en el que el componente ideológico se encuentra presente en todas las materias significantes. El sentido de las mismas está determinado socialmente, así como su particular forma de crear distancias entre los grupos.

Good practices of cooperation between university and local community

This paper will identify areas of application of good practices which emerged from international and interdisciplinary research on social suffering in urban spaces and on change agency with intercultural sensitivity, which is at the basis of a new concept of co-operation for local development. Three examples of possible good practices are described such as: 1) The Pilot action-research project on community health and quality of the life in Managua's Barrio Carlos Fonseca, an urban place of social suffering; 2) The relationship of University of Sancti Spiritus with the local Cuban community; 3) The research-action on the rights of citizen that the University of Milano-Bicocca, together with the Foundation Casa della Carità, is conducting in some districts in Milan. Six themes of research: under age foreigners not accompanied, migrant people, health and services, social marginality, prisons, house. In the relationship university-local community it is very important the role of the University as a development agent in society, interacting with citizens and institutions, which is strengthened by research activity, interaction, sensitization, education, training and capacity building, professional apprenticeship and participatory field projects. It is important to emphasize how universities progressively rising number of tasks makes them increasingly important as agents for local development. Therefore the university is measured not only on the basis of quality of knowledge and human capital, but also on the level of embedded social capital within a certain region. Value is added in those contexts where suitable skills resulting from constant investment in university education and professional qualification are useful. Universities should increasingly become the in which people can come together, ask questions, make demands and offer experiences. These social and professional practices pass through the university arena and return to their origins enriched by the exchange of new perspectives.

Civic knowledge and political participation in unequal contexts: Six Latin American countries in comparative perspective

Empirical research in civic and political participation has consistently shown that higher levels of civic knowledge and higher participation levels are characteristic of those with higher socio-economic status and formal education. Socio-economic status differences among citizens are accentuated in societies with high inequality as the Latin American ones. This has the consequence that economic inequality is related to political inequality in terms of knowledge and participation. Such a link is not only a threat to the principles of egalitarian political participation in a democracy, but in the Latin American context it also puts at risk the legitimacy of the democratic system itself, as it no longer represents the whole spectrum of its citizenry. Schools are considered one of the key social institutions for neutralizing the effects of differences in social origin and for providing possibilities of social mobility. In this ideal sense, it is certainly relevant to know to what extent social origin impacts on civic knowledge and at the same time whether civic knowledge affects the participation levels at school and on the disposition to civic participation in future adult life. Given the availability of the ICCS 2009 data and its Latin American module (29,962 students in 1,027 schools), for the first time there is an opportunity for an empirical analysis following this research question. Under the general hypothesis that low social origin is related to low civic knowledge and low participation levels at school and equally low dispositions to participate in adult life, the present paper compares this association in six Latin American countries: Chile, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Mexico, and Paraguay. Preliminary results show that the association between status, civic knowledge and participation varies across countries, something that is discussed taking into account the diversity of educational programs and socio-economic situation of the countries considered.

Higher education, inequality and distributive beliefs: Evidence from the Chilean case

During the year 2011, Chile has been site of several student's demonstrations claiming for more equity in the access to the higher education. These claims have as background several studies that characterize the Chilean educational system as one of the most economically segregated at world level (OECD, 2010). The high support to the protests by the side of the general population (nearly 80% of approval in public opinion polls) seems to suggest the existence of a large consensus about the weaknesses of the Chilean educative model, a model that would challenge the traditional ideals of meritocracy and social mobility that are at the core of the educational systems in modern societies. In this context, a question that remains open is to what extent these claims are mostly based on consensual equality ideals, or whether they are influenced by individual socio-economic determinants vis-à-vis rational motives. Using data of the social inequality module International Social Survey Program (ISSP) of 2009, this research analyzes perceptions and beliefs about education and the distributive system as well as the influence of income and educational variables in a structural equation modeling framework. We propose that, instead of a widespread consensus, there are significant differences within the population regarding inequality in education, differences that would be at least partially explained by rational interests linked to social status: those with higher status would perceive less educational inequalities than those with less status. Preliminary results give partial support to the hypotheses, unveiling the presence of socio-economic cleavages that seem to be hidden under the idea of a normative consensus about the function of educational system as a redistributive mechanism.

Modern traditions, traditional moderns?: Contrasts of modernity in postcolonial Latin America

¿Tradiciones modernas, modernidades tradicionales?: Contrastes de la modernidad en la América Latina poscolonial (Tesis final de maestría)

En conmemoración del bicentenario de independencia de Hispanoamérica el siguiente trabajo está enfocado a explorar su situación histórica como región poscolonial. La herencia del colonialismo es una condición irrefutable que sin duda alguna conduce a un análisis profundo con el objetivo de identificar sus consecuencias e implicaciones en las diferentes culturas y sociedades. Una de los principales temáticas del debate poscolonial es el concepto de modernidad, el cual no deja de desatar controversias debido a su alto enfoque político. En orden de acentuar la diversidad cultural existente en América Latina y en consideración de las prevaletentes disparidades económicas y sociales del área, esta tesis final de maestría se enfoca a presentar formas alternativas de ver y explicar la modernidad. Además y ante todo, este trabajo debe de ser entendido como un intento de desempañar y destapar realidades en contraste, pluralidad e hibridez con un especial enfoque a la población indígena latinoamericana como sector socialmente marginado. Con material audiovisual recogido durante una estancia de dos meses en tres países diferentes (Bolivia, México y Perú) y en base a la teoría del poscolonialismo este trabajo se orienta a contrarrestar concepciones lineares y hegemónicas sobre la modernidad. En este sentido, resaltando interdependencias y al mismo tiempo diferencias se propone abogar por una reflexión amplia que permita superar modelos duales de categorización social así como definiciones unilaterales y discriminatorias de desarrollo.

Mothering and fathering in flexible working contexts

The literature on the relationship between work and family aims to understand the impacts that the flexible working hours and non-standard contracts have on the roles of motherhood and fatherhood. They usually focus on part-time contracts and on parental leave. There is, however, little attention from the Brazilian Social Sciences for this phenomenon.

Some changes in labour laws, in the 1990's, allowed a profusion of non-standard labour contracts in Brazil. The sector of information technology (IT), in particular, has a significant amount of workers in non-standardized labour relations (illegal contracts, unregulated working-hour, for ex.). This means that basic labour rights, such as parental leave, are not guaranteed for them.

In this paper I intend to present the different concepts and practices of motherhood and fatherhood found in the interviews I have conducted with IT workers in the city of São Paulo. I intend to show how the unregulated productive labour relates to the reproductive labour, as well as how the different types of contracts, the working-hour regime and the home office practice impacts on the exercise of motherhood and fatherhood.

Non-standard employment contracts and the organization of work: The case of the Brazilian information technology sector

The Information Technology (IT) industry gained strength in Brazil in late 1980 and early 1990 with the liberalization of the computer industry, which used to be closed to international companies. In the same period were introduced important changes in the Brazilian labor legislation, allowing different forms of flexible work. In this context, non-standard employment contracts have become common in this industry, specially one called "PJ" (short for "Legal Entities"). The "PJ" consists of an individual agreement, made between employer and employee, which has the ultimate goal of cheaper labor costs. In theory, a company has a contract with another company. In practice, the worker opens a business to guarantee his or her place of work.

In this paper I intend to present the case of "PJ"s in the IT sector in the city of São Paulo and its impacts on the organization of work. I have conducted interviews with 30 men and 30 women working for this industry in different companies. This methodological choice was made because I wanted to capture a greater diversity of models of labor relations. Since there is no regulation to a "PJ", the working hours, the wage definition, the guarantee of vacation and other employment rights and benefits are offered by companies in different ways and are negotiated individually. There are, however, some patterns identified by empirical research that will be presented and analyzed from the point of view of gender and generation.

The locus of the affordable housing in São Paulo over the growth cycles of the 1990's and the 2000's

This paper aims to investigate housing policy and private sector initiatives affecting housing provision in Brazil over the 1990's and 2000's. Within an historical and theoretical framework, it identifies the trends of these policies and the strategies of private sector as well their impacts on the built environment. It focus mainly on the case of São Paulo, where the growth of house building in Brazil is greatly pronounced and has shown a concentration of new affordable homeownership production over last decades. In the 1990s with the lack of resources to foster the Housing Finance System, the choice taken by construction companies, developers and cooperatives managed by private agencies was the self-financed housing for middle-income households, an innovative way of organizing production, enabling to eliminate construction and sales loans. However, over the mid 2000's the new economic conditions and the guidelines of National Housing Policy have engendered financial innovation and investment alternatives making the housing sector more competitive mostly pulled by public financing and subsidies that enables the expansion of the housing market for the middle income and lower middle households. The paper achieves a comparative analysis of the patterns of supply and demand of the affordable housing production over the growth cycles of the 1990's and 2000's in the Metropolitan Area of São Paulo mainly focusing a number of specific questions/hypotheses related with the factors that have affected the choice of location for new housing developments.

Age and gender in Brazilian self-help books

This work aims to capture the socio-cultural construction of midlife crises in Brazilian self-help literature, through the interplay of two analytical categories: gender and aging, taking into account the anti-aging contemporary experiences, the variety of identity branding and the elevation of youth as a value. The analysis focuses on the popular images of the male and female wolves (lobos and lobas, in Portuguese) that characterize the midlife or forty-years-old crises in Brazil since the 1990s. The effort is to capture the changes that the gender deviations bring to define the midlife in this particular kind of media. Apparently dealing with the same period of life in a given social context, the books play an active role reproducing and recreating differences and inequalities about the social and emotional experiences of aging men and women. While men are seen as fragile and childish, women are seen as powerful and seductive, despite the physical transformations in this period of life. From the theoretical framework of sociology and anthropology of emotions and care, and the generation and life courses topics, I propose a debate on the socio-emotional expectations for this stage of life. Reinforcing, at the same time, risk and individual crises feelings, and family and traditional positions, Brazilian self-help literature constitute a rich field for sociology study, and part of this work looks at the possible social-cultural specificities in this context. Additionally, it also highlights the procedures of construction of other age images and meanings such as the futile young adult and the really old women and men, that have no bodies or emotional expectations. The crises arises as a possible result of the interplay between the extension of the adult life tendency and the anti-aging experience, full with inequities between those who can access and live it and those that can not.

Life crises in Brazilian self-help books

Considering the contemporary processes of denying aging, the variety of identity branding and the elevation of youth as a value, I propose an analysis as per how some life crises are portrayed in self-help books. Taking into account the images of the male and female wolves (lobos and lobas, in Portuguese) in order to characterize the midlife crises or forty-years-old-crises in Brazil, these constitute one of my analytical attentions. The effort is to capture the changes that the gender deviations bring to define the midlife in this particular kind of media. While men are seen as fragile and childish, women are seen as powerful and seductive, despite the physical transformations in this period of life. From the theoretical framework of sociology and anthropology of emotions and care, and the generation and life courses topics, I propose a debate on the socio-emotional expectations for this stage of life. Another topic of interest is the recent appearance of the so-called quarter-life crises in American self-help books for a cross-cultural comparison. This paper initiates a comparative analysis on the socio-cultural processes of construction of images and meanings for life crises in self-help literature, through the interplay of two analytical categories, gender and life courses, in different publishing and national-cultural contexts, as my doctorate graduation work aims to achieve.

Los sentidos de la exclusión en América Latina

Esta propuesta intenta articular una perspectiva diferente en lo relativo a la historia de la llamada "cuestión social" en las sociedades contemporáneas, particularmente en Brasil y Argentina. El foco estará puesto en las nociones de masa marginal, trabajo asalariado/trabajo desafiado, en las políticas ideadas e implementadas desde la esfera estatal y en las acciones de los movimientos sociales de base. Un segundo tópico será discutir—desde una perspectiva histórico-social— la acción profesional, especialmente las profesiones humanitarias y las vinculadas al trabajo social. Así pues, este texto busca reflexionar en torno a las características de las políticas sociales, los movimientos sociales y el trabajo social en Brasil y Argentina, con todas las implicancias teóricas, analíticas y políticas que dicho trabajo trae aparejadas.

Luego, revisaremos la literatura que nos llevará a comprender las acciones cooperativas y las experiencias "de base". Entre los intérpretes de estos sucesos contemporáneos se encuentran Carlos A. Gadea (2007, 2008) y María Da Glória Gohn (1997). El objetivo es repensar algunas generalizaciones sobre la historia reciente de los movimientos sociales y la activa presencia de la sociedad civil en Argentina y Brasil. Autores cercanos a Gohn (Gohn, 2008) sostienen que la fuerza y el dinamismo de las acciones colectivas fueron socavados por las políticas de "inclusión social" de los gobiernos, o por iniciativas de proyectos sociales realizadas por agencias del tercer sector y fundaciones filantrópicas. (Algunos autores dedicados al trabajo social sostienen argumentos similares). Al mismo tiempo, otras lecturas apuntarán a una dirección diferente. Las iniciativas de autoayuda, las experiencias de aprendizaje mutuo y el desarrollo de las capacidades autónomas y las identidades colectivas pueden surgir, aún de los más "conservadores" proyectos sociales de los gobiernos o de las "fundaciones inspiradas" (Hirschman, 1984; Melluci, 1980; Castro Santos, 2010).

The health professions: A critical analysis of the culture of caring

The text discusses the role and performance of nurses and physiotherapists in the National Health System of Brazil and, particularly, in the family health services. The emergence of new health professions and the redefinition of traditional roles and activities associated with more established professions are discussed in detail. Attention is placed on the challenges posed on multi-professional teams, especially on the new professionals, who are part of a government effort in search a more humane health care, universal coverage, integration of services and effective, good-quality, health providers. The field of public health (also known in Latin America as "salud colectiva") has contributed to the achievement of such goals, by means of an articulate cross-fertilization with the Social Sciences, despite (or to some extent, because of) the existence of conflict and tensions between different frontiers of knowledge and practices. Clashes between paradigms -- for example, between social epidemiology and the social sciences, and their different roles assigned to professions and professionalism, may or may not be conducive to advances in knowledge in the health field. Under some circumstances, the dialogue with the Social Sciences has been unfortunately broken or discontinued by health care academics and professionals, in favor of an exclusive interaction with the general field of the so-called "Health Sciences".

Assessing three visions of democracy in Latin America: Civil society and political institutions in historical perspective

For many observers, the future of democratization in Latin America hinges on the extent to which civil society can be engaged effectively into more inclusive political arrangements vis-à-vis the state. For some, civil society and NGOs can provide more effective controls over state agencies, so as to secure more transparent, participatory and efficient governments. We will call this the liberal-democratic model of civil society-state relationships. For others, the pursuit of more inclusive and equitable political arrangements requires greater space for participation by mobilized social movements (e.g., landless peasants, the unemployed, and/or labor). We will call this the radical-democratic model of civil society-state relationship. These two models differ greatly; the advocates of both warn us, however, against the current rise of a third way of linking civil society and the state, involving the co-opting of civil society by the state, through the purposeful maintenance of social inequality and the deployment of clientelism and patronage. We will call this the populist model. How should we assess the shifting relative importance of these three modes of organization over time? How do they relate with the quest with greater democratization today, especially in the context of the changes brought about by globalization? To assess these questions, this paper uses original data to analytically explore how civil society association has been articulated through competing but complementary patterns of action and organization (that we label as those of "insiders" and "outsiders"); identifies when and how the transformation of these two patterns through the 20th century was associated with the emergence and development of innovative institutional arrangements embodied in each of the three models discussed above; and, finally, argues that our focus on these two types of activism helps us understand the renewed importance of populist mobilization among current democratic regimes in the region.

Brasil, governança, recursos naturais e cidadania

Recursos naturais do Brasil com governança? Melhor dizer: Participação, cidadania e democratização em stand by: a reprodução da década de 1970 for ever: abertura política lenta, gradual, segura e fora das conversas da sociedade civil.

Não há como "comprovar", em 20 páginas de demonstrações teóricas abstratas, que a governança dos recursos naturais brasileiros significa: concentração do poder de decisão nas mãos dos executivos, políticas públicas objetivando a apropriação dos recursos em prol de iniciativas privadas, exclusão de facto da sociedade civil e ausência de democracia real em prol dos imperativos da democracia-de-mercado. Por isso, pretende-se evocar o assunto através de dois exemplos que trazem as ditas provas em âmbito prático:

1. as condições da participação da sociedade civil na gestão dos recursos hídricos: como a Lei federal brasileira 9433/97 (Política Nacional de Recursos Hídricos), ao fixar as condições da participação da sociedade civil, determina a exclusão das iniciativas de dita "sociedade" e promove, contra a vontade e à revelia da sociedade civil, soluções ultraliberais e mercantilistas: se houver governança, haverá privatização da água.
2. As condições da participação dos povos indígenas na política pública brasileira: diretrizes e critérios para a concepção e execução de ações de proteção territorial e etnoambiental em terras indígenas, recém (13/12/2011) re-produzidas pela Portaria 1.682/2011 expedida pela FUNAI (Fundação Nacional do Índio) que estabelece as diretrizes e critérios para a concepção e execução de ações de proteção territorial e etnoambiental, evocam e revogam a participação e a cidadania das nações indígenas brasileiras.

Esses dois casos serão analisados à luz dos esquemas teóricos do sociólogo Pierre Bourdieu, para mostrar como o discurso mais oficial (o que está tornado irrefutável pela sua incorporação em texto legal) trata de excluir a possibilidade de qualquer cidadania efetiva.

Public sphere and environment

The advance of technologies, especially the mass communication means, had approached not only the world economies, but also cultures and societies. The emergency of a called global society brings the coactivities together, and throws them into planetary orbit. It promotes a redefinition of the Nation-State and, consequently, a reflection of the traditional public sphere concept.

Observing the new amplitude of communicational flows allows to observe the rising of civil society on international scenery. Its space for deliberation is related to comprehensions of international dynamic, as well to the human relations transcending national frontiers. National movements point out the recognition of the transversality of human interests, marked by world public opinion tendencies, tied to the informational growth and the globalization process.

This research intends to approach Jürgen Habermas' public sphere traditional concept, revisited in a transnational dimension, once themes previously belonging to national agendas move to world agenda, establishing common concerns, as environment and climate change.

Quota system and the new protagonists in a contemporary public higher education in Brazil

Higher Education in Brazil has been going through many changes for the last two decades due to the market demands and its cultural and social selective nature opposing effective democratization. Institutional diversification expresses its discriminatory organizational forms, which hierarchy and classification are derived. The dissimulating nature of social inequality and school trajectory are disguised by the argument of the myth of talent and individual struggle. Emerged from social movements, specially those focused on human rights, affirmative actions arose from the disruption against old compensatory policies. The result is a number of projects for public school and higher education. The Quota Policy in higher education is considered a collective strategy for democratization to access and qualitative permanence, reserving places for social groups historically excluded, such as non-white or afro-descendants, public school students, indigenous and handicapped. Politically and educationally, affirmative policies are defined and signified as a commitment and a possible policy for historical reparation of increasing school inequalities mediated by cultural and social inequalities. This program is not mandatory and the institutions determine the number of places to be offered to specific groups. This work proposes to discuss how these groups are distributed in the quota system by higher education institutions and how this policy moves towards democratization of access of these groups. This study is part of an ongoing research in the line of Education, Society and Culture in a doctorate program. A research about the strategies of democratization in higher education by documental analysis of the National Education Plans of 2011-2010 and 2010-2020 (which is currently being discussed in the National Congress), as well as the quota distribution map, which reveals the relevance of the protagonists by its nomination and reservation indexes of places, was carried out for this study.

An approach to the Brazilian immigrant entrepreneurship in London and Barcelona

This paper is based on the research "Transnational economic practices of Latin American migrants in Barcelona and London", conducted by the Group of Immigration Studies and Ethnic Minorities (GEDIME – at the Autonomous University of Barcelona). The paper analyzes the conditions and processes that explain the organization, structure and operation of transnational economic enterprises and transnational economic practices carry out by Brazilian immigrant entrepreneurs living in Barcelona and London. Based on the case of Brazil, our proposed typology of Brazilian immigrant enterprises confirms the absolute necessity of keeping transnational relations both for Brazil and its migrant-citizens.

This presentation analyzes the transnational economic practices that link Brazilian settlements in Barcelona/London with Brazil. At the same time that it considers the relationship between economic transnationalism and immigrant settlement. Four processes are examined, including: (1) the theoretical and methodological framework; (2) styles and patterns of entrepreneurship; (3) the typology of the transnational enterprises; (4) the impact and importance of the Brazilian immigrant enterprises and their role in (re) constructing the social visibility of the Brazilian collective both in Barcelona and in London.

Brazilian immigrants in Spain and their incorporation into the Spanish labour world

This paper partially analyzes the results of a research financed by the Ministerio de Trabajo e Inmigración de España [Spanish Ministry of Labour and Immigration] on the socioeconomic incorporation of Brazilian immigrants in Spain. This is elaborated paying special attention to the "common places" that make up the labour stories of Brazilians in Barcelona and Madrid. The text discusses three aspects of the incorporation into the labour world done by the Brazilian collective:

1. Their prominence in the general commercial/business milieu and their role in the (re)construction of their social visibility in Spain;
2. Brazilian women incorporation into the labour force, from a gender perspective;
3. Different individual trajectories of the Brazilians and their different position in the "hierarchy of otherness" of immigration in Spain.

Apart from showing the main quantitative data about the Brazilian immigrants in Spain, the article also discusses how the unique heterogeneity of this group in Madrid and Barcelona brings about different incorporation patterns into labour force in comparison to other Latin American groups living in Spain.

Changes and events across the life course: An international comparison

Conocimientos actuales sobre el curso de la vida se basan casi exclusivamente en la investigación llevada a cabo en América del Norte o Europa occidental, y queda mucho para llegar a una "geografía global del curso de la vida" (Dannefer, 2003). Esta ponencia trata del proyecto internacional de investigación CEVI – Cambios y eventos en el curso de la vida – que analiza la relación entre el desarrollo de las vidas individuales y las dinámicas socio históricas. Para ello es relevante la noción de cambio y la percepción de las personas de diversos países y que se encuentran en distintas etapas de su vida. Se consideran tres temas principales: la percepción y la evaluación de los cambios importantes en la vida de las personas durante el último año; la percepción de cambios importantes (puntos de inflexión) durante toda la vida; y la memoria de los acontecimientos socio-históricos. El proyecto CEVI tiene tres características originales. Desde un punto de vista teórico, consideramos no las trayectorias de vida objetivas pero la percepción subjetiva de los individuos de su propio curso de la vida. Sin embargo, mientras que las investigaciones sobre la reconstrucción autobiográfica habitualmente adoptan métodos cualitativos e involucran a un número limitado de casos, el enfoque sobre el concepto de cambio hace posible la formulación de un cuestionario aplicable a gran escala que puede analizarse mediante la combinación de técnicas cuantitativas y cualitativas. Por último, CEVI es una de las primeras investigaciones interculturales sobre la articulación entre la historia y la biografía. El proyecto involucra 11 países, 4 de los cuales en América Latina (Argentina, Brasil, Chile y México). En cada país, se aplica un cuestionario estandarizado a unas 600 personas de cinco grupos de edad: 20-24, 35-39, 50-54, 65-69 y 80-84 años.

Crossing borders and overcoming exclusion: An overview of female migration in Brazil

Through a brief overview of female migration in Brazil, this paper aims to show how women have been negotiating with other traditions and cultures, redefining traditional gender identities, and, crossing the boundaries of social exclusion.

The "journey" begins in Africa, between the fourteenth and nineteenth centuries, when they migrated to Brazil as slaves, about 4 million Africans from various ethnic groups / nations, with a large contingent, however, uncertain of women. Although, in the nineteenth century, the abolition of slavery was announced, it came unaccompanied by policies of social inclusion for african descent, who had no place in the everyday work of Brazil, taken by European immigrants. On the other hand, patriarchy, with all his force, kept women oppressed. Racial disparities coupled with the strength of patriarchy imposed hard boundaries to women, who used to overcome them, creating some very interesting strategies of survival and overcoming.

The journey of black women, and their descendants, who, in the diaspora context, (re) created an "imagined" Africa in Brazil, is a good example. Through the maintenance and transmission of sacred African oral traditions, they gave power to a religious-mythical world in which, as "mother of saint" assumed the highest office in the hierarchy - against both African tradition and Western, where men traditionally hold authority.

Outside the religious sphere, but sharing the refusal by passivity, young women, coming from the disadvantaged sections of the population, have also been working great "miracles." Through the joint (and informal) solidarity in networks of mutual support, they migrated from the country's poorest regions, mainly in the Northeast, to Rio de Janeiro, and can overcome everyday adversities. In search of better living conditions and social recognition, the young migrants and their networks also come across borders (geographical and subjective), without losing the marks of their cultural identity.

Diaspora and Africa: Black identity constructions in Brazil

Between the 16th and 19th centuries about 4 million Africans of several ethnicities/nations migrated to Brazil as slaves. The abolition of slavery in Brazil in the 19th century, lacking any policies of social insertion to Afro-descendants, generated huge racial inequalities in our society. Such inequalities inherited from the colonial period last until nowadays, as pointed out by social-economical indicators of the official research agencies. This is also present in the case of women. Africa "imagined" was recreated here through this mythic-religious world, and the women had a great importance in this process of maintaining and transmitting African oral sacred traditions. This work has the purpose of analyzing, within the perspective of post-colonial and cultural studies, the trajectory of Black women and their descendants victims of racism and sexism have occupied the highest hierarchical positions in their communities, searching for recognition through religious practices of African matrix. Semi-structured interviews were carried out in Rio de Janeiro with religious leaders, elected amongst those more aged and having a greater time of initiation. The analysis of the narrative of the leaders has revealed that women are not the passive subjects of the History. By means of negotiations with other traditions they assert their identities of gender, race and religion, struggling for a greater visibility and recognition. Chosen by the deities, the women value the legacy of the ancestors and the lineage of the worship, presenting a high self-worth and a highly estimated subjectivity, forming a large family where akin descent and ritual are merged, landmarks of their cultural identity.

Lineamientos empresariales en la sociedad del riesgo

El riesgo en las sociedades modernas está inserto a través del mundo interconectado por las tecnologías de la comunicación lo que conforma una nueva constelación de la realidad mundial. La sociedad del riesgo, entonces, hace que los diferentes grupos de interés establezcan nuevos debates surgidos de la arquitectura de la sociedad industrial moderna. Los riesgos surgen en el espacio social bajo diferentes modalidades, generando ambientes de incertidumbres institucionalizadas que constituyen la escenografía y las fatalidades propias del mundo moderno. Estos hechos exigen acciones más audaces y comprometidas para conformar un nuevo espacio de oportunidades sociales, con la finalidad de generar confianza y expectativas fiables que se materialicen en instituciones para resocializar el espacio social a partir de nuevos ordenamientos consolidados en el imaginario colectivo. En este trabajo se analizarán las nuevas propuestas empresariales dirigidas a solucionar los problemas que devienen de la sociedad del riesgo y las condiciones adversas de la globalización. Estas problemáticas globales se constituyen en un tema político en sí mismo, muy especialmente las referidas a políticas medioambientales, desarrollo sostenible y derechos humanos, pues conformarán los nuevos parámetros de la gobernanza internacional y establecerán nuevas iniciativas civilizatorias. Se utilizará el análisis de contenido en un corpus de tres documentos representativos del management, en donde se argumentan las nuevas formas de intervención y regulación del mundo económico empresarial. En esos discursos analizados se ponen de manifiesto las formas del ideario empresarial responsable, la construcción de nuevos valores y solidaridades, que conforman una visión global alternativa creando horizontes, lineamientos y acciones, para estructurar nuevas interpretaciones de la cohesión social, el bien común y la justicia social. Desde estos lineamientos, el management apunta a dar forma a una comunidad empresarial internacional que, discursivamente, establece las formas del desarrollo social.

Changing understanding and practices of nursing in Turkey: An analysis of two generations

Nursing is robustly feminized and assumed as the natural duty of womanhood which later transferred to the professional work life. As a result of being an approved female occupation, women are expected to perform their womanhood via nursing occupation combining the supreme thought and practical roles that attributed to them. The main aim of this study is to analyse and understand the solid and authorized impending of nursing across the generations, practising this occupation. Healing and nurturing were conducted by the female members of the family since the ancient times. Gradually with modernity and medical development, traditionally and socially structured caregiving duty of women shifted from domestic sphere to hospitals and care centers. Nurses are also assumed to be the symbol of the innocent and hard working care takers. In any case of wars or uprising social crises, women's docile existence shifted from one purpose or duty to another on the interest of the state in the concept of women as potential nurses or docile citizenship. With time and modernity feminist discourses brought a new look to the nursing practices. Nurses who work for over 20 years, are educated with different values and conditions compared to incipient nurses. Generational differences also raise debates of division of labour and links of womanhood transfer of daily nursing care from home area to labour market. These concepts are needed to be tackled with a feminist approach. Changes in and understanding of the practice of nursing will be examined and shown through the data collected from the in-depth interviews conducted with both experienced and incipient nurses.

The dilemma of remaining in between : Case of Arab Alawitas in Turkey

Arab Alawitas are forming an ethnic group spread over Turkey, Syria and Lebanon mainly. This ethnic group has been prone to many practices of social exclusion for centuries, due to their distinct way of understanding and adjusting religion to their own community. Exclusionary practices by the dominant groups led this community to live a sacred life. Whilst they consider themselves as Muslims, at the same time their beliefs were affected by some other both semitic and ancient rituals & religions. This situation basically caused them to partly feel or pretend as both outsiders and insiders within the society they live. Their case shows differences in different contexts for instance. For example although in all three mentioned countries they are not forming the dominant group, they are in the head of the state in Syria. This research, on the other hand, focuses on the case of Arab Alawites in Turkey. The situation of Arab Alawites in Turkey is an example of double jeopardy because of their both Arab and Alawita identity. Both of these identities are seen as problematic and degrading by the dominant Turkish groups. The qualitative analysis of both the perceptions and experiences of Arab Alawites in Hatay region of Turkey is employed to understand to what extent this group of people is subject to exclusion because of their ethnic origin. The data derived from the in-depth interviews with Arab Alawites in this region will be presented with special attention given to how this group remains in between within the Turkish society.

Cuerpos, sentidos y función de la transgresión en la cultura urbano popular

Grupo temático: Sobre los sentidos y la sociedad TG07
Sesión D: sensorial pedido (s), transgresiones sensorial

Esta ponencia trata sobre el papel del cuerpo y los sentidos en las interacciones entre los sexos en ciertos espacios "transgresores" y de ciertos comportamientos considerados marginales, excluidos de la cultura oficial, formal, instituido.

Se recupera la función conspiradora de la transgresión contra los poderes simbólicos establecidos, así como la función en la estructuración de una nueva realidad de los comportamientos contra-culturales.

Se analiza dos fenómenos considerados hechos sociales por su extensión y práctica permanente: Uno es la existencia de los hostales, como espacios de encuentro transgresores de parejas que practican relaciones extramatrimoniales. Oficialmente, los hostales son establecimiento de hospedaje temporal de viajeros, pero que en las grandes ciudades del Perú, sobre todo Lima, se han transformado en espacios de intimidad de parejas.

El otro espacio, es lo que en Lima hemos dado en llamar perrotecas, lugares donde adolescentes y jóvenes de los sectores populares se concentran para bailar el reggaetón al ritmo del perreo, simulando actos sexuales, en un ambiente de comportamientos y expresiones obscenas.

Ambos son espacio de licencias, donde las relaciones tradicionales entre los sexos se deconstruyen de manera gozosa. Y el papel de la mujer es fundamental en ese proceso deconstructivo democratizador.

Discursive positioning in everyday encounters in elder care

This is a study of talk between older persons and care staff in encounters in elder care. The empirical data consist of 20 dyadic audio-taped conversations between older persons and care staff.

The conversations were studied as acts of narrative identity positioning in which the participants in the dialogue take positions in order to argue for a specific identity in the context of care.

A discourse analysis of interpretive repertoire subject positions and narrative identity construction were undertaken (Davies and Harré 2001). The results summarize the interpretive repertoires used by old persons and the care staff high-light the construction of subject positions using discursive recourses.

While focusing on communicative practices in the context of elder care, the paper address methodological issues, but the intention is to open up also for discussions on theoretical as well as empirical matters in the study of ageing and later life.

*The role of intellectuals in the circulation of knowledge in South African labour movement, 1970s-1980s

This paper will focus on the role of intellectuals in the development of South African labour movement in the 1970s and 1980s. Through a historical perspective, the paper will explore the characteristics and forms of the engagement of intellectuals in the labour movement in this period. This will include, among others, the engagement in workers education institutions, advisory bureaus, aid institutions that preceded the formation of new trade unions in the 1970s as well as then existing trade unions and universities. The emphasis on the engagement of intellectuals in cultural projects in the 1980s, such as workers theatres will enrich the configuration of their engagement. Particular to the South African case, the race dimension of an intellectual engagement will be discussed with the contribution of some current debates on "white intellectuals" and/or "white unionists" of that time. This paper will attempt to identify first, the channels of knowledge circulation in South African labour movement in this period and second, a particular form of intellectual engagement in the labour movement in the Global South. The information is based on a preliminary analysis of the qualitative data collected through 16 in-depth interviews with intellectuals and trade unionists in South Africa in 2011.

Gobernanza del agua y participación ciudadana en México. El caso de la iniciativa de monitoreo ciudadano de agua y saneamiento (IMCAS)

La ponencia discute hallazgos de investigación sobre la gobernanza del agua en México tomando el caso de la Iniciativa de Monitoreo Ciudadano de Agua y Saneamiento (IMCAS). Las IMCAS fueron diseñadas por el Consejo Consultivo del Agua, el Programa de las Naciones Unidas para los Asentamientos Humanos (ONU-Hábitat) y la Oficina de Naciones Unidas contra la Droga y el Delito (UNODC) y surgen en 2009 en las ciudades de Xalapa, Veracruz y Tuxtla Gutiérrez, Chiapas, México. El objetivo principal de la IMCAS es ser un mecanismo de participación ciudadana para la generación, análisis y difusión de conocimiento sobre la gestión de agua y saneamiento que facilite y promueva la transparencia y la rendición de cuentas por parte de los gobiernos locales. Las experiencias incluyen la formación de grupos técnicos independientes que vigilan y monitorean algunos procesos o actividades que normalmente realiza el órgano operador de agua (autoridad local), con el propósito de acompañarlos para mejorar su funcionamiento. El estudio sugiere que las autoridades locales a veces son más receptivas a estas propuestas ciudadanas si las mismas cuentan con aval institucional, que en el caso de las IMCAS fue provisto por las Naciones Unidas. El trabajo también presenta evidencia de que el éxito de este tipo de iniciativas frecuentemente depende de la existencia de una serie de factores como el apoyo del poder político y los niveles de organización y determinación de los integrantes de la iniciativa. Por otro lado, la ponencia explora el proceso de conformación de los grupos participantes, lecciones aprendidas, dificultades encontradas, y los beneficios e impactos que pueden identificarse en las ciudades involucradas. La ponencia presenta también la opinión de actores involucrados (integrantes de la IMCAS, autoridades locales y funcionarios de las Naciones Unidas y el Consejo Consultivo del agua) obtenida de entrevistas realizadas durante la investigación.

Las posibles relaciones entre capital social, asociaciones y desarrollo económico local Comparar la relación entre los conceptos de capital social, desarrollo socioeconómico y cooperativismo es a que se propone este trabajo. El capital social, para Bourdieu (1993), está relacionado a recursos, que dependen de una red de contactos y de la pertenencia a un cierto grupo de personas. Putnam (1996) acentúa que además de la pertenencia, la [...] confianza es que promueve la cooperación y la propia cooperación genera así confianza. Esa confianza es necesaria para fomentar la cooperación. Y continua, afirmando que la confianza social puede emanar de dos fuentes: las reglas de reciprocidad y los sistemas de participación cívica. Siendo así, el capital social puede proporcionar nuevos mecanismos que potencialicen la capacidad participativa y cooperativa de la sociedad. El cooperativismo es un movimiento donde los integrantes deben estar imbuidos del espíritu cooperativista, basada en valores nobles de ayuda mutua, solidaridad, igualdad de derechos y deberes, responsabilidad y compromiso. Una persona con espíritu cooperativo pone en práctica su ciudadanía. A partir del concepto de capital social, se puede explicar porque algunas regiones presentan tasas de crecimiento superiores que otras con los mismos incentivos institucionales. Los stocks de capital social de una comunidad pueden estimular la participación de las personas en actividades cooperativas colaborando para el desarrollo socioeconómico del hogar. Este desarrollo se tornó un fenómeno ampliamente deseado por toda la población, visto que la humanidad desea calidad de vida, que solo es posible cuando las necesidades y deseos pasan a ser atendidos adecuadamente. Se cree que el incentivo para la elevación del capital social es de importancia fundamental para el desarrollo de las comunidades y para el fortalecimiento de las cooperativas.

Palabras-clave: Capital social, Desarrollo Socioeconómico, Cooperativismo.

Remaking the edge of Europe from Buenos Aires to Istanbul: Urban landscapes, spectral identities, and the politics of location

Where is the limit of Europe? Is it cartographic, cultural, economic, or something else? This paper traces "Europeanness" as an itinerant, malleable idea that is the object of extensive political squabbling in a wide variety of cities where there are efforts to invoke some kind of "European" identity in urban landscape interventions. These can range from commemorations and festivals, to neighborhood redevelopment, to infrastructural preparation for megaevents, to monuments. Yet whatever the medium of expression, the idea of "Europeanness" is always highly localized in its content and purpose – as well as its alternatives. Taking the disparate cases of Buenos Aires and Istanbul as its focus, the paper observes how definitions of Europe can travel and be implemented, conflictively, in quite distinct cities. Special attention goes to the European Capital of Culture events in Istanbul and the Argentine Centennial in Buenos Aires, both celebrated in 2010.

Bringing cultural sociology into urban sociology, this presentation addresses "Europeanness" as a travelling concept across urban realms. The focus is on how sites as different as Buenos Aires and Istanbul can be brought into fruitful comparison by studying their particular dynamics of contention in the urban landscape. Especially useful are the literature on cultural landscapes, urban geopolitics, and contested identities in public space. From the cases in Argentina and Turkey, I draw out implications relevant to other cities, including Beirut, Rio de Janeiro, and Sarajevo.

La diversidad posmoderna frente al concepto antropológico dualista de la filosofía tradicional

El pensamiento cristiano primitivo es una continuación del concepto hebreo plasmado en el A.T. en el cual se destaca la unidad existencial del hombre en el mundo de la vida cotidiana. Sin embargo, cuando la filosofía griega influye en el pensamiento cristiano, éste entrará en la vía del dualismo afectando la cohesión social. El propósito del estudio es analizar la hermenéutica de Vattimo que, a partir de Heidegger y Nietzsche, descubre que una de las raíces de la crisis social posmoderna parte del concepto dualista de la filosofía griega que se impone como pensamiento fuerte o violento, fragmentando no solo al hombre en cuerpo y alma, sino también a la sociedad en ricos y pobres, conocedores e ignorantes, fuertes y débiles, estado y sociedad, clero y laicado. En su interpretación, los medios de comunicación promueven la diversidad debilitando la violencia metafísica y declinando la filosofía en sociología. Pero con la muerte del dios aristotélico surge un nihilismo débil que Vattimo lo relaciona con su propuesta hermenéutica de la kénosis (vaciamiento) o encarnación de Dios como posible nexa entre la sociología del mundo de la vida actual y una religiosidad que libera de los dualismos metafísicos y violentos, permitiendo la reviscencia del cristianismo que basado en la caridad, posibilita una nueva sociedad. Aunque en su intento de justificar el papel de la religión en la posmodernidad y evitar la inflexibilidad dogmática, Vattimo corre el riesgo de desviarse hacia una religiosidad ciertamente relativista. Se analizarán respuestas tanto sociológicas como filosóficas para resolver el conflicto social surgido a raíz de la concepción dualista y de marcada presencia en la sociedad latinoamericana.

Unfolding contradictions in the Zuma movement, South Africa, through the eyes of public sector strikers

My paper traces unfolding contradictions in the relation between Cosatu, South Africa's main trade union federation, and the ruling party, the ANC, through the eyes of public sector strikers who struck in 2007 and 2010.

These are crucial years when criticism of the ruling party, previously restrained by loyalty to the alliance, became commonplace. The period was marked by the spread of township protests and an increase to record highs in strike days, after a long period in which the unions relied on collective bargaining and policy lobbying which produced mean fruit.

The paper traces the breakdown and subsequent restoration of the alliance when Thabo Mbeki was replaced by Jacob Zuma, a populist unionifier who is beholden to labour for his ascendancy, but not particularly left-leaning. However it also shows how the restoration of the alliance exposed different 'uses' and expectations about this restoration for different actors in the trade unions. Finally, it examines how stable the restoration actually is beneath the surface.

The paper considers three phases in this dynamic. The first phase was marked by recognition that the alliance between Cosatu and the ruling party had become ineffective for the unions' agenda. In this context, the public sector strike of 2007 quickly linked wage demands to broader discontents.

However the impulse to change the working of the alliance was channeled into changing the leadership of the ANC: The second phase, marked here by the 2010 public sector strike, is the first big test of the Zuma government and of the unions' strategy of backing him. Strikers here experience a double betrayal: their expectations of Zuma are betrayed and their leaders seem to betray them by siding with government. The third phase, still being researched, considers strikers' attitudes to the state in the aftermath and what unions achieved.

The political aspects of the emergence of the rojas in the artistic sphere of Buenos Aires, in the post-dictatorship era

Between 1989 and 1993 a group of artists centered around the exhibition space of the Ricardo Rojas Cultural Center emerged, producing an aesthetic differentiated from the artistic mainstream at that time. While some of these artists possessed individualized and distinct aesthetic characteristics, from among the rest of the field a recognizable artistic group emerged. Until now, the interpretations of this phenomenon have diverged in many respects, but the absence of political content appeared to be a constant in interpretations of the group's artistic production. That is, while the singular character of the artists that exhibited in that space was quickly recognized by critics, their singularity was defined devoid of any political sense. Contrary to this interpretation, we would propose a new reading of the works and artists of the Rojas that sheds light on the political dimension of this artistic phenomenon. We thus propose considering, on the one hand, the aesthetic ruptures produced in relation to the criteria that governs the space of artistic production and circulation in Buenos Aires, and on the other hand, the trajectories of those actors that created a dissident artistic ethos in relation to the role of the legitimate artist in the culture of Buenos Aires following the military dictatorship.

Traectorias sociales y tipos de artistas en la post dictadura Argentina, 1984-1993

La política represiva de la última dictadura militar argentina produjo efectos poco visibles pero muy profundos en las estructuras sociales del espacio de producción y circulación de artes visuales. La recuperación democrática, del mismo modo, significó el inicio de un proceso de transformaciones al mismo tiempo sociales y estéticas, derivadas del ingreso de artistas con trayectorias sociales diversas a las que hasta el momento marcaban el tipo social legítimo de los artistas.

En el trabajo queremos describir aspectos del proceso de democratización de la sociedad argentina, que tienen su origen en la apertura del campo cultural en este período, que permitió el ingreso de nuevos tipos sociales de artistas. Como todo proceso de movilidad social, éste produjo tensiones y nuevas divisiones en el campo que dejan sus marcas en los estilos, modos de producción y espacios de circulación de las obras. Nos interesa describir, a partir del análisis de sus producciones, las tensiones entre los artistas consagrados de la década del ochenta y un tipo de actor cultural disidente cuyo origen se encuentra en una zona periférica y subterránea que se desarrolla durante el período de la dictadura militar en el campo cultural de Buenos Aires.

"Ya vendrán tiempos mejores..." tiempo social, cuerpos y la lógica de la espera en la configuración de sensibilidades urbanas

En el marco de la aceleración de los tiempos sociales impulsada por la circulación cada vez más veloz de mercancías y consumos, la pregunta por la estructuración de las sensibilidades y por la instauración de la espera como uno de los modos de ser/estar/tener/sentir que se hace carne en la cotidianeidad de miles de latinoamericanos es central.

A partir de escenas identificadas en Argentina en relación a la salud, el transporte y la vivienda, este artículo reflexiona sobre el mecanismo de la espera en su articulación con la configuración de las sensibilidades sociales en contextos urbanos en la actual fase de acumulación. Parte del supuesto de que la espera se instituye sobre los cuerpos, performando sensaciones de cansancio e impotencia que reproducen los límites y contenidos de un tiempo social regulado por la lógica del "siempre será así". Las vivencias de la ciudad, entendidas como el resultado del inter-juego clasista de distancias y proximidades corporales y sociales que habilitan/restringen ciertos recorridos (y no otros), son estructuradas desde la falta, acelerando la emergencia de la capacidad de espera como uno de los mecanismos (en) que (se) traducen las condiciones del habitar de cuerpos apostados en la periferia de las urbes del siglo XXI.

Under the pirate flag: Study on identification based on filesharing

The present work is set to argue about the spreading of the term pirate, created by economically dominant groups to refer to the internet users that copy and share medias such as films or music illegally through filesharing software and how it became a form of identity accepted by this group. What was at first created as stigma, now is a label that establishes a form of virtual activism of great ideological and political importance.

The type of piracy I intend to describe is the one commonly referred as the illegal exchange and sharing of archives over the Internet, in special of the intellectual production, as music, films and even entire books. All this content is generated and managed by the own users, who organize this activity without creator consent and, most of the time, looking for no profit of any kind.

Internet piracy became a problem to the cultural industry and governments worldwide as it became a spreading social movement based on a consumer habit. My aim is to clarify how this piracy concept became something positive. To subvert the vision of the pirate and to transform it into an ideal of free access to the information, in opposition to the copyright protected objects. At the same time one becomes necessary to investigate if the label of pirate in comparison with the image of the plunderers of century XVII has parallel with the concept applied to the users and if the industry has to be able to create an identity on a group of people.

El estado de bien estar social x el estado de buen vivir: Que educación queremos nosotros?

Especialmente desde la segunda mitad del siglo XX, puede decirse que la educación de América Latina, en general, ha seguido a determinaciones externas, guiadas por organismos como el Banco Mundial y el Fondo Monetario Internacional. El objetivo de estas agencias es la integración de los países latinoamericanos en el circuito del capitalismo neoliberal en condiciones subalternas, como eternos consumidores. El resultado de este escenario para la educación es un proyecto educativo que no se destina a la formación de las personas, pero a la formación de capital humano, y que no intenta fortalecer a los individuos como sujetos políticos, para que se pueda mantener esta situación de dominación a través de los mecanismos de la colonialidad del saber. Los rankings internacionales de rendimiento educativo a los cuales se sometem nuestras políticas estatales de educación se rigen por normas que no mantienen relaciones con las realidades inmediatas que enfrentan, en diferentes contextos, los sujetos a los cuales se evalúa y a los cuales se destina esta misma educación. Como consecuencia, se produce un sistema de regulación que torna la educación más homogénea, con respecto a planes de estudio, y más excluyente, con respecto al acceso. En este artículo se propone realizar una lectura de los escritos sobre educación de Pierre Bourdieu a cerca de los sistemas escolares, vistos como campos de autonomía relativa sobre los cuales se extiende la lógica del mercado, consagrado en el valor de los diplomas. En contraposición a esta perspectiva, se realizará una lectura crítica de los estudios sobre la ética de la liberación de Enrique Dussel, como propuesta alternativa para la construcción de una educación dirigida a la emancipación política de los sujetos, en un modelo participativo en el cual los estudiantes no sean tratados como mera pasividad.

Que enseñamos a nuestros maestros? La formación de profesores a través de las universidades Brasileñas

La educación en América Latina, como se percibe a través de las políticas estatales, sirve a las directrices de agencias capitalistas internacionales como el Banco Mundial o el Fondo Monetario Internacional. El reflejo de esta relación de dominación sobre la formación de los profesores es clara: se torna a cada día más homogénea y precarizada. La lógica del capitalismo neoliberal se extiende sobre la educación y el objetivo de los maestros se limita a agregar valores en la formación del capital humano.

Como apunta Pierre Bourdieu, existe autonomía entre los diferentes sistemas de enseñanza. La educación básica, en las escuelas, y la educación superior, en las universidades, son dos universos muy distintos. Todavía, las universidades cumplen un rol importantísimo cuando tratamos a la educación como un sólo sistema integrado de ciclos. Con el progresivo fin de las llamadas escuelas Normales, la responsabilidad por la formación de los profesores que educarán a los futuros estudiantes tornase prácticamente exclusiva de las universidades.

En Brasil, el número de profesores en la educación básica en esta década ultrapasa los dos millones y medio, y se puede observar que su formación universitaria es débil. Los contenidos de los planes de estudios se remiten más a la filosofía, teoría y historia de la educación que a técnicas pedagógicas que los permitan optimizar el tiempo de las clases. Tampoco aprenden contenidos críticos que los permitan lidiar con la diversidad cultural entre los estudiantes.

En el presente artículo se propone presentar la actual situación de la formación de profesores en nivel superior en Brasil a través de los datos oficiales ofrecidos por el Ministério de la Educación, con respecto a la calidad de las licenciaturas y a los contenidos que los maestros aprenden a enseñar.

Trafficking in teenage girls: A field study in an extremely vulnerable zone in north east India

Trafficking in girl children for onward sale for commercial exploitation is on the rise keeping parity with tremendous expansion of urban landscape in contemporary India. Illegal sex industry is thriving on the back of rising demand of swelling clientele consisting of irregular visitors, migrants and tourists. These trafficked girls are susceptible to HIV infection, physical abuse by the pimps or brothel keepers, mental agony, unsafe and unhygienic living condition and extreme financial hardship. A research study has been conducted during 2008-2009 in one area situated in the backward Northeast India from where hundreds of girls are reportedly trafficked each year. This field study over the "source" area of trafficking mostly has covered sick and closed tea gardens where abysmal poverty befalls in the wake of closure of tea gardens one after another. The upsetting closure and consequent job loss has been caused primarily by persistent loss in the business of tea manufacturing. Labouring families having no productive assets to fall back upon bear the brunt. Because of lack of skill, they cannot switch over to other alternative occupations. Thus these distressed families are easily turned in to easy prey for traffickers and these areas are trouble-free hunting ground for the tricksters. Lure of cash, promise of job and educational prospects in cities, even fake marriages are examples of tricks applied by the traffickers. This study has found that household poverty, illiteracy, police inaction, insensitivity of local self-governments, connivance with local agents, acquiescence of parents, have been found to collectively contribute to cause trafficking in girls from the supply side. Rail station is very close to the "source" area. Constant vigil in cooperation with railways and police, community monitoring, economic empowerment of families through provision of alternative livelihoods and universal schooling are measure to be taken up urgently.

Hacking digital universalism: OLPC & information networks in the Andes

Channeling the promise global interconnection, and framed as the mark of contemporary optimization, "the digital" has come to represent the path towards the future for diverse nations, economies, and populations alike. Pursued in a broad range of national initiatives to prepare populations for an innovation-driven information society, digitality now operates as an object – to echo Gayatri Spivak's and Anna Tsing's reflections on "the universal" – that we cannot help but want. In the midst of accelerating pursuits of the digital across distinct global spaces, however, little has been made of the "universalist" underpinnings that allows a vision for digital connection generated by a cosmopolitan techno-elite, to speak for and represent the "global" rest. This paper will attend to experiments in innovation spaces from the periphery, including regional deployments of the One Laptop Per Child Project in Peru, that distinctly engage materialities of nature, technology, and information. By fostering collaborations between Latin American free software activists across a range of rural and urban site, and between transnational media producers and indigenous communities, such networks press a cosmopolitical urging to "think with the unknown," and open up possibilities for uncovering distinct collective futures through an interfacing with multiple local pasts.

Contesting crop sciences: A critical examination of alternative knowledge claims in rice production

Scientific explanations of crop production offered by crop sciences contributed to remarkable progress in the productivity levels of various food and non-food crops. The cognitive authority of science of crop production derived from the modern-scientific rationality, however, claimed to have obscured alternative, competing, reflexive knowledge claims in agriculture for a very long time. Moving beyond the linear model of modern science, alternatives to crop production have started to emerge outside the scientific institutional realm. One such example is the system of rice intensification (SRI) that emerged in the precincts of civil society. SRI offers alternative explanations on the biotic agents of rice cultivation such as rice plant, soil, and abiotic agents such as water, light and nutrients and thus demands for re-examination of assumptions of science of crop production. Considered as a civil society innovation SRI claims authority on the grounds of it's poorness in comparison to modern rice cultivation strategies. Interspersed with empirical evidence, the present paper attempts at deciphering the contesting knowledge claims in rice cultivation and examines the evolution of SRI and its adoption in India.

Living arrangement, care relations and quality of life in Taiwanese family

The economic development of East Asian countries brought about the change of family structure. When Taiwanese society faces the challenge of rapid aging population and high female labor market participation, the care policies for elderly and young children did not follow. It is common to see working adults have to care for their parents in the same household and working couples rely on their parents to care for their preschool children. Thus, caring for aged parents and/or young children becomes an important issue to explore in the study of subjective well-being. Caring for relatives could be seen as the labor of love but also could be very demanding and affect quality of life. This research explores family living arrangement, care relations and quality of life in contemporary Taiwanese families.

Globalization policies for educational development and the attendant issues of social justice: The case of Taiwan

Educational policy makers were probably among the first groups that had made the term "globalization" an agenda in policymaking in Taiwan during the past two decades. In fact, they have successfully launched several policies under the name of globalization since early 1990s. This paper aims at examining (1) the themes, rationales and strategies of these globalization policies, and (2) the controversial issues related to social justice that each policy has brought forth. By drawing evidence from two "discourse analysis" studies of mine, one of which was granted by National Science Council (Taiwan) in 2003-2005 and the other by Chinese Culture University (Taipei) in 2011, this paper specifies four distinctive policies that have been put into practice so far. The major findings are summarized as follows:

Policy Variants	Time Period	Social Justice Issues
1. Globalization as keeping pace with the world trends of education, such as the neo-liberalist reforms.	early 1990s – mid-2000s	The possibility of upward mobility for most working class kids declined.
2. Globalization as skipping China while linking Taiwan directly with the globe.	late 1990s – late 2000s	Besides social justice, the policy focused mainly on ideological struggle against China.
3. Globalization as enhancing English teaching, especially in primary schools.	Since late 1990s	The rural-urban divide has further revealed itself by a bimodal distribution of English test score in recent years.
4. Globalization as promoting internationalization in higher learning institutions.	Since early 2000s	Only a few privileged, research-intensive universities benefit from this policy. However, most of their students are disproportionately of middle- and upper-class origins.

The significance of trust in business relocation

In the modern global economy, firms frequently face pressures to move certain corporate functions abroad in order to take advantage of lower production costs and tap into new emerging markets for their products and services. This paper examines how social factors shape companies' behavior in business relocation, using original fieldwork data collected from Taiwanese computer industry during their relocation to China. In addition to market uncertainty, companies encounter an institutional uncertainty during the process of relocation, as they are adjusting to different sets of actors and rules of game in the local environment. To reduce this uncertainty that threatened their survival, Taiwanese computer companies relied on trust, particularly from partners in their pre-existing production networks. Besides being reliable business associates, these partners were sources of trustworthy information, emotional support, and stability in the uncertain Chinese environment. Being a part of the group also created a sense of security and possible greater bargaining power of Taiwanese companies vis-à-vis Chinese local governments. This paper suggests this greater reliance on trust from fellow Taiwanese partners have contributed to these firms' relocation in group, with many migrated to locations approximate to their partners.

Sea water change experienced by fishers and women divers in Jeju Island, South Korea: Narratives, reactions, and community change

The impact of environmental change is said to be greater upon social groups whose survival depends upon biomass use. The paper is aimed to address the impact of sea water change upon two occupational groups in Jeju island, South Korea: fishers and women divers. The two groups presented the major occupations in the island until the 1980s when tourism industry was introduced to the island by the central government and still include significant portion of people. While their livelihoods depend upon the availability of fishery resources in the island, interestingly their labor process reflects gender division and differing degree of technology involvement in their work: fishers (exclusively men) working above the sea water in a boat with diverse sets of technological devices whereas women divers (exclusively women) collecting seashell resources (such as abalones) deep under the water without any sophisticated devices. The paper describes their narratives of sea water change through their working career; how they have responded to the change in a collective level; and how their community has changed along with sea water change. For an empirical inquiry a qualitative interviewing data from eight fishers and eight women divers in the island will be used.

Paradoxes du discours démocratique et de ses supports

Le contexte géopolitique récent a favorisé l'apparition de discours nouveaux quant à la représentation de la démocratie; En particulier sont apparus des toponymes, tels "la place Tahrir" ou des chrononymes tels "le Printemps arabe". Dans les médias d'information générale du monde francophone, ces toponymes et chrononymes ont fonctionné de manière paradoxale comme les noms propres de processus, légitimés par cette nomination et de ce fait exemptés de légitimation argumentative, discursive, politique. La manifestation dans les espaces publics, rues et place, liée à des noms de lieux rapidement sacralisés par les médias a fait renaître un imaginaire de "l'Agora", espace de la démocratie ancré dans la réalité urbaine de la vie ordinaire. Ce phénomène discursif s'est généralisé à de nombreux noms de lieux. Curieusement, pourtant, certaines places n'ont pas bénéficié de la même onction démocratique par les médias. Ainsi les "indignés" de la Puerta del Sol, ou de la Place Syndagma n'ont pas bénéficié de la même légitimation discursive. Ceux de "Wall Street" sont restés une curiosité. Cette valorisation de l'expression citoyenne dans les espaces publics s'est accompagnée de la promotion de slogans élémentaires: "Dégage!". Parallèlement une propagande intensive, de type marketing, a valorisé dans ces contextes les services de communication de marques d'entreprises mondialisés de communication.

Dans l'après-coup des événements, les carences de symbolisation et d'argumentation remettent les supports et média devant un réel difficile à traiter, les enjeux politiques étant restés camouflés dans la glorification de formes d'expression supposées à la fois spontanées et "modernes". Dans les oripeaux de la démocratie originaire et de la démocratie assisté par ordinateur.

L'exposé de ces paradoxes s'appuiera sur l'analyse de textes journalistiques francophones d'information générale.

Recherche, publication et "grands secrets"

La recherche dans les espaces professionnels: observation engagée et « grands secrets ».

On propose d'interroger un aspect de la position et des méthodologies du chercheur lorsqu'il se trouve dans la position d'un observateur engagé, terme préféré ici à « observation participante ». Par cette expression, « observateur engagé », on souhaite questionner l'équilibre, ou le déséquilibre, de celui qui se trouve dans un espace professionnel à chercher à « faire le point », « prendre du recul », « objectiver », « analyser » ou selon une expression qui pour être galvaudée n'en reste pas moins utile : « déconstruire ». Il s'agit d'un chercheur embarqué, mais qui pour autant veut ne pas être « embedded ». C'est principalement dans une recherche réflexive sur l'observation engagée à l'Université que sera inscrite la communication proposée.

Révéler, « expliquer » un « grand secret », c'est souvent dévoiler – partiellement... Salomé a plus d'un voile – « ce que tout le monde sait ».

On peut, néanmoins, faire l'hypothèse que le chercheur ne fait pas rien lorsqu'il dévoile un grand secret à un public d'acteurs qui ne disaient rien d'autant plus qu'ils savaient tout.

La question des « grands secrets » pose donc la question de ce que l'on fait lorsque l'on fait accéder à un statut public des connaissances – des ethnométhodes (Garfinkel) – dont le mode d'existence et la survivance, pour consubstantielles qu'elles soient à certaines organisations et institutions, repose sur le statut du secret.

La communication exposera

- La problématique de la construction de quelques « grands secrets » en objets d'observation
- La question de l'éthique de publication des « grands secrets »
- Quelques aspects des problèmes de publication et de réception.

The paper will be presented in French or English language according to organisator's preference

The gendered nature of caregiver perceptions of the effectiveness of cholinesterase inhibitors (ChEI) for those with dementia

The gendered nature of caregiving behaviours and stress outcomes is well known. However, little research has been conducted concerning caregiver perceptions of ChEI effectiveness and none is available on gender differences of their perceptions. For a study on caregiver perceptions in this area, including a comparison with clinical judgement, a screening interview to determine eligibility for the larger study obtained information on their perceptions after a family member had been taking the drug for 6 months (this is the time when clinicians determine whether to maintain the patient on the drug or terminate treatment). Analyses of the triage data reveal differences in perceptions of effectiveness with males, especially husbands, more likely to give an 'indeterminate' assessment and females, especially wives, more likely to give a positive assessment. There is no gender difference in providing an assessment that the drugs are having a negative effect. The extent of assistance provided by the caregiver, the particular ChEI the family member is taking, and the nature of the perceived effect (whether it is on the memory, mood and/or physical functioning of the patient) are also taken into account. The results are discussed terms of what we know about women's place in caring for and about family.

Public housing and beneficiary responses to it

Low income housing interventions that respond to people living in poor conditions in countries of the South have received considerable scrutiny. Amongst state housing programmes that share similar characteristics such as those of Chile, Colombia and South Africa, are those which broadly centre on the construction of new housing stock to be owned by qualifying beneficiaries. These can be large-scale and significant in impact on the landscape and form of cities: South Africa's programme for example has delivered over 3 million newly built detached houses for ownership since the transition to democracy in 1994. A key strand of criticism of these housing approaches has centered on their regularizing, ordering and standardizing properties - loosely, their modernist characteristics. These, it is argued, are uncomfortably juxtaposed against household structures, activities, and ways of generating income that are more informal, complex or fluid than these buildings and settlements allow for. Nevertheless, there are indications that many recipients and potential beneficiaries from diverse contexts appreciate, cherish or aspire to such accommodation: research from Cairo for example describes peoples' transformation of the housing they are relocated to but also their attachment to it. In Mumbai in-situ 'SRA' apartment housing evokes aspirations and desires from informal settlement dwellers. These indications, diverse as they are, resonate with empirical findings from state funded 'RDP' housing in South Africa, where gratitude to the state and pride in the housing surfaces. The various criticisms directed to such housing programmes might anticipate more resistance, rejection or conflict from recipients than this suggests. Instead, what conceptual and theoretical tools help explain this more ambiguous interface between these government sponsored programmes and the lives of resident users?

"Latin America in the modern world-system: World revolutions and the evolution of global governance"

This is about sociocultural evolution of world-systems in Latin America, Latin America's changing role in the modern world-system and the contributions that Latin America has made and may yet make to the contemporary world revolution and the evolution of global governance. We present an overview of the development of human societies since the arrival of humans in the Americas and the roles of indigeneity in the historical development of Latin American societies. We also review the ways in which earlier world revolutions have played out in Latin America contributions that Latin American populist and indigenous politics are making in the global justice movement.

Women miners of India: Gender wage gap

India is richly endowed with mineral resources that are essential for promising future; Since Independence (1947), India's mining industry has shown rapid growth from production of 20 minerals valued at INR 700 million in 1950 to 84 minerals valued at INR 757130 million during the year 2007-08 (increase by thousand times). But during the same period employment in mines has decreased by 4% from 0.549 million to 0.526 million. However, there is not much recorded involvement of women's participation in the formal mining industry in India. This paper explores gender wage gap and absence social security for women miners in small-scale and artisanal sector in India. For determining the size of miners, data were collected from Census of India, 2011 and wage data was collected from National Sample Survey Organization that provides wage as per weekly status for the year 2004-05. Since mining sector is spread over organized and unorganized sector and Census does not provide sectoral data, workforce in organized sector is calculated as 10% of total miners that amounts to 2 million miners and unorganized miners as 0.188 million. Since, women workers constitute 6 to 7 % of the workforce in the unorganized sector that is known as small-scale and artisanal mining, number of women miners in small scale and artisanal mining comes to 0.13 million. Regarding wage data also, sectoral distribution is not given. On an average, as per NSSO, wage ratio is 0.39. On a closer look by National Classification of Occupations, it is observed that in the basic labour-intensive rudimentary jobs where women workers occupy sizeable force, wage gap ranges between 0.22 to 0.28 and provisions of social security are completely non-existent. Women in mining sector are drawn mainly from landless agricultural background demands greater attention from policy makers.

Globalization and vision quest of what is viable future

Crisis after crisis has dismantled globalization as the promise to secure the future of society. Is this verdict conclusive? In absence of any other worldwide process, is it still the best option? Pre-recession major charges against globalization included (1) rich becoming richer, poor poorer; poverty and unemployment, (2) the centre and periphery of 'modern world system' model was not much changing, (3) violence against people, property and environment was increasing. Unifying the world by economic integration was not without criticism. When crisis occurred, skeptics became doomsayers.

With leading ideas including those of Jagdish Bhagwati and Joseph Stiglitz, this paper discusses globalization with promises, pitfalls, touches 'defense' when crisis was round the corner, and reviews rescue operation – bail outs, other things.

Krugman sees return of 'economic maladies' of the Great Depression during recession which in the wake of Euro zone crisis and Euro zone division pose threats to democracy. In his view, only sociology can explain the 'social dynamics' behind the crisis, perhaps destruction of globalization. In the quest of democratic future, from this vantage point the paper moves to its main theme of what is in the store of future, particularly the chance of human society as a democratic system based on social justice. Among phenomena, 'occupy movement', 'civil society and its variations', and 'visualization 'real utopias', 'the idea of a third system' help the thematic understanding to reach to the viability of a future society different from earlier social formations. It concludes that present thought devises 'global justice' as a potent approach to a better future which is perhaps viable.

Gender disparities of depressive mood and roles of family factors, school difficulty, violence, and unhealthy behaviours among adolescents

Nowadays modern societies are to be more competitive and include more non-intact families and living difficulties due to employment and social deprivations. Adolescents may suffer from depressive mood (DM) which is common and multi-factorial. This study assessed, among boys and girls, the causal relationships between DM and parent education, nationality, occupation, income, divorce/separation, and death, repeating a school-year, lifetime alcohol/tobacco/cannabis/other drugs uses, victim of violence and sexual abuse, involvement in violence, and lack of social supports (family members/friends).

Methods: 1559 middle-school adolescents from north-eastern France (mean age 13.5, SD 1.3) completed in class a questionnaire including DM (Kandel scale), factors studied, and their occurring/persisting period. Data were analyzed using Cox models taking into account risk factors which came before and persisted until DM occurring.

Findings: Lifetime-DM affected 7.6% of boys and 19.1% of girls. Among girls factors with significant crude hazard ratios (HR) were: parent divorce/separation (1.57), insufficient income (1.95), repeating a school-year (1.95), victim of violence (2.99) or sexual abuse (4.96), and lack of supports (4.08 for score 1-2 and 7.74 for score 3+, vs. score 0) while tobacco use was close to significance (1.77). Taking all factors into account retained only repeating a school-year (adjusted HR 1.87), victim of violence (2.50) or sexual abuse (4.02), and lack of supports (3.83 and 7.28). Among boys, the significant factors were: hard-drug use (6.01), victim of violence (2.88), and lack of supports (2.27 and 4.78) while insufficient income (1.75), low parent education (1.60), and victim of sexual abuse (3.58) were close to significance. Full model retained only victim of violence (adjusted HR 2.29) and lack of supports (2.16 and 4.18).

Conclusion: Taking chronology in consideration revealed strong gender disparities for DM and its associations with family characteristics, school difficulties, unhealthy behaviours, violence, and social supports that may be prevention targets.

Universal health care or universal nightmare? Two types of insurance, two meanings of universal, two options for health care reform

I offer a framework to examine the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (P-PACA), the new federal health care law in the United States. I build upon the concept of insurance and distinguish between two types that lead to two meanings of universal coverage, each with radically different implications for the goal of providing guaranteed access to medical care to the population. I argue that because the type of insurance underlying P-PACA is that of casualty or commercial insurance, where insurance is treated as a market commodity, the new law will lead to 'resolving' the problem of the mounting number of uninsured while, paradoxically, increasing the number of individuals without access to medical care. I also discuss how alternative proposals to reform the US health care system, such as the Extended and Improved Medicare for All Act (HR676), drafted upon the cooperative principle of social insurance, are shunned in legislative and other public debates as 'politically unfeasible', when not rendered invisible by an intense propaganda campaign led by a loose collaboration between the business sector, political elites in the two main, 'opposing' parties, and the corporate media. I conclude by suggesting that no less than a massive popular uprising demanding social justice in health care matters will resolve the conundrum of the most powerful nation in the planet allowing an increasing number of individuals to fail to receive even minimally decent medical care, as a result of which they suffer from unnecessary disability and early death.

You must not confuse poverty with laziness: A case study on the power of discourse to reproduce diabetes inequalities

The disproportionate impact of type 2 diabetes (T2DM) on low-income groups and the social and biological processes linking poverty and T2DM inequalities are well documented. Moreover, millions of dollars are invested annually in programs aimed at reducing T2DM inequalities, yet these remain stubbornly high. Our paper explores how societal discourses reproduce T2DM and related health inequalities in a low-income neighborhood in Northern California, through a thematic analysis of interviews and focus groups of staff and clients at a non-governmental organization (NGO). We probe participants' beliefs vis-à-vis the causes of, and solutions to, T2DM inequalities and explore whether and how the discourses normalizing them are challenged. We find that staff identify the ultimate source of T2DM inequalities within health sufferers, i.e., in their lifestyle choices, psychological makeup, or cultural preferences, even as they acknowledge the widespread poverty, unemployment, and other social determinants that present serious barriers to their health. Notably, we find this blame-the-victim discourse among clients themselves. While our study is empirical, its goal is primarily conceptual: to add to the evolving understanding of discourse as a social practice that contributes both to status quo reproduction and to social change and resistance.

En el año 2006 participé de la elaboración de un informe para acompañar la solicitud de un Estudio Nacional sobre Juventud en Argentina (encuesta que sigue pendiente) por parte de DINAJU, UNSAM y UNICEF, titulado "Investigaciones sobre juventudes en Argentina: estado del arte en ciencias sociales". El texto circuló primero de mano en mano y en 2009 fue publicado por la UNSAM en versión digital. Con el paso del tiempo se ha convertido en una referencia de cita en las investigaciones nacionales y en los panoramas latinoamericanos sobre el campo. A 6 años de aquella producción me interesa revisarla y ampliarla. Por un lado discutir los enfoques formulados para ordenar el material en aquella oportunidad, mostrar ausencias y falencias, así como intentar medir el impacto que tuvo la caracterización propuesta. Y por otro lado pretendo dar cuenta de lo que ha sucedido en el tiempo trascurrido desde aquella sistematización. El objetivo es producir un nuevo texto que funcione como anexo de aquel estado del arte, abarcando el período 2006-2012 del desarrollo de las investigaciones en juventudes en Argentina desde las ciencias sociales. Además de realizar un nuevo relevamiento de investigaciones se cuenta con las bases de datos producidas en 2007 y 2010 por la Red de Investigadores/as en Juventudes Argentina. Se analizará el material para interpretar cambios y continuidades en los enfoques, o nuevos enfoques, identificar trayectorias de investigación, emergencia y consolidación de líneas y equipos, formaciones de posgrado y todo aquello que permita dar cuenta de la emergencia del campo de estudios sobre juventudes en el país.

Hopes and inequalities in the transition to work: New data about a reappraised problem

As in many other countries, over the past 40 years, the Portuguese higher education system has been the target a process of great growth and a deep social change of its composition. We moved from a situation in which the population of this level of education was composed almost entirely of several fractions of the dominant classes, to another where a significant proportion of individuals from different social classes had access to that system. Faced with this reality, it is important understand if the titles granted by the higher education have achieved its purpose more instrumental, functioning as a vehicle for upward mobility. In other words, those diplomas have accomplished what many consider to be one of their promises, or have foundered faced with persistent and well known processes of social selectivity.

Proposals developed in this article are based on the data from a recent study carried out in Portugal, focused on the graduates of the University of Lisbon and the New University of Lisbon. The study's primary goal was to understand the pathways to employment, taken by graduates of higher education, as seen from the development of an analysis model based on three dimensions of insertion: (i) the "objective situation of graduates' work"; (ii) "resources mobilized to access the labour market"; (iii) and the "subjective relationships with the work". In this study, young people who completed their courses in 2004/05, in the largest public universities in Lisbon, responded to a survey which comprised a retrospective of the first 5 years of transition to work.

This paper aims to observe whether and to what extent, university degrees allow graduates from the undercapitalized classes climb positions - symbolic and economical - most prominent in the labour market.

Professional ethics and social commitment of the university

In this study, the goods and services provided by various professions are clarified based on the perception of students, teachers and administrators. This clarification is essential to consolidate an ethical-professional training that pertinently meets the social demands faced in professional practice. The public university seeks to fulfill its social commitment primarily through the outflow of professionals who are qualified in their area, responsible and committed, but that objective may not materialize in a complex environment like the present, in which it appears that the public interest loses value to certain private interests. Max Weber presents professions as institutionalized activities that provide a service to society. In this sense, professions require specific skills (including vocational ones) in order to be practiced. A manifest commitment is also necessary of the professional, who upon entering the profession commits him/herself to pursuing the goals of that social activity, whatever their private motives to join may have been. University education provides a space to lay firm foundations for the development of professional ethics that address social needs accordingly. University education is expected to contribute long term to the quality of life for all, or at least to those who rely on the professional practice of any of the professions. Therefore it is important to revitalize the professions and professional training, remembering their legitimate purposes and the habits that must be developed to achieve them. This may help to strengthen the sense of ethics and profession in the university and benefit society as a whole.

Key words: professions, professional ethics, social commitment, public university

Is work soluble in sustainable development ?

This paper aims to examine the tensions between the discourses on sustainable development, protection of the environment and preservation of natural resources on the one hand and on the other, working conditions of employees in the "green" economy. First, we would like to show the employment growth in the environmental sector including the rise of green jobs expected to respond to the environmental challenges by skilled labour. In a second step, we will indicate the centrality of waste management for green jobs. Waste management industry is emblematic of its importance, its organizational structure and its evolution over time. Third, we will develop in relation to waste, the most labour intensive activity which is "sorting". Sorting and sorters are indeed the heart of economic activity that drives the waste management industries. Here we will mobilize field observations to indicate the difficulties experienced by employees at the workplace. Finally, we shall examine the elements needed to initiate a discussion on the possibility of improving the working conditions of these employees. Here we are focussing on the social dialogue in the business, the relationship between unions and management but also the weight of public policies and the consumers. In this final section, we would like to outline potential trade-offs between economic, social and environmental logics in order to integrate the well-being of workers as a dimension of the measurement of sustainable development.

The faces and stories of Lebanese elders: Changes in family structure, differing demographics, quality of life, and challenges faced in building capacities for care givers in social services

Advances in modern health care have resulted in an exponential growth in the world's elderly population. The Arab world, in particular, has experienced a fifty percent drop in mortality rate over the last twenty-five years. Concomitantly, life expectancy has increased from fifty-five years of age in 1975 to sixty seven years of age in 2000.

Lebanon, a diverse, conflict-affected country of 4.2 million people, is located on the Mediterranean Sea in the Middle East. Similar to the rest of the Arab world, its birth rate has decreased from 4.6% in 1970 to 1.9% in 2004. The mortality rate has also dropped from 9.1% to 7.1% per 1000. Life expectancy has increased from 66 years of age in 1970 to 74 years of age in 2004 with an increase in the aging population from 4.6% in 1970 to 7.4% in 2004. Notably, recent conflicts have increased the number of widows in the country with 50.6% of women more than 65 years of age, of whom 81.5% head poor households.

Family structure has transitioned from an extended model to a nuclear format. The traditional role of 'taking care of one's elders' has faded as priorities and lifestyles of younger generations change. At the same time, many women have left their gendered sphere of the home, and entered the formal economy and labor market. With these shifting dynamics and in the absence of institutions that cater to older populations, elder care is in jeopardy. The country's high unemployment rate (8.9% in 2004) and the rising costs of healthcare exacerbates the situation for this at-risk population.

To better understand the issues faced by elders and their caregivers in Lebanon, and to improve the capacity to meet identified needs, we conducted a 6-day capacity building workshop on Alzheimer Disease (AD) in 6 distinct demographic regions in collaboration with the Lebanese Ministry of Social Affairs and the AD Lebanon Foundation. Mixed methods data collected during the training revealed important insights into how local caregivers cope with AD; the socio-economic burden, pathophysiology, epidemiology, and cognitive and emotional wellbeing of Lebanese affected by AD (including elders and their caregivers); and the public health impact of an AD national outreach program. Understanding the needs of the growing Lebanese aging population and their caregivers is critical to inform social service programs.

Successful ageing in long-term care: International comparison and lesson learning

Quality of life is one of the main concerns in long-term care amongst ageing populations in many countries. This problem is historically unique and increases the demand for research material. This study looks at how different societies promote or fail to promote successful ageing of long-term care of older people, and considers how countries may learn from one another in their search for solutions. The three countries studied (England, the Netherlands and Taiwan) correspond to Esping-Anderson's three types of welfare system (Esping-Anderson, 1990). In addition, the Asian-European dimension has been employed as it is a neglected one.

Data sources included conceptual, empirical and statistical documents on long-term care of older people. Moreover, this research used identical qualitative cross-national research methods on three levels in each country: national, county and municipal. A total of 142 interviews were included in the study. The aim of this study was broadly to rank the three welfare systems where there were clear differences but to qualify this by pointing out the complexities and difficulties of mixed economy comparisons.

The overall conclusion is that the Netherlands provides higher quality care to older people, thus confirming Esping-Andersen's finding about the superiority of social democratic systems. In reviewing current policies and research in needs and successful ageing, this qualitative comparative study has focused on needs, social inclusion, power and autonomy, care resources as well as partnership as crucial concepts in care systems and discovered good practice in each and lessons to be learnt.

A study on social justice and afterschool programs in Taiwan

The pursuit of equality of educational opportunity and social justice has been regarded as one the primary mission that education should play since the beginning of schooling. Unfortunately, sociologists and educators discover that the achievement gaps between the rich and the poor, have and have-not, and advantaged and disadvantaged are much bigger than they were before. In this study, the principal investigator conducts a series of interviews including 12 elementary school kids themselves, their corresponding schoolteacher, tutors, social workers, and classmates. Along with Bronfenbrenner's ecological systems that could interpreted into student/family, school, and the afterschool tutoring program, the researcher analyzes the transformation of disadvantaged elementary school students who participate the Yonglin School of Hope via Otto, McMeemy, and Smith successful remedial teaching principles. Following these veins, the principal investigator concludes the following discoveries. First, the higher motivation that disadvantaged students have to join the afterschool tutoring program influences a lot on the positive transformation. Secondly, align the learning material with the authentic performance of the disadvantaged students. Thirdly, implementing the remedial teaching step by step, providing feedback and enforcement, making the learning and subject materials meaningful, helping students remember the key concepts, encouraging the students to have good relationship with their colleagues, providing enough opportunities to practice, and setting up successful learning experiences for the disadvantaged students are also essential points for effective remedial teaching. Finally, the author suggests the afterschool tutoring program should pay more attention on how to make the learning material meaningful to the disadvantaged students individually especially in math, how to maintain positive learning motivation as long as possible, and how to scaffold the disadvantaged students' successful learning experience back to their normal school setting.

Professional discretion and organisational change: The case of general practitioners working in the English NHS

Discretion is widely regarded as one of the defining features of professional work as exemplified in medical professionalism. There has much debate about the extent to which professional discretion has been challenged by recent organisational changes such as through the new forms of governance associated with the introduction of the principles of the new public management (NPM) into health systems and other public sector services. A related question is whether these organisational changes have spawned new forms of professionalism? What appears to be missing from these debates is a detailed analysis of the concept of professional discretion and its different dimensions which should enable the precise identification of the extent and a nature of any changes in professional discretion. This paper attempts to fill this gap by delineating the key dimensions of professional discretion evident in the literature and exploring their significance in an empirical study which adopted a longitudinal design and qualitative interviews with general practitioners working in the English NHS. More specifically, the aim is to explore which, if any, aspects of general practitioner (GP) discretion have been affected by recent contractual changes and whether this is affected by GP status (for example principal vs. salaried status). In particular, we focus on the introduction of the Quality and Outcomes Framework (QOF), a prescriptive pay-for-performance system designed to standardise the quality of care provision in general practice which it is argued represents a form of governance incorporating the principles of both scientific bureaucratic medicine and market competition.

O exame referencia contextos nacionais e internacionais, tendo em vista a incidência da ação de movimentos de mulheres e feministas na formulação de agendas públicas para enfrentar discriminações oriundas da construção social de relações de poder entre masculino e feminino. Para tal, avaliam-se, comparativamente, a atuação do Programa Pró-Equidade de Gênero e do Observatório da Lei Maria da Penha, iniciados em 2005 e 2007, respectivamente. Este apoiado pela Secretaria Especial de Políticas para as Mulheres e, aquele, criado por iniciativa do mesmo órgão. Migrant women's political practices: Gender, race and ethnicity in action. / prácticas políticas de las mujeres migrantes: Género, raza y etnicidad en acción

The emergence of the political action and mobilization by people of migrant origins is one of the main processes which challenge the dominant conceptions and practices of democracy, and it pushes to a revision of the current meanings of citizenship. Particular attention has to be given to the political practices and subjectivities enacted by migrant women, within the excluded minorities in contemporary societies. Migrant women live multiple forms of exclusion within the gendered, racialized, ethnicized and classed structure of contemporary democracies; the analysis of their political action can help in building inclusive political spheres and in advancing towards pluralistic societies.

In this paper I want to contribute to the debate on "Democracies in transition: the political cultures of excluded groups", discussing the main results of my research on the political participation of migrant women, involved in grass-root and self-organized groups based in Andalusia, Spain. The research used a qualitative methodology, based on participant observation and discursive interviews. Forty migrant women, from twenty seven grass-root organizations, were interviewed. The interviewees come from Third and EU-27 Countries, and hold different legal statuses. Participant observation was carried out during different activities of the migrant women's organizations involved in the research.

The presentation will focus on the multifolding ways of political expression of these women, explaining the different individual and collective strategies through which these subjects attempt to create spaces for voice, action and recognition, and try to gain visibility in the political and social sphere. Special attention will be given to the analysis of the women's claims, exploring how these subjects negotiate their political and cultural demands with the state and local institutions.

The everyday experiences of exclusion of migrant women in a south European context

With this paper I wish to contribute to the debate on the experiences of exclusion, marginalization and racism, drawing on my own research on migrant women in a South European context. The research used a qualitative methodology based on discursive interviews with forty migrant women from both third countries and the EU- 27 living in Andalusia, Spain.

Migrant women involved in the research can be seen as subjects who experience multiple forms of exclusion at the institutional, social and symbolic levels. In their everyday lives they develop different strategies to overcome these exclusionary forces in order to pursue their projects (in the political, professional, family and personal fields) and to change their position in the context of residence.

The paper will focus on two specific mechanisms of "othering", exploring its consequences on the women's biographies and everyday lives, and their strategies for managing it. The mechanisms are: 1) institutional and legal exclusion from full citizenship rights, related to civic stratification (the legal differentiation of migrant categories and statuses in the Spanish context); 2) the hegemonic narratives of belonging in the local context in which these women reside. The analysis will focus on the subjective meanings and experiences related with the possession or denial of the documents that assure partial or full citizenship rights (e.g.: different kinds of residence permits, formal Spanish citizenship); and on the women's identities and representations of belonging.

Special attention will be given to the intersectional perspective as a methodological tool to understand migrant women's experiences. The subjects of the research come from different countries, hold different legal statuses, and differ in terms of age, educational level and professional profile. This heterogeneity shapes different biographical trajectories and different pathways of inclusion in the immigration context.

Trends in global wealth inequality from a world systems theory perspective

The rapid expansion of the world economy between the 1990s and 2008 impacted on levels of between-nation and within-nation wealth inequality. Drawing on world systems theory and Wright's class schema, I examine the relationship between stratification within the world economy and stratification within national economies whereby exploitation within nations is overlaid by exploitation between nations. In the past, research into levels of wealth inequality, at both a national and a global level, has been constrained by a lack of data, therefore, in this paper, I use data from a new longitudinal dataset which includes measures of the net worth and location of the wealthiest individuals in the world. I find that although the expansion of the world economy, largely due to the rapid growth of the economies of three semi-peripheral nations- India, Russia and China, has led to a decline in between-nation inequality, it has also generated increases in within-nation inequality. If these trends signal a redistribution of global wealth from the core to the semi-periphery there will be a decline in the economic power of the core and will undermine its ability to maintain its dominance of the world economy.

Pursuing ideology or conforming reality: Why does education shift its function from equity to competitiveness in the era of globalization?

Dr. Tien-Hui Chiang, Professor & Chairperson, Department of Education, National University of Tainan

Secretary-General, Taiwan Association for Sociology of Education, Editor-in-Chief, Journal of Comparative Education (Taiwan)

A considerable amount of capitalist profit embedded in the globalized system makes many countries no choice but confirm the rule of neo-liberalism that is the main philosophy of globalization. Unlike classic liberalism, neo-liberalism appreciates governmental authority for creating and sustaining the mechanism of free market that is able to increase its efficiency and service quality. Neo-liberalists also believe that education is the key channel for a given nation to cultivate human capital, functioning as a key element for promoting its international competitiveness. Nevertheless, they contend that the managerial rule of enterprise needs to apply to the public sector for overcoming its bureaucratic constraints, and, then, improving its efficiency and service quality. Therefore, education needs to be run in a quasi-market that is created by the operation of devolution. As globalization expands its influence significantly, many countries adopt the philosophy of neo-liberalism and initiate new educational policies, shifting from the mode of social justice to free market one. Equity is no more an agenda in educational reforms. Therefore, entrepreneurialism becomes the central dogma for running education, and education transforms itself into national enterprise.

Buscando conceptualizar la relación entre política de salud y territorio: Un enfoque para el análisis de la fragmentación del sistema sanitario Argentino

Las desiguales condiciones de vida, la movilidad, las condiciones de acceso a los servicios, las relaciones entre establecimientos, son alguno de los problemas que ponen en evidencia la relevancia de la dimensión territorial en la política sanitaria. Sin embargo, estos emergentes son abordados desde campos disciplinares diferentes, sin llegar a conformar un corpus conceptual que ayude a comprenderlos en toda su complejidad.

En este trabajo nos proponemos analizar las contribuciones que el enfoque territorial puede proporcionar a la investigación de las políticas de salud, abonando a la construcción de un andamiaje conceptual que eche luz sobre las relaciones de mutuo condicionamiento entre ambos dominios.

La relevancia de este abordaje se funda en la propia conformación del sistema de salud en Argentina, su carácter federal y las consecuencias que ha tenido en su morfología la descentralización. Aunque en el plano constitucional (nacional y provincial) está consagrado el derecho a la salud bajo los principios de universalidad y gratuidad, su ejercicio efectivo enfrenta condiciones muy desiguales según los territorios, tanto en el acceso como en el desempeño de los servicios. En este contexto, la emergencia de la cuestión territorial en las distintas escalas impone fuertes condicionamientos en la construcción de los objetos de investigación, cuestionando aproximaciones y planteando nuevas preguntas.

Retomando las contribuciones de los estudios territoriales, este trabajo busca radicar el análisis en aquellos aspectos que diferencian a salud de otros sectores de la política social en los que es más habitual este tipo de aproximación. Retomando conceptos del análisis de políticas, de los estudios sectoriales y del campo de la geografía, nos interesa entender cómo la política sanitaria impacta en el territorio y, a su vez, se ve interpelada por éste.

Preventive custody and social exclusion

Over the last few years, a massive increase of incarceration as a mechanism of social control and segregation have been spotted in a great number of countries. In Brazil, one of the reasons that led to an enlargement of the imprisonment rates in the last decade is the increasing use of preventive detention. This can be attributed to a number of reasons: low income of defendants, the scarce capacity of elucidating crimes and the very slow judicial system. The present work is the partial result of an ongoing research that focuses on the analysis of judicial sentences delivered by the Courts of Appeal of the southern region of Brazil (RS, SC and PR). The justifications presented by these judges when they confirm the decision of the court of first instance to maintain the segregation are identified. The data presented in the second report of the second National Justice System Meeting, conducted in early 2009, found that up to December 2008 42% of the Brazilian prison population consisted of preventive custody prisoners. Based on such statistics and through the analysis of those decisions, this study aims to verify different ways of interpreting the law. Moreover the arguments that legitimate those decisions and how much the social and economic profile of the defendant and of the crime practiced influences on determining the preventive custody are analyzed.

The workers vs. temporary labour recruitment agencies: Contextualizing immigrant workers' struggles against temp agencies in Canada

In an era of neoliberal immigration and austerity, many new immigrants and temporary foreign workers in Canada encounter multiple levels of exploitation as employers further reduce costs of production. This paper focuses on the building of agency/immigrant worker leadership and independent organizations of agency workers in education and action campaigns against the practices of the thriving temporary recruitment agency industry in Quebec, often characterized by low wages, poor working conditions and workplace safety, and labour law violations. Finally, it argues that these conditions and temporary labour recruitment agency workers' struggles for labour justice and respect must also be contextualized in relation to broader historical and contemporary trends in national and global labour, immigration and economic policymaking, as well as local/global networks of resistance driven largely by im/migrant workers themselves which have emerged in recent years.

A specter haunts the neoliberal globe: Reworking the communist hypothesis through the Chilean student movement

Two crucial aspects make the Chilean student movement particularly interesting. First, its demands point at the legacies of the Pinochet's dictatorship. The student are calling into question not only profit in education but also the socioeconomic model inherited from dictatorship and institutionalized due to the political arrangements of the democratic transition. Only after considering these historical events can we fully grasp students' demands for a new constitution, a participatory democracy, and a tax reform aimed at transforming the neoliberal state.

Second, unlike the Arab revolutionaries, the European indignados or the Wall Street's occupiers, which publicly reject every past form of institutional politics, have no clear leadership, and resemble anarchist practices; the Chilean movement shows a high influence of old communist politics and revolves around the preaching of notorious leaders. Instead of growing in complete estrangement from traditional organizations, the students combine spontaneous and creative participation with old left-wing politics, highly institutionalized and markedly permeated by Leninist practices and communist rhetoric.

This paper analyzes these two distinctive characteristics. I argue that the links among neoliberalism, military rule and democratization are crucial to understand the significance of the student movement. I state that the students' demands receive such an important level of support because they aim at removing the legacies of Pinochet's regime that transition to democracy left untouched. I also stress that the movement may be seen as a new incarnation of the "spectral" communist idea, and that this communist resurgence has significantly framed the strategic development of the movement. At least in Chile, old vanguard politics (like communism) seem to be helpful for an increasingly autonomous civil society to reject institutional politics and pose universal hypothesis around which alternatives to neoliberal hegemony may be formulated.

Violence, liberty and constitutionalism: A historical and contemporary reflection from Atlantic Canada

This paper reflects on violence, liberty and constitutionalism through a focus on patriarchal developments over time and on feminist attempts to create women's political spaces that would permit women to exercise liberty. It draws from two very different types of historical data: (1) my recent secondary macro-historical research focused on Europe and colonial America over the last millennium and (2) my feminist action research in Atlantic Canada from 1967 to the present as part of local, national and international women's movement organizations, as a feminist sociologist and as a member of the Canadian Research Institute for the Advancement of Women. These two types illustrate macro and micro changes over time.

It begins historically with brief findings that challenge contemporary versions of women's political progress in the west by presenting four case studies from the last millennium that suggest an alternative interpretation. It reflects on these case studies and on the radically changing paradigms that characterize the last millennium over time and space. It then focuses briefly different historical relationships to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women or CEDAW throughout its history. These include: (1) participating in actions for its ratification from Atlantic Canada, (2) relative indifference because of the growing acceptance of the legitimacy of women's rights in Canada during the 1980s; (3) feelings of its growing significance in legitimizing the human rights of women in light of conservative forces within Canada in the 2000s and new forms of patriarchy starting in the 1990s; and (5) concerns about challenges to CEDAW in Canada that need action via the Optional protocol. The paper concludes with a reflection on CEDAW, human rights and Constitutionalism from several paradigmatic perspectives, including one from North America's first nations.

Baring pain in the news media

My purpose in this presentation is to explore the availability of the pain spectacle in the news media and to examine how the human body is differentially exposed. More specifically, I compare images of bodies in pain in the news media based on the following criteria: published in the period 2000-2010, from cases of war, terrorist attacks and natural disasters. Images are collected from International news agencies databases and from major news websites. The paper attempts to go beyond the 3 main debates in media studies (truth, aesthetics, and ethics) and focus on questions of power and inequality. I argue that, as moving and humanizing representations of pain and suffering may be, they constitute pedagogical forces of embodied difference. Images of bodies in pain in the news media are becoming increasingly more 'real', unprocessed and immediate. Viewers are exposed to bodies that are tortured, bodies that have been burnt, crushed, broken. There are images of blood and bodies in positions that seem 'unnatural' or painful; bodies in abject conditions. How do these images function as evidence of another human being's pain? How does this excessive visibility function to humanize or de-humanize the exposed bodies? In this paper, I analyze how the human body is exposed (flesh, injuries, expressions) to communicate the experience of pain. I point out how discrepancies in the differential exposure of the vulnerable human body are not simply representations of 'reality' but productions of cultural difference and constructions of humanity or inhumanity.

Barriers and borders of social justice and education reform: A view from global democracy

This paper is aimed at arguing that social injustices are redressed according to certain principles such as, for instance, fair distribution, equal treatment, compensatory discrimination, and utility. Redistribution of resources, recognition of personal and/or cultural identity, and participation in rule-making contribute to the key themes of the corrections of injustices. Each constitutes a field of public concern, namely economical, cultural, and political issues. I hold the argument that the competing priority of these issues involves both barriers and borders of social justice.

The achievement of social justice through correction of injustices raises the problems of order of priority among fields and between different development levels of societies. Both of these problems usually intertwine with each other. That is to say, the achievement of justice in a certain society often entails an injustice done to other societies especially in the era of globalism. This explains the barriers and borders of social justice.

The problem of order of priority among fields has been posted by some authors such as Young (1990, 2000, 2007), Fraser (1997), Fraser and Honneth (2003), and Fraser (2009). Since education reform in the era of globalism and multiculturalism cannot do without tackling the controversial priority of economic, cultural, and political issues, it would be so naïve to fight for educational justices or just education without taking this problem into account.

In order to reveal this long neglected barriers and borders that any struggles against social injustices have to face, I thus propose a view of global democracy to help go beyond social justice. By doing this I create the term "communaliberalism" to emphasize the double efforts of liberation of communities and individuals, and to by-pass the individual-collective deadlock.

La calidad institucional como objeto económico. La construcción social del mercado de indicadores agregados en Argentina

El presente trabajo pretende contribuir al estudio de las relaciones entre objetos económicos y sus atributos socio-políticos, así como al abordaje de la construcción de los mercados desde la mirada de la Sociología Económica. Desde hace unas décadas, paralelamente a la proliferación de indicadores (agregados y mayoritariamente preceptuales) vinculados a la medición y cuantificación de la calidad institucional, se ha desarrollado una literatura que aborda asuntos económicos desde una posición sociológica/antropológica alternativa a la corriente neoclásica, postulando que la economía no es independiente del Estado y su forma de ordenar las conductas, ni de las relaciones y representaciones sociales e intereses políticos que hacen a su desenvolvimiento. Este tipo de indicadores ha sido y es utilizado por exponentes de perspectivas de corte econométrico, desde la ciencia política y el neoinstitucionalismo, entre otras.

Partiendo de la idea que supone que los dispositivos tecnológicos poseen atribuciones políticas, examinaremos determinados indicadores agregados referidos a la calidad institucional (control de la corrupción, rendición de cuentas, competitividad, entre otros), elaborados por ONGs y organismos multilaterales de crédito y de uso frecuente en la literatura antes mencionada, para indagar acerca del contexto de su construcción, cuáles son sus usos, para quienes son producidos, que atribuciones políticas subyacen en el transcurso de su elaboración e indagar acerca de la construcción de un mercado de este tipo de indicadores en Argentina.

Perceptions of violence and youth

The purpose of this work is to examine the different perceptions of violence among the young that cohabit some neighborhoods considered risk areas in Rio de Janeiro. It is intended to map the varying understandings of the young in their respective social environments; think over the possible effects of exposure to violence on their behavior and values; and analyze differences and similarities in the observed group from related life experiences.

Our study is based on the interviews with 83 young residents of neighborhoods seen as dangerous and violent in the city of Rio de Janeiro. We focus on the opinion and experiences of the interviewed about the use of violence, fear and its possible implications.

Different social contexts and its relative influence on the formation of values are also considered. Based on specific bibliography, and by means of our research, we support the hypothesis that persons who live in similar social environments, seen as violent, differ significantly on the way they think of the subject and react to the phenomenon, something that contradicts traditional arguments founded on social determinism.

This work reviews the many theoretical approaches to researches with similar subjects and inquires how exposure to violence translates, on these young men and women point of view, into forms of legitimization, banality or rejection.

Marginal urban claims to the city in emerging versus peripheral economies

This paper examines the contingent ability of peripheral urban mobilizations to challenge the social and economic effects of neoliberal state policies through a comparison of marginal urban claims to land. It focuses, more particularly, on the construction of urban collective subjects and mobilizations in the peripheral economy of Bolivia and in the emerging economy of South Africa. Based on ethnographic fieldwork conducted in Cochabamba, Bolivia and Johannesburg, South Africa, we compare the ways that national approaches to positioning its urban land markets within international economic contexts shapes possibilities and limits of marginal claims to the city.

In Bolivia, the relationship between formal and informal land markets allows for peripheral urban groups to claim legitimacy of their right to self-administer and manage their basic services. In South Africa, in contrast, the urban poor's claims to basic services is made in the context of state policies that seek private investments to support the expansion of housing and service delivery in the country's growing cities. The resulting disinvestment in poor neighborhoods is combined with an articulation of claims through universalized political rights. The consequent dependence on the state weakens the vigorous collective identities and actions that emerged through during the anti-apartheid struggle. In contrast, Bolivia's periurban residents' claims to the city draw on indigenous social movement discourse that claims the validity of customary rights alongside the universality of rights. This paper explores these themes as it identifies the ways that states' attempts to position themselves in the global economy intersect with national dynamics of social organization to shape local urban struggles.

El desafío de ser iglesia católica en un espacio de pluralismo religioso. revista mensaje: Testigo del desafío. 2001 - 2010

La Iglesia Católica ha visto emerger delante de ella una sociedad chilena crecientemente compleja, abierta a procesos de creciente globalización y diferenciación (racial, étnica, religiosa). Estos procesos, en una primera aproximación, tienden a ser evaluados por ella como amenazantes (relativismo moral, hedonismo, secularismo, individualismo) para su identidad religiosa y su sobrevivencia en la sociedad. Esto acompañado de una creciente pérdida de un núcleo común de valores compartidos entre los católicos chilenos; y de un nuevo clero obispo cuya base no fue el catolicismo social predominante desde los 60 en el siglo XX en Chile.

¿Cómo la Iglesia Católica, actor político-religioso de relevancia en toda la historia de Chile, comprende hoy la sociedad chilena contemporánea del siglo XXI? ¿Cuáles han sido las temáticas que ha buscado abordar? ¿Cómo concibe su rol en la sociedad chilena y en particular en el campo político post Pinochet? En una sociedad que vive un creciente proceso de individualización en cuanto sus creencias religiosas, donde cada uno se conduce subjetivamente a producir para sí pequeñas narrativas capaces de dar sentido a su experiencia personal, las cuales reflexivan su vínculo religioso, pluralizando el campo religioso.

Estas son preguntas centrales para lo que ha sido nuestro estudio, las cuales hemos abordado desde uno de los medios escritos católicos de mayor influencia en Chile: Revista Mensaje, a través de la revisión y análisis de sus editoriales, desde el año 2001 al 2010; portadores de una mirada de Iglesia, desde el catolicismo social, observadora del devenir de la sociedad chilena y la acción de la Iglesia en diversos campos de esta. Los principales resultados de la investigación serán presentados en nuestra ponencia, dentro de los cuales ya podemos indicar la relevancia que tiene para la profundización de la democracia chilena en la primera década del siglo XXI.

Aglomeraciones industriales en regiones periféricas: El intercambio de recursos con el territorio

El objetivo de la ponencia es analizar la interacción que se establece entre aglomeraciones industriales de grandes empresas localizadas en una región periférica con los agentes institucionales locales, en especial, el gobierno local e instituciones del gobierno nacional. Para ello se sitúa la interacción de las empresas que componen la aglomeración con el sector público dentro del campo económico (Bourdieu), en el cual se produce un intercambio de recursos condicionado por la estructura objetiva de posibilidades que constituye dicho campo. A partir de un análisis cualitativo del Polo Petroquímico en Bahía Blanca (Argentina) se han identificado los recursos situados en el territorio que son más valorados por las empresas transnacionales, así como las estrategias desarrolladas por los agentes institucionales públicos y asociaciones empresariales representantes de las PyMEs locales para promover la utilización de los recursos locales. A partir de esta investigación se quiere establecer un marco que permita comparar este nodo de interacciones con el generado por aglomeraciones industriales en otras regiones periféricas y centrales. En el caso analizado se ha encontrado que entre los recursos más valorados por las grandes empresas se encuentra la formación de los recursos humanos y la capacitación "a medida" de los proveedores locales, brindadas por las universidades públicas localizadas en el territorio, siendo escasos los recursos que en materia de financiación e infraestructuras puede brindar el sector público a nivel local. Por otra parte, por la misma naturaleza de la actividad de las empresas petroquímicas, que hace que se las identifique como empresas con impacto en el medio ambiente y en la seguridad, la utilización de recursos locales significa para éstas una ganancia en capital simbólico, dado que su imagen corporativa se beneficia de hacer visible su impacto económico en la región mediante la utilización de sus recursos endógenos.

This paper is a product of a qualitative research project titled "Gender in Local Politics" on the gender relations in local politics by utilizing in-depth interviews with women who were elected or nominated for various positions in local governments in 2009 local elections. The main research questions are: (1) How do women politicians in the local politics perceive and reconcile the values regarding their reputations stemming from their virtue? (2) How and when do women politicians resist and confirm to this limitation regarding women's participation to politics? (3) What are the prospects of better representation of women in the political offices? In conclusion, this paper explores the contested boundaries of the patriarchal political culture in Turkey.

The impact of new technologies on leisure activities in developed and emerging economies

In the last two decades there has been an exponential increase in computer use worldwide followed by a similar expansion of mobile phone ownership. Technological advances in those technologies have had a major impact on the way people use technology in their lives, including the way people spend their leisure time. As computer use migrated from work to home environment it was paralleled by technological advances in functionality and information access through the internet. Increased accessibility of data extended computer use beyond the business and gaming sectors. The expansion of search engines widened the user base dramatically. After 2004 the introduction and popularity of social media websites further expanded internet audiences. As computers came down in price ownership levels went up. The emergence of mobile phones followed a similar exponential growth. In the last decade 3G mobile phone technologies provided internet access by mobile phone, and this change enabled people in emerging countries to leapfrog the computer stage and access the internet from their phones. The way people communicate has also changed. When social networking emerged it stimulated an exponential expansion in use of sites such as Facebook. These changes have all had a major impact on the way people conduct their lives. Social networking and social media have changed the way people interact and how much time they spend interacting and what other activities are displaced. These trends have some similarities across cultures, but the profiles of user behavior changes in different cultural and socio-economic contexts as well as in different age groupings. These changes have had a major impact on leisure activities in both developed and emerging economies: what people do, the way people pursue those activities in both their home locations, and when and how they travel.

Reflexiones en torno a las transferencias de la responsabilidad sobre los niños: Prácticas, actores, lógicas y circuitos de intercambio

En este trabajo nos interesa analizar desde una perspectiva etnográfica una de las dimensiones presentes en las prácticas de transferencia de la responsabilidad sobre los niños, aquella que remite a la intersección entre el mercado y la sociedad. Particularmente, nos referimos a los intercambios mercantiles y no mercantiles que tienen lugar en el proceso a través del cual se cede o se pierde la responsabilidad sobre los niños. La crianza y el cuidado son actividades que devinieron propias de la "esfera íntima", caracterizada por el orden de los afectos, el desinterés y las relaciones personales y, en consecuencia, fue pensada como una esfera separada del dinero, del mercado, del interés y de las relaciones impersonales. En este trabajo, sin embargo, nos interesa analizar los diferentes tipos de intercambio que se producen entre distintos actores sociales en el proceso a través del cual los/as niños/as devienen adoptables, ya que en ellos estas esferas —en apariencia irreconciliables— se conectan, se entrelazan y pueden llegar a ser redefinidas. En este sentido, nos interesa dar cuenta de las relaciones sociales que vinculan a organizaciones de la sociedad civil que administran hogares, pretensos adoptantes, las familias de los niños y agentes judiciales, dado que es a través de estas relaciones que las transacciones se llevan a cabo y también así las esferas se articulan.

Así, quién cede y quién no; quién da más de lo que recibe; quién recibe y por lo tanto, adeuda, sólo puede comprenderse a partir de identificar las relaciones sociales que anudan a los sujetos y las diferentes lógicas que son puestas en juego en cada una de las esferas.

Computer assisted qualitative analysis of religion

A new possibility for the analysis of religious phenomena comes from some innovative tools in terms of software like NVivo or Atlas-ti. In particular the use of Grounded Theory by Strauss and Glaser seems to be a research style that eliminates the presence of previous hypotheses and privileges an interpretive – as opposed to a hypothetic-deductive – approach to data analysis.

However a solution of mixed methods appears to be the best in order to control different perspectives and to compare diverse results. For instance the classical analysis of lexical correspondences and discourse analysis (namely DiscAn, invented by the Canadian Anthropologist Pierre Maranda) can be combined in order to have more suggestions for a purpose of theory building.

But the presence of sensitizing concepts (according to Herbert Blumer) is appropriate to reach reliable interpretations of data.

An example will be presented: a research on Rome Jubilee pilgrims, interviewed through questionnaires and partial life histories.

Between heads, corpses and guns: An exemplar analysis of videos related to Mexican drug war

Our main interest is on videos disseminated on the web about assassination and executions of people presumably connected to drug cartels and drug war. Some of these materials have generated a policy reaction by the means of creating legislation on journalism. Such kind of media has been also forbidden and stigmatized as apology of delinquency and crime. We have selected some samples to shape our visual discourse corpus to be analyzed. This paper will describe the methodological challenges we have faced to gather and classify the sample and to analyze it with rigour beyond of ethical and political restrictions. we focussed the followings questions to generate debate: What sort of naivety is needed to describe such materials? How is possible to identify its basic components? How these audio-visual materials serve to create social fear and the atmosphere of terror Mexican people is living in any circumstances? How is built the horror using corpses and bloody bodies? How is changed the social order by means of such visual discourse?

In a posmodern and post-structuralist perspective the cultural meaning of such videos is examined highlighting the limits and scope of traditional approaches. What is the data to be constructed, de-constructed and analyzed in such kind of videos? Critical visual discourse analysis appears as necessity but framing this audio-visual production is quite problematic.

Performative dimensions of collective memory: Comparative analysis

This paper will explore the relationship between images and social acts in the realm of social movements. Based on phenomenological inquiry the goal is to show the differences and commonalities in personal narratives and institutional narratives. How is the institutionalization of some narratives created? How is performed the collective memory? Or in other sense, has collective memory any performative dimensions? We are particularly interested on to reveal how the sites of memory produces a different actor. Sites of memory are conflicting arenas wherein versions of the past are in permanent struggle. Some versions can legitimate values and future and other doesn't. The analysis of specific social actor, named victim of political repression will be comparatively shown in the cases of Chile and Mexico's dictatorships.

La gobernanza de la provisión de agua potable. Las nuevas empresas públicas del Ecuador

Este documento discute el potencial que tienen las nuevas empresas públicas de agua potable y alcantarillado para construir una nueva gobernanza del agua en áreas urbanas del Ecuador. Tradicionalmente las empresas públicas en el país se han manejado sin cobrar tarifas reales, que han generado dependencia de transferencias del Estado central y poca capacidad de crecimiento autónomo. Además han estado desconectadas de otras iniciativas sociales para proveerse de agua y se han preocupado poco o nada por su aporte a la sustentabilidad. No están insertas en arreglos institucionales para manejar las cuencas que utilizan, y tampoco han logrado una cobertura adecuada de tratamiento de aguas residuales. En el país se trata menos del 5% del agua residual.

Con los recientes intentos de recuperación del rol del Estado como regulador y proveedor directo, las nuevas empresas públicas deberán lidiar con el lastre de décadas de una gobernanza incompetente y de una crisis de gobernabilidad. La primera se manifiesta en relaciones entre actores que no logran sentar las bases para un trabajo colaborativo, la segunda en un sistema que, a nivel nacional, se muestra incapaz de responder a las demandas de la población por un servicio de calidad.

Es esta primera exploración empírica, mostramos las características del contexto de la transformación, los pasos tomados para construir las nuevas empresas públicas y satisfacer el derecho humano al agua de reciente constitucionalización. Identificamos algunas líneas de análisis para determinar si existen indicios de que estas empresas públicas den cuenta de un cambio cualitativo en la gestión del agua en el país. ¿Qué rupturas parecen estas buscando y logrando estas nuevas empresas con respecto al modelo de las décadas precedentes? Para empezar a responder estas preguntas, analizamos dos empresas públicas. ETAPA y EPAM, que sirven a las ciudades de Cuenca y Manta respectivamente.

El discurso argumentativo publicitario como mecanismo de persuasión en la construcción de la creencia "cuidemos el patrimonio, (porque todos somos Patrimonio)"

Para intentar comprender el proceso de configuración identitaria en la provincia argentina de Jujuy, a partir de la declaración de la Quebrada de Humahuaca, resulta interesante resaltar cómo la pauta publicitaria del Gobierno de la Provincia de Jujuy o propaganda oficial, cumple un rol importante en esta configuración, construyendo a través de los medios comunicacionales la creencia de: "Cuidemos el Patrimonio (porque todos somos patrimonio)". Principalmente esta creencia, se vale de la imagen audiovisual y gráfica como medio de persuasión para construir este "como si" todo fuese patrimonio. Desde una perspectiva relacionada con el estudio del discurso, el texto publicitario tiene estrecha vinculación con el discurso argumentativo. Así por ejemplo, en el folleto propagandístico de la Secretaría de Turismo y Cultura de la Provincia de Jujuy, que constituye una voz institucional desdoblada en una cadena de emisores, hay un uso argumentativo del discurso icónico y verbal para persuadir a los receptores de visitar el espacio patrimonializado. Este discurso publicitario es usado luego por algunos actores sociales para construir su definición acerca de "patrimonio". Esta definición surgida en el mismo contexto en la cual se inscribe, constituye parte de la metodología de esta investigación, en tanto definición contextual, permitiendo rastrear el proceso discursivo de la creencia "Valoremos el patrimonio (...)" cruzada por una interesante red intertextual publicitaria institucional.

Metadatos en la biblioteca: Trabajo colaborativo en la comunidad universitaria

Trataremos un estudio de campo de un proyecto de innovación, llevado a cabo por la Biblioteca de la Facultad de Ciencias de la Información de la Universidad Complutense de Madrid (UCM).

La asignatura Historia del cine español tiene una bitácora en Internet donde los alumnos, previa supervisión y aceptación del docente, pueden alojar las reseñas que escriben de los filmes trabajados en clase. La biblioteca de la Facultad de CC.Inf. tiene en su haber las películas en cuestión, y se ha animado con un proyecto piloto que pretende la colaboración de los alumnos y los usuarios de la biblioteca, valiéndose de las nuevas tecnologías hipertextuales.

Se genera un vínculo entre las reseñas virtuales y las películas de la biblioteca, a través de códigos QR (también conocidos como BiDi). Los códigos QR, pegados en las portadas de las películas, son fácilmente escaneables por los smartphone o los ordenadores portátiles. Así, el interesado podrá acceder a la reseña en la web, de dicho film.

Con esto pretendemos analizar el uso por parte de los alumnos de esta tecnología, saber si despierta su curiosidad, y si sería posible aplicarla en otros ámbitos.

El proyecto se pone en marcha en diciembre de 2011, y para el análisis se contará con los impactos en el Blog procedentes de los enlaces QR de los meses siguientes, y con encuestas a los alumnos.

Twitter y la medición de audiencias

Desde hace unos años se plantea el uso de las Redes Sociales para la medición y las estadísticas de audiencias. En este proyecto investigamos la red social/micro blogging Twitter y sus posibilidades como sistema de medición de audiencias.

Para realizar este trabajo nos hemos centrado en la emisión del día 30 de noviembre de 2011, del capítulo número 26, de la serie española El Barco que se emite en Antena3 (22:30-0:30). Utilizamos los sistemas de medición de audiencias tradicionales (Sofres, GECA) y los comparamos con los datos obtenidos de la red social/ de micro blogging Twitter: número de tweets, número de hashtag, perfiles de usuarios, re-tweets.

Para obtener los datos de Twitter recurrimos a las siguientes herramientas Tweetstats, Tweetronics, Follow the hashtag... Además hemos recopilado y estudiado cada uno de los tweets generados.

Además utilizaremos el guión original del capítulo, así como entrevistas a los guionistas de la serie, para analizar cuales son los puntos de interés del episodio.

Estos datos cuantitativos (tanto los datos tradicionales de Sofres, como los obtenidos por Twitter) serán analizados según la teoría de líderes de opinión y relacionados con un estudio de las intenciones de los guionistas y productores de la serie.

Nuestro objetivo es analizar el perfil de la audiencia de este capítulo de El Barco y compararlo con la medición tradicional. Confiamos que gracias a Twitter se pueda conocer mejor a la audiencia y por ello realizar un sistema de medición de audiencias más completo.

Trabajo infantil, familia y escuela: Tensiones entre la naturalización y la protección integral

Instituto Gino Germani, Facultad de Ciencias Sociales Universidad de Buenos Aires

En esta ponencia se retomarán algunos resultados de la investigación Trabajo Infantil e Infancia (Proyecto UBACYT 078) El objetivo principal de la misma consistió en conocer las perspectivas subjetivas de los actores involucrados en la problemática del trabajo infantil urbano, niños escolarizados, maestros y autoridades escolares y funcionarios en Argentina, particularmente en la ciudad de Buenos Aires y en el GBA.

El trabajo de campo desarrollado durante los años (2009 y 2010) se centró en tres instituciones escolares localizadas en capital federal en el barrio de Barracas y las otras dos en los partidos de Lomas de Zamora y Vicente López en el Gran Buenos Aires. La investigación se desarrolló siguiendo la tradición de investigación cualitativa "teoría fundada en los datos" (Glaser y Strauss 1967).

El contexto conceptual se conformó con la conjunción de teorías acerca de las familias como agentes económicos (Bertraux), con los conceptos de trabajo infantil, infancia y adolescencia, estrategias (Bourdieu), conceptos propios de la sociología de la educación tales como capital cultural (Bourdieu), capital social (Coleman), entre otros y concepciones de política pública (Isuani).

La investigación partió de una teoría general de la sociedad que intenta sintetizar e integrar las realidades macro y micro sociales (Berger y Luckman, 1967). Se sustentó en los supuestos epistemológicos del paradigma interpretativo consistentes en: 1) la resistencia a la naturalización del mundo social, 2) la relevancia del concepto de mundo de la vida, 3) el paso de la observación a la comprensión y del punto de vista externo al punto de vista interno, y 4) la doble hermenéutica (Vasilachis de Gialdino, 1992).

La dimensión política del fenómeno migratorio en el contexto contemporáneo colombiano y las estrategias de vinculación con los colombianos en el exterior

La dinámica de la migración internacional colombiana en los últimos años ha estado caracterizada por un considerable aumento y una gran heterogeneidad de los migrantes y los países de destino; generando cambios en ámbitos económicos, políticos, sociales y culturales. Este hecho ha traído consigo efectos para el Estado tanto a nivel interno como externo, y ha suscitado un creciente interés por parte del gobierno colombiano en la temática, este trabajo presenta un análisis de la política migratoria adoptada por el Estado colombiano respecto a los colombianos residentes en el exterior, en los periodos presidenciales de Álvaro Uribe Vélez (2002-2006 y 2006-2010). Busca indagar desde una perspectiva crítica la dimensión política del fenómeno migratorio en el contexto contemporáneo colombiano a partir de la caracterización de los colombianos en el exterior y áreas de interés que se priorizan en las estrategias de vinculación entre el Estado y los emigrantes colombianos en el marco de la política migratoria colombiana, en particular en el desarrollo del programa Colombia Nos Une (CNU) como institución encargada de la relación entre el Estado y los emigrantes. Partimos del supuesto que la política migratoria colombiana reciente apunta básicamente a potenciar dos aspectos: el ámbito económico, principalmente por el impacto de las remesas en la macroeconomía colombiana y el ámbito político, por la búsqueda de apoyo a la consolidación de las proyecciones políticas del gobierno, teniendo en cuenta el volumen de la migración internacional. Asimismo consideramos la articulación e influencia en la construcción de la política migratoria nacional de lineamientos adoptados en escenarios regionales e internacionales referidos a la cuestión migratoria. El estudio se apoya en una metodología cualitativa basada en el análisis de documentos elaborados por el programa CNU, y otros actores de carácter nacional, regional e internacional vinculados al tema, como en entrevistas semiestructuradas a funcionarios públicos.

'Red suburb' and otherness: How migrant arts became legitimate in the Communist and working class Parisian suburb

As migrant people are generally – when they arrive in a country – dominated, many sociologists study them with miserabilist interpretative frameworks. To prevent this bias, it is important to have epistemological safeguards: studying segregation and métissage; studying cultural and artistic fields (and not only the economic one); having a diachronic perspective.

For my PhD research I study the different arts that have been recognized as legitimate since the 1960s in the Parisian former 'red suburb'. In the French urban and social context, this space is marked by a long-lasting equivalence between a working class social world and a communist political administration. The establishment of the important economic waves of migration is also typical of this area. It has also been strongly influenced by the very dynamic artistic political program initiated by the French Communist Party. My work is based on an ethnographic approach of two cities of this suburb (Saint-Denis, Nanterre).

In this presentation, I propose to analyse how, in this dynamic artistic local context, migrant groups and migrant arts are included. How the local elite has been dealing with otherness through time? What are the social and historical conditions of possibility for a recognition of artistic forms that come from or refer to migrants?

(1) I will present a history of the relationships between the local elite and the different waves of migrants: from a very legitimate vision of arts defined by the communist white working class elite to the legitimization of word music and "urban cultures". (2) I will try to understand how it has been possible, defining in a more precise way these social and ethnical groups and the process of acculturation of both following generations and white local elite. (3) Finally, I will compare this regarding to the national context.

International human resource management (IHRM) as a practice of globalising nursing work: The case of transnational nurse recruitment

This theoretical paper views international human resource management (IHRM), within the discipline of management and organization, through a transnational feminist lens. This lens examines IHRM theory and practices by considering not only gender, but also the complex transnational nature of managing human capital across national borders. By using global nurse recruitment as an example, the paper will argue that limiting IHRM to international business and multinational corporations does a disservice to the discipline of management and organization as IHRM expands well beyond this sector to other international sectors in service such as nursing, domestic work, and teaching. This paper will also engage with how this lens can open a critical debate on how the management of health service HR can become more sustainable.

Familiarización del enfoque de bienestar, últimas redes y reconfiguración de la pobreza y la indigencia en medios urbanos. Tensión entre comprensión y medición de la pobreza extrema

El objetivo es conocer cómo se reconfiguran las necesidades sociales y las expectativas de movilidad social por parte los miembros de las familias que padecen pobreza extrema por más de una década y cuyas necesidades de reproducción dependen de la asistencia directa (pública y no gubernamental) en el marco de la progresiva familiarización del modelo de bienestar que sustentan las políticas sociales para este sector de la población en los últimos 20 años.

Para alcanzar este objetivo, se conforma un equipo interdisciplinario que esta trabajando con fuentes secundarias y primarias a partir de dos líneas: una referida a la evolución de las principales categorías implicadas en el proyecto: pobreza estructural, informalidad, familia y territorialidad. Al mismo tiempo se relevaron los métodos de medición de la pobreza y la indigencia en su manifestación doméstica.

El desafío de la medición de la multidimensionalidad de la pobreza, continúa abierto y es en él que se desarrolla la tensión entre la medición y la comprensión del fenómeno. La revisión de sistemas diagnósticos hechos a medida de programas sociales que exigen algún tipo de focalización para identificar sus beneficiarios representan un punto de interés para esta investigación, puesto que han probado en el tiempo indicadores no convencionales que permitan ampliar la visión reduccionista que brinda la medición por ingresos.

Para complementar la perspectiva descriptiva, el proyecto propone conocer los significados que los miembros de las familias que padecen pobreza extrema, atribuyen a su condición de privación. Esta aproximación se produce en los hogares y busca captar las particularidades condiciones que impone la pobreza extrema en el Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires (AMBA). La asociación entre pobreza persistente, informalidad y aislamiento social son los principales fenómenos asociados en esta investigación.

When promoting social mix leads to support gentrification: The case of Paris

Since the last decades the role of public policies in gentrification has been outlined by many academics. Especially, Neil Smith (1996) analyses New York public policies in the nineties as revanchists and clearly supporting gentrification. But are there only revanchist or neoliberal policies which support gentrification? Although the city of Paris is not widely known for its gentrification, this process of social and urban conquest of working-class neighborhoods by a new middle class was well-advanced in 2001, when a left mayor was elected. The new mayor, Bertrand Delanoë, who was reelected in 2008, put forward a new goal for city planning: promoting social mix in every part of the city. Emphasizing social mix in each public discourse was held up as a total break with the past right policies. The main policy which is supposed to break with the past is the relaunching of public social housing. The left policy in Paris can be characterized by a strong public action and the promotion of a shared city between the different social and ethnic groups, generations and genders. This presentation will be divided in three parts: first, I will give an overview of the actors, factors and spatial dynamics involved in the gentrification process since the 1980s; second, I will focus on the relaunching of social housing and its limits since 2001; third, I will present the other public policies which promote beautification and culture and how they combine with the social mix goal. I will show the global coherence of these different policies and how, despite this highly publicized social mix goal, they still foster gentrification.

Macro and meso causes of party factionalism: A comparative analysis

In the context of the literature devoted to phenomena of organization and competition for power, much attention has been dedicated to political parties, since they were generally recognized as discernible organizations performing legitimate function for the polity. However, parties "are not monolithic structures but collective entities in which competition, divided opinions and dissent create internal pressures" (Boucek, 2009: 55). Though not directly observable, factions are in most parties formed as consequences of these pressures; and this phenomenon makes the unitary actor assumption questionable. Thus factions are an important aspect of the political arena and their formal or informal existence inside most political parties makes their study a matter of significant importance.

This paper places a particular focus on the causes of party factionalism. Drawing on an institutional approach, it explores the potential factors of party factionalism at different levels of the polity, through a cross sectional analysis. Firstly, the paper defines the concepts of "faction" and "factionalism", and clarifies their links with other concepts, such as party "cohesion", "coherence", "discipline" or "fragmentation". Secondly, the analysis shows how, at a macro level, several elements of the electoral system (electoral formula, district magnitude, structure of the ballot...) might impact on political parties' degree of factionalization. Thirdly, this paper examines how, at the organizational level, different procedures for candidate and leadership selection might also influence the degree of cohesion or intra-party conflict. Finally, the paper makes a couple of suggestions about how could be improved the study of party factionalism.

"Reception of racist-discriminative media discourse"

Racist/discriminatory discourse put into circulation via mass media are generated upon the definition of the Other on the basis of stereotypes and the presentation of gender, race and ethnicity representations within a similar framework. Furthermore, regeneration and dissemination of racism is also mediated by the media suppressing and marginalizing the alternatives working against it and thereby creating an influence to this effect on other social groups and social beliefs.

In spite of this role of the media, the receiver of media messages cannot be argued to accept all messages as they are or to limit themselves with the "dominant reading". Therefore, research is of great importance in how ideological representations presented through the media are perceived, interpreted, recreated and used by individuals in daily life.

The manner in which racist discourse or racism presented within media texts discuss, generate and generalize racism and how these texts are read by the audience emerge as a significant societal problem also in Turkey.

To this end, this study will perform a reception analysis for the purpose of revealing the forms of "reading" racist media content used by university students as a sample for the "interpretative community". The texts to be used as intermediaries within the reception study are planned to be selected from media in general and from television texts in particular.

This dissertation study aims to establish the relationship between the meaning generated by the media texts mediating verbal, audio and visual coding in the generation and generalization of racist/discriminatory opinions and judgments in Turkey and the meaning regenerated by the audience.

RC02-585.5COBE, Lorena (IDAES-UNSAM, lorenacobe@yahoo.com)Finanzas y poder en el capitalismo contemporáneo: La configuración de la elite bancaria en la Argentina de la década de 1990

El poder de las finanzas aparece como clave de inteligibilidad de las recomposiciones del capitalismo iniciadas en los años setenta y consolidadas en los noventa en América Latina. A pesar de la centralidad que adquiere lo financiero, existe una relativa vacancia a la hora de abordar las elites financieras locales: las transformaciones, singularidades y diferenciaciones internas de las categorías dirigentes vinculadas a esta forma del capital, permanecen exentas de una indagación específica.

La intención de esta ponencia es contribuir al conocimiento de las elites financieras a partir del estudio del sector predominante en los sistemas financieros de la región, la banca y tomando como referencia un caso paradigmático, la experiencia argentina de inserción en el proceso de globalización financiera de la década de 1990. Este país, durante dicho período, adopta con radicalidad la apertura y desregulación de los mercados financieros y otras reformas de mercado, y es donde el auge y la crisis del modelo resultan especialmente agudos. A su vez, tanto los tiempos de euforia como los de pánico financiero que marcan la década comprometen a la banca local misma: los agentes, actores y prácticas ligadas a lo bancario atraviesan transformaciones sustantivas.

La propuesta consiste en analizar, desde el campo problemático de la sociología económica, la configuración de la elite bancaria durante la década de 1990 en la Argentina. Adoptando una estrategia metodológica que articula enfoques cuantitativos y cualitativos, y recurre a un amplio acervo de material estadístico, documental, periodístico y bibliográfico, se examinarán las categorías dirigentes vinculadas a la banca privada local. Para ello, se tomará como referencia a las máximas posiciones en los dominios del negocio y la representación del sector, a fin de captar las recomposiciones y singularidades de los sujetos, posiciones y reglas que configuran la elite bancaria.

RC44-409.2COCK, Jacklyn (Witwatersrand University, Jacklyn.Cock@wits.ac.za)Contested notions of the transition to a 'green economy'

Recently, the South African trade union federation, COSATU expressed its commitment to a 'just transition to a low carbon economy'. However the content of that commitment is unclear. Members of COSATU affiliates have very different understandings of the scale and nature of the changes involved. These vary from demands for shallow change focused on protecting vulnerable workers, to deep, transformative change involving very different forms of production and consumption. In addition the trajectory of the transition is unclear as the notion of a 'low carbon' or 'green economy' is highly contested. Many labour activists are focusing on the creation of 'decent', 'green' jobs and the COSATU General Secretary frequently refers to a 'just transition to a Green Economy'. At the same time at COP 17 in Durban 2011 many climate justice activists denounced the notion of the green economy as greenwash, as "a green-tinted regurgitation of a failed and unjust economic system". This perspective views the green economy as central to a green capitalism based on expanding markets and new technology which involves the increasing commodification of nature. An alternative view from capital and the World Bank views the green economy as the profitable site of 'green growth' which is about making growth processes resource-efficient, cleaner and more resilient. Based on in-depth interviews the paper will analyse these differences from the perspective of how to deepen solidarity between labour and environmental activists.

A partir de los años 90, redes y organizaciones feministas en América Latina empezaron a dedicarse a la incidencia política dirigida a cambiar las políticas públicas del estado. Se propusieron cambios en cuanto a cómo prevenir la violencia de género, aumentar el número de mujeres en puestos políticos y garantizar los derechos reproductivos, entre otros temas. Aunque la incidencia política por parte de los movimientos feministas es aun un fenómeno reciente, se han realizado importantes estudios sobre sus consecuencias para los movimientos feministas, para las políticas públicas así como para las relaciones entre distintos actores, tomando en cuenta las políticas neo-liberales y el restructuramiento de las relaciones estado-sociedad civil. No obstante, existe un vacío acerca de cómo los/as tomadores de decisiones gubernamentales perciben la incidencia política feminista, debido a que son ellos/as, los/as tomadores de decisiones gubernamentales, el blanco de esta estrategia. Para contribuir a llenar este vacío, presentaré un estudio sobre cómo los/as tomadores de decisiones gubernamentales en dos regiones del Perú perciben la incidencia política feminista a favor de los derechos reproductivos. Este estudio se basa en entrevistas cualitativas con dieciséis representantes del ejecutivo y legislativo en las regiones de Arequipa y Cusco. Las entrevistas capturaron sus percepciones sobre:

Researchers increasingly consider young people as political actors in their own right rather than merely as preparing to be political actors as adults. Studies further show that young people are not apathetic to political issues and are even more politically active than adults, but that they do politics differently from participating in conventional parties and electoral processes. Less attention has been paid to understand how gender hierarchies – and intersections with other axes of social difference – shape young people's political action.

This is of particular interest in the case of body politics in Latin America. Until recently, second-wave feminist movements were the main claim-maker for reproductive and sexual rights in the region, and their activism went hand-in-hand with questioning gender hierarchies. Today, youth movements also address body politics, thereby raising the question of how they perceive gender hierarchies in relation to their activism.

To address this question, we took young people's actions as our point of departure. The study aimed to understand how young activists working on sexual health in Ecuador and Peru perceived and assigned meaning to their actions. Grounded Theory with small N comparison was used to analyze qualitative data on four initiatives, two in each country. In total, 60 young activists participated in individual and group interviews, semi-structured around broad themes with open-ended questions.

The findings showed that gender hierarchies – and their intersection with other axes of social difference – shaped young activists' strategies, including responding to adult allies; building organizations and leaderships; and carrying out social and policy advocacy. In this paper, we present these findings and interpret them in light of the existing literature on the role of gender and other axes of social difference within young people's political action as well as social movements more broadly.

Diasporas, borders and ethnic and national conflict: The case of Brazilians in Paraguay

Thousands of Brazilians were scattered in many countries around the world in the last decades of the twentieth and early twenty-first century. The most publicized and researched destinations of new immigrants in Brazil are the United States, the countries of Western Europe and Japan. In these national contexts, these immigrants are classified in various ways (Hispanics, Brazucas, Sudacos etc.) And the representations and identifications on the Brazil and the Brazilians acquire new meanings in multiple situations of ethnic and national tensions. However, the second destination of Brazilians abroad is to neighboring Paraguay, a country considered to be poorer and less developed than Brazil. About 450 thousand Brazilians and their descendants live in the neighboring nation, and near the international border with Brazil. This Brazilian diaspora in Paraguay has caused conflicts with various forms of the Paraguayan population, especially tensions over land ownership, the destruction of the environment with the planting of soybeans, the problems of territorial sovereignty in a border area colonized by Brazilian and ethnic conflicts among Brazilians of German and Italian descendants and local indigenous and peasant populations. The objective of this paper is just to reflect on the intersection of social, ethnic and national conflicts occurring in this region of the international border between two countries with very uneven economic development. These tensions around land ownership, the national sovereignty and developing a non-destructive of the environment, the ethnic and national conflicts acquire historical dimensions in relation to the revived memories of the War of the Triple Alliance (1864-1870) - War in Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay against Paraguay- in today's conflicts between Brazilian soybean planters and Paraguayan peasants. Moreover, these conflicts also reinforce the Brazilian and Paraguayan nationalism and extend the manifestations of xenophobia and racism in relation to local populations.

Occupy wall street's sources of creativity

This paper is based upon an ongoing investigation, through participant observation, of sources of creativity mobilized by the occupiers of Liberty Plaza/Zuccotti Park. My paper will draw on near-daily visits, observations, and conversations, including those of my research partner, Michael-Gould Wartofsky. We observe three modes of practice (among others) that have rarely been taken together in social movement studies: that of theoretical or imaginative practice, that of metaphorical or analogical practice, and that of tactical or strategic, i.e., "practical" practice.

All three modes of practice, of course, are mediated through and through by narrative, embodiment, and our own situation/position as participant-observers, and we have sought to remain reflexive throughout. We present our findings in three parts, corresponding to these three modes of practice: First, we examine specific folk theories and social imaginaries as mobilized by participants to explain how social change is/ought to be wrought—from financial reform to social revolution, "99-percenter" democracy to "anti-oppression" politics. Second, we inquire into the ways in which theories and imaginaries are expressed and embedded in particular models, memes, and metaphors of the occupation, e.g., "Occupy ____," the "People's Mic," and the "American Autumn." Third, we trace some of the ways in which folk theories and social imaginaries are translated, mobilized and demobilized, institutionalized and contested in everyday practices, as observed in general assemblies, working groups, and actions.

Urban climate politics and the divorce of capitalism from democracy

This paper will explore the missing question of democracy in urban climate politics on the basis of fresh theorizing and preliminary data.

Although studies of neoliberal austerity are often concerned with the fate of democracy, in studies of national and sub-national climate politics and governance, questions of political and economic democracy are usually ignored or subsumed under vague rubrics of good governance. Instead, the dependent variable is usually emissions reductions and/or participation in international treaties. Marxian critiques of these studies, meanwhile, posit an ontological distinction between unsustainable capitalism and sustainable post-capitalism, which a priori excludes consideration of the real impacts on democracy of new urban climate policies. The result is that we are unable rigorously to connect concerns with social justice to concrete analyses of urban climate politics.

I argue that a theory of urban climate politics must build on the foundations of Lefebvre's and Harvey's interventions, which have showed how global governance regimes, national policy-making, and urban class struggles are intertwined. Building also on Brenner's and Jessop's innovations with the regulation approach to governance, I argue that to put urban climate politics "in their place" requires exploring the links between green urban policy advocacy networks and broader patterns of inter- and intra-class struggle. This in turn compels us to ask what role middle class environmentalisms are playing in what Zizek has called the potential divorce of capitalism from democracy.

I discuss my preliminary research findings from São Paulo, where I spent some time with middle class environmentalists and poor people's movements, highlighting the absence of a common agenda, the emergence of a centrist or even anti-political environmentalism, and a set of conflicts between environmentalists and slum-dwellers.

Three paths to population decline: Russia, Germany and Japan

This paper compares the causes, likely consequences and responses to population decline in three modern developed countries: Germany, Japan and the Russian Federation. All share low period fertility equivalent to about 1.4 children, with no relief from demographic momentum. In all cases decline is likely to accelerate with population ageing. In Japan decline is moderated by long expectation of life, which exacerbates population ageing. In the Russian Federation, high male death rates exacerbate decline but moderate ageing. Immigration delayed decline in Germany until recently. In Russia, immigration, low in Soviet times, now substantial from the Central Asian Republics, has stalled decline temporarily. Despite demands from employers, immigration into Japan, resisted for cultural reasons, remains a fraction of that into Western Europe.

Population and fertility decline in Russia, not in prospect until 1991, followed a crisis in economy and politics and is perceived to be threatening, warranting crude responses to promote the birth rate. The processes in Germany and Japan are more gradual. Some perceive Germany to have been overpopulated and its decline as unthreatening. Post-war inhibitions about 'population policy' have been cast aside. Economy and politics remain robust. Japanese responses are pessimistic, with official projections foreseeing continuing low fertility and even population extinction.

Regional decline is salient in Germany and Russia, in the former East zone and the Northern and Siberian regions respectively. Rural and small city depopulation is salient in Japan. Prospects of recovery seem bleak in Russia, as radical reform of politics and economy are needed. In Japan, radical cultural changes, difficult to engineer, are needed to revive the birth rate and make immigration acceptable. Germany seems to offer the best chances of an orderly management of decline and the most likely case of stabilisation of fertility and age-structure at a sustainable level.

Grassroots organizations in the informal economy: A way to go beyond the survival in free markets?

Millions of people survive everyday occupying the streets of the cities of the world's South. In the metropolitan areas of Africa, Latin America, and Asia, streets often represent an "extralegal zone" where a multitude of vendors, artisans, artists, preachers, shoe-shiners, delivery boys, and garbage collectors work and live. Within these zones individual qualities can emerge. But the street can also become a place for different forms of exploitation, representing a "gap of legality" where various criminal organizations impose their rule and their social order.

From different points of view, the informality may represent an enormous "reservoir" of resources used inappropriately, or it may turn into a domain largely closed to the outside, in which sections of the population excluded from the recent processes of economic globalization drag out their lives with no chance of planning a different future, reinforcing, in this dimension, their condition as noncitizens. Garbage collectors and street vendors well exemplify many of these dilemmas linked to the informal economy. These workers seem wholly marginal to society and, for this reason, "de-socialized".

But it is precisely in order to defend themselves against the free operation of the market that these informal workers seek to rebuild sociability. To survive, they sought to reconstruct social bonds, often with people in the same situation as themselves. An ethnographic fieldwork, conducted at Porto Alegre (Brazil), showed that some grassroots organizations, promoted by street vendors and garbage collectors, have been able to redefine its initial objectives (linked to the need to cope with an emergence situation) and shift its action to gaining important improvements for its members.

Another look at pharmaceuticals

Over the past 40 years, beginning with the seminal work of medical sociologists like Erving Zola and Peter Conrad, thousands of studies have contributed to describing and analyzing medicalization. What is common to most of these studies is that pharmaceutical drugs are almost always involved in the process described. Since medications and their omnipresence in current societies have inspired many empirical and theoretical analyses, some authors are now proposing the concept of pharmaceuticalization rather than medicalization to describe the widespread use of pharmaceuticals (Williams et al., 2011; Abraham, 2010).

The complex assemblage surrounding drugs, from the pharmaceutical industry to the construction of technoscientific identities, from biotechnologies to clinical practices, makes us wonder about the epistemological dimension of drugs as social objects and about the ways humanities and social sciences (sociology, anthropology, history, philosophy) have conceptualized and analyzed it since the last 30 years.

In order to examine these and related conceptual and methodological issues in greater detail, we have examined a set of articles addressing pharmaceuticals published in humanities and social sciences databases (Sociological Abstracts, Proquest, Abstracts in Anthropology, Historical abstracts, etc.). About 300 articles were analyzed. A classification of the articles based on Guba and Lincoln's epistemic paradigms (positivist, post-positivist, constructivist, critic (Denzin and Lincoln, 2011)) helped to define the ontological contours of pharmaceuticals as objects. In a global era, interesting avenues point to how technologies and pharmaceuticals contribute to the counting of lives saved (international health programs and pharmaceutical industry initiatives) and the numbering of biological processes (hypertension, cholesterol levels, etc...) as well as to the reconfiguration of social space and time.

Enhancement and evolving polarities: The case of smart drugs

Over the last decade, there has been a growing concern for the non-medical use of prescription drugs by youngsters, and particularly college and university students (see Peralta & Steele 2010; Arria & Du Pont 2010). Prevalence of lifelong non-medical prescription drug use is close to 40% on some campuses (Peralta et al., 2010). Nation-wide American studies show that almost 10% of students used psychotropic drugs or antidepressants in their lifetime (McCabe 2005). While those numbers vary greatly depending on the sample, one finding seems universal: non-medical use is on the rise (Quintero et al. 2006; Sweeny 2010). Although drug consumption trends among students can take many forms, we will focus in this paper on the use of so-called "smart drugs" or cognitive enhancers such as Ritalin or Adderall.

Many studies conducted by epidemiologists and psychologists offer data on the prevalence of the phenomenon, but in a totally decontextualized perspective, which is one among many flaws that characterize this literature. Based on the analysis of qualitative semi-structured one-to-one interviews as well as on focus groups, this paper aims to explore the social contexts, representations and rationales associated with cognitive enhancing practices among university students. We will try to fill the gap by linking cognitive enhancement with the social and individual contexts experienced by students through their accounts of performance, competition, depression and stress in the academia. We will argue that consumption of cognitive enhancers cannot be understood without trying to grasp the various strategies of coping with increasingly porous exigencies of higher education and those of the market. We will finally resituate cognitive enhancement in a broader theoretical framework on pharmaceuticalization, by illustrating how medications are central to the dissolution of polarities between health and illness, nature and culture as well as licit and illicit uses of drugs.

Social exclusion and inclusion of immigrant minorities in Australia

Australia has, in relative terms, more immigrants from a greater diversity of ethnicities than most countries in the world today. While Australia's policy of multiculturalism proclaims equality of all irrespective of ethnic, national or religious background, the reality is different. This paper looks at the often contradictory evidence for immigrant social inclusion and social exclusion across many different objective and subjective dimensions of contemporary Australian life. It draws on primary data drawn from recent research with immigrant youth to map out subjective feelings of aspiration, belonging and experiences of racism and exclusion. It also looks at secondary data sources of socio-economic data and research comparing labour market profiles, unemployment rates, income and poverty rates and racial discrimination experiences of immigrant minorities and the white majority. The paper also looks at experiences of racism in Australia today.

El peor crimen es el silencio

México ha vivido en los últimos 5 años un estado de guerra que suma ya 55000 muertos. Una guerra sucia como las del pasado, sin reglas ni derechos humanos. Una guerra encubierta bajo la lucha contra el narcotráfico, en la cual todas las víctimas son subsumidas como parte de la delincuencia organizada. Paulatinamente entre las costuras del modelo impuesto fueron apareciendo las verdaderas víctimas: civiles atrapados entre dos fuegos, víctimas del propio ejército. Fueron catalogados como "daños colaterales necesarios en la derrota de los delincuentes". Víctimas ocultadas, silenciadas, invisibilizadas, desvirtuadas frente a una escasa posibilidad de justicia. Finalmente, un padre agredido poeta, periodista, vinculado a organizaciones críticas, pone en marcha una manifestación pública que rompe el círculo vicioso de los pasillos de la PGR adonde los confinan y sale a las calles manifestando directamente: "Estamos hasta la madre de su guerra". Plantones, marchas del norte al sur del país, las víctimas adquieren voz, una voz estrujante y directa. Las víctimas se hacen visibles: la manifestación es la única forma de silenciar el silencio. Cada víctima sale, tiene voz y rostro, le habla a la sociedad. Rompe el cerco. Se autonombra "Por la paz con justicia y dignidad" remembrando voces zapatistas y de Madres de Plaza de Mayo. Habla a una sociedad aturdida por el ruido ensordecedor de la guerra, espantada por los decapitados, colgados, fosas colectivas, que pueblan el silencio al que convoca el grito patriótico del gobierno en su guerra irracional. La fuerza de manifestación del movimiento obliga al presidente a un diálogo imposible que pretende mediatizador. Se ha usado contra el movimiento todo el repertorio contrainsurgente: achicar, dividir, aislar, desprestigiar, condenar, simular, desgastar, atacar, reprimir. Pero la demanda central del movimiento sigue vigente. El movimiento no solo buscaba parar la guerra sino enfrentar socialmente la emergencia nacional e iniciar la recomposición del tejido social.

A city for whom? Urban tourism, neighbourhood conflicts and planning policy in Berlin and Barcelona

This paper analyses the conflicts arising from the prioritization of tourism in the urban development strategies of Berlin and Barcelona over the past two decades (during which the two cities witnessed a major increase in annual tourist flows). It considers whether planning can mediate the conflicts between residents, tourists and 'temporary city users'. In both cities official tourism policy has remained primarily concerned with promoting further tourism growth, rather than encouraging the development of a qualitatively adequate tourism from an integrated urban development perspective. In recent years, a debate on the negative impacts of mass tourism on particular neighbourhoods, for example due to the conversion of residential units into holiday rentals, has emerged in the two cities under the impetus of local residents, the local media, and part of the local political sphere. In Barcelona the debates have focused on the historical district of Ciutat Vella; in Berlin, on mixed, multi-ethnic neighbourhoods such as Kreuzberg. Current conflicts not only reveal a tension between 'hosts' and 'guests', but reflect wider struggles over the socio-spatial restructuring of particular neighbourhoods and who has a 'right' to enjoy them. The paper identifies the stakeholders who started a debate about tourism's adverse impacts, analyses the demands they make to the local state for more (planning) regulations, and critically considers policy responses to date.

The challenge of investigating policy mobilities, social learning and policy change in (global) urban studies: Methodological reflections

This paper proposes a reflection around the methodologies and methods which can be used to investigate how urban policy ideas travel around the world. In an increasingly interconnected and globalized world, the increased circulation of knowledge and expertise and processes of emulation between urban elites have led to a wide diffusion of urban policy and planning ideas, models or techniques from one place to another. Such processes are, by nature, difficult to grasp, observe, track and follow. The establishment of causalities between processes of policy mobilities, social learning and policy change is a challenging task for urban studies scholars. The paper first takes stock of recent debates and developments in two (broad) sets of disciplinary fields:

i) urban geography, urban studies and planning studies, where there has been, in recent years, an increasing focus on the notions of 'policy mobilities' (Eugene McCann), urban learning (Colin McFarlane) and what Kevin Ward terms the need for 'relational comparative' research;

ii) the various approaches from political sociology, public policy, international relations and European studies which can be comprised under the broad label of 'policy transfer studies'.

The paper reviews and assesses the research designs, methodologies and methods which have been used by various researchers to empirically investigate the causes, processes and outcomes of urban policy mobilities between cities as collective actors. The paper finally presents the mixed-method research design currently developed and tested by the author in the context of a European Union funded project entitled 'Transboundary territorial cooperation, policy learning and the Europeanisation of urban and spatial planning policies in the Mediterranean area'. In the conclusion of the paper, future challenges for the investigation of urban policy mobilities in a global world are identified.

Perception of traditional arts as a methodological proposal to measure arts effects on the immediate society

Given the growing of social and cultural exchanges, provoked by migration, social movements and global economic instability, arts and culture programs shall be strategic and important element solving problems identified as collectives.

The public expressions of traditional arts may be a strategic aspect observing rather there is a effect provoked to the immediate society or not. But in some arts expressions these analysis becomes more complex regarding the intangible characteristics of some traditional expressions. This paper focuses on the complex problematic to evaluate intangible effects created by arts, generally related to cultural and social aspects of the society.

Having examined the conceptualization of social and cultural effects as well as underlying methodological aspects, this paper presents an epistemological and methodological proposal. A proposal to be able to measure these effects, generated by public expressions of traditional arts.

The analyzed data are mainly derived from a number of studies carried out by various researchers and institutions, as well as derived from implementation of this new methodological proposal done on the Karneval der Kulturen in Berlin.

The paper concludes with some reflections and aspects, which need to be taken into account when implementing this new methodological proposal.

Illegal activities in the agricultural production in the province of Córdoba, Argentina. An approximation to the economic organized crime in the rural area

The Economic Organized Crime it's a way of criminal functioning where actors and representatives of the private sector and actors and institutions of the public sector are connected through a symbiotic relationship which allows the coordination of an organized criminal network that, while remains unpunished, produces wide economic benefits.

Nowadays in Argentina we are before the hegemony of the agro business model and the "sojización" of the agricultural activity where the big transnational companies, the exporters of cereals and oleaginous, the "big sojeros" and pools of sowing, have a fundamental role. It is in this complex scene where we observe a proliferation of white collar crimes. We consider that this type of crime shows how certain agents are not punished in the same way as "common delinquents" but, on having been identified as white collar criminals, they suffer soft or none actions of control and penalty, generating in this way a selective punishment.

In the following work we will analyze how and why the illegal activities realized in the agricultural sector in the province of Córdoba, Argentina, enjoy of great impunity. We will describe the differential administration of the penal justice of the federal courts of this province, in the measure that these actors and crimes receive a civil or administrative punishment rather than a penal sanction, functioning this way as "collector" courts.

We consider pertinent to describe and to analyze the Economic Organized Crime and the selectivity of the penal justice in a concrete phenomenon as are the criminal actions of the emergent actors of agro business and soybean exploitation.

Key words: Economic Organized Crime- agricultural activity- white collar crime- selective punishment

With illegality and without delinquency. Analysis of tributary tax evasion in the province of Cordoba, Argentina, from a cultural dimension

The tributary tax evasion is a crime that generates deep consequences in the societies throughout time. It is of wide knowledge that this type of crime is of easy accomplishment in different sectors of the economy. Nevertheless, the tributary tax evasion in the agricultural production in the province of Córdoba, Argentina is an activity that has acquired a certain status appearing itself as legitimate, inevitable and justifiable this way promoting a process of naturalization and constant reproduction of this criminal activity.

In our case of analysis, we consider tributary tax evasion as a white collar crime as the delinquent and his criminal actions are realized by a person of high social status in the course of his occupation, in this case the agricultural exploitation. Thus, these white collar delinquents remain unpunished, affecting in addition to income distribution and social inequity.

In the present work I will analyze how tributary tax evasion is a legitimate naturalized and accepted practice by the generality of the population of the province of Cordoba, investigating this way how this is one of the central elements on the reproduction and impunity of this crime. Our proposal is that ideas and affirmations of common sense work in a cultural frame as a legitimation factor of this criminal activity.

The analysis of this type of crimes appears of great relevancy in this context but not only from a juridical - formal plane, but also attending to the cultural dimension as well to it's sociological implications

Key words: crime- tributary tax evasion- naturalization- agricultural production

2011 elections in Turkey and the radical break in the republican people's party: Outcomes of the intra-party democratization

The Republican People's Party (Cumhuriyet Halk Partisi) is the oldest party in the Turkish Republican history. Since its foundation in 1923, it has been subject to harsh critiques about its traditionally insufficient intra-party democratization. However, today's RPP is going through a radical transformation both in the candidate selection processes and in its aim to enlarge its electorate within minority groups. Deputy candidate selection within smaller cities for the last general elections in 2011 is based on the elections by the party delegates. Although this democratization process has been seen as a positive step, the selections of the deputy candidates within larger cities directly by the party center created discontent among a certain strata. Also there were questions about why the selections were not based on the elections of the party members but the delegates. On the other hand, the new "expansions" like the "ethnic" expansion or "headscarf" expansion within the party politics aimed at enlarging the electoral base. This situation is also considered as the sign of a radical break within the history of RPP since the party was always skeptical about mentioning religious and ethnic minority groups within the party program. For some, this was finally the transformation of the party into a democratic representation of all the groups within the Turkish society. But for others, these expansions are considered as "deflection" from the traditional party orientation. RPP's loyal electoral strata which consists the statist-elitist groups has been for a while discontent because of this "deflection". This research focuses on the outcomes of the intra-party democratization processes within RPP in terms of how they affect the intra-party cohesion and the opinions of the electorate.

Intergenerational split? The Turkish elderly parents and their adult children

Contemporary Turkish population is still young but rapidly aging. The proportion of the elderly to the total population in Turkey is currently 7 % and is expected to reach 9 % in 2023 which means 8 million elderly as a result of the decrease in fertility rates and improvements in mortality rates. The Turkish state's policies regarding this rapidly growing elderly population have always been based on the hypothesis of high intergenerational reciprocity and solidarity within the society. This hypothesis enabled the state's emphasis on the family as the site which aged people can rely on in meeting their needs, both material and emotional. However, due to a series of economic crisis Turkey has been passing through, the resources of families to support their elderly members have diminished. In addition, the transformation of the traditional Turkish family structure and the increased participation of the female family members in the marketplace resulted in a change of preferences within the new generations regarding their relations with the elderly parents. The reciprocal bonds between the parents and their offsprings have lost the previous strength and as a result elderly care is left without a responsible institution in the absence of the family as a traditional site of care. This research focuses on the transition of the Turkish family institution with respect to family bonds between elderly parents and their offsprings. The ambivalence theory is crucial to understand the changing nature of intergenerational relations within the Turkish context. A qualitative analysis of the actions, motives and beliefs about the care needs of the elderly members within the Turkish families is employed within this research. Special attention is given to the differences within different SES groups. In this respect, the outcomes of this research are going to be presented.

The unchanging other: The case of Romani community in Turkey

The Romani community is one of the largest and ancient ethnic groups residing within the borders of Turkey. This community is actually composed of different subgroups like Doms and Loms but mostly referred as "Gypsy" by the Turkish people. The negative connotations of this word are forming the first step of exclusion of this group within the Turkish society. In addition, the Romani people are considered as the "other" both by the dominant group – Turkish – and other ethnic groups. This situation leads to constant exclusion – both geographically and socially – of this group of people because of their ethnic origin. This exclusion is visible almost in all spheres of life. The never-ending questionings about their religious commitments, their limited or unequal access to public services like education and transportation, their spatial segregation and other group's solid rules about not marrying anyone from the Romani community are some of the signs of their exclusion within Turkish society. On the other hand, their strategies for inclusion to the society are mostly based on their overt Turkish nationalism and constant emphasis on their Muslim identity. This is because being a part of dominant Turkish community is closely related to being Muslim. But still how much they succeed in being included in the society is open to discussion. This research is based on the data collected from in-depth interviews with both the Romani people and the dominant groups who categorize themselves basically as Turkish in the Thracian region of Turkey. The perceptions of both sides about the exclusionary or inclusionary patterns concerning the Romani community within the region are analyzed through this qualitative research and the results are going to be presented within this session.

Global governance, civil society awareness, mobilization and the information communication technology: The convention on biological diversity through Brazilian community voices

Tools for social mobilization and participation through the use of information and communications technology (ICT) in order to promote public awareness and education are advocated in the Chapter 36 of Agenda 21 and in the Article 13 of the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD), which deal with Education and Public Awareness by promoting the use of vehicles and methods of formal and informal networking to increase public awareness about environmental discussion.

Empirical research about the use of social networks and online communication can reveal interesting aspects related to the interactional dynamics of global, national and local stakeholders and actors related to environmental governance. It is noteworthy that the environmental discussion originated in the 1960s from transnational activist groups that contributed to attitude and perception change of public opinion on the environmental impacts of human activities (Wapner, 1995).

This research maps the dynamics of both global and national CBD governance accountability online communication (www.cbd.int, www.cdb.gov.br) - the global and national institutional platforms levels – among it selves and with respect to civil society online communities, identifying how information is produced, transmitted and disseminated within the communities, including the ability of these platforms to receive positive and negative feedback from local up to global levels.

The methodology of the study encompasses online ethnography of websites in the environmental public sphere debate in Brazil, assisted by Pearltrees add-on in order to gather, visualize, organize and browse studied sites; as well as ethnographic content analysis regarding the Convention on Biological Diversity global and national platforms by means of computer assisted qualitative data analysis software AtlasTi, as a tool to organize and analyze collected data related to their communication patterns.

We intend to point out some empirical opportunities and challenges in this yet asymmetric online participatory framework.

Online environmental mobilization in Brazil: The Belo Monte future at crossroads

In this article we exam the online mobilization about Belo Monte, the hydroelectric dam complex on the Xingu River in the state of Para in the Brazilian Amazon region, which is meant to be the world's third-largest in installed capacity and has been generating important controversy throughout 2011.

Regarding environmental issues, online mobilization becomes particularly relevant in Brazil due to concentration of 84.36% of the population in urban centers (IBGE, 2010), distant from the portions of territory that hold significant stake of global biodiversity. The impossibility of direct apprehension by the majority of citizens of what occurs in the country's wilderness areas drives substantial relevance to media coverage and specifically to new media both national and international mobilizations aiming to democratically sustain or oppose government development plans and law bills which risk major environmental impacts.

The methodology of the study encompasses online ethnography of websites in the environmental public sphere debate in Brazil, assisted by Pearltrees add-on in order to gather, visualize, organize and browse studied sites; as well as ethnographic content analysis regarding Belo Monte by means of computer assisted qualitative data analysis software AtlasTi, as a tool to organize and analyze collected data related to the dam discussion.

The research Investigates the dynamics of the movements for and against the dam's construction, the similarities and differences in stakeholders strategies to foster the social movement about the construction of the dam, focusing on five levels of analysis: the call for individual participation rhetoric, intergroup relations, mobilization for collective action in public policy, and the intention to drive external and local attention to the matter.

This article intends to discuss how social movements create, debate, disseminate, and attempt to implement visions for the future through new media in an empirical study of Belo Monte online mobilization during 2011.

Theories of market society on a world scale

Contemporary social theory on market society centres on ideas from Europe and North America. However, the experience of market society is global and social theory derived from the experience of Europe and North America cannot sufficiently address the social dimension of transition to market regimes in the Global South. This paper is drawn from an ARC funded research project titled 'The Making of Market Society on a World Scale: Social Experience and Social Theory from the Global South.' It is aimed at producing a sociology of global market society that highlights the ideas and experience of the global periphery. In doing so, it aims to develop a new model of theory construction that can link multiple knowledge systems from different world regions. This paper addresses conference themes about the globalization of economic life and the localization of social life by examining the shift to a market society on a world scale as one that cannot be explained by a general theoretical framework which views the majority post-colonial world through the lens of the Global North.

Leisure in turbulent times: "second life" realizations

Only half a century ago, J. Dumazedier argued that leisure values were about to "conquer" massively the modern societies: liberated time from work (because of technology), easy and cheap access to the entertainment (especially to the entertainment media), magic due to the augmenting role of the image would be some of the dimensions imposing a virtual world in which the everyday man feels able to "live" experiences, adventures and relationships, (possibilities inexistent or forbidden in other systems and cultures -included the classical western "bourgeois" system).

It's obviously a "mood of laxity" which seems to express a new mentality of "liberation" but also of importance of appearance (of the "look") and of ephemeral pleasures; this mood, defies the stars and calls for an everyday search of immediate fulfillment (instead of a promise of happiness in some future paradise –as the closeness to religion does not determines human entertainment).

But despite the imaginary journey of fulfillment into the everyday achievements there is definitely coexistence of virtual euphoria and generalized social poverty: the possibility to "perform" becomes thus "virtual" for most people when "star values" (and the so called modern life style) are very important but all the most difficult to realize. How could Sociology "define" this kind of postmodern "leisure" (where everything seems "possible" whilst this possibility is only a dream? Or a "Second Life" performance?). Speaking about justice, equality and democracy, what would be the challenges of nowadays world linked to the notion of "leisure"?

El país de los corazones

El país de los corazones parte de la idea de caracterizar, a través de la publicidad audiovisual de la marca de país Colombia es Pasión, los valores inmersos en el discurso publicitario de la misma; entorno desde el cual se despliega esta ponencia, donde se desarrolla el concepto de ciudadano colombiano a través del mencionado discurso, tomando como eje central los valores sociales inmersos en el mismo.

Para ello, se realizó un ejercicio de investigación de carácter exploratorio, que partió de la observación de dinámicas dentro de la plataforma Youtube, respecto a videos relacionados con la marca de país y de cómo la audiencia reacciona ante éstos; por lo cual, además de examinar el contenido audiovisual, se tuvieron en cuenta elementos del sitio como la medición de visitas, la calificación de los usuarios y sus comentarios. Partiendo de dos componentes metodológicos básicos: el primero de tipo cuantitativo, referido a la clasificación de la publicidad seleccionada para el análisis de la misma; el segundo, de tipo cualitativo, apoyado en el análisis textual.

Por lo que se llevaron a cabo tres fases: observación, búsqueda y selección de videos, donde fueron tomados aquellos cuyo contenido esté relacionado con la marca, sin importar si su procedencia es de naturaleza oficial o no. Además de la comparación de resultados con la fase anterior de esta propuesta, es decir, un paralelo entre los valores sociales hallados en el discurso de Colombia es Pasión (material audiovisual) y los elementos discursivos identificados que permitan identificar la formación de un concepto de ciudadanía colombiana desde la audiencia. Choix d'orientation et hiérarchie des disciplines

Depuis les années 1980, la France a connu une des plus fortes croissances du taux de diplômés de l'enseignement supérieur. Cette croissance est allée de pair avec une démocratisation au moins apparente de l'accès à l'enseignement supérieur. Mais derrière cette apparence, on observe une très grande inégalité d'accès aux différentes filières d'enseignement et aux différentes disciplines, selon le genre et selon l'origine sociale et géographique. Comme dans beaucoup de pays, les étudiant(e)s d'origine défavorisée se concentrent dans les cycles courts technologiques. A l'autre extrême de l'échelle sociale, les enfants d'origine favorisée, en particulier les garçons, se concentrent dans les Grandes Ecoles et leurs classes préparatoires, une spécificité française. Entre les deux, l'Université elle-même constitue un espace très hiérarchisé et généré selon les disciplines. Pierre Bourdieu avait montré, dans son livre Homo Academicus, comment les disciplines les plus « théoriques » (mathématiques en sciences ou philosophie en lettres) accueilleraient plutôt des étudiants d'origine favorisée, tandis que les disciplines les plus « empiriques » (géologie ou géographie) des étudiants d'origine populaire.

Qu'en est-il aujourd'hui ? La communication se propose de donner une représentation précise de cette hiérarchie sociale, sexuelle et scolaire des filières et disciplines d'enseignement supérieur, à partir d'une analyse des choix d'orientation opérés à l'entrée. Comment les choix d'orientation (variable dépendante) se différencient-ils selon le genre, l'origine sociale et le niveau de réalisation scolaire dans l'enseignement secondaire (variables explicatives) ? En outre, l'analyse de l'évolution de ces choix sur moyenne période, de 1995 à 2008, permettra de voir si ces inégalités d'accès à l'enseignement supérieur tendent à se réduire ou à s'accroître avec le temps. La communication repose sur l'exploitation statistique du fichier individuel des choix opérés par les étudiants, dans une région française, l'académie de Lille, qui compte environ 25 000 premières inscriptions dans l'enseignement supérieur chaque année.

Os desafios na construção de sistemas alimentares territorializados (SALT's) e o desenvolvimento territorial sustentável: Estudos de casos do litoral centro-sul de Santa Catarina e região oeste do Paraná, Brasil

O presente trabalho procura trazer contribuições para o refinamento do conceito de Sistemas Alimentares Territorializados a partir de experiências de duas regiões distintas. Apoiar-se em correntes que ressaltam a importância da territorialidade nas estratégias de desenvolvimento, onde proximidade geográfica, identidade cultural e saúde ambiental são elementos imprescindíveis para a construção do Desenvolvimento Territorial Sustentável (DTS). Diante de diferentes realidades rurais encontradas e estudadas no litoral Centro-sul de Santa Catarina e região Oeste do Paraná, foram explorados com enfoque agroecológico alguns processos de experimentação em organização social, produção, comercialização e consumo, levando em conta especialmente sistemas de produção de base ecológica. O intuito foi de perceber e analisar as conexões entre tais elementos e processos dentro de sistemas agroalimentares, favorecendo diagnósticos e prognósticos mais sistêmicos, realistas e úteis no contexto complexo da sustentabilidade do desenvolvimento rural dos territórios.

In the city of god?: The Roman Catholic Church and Japanese Brazilian migrants in Japan

Since 1990 Japan has witnessed the increasing flow of immigrants in order to work at the industrial sector. Among those immigrants, Japanese Brazilians constitute the third largest foreign population in Japan after Chinese and Korean descendants respectively. This paper analyzes the experience of Japanese Brazilian migrants by focusing on the role that the Roman Catholic Church has played in their adaptation to the Japanese society. In the first part of this paper, I will describe how the Roman Catholic Church offers to the newcomers an ethnic space where they can speak their language, reproduce their culture, and receive moral support in the midst of their daily-lived situations as immigrants. I will then interrogate how this ethnic space becomes a bridge to fostering connections with the broader social networks such as international programs at the city or town level, legal and immigration information, counseling or contact with health organizations, among many other services. This constitutes an important step into the process of adjusting to life in Japan. Although immigrants in Japan are perceived as temporary workers, some of them have been granted long-term residency. However, the constant reforms to the immigration law in favor of further controlling make evident that immigrants do not enjoy the same level of rights than citizens, leading to social conflicts and the deepening of symmetrical schismosis. I conclude that religious organizations such as the Roman Catholic Church have the potential to ally with the immigrants in order to enhance their local citizenship, which is uneven throughout the country. For example, while in some cities Japanese Brazilian migrants barely receive the services offered by the state, in other cities they have even obtained the right to vote at the local level. This paper is based on fieldwork conducted in Japan between 2006 and 2011.

Mandated assessment policy and teachers' work: Representing and enacting teaching and learning in an age of market reforms

Standards-based reforms have decisively recast the educational landscape in the US, the UK, Europe and other Western countries. Australia is no exception, as the recent implementation of the National Assessment Program: Literacy and Numeracy shows. Research into impacts on teachers in other national settings where standardised testing has been implemented shows that teachers are being pressured to teach to the test while they struggle to maintain their own perspectives on learning because the views of so-called 'measurement experts' have been privileged over their own professional judgements. School leaders and teachers are also critical of the way that one shot judgements of standardised tests are being used to gauge their school's performance.

Data for this paper are drawn from a three year, multi-site study, funded by the Australian Research Council entitled Mandated Literacy Assessment and the Reorganisation of Teachers' Work which is investigating changes to the work of English literacy educators associated with the introduction of standardised assessments. Institutional Ethnography offers a means of investigating the complex ways that teachers enact their lives every day, as they negotiate the relationships presented to them, while also meeting the larger demands placed on them by mandated policies. We ask how teachers and school leaders have been positioned by assessment policies which focus on marketised reform and associated reformulations of what counts as proper knowledge about learners and learning. We consider the kinds of daily dilemmas and opportunities they encounter and the practices that are engendered. We show that there has been a layering of policy, for while there are new demands being introduced by recent reforms, old policy imperatives remain and must be dealt with. We discuss the ways in which educators draw upon counter-discourses and ethical practices to exert agency and mediate the impact of policy on their school communities.

"Cuéntame tu historia de la dictadura": Voces e imágenes en dialógica intergeneracional en Chile

Se presentan parte de los resultados de un estudio que busca comprender configuraciones del proceso dialógico intergeneracional (Reyes, 2009), es decir, de espacios relacionales que se producen entre generaciones al hacer memoria del pasado, específicamente sobre la Dictadura Militar chilena (1973 a 1990).

La complejidad de la construcción de memorias sociales acerca del pasado reciente de Chile se produce a través de procesos dialógicos entre diversas posiciones discursivas, siendo central la posición discursiva generacional. Esta complejidad intenta ser abordada, además del plano discursivo tradicional (narraciones), a través de su articulación con materialidades que actúan como huellas del pasado, fotografías e imágenes. Se asume el desafío de abordar, de forma relacional y dialógica, un problema crucial en los estudios de memoria: qué recordar y qué olvidar de un pasado conflictivo y violento.

En términos metodológicos, el estudio se inscribe como una investigación social cualitativa, en una lógica exploratoria y comprensiva. Se presentan resultados de la primera fase del estudio, constituida por relatos de vida (De Gaulejac, 1987; Legrand, 1993; Niewiadomski & De Villers, 2004; Sautu, 2004; Cornejo, Mendoza & Rojas, 2008), considerando cada historia singular como portadora de la historia social que la sustenta y la construye. Se trabajó con 25 participantes convocados desde distintas posiciones discursivas: generacional, ideológica, nivel socioeconómico, territorialidad, género, y con y sin experiencia de represión política. Con cada participante se realizaron dos encuentros en los que se contó "mi historia de la dictadura", a través de la narración y a través de fotografías e imágenes que permitieran contar "mi historia" a personas de otras generaciones.

Los resultados muestran contenidos generacionales que se vehiculizan en los discursos –narrativos y visuales– acerca de la Dictadura Militar, así como las particularidades respecto al "otro" que responden y/o interogan al contar su historia de la Dictadura.

Race, class, gender, ageism and hetero-normativity in western commercials: Old and new forms of feminist semiotic activism

The field of advertisement represents an important mirror for those who are willing to study our societies in an intersectional manner – considering gender race, class, age and sex as 'interlocking categories of oppression' (Hill Collins). A 10 years long intersectional empirical research on commercials (carried out with students through magazines, tv, and internet) show how publicities both embody and reinforce social stereotypes: in the effort to transform commodities into appealing objects, they tend to legitimize classist, ageist, racist and hetero/sexist behaviors.

The awareness of the normative role of commercials – based on the semiotic analysis and deconstruction - gave impulse to new forms of feminist cooperation among different types of groups: women's associations, glbt collectives, anti-racist groups, scholar-activists in the academia, women lawyers and unionists, students and media activists – offering a fertile terrain for coalition building.

The diffusion of classist & racist images of sexually submissive women is interpreted as an indicator of the present power relations among genders: young feminists collectives became particularly active in making 'corrections' or re-coding commercials in public spaces, perceived as despotic signifiers. They do not believe in asking the institutional intervention; they are also skeptical about cooperating with femmocrats in order to improve the situation. They believe in direct action - as a way to fight back and practice direct democracy - and in grassroots activism, in exerting a control on women's body image. Since the 70s, the women's movement had understood the body is a political issue and held public demonstrations, voicing their discomfort about the improper use of women's body. The new wave of feminists today are targeting racist, degrading, sexualized, commercials in creative and communicative ways. Visual examples about old and recent feminist actions will be shown and discussed.

Sex and violence in commercials: Freedom of expression or symbolic aggression?

A qualitative research on Western commercials shows new trends in the use of sex and violence:

- images eroticizing the use of strength over women
- sexualization of children and young girls
- promotion of an anorexic body type
- spectacularization of women's death
- degrading images portraying the women as animals
- vpornography, including gang rapes

Feminists display different views about the phenomenon: some believe there is no connection between violence against women and media representations of sex and violence, considered harmless since the virtual world of images is perceived as insubstantial, far away from everyday life - people know it is not real, as a prominent feminist philosopher argued during a public debate on the research findings. Other feminists tend to draw lines between material and symbolic forms of violence and to consider them as a problems of social justice. They engage in targeting sexualized and violent commercials, which are seen as promoting a vision of women and girls as objects, lowering their self-esteem, and encouraging sexual harassment and violent behaviors.

Aims of the paper are:

1. to document the use of sex & violence in commercials, deconstructing the present trend of eroticization of violence on women: the poorer women become, the more women become sexually commodified;
2. to challenge the idea that democratization processes necessarily imply more neo-liberism (in this case applied to women's and girls' bodies) and the belief that sex&violence representations have to be tolerated in the name of 'freedom of expression';
3. to discuss the possibility of new forms of feminist agency (in alternative to the authoritarian prohibition of violent images) based upon the derision of patriarchal features - such as the excitement for power, homosocial milieus, testosteroneic imaginery – with the use of new media, irony, satire, and imagination. Visual examples will be shown.

La gestión público-privada en grandes proyectos urbanos (GPU) en Argentina

La presente ponencia propone contribuir al conocimiento sobre las transformaciones urbanas a partir de la implementación de políticas de renovación urbana mediante grandes proyectos urbanos (GPU), permitiendo dar cuenta de la complejidad y diversidad de procesos de desarrollo en Argentina.

En un contexto de redefinición de las políticas urbanas que otorga un rol protagónico al capital privado en el desarrollo urbano. La bibliografía sobre el tema, considera este tipo de implementación parte de una nueva orientación empresarial de la gestión urbana y de la competencia entre ciudades de distintos países y al interior de los mismos. Estas políticas se orientan a lograr un aumento de la competitividad local en el desarrollo capitalista.

Un elemento relevante que menciona la bibliografía sobre el tema, es la existencia de una concertación de intereses y prácticas de distintos actores de los sectores público y privado en la gestión de los mismos. Sin embargo, poco se sabe de cómo se construyen en la Argentina estos nuevos espacios (fracciones de ciudad) a partir de dicha articulación público-privada. Es relevante preguntarse hasta qué punto su implementación puede implicar una privatización de la gestión urbana.

En este trabajo se analizan distintas modalidades de gestión en tres casos de GPU en Argentina para el período 1989-2011. Los casos seleccionados se sitúan en grandes fracciones de ciudad donde el sector público es propietario del suelo y que crean nuevas áreas centrales. De esta forma, se trabaja con el Proyecto Puerto Madero (ciudad de Buenos Aires), el Proyecto Puerto Norte (ciudad de Rosario, Santa Fé) y el Municipio de Malvinas Argentinas (Región Metropolitana de Bs.As.). Se analiza la alianza público-privada en cada caso (a partir de los objetivos del proyecto, las características del ente de gestión, las fuentes de financiamientos, la utilización de los recursos, entre otros elementos).

Education, work and youth: Research and public policies in Brazil

In Brazil, the contemporary youth's condition is produced by the recent expansion of the opportunities of scolarization and by the diversity of experiences that young people produce in social instances that are different from the traditional institutions of social reproduction. The school that they were able to access didn't produce an effective quality. Its work is based on representations that have little to do with the concrete adolescents and young people. It is therefore necessary to incorporate the discussion of research results that point to new possibilities for design of public policies considering the prospects of young people themselves. This is what we want to make the search type from State of the Art on the production Brazilian post-graduate students developed between 1999 and 2006 (Sposito, 2009) and raised from the portal CAPES / MEC sites and Program Post Graduation in the areas of Education, Social Sciences and Human Services. Focus will be theses and dissertations that have researched young people, life experiences and meanings that they attribute to work. Will be considered 91 studies on young people and work, specifically 16 productions that bring new possibilities and thematic reflections to focus the analysis on actual working conditions of these subjects, the work takes place in their lives and relationships between work and the constitution of their identities. Highlight will be the dominant brand in the studies, the ways of approaching the issue of youth, the theoretical and conceptual predominant and the methodological strategies. The perspective is note the advances in knowledge produced about young people and work, challenges faced by new studies and those dealing with the design and implementation of public policies directed to young people.

Searching for a "true work": The paths and projects of the poor youth at São Paulo

In Brazil, especially since the beginning of the 21st century, themes related to employment and unemployment have been approaching the youth condition, demanding the creation of federal public policies and the construction of a National Youth Agenda for Decent Work. This paper intends to present some results of the author doctoral thesis, which focused different youth trajectories verified at São Paulo periphery, concerning public initiatives, precarious work and odd jobs, as well as the continuous efforts for raising the schooling levels.

The research was part of the study about youth and its inter-relation with work, family and school, considering the relevant transformations of these institutions for the modern construction of the youth condition itself. The theoretical concepts of support, as developed by Danilo Martuccelli, and of individual, as developed by François Dubet, are used for the study of the youth and unemployment categories, as well as for the interviews analysis. The research adopts a qualitative methodology, using open and in-depth interviews. The field work was carried out from 2005 to 2006, when 7 policy-makers and 38 young people - as well as some of these parents, were interviewed.

The young people narratives show the diversity of trajectories and meanings given to the work and the lack of work, and their multiple strategies in the search for a "true work", using their own words. Besides the recent increase of public initiatives for rising the youth presence at the Brazilian work markets, the study shows that the family networks featuring strong ties is a main factor for the finding of some precarious jobs. Therefore, the family and the expectations for schooling elevation appear as the fundamental supports for the building of a better life and work trajectories.

Repensando la historia reciente de la Argentina : La realización simbólica del genocidio

Como es sabido, ningún genocidio concluye con el mero aniquilamiento material de un grupo, sino que además, luego de llevada a cabo esta acción, tiene lugar un proceso simbólico a partir del cual efectivamente aquel puede cumplir su objetivo de erradicar el entramado de relaciones sociales existentes. Esta representación simbólica sobre el genocidio que emerge como consecuencia del exterminio, pero que no surge de los perpetradores, sino de la sociedad misma, se caracteriza por construir una cierta memoria sobre lo ocurrido y no otra, por imponer un determinado discurso sobre el genocidio mismo. De esta manera, dicha simbolización puesta en juego en ese proceso adquiere tanta importancia como el aniquilamiento material en sí.

Teniendo en cuenta esto, me propongo analizar los modos de "realización simbólica" a partir de los cuales la sociedad argentina construyó su memoria sobre el genocidio perpetrado por la dictadura militar 1976-1983. Examinaré dicho momento a través de distintas fuentes: bibliografía pertinente sobre esta temática y algunas películas paradigmáticas de la transición democrática. En dichas fuentes intentaré rastrear indicios que me permitan determinar en qué consistió esa construcción simbólica sobre lo ocurrido que emergió luego de la última dictadura militar. En este sentido, será importante identificar cómo es definido y representado lo acontecido, así como también cuál es el lugar otorgado a las víctimas del genocidio: tanto a los asesinados y desaparecidos como a los sobrevivientes. Esto implica problematizar los modos en que la sociedad argentina posdictadura narra y simboliza lo sucedido.

Cabe aclarar que esta ponencia tiene un carácter exploratorio y que está elaborada en el marco de la realización de un trabajo final para la materia Análisis de las Prácticas Sociales Genocidas de la Carrera de Sociología de la Universidad de Buenos Aires.

Income transfer programs and labour policies in Argentina, conflicting strategies?

The paper discusses two central components of Argentina's welfare policies: conditional cash transfer programs and labour regulations; it examines their design, institutional structure and implementation, identifying their gender and labour market impacts in the 2002-2010 years.

In the height of unemployment in 2002 the Executive designed a CCT program directed to unemployed heads of households with children under 18. With the new administration starting in 2003 the program's level of transfers stagnated until 2009 when a novel - allegedly universal - conditional cash transfer program was implemented. The program aimed at providing child benefits to informal or unemployed heads of households with children that in return had to prove the latter's regular schooling and vaccination. During the 1990's the labour code had been reformed flexibilizing contractual and working conditions, as collective bargaining remained in a stand still. Starting 2003 a set of income policies, the introduction of protective labour standards and the reinstatement of collective agreements became the main components of the Executive's labour policies.

In the literature as in the official discourse there is a tendency to mix-up broad coverage with 'universality' concerning social programs; however, the selection of the type of beneficiaries of the cash transfer programs already introduces selection criteria that contradict universality.

The main hypothesis of the paper is that the division between a set of policies directed to informal workers' households and children through cash transfer programs, and of labour policies directed to workers in formal jobs, reproduces social and gender segmentation. The analysis attempts to illustrate how the divide between social and work policies is reviving the strategies of delivering 'targeted' programs to vulnerable groups under a 'universal' guise.

Changing the relationship between the state and non-for-profit organisations: The bureaucratisation of decision-making on organisations' tax relieve in Brazil

Most scholars agree that since the 1930s, in Brazil, patterns of relationship between state and society can be either defined as corporatist and clientelistic or as bureaucratic and even universalistic, depending on the political dimension and the period under examination. Some argue that, since the 1980s, clientelism is declining, and that corporatism has lost its authoritarian characteristics while the access to social services and goods became more universalistic. Due the Brazilian strong presidential system, the bureaucracy is often organised along a sequence of appointed positions rather than a meritocratic career. However, although in a very slow pace, typical bureaucratic careers and procedures have been growing in the public sector.

The paper assumes the Weberian perspective that bureaucratic insulation preserves the state from rent seeking interest groups, without denying, firstly, the importance of politics to control bureaucratic tendencies towards corporatism, and, secondly, the fact the state is an imperfect instrument far from the image of a benevolent and competent organization. It analyses the institutional isomorphic process that leads the decision-making on non-for-profit organisations' tax relieve from a clientelistic and corrupted arena, the National Council of Social Assistance, to bureaucratic ministerial offices. The process, set up in 2004, after a police investigation over allegations of bribery to facilitate the conferring of tax relieve certificates target powerful religious organizations owning well known universities, educational groups and hospital complexes. During 2009 and 2010, the competence to confer certificates was transferred to bureaucratic departments inside three Ministries - Education, Health and Social Development. The paper describes the process, highlighting institutional isomorphism mechanisms that helped to shape this new type of relationship between state and society in Brazil.

Democratic governance in Brazil: Institutional framework and political context shaping the national councils of social policies

Most scholars regard participative forums, built up in Brazil and elsewhere, as important institutional devices to induce state democratisation as well as to improve democratic governance in the public sector. Nevertheless, the institutional framework, the political dynamics and the history of different policy areas can induce the forums to undertake other functions rather than favoring societal actors to take part in the forums' decision making process.

The paper analyses two national councils of social policies, in the health and social assistance areas, in Brazil. These councils are neo-corporatist intermediary organizations that favor improvements in democratic governance, as in fact societal actors take part in these forums' decision-making processes, although the degree of participation varies according to the area. Nevertheless, they also have other functions. The institutional framework and political dynamics of each of the two areas shape forums with diverse roles. The National Council of Health works as a political arena, whose major task is the defense of the Single National Health System. The National Council of Social Assistance is mostly a device to enforce policy decisions taken at the federal level of government throughout the Brazilian federation.

Las pugnas por el uso del espacio público: Explorando moralidades y narrativas sobre la desigualdad

A partir del análisis de la presencia de personas pobres dedicadas a la recolección informal en los barrios centrales de la ciudad de Buenos Aires (cirujas o cartoneros) en este artículo mostramos cómo en la pugna por el uso del espacio público se generan distancias sociales y se reproducen las desigualdades de clase. Argumentamos que ello no solo se produce a partir de una segregación espacial sino también en las interacciones cotidianas. Para ello abordamos dos situaciones. Por un lado, en el modo en que los cartoneros construyen recorridos en los barrios para poder realizar su tarea, por el otro, en el proceso de desalojo de un asentamiento de cirujas. En el primer caso mostramos los modos en que tanto cartoneros como vecinos reconocen la existencia de códigos que orientan los comportamientos en determinados contextos socio-espaciales. En otro caso, exploramos las narrativas sobre la desigualdad que funcionan legitimando las exclusiones y usos desiguales del espacio público. El abordar los dos casos de forma comparativa nos permite dar cuenta de los las prácticas y narrativas que se ponen en juego en torno al uso del espacio público y del modo en que se van constituyendo personas y modos legítimos para permanecer, transitar y establecerse en él.

The right to the city: A theoretical concept and an illuminating idea for the realization of the urban society

In his "Theses on the City, the Urban and Planning", Lefebvre says the following about rights which define civilization (rights in general): "These rights which are not well recognized, progressively become customary before being inscribed into formalized codes. They would change reality if they entered into social practice: the right to work, to training and education, to health, housing, leisure, to life. Among these rights in the making features the right to the city". About planning and social practice Lefebvre says: "The realization of urban society calls for a planning oriented towards social needs, those of urban society. It necessitates a science of the city (of the relations and correlations in urban life). Although necessary, these conditions are not sufficient. A social and political force capable of putting these means into oeuvres is equally indispensable"[1]. My intention in this joint session is to reflect about these two passages of Lefebvre's thought around the concept (and the idea, I would say) of the right of the city. I will discuss at least two dimensions related to this concept/idea: 1) The content of the Brazilian Urban Reform Movement which adopts the idea of the right to city as an illuminating guide for an urban practice that has housing as a central question. 2) The risk of narrowing (trivializing, corrupting, banalizing?), in the academic milieu, the real meaning of "the right to the city", as a central concept for the discussion about the possibility of the "urban", the urban society. I would argue that this is in part due to the strength that the urban political economy approach has in that milieu.

Immigration in European cities and the determinants of social exclusion

European cities attract immigrants from all over the world in large number. This ongoing influx and spatial concentration diminish the exclusive explanatory power of national migration policies. Instead cities such as Amsterdam, Barcelona, Berlin or Milan become social laboratories where patterns of immigration and respective conflicts can be studied like under a burning glass. Based on a comparative study of 20 medium and large scale cities in ten European countries, this paper seeks out determinants of social inclusion and exclusion for immigrants in local welfare systems.

By evaluating socioeconomic data and social backgrounds of first and first and a half generation immigrants, a preliminary typology of urban migration effects in the fields of housing, childcare and employment across European cities will be developed. It will be shown that cities or, more precisely, certain districts and neighbourhoods within cities may be vibrant localities where immigrants' become users and co-producers of social services and communities of de facto outsiders get strengthened. On the other hand, effects of segregation and culminated difficulties of immigration (e.g. linguistic, cultural and bureaucratic constraints) may turn whole districts into homogeneous but deprived zones in which inhabitants are treated as second class citizens who lack access to decent work, appropriate housing and childcare facilities. According to our empirical data, social inclusion of immigrants depends largely on productive contacts with fellow native citizens, trust-based relationships with local institutions, service providers and Third Sector Organizations (TSOs) and, additionally, immigrants' overall competences to make use of these resources. In a nutshell, the paper describes cities as ambiguous places where immigrants can (more easily than in rural areas) become a part of a loosely integrated urban immigrant society but may also be imprisoned in an environment that accelerates a social downward mobility.

Urban-environmental transformation in metropolitan areas: Challenges to social and environmental justice, planning and politics

The paper discusses research results related to the implementation of urban-environmental policies in metropolitan Brazil. The underlying idea is that during the last two decades, there has been a steady movement towards building an institutional framework to deal with urban-environmental issues in different spatial scales, from national to local policies, based on principles of participation, sustainability and urban reform. Although such concepts area usually loosely defined and generally adopted as progressive discourse, the paper argues that there is an effective attempt from social movements and public policies to move towards social-environmental justice. This is not unproblematic and often raises conflicts around their conception, implementation and mechanisms of social control. In recent years, the discourse of climate change and mitigation/adaptation strategies became widely adopted in planning and public policies. Are they new forms of visioning a scenario in which socio-environmental justice plays an important role or are they contemporary strategies to deal with longstanding social and environmental shortcomings?

The paper will address such questions in the empirical context of Belo Horizonte, a five million inhabitants metropolitan area in southeast Brazil. The region is undergoing a process of intense growth as a response to recent public and private investments, with important social and environment implications. At the same time, an interesting planning experiment took place in the region as a Metropolitan Master Plan was developed by our university. Notions of social justice, environmental change and citizen's mobilization were considered central to the process of discussion of the plan. Proposed policies are discussed, particularly those related to environmental and climate change, as an attempt to understand the relationship between policy implementation, governance structure, social forces supporting them, implications in terms of spatial restructuring and the need for change required from social agents associated to industrial capital, landed property or provision of economic infrastructure.

Impacts of educational inequalities on class structure in Brazil 2001-2009

The strong relation between education and employment opportunities has been historically sustained by the great inequality in the distribution of schooling in the Brazilian context. However, recent studies indicate a decrease in the weight of origin in the class destinations, as well as a small decrease in the income inequality that is attributed to the decrease in return on education in relation to the expansion of access and extension of schooling, and to the reduction in educational inequality over the last few decades (Carvalho, 2010). In this paper our aim is to analyze the relation between education and occupation in the context of extreme inequality of educational opportunities in Brazil during the last decade. The data used was from the Pesquisa Nacional por Amostragem de Domicílios [National Household Sample Survey]. In order to deal briefly with the impact of education on unemployment and occupational status, we decided to use a Logistic Regression Model to understand the condition of occupation in the employment market, and to use Linear Regression to analyze the impact of education on occupational status, which was performed to estimate the variable Socio-Economic Index (ISEI). Our main controlled variables are: education (higher; middle level; fundamental; no education), gender, color, urban.

The Cultural Politics of Economic Development: mapping the Xikrin-Mebengôkrê political participation in environmental politics – The Belo Monte case

Tracking the way in which development politics are asserted among indigenous communities – through the fortification of "indigenous sovereignty" materialized on a legal and constitutional program that aims to empower indigenous institutions to accompany environmental policies applied to the infra-structural project of Belo Monte (a Hydroelectric Power Plant on Xingu river, north Brazil) –, we will try to show how new political positions have been edified and engaged by postcolonial political subjects. In the context of implementing infra-structural projects such as Belo Monte, "politics" or anti-politics (Ferguson) works through ways that would make the project viable. Project-affected people must be compensated by the social, cultural and environmental injuries caused by impositions of river flow regimes, changes in fisheries habitats and species, compromising fluvial accesses, anthropic pressure over indigenous territories, etc. In this way, money and infrastructure investments over land properties, boats, automobiles, fish and agricultural equipments – legally imposed and induced by government organisms and private institutions –, become a reality and a local exigency among indigenous communities. But, within development and environmental discourse, place is also given, in political representations, to demands of livelihood rights and traditional ways of live endanger. And, although these claims have been encouraged and articulated by NGOs and environmental social movements, a local perspective is, no doubt, identified from the indigenous point of view. How can political anthropology deals with these local/global forms of political articulation when, in some way, both are personalized and experienced by indigenous subjects? What position should anthropology hold when a knowing local organic political economy structure (the Xikrin-Mebêngôkre cultural and political economy) is crashed by a global bureaucratic political form of participation and vice-versa? Within and beyond these questions, which would be the grounds for the construction of a politic of recognition and empowerment of contemporary indigenous society?

Cultural rights and democratic legitimacy: Conceptual approaches and uses in Latin America

The legitimization of policies and legal frameworks oriented for protecting cultural rights is usually based on the assumption that members of cultural minorities share a common identity. Therefore, the protection of minority cultures would offer individuals who belong to ethnic minorities an adequate context for unfolding their personality and political preferences.

New theoretical approaches and also empirical studies have questioned these assumptions. Theoretically, poststructuralist and postcolonial studies have demonstrated that cultural identity does not represent a pre-political entity. On the contrary: cultural identifications are constructed dynamically, through practical negotiations of interests and differences (H. Bhabha, S. Hall, J. N. Pieterse).

On the empirical level, sociologists and anthropologists have been describing concrete negotiations of differences showing how actors mobilize (or do not mobilize) certain cultural repertoires according to their values, political preferences, and economic strategies (P. Gilroy, J. Hoffman French).

The paper is divided in three parts. The first section is dedicated to a theoretical discussion confronting fixed and dynamic concepts of identity and culture. The second part collects some findings extracted from studies about the implementation of new cultural rights for indigenous and Afro-descendant populations in Latin America in order to visualize empirical interconnections between law, politics, economic interests, and cultural identifications. In the concluding section, the paper presents a defence of rights for cultural minorities that is based not on an essentialist concept of identity but on the democratic imperative of compensating abusive power and social asymmetries

Which sociology? Exploring "non-western" interferences

New critical contributions addressing Eurocentric assumptions of sociology are mostly confined at epistemological level. Therefore these contributions, no matter how radical this criticism is, are actually classified as a mere current within a sociological sub-discipline, the Sociology of knowledge.

In this paper, I state that critical assessments coming from decolonial, postcolonial and Southern theories may have consequences for sociology as a whole. But that will only happen if contributions go far beyond the deconstruction of the colonial division of labour between disciplines or the denunciation of unjust geopolitics of knowledge within social sciences. These critical contributions must namely provide analytical tools in order to enable sociologists to produce non Eurocentric sociological knowledge.

I develop my argument in three steps. The first step is a general description of some dilemmas observed in sociology today. In the second section, I present a tentative typology of existing forms of interaction between "non-Western" critical scholars and sociology: rejection, nostalgia, interference. Finally, I give some examples how "now-Western interferences" can contribute to overcome analytical and theoretical bottlenecks of contemporary sociology.

Intellectual creativity in peripheral countries. the impact of the BRIC-IBSA emergency to the political economy of knowledge production in the global south

In recent years, there has been much of thrill concerning the emergency of peripheral countries in the global scenario. Within this picture, the BRICS countries are at the spot. A great concern behind this regards expectations about the real change that this movement can represent to the world politics. Would the raise of India, China, Russia, Brazil and South Africa mean the development of a new grammar of power or would it just be a fresher vocabulary reifying old cleavages of dominance?

The emergency of peripheral States has been paralleled by an important wave of debates over the question of intellectual capacity in the South.

Essentially, the edification of peripheral countries scholarly constitution – universities, research centers and fundamentally the education of the intelligentsia – is profoundly indebted to European models of scholarship, research agendas and theoretical frameworks. As a consequence, South academies are structurally characterized by a rather colonized scientific culture, where issues like dependency, autonomy and freedom are, ultimate expressions of an epistemological ascendancy over their intellectual architecture of Higher education (e.g. F. Alatas, C. Ake, Diouf-Mandani, P. Altbach and others).

Conversely, the last decades shows several initiatives to reverse this tendency. Brazilian State has been visibly active, on attempts to situate itself in a context of more horizontally collaborative programmes with the valorization of the South-South perspective – the very improvement of the BRICS forum is aligned to that.

We focus on the Brazilian initiatives towards Africa, with a look to the BRICS framework, and outlining a comparative picture of the Brazilian politics of academic cooperation towards the North-South and South-South agendas. Finally, the paper suggests initiatives to improve the BRICS co-operation towards Africa and search to develop renewed theoretical approaches that consider the idiosyncrasies of the South and helps to decolonize the international social theory.

Développement local et droits des femmes

Le territoire du Québec est divisé en 17 régions dont la grande majorité sont rurales ou semi-rurales : les régions métropolitaines de Montréal et de Québec étant à ce titre une exception. Le gouvernement du Québec a adopté le concept de développement pour ces régions, mais le thème des « femmes et développement » n'a été reconnu que récemment en matière de développement régional. Or la décentralisation transforme actuellement le palier régional en interlocuteur incontournable pour les groupes de femmes et privilégie la cooptation plutôt que la représentation électorale. Intégrant des objectifs liés à l'atteinte de l'égalité, les autorités régionales orientent fortement les interventions de ces groupes en matière de droits des femmes sur la scène régionale. On assiste ainsi à une mutation des formes traditionnelles d'intervention en matière de droits de femmes qui laissent peu de place aux initiatives communautaires.

"It's the Political Economy, -----!"

Many of the financial problems young people experience were amplified by the "great recession," but are certainly not new. Before the onset of the recession in 2008, myriad problems related to education and labour force participation were traceable to the collapse of the youth labour market in the recession of the early 1980s (e.g., credentialism and underemployment). What is different for the current generation of young people is that those from more prosperous families and cultures are now being disenfranchised, so public attention is being alerted as if a new problem has emerged. In fact, the disenfranchisement of youth follows a more linear trend when indicators of earnings and labour force participation are examined over the past half-century. I argue that to understand this trend it is most useful to look at the "materialistic" position of youth in the political economy of a society, and to not get sidetracked by "symbolic" issues.

The present work attempts a comparative perspective of the apparel industry that make use of foreign workers in the São Paulo City and New York City. We focus our attention on the garment industry that employs large number of undocumented immigrant workers, mostly of Hispanic origin. We have among the central hypothesis the increase of sector based in the use of illegal immigrants workforce and precarious work relations. Trying to understand the phenomenon from their own mechanisms, we consider the importance of the immigrants historically established in these cities and in the productive sector. For such, we use a literature review about the transnational migration of workers and the sector productive organization. We expect to constitute theoretical instrumental that contributes for the understanding of the thematic and allow establishing links between the Brazilian and the U.S experience.

La "comunidad" yaveña: (re)configuración de una modalidad organizativa y de un principio de adscripción kolla, en el contexto de la (re)emergencia étnica en Yavi

A partir de la década de 1990, la idea de "comunidad" adquirió renovada relevancia en las narrativas y lógicas de vinculación de los habitantes puneños. Ese fenómeno social está asociado a la redefinición del posicionamiento del Estado Nacional ante la marginación social de los pueblos originarios y se objetiva en la reforma de la Constitución Nacional de 1994 y en la implementación de políticas públicas, que frecuentemente reconocen como destinatarios de sus acciones a las personas de origen indígena constituidas bajo la figura jurídica: "organización comunitaria aborígena". Concomitantemente, en la Puna jujeña (re)emergieron y/o ganaron mayor visibilidad organizaciones sociales cuyos miembros se reconocen como pertenecientes a grupos étnicos kollas, siendo el "modo de vida en comunidad" uno de los elementos simbólicos que accionan en la (re)producción de su identidad étnica. Así, en torno a la categoría "comunidad", conviven diferentes definiciones, sea de instituciones públicas o de los nativos, en un contexto de configuración y actualización de la "cuestión indígena" en la agenda pública local. El presente trabajo tiene por objetivo comprender los significados que los habitantes de cuatro aldeas de la comarca yaveña atribuyen a la idea de "comunidad" y qué papel juega esa modalidad de organización en su sociabilidad y en sus estrategias de reproducción social. Con un enfoque etnográfico, exploro los sentidos atribuidos a la idea de "comunidad", los principios de pertenencia y de comportamiento que rigen en ese ámbito social, las modalidades de vinculación con el mundo externo y su instrumentalización en la producción de la identidad étnica. An ethic of independence and diminished filial piety: Chinese widows' support systems in Canada

The concept of filial piety is often used to frame generational relations and expectations between older adult Chinese parents and their adult children (Chow, 2001). This expectation has been ratified in the Constitution of the People's Republic of China: "children who have come of age have the duty to support and assist their parents" (in Chow, 2001). Research in other countries further suggests that filial piety is upheld among older adult Chinese immigrants and their adult children (Liu et al., 2000). Our purpose is to examine filial piety in the Canadian context, where 10% of the elderly population is Chinese. We examine generational connections in the context of widowhood.

We conducted twenty in-depth interviews with foreign-born Chinese widows living in Toronto, Canada. Participants were recruited through a charitable social services agency, ranged in age from 70 to 88 years (median 79 years), and had lived in Canada an average of 16 years. Interviews were conducted in Mandarin or Cantonese, tape-recorded, transcribed and translated into English. Responses were coded using Lopata's (1996) categories of support in widowhood (social, financial, service and emotional). We adopt a life course approach examining "widowhood in the context of past and current life experiences and behaviours..." (Chambers, 2000).

While the predominant paradigm suggests high levels of filial piety in Chinese culture, elderly immigrant widows living in Canada describe a much more nuanced situation: adult children fulfill some filial obligations, yet the widows experience high levels of independence, loneliness and aloneness, even though over half of them live with a child. Many actively resist intergenerational dependence and express a desire to not burden their children. The combination of being widowed and in receipt of health and financial support from a welfare state affords these elderly women the opportunity to realize their ethic of independence.

Trapped by consumption: Towards the liberation of the senses in an age of austerity

'Desire', said Deleuze and Guattari, 'is shamed, stupefied... it is easily persuaded to deny "itself" in the name of more important interests of civilisation'. Today desire is being shamed for what it has apparently done to the economy and ecology. With all roads leading to austerity, all fingers point at a generic subspecies called 'the consumer'. After all, their crass individualism, selfishness and greed has corroded public life, contributed to the depletion of planetary resources, the rise of sweatshops in India and skyrocketing food prices in Africa. And now, by 'binging on easy credit', consumers are also to blame for the economic crisis.

Drawing on iCommunism, published in 2012 with Zer0 Books, the paper mounts a defence of the consumer. It argues against the logic of austerity whether justified for economic or ecological reasons and invokes Herbert Marcuse who saw Eros – the pleasure principle – as a liberating force.

Memoria y poder. Las luchas políticas por el sentido del pasado de violencia y dictadura en la Argentina

Esta ponencia examinará las relaciones entre memorias sociales y poder mediante el análisis de las luchas que se libran, hace más de treinta años, por imponer un sentido sobre el pasado de violencia política y dictadura en la Argentina. Partirá para ello de las proposiciones fundacionales de Maurice Halbwachs sobre la cualidad cambiante de la memoria social y de las conceptualizaciones de Michel Foucault sobre los regímenes de verdad. En base a esta perspectiva teórica y mediante el análisis de fuentes primarias y secundarias, pondrá en discusión la mirada economicista que propone a la memoria como resultado directo de la voluntad del poder mostrando que, en la Argentina, esa configuración de sentido sobre el pasado fue fruto de la intervención decisiva de actores, como el movimiento de derechos humanos, que sufrieron la persecución estatal y la estigmatización de su voces en la esfera pública. De este modo, la ponencia contribuirá a discutir teóricamente arraigadas nociones de sentido común sobre los vínculos entre memoria, poder y política; ofrecerá nuevas herramientas heurísticas para comprender esas relaciones y aportará a la reflexión sobre los cambios y continuidades de la memoria social sobre la violencia política en la Argentina.

Beyond Foucault's subject of power: The affect of visual emergence in grass-roots social activism

In responding to questions about the role visual sociology can play in representing how power becomes effective and operates at the micro level of social relations, this presentation (cautiously) proposes that it may be fruitful to reach beyond the Foucauldian idea of power as everyday disciplinary practice. It is suggested that useful analytical directions might be found by engaging with concepts drawn from complexity theory and the philosophy of Deleuze and Guattari, which consider power in relation to complex systems, sensory engagement, emergence and affect. The example of a local-level initiative, which drew heavily on the visual, will ground the discussion in social actuality.

During four days in November 2008 over one thousand men, women and children marched through eight rural towns in the southeast of the Australian mainland. Known as the "The Gippsland CommUNITY Walk Against Family Violence", this local-level action is recognised across state and national levels as an example of successful engagement between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal communities in positive, community-led action to resist violence against women and children.

Prior to, during and after the Walk the visual provided a significant vehicle for influencing and effecting action. A visual audit, conducted as part of an evaluation of the Walk, identified fifteen distinct visual devices, these incorporated colour, traditional symbols and dress, dance and performance. Intentions for the use of the visual included message conveyance, inspiring and unifying participants and connecting the micro level of individuals and community with the macro level of law and Government policy. This presentation discusses how multiple, intersecting visual elements contributed to forming spaces where, through sensory experience, participants were engaged to participate in political action. Consideration is also given to the Walk as an emergent phenomenon in which the visual performed as a vector for forming social, cultural and political alliances and identities.

Coproducing life histories: The ethnographic challenges of producing knowledge with the segregated urban communities

This presentation seeks to approach the process of production of social histories focusing on two differentiated perspectives: the vision that belongs to the community and inhabitants of an Segregated Urban Community (SUC) and the one that the teachers and school workers have created from their institutional practice. The approach, held on the perspective of the methodology of coproductive-investigation, will interrogate on the SUC construction meanings and its reconfigurations. At the same time will contribute to the understanding of the collective and subjective resistances to the social dominations and governmental modulations produced in this process. The proposal implies a recondition of the knowledge production process, in which the investigated object turns into a knowledge co-producer, requiring a simultaneous change in the perspectives of both, the academic investigator and the investigated subject, giving form to new co-investigative praxis.

Through this dynamics of critical revision of the collective findings and self-discoveries, we will analyse the social process of the last three decades, concentrating mainly on the segregation, sequestrations, custody and identity resistance processes. Corporate and tax structures in Brazilian higher education

Brazilian higher education has been growing considerably in the past few years. This paper's main objective is to present, through secondary data analysis, the Brazilian higher education general context in terms of its geographical, corporate and tax variables. So, we are able to evaluate the current situation and suggest a new strategic positioning as well as business and public policies. In this context, the Brazilian higher education institutions (HEIs) can have three basic configurations, that is: colleges, higher education centers and universities. Analyzing the corporate aspects of the data, we can see that the Brazilian higher education system is centered mainly on private colleges. It also is important to state that the tax situation is very complex for the HEIs in Brazil. There are several tax configurations, so the institutions can find several opportunities to generate savings for them and for the State, through resignation or tax immunity situations related to the participation in programs that help develop higher education in Brazil, such as PROUNI (a government program that allows students to go to private institutions with a full or partial scholarship). Understanding corporate and tax issues of Brazilian HEIs, under its quantitative characteristics, is relevant because such information is not consolidated by the current government information sources. Therefore, this study contributes providing an integrated understanding of the structural, geographical, corporate and tax variables of HEIs in Brazil. Finally, it is important to emphasize that the purpose of this paper is limited to a quantitative survey of HEIs, in terms of their corporate structures and tax variables, allowing us to identify opportunities to be analyzed by public officials on the establishment of new public policies, and private managers to make business decisions.

Resistencias y dificultades de la educación en derechos humanos en la policía militar: Un estudio sobre las alianzas entre universidades y academias de policía

Para contener el crecimiento de la criminalidad y el aumento de la violencia en Brasil, ante el fracaso de la policía tradicional, identificada más por el uso de la violencia, abuso y represión que por la prevención, el Gobierno Brasileño viene fomentando la creación de un nuevo modelo de pensamiento y hacer la policía que se identifica más con acciones proactivas y preventivas que represivas y reactivas. Con este fin, viene haciéndose cambios en la calificación profesional de los agentes de seguridad pública, como la construcción de un nuevo aparato pedagógico que valora la comunicación entre disciplinas técnico-operativas con disciplinas humanísticas, como derechos humanos, mediación de conflictos y ciudadanía. En este sentido, las alianzas entre las Academias de Policía y las Universidades en los cursos de formación se configuran como algo innovador y necesario a la formación de las fuerzas de seguridad pública, sobre todo de las fuerzas policíacas militares, volviéndose uno de los mayores diferenciales de esa nueva educación de la policía. El presente artículo tiene como objetivo de reflexión la política de seguridad llevada a cabo durante el Gobierno de Cid Gomes (2007 – 2010) en Ceará (Brasil) con el desarrollo de una nueva modalidad de actuación de la policía, el "Programa Ronda do Quarteirão", el cual tenía como gran diferencial su propuesta de proximidad a la sociedad. Por lo tanto, tratamos de comprender cómo las actividades de capacitación y las directrices de contenido desarrollados por la Secretaria Nacional de Seguridad Pública (SENASP) se transmiten durante los Cursos de Formación y que lugar tiene la educación en derechos humanos en este proceso de Gobernabilidad.

Urban social interactions, representations of the city and society, and citizen consciousness

What kind of social interaction (Giddens, 2001, Berger and Luckmann, 2004) the public and private urban spaces promote (Jacobs, 2001)? These are interactions that stimulate the instrumental action, communicative action or action based on tradition (Habermas, 1984, 1989; Weber, 1969)? These interactions are manipulated by the economy and politics (Cohen and Arato, 2001), or interactions are aimed at qualifying the opinion (Habermas, 1997) related to the welfare and urban way of life? Urban spaces that promote instrumental interaction, traditional interaction, or communicative interaction produce subjectivities that have different representations (Moscovici, 2003, Durkheim, 2004), of city and urban society, which guide the action of the actors. These representations may value the private use of urban space and the relations of production and consumption, as desired qualities for the city and urban society, or enhance public use and the creation of social spaces that promote the construction of civic values and a citizen conscience. The interactions that predominate in urban society define the representation of the city and urban society that society handles in the private and public spheres (Habermas, 1984, 1997). To evaluate the "democratic density" of the local public sphere is necessary to investigate how it produces the opinion and will of the public, which in contemporary society is a plural public (Thompson, 2002), and seek to identify the presence of communicative interaction, characterized by goals and practices for the construction of autonomous individuals and citizen consciousness. The search for interactions that predominate in groups allows us to evaluate its potential democratizing and their ability to contribute to the transformation of urban society. Keywords: urban social interactions, representation of the city, citizen consciousness, urban subjectivities.

Innovation in public research organizations:

The aim of this paper is to analyse the dynamics of science innovation in Public Research Organisations. Our research question relates to whether and how formal institutional structural factors (governing models, recruitment and promotion systems) and dynamic factors (funding and scientific integration) affect the capability of public research institutes to innovate. By "innovation capability" we understand the capacity to start new working lines, to reorient the existing ones, or to begin new lines that overcome the traditional disciplinary frames.

We empirically test the influence over the institutes' innovation capacity of two different PRO models: the Spanish CSIC and the Argentinean CONICET. The aim is to analyse if different formal governance structures correspond to different levels and processes of scientific innovation in public research centres, and the possible mediating effect of funding mechanisms and scientific integration dynamics. The data comes from two sources: in-depth qualitative interviews with policy makers and institutes' directors and a structured questionnaire to Institutes' directors, covering two fields [physics and biology and biomedicine in the two countries (N= 81)].

We find that differences in macro variables shape two very different types of research centers and that this seems to have a correlate in the aggregate level of integration within the institutes: 75% of CSIC institutes work around an integrated program whereas the proportion for CONICET is 25%. Structural differences are not associated to differentials in the aggregate levels of innovativeness of the institutes. Multidisciplinary innovation in new issues and methods is the dominant mode of innovation in both institutions. It seems that scientific innovation is generated mostly bottom-up, based on the cumulative capacities of research groups both in terms of researchers, experience and seems to depend more on the gathering of multidisciplinary perspectives than on the levels of scientific integration.

Justicia social e integracion laboral

Etnografía multisituada y justicia social : ideología de la « inserción » en dispositivos de asistencia social estatal y asociaciones locales en Suiza

El objetivo de inserción laboral, como base de todo proceso de ayuda estatal (políticas de activación), se inscribe en el marco del neoliberalismo y en una tendencia a considerar que los beneficiarios son responsables de su propia situación aunque su vulnerabilidad este generada por – salvo excepciones- eventos biográficos y condiciones economicas y sociales desfavorables. La « inserción », en este sentido, se acompaña de una responsabilización del individuo que se encarga del peso de su integración sin siempre tener los recursos suficientes para aumentar su capital tan material como simbólico. Sin embargo, la aparente hegemonía de la ideología de la inserción, al nivel de las instituciones y asociaciones investigadas, se traduce en acciones y características distintas según los lugares.

Una etnografía multisituada de las instituciones demuestra ahí todo su poder heurístico. Efectivamente, permite comparar las exigencias de integración laboral en un gran dispositivo de ayuda estatal con las de pequeñas asociaciones. Tomaremos dos ejemplos : una asociación de ayuda para mujeres trabajadoras del sexo que quieren cambiar de actividad y una asociación de ergoterapia comunitaria y psiquiátrica. Aunque participen de la ideología dominante, sea por motivos de financiamiento, estas dos asociaciones tienen como objetivos prioritarios de asegurar una justicia social, la cual se entiende en el sentido desarrollado por Nancy Fraser, es decir, por una parte, asegurar una distribución más o menos equitativa de los recursos economicos y por otra, reconocer a las necesidades específicas de ciertos grupos sociales desde el punto de vista de los beneficiarios como de los trabajadores sociales.

La categoría de éxodo como reinterpretación de los procesos migratorios en contextos democráticos Latino Americanos

Una equivalencia entre la categoría filosófica de devenir y la categoría teológica de éxodo, muestra la migración como proceso escatológico que expresa la pobreza del ser, y la movilidad social como esperanza liberadora, como pascua, como paso del no-ser al ser al más-allá-del ser. Desde la mirada escatológica, todos somos migrantes, todos somos exiliados. Este artículo tratará, entonces, el proceso migratorio del siglo XXI en América Latina enfocando en el hombre religioso como sujeto re-significador de categorías políticas. Intentará precisar el vínculo entre religión y política, para identificar las transformaciones sociales que éste pueda operar en contextos democráticos, en función de mejores condiciones sociales para los migrantes. Ver la migración como éxodo no es solo un modo teológico de abordar el tema, sino también una alternativa discursiva que permita otras articulaciones sociales en los nuevos estilos políticos. Primero, se contextualizará el tema dentro de las democracias populistas. Segundo, se analizará la palabra pública y su función emancipadora como fundamento de la teología y de la política. Tercero, se hará una articulación entre categorías de ambos campos a partir de la noción de negatividad. El objetivo del artículo es llegar a un denominador común entre religión y política para abordar el problema social del trabajador migrante como nueva modalidad de éxodo en la sociedad globalizada, donde la frontera es la palabra pública. La política, al momento de comprometerse con la pobreza del ser manifiesta en el migrante -más allá de un liberalismo secularista-, debería reconsiderar en las categorías religiosas sedimentadas en América Latina como elementos susceptibles de ser articulados discursivamente. La palabra, en la religión y en la política, es el camino a la emancipación del ser; el éxodo, una esperanza liberadora en busca de una pascua en el desierto urbano de la globalización, nos presenta un migrante sin palabra pública.

From egalitarianism to meritocracy: The spatial metamorphosis of social justice in youth transition to adulthood

Drawing on a qualitative study of two rural schools in Victoria, Australia, this paper seeks to understand the meaning of social justice for young people. The extensively documented disadvantages faced by rural schools and communities place the concept of social justice at the centre of any discussion. The structural challenges faced by young people coupled with a traditional communitarian ethos in rural places contribute to the display of egalitarian discourses and practices. However, in considering their post-school options students' discourses of social justice changes within a context of greater uncertainty. Young people and adult members of the communities are aware of the need for youth to migrate to gain further and higher qualifications to gain access to meaningful employment opportunities. In the scenario of youth out-migration to metropolitan and regional centres, students hold closely to notions of 'self-reliance' and 'individual responsibility' to confront a future of uncertainty. I argue that these individualised notions over-determine their agency to dictate their own future overlooking structural barriers, inadvertently making young people themselves solely responsible for their successes and failures. Moreover, egalitarian conceptualisations of social justice metamorphose to the principle of desert, where the concept of merit justifies and normalises unequal outcomes in youth transitions to adulthood.

Empobrecimiento de la familia tras la ruptura o muerte de la pareja

La presente ponencia analiza el impacto de la muerte y/o ruptura con la pareja en la economía familiar a través de 24 entrevistas a profundidad realizadas a mujeres de diversas edades y clases sociales de ciudades medias del occidente mexicano. El análisis enfatiza los cambios enfrentados por las mujeres entrevistadas en su economía tras este evento a través de 3 categorías analíticas: a) los marcos jurídicos que regulan la vida familiar y conyugal; b) los programas y apoyos sociales dirigidos a mujeres y familias vulnerables y c) los factores culturales que afectan la economía de la familia tras la muerte y/o ruptura de la pareja. Los principales hallazgos muestran que estos tres factores se combinan en distintos grados y afectan de manera diferenciada a las mujeres estudiadas dependiendo de su clase social, escolaridad y ocupación. El análisis se articula desde las teorías del feminismo y la familia.

Distance education, information and production teams: Connections necessary for the production of teaching materials

This article discusses the results arising from research conducted as part of training in the graduate program at the doctoral level at UFMG / MG, Brazil, and the goal of the research was to analyze, in the field of Distance Education (DE), the importance and contribution of information in production teams, in order to demonstrate the relevance and interconnection between these elements and their effectiveness for the production of teaching didactic materials. To do so, it became pertinent to recover the institutionalization of the DE in Brazil, their strengths and achievements in the national context and to discuss about the theoretical support of information from the perspective of Information Science, as well as to analyze the functions and roles related to production teams. It was possible to map the academic standing of DE in Brazil, and the data collected let us to identify and characterize the amount of accredited educational institutions, courses or programs authorized by the Ministry of Education and Culture to offer DE courses. Through this assessment, we have sought to learn, in objective terms, what mechanisms are involved in the production of didactic materials for DE by production teams, as well as how to properly assimilate Informational matter into these mechanisms. The consolidation of these elements has provided us with a framework to propose a new model for the production of teaching materials for DE, with the goal of identifying and underlining the importance of the treatment of the informational actions in the steps of the production process. It is noteworthy that the informational perspective in the context of the production teams and the functions of selection, organization, processing and dissemination of information are needed, given its contribution to the production of materials - analysis that let us to discuss its contribution to national education and citizenship.

Economic knowledge on the Brazilian debate on poverty - Actors, institutions, and ideas

Poverty in Brazil has been mainly defined and publically debated by way of statistical or econometric calculations and diagnoses about the efficient use of resources focused on its resolution. Starting from the hypothesis that the predominance of these terms reflects a broader process of change that places the economic practice and knowledge as favored in the debate of the public issues, the presentation proposes to identify this movement from the path of one of its participants, a government institution called Instituto de Pesquisa Econômica e Aplicada (Applied Economics Research Institute), IPEA.

The scenario of the liberalization movement, set in motion in the 1970s and 1980s has been recovered by the research since we believe it is where the movement which causes the change that is the subject of this investigation comes from: the prominence of economic knowledge over other areas of social life that also obey logic that is not only economic; among them the debates on poverty. It is when terms of efficiency, responsibility and expertise begin to provide the parameters of recognition and legitimacy attributed to the economic experts.

The object of the presentation is to outline the way by which econometric terms and the matter of adequate resource management gained prominence in debates about poverty, in detriment to issues such as social justice and rights in Brazil. The IPEA was defined as an empirical object as it is a state institution for the production of knowledge and whose goal is to foster the development, implementation and execution of public policies. Thus, its nature as well as the relationships that it maintains (government, international institutions and academia), makes it the object of choice for the observation of how policy changes also rely on the production of legitimate perspectives and ideas through technical knowledge, most often taken for granted.

Getting a job (but not anywhere). job opportunities as one of the major determinants of the intrametropolitan migration flows in metropolitan area of campinas

From a historical-structural perspective in migratory studies, Singer (1980) highlights that economic inequalities between source/origin areas and destination areas can direct migration flows from economically stagnant regions to more prosperous areas. From this perspective, the gap between demand and labor supply could stimulate migration, especially from rural areas to cities. Still taking in account the macrosocial dimension of the migratory phenomenon, Cunha (1994) mentions two main reasons that are strongly associated with the migratory decision making process. The first one is the habitation market and the second would be the labor market. In this paper, job opportunities are seen as a "proxy" to the emergence of centripetal and centrifuges forces. In Brazil, over the past two decades of the last century the so called R-U (Rural - Urban) flows lost a significant portion of its relevance to more spatially localized movements, mainly between urban areas (U-U). In this sense, the metropolitan areas appears as an important territorial delimitation given the dramatic increase in the urbanization degree of the Brazilian cities between 1950-1980, a process by no way sedimented. Thus, the main objective of this article is to map the intrametropolitan migration flows of the Metropolitan Area of Campinas (MAC) and correlate these same flows with its job opportunities, using for that some specific indicators: net migration, migratory effectiveness index, stock of employees, among others. These notions can indicate the roles played by its 19 municipalities over time. The principal data source used was the Demographic Census. Others data sources used were: RAIS ("Relação Anual de Informações Sociais" - Annual Social Information Report) and CAGED ("Cadastro Geral de Empregados e Desempregados" - General Register of Employed and Unemployed), both of them were developed by MTE ("Ministério do Trabalho e Emprego" - Ministry of Labor and Employment).

Ladrillo por ladrillo

El presente artículo toma la construcción y utilización de indicadores sintéticos de las viviendas, bien como de su entorno inmediato, como herramientas para el análisis comparativo entre los municipios integrantes de la Región Metropolitana de Campinas (RMC) a lo largo del período intercensal comprendido entre los años de 1991 y 2000. Disímiles estudios sobre el tema migratorio, especialmente la migración intra-metropolitana, sugieren, básicamente, dos razones principales para el acto de migrar, que son: a) el mercado de trabajo y b) el suelo urbano y el mercado de viviendas. El presente estudio examinará especialmente esta segunda razón. Una de las primeras suposiciones es que las consecutivas mejoras en el acceso a la tierra y a las viviendas, así como el aumento de su calidad intrínseca (proximidad a importantes servicios públicos, suministro de agua, recolección de basura y alcantarillado, electricidad, etc.) pueden estar pautadas por el direccionamiento de los flujos migratorios para determinadas localidades y no otras. En verdad, el precepto inicial adoptado, al menos en este caso, es que las oportunidades de servicios e infraestructura "direccionan", aunque indirectamente, los flujos poblacionales de algunas áreas específicas (y no otras) para otras áreas (y no otras), una vez que estos elementos repercuten directamente sobre los precios del suelo/tierra urbana y, por consiguiente, de las viviendas. Los datos de los Censos Demográficos brasileños de 1991 y 2000 fueron esenciales para la elaboración del presente artículo.

Between "prostitution" and "dignified work": An analysis of the political practices of travesti associations in Buenos Aires

Argentinean travestis (male to female transgenders) have been historically deprived of the access to many citizenship rights, due to their non-normative sexualities and gender identities. Like other Latin American travestis, they have always found in prostitution their main source of incomes, being exposed to violence and exclusion.

As a response to this situation, several organizations emerged in the country in the last two decades. Some of them rejected the idea that prostitution could be considered as work, claiming then for a dignified work for these people. The construction of this demand was framed, on the one hand, by local feminist debates; and on the other, by the so-called productivist turn of the Argentinean State, which since 2003 has been promoting the formation of labor cooperatives -as one of the privileged ways to manage the (un)employment issue.

My hypothesis is that after two decades of resistance and organization, groups of travestis are beginning to generate their claims in specific languages - such as dignified work - so that they can be heard. However, the concept of dignified work as the "common discursive framework" -between the public policies and the claims of the travesti associations- is contested, questioned and resignified on the everyday lives of the people involved, on the basis of their previous experiences, and according to the fact that prostitution is always an alternative and a source of metaphors for thinking about themselves.

This paper is part of my current Ph.D. research, in which I study the organizational and political practices carried out by travesti associations in Buenos Aires. With an ethnographical and political perspective, my research methods are based on qualitative techniques such as participant observation and in depth interviews, developed on the fieldwork done between 2008-2010, as well as the analysis of secondary written sources.

A dialogue between Judith Butler's and Axel Honneth's theory of recognition

In her book "The Psychic Life of Power" (1997), Judith Butler reaffirms her anti-normativist perspective by proposing a conception of recognition connected to social domination. Recognition is a vital drive by means of which we undertake, desire, and pursue our oppressive social identities. At this point, her perspective is, therefore, openly contrary to theories supportive of politics of recognition. Nevertheless, in more recent papers concerning the exposure to violence, Butler has developed a study on the body's vulnerability which works as an ethical foundation close to normative theories of recognition, such as Honneth's. The aim of this paper is to discuss whether there is a similarity between Judith Butler's and Axel Honneth's formulations regarding the moral foundations of a politics of recognition adding new theoretical problems to this theme.

Gender and feminism in Latin American comparative politics: The relationship of the state, international organizations, social movements and experts in the struggle for gender global justice

The main actors in the field of international relations and in gender justice have been articulated in a wide range of manners latterly as it has been observed, particularly in countries of the global South. Over the last decade, it has been reported that an approximation of feminist movements with the state itself and a reformulation of the bureaucratic apparatus of international cooperation agencies has been occurring. Therefore, the year of 2010 deserves to be highlighted because of an important innovation in the United Nations (UN) system: the so-called "joint action strategies", which can be exemplified by the case of "UN Women", now operating within a single agency, emerging as a much more unified and effective body of the UN bureaucracy, granting thus the possibility of a more coordinated international cooperation process to be developed. This article will discuss the example and the model of the main discussions on gender consensus-building on the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC), focusing on its Tenth and Eleventh Regional Conference on Women in Latin America and the Caribbean; both events reflect the increasingly indicators of gender inequalities in the region, which is of paramount importance for this research. Wherefore, this article reflects both the deliberative moment, as well as the movement in democratizing feminist demands for more social justice in Latin America. The article has two main proposals: the first is to address the theories of social justice and of international relations to the deliberative issues. The second part will examine the relationship of the state, international organizations, social movements and experts in the process of consensus-building and the relation they intend to establish in their effort to achieve a perspective of global gender justice from a Latin American experience.

Socio-economic consequences of professional activity of women. A case of Poland

The transformations of Polish society resulting from the adaptation to the requirements of market economy and the accession to EU made it necessary to develop specific strategies to come with new social reality. Systemic transformation covered not only political and economic sphere, but also changes in social awareness of the inhabitants of Poland.

Women constitute this social category that was influenced by the consequences of the changes in 1990's to the greatest extent. Genuine threat of unemployment among men – frequently the only breadwinners in a family – led to a change of attitudes, including the increase of women's professional activities. Extending the time of education, increasing professional qualifications and taking full time jobs caused changes in the structure and the size of a family. Women who decided to be active in their professions and to be ready for life-long learning not only limit the time to have their first baby, but also postpone their motherhood. Another milestone was the accession of Poland to European Union and the opening of European labour markets for the citizens of new member states. Additionally, the prospects of having a legal and well-paid job encouraged Polish women to seek better life abroad. Consequently, the change of women's mind-frame and behaviour made Poland the country with one of the lowest fertility rate in Europe in the last few years (1.28 in 2010). Demographic forecasts indicate constant deterioration of this negative phenomenon. Statistical data clearly show systematic decrease of the number of Poles and the ageing of the society. It is worth to emphasise that the actions taken by the governments concerning social and pro-family policy seem to be insufficient, inaccurate and unsuccessful. The proposed financial and legal solutions of employment flexibility and the help in childcare appear to be not attractive enough for Polish women.

Acción colectiva y estructura social neo-colonial: De identidades emergentes y clases sociales

Desde un análisis de la conflictividad social en Argentina, es posible reconocer en los estudios de acción colectiva, diferentes etapas que van desde los ciclos de protestas que correspondieron a la aplicación de las políticas neoliberales y sus efectos; hasta la institucionalización de los actores emergentes en el marco de la conflictividad social post 2001.

Como veremos, la discusión en torno a los "nuevos movimientos sociales" ha constituido uno de los contextos teóricos desde donde ha sido posible acceder a los complejos procesos de cambio social, sin perder de vista –pese a algunas lecturas– el peso del componente estructural y la lucha de clases. Recuperando cierta tradición dentro de este campo, encontramos en los momentos de latencia de los conflictos y en las instancias cotidianas de su expresividad lugares desde donde dar cuenta de la relación entre la construcción hegemónica y las resistencias, y problematización de los procesos de constitución de los sectores dominantes y los subalternos.

En este sentido, este trabajo se propone explorar la tensión entre la noción de clase y las múltiples identidades emergentes, como una vía relevante para complejizar la caracterización del contexto neo-colonial de estructuración social.

Para ello se realizará en primera instancia una breve consideración de los teóricos de los NMS (Melucci, Offe y Touraine), tomando como ejes centrales las categorías de conflicto y antagonista. En un segundo momento, se destacará la importancia de las redes de conflicto que suponen las acciones colectivas, como instancias centrales para la comprensión de los procesos de reproducción y de dominación social desde una perspectiva clasista. Por último, se analizará la información recolectada en diversas investigaciones sobre colectivos emergentes de la protesta social pos 2001, como una vía para fortalecer el análisis teórico antes propuesto, e identificar nodos de la estructuración social de las sociedades neo-coloniales.

Communitarian strategies of environmental control and adaptation: The experience of Mexican indigenous groups Global warming and climate change have brought new challenges to the daily life of communities. In addition to the gender and racial discrimination - the main factors that drive poverty and inequality in Latin America, producing social disadvantage and economic policies for women, blacks and indigenous groups – the access to some natural resources are equally important in setting up a scenario increasingly hierarchical, where poverty, hunger and misery lead the vulnerability of life. This article aims to analyze some of the strategies of community control on the use of natural resources, climate adaptation and migration in situations of environmental risk. We present a case study of the alternative lifestyle of indigenous communities in Mexico. It is a participatory research project conducted by the University of Oaxaca in partnership with the Mexican Federal Government. Emphasis is on reducing consumption and recycling natural resources, the use of vernacular architecture as a coping strategy for climate and political commitments in face of alarming situations where migration becomes an imperative for survival. Finally, since pollution has no boundaries, we present a discussion on global environmental governance as a political project towards climate justice.

Parting from the ever-growing importance of Internet in Latin America and the degree in which political institutions, knowledge, genre, and collective action are affected by its use, considerations on the changes in body politics implied in this social practice were introduced. The aim was to raise the issue concerning the importance of these links in the sensibilities' constitution. Consequently, this paper described the existing studies on the links between memory, body politics and cyberspace, depicting the state of the art on body, memory and cyberspace in Latin American social sciences, making a conceptual map on the existing connections between body, memory and emotions, and cyberspace. Then, the diverse methodological approaches were considered. Finally, a possible agenda for Latin American social sciences was configured, making a statement on the need of "emotional memory" approximations due to its links with devices for sensitivities' regulation which result in a pillar for social domination.

Orígenes y dinámica de la producción de publicaciones en co-autoría: El rol de las relaciones personales y la movilidad en la cooperación bilateral entre investigadores argentinos y españoles

La colaboración científica internacional se ha convertido en un elemento clave para la producción de nuevo conocimiento y el notable incremento que registra el número de publicaciones en co-autoría es un reflejo del alcance de este proceso a nivel mundial. Los indicadores comúnmente utilizados para monitorear este proceso son por lo general exclusivamente bibliométricos, sin que exista información relacionada acerca de las motivaciones, las dificultades y los beneficios de esta colaboración desde las perspectivas de sus propios protagonistas institucionales e individuales.

Este trabajo describe los resultados de un estudio reciente acerca de la producción en colaboración bilateral entre Argentina y España, abordada a través de dos estrategias complementarias: un análisis bibliométrico clásico de las publicaciones conjuntas de ambos países registradas en el ISI Web of Science y una encuesta a los propios autores de dichas publicaciones.

Entre los principales hallazgos del estudio se ha detectado que la producción científica en colaboración internacional es, más que el producto de políticas explícitas de internacionalización fomentadas desde las diferentes instituciones y/o países, el emergente de la exitosa iniciativa de individuos que ponen en práctica diferentes acciones para cumplir con determinados objetivos personales. La encuesta permite indagar acerca de los principales motivos que han originado la colaboración bilateral, el impacto que tienen las relaciones profesionales, los vínculos informales y la movilidad académica en la colaboración, los modos de desarrollo del proceso de trabajo en co-autoría y de ejercicio del liderazgo, las expectativas a alcanzar, los problemas que han surgido durante el proceso, las principales vías de financiación y las percepciones de los investigadores con respecto a los resultados obtenidos.

Popular housing in Brazil: From housing market to minha casa minha vida program

A major issue in contemporary major cities, especially in developing countries, is the housing shortage of lower income ranges. In Brazil, the estimated deficit for 2008 was over 5.5 million households, 83% in urban areas. Almost all of the deficit (89,9%) refers to families with incomes up to three minimum wages (circa US$ 1.000,00). Nine major Brazilian metropolitan regions concentrate 27,6% of the deficit. São Paulo Metropolitan Area (SPMA) has a deficit of 504 thousand households.

Popular housing market has been present in São Paulo Metropolitan Area real estate market during last decade. Real estate data shows a significant concentration of units launched in the period between 2000 and 2004. About 24 thousand, or 15% of the new residential units, could be classified as popular housing.

Minha Casa Minha Vida Program (My House My Life Program - MCMV) launched in 2009 had the goal to construct 1 million new houses in Brazil, for families with income up to 10 minimum wages (circa US$ 3,400). In May 2001, was launched the second part of the program that intends to construct 2 million new houses until 2014.

Without doubt, building programs for new housing are important and necessary. The important question that has to be discussed now is if the new housing program is reaching the program target group.

This paper intends to analyze São Paulo Metropolitan Area housing market during the last decade and the impacts of Minha Casa Minha Vida Program in the metropolis popular housing provision. Observing if the program answers the existing housing deficit and what are the characteristics of the new housing developments.

Trabajadores tercerizados y conflictividad laboral en el sector automotriz. Límites y desafíos en términos de representación

El presente trabajo tiene por objetivo el estudio de la tercerización laboral a partir del análisis de aquellos conflictos laborales que, entre los años 2006 y 2010, fueron impulsados por reclamos de trabajadores tercerizados en el sector automotriz.

Nuestro interrogante se orientará hacia la representatividad que logra ejercer el Sindicato de Mecánicos y Afines del Transporte Automotor (SMA-TA) respecto a los trabajadores no sindicalizados. Particularmente, se estudiará el impacto que el resurgimiento del conflicto organizado tiene en los reclamos de aquellos trabajadores que se encuentran afectados por la tercerización laboral. En esta dirección, nuestra pregunta de investigación indagará sobre los desafíos que dichos trabajadores presentan al sindicato en términos de representación.

La conflictividad laboral del sector se abordará a partir de datos provenientes de la Subsecretaría de Programación Técnica y Estudios Laborales (SSPTyEL) del Ministerio de Trabajo de la Nación (MTEySS).

El contexto de los conflictos en Argentina, se enmarca en un proceso de recuperación económica acompañado por la recomposición de las instituciones laborales. Bajo esta tendencia, los sindicatos recobraron espacios perdidos en la década anterior y fortalecieron su presencia en el escenario social, al mismo tiempo que ampliaron su horizonte de representación de la mano de un aumento sostenido del empleo registrado.

La literatura argentina que aborda los temas sindicales de representatividad y organización de trabajadores (Battistini, 2009; Barattini y Wyczykier 2010) utiliza debates que posicionan las prácticas sindicales en la perspectiva de la revitalización sindical (Collier y Etchemendy, 2006; Senén y Haidar, 2009; Atzeni y Ghigliani, 2007). Por otra parte, hay quienes enfatizan en aquellas tendencias que erosionan las relaciones laborales y los espacios de desenvolvimiento de los sindicatos, como ser cómo las estrategias de tercerización adoptadas por las empresas menoscaban los lazos de conciencia colectiva de los trabajadores (Castillo, 2005; Iranzo y Ritche, 2005).

The culture of fear and urban space: Thoughts on the social sensation of insecurity

Urban living and a feeling of insecurity: a paradox. Social groups, established since the dawn of civilization as mechanisms for protection against adversity, in post modern times consist of a source of indetermination. Insecurity. Uncertainty. Fear. It is about the urban ground, a space that is more private than public, the location where insecurity is produced and attempts of formal social control are made. Currently, the fear of personal and professional victimization determines choices for medieval models of urban construction, whereas these same constructions contribute to increasing the sensation of insecurity. Therefore, and first of all, facing the characteristics of this fear, as well as its presence in contemporary urban society, demands one question, first off: can one affirm fear's existence or inexistence? In other words, has there ever been a time in history when civilization has been absolutely disconnected from the sensation of fear? Might it be the propelling force towards a society's evolution or involution? The following argument has been defended: that governmental agencies employ Criminal Law as a formal social control mechanism and instrument for reducing complexity, which, for its part, uses fear as a form of neutralizing its own presence in society. This is the central thesis of punishment's traditional functions, especially general prevention. In other words, the State employs fear of punishment, seeking to inhibit the fear of crime. In this sense, as focus of this paper, fear constitutes a feeling that is invariably inseparable from a sensation: that of danger. It develops as a response to it. Starting from individual experiences, said personal impressions become characteristics of (and common to) several social groups. Subjective experimentation transmutes into collective, and the symbolic effects culminate in characterization of a social group's way of life.

How rational choice has been embedded in institutional change of the main bureaucracies in national security? Has been the Military - as a legitimate political actor during democracy - the main actor behind the institutional change in these bureaucracies in Brazil? And how could one conceptualize (institutional) "change", taking into account the gradualness of civilian control of the Military in Brazil? Pixel bricolage: Machinima and production of digital art

The production of films using videogame's software or hardware and other real-time 3D graphics programs is called machinima. This type of digital cinematic production is characterized by the appropriation of a graphic platform designed for a specific purpose - for example, to play games - for the production of films. In this article we will discuss the production of machinima as a form of digital art. The anthropological and sociological studies on art has shown that its definition is not intra-aesthetic, but part of classificatory schemes that reflect sensibilities both local and collective. With the rise of new digital media in the mid-1980s, significant changes emerged in what we mean by art. Artistic digital media are commonplace in our everyday lives. In the case of machinima, we have new narrative forms and mechanisms of creation that problematize the classical dichotomies between fiction and reality, man and machine, author and spectator, expert and lay knowledge and even art and market. More generally, digital art raises issues about its scope in terms of audience, interactivity and contemplation. The appropriation of multiple elements whose authorship is not readily ascertainable makes problematic the notions of author/artist in this new artistic form, even making us rethink current copyright laws. We suggest, finally, that the use almost artisanal of technological tools that are intended for another purpose approach the machinimist of the bricoleur. And if art shows patterns of thought, we should reflect on what is art today, and on the forms of thought being created on digital arts.

Climate change and environmental governance: The role of environmental non-governmental organizations in Brazil

In the context of climate change (CC) as a socio-environmental theme and of the earth governance, the formulation process of environmental public policies resorts to and assimilates in its discourse knowledge produced and/or disseminated by a number of actors in order to give grounding to decision making. One actor has come to the fore in the environmental debate due to its increasingly prominent role: Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs). There is an assumption that NGOs, as actors in the environmental governance system, are capable of influencing the debate on CC, deploying knowledge and information which lay on the interface between the social sciences and the natural sciences.

This present study aims at discussing the role of NGOs with regard to the construction of political positions of social actors involved with environmental governance taking the dissemination of knowledge on CC as a starting point. This study investigated online databases on the NGOs and the respective websites in order to assess the publications analyzed based on 4 previously established categories. Lastly, the study is mapping possible actor networks established based on the authorship of the publications.

11 Brazilian environmental NGOs were selected as well as 28 publications on CC. There is a clear interest in the Amazon. The theme of mitigation is favored by comparison to themes such as adaptation and vulnerability, which contain more of a social element and have attracted recent interest in Brazil, reflecting an international tendency. In this context, the study on the NGOs is a complex one, which observes the dialogue between the different fields of science; the interests of international demands; and the influence of the knowledge produced on the political position of the many actors in the realm of Earth Governance.

Although the Brazilian government has been promoting the approximation between scientists and enterprises in the area of technological development, very little has been done to facilitate the use of scientific knowledge in policy making processes.

This article intends to discuss the limits and possibilities of utilizing science as a base for political decision making. In order to do that it will analyze the means by which social actors involved with the elaboration of three public measures for biodiversity conservation in the state of Rio de Janeiro (RJ, Brazil) make use of scientific knowledge.

Policy makers involved in the process which established two areas of environmental conservation, and in the formulation of the so-called Atlantic Forest Law to regulate the anthropic activity in the remaining areas of this biome, were interviewed.

At least four configurations of interrelation between the scientific and the political realm were identified: (1) when a politician seeks scientific grounding; (2) when the resort to science is intermediated by technical knowledge which translates scientific knowledge; (3) when scientific knowledge is dismissed for not corresponding to hegemonic political interests; (4) when science is perceived as an additional political field, with a dispute for greater legitimization between different paradigms.

We hope to contribute towards developing a critical argumentation on the linear approach in the formulation of public policies based on scientific evidence and on the model of co-production of knowledge. Thus, we hope to promote and to contribute towards a reflection on the limits and possibilities of bridging the communication gap between science and politics against the backdrop of sustainable development

Inclusión educativa e involucramiento escolar. Perspectivas y acciones en cuatro instituciones estatales de la ciudad de Buenos Aires

Este trabajo presenta algunos resultados de un estudio cualitativo realizado durante el año 2010 en cuatro escuelas secundarias de la ciudad de Buenos Aires, fuertemente comprometidas con la inclusión, permanencia y egreso de sus estudiantes.

La investigación se propuso indagar las iniciativas y modalidades de trabajo impulsadas en escuelas secundarias que cuentan con un denso entramado para sostener la escolaridad de estudiantes provenientes de sectores sociales históricamente excluidos de la escuela secundaria. Asimismo, el estudio apuntó a explorar el involucramiento escolar de los estudiantes, concebido como elemento que favorece la retención en el sistema educativo. Sin desatender las múltiples y complejas razones que explican el abandono de los estudios, el involucramiento escolar contribuiría —en un nivel microsocioal— a mitigar una desigualdad educativa primera: la temprana salida del sistema educativo, que se evidencia en los persistentes y elevados niveles de abandono en los inicios de la carrera escolar secundaria.

Esta presentación explorará cómo se construye el involucramiento emocional y académico de los estudiantes y las iniciativas y modalidades de trabajo institucional que lo promueven. En una primera sección se describe el diseño de investigación y los casos en estudio. Una segunda sección explora la dimensión afectiva y relacional del involucramiento de los jóvenes con la escuela, desde la perspectiva de los estudiantes y los adultos escolares. Por último, se desmenuzan aspectos clave en la construcción del involucramiento académico, analizando las estrategias de enseñanza, evaluación y acreditación de los aprendizajes que logran motivar a los estudiantes positivamente.

El estudio fue realizado por un equipo de la Dirección Operativa de Investigación y Estadística del Ministerio de Educación de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. Se realizaron entrevistas a directivos, asesores pedagógicos, docentes y profesionales, así como entrevistas grupales e individuales a estudiantes de diferentes años de estudio.

Democratisation and creative process: Poem's body on the web

This paper focuses on changes that have effect on poetic creation forms and the poem's body, which, together, contribute to web poetic writing democratisation. Observing the poetry created and shared on the internet one discovers considerable transformations that have been occurring for about twenty years with the interactions that poets have among themselves and between them and their readers, and, especially, with the poem's body. Studying poetry and poets by means of what is shown on the web allows us to reach unusual realities, based on original elements, with new nature, so to speak, more than access to data. Furthermore, the internet establishes realities that reverberate far out of its screens, technologies, languages, habits, leading to a diversity of experiences that, perhaps, was not yet processed with questions and suitable conceptual apparatus, fixed on the singularity of that phenomena. Within that communication, we would like to point, in a preliminary fashion, to some ways through which poets and non poets interact on the internet, evaluating practices linked to poetry. Also, we would like to present some of the new configurations in which poetic creation has been appearing in that support, especially to significant modifications on its body, and, as a consequence, on the poem's image —its silhouette, colour, texture, visual ambience et cetera. We will be concerned with indicating important correlations between propositions made by poets considered as vanguardists and the currently diffuse poetic creation process, which is not based on knowledge of those propositions and poets. Regarding its diffusion, and other characteristics, we call this process "cultural improvisation" —generative, meaning that it is based on what is extensively known as poems; temporal, that is, non eruptive; extensive, namely, non reducible to individual ruptures with established creation models; and as a practice mostly naturalised by the involved social actors.

Health inequalities across europe: Do welfare arrangements make a difference?

A puzzle in comparative health inequality research is the finding that egalitarian welfare states do not necessarily demonstrate narrow health inequalities. This paper interrogates into this puzzle by moving beyond welfare regimes to examine how welfare spending, i.e. spending on social benefits/services and health care, affect educational inequalities in self-rated health across Europe. The research question is how welfare spending — operationalised in four different ways — is related to health inequalities in relative and absolute terms.

The research question is addressed by analyzing data from the 2005 EU Survey of Income and Living Conditions (EU-SILC) which is a survey data base organized by Eurostat. Our sample includes more than 250 000 individuals (133226 women and 117969 men) aged 25-85+ years from 19 European countries. The four operationalizations of welfare spending were gross and net welfare spending as percentage of GDP, and gross and net welfare spending per capita in purchasing power parities. All four measures were adjusted for "need", i.e. the size of the population outside the labour market. The data were analyzed by means of multilevel logistic regression and stratified for gender.

The results show first that welfare expenditures are associated with health inequalities among women, but not among men. Low educated women benefit more from high welfare transfers than middle and high educated women. This means that lower educational inequalities in health — in absolute and relative terms — are linked to higher welfare spending. Next, different operationalisations of welfare spending (i.e. net versus gross, GDP versus per capita) produce very similar outcomes. It appears that a welfare regime approach and an expenditure approach do not necessarily give the same results, and that for women what seem to matter are welfare expenditures, in line with the notion of welfare resources.

Organizing knowledge in an asylum office

This paper draws on my institutional ethnography (IE) study investigating administrative work as practice and is based on participant observation and in-depth interviews with decision making officials of a branch of the Austrian Federal Asylum Office. A vital part of the organization of knowledge in this work context lies in the (re-)production of categories and 'facts' (legalfacts) — thus making administrative work more efficient and cases easier to handle by establishing routines and reducing complexity. The processes of categorization, objectivation and 'factization' are informed by knowledge from various sources, i.a. information, 'facts' and ideology. In this paper I take a look at how these processes — the institutional organization of knowledge and the ideologies involved in the construction of categories and facts — operate in the concerned state agency and shape officials' everyday practices of work. The arguments developed illustrate how ideology informed by formal training as well as informal socialization in the state institution is incorporated in street-level bureaucrats' practices of fact finding and decision-making, but also in their relations to their 'clients', the asylum claimants, e.g. in their practices of interviewing. These questions are of particular interest since officials' practices of decision-making produce important consequences for asylum claimants' future lives.

"Aborto legal, una deuda de la democracia". Aportes para una historia de la lucha por la despenalización y legalización del aborto en la Argentina

Si bien la reivindicación del derecho al aborto ha estado presente en la agenda del movimiento feminista local desde los años 70, no ha ocupado hasta el momento un lugar primordial en la agenda política del país. De aquí que, no sólo la lucha por la legalización del aborto lleve recorrido un largo camino sino también que el movimiento feminista y de mujeres, en tanto movimientos capaces de crear nuevos marcos de interpretación de la realidad social, renueven cotidianamente su compromiso en esta contienda.

Durante la llamada "Segunda Ola" del movimiento feminista de los años sesenta y setenta del siglo XX, la política tradicional se vio conmovida por la irrupción de demandas que politizaban la vida cotidiana. A la lucha por los derechos civiles que aún se nos negaba a las mujeres, se suma "lo personal es político" para denunciar que el poder estaba dentro de la familia, en las relaciones interpersonales, en la sexualidad y no sólo en las (aparentemente más visibles) estructuras político-jurídicas. Para ese mismo período, el movimiento feminista en Argentina se hacía eco de esas demandas y también exigía el acceso al aborto libre y gratuito en un contexto social y políticamente convulsionado que pronto se tornaría represivo para cualquier demanda emancipatoria. El régimen militar instaurado en 1976, así como los años de terror previo, clausuraron cualquier posibilidad de debate y acción, por lo que recién con la vuelta a la democracia, en 1983, el tema comienza a instalarse lentamente.

Nos interesa aquí realizar un ejercicio de historización de la demanda por el derecho al aborto, teniendo en cuenta las distintas estrategias que sus activistas implementaron y que no son ni han sido ajenas tanto al contexto nacional como internacional.

The risks of networking in facebook for the 2012 Mexican national elections

Despite the increasing number of studies on digital technologies, the actual scope of the Internet for creating political discussion and building political support still remains in some areas unexplored by academic research. This paper studies online political participation in the context of the 2012 Mexican presidential campaigns. By analysing the presence of two of the main Mexican parties - Partido Revolucionario Institucional (PRI) and Partido Autonomo Nacional (PAN) – on Facebook, the most popular social website in Mexico, the study shows the importance of pre-existing networks in supporting parties and candidates and the risks of using Facebook Open Groups and Public Profiles for networking. Discourse analysis and network analysis were conducted to show the importance of building up a sense of personal belonging to generate public debates. In line with this idea, special attention is paid to the construction of ephemeral "communities" by recalling shared values and using the presence of hostile outsiders to reinforce the own identity. On the one hand, a network analysis of the Facebook users visiting the parties' pages suggests the importance of existing networks in fostering online participation and the issues created by the use of public groups. On the other hand, a network analysis of interlinked websites demonstrates the instrumental role played by other websites enhancing the debates by supplying content for the discussion and attracting new participants. Finally, the paper presents the unpredictable and sometimes undesired results of using open groups which are created in the need of specific websites to be acknowledged by Facebook's visitors.

Innovative organisation as a social field: Micro-foundations of innovation

Today's challenges companies and consequently society are faced with are directly connected with badly defined internal procedures. The required approach to change organisation's functioning must include a proper understanding of the business and its structures as well as possible ways of innovation. Efficiency should not be seen as a set of functions, departments or products, but as a set of key business processes. Successful path that leads to creation of innovative organisations is a reorganisation of business processes from beginning to end with the use of any available innovative technologies and organisational resources. The first results of the business processes innovations have clearly refuted the initial scepticism. IBM Credit for example has reduced the time of preparing bids for the purchase or lease a computer from seven to one day, while increased the number of prepared bids by ten. Although the competition is global and the tasks are demanding, it is nevertheless crucial fact that internal social, economic, and political institutions, networks and cognitive frames become vital factors in development, and can adapt the effects of the global trends to their benefit. Systems of innovations can be defined and studied as any other social field where numerous formal and informal interactions communications between relevant institutions, networks and cognitive frames are taking place. Innovative processes are social processes and social field can enable or prevent positive responses to global challenges. As such, systems of innovations are a social infrastructure, which companies can utilise in their policy-making efforts to adapt to global trends. Organisations have to take these complex interdependency's and trends into account in formulating their strategic orientations and planning their activities. They are focused towards steering social changes. It is a never-ending activity, as the social topography of the world is continually shaping and reshaping.

The 'horizontal cooperation' and the place of Brazil in Latin American scene: The case of Peruvian university students in Brazil

In recent years, Brazil has gained a place on the international scene and has stood out among the developing countries. One of the strategic points thought by the Brazilian government is the consolidation of higher education and scientific research centers in the country. Since the 50's, scientific output stands as an important item on the governmental agenda, understood as a way to create conditions for a more autonomous economic and intellectual development of the nation. In this sense, the international circulation of Brazilian students to complete their undergraduate and graduate studies was a state policy in order to supply the needs of the Brazilian academy training. From 80 years onwards, Brazil also intensified the investment of resources to attract students from the Global South, particularly South America and sub-Saharan Africa, to conduct their formation in undergraduate and graduate levels. Aiming to strengthen ties with other developing countries, policies like this has been called an example of "horizontal cooperation". It brings the idea that the relationship established by Brazil and other countries in the south would be a more egalitarian relationship than that between north and south countries. The goal of this paper is discuss meaning of 'horizontal' in this kind of international cooperation. As a case study, it will be analyzed the migration of Peruvian students to Brazilian universities. For them, Brazil is not a country in which they hoped to study, but they chose it by its the facilities- in the selection process, in receiving grants, etc- the country provides. This kind of south-south migration helps us to reflect on ways of international relation is manipulated by countries and individuals, in a very complex and dynamic manner.

El desplazamiento de lo político en el teatro post-dictadura: Reconfiguraciones en la experiencia común de lo sensible

Las artes escénicas, a través de una encarnación particular de lo colectivo en su concepción ideal (tanto en la creación, como en la recepción y en el imaginario representado) han asistido a un proceso de sublimación como arte político por excelencia en la medida que proporcionan operaciones de reconfiguración de la experiencia común de lo sensible (Rancière, 2010). El teatro en el cono sur de América Latina (Argentina, Chile y Uruguay) durante el período de la dictadura militar, representó un enclave fundamental para el desarrollo de esta concepción romántica del arte como experiencia a la vez estética y al mismo tiempo emancipadora.

El objetivo de este trabajo es analizar las intersecciones entre teatro y política en dos períodos diferentes: el final de la dictadura militar y la restauración democrática. A partir de entrevistas a creadores teatrales y análisis de obras realizados en Uruguay para la primer etapa de la investigación, y siguiendo los debates actuales de la sociología del arte que instan a integrar la particularidad de las obras (el nivel estético del arte) en el análisis sociológico, abordaremos tres cuestiones centrales: (a) como se reconfigura la concepción de "lo político" en las producciones teatrales de un contexto al otro, (b) qué particularidades proporciona la experiencia teatral a nivel cognitivo y sensorial que alimentan la idea romántica de la emancipación a través del arte, (c) y finalmente, cómo contribuyeron los mencionados aspectos a la creación de un espacio escénico de resistencia en la transición democrática en esta región del continente.

Transnational activism and national affinities: Building cross-sectoral solidarity in global justice movements Solidarity is a crucial foundation of cooperation among activists. Solidarity seems simple where activists are socially, culturally, and geographically close. This is why studies on transnational social movements have invested much energy into explaining how solidarity emerges across geographical distance and social and cultural differences. However, also in national contexts there are differences to be bridged. Drawing on the assumption that transnational social movements crucially depend on successful cooperation between different movement sectors within a country (e.g. Unions, NGOs, Churches, Social Centres), the paper focuses on cross-sectoral solidarity building in national contexts. More specifically, it examines the role of collective action in building cross-sectoral solidarity, transnational protests in particular. Based on interviews with activists of the Global Justice Movements in Italy, Germany, and Poland the analysis shows 1) how national solidarity frames are invigorated during transnational protests, both on the basis of the national delegation's shared experiences as well as boundaries drawn to other delegations; and 2) how such reifications of difference interact with (and not necessarily block) transnational solidarity building. Considering the different dimensions of solidarity – internal processes & boundary drawing, national & transnational levels – provides interesting insights into processes of solidarity building as well as into national bases of transnational activism.

'We're moving – Like it or not': Tenant driven research on forced relocation and social mix

This paper reports on a study exploring the experience of forced relocation to new mixed income neighbourhoods, developed and conducted by public tenants in Western Sydney who have themselves been affected by relocations. Residents' Voices is a partnership involving university researchers and local tenant organisations in several cities in Australia and the US. which aims to recast debate on redevelopment and deconcentration of public housing from the perspective of tenants' lived experience and right to place. This particular project emerged from a Residents' Voices forum discussion amongst tenants who believed that much more could be learned by tenants exploring mutual experiences than through investigation by external researchers.

Tenants' experiences and perceptions of the benefits and disbenefits of moving, which might encompass: the quality of housing and neighbourhood services; empowerment or disempowerment; dislocation and re-establishment of social ties and networks; and the experience of stigma, are being explored through mutual storytelling as well as photo-elicitation and other visual methods. Stories, pictures and analysis of local participants' experiences can then be shared via a purpose-built website (residentsvoices.net) established to facilitate communication, collective theorising and organising by tenants across sites in both countries where redevelopment and relocations aimed at changing social mix are currently or have recently occurred.

Residents' Voices is based on the premise that conventional academic and policy research on so-called 'excluded' communities is itself inherently exclusionary and so seeks to allow and encourage tenants to form and pursue their own questions about social mix, amongst other things. The paper will reflect on the value and efficacy of the collaborative participatory approach and its potential to open a new debate about these issues.

Housing rights and residents' voices in the marketplace of ideas

Public housing represents a diminishing part of the urban landscape and the urban policy agenda, and struggles over its future have rarely been framed in terms of a 'right to the city' (until recently, see Right to the City Alliance 2010). Nonetheless, de-concentration and social mix projects bring into relief all the key interests and forces at work in contemporary neoliberal urbanization. In the first part of this paper we illustrate the demise of the trope of citizenship rights in the housing arena. Housing authorities have typically deployed social inclusion and poverty reduction discourses to justify redevelopment while 'an increasingly entrepreneurially minded local state apparatus' (Harvey 2008) has invited private capital to not only rebuild the physical fabric, but to remake the social relations around public tenancy within the trope of consumerism. Drawing on a case study of a 'mixed tenure' redevelopment in Western Sydney, we outline the effects on tenant collectivism and self-organising where a private consortium was contracted by government to manage all aspects including physical redevelopment, tenancy management, tenant consultation and participation, and even to provide a tenant advocacy service.

We report on a project which seeks to reassert the political subjectivity of public tenants by changing the scale and medium of organising. Residents' Voices is a partnership involving university researchers and local tenant organisations in several cities Australia and the US. The paper will report on the project's use of new media technologies and a tenant-driven website (residentsvoices.net) to recast debate on redevelopment and deconcentration of public housing from the perspective of tenants' lived experience and right to place.

Strategy of conservation of environment in global era

Strategy of Conservation of Environment in Global Era Introduction Environment is the complex aggregate of external condition which affect the life development and survival of organism. It embraces air, water, land, flora, fauna and many other factors. It is made of bio – physical and socio economic elements. Environment and people have reciprocal relationship. Environmental degradation seriously threatens economic and social progress, environment, ecology and development must be balanced to meet the need of the society making provision for future generation. So the pollution free air, pure water should be the primary concern for environmentalist and economist. Conservation is defined as management of human use of the natural resources in the biosphere, so that they may yield the greatest sustainable benefits to the present generation while maintaining the potential to meet the needs and aspirations of the future generation. This brings into play the concept of sustainable management of natural resources. Objectives o To define and clarify the concept of environment. o To examine the causes of environmental degradation. o To identify the burning effect due to deterioration of environment. o To exhibit the legal framework for conservation of environment. o To quote the suggestions for sustainable strategy for environment conservation for future generation. Conclusion The developed countries like USA, USSR, Brazil etc. are more responsible for environmental degradation than that of developing and under developed countries. Both GATT and WTO at global level are very much concerned to environmental degradation. Though several meetings and conferences have been held at national and global level, still much political, economy and scientific instruments must be devised for protecting the environment in order to have sustainable conservation of environment. Successful aging: A socio psychological prospective

Introduction: Aging is a series of transition that begins with life and continues throughout the life cycle. It is influenced by the biological as well as the sociological and cultural factors. A successful person with his aging learns to maintain a good balance between these factors.

Successful aging is something beyond health and longevity. The term successful aging appears paradoxical, as traditionally aging brings to mind, images of loss, decline and ultimate death, where as success is represented by achievement.

Objectives

- To find out the problems due to aging.
- To study the factors those cause these problems.
- To study the methods of tackling.
- To access the effects of their handling problems on others.
- To find out the consequences of successful aging.
- Improve their successfulness.

Conclusion

Healthy is not only related to the advances in medical technology but also related to the interaction of a wide range of social factors such as maintaining and enhancing physical and cognitive functions, being fully involved in the society, leading a stimulating and productive life, living in a stable environment and having meaningful personal relationships. Lastly according to Sir James Sterling Ross, 'You do not heal old age. You protect it, you promote it, and you extend it'.

Communicating power: Technological innovation and social change in the past, present and futures

This project examines how communication technologies have contributed to changes in the structure of societies, and hence to the distribution of political power, in the past, and at present, and in four alternative futures. Our research moves from the advent of writing on oral societies through the utilization of new media in various contemporary social movements with an eye towards articulating the role of technology as a driver of social change across historical contexts. We elucidate the means by which communication and networking technologies perpetuate and/or disrupt the normative power relations within various socio-cultural contexts. We outline a working theory of power that draws on a multidisciplinary corpus with sensitivity to the variety of socio-cultural conceptions of power and the means by which social relations can and might transform systems of governance. While the historical and theoretical context for our work is a crucial part of our research, the unique contribution our project offers from a sociological perspective stems from the creation of four plausible alternative future(s) scenarios using Futures Studies' techniques, particularly the Manoa School scenario modeling method, as a lens to reflect upon issues within the present in addition to those that can and might surface in the futures of democracy as well as other forms of governance. Using four urban centers (Honolulu, Melbourne, Los Angeles, and Dhufai) as sites of engagement for four alternative futures (growth, disciplined, collapse, and transform), our project offers an engaged point of entry from which to examine the potentialities of climate change, economic inequality, and numerous other socio-political issues that (have and) will come to define life in the 21st century. Our fundamental research aim, then, is to pluralize the future as a means to stimulate discourse on the preferred futures of power relations.

Food, science and healthy labels

Most recently, the focus on health has featured more explicitly in the food industry's strategies in the global market. Front-of-pack stamps that are used to indicate "healthy" products, inspired by nutritional recommendations from national and international health institutions, can be found among the latest innovations within this health trend. The "Healthy Choice" stamp created by dutch companies Unilever and Friesland Campina in 2007 is taken as example of one of the major stamps that promote "healthy" foods currently on the market. The "Healthy Choice" stamp has created its own nutritional standards inspired by the World Health Organization's (WHO) dietary advice. This paper proposes that the "Healthy Choice" stamp can be studied as an artifact that promotes a particular definition of what a "healthy" food is that rivals against other definitions such as those presented in the certification of organic foods, GMO free, etc... The paper takes an anti-essentialist perspective in relation to artifacts following authors such as Bijker, Latour and Callon, so as to argue that the stamp does not necessarily have a single use or promotes a "healthy" quality that can be simply taken as a given. This "healthy" quality at issue is achieved through a qualification process: "behind" the stamp there's a network of associations that involves all sorts of actors such as food companies, certification organizations, laboratories, experts, scientific articles, nutritional standards – all of which strive to create the "healthy" quality that the "Healthy Choice" stamp engenders. This paper proposes to take the "Healthy Choice" stamp as an example to discuss wider issues such as: by looking at the characteristics of this certification network established by The Choices Programme, how are food qualities constructed through processes of qualification (Callon) and how these kind of stamps connect local consumer practices to the global food market.

Operationalizing climate change reflexivity: New insights into social response

Several conceptual models have served as the mainstay of attitudinal and behavioural research on environmental risks, including climate change for several decades. While important findings have accumulated, this largely empirical project has not incorporated several theoretical advances in sociology, particularly renewed interest in agency, as expressed by a vibrant literature on reflexivity. As is often the case in sociology, there would appear to be an untapped opportunity for synergy between sociological theories that tend not to problematize social relationships with the natural world, and environmental sociologists who focus precisely on those relationships. We have attempted to breach one particular divide, by developing a survey intended to apply Margaret Archer's theory of reflexivity to individual-level problematization of climate change. The survey was implemented among two discrete populations in Alberta, Canada. One consists of residents of forest-based communities who are both particularly sensitive to the impacts of climate change, and in a position to personally observe those impacts. The other consists of residents of Alberta's two major cities, Edmonton and Calgary. Both of these populations are situated within a Province which has hinged its future economic wellbeing on the development of unconventional oil, which is associated with a higher intensity of greenhouse gas emissions than conventional oil. The province, furthermore, has been a staunch opponent of internationally-coordinated mitigation efforts. As postulated by reflexivity theory, we find that several internal reflexive predispositions have bearing on levels of concern that are not readily explained by socio-structural or social-psychological characteristics. The results confirm the value of continued efforts to understand individual and collective responses to climate change through the lens of reflexivity, while at the same time highlighting the advances that can be made to reflexivity theory with more concerted attention to societies' integral relations with the natural world.

Dance and biography: Or why should a biographical researcher be interested in tango?

This paper is situated in the emerging field of the sociology of popular dance, a field which explores the relevance of dance in people's everyday lives, its significance in the construction of identity, and its entanglements with power, and subversion. Taking the recent craze of Argentinean tango as a case in point, I argue that sociologists should not – as is perhaps our first inclination – dismiss dance as a frivolous leisure activity of little scholarly importance. I will show that tango has much to offer for biographical research. It can help us understand the role of passion in people's everyday lives, the possibilities for agency which subcultures provide, as well as enable us to explore the complicated intersections of gender, class, ethnicity and national belonging which emerge when embodied social practices transverse national and cultural borders to become global phenomena.

Institution building to prefigure sacred societies and states: The Muslim brotherhood in Egypt, Shas in Israel, Comunione e Liberazione in Italy, and the Salvation Army in the U.S.

Across the world today, religiously orthodox, "fundamentalist" movements of Christians, Jews, and Muslims have converged on a common strategy to install their faith traditions in societies and states that they see as alarmingly secularized. Many scholars, political observers, and world leaders, especially since September 11, 2001, see this shared line of attack as centered on armed struggle or terrorism. Political scientists and sociologists of politics and social movements also focus on strategies that directly engage or confront the state through petitions, boycotts, lobbying, mass rallies, and general strikes. In this paper, however, we show that the strategy-in-common of the most prominent and successful religiously orthodox movements is not terrorism or solely direct engagement of the state but a patient, beneath-the-radar takeover of civil society that we call "bypassing the state." One institution at a time, the most prominent orthodox movements have built massive, grassroots networks of autonomous, religion-based social service agencies, hospitals and clinics, clubs, schools, charitable organizations, old and media outlets, worship centers, and businesses—networks that we argue constitute "states within states," "surrogate states," or "parallel societies." In this paper we show how four religiously orthodox movements—the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, the Sephardi Torah Guardians or Shas in Israel, Comunione e Liberazione in Italy, and the Salvation Army in the U.S.—use this institution-building strategy to prefigure new societies and states with religion at their core. These grassroots institutional networks allow skeptics to "try on" what life might be like if the movement's ideology and agendas were put into practice, encourage comparison with often ineffective, corrupt, or indifferent current governments, and empower followers as they work to bring the movement's ideology into reality.

Compromiso democrático y ciudadanía: Un vínculo erosionado?

Gran parte del compromiso democrático por parte de los ciudadanos se basa en la percepción de que la democracia como sistema de gobierno contribuye al bienestar general e individual, y que cada ciudadano participa con su voto en los asuntos públicos, pudiendo influir en decisiones gubernamentales (votando al candidato triunfador) o al control del gobierno (si vota candidatos no triunfadores).

La erosión del compromiso democrático ha sido una particularidad del proceso argentino nacido en 1983, luego de un siglo de alternancia entre gobiernos militares y gobiernos elegido mediante elecciones. Esta erosión se manifiesta por dos vías: la apatía ciudadana, y la desconfianza en políticos e instituciones.

En la apatía ciudadana, los ciudadanos retiran su interés por "cosa pública", mediante la abstención electoral y la desconexión informativa y performativa. En éste caso, los sujetos abandonan su vínculo con la política, ya no están "al tanto" de las cosas que pasan, y la política deja de ser parte de su cotidianeidad

El retiro de la confianza de los ciudadanos en las instituciones introduce una creencia que marcaría una ruptura en los modelos representativos. "Los políticos" habrían abandonado el interés general y el voto no contribuiría más al cambio social, debido a que la clase política reconstruiría su agenda más allá de las promesas electorales.

En la ponencia que aquí se presenta se desarrollará el problema planteado mediante el análisis de veinte entrevistas en profundidad realizadas a ciudadanos del Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires en 2011, para analizar las dimensiones subjetivas del compromiso democrático. Simultáneamente se procederá a indagar los resultados de una encuesta de opinión efectuada en la misma área en 2011, buscando establecer desde un enfoque cuantitativo las disposiciones de los ciudadanos en cuanto al problema planteado, identificando a los sectores más permeables a poner en duda el compromiso democrático.

Imagining another world. The role of language and political imagination in shaping a transnational movement of movements

Over the past ten years the World Social Forum (WSF) has turned into one of the most important points of aggregation for social movements worldwide. In order to bind different potential and current participants into the WSF, the Forum's organisers have devised a political language that is meant to establish a worldwide "communicative web" a key feature of which is the imagination of a future beyond neoliberalism and towards a "new possible world". The political language in question thus revolves around

1. The verbal construction of a symbolic aim around which a movement is supposed to coalesce;
2. The formulation of a "world-view", i.e. a key to interpreting events as well as political and economic relationships;
3. The construction of a symbolic "stage" on which the symbolic aim conjoins with the image or interpretation of the "movement of movements" that the organisers aim to transmit.

More precisely, these features take the form of

- a) A verbal and symbolic construction of "another possible world" with significant references to the "future" as a symbolic watershed between the neoliberal world and the desired world;
- b) A description of the neoliberal world and its opposition to different forms of political and economic integration and cooperation;
- c) An assessment of the present and planning of the future of the WSF as an event, as a network, and as an organisation;
- d) A WSF "Territory" as a symbolic anticipation of a future form of political life.

The paper aims to detail these different symbolic features by means of a qualitative and quantitative content analysis of the documents available at the WSF's website. These include both the organisers' foundational documents and a representative selection of the recorded debates that have taken place at the WSF throughout its history.

Environmental services as a means of benefit sharing in national park management in Brazil

The challenges of benefit sharing commitments of the Biological Diversity Convention demand new approaches concerned with environmental services and its implementation strategies connected to protected areas management.

The Biological Diversity Convention opportunities linked to environmental services may be translated through market mechanisms aiming to promote local development and benefit sharing from biodiversity use. These opportunities refer to ecosystem goods and services, such as nature based products, which are provided on sustainable basis, encompassing natural and cultural heritage products and services.

Brazilian national legislation approach considers environmental services as flows of matter, energy and information from natural capital stock, which combined with the services and human capital building, deliver benefits to the society.

Because of its distributive income potential and consequent benefit sharing possibility, environment services payment cannot only be an important biodiversity conservation strategy, but also social inclusion.

This can be especially true in the case of national parks which, in the Article 11 of the National System of Conservation Units (9985/2000), have the objective of the preservation of ecosystems of great natural scenic beauty and ecological importance, however, allowing scientific research, environmental education and interpretation activities, recreation and ecological tourism.

The importance of environmental services connected to park management is justified not only by their possibility to promote biodiversity conservation, but also by their potential to balance social exclusion processes that result from the restrictions of local ways of living in these areas. It is acknowledgeable that the interdiction of human populations in park areas represent significant source of conflict which contributes to the resistance to the park as well as its interpretation as an obstacle to local development.

The present article will discuss possible ways that environmental services connected to park management can be translated as a means to balance the social exclusion generated by in the process of biodiversity conservation.

La música grabada y su formato digital: Transformaciones en la industria discográfica Brasileña

El objetivo de este trabajo es presentar e debatir los resultados preliminares de una investigación acerca de los cambios recientes en la producción discográfica, en particular la brasileña. Se trata, específicamente, de analizar críticamente las tendencias de valorización y desvalorización de la música grabada en la forma de mercancía a partir de un nuevo modelo de negocios adoptado por las majors (grandes transnacionales del disco): la llamada "música digital".

A lo largo del siglo XX, las majors concentraron en su esfera las condiciones de producción de aparatos técnicos y contenidos musicales. En este contexto, era imposible escuchar música sin la mediación de soportes físicos, de los discos. Sin embargo, el reciente desarrollo de las tecnologías digitales dio lugar a profundas transformaciones en la forma de acción de diversos sectores de la industria cultural, como el discográfico, lo que llevó a la ruptura en el control estricto que las empresas tenían, hasta ese momento, de la circulación comercial de las creaciones musicales ancladas en medios materiales. El disco, que tuvo un papel hegemónico en las ventas de las empresas discográficas, actualmente divide su espacio con la "música digital".

Por lo tanto, es posible percibir que la música grabada en formato digital concentra parte de su circulación comercial en las "pistas", aisladas de lo que se concibe por "álbum". ¿Qué cambios ocurren en el perfil de la producción y edición musical cuando se decide a vender música grabada de esta manera, ya que la unidad del disco pierde su centralidad? ¿Cuáles son los significados de estas transformaciones, como un proceso social de producción de música-mercancía, mediante el aislamiento de las pistas de música? ¿Qué implicaciones estéticas, en el nivel de los sentidos (en la creación y escucha musicales), la industria discográfica (y su carácter eminentemente heterónomo) es capaz de pautar?

Crime live! Representations about crimes and criminals in the newspapers in state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil

The research aims to question the representations of crime and criminal fact present in the main newspapers in state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil. Specifically, was realized a mapping of the content and the way news is broadcast in three major newspapers in the state, considering what the crimes are reported, where the space devoted to such news in the papers and how these facts are covered by the press. From these questions, the study aims to verify how the approach is given in stories about crime and how these elements are present. For data collection, was created an instrument containing several indicators, with which was collected information about the juridical and political discourses and news of the crimes published in the newspaper Zero Hora, Correio do Povo and Diário Gaúcho in April 2011. The newspapers was considered in its entirety, representing the file of the research as a corpus for analysis. Rather than initially thought, the data indicate that the reports of crimes are not limited to police editorial of newspapers, but are scattered throughout the issue. Thus, the police editorial brings the news about the "violent crime", traditionally selected by the criminal justice system, while other crimes are placed in other sections, by the legal right involved or by authorship attributed to it. The investigation concludes that newspapers create "crime waves" by bringing together crimes that normally have no relation to each other as interconnected events, thus contributing to the construction of fear and social insecurity. The analysis found that the form of sensationalism and journalistic approach in the cases in study vary according to the newspaper and the location where the news was published.

To be a candidate in Brazil: Towards a new legal profession?

This proposal is one of the results of a research on Rio de Janeiro State School of Magistracy (called EMERJ). Two data sources will be considered: (1) nine focus groups with about approximately sixty EMERJ students in May 2009 and September 2011, and (2) a census-type research on 750 files of all students active at the EMERJ on mid 2009.

Unlike most of the professional schools, especially in continental tradition, the main activity of EMERJ is to be a preparation course. Lasting three years, EMERJ prepares at once nearly seven hundred students to the magistracy's admission examination. Actually, EMERJ acts inside a huge preparation market, once the access to legal public work is done almost only by bureaucratically selected civil servants, well paid and stable.

Numerous legal careers may only be started following the success on a public competition examination. Not only the judges, but also all the public attorneys, state and legal aid lawyers are organized into bureaucratic corps. Brazil additionally counts with one of the highest number of law schools in the world, and an "army" of law graduates, which in great number seek a public legal career.

The point this proposition wants to stress, based on the collected data in the EMERJ case, is the creation of a new socio-professional group: the candidates. Driven by a very competitive and morally hostile routine, several young lawyers spend many years of their lives preparing to different examinations simultaneously, on a full time basis.

Social justice in the courts of the Macau SAR, China

Despite being part of the Chinese territory, the Macau Special Administrative Region (SAR) has its own legal and judicial systems which are highly separated from the ones of the Chinese mainland. As a development of an investigation about the judiciary of Macau, this text intends to present a portrait of Macau's two highest courts based on how their judges have been deciding relevant cases concerning rights of immigrants, workers and the right of government officials to block the entry in Macau of certain "undesirables". The two highest courts are the Court of Final Appeal and the Court of Second Instance of Macau. As the world's number one gambling region, the minuscule Macau has gained great notoriety in the recent years and has attracted people from all origins and walks of life. A main question to be answered in this paper is what political and social roles those courts are playing during this period when China has regained sovereignty over Macau, although with limitations that shall last at least until 2050. An overall presentation of Macau's main characteristics will be made so that the discussion about those courts' decisions can be related to a larger context, which includes specific features of Macau's politics, culture and society.

We are the canary in a coal mine - Establishing a disease category and a new health risk

This paper analyses the process of establishing a risk object – electromagnetic fields (EMF) – to examine risk categorisation as such and how individual and collective attempts to establish a new risk interact with health policy. We study people who claim to suffer from electrohypersensitivity (EHS). We conducted participant observation and repeated interviews with 18 EHS sufferers and interviewed representatives of 'patient' organisations and health policy-makers in the Netherlands. In their attempts to trace particular outcomes (EHS) to a specific risk factor (EMF), we observed EHS sufferers assembling complaints and complainants into a single illness category, distinguishing 'real' from 'fake' cases, and turning to measurement and experiments to show that others are at risk. Although EHS sufferers mimic scientific practices, they have thus far failed to have their illness recognised. To non-sufferers, EHS remains a psychosomatic condition. This entails a dual failure for EHS sufferers: they suffer from medically unexplained symptoms while identifying with a politically and medically unrecognised label. This very failure, however, provides perceived legitimacy for political activism: while they have failed to establish EMF as a risk, their suffering is increasingly recognised. This partial recognition, we argue, is an attempt to depoliticise the issue.

Mon hypothèse principale pose que les populismes réellement existants sont forcés de appauvrir le sens traditionnel, et plus ou moins établi, de ce concept, à cause notamment de la nécessité d'insérer la figure de leader et de lui assigner le rôle d'énonciateur privilégié du "démocratique" en toute circonstance. La communication fera appel aux exemples de Hugo Chávez en Venezuela, Néstor et Cristina Kirchner en Argentine, Luiz Inacio Lula de Acosta et Rafael Correa. Ontological politics in practice: Understanding antagonistic framings of GMOs, science, and the public in Flanders

In 2011, a consortium of scientists and a multinational company conducted the first GMO field trial in Flanders (northern Belgium) since a decade. This field trial, which involved potatoes that were genetically modified to attain resistance to phytophthora infestans, triggered antagonistic public protests. Opponents of the trial advocated its destruction, in response to which a coalition of scientists instigated a public campaign to 'save our science'. This paper studies how coalitions of proponents and opponents of (the freedom to conduct) the trial framed the GMO trial, and each others' stakes in it. Based on analyses of grey literature and 16 semi-structured interviews with key stakeholders from all coalitions, the paper argues that the coalitions were actively involved in an ontological politics centring on the performativity of the field trial. These politics turned the GMO field trial into a 'fire object' that ontologically changed as it moved from one epistemic assemblage to another. The paper concludes that this ontological – rather than epistemological – discontinuity hindered a public debate on two core issues underlying protests against the trial: the socio-political embeddedness of scientific knowledge, and a scientific culture of handling non-knowledge. As a result, the different coalitions missed opportunities to enhance mutual reflexivity, not only or principally concerning the pros and cons of socio-technical innovations as GMOs, but more fundamentally concerning the social position of post-sovereign science.

Alcohol use among recent Latino immigrants before and after immigration to the United States

Background: U.S. born Latinos have higher rates of alcohol use than Latinos who have immigrated to the U.S. However, little is known about pre-immigration drinking patterns of Latino immigrants and whether alcohol use rates change during post-immigration life in the U.S. This longitudinal study compares regular, binge, and heavy alcohol use patterns of young adult Latino immigrants 90-days prior to immigration with post-immigration alcohol use patterns. Methods: Data on alcohol use prior to immigration were retrospectively collected from 527 Latino immigrants living in the U.S. for 12 months or less with the intention of staying for two or more years. Follow-up assessments of 415 participants occurred between their second and third years of living in the U.S.; yielding 79% retention rate for this hard to reach population. Results: Regular alcohol use patterns prior to immigration were statistically equivalent to that of post-immigration reports. Binge alcohol use (5 or more drinks on the same occasion during the past 90 days) significantly declined during the post-immigration period, particularly for Latina women. Heavy alcohol use (5 or more drinks on the same occasion on each of 5 or more days during the past 90 days) also significantly decreased. Discussion: Results suggest a need for continued exploration of the pre-immigration drinking patterns of Latinos in the U.S. Findings also inform our conceptual understanding of Latino immigrant health [e.g., health immigrant effect] while suggesting the need for more research to uncover underlying factors associated with declines in rates of problematic alcohol use after immigration.

Digital skills as a conditioning factor for digital political participation

In a political context in which the Internet is becoming increasingly important as a tool for participation, academia is starting to enquire about the factors that facilitate engaging in digital political practices. Among these factors, those inherent to the digital nature of said practices are especially important. In this paper we seek to understand how the digital skills of Internet users influence their Digital Political Participation. Following the researchers of the second-level digital divide and digital inequality, we have operationalised the digital skills construct in terms of competence in the use of the Internet and level of appropriation of this tool by users. Through the study "Internet and Political Participation" of the Centro de Investigaciones Sociológicas we tested, firstly, the goodness of the items chosen to measure these two dimensions. Secondly, we looked into their influence on Digital Political Participation. The results are framed within the Democratic Divide theory.

Notes for a sociological theory of community (Analyzing the dimensions of an endless discussion)

The concept of community has always been one of the most powerful focuses of discussion throughout the history of sociological theory. In different traditions and perspectives that have developed over more than one and a half century of theoretical reflections, community has gone through the most diverse interpretations, critiques and recoveries. Particularly, in recent times, the emergence of "communitarian" discourses in different social areas -most of them outside the academic field-, has led us to rethink its characteristics and foundations.

Therefore, moving forward towards the construction of a "sociological theory on community" becomes imperative. This should not lead to the reduction of community to a number of concluding definitions, or to the formulation of a monolithic approach. On the contrary, it implies to identify and characterize the analytic dimensions that cross it over. These dimensions allow us to outline two research goals: 1) to reinterpret the various elaborations of sociological theory on community, pointing out tensions, contradictions and contributions; 2) to create a body of reflections that seek to contribute to increase the complexity and comprehension of community, both for sociological theory and for empirical studies. In order to do this, we will look into four central analytical dimensions of the concept of community: as an abstract ideal type of social relationships; as a historical antecedent of modern society; as a political utopia or horizon for social intervention; and as the ontological substrate of every sociality.

Universal health care: For whom?

The discussion toward on how to guarantee a just health public system presented in this paper rely on the Brazilian public health system experience. It is known that the public institutions and policies are crucial to decrease inequalities in health and the social inequalities behind them. The main definition of health in "SUS" (Sistema Único de Saúde), the Brazilian health public system, is that health is a universal right that seeks the well-being and which provision is responsibility of the state and of each citizen, what, at least theoretically, means that all Brazilian citizen has the right to be healthy and have access to public healthcare and social services, mainly the ones whose have an important impact on populations health. The main point is that the reality is far from this definition, on one hand, the public system has low quality and is for the majority of the population, and on the other hand, only the minority has access to health services of high quality offered for both, by the market and even by the public services (when high complexity healthcare is necessary).

By considering the real-world challenges faced for the Brazilian society and the design of public Brazilian institutions that impact on population health, this paper intend to provide the discussion towards how to get a just public healthcare system from empirical and theoretical elements that allows the understanding of the actual problems to implement the system proposal and how the relation between the public and the market aims has influence on the system results.

The approach here considers that the understand of health must rely on a broad concept concerned with the social determinants and the socio-economic gradient of health, since health is thought as a good of a moral importance, essential for a just society.

A individualização na interseção entre as desigualdades sociais e escolares no contexto da modernização Brasileira

Diante da intrínseca relação entre modernização e educação escolar, o objetivo do estudo ora apresentado é compreender, a partir de uma análise teórica, os processos de individualização, conforme perspectiva de Danilo Martuccelli, na interseção entre as desigualdades sociais e escolares constituídas ao longo da modernização brasileira, principalmente a partir de 1930.

Adotar a perspectiva da individualização significa descentralizar a análise do processo de socialização para colocar em foco os grandes mecanismos históricos e econômicos que contribuem para a configuração dos processos educacionais da forma como eles se apresentam na contemporaneidade.

Para tanto, foram realizadas leituras de diversos autores brasileiros cujos estudos se voltam para a compreensão das peculiaridades do processo de modernização do referido país, e aqueles que abordaram a sociologia da educação a partir da década de 30. Em seguida, buscou-se tensionar as teorias a partir das discussões de Danilo Martuccelli levando em consideração, principalmente, o conceito de individualização.

Através desse trabalho foi possível perceber como a educação contribuiu, em cada época, de diferentes maneiras, para a produção dos indivíduos em cada época e local, além da compreender as mediações existentes entre as desigualdades sociais e escolares, tais como, no passado, a posição social e, na contemporaneidade, o capital econômico.

Cine y biografías políticas: La política de la imagen y la construcción biográfica de los personajes políticos en la filmografía de Silvio Tendler

A partir de una reflexión sobre el uso de la película de género documental en la construcción de figuras políticas, se busca una lectura sociológica de las imágenes, historias personales y del discurso contenido en la filmografía del cineasta brasileño Silvio Tendler. Así, a partir de un análisis de las principales películas de su carrera, se refleja sobre las representaciones creadas en torno de la selección de imágenes, la historia de vida y de los cortes y énfasis en el discurso de personalidades políticas biografadas por Tendler, entre ellos dos ex presidentes de Brasil, João Goulart y Kubitschek, en las películas de 1980 y 1984. Se comprueba que, en el discurso político de los personajes elegidos, el director inmortaliza no el personaje, sino la narración, y por lo tanto hace uso de fragmentos del discurso y de la línea narrativa contenida en la imagen para garantizar al espectador la visión sobre una realidad estructurada por el discurso de la personalidad biografada y la montaje de las imágenes. Para el enfoque propuesto, el centro de poder de la representación política se encuentra en el ejercicio del director como creador de discursos, representaciones y drama escenificado, utilizando de la política de la imagen, de los escenarios de representación creados, recursos dramáticos y del apelo al imaginario social para la construcción del personaje biografado para el espectador. En tiempos en que películas de biografías y políticos son géneros populares, la pertinencia del debate sobre el cine político de uno de los primeros cineastas brasileños a hacer biografías en el cine se convierte en una discusión acerca de la construcción de biografías y ideologías políticas a partir de los recursos característicos del cine y del consumo de un género cada vez mayor de la industria cultural.

Transition without intervention? - Multiple arenas and the impact of the domestic and external variables in the contemporary processes of democratization

This study examines the role played by the domestic and external variables inside the democratic transitions processes in the twenty-first century. The internal variables are demonstrated by the economic development, political stability, ethnic, religious and cultural diversity, historical background and mobilization of the civil society, while the external factor is expressed by the use of military force from abroad. For this purpose, it scrutinizes the democratization cases of Afghanistan and Iraq, where the North American intervention was essential for the change of the political regime. Subsequently, the revolutions in Tunisia and Egypt are analyzed under the same variables, concluding that the external intervention is necessary in contexts where the citizens are ethnically and religiously heterogeneous, since this arena of popular conflict hinders the organization of the civil society in order to establish a democratic system.

Addressing policies and programs for the improvement of poor neighborhoods in Brazil: Opportunities and challenges in the case of ZEIS in Recife

The urban population has grown at an unprecedented rate, and numerous studies reported the failure of markets and the state to meet the growing demand for housing for the vast majority of the urban poor who are unable to afford quality housing. One way or another, this has negatively affected the quality of life of people in their housing environment. In Brazil, this situation is no different, and is very similar to other Latin American countries. However, there is this broad claim in Brazil that housing is a need but also a right, guaranteed by the Brazilian Constitution of 1988. However, the trajectory of this achievement took place over many disputes and attempts to resolve the problem, in part, outlined in this paper. The failures of state interventions in the provision of housing for the low-income sector until the 1980s have been well documented and will not be the direct addressed in this analysis. This article discusses the challenges and opportunities found in the policies and programs for the improvement of the neighborhoods in Brazil, pointing out the limits found between the gaps on their discourse and practice, and gives an emphasis on the case of ZEIS in Recife.

The objective of this research is to understand why, in spite of opening up opportunities favorable policies, the homosexual movement did not achieve the expected success, although it has produced new repertoires of action in the following decades. The central hypothesis is that the moment of political opening given in ANC 1987-1988 produced a set of interactions of competition of resources between the homosexual movement, counter-demonstrations and other social movements such as the black movement, trade union and women that interfered with the construction of strategies of the Brazilian Homosexual Movement and consequently the results of mobilization. The competition for political allies and space in the public agenda had framed the initiatives and strategies of the homosexual movement. The need for consolidation of the democratization rhetoric undermined the efforts of the homosexual movement in building broad coalitions in support of their demands. The cooperation and conflict between these political actors have determined the course of construction of the concept of "sexual orientation" and the discursive strategies of the homosexual movement and the impact that the concept has received during ANC -1987-1988.

Global cities and the habitat question - The case of social movements for habitation in São Paulo downtown

São Paulo is Brazil's most important city with a booming economy. The city has a huge population and this so called prosperity keeps on attracting more people to the city. It is well known that one of the issues brought up to a city with a fast growing population is the housing provision and conditions.

What it is proposed in this reflection is regarded to the case of São Paulo's downtown. This area has been deteriorating since 1950, being before an important economic area of town. In the 50's it began a plan of urbanization that expanded the city to the southbound. By that time, the higher classes broke up with downtown area that became a place mostly dominated by violence and homeless people. As opposed to the higher classes, this area of the town has been serving as a well located place to live also for low income people that choose the region for some reasons like proximity of their working places.

As a reverse of what happened in the past, downtown São Paulo is currently becoming an attractive real estate market, inserting the area on the center of this hurricane called speculation. In the opposite hand of speculation, there are several social movements that together fight against the upcoming gentrification going on in this area. These people are organized to make the laws work in benefit of a social right. In occupying buildings that do not exercise anymore a social function; these movements are making their part in trying to keep downtown a diverse and accessible place.

Having this small history line in mind, this article proposes to understand these urban transformations and analyze the current conflicts taking place in São Paulo, having its downtown as the center of the discussion.

Movimiento de la juventud negra y nuevos espacios políticos e institucionales: La lucha contra el "genocidio del joven negro" en los consejos y conferencias sectoriales en Brasil

Este artículo tiene como objetivo registrar la experiencia brasileña tratando de describir y analizar la relación entre conflicto y cooperación en la juventud negra - esta siendo un actor emergente de la construcción democrática en el país - con los actores estatales de Brasil y otros actores de la sociedad civil en la formulación de políticas públicas que respondan a las exigencias de este nuevo movimiento social.

Se presenta un resumen de la trayectoria de la organización juvenil negra en Brasil, desde el año 2000, que expresa la principal demanda de finalización del período del dicho "genocidio del joven negro" en el país. Destacarse, en este resumen, la construcción de la primera Reunión Nacional de la Juventud Negra (el ENJUNE primero, ocurrido en 2007) y el Foro Nacional de la Juventud Negra (FONAJUNE, creado en 2008), para entonces tratar de la relación entre este actor y los actores estatales, en los espacios públicos político-institucionales, de manera más directa en la primera Conferencia Nacional sobre Políticas Públicas para la Juventud (primera CNPPJ) y en el Consejo Nacional de la Juventud (CONJUVE).

El análisis inicial realizado apunta para nuevas posibilidades para las políticas públicas para garantizar los derechos - que combinan criterios de edad y raza - a partir de la interacción entre un nuevo actor en la sociedad civil - el joven negro - y las nuevas instituciones democráticas en Brasil - los Consejos y Conferencia Sectoriales. Más allá, por tanto, de la dicotomía entre Estado y sociedad civil. Sostenemos que para un mejor análisis del proceso es necesario entender ampliamente la afinidad, los lazos y tensiones tanto con otros actores de la sociedad civil - en este caso las organizaciones del movimiento negro y los movimientos juveniles -, así como con los actores de la sociedad política - los partidos políticos y niveles de gobierno.

Economic sociological view of the SRI market in Brazil

The recent emergence and growth of the Socially Responsible Investment (SRI) market in Brazil combines sustainability with finance, insofar as it presumes that socially responsible investors will consider social, environmental and economic criteria in their investment decisions. If traditionally the stock market was associated with gambling and betting, there is little doubt that nowadays it is considered a place par excellence where the economic law of supply and demand reigns. The questions that remain surround the understanding of the emergence of a market that combines finance and sustainability. This communication seeks to answer this question using the economic sociology theoretical approach. In accordance with the ideas of Pierre Bourdieu, I argue that simply thinking of the financial market as a place where the law of supply and demand reigns is quite insufficient to understand the emergence of the ISR market in Brazil. On the other hand, considering this financial field as a locus of cultural disputes, focusing the analysis on the social actors involved in this market's creation as well as their individual and collective habitus can possibly put us on the track to understanding the sociology of SRI market in Brazil. Starting with a sociological analysis of the stock market Corporate Sustainability Index Committee, I mapped 154 social actors who worked directly or indirectly with the Brazilian SRI market between 2005 and 2010. The analysis of these social actor's biographical notes led to the conclusion that the emergence of the SRI market in Brazil has less to do with the supply and demand logic than to a convergence of elites which is influenced by a financial dominant pole, seeking to win the cultural dispute by imposing their worldview to the financial field, trying to turn the SRI into the prevailing current of thought.

Is innovation routine? Diverse types of innovative behavior and routine work

Using survey data of about 1100 employees of various industries in the Flemish region in Belgium; we research to which degree various kinds of employees are actively and continuously engaged in innovative activities at their workplace. The focus in the survey is on so-called routine manual and non-manual work in industries like chemicals, and service sectors like retail and hotels, restaurants and bars. The paper will start by arguing that indeed innovation can be conceptualised in today's organisational context as part of a daily activity of many workers, also of routine manual and non-manual workers. The concept of 'innovative work behavior' (Scott & Bruce, 1994; Janssen, 2002) is next considered as a very useful construct in this regard. However, based on the illustrated multi-dimensionality of this concept, the paper will investigate in the empirical part to what extent routine workers:

- are engaged in idea generation, idea exploration, idea championing or idea implementation. It is hypothesized that they are mainly involved in the latter forms of innovative work
- are engaged in incremental, operational daily work innovations or in radical organisational innovations. It is hypothesized that only a small percentage is involved in the second type.
- are engaging in these types of innovative work as part of their job requirements or on the opposite deploying this innovative work as a way to cope with the work load and stress of the standardised job.

It is hypothesized that this type of 'coping' innovative work is more about idea generation and exploration.

Based on this empirical information on the involvement of routine workers in mechanisms of organisational innovation, the paper will end with a discussion of possible determinants of the established diverse types of innovative involvement.

Generalized trust and political trust among immigrant and natives

This paper investigates generalized trust and political trust among immigrants and natives in the Netherlands. Research has shown that people who are more trustful tend to have higher subjective well-being, and economic theory suggests that higher levels of trust will improve the efficiency of societies' economic and democratic institutions (Alesina & La Ferrara, 2002; Helliwell, 2003). Studies also show that trust is lower among immigrants than among natives, raising concerns about immigrants' societal integration (Dinesen & Hooghe, 2010).

While socio-economic position is widely considered to be a crucial determinant of trust (Dinesen & Hooghe, 2010), it is not yet known to what extent the differences in political and generalized trust between immigrants and natives can be explained by socio-economic inequalities, and whether the relations between socio-economic position on the one hand and generalized and political trust on the other differ between immigrants and natives.

We rely on cross-sectional data from the NELLS Study, and we use multiple regression analyses to test our hypotheses. Respondents include about 2500 natives and 1800 immigrants from Moroccan and Turkish origin in the Netherlands.

Results show that socio-economic inequalities can partially explain the differences in trust between immigrants and natives, but also that economic success is much more closely related to generalized and political trust among immigrants than it is among natives. Additional analyses show that perceived discrimination and interaction with natives and co-ethnics are important additional explanations of trust among immigrants.

National identification of immigrants and natives in the Netherlands

This study examines to what extent immigrants and natives identify with the Netherlands. We use survey data of more than 1700 Turkish and Moroccan immigrants and more than 2200 natives. We answer four main questions in this study. First, do immigrants have lower national identification than natives? Second, does the level of national identification differ between immigrant groups? Third, does economic participation similarly affect national identification among immigrants and natives? And fourth, what are important determinants of national identification among immigrants? The results show that, compared to Dutch natives, Turkish but not Moroccan immigrants have lower national identification. Being employed is associated with higher national identification among immigrants as well as natives, but only among immigrants is higher occupational status associated with higher national identification. Results further show that for immigrants, the most important determinants of national identification are Dutch language proficiency, perceived discrimination, and contact with natives.

Material-semiotics and the sociology of risk: A tale of two cities or an entanglement of sorts?

Conventional approaches to risk tend to set Ulrich Beck's sociological account in opposition to Bruno Latour's material-semiotic one. The chasm this produces is representative of a broader distinction commonly drawn between the sociology of risk and actor-network theory. In this paper, however, we argue that it can be generative to consider these different conceptions of risk together given that three significant, conceptual tensions are evaluated. We highlight these three tensions to support any attempt that aims to work with both a material-semiotic sensibility and with the literature on the sociology of risk. Firstly, an epochalist reading of risk that distinguishes different orders of modernity with periodicity contrasts with an understanding based on situated and detailed, empirical accounts. Secondly, this leads to a metaphysical dilemma of whether an a priori distinction can be made between the social and the material, between nature and culture. Thirdly, humanist approaches identify risk as a problem of language, discourse and representation while explaining the material away. More-than-human or post-humanist accounts suggest that risk is an entanglement constituted multiply in sociomaterial pluriverses. For each of these tensions we show how the work of Beck and Latour can be located by drawing attention to the different scales at which they operate. Our position is that instead of conceiving risk as abstract, quantifiable, socially constructed or understood in terms of something else, its irreducibility can be made clear by paying greater attention to its enactment in processes and practices. In concluding we propose that a material-semiotic notion of risk complements traditional sociological approaches to the study of risk by showing how and when risk is negotiated, traded and aggregated as an entity.

El paso por un centro de expulsión de inmigrantes en francia

Los centros de retención - o de detención, según el país - son espacios de alojamiento para extranjeros que se encuentran en instancia de repatriación, es decir, extranjeros que no cuentan con sus permisos de residencia, detenidos en la calle, en sus domicilios o en sus lugares de trabajo y que son trasladados a estos espacios para ser enviados de retorno a sus países de origen. En Francia, sin incluir las regiones de ultramar, durante el 2009 más de 35 mil personas ingresaron a estos centros mientras que el 38% solamente fue efectivamente expatriado (CIMADE, 2010), esto habla por sí solo acerca del uso extendido de este mecanismo coercitivo a pesar de su acotado éxito.

A partir del trabajo de campo realizado durante seis meses en un centro de expulsión de inmigrantes de las cercanías de París nos proponemos describir y analizar la vida cotidiana de los individuos que transitan estos espacios. Buscamos estudiar principalmente las transformaciones que experimentan los inmigrantes en vías de expulsión, así como las distintas estrategias de reivindicación que se construyen en el tránsito por estos centros.

Europeans in Japan - experiences of differentiation and exclusion

Aim of this paper is to analyze experience of European migrants living in Japan. Although this group is heavily understudied, it is popular belief, that they are Japan's non-problematic minority in terms of socio-economic position and social integration. As some researches prove, contrary to other stigmatized minorities, white people are still perceived very favorably, even as superior to Japanese. On the other hand, Japanese society is still regarded by many as relatively closed to foreigners and main challenge remains to be the overcoming of gap between Japanese and foreigners. Regarding both arguments, what would be the position of Europeans within the Japanese society and their experience of exclusion or marginalization?

For this purpose, I aim to conduct around 50 semi-structured interviews with foreigners from different parts of Europe. Interviews are focused on their experience of migration and daily life in Japan. Combination of general and particular questions informed by social network analyses approach should shed some light on the social exclusion and/or inclusion from the micro perspective and analyses of their life stories should clarify the extent and existence of institutional discriminatory practices. Together with analyses of their subjective assessment of their situation and integration in Japanese society, the goal is to provide a complex picture of position Europeans living in Japan have and strategies they adopt to cope with it.

Although data collection is not finished yet and results are only preliminary, they suggest that being other is starting point for majority of interactions in Japan they experience. Preliminary results also suggest that even positively regarded Europeans have expected roles in Japanese society which are hardly changed and thus being differentiated from majority. This applies not only to labor market, but also to other spheres of their daily lives such as housing and every day social interactions.

The knowledge of young students about ionizing radiation. A study-campaign and its assessment in the high schools of the Lazio region

The Department of Communication and Social research of the Sapienza University of Rome and the National Institute for Environmental Protection and Research have realised a study aimed at evaluating the effects and achievements - in terms of gained knowledge - of a study-campaign on radiation protection and ionizing radiation. The campaign was addressed to 14-19 years-old students, a strategic target representing a fertile ground for absorbing new knowledge, new values, new behaviours, and transferring them to future generations. This audience is exactly a medium, enabling that the information gets diffused in the families; at the same time this audience is easy to be reached through the schools.

The adopted research design (with pre-test, post-test and not perfectly equivalent control group) was an quasi-experimental one due to a casual subdivision, in the initial phase, of all the selected classes in two groups: the experimental group (EG) and the control group (CG).

The referred theoretic model assumes that an important part of the achievements - in terms of enhancement of competencies with consequent progress at cognitive level and more generally also in the affective and conative aspects -, depends on the educational activity performed ad hoc by an experienced and qualified staff. On the other hand the success of an educational activity depends also on the quality of the environment (structural characteristics and the system of relationships) where the activity is conducted; moreover, as it is the case for any human attitude, there are also further factors contributing to the changes imputable both to the individuals (gender, cultural heritage, position in the educational process, level of preparation, engagement of eco-compatible behaviours, etc.) and to the context of the activity (town, profile of the school).

Undocumented migration and civil society

This paper investigates a group of unauthorized immigrants in the United States, that of undocumented college students. Undocumented students are young men and women that were brought by their families to the United States when they were very young. They grew up there, learned English, went to school with their peers, but because of their situation vis-à-vis American immigration laws they had to do so while remaining in the shadow. Notwithstanding these difficulties some of them are now college students with a strong desire to succeed, but their future remains blocked. In my research I investigate how these students navigate their everyday lives in search for a future in the United States. Through semi-structured interviews with a group of 25 undocumented college students I explore how these students interact with civil society at large, how they respond to and interact with different social actors and the kind of survival strategies that they adopt to deal with their liminal visa status and precarious future.

Explaining the survival of guerrilla organizations: The pros and cons of virtual experiments

Experiments are a most reliable way of identifying the causal regularities governing certain social settings. Unfortunately there are many social situations and configurations that are very unpleasant for the actors involved and therefore do not permit experimentation in the traditional sense. Civil wars, for example, are recurring phenomena whose internal laws are of great interest to the social scientist; yet at the same time they cannot and should not be converted into experimental settings. In order to overcome this limitation of the experimental approach and to extend its applicability I want to elucidate the option of conducting virtual experiments.

My presentation starts with a brief account of the typical social configuration of the guerrilla war. I describe the parties involved – the armed forces, the guerrilla organization, and the civilian population – as well as their mutual relationships. Subsequently I raise two questions concerning certain causal regularities of this social setting: To what extent is the survival of a guerrilla organization dependent on the support of the insurrection by the civilian population? Which degree of support is needed as a necessary condition for the survival of a guerrilla organization?

I seek answers to these questions by employing a multiagent simulation model of the guerrilla war as a virtual experimental setting. A systematic modification of the degree of support granted by the virtual civilian population enables me to measure the effect of this variable on the probability of survival of the virtual guerrilla units. The results thus obtained need to be discussed afterwards, particularly because of the high degree of abstraction of the simulation model. I conclude my presentation with some remarks about the advantages and disadvantages of virtual experiments in general.

The notion of structural imperative: An alternative conceptual instrument for mixed-method studies on guerrilla organizations

The extensive literature on guerrilla organizations can roughly be divided into two clusters. On the one hand there are qualitative studies that examine either one organization in particular or a small number of guerrilla organizations. On the other hand there are publications focusing on the tactics and the strategy of guerrilla warfare. Studies of the former type give reasons for the observable behavior of specific guerrilla organizations (and usually involve a description of their internal dynamics), while studies of the latter type exhibit the constraints and options that each guerrilla organization in a certain environment faces. In the course of my presentation I will show how these two levels of analysis may be connected theoretically and methodologically by employing the concept of structural imperative.

At the outset I give a brief definition of the concept by drawing on Immanuel Kant's notion of hypothetical imperative. In this first part of my presentation it will become clear that a structural imperative basically is a marker that signalizes the effectiveness of social forces pushing a certain type of actor towards a specific course of action. Subsequently I deliver an account of the characteristic social constellation of guerrilla war, primarily for the purpose of naming the structural imperatives applying to guerrilla organizations in general.

In the second part of my presentation I demonstrate how these structural imperatives may be used as a point of reference facilitating the description and comparison of particular guerrilla organizations. I do so by using contemporary Colombian insurgencies as illustrative material. After that I will recapitulate my findings in order to point out in which way the concept of structural imperative serves as a link between the aforementioned paradigms of research on guerrilla organizations.

Sexual assault and harassment of immigrant workers in the United States: Overcoming obstacles to legal and social justice

The organization of work in the global economy produces conditions ripe for the sexual abuse of immigrant women in the workplace. Reports document sexual assault and coercion of immigrant workers in the United States, especially in industries that employ large numbers of undocumented women such as agribusiness and food services. We analyze successful lawsuits filed by the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (a federal agency) against employers on behalf of immigrant women in these industries. The formal charge is sexual harassment as discrimination under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The fuller story however, reveals multiple complaints of rape and other forms of sexual assault and coercion as well as verbal harassment and abuse.

We examine obstacles faced by undocumented women seeking recourse. These include lack of knowledge of legal rights, complexity of legal options, language barriers, cultural barriers, the structure of the labor markets and workplaces, threats of firing, harm to family, deportation, and physical violence, distrust of government and police, unresponsive police, and limited legal rights for the undocumented, to name a few. Despite the obstacles, numbers of women, with the help of advocacy organizations, have challenged their employers and won significant monetary awards, protection against deportation, and court-mandated workplace reform. However, legal success stories also reveal the limitations of the legal system and the gap between even a "successful" lawsuit resolution and a broader vision of social justice.

We consider implications of a fragmented legal structure (differences between civil and criminal law, different courts, different enforcement agencies), and of the interaction of social movement-based legal advocacy organizations with the state. We use sociological theories of structure and agency, and of legal mobilization for social change. Our data are documents from approximately 20 lawsuit settlements or jury verdicts plus interviews with some of the attorneys.

Políticas sociales para mejorar el bienestar de las personas que envejecen. La experiencia en el país vasco (España)

El Instituto Gerontológico Matía ha elaborado para el Gobierno Vasco el documento "100 propuestas para avanzar en el bienestar de las personas que envejecen". Su objetivo es generar debate en todos los sectores implicados y también en la ciudadanía sobre el futuro del envejecimiento, desde una enfoque basado en la promoción de la autonomía, el reconocimiento de la heterogeneidad de este grupo de población y la promoción de su compromiso y corresponsabilidad en la construcción y mantenimiento de una sociedad del bienestar en tiempos de crisis, desde el reconocimiento que la evidencia científica ofrece sobre los efectos favorables de estas actitudes y acciones en esta época de la vida.

- Promoviendo acciones preventivas en las primeras etapas del proceso de envejecimiento, a través de servicios de orientación y consejo en un conjunto de aspectos que condicionarán un envejecimiento satisfactorio y saludable: vivienda, aspectos económicos, salud, mantenimiento de redes familiares y sociales, colaboración social....
- Adaptando el modelo vigente de cuidados de larga duración a las necesidades y preferencias de las personas. El desarrollo del modelo de atención centrado en la persona, la diversificación de servicios y programas en los domicilios y la revisión del diseño arquitectónico y ambiente de los alojamientos del futuro para personas en situación de dependencia, se configuran como ejes fundamentales en este documento.
- Avanzando en fórmulas de provisión integrada de atenciones y cuidados sociosanitarios desde la coordinación de sistemas y servicios que garanticen la continuidad y la eficacia de los cuidados y de los sistemas social y sanitario.
- Desarrollando iniciativas de apoyo, acompañamiento, formación y otros servicios a las personas cuidadoras no profesionales, principales proveedoras de cuidados a las personas que necesitan ayuda.

Un acercamiento al fenómeno housing a través de metodología cualitativa y cuantitativa

El lema "envejecer en casa" empezó a acuñarse a principio de los 90 entre los expertos e investigadores en el ámbito de la gerontología. A partir de ese momento estudios internacionales sobre envejecimiento comenzaron a abordar las cuestiones de la vivienda y el entorno como elementos fundamentales para el buen envejecimiento de las personas. (Wahl, Fänge, Oswald, Gitlin e Iwarsson, 2009).

La mayor parte de esta investigación se ha centrado en una evaluación externa de la vivienda (accesibilidad, espacios, equipamientos, etc.) y en escasas ocasiones se ha trabajado el punto de vista individual (usabilidad, percepción de seguridad, ambiente, satisfacción, etc.) donde la experiencia del sujeto resulta fundamental (Oswald, Jopp, Rott y Wahl, 2010).

La línea de investigación desarrollada por Ingema en torno al paradigma "Housing" pretende abarcar ambas perspectivas –esenciales- (externa/ interna, objetivo/subjetivo) y relacionarlas, tanto al fomento de un envejecimiento saludable, como a la permanencia de las personas mayores –como es su deseo- en el domicilio. Integrandolo, para ello, una perspectiva aplicada y multidimensional, capaz de desarrollar tanto conocimiento sobre el fenómeno housing, como planes de acción para los servicios sociales y sanitarios y para el entramado científico-tecnológico y empresarial.

Para la consecución de estos objetivos se combinan metodología cuantitativa (encuesta) y cualitativa (entrevistas en profundidad). El universo de trabajo son personas de 50 y más años residentes en viviendas en la comunidad autónoma del País Vasco (España). Para el estudio cuantitativo se desarrollaron 2.500 entrevistas personales y en el cualitativo 33 entrevistas en profundidad. La utilización de estas dos técnicas supone un acercamiento más certero a la realidad social de este fenómeno.

Naturaleza y alienación en la teoría crítica

La exposición aborda la teoría de la alienación en la primera generación de la teoría crítica de la Escuela de Frankfurt como una línea distinta a la tradición hegeliana dominante en el marxismo occidental que aporta una perspectiva productiva e interesante a al actual debate sociológico de la crítica de la ideología (Althusser, Zizek, Eagleton, Therborn, Abercrombie). Mientras que en la teoría de la ideología emanada del fenómeno de la mercancía (Marx, Lukács) era la conciencia la que estaba puesta en cuestión, para Theodor Adorno ya toda conciencia era ideológica. En la primera generación de la Escuela de Frankfurt, la alienación emerge con el origen de lo social, haciendo de toda relación social una formación ideológica. En particular, la ponencia se dedicará a analizar la obra de Adorno entorno a la "historia natural" y estará estructurada por tres momentos. Primero, se define la crítica de la alienación en Adorno a partir de sus críticas a la tradición de la crítica de la ideología en el marxismo occidental y, por otro lado, sus resquemores con las antropologías filosóficas y ontologías alemanas de la década de 1930. En un segundo lugar, un curso sobre la teoría de la alienación en el Joven Marx de los Manuscritos de París de 1844. Y, finalmente, los aportes de para el debate contemporáneo de la teoría social sobre ideología.

Movimientos sociales y derecho

El trabajo explora la relación entre movimientos populares y derecho en la Argentina contemporánea. A diferencia del movimiento de derechos humanos, el activismo feminista y la movilización de "minorías" sexuales y de género, todos ellos claramente activadores del derecho como estrategia de democratización, ciudadanía e innovación de las políticas públicas en las últimas décadas, la constitución de organizaciones "populares", esto es, de colectivos que se dicen ser "pueblo" en alguna de sus distintas inflexiones, ha ido de la mano de la prescindencia (retórica y/o práctica) del derecho en tanto campo de articulación de demandas, cuando no de su completo rechazo, en tanto dimensión estructurante del Estado.

Observaremos este rasgo de la acción colectiva en Argentina, desde la emergencia del "movimiento piquetero" a la constitución de asambleas barriales, destacando las relaciones cambiantes entre sociedad y derecho visibles en las luchas socio-ambientales, un campo de movilización y reclamos más reciente y experiencia ulterior de las movilizaciones populares de corte territorial.

El trabajo buscará establecer cuáles son las variables que explican el reingreso del derecho en las estrategias populares en Argentina, en el marco más amplio de las transformaciones tanto de la movilización social como de los marcos jurídicos en América Latina. Por cuanto el derecho constituye un marco singular de simbolización de los reclamos que religa éstos al Estado, su reactivación obliga a pensar de nuevo la autonomización de la política institucional que atravesó la movilización social en la Argentina y en otros países del continente, del mismo modo como lo está haciendo en otras regiones del mundo.

Assisted reproductive techniques: Moral judgments and mobilisation for better access by gay couples and chronically ill people

In this paper I intend to analyze the process of emergence of infertility as a public health problem, as well as its social construction as a disease, internationally recognized by supra-state organizations, such as the World Health Organization.

However, how infertility is defined and publically constructed - i.e., in biological, physiological, psychological or social terms – determines the type of social actors who appear in the public arena to defend a more fair distribution of the common good which is health. One such example is the demands by same-sex female couples on public reproductive health policies.

Furthermore, there is the debate on policies of partially state-funded fertility treatments faced by vulnerable groups (particularly gay couples and chronically ill people), as well as demands for their recognition among the political communities. Both issues provide lay the ground for further studying of disputes related to ethical and socio-technical controversies, such as the access to Assisted Reproductive Technologies.

The current context of widespread financial and economic crisis, throughout Europe, is questioning and challenging the ability to maintain conventionalised social rights such as state subvention for fertility treatments and medication. This corresponds to the decline of the welfare state, particularly in the Portuguese context, in which the state provided health coverage public access to healthcare. Based on the two main principles that constitute the «imagined project of modernity» (Wagner, 1996) - freedom and discipline – I seek to address two possible potential dissonance s. Nowadays, these dissensions may occur between the autonomy in the construction of individual fertility projects, and the institutional constraints that limit the reproductive freedom of people. Building upon my post-doctoral research, I will approach this problem theoretically and through data analysis (such as reports from ethical committees, legislation and media articles).

Surrogacy and gamete donation: The commoditization of the human body, differences in healthcare systems and cross border reproductive care

This paper aims to analyse the effects of people circulation on the access to assisted reproductive technologies, in terms of state sovereignty and individual autonomy. It does so by addressing issues such as socio-economic inequalities, national disparities regarding healthcare, the current trends in family structure and the commoditization of both the human body as well as the exchange of biogenetic substances.

The creation of the EU and the Schengen Area, with the contemporary erosion of national borders control has weakened the obstacles to individual mobility. European states have different legislation concerning assisted conception, allowing some technical procedures while criminalizing others. Moreover, we face the emergence of new trends in what regards family configurations, such as same sex couples or single parents.

The combination of these three factors creates new phenomena that challenge both the health status of the reproductive body, and the sovereignty of countries as far as the regulation of medically assisted procreative technologies and the safety of individual citizen are concerned. In fact, couples or individuals travel in order to evade restrictive legislation in their own country, sometimes submitting themselves to more precarious healthcare.

At the same time, poverty and the predominance of market economy lead to the commodification of the individual body and of human life, in which the commercialization of gametes and the payment for surrogacy are only two examples. This means a balance between individual autonomy – namely what concerns the freedom to program their own reproductive life – and the social control of Biomedicine procedures and personal life trajectories.

Building upon my post-doctoral research, I will approach this problem theoretically and through data analysis (ethical committees' reports, legislation, media articles).

Trayectorias laborales y sentidos del trabajo: Repercusiones de la precariedad laboral en la valoración del trabajo de los jóvenes

En los últimos años numerosos estudios han analizado cómo la precariedad se ha extendido a una proporción cada vez más grande de la clase trabajadora, haciendo de ésta "la forma-empleo" característica de la relación salarial. En este sentido, en Argentina, luego de ocho años crecimiento sostenido del PBI, la precariedad parece consolidarse como una característica del mercado laboral. Por otro lado, los jóvenes siguen estando sobrerrepresentados cuando hablamos de desempleo y precariedad. Su tasa de desempleo es considerablemente superior a la correspondiente a los trabajadores adultos y los empleos a los que acceden suelen ser precarios; y aún cuando logren insertarse en el sector formal de la economía, sus posiciones son más inestables, sin protección laboral y con bajos salarios.

En este contexto, la presente ponencia busca analizar las repercusiones que las trayectorias signadas por la desocupación y la precariedad tienen en las representaciones que los jóvenes le asignan al trabajo. ¿Es la precariedad una condición de su inserción en el mercado laboral? ¿Pueden establecerse distintos niveles de precariedad en sus trayectorias laborales? ¿Qué rol le otorgan al trabajo en sus vidas? ¿Qué proyectos construyen fuera del trabajo? ¿Qué expectativas tienen respecto a su futuro profesional? Estos son los principales interrogantes a los que busca responder la ponencia.

El análisis se realizó a partir de estudios de caso de carácter cualitativo que llevamos adelante en el marco de nuestros proyectos de investigación. Realizamos entrevistas en profundidad a 50 jóvenes de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, La Plata, San Fernando y San Isidro, de diferentes estratos sociales y niveles educativos tanto en el sector formal como en el informal, y en empresas privadas como en organismos públicos.

Les femmes em mouvement: La participation politique contre les barrages et par les droits sociaux à la zona da mata de minas gerais – BR

Cette recherche met en valeur les relations de pouvoir vécues par les hommes et les femmes dans un contexte de conflit causé par la construction d'un projet hydroélectrique. Ces personnes revendiquent le droit de rester sur leur terre, en exigeant leurs droits et une représentation dans la sphère politique. Dans ce champs de forces ce sont les femmes touchées par le barrage notre objet d'étude, tout comme leurs relations avec les hommes et leurs familles, lesquelles nous permet de comprendre le «lieu»; l'espace qu'elles occupent dans la maison, les associations communautaires, le Mouvement des Personnes Touchées par les Barrages (MAB) et au gouvernement au niveau municipal et de l'État. Nous avons pour but d'identifier si la participation des femmes dans le MAB a contribué pour changer les relations entre les hommes et les femmes dans la famille, la communauté et le mouvement social. Et si certains facteurs ont conduit à «l'autonomie» des femmes, dans les secteurs public et privé. L'unité d'analyse ce sont les femmes et les hommes touchés par la construction des petites centrales hydroélectriques de Fumaça. L'univers empirique ce sont les villages de Miguel Rodriguez et Emboque Guaiana - Diogo Vasconcelos, Zona da Mata de Minas Gerais, au Brésil. Nous avons pu remarquer que la participation des femmes dans l'action collective sont basée principalement sur la volonté d'avoir leurs moyens de subsistance ce qui a influencé l'augmentation des disparités entre les hommes et les femmes. La présence des femmes dans les actions collectives n'ont pas empêché la violation des droits de l'homme mais, a permis d'obtenir le droit à une indemnité plus juste, l'accès à l'emploi, le logement et la terre pour les familles. Nous avons observé que le mouvement des femmes dans les sphères privées vers les espaces publics entraînent l'empowerment et plus de visibilité.

Entre lo público y lo privado: "Las católicas" en el encuentro nacional de mujeres de Argentina y el debate por los derechos de "las mujeres"

Los Encuentros Nacionales de Mujeres Argentinas, que se realizan cada año, desde 1986, en una ciudad distinta cada año, son un espacio de movilización pública y colectiva que busca acoger los intereses de las mujeres y que desde 1994 incluyó el debate acerca de la despenalización del aborto, que ha cobrado un papel protagónico. Así, entre 1997 y 2001 se registra la irrupción de grupos de mujeres identificadas como "católicas" que acuden a los Encuentros para debatir en los talleres sus posiciones, reivindicando que no todas las mujeres argentinas piensan como "las feministas". Los Encuentros Nacionales de Mujeres se construyen así como un espacio de disputa frente a los temas de género, aborto y modelos de familia.

Si bien existen diversas etnografías acerca de los Encuentros Nacionales de Mujeres desde la organización y participación de las diversas expresiones políticas y feministas que a ellos concurren; presentamos ahora un trabajo etnográfico desde "las católicas", a partir de una mirada de observación participante en el XXVI Encuentro Nacional de Mujeres celebrado en Bariloche durante el mes de octubre de 2011.

A partir de la participación conjunta que se expresa en los Encuentros Nacionales de Mujeres, podemos observar que son más bien un conjunto de expresiones diversas que en su interior no se encuentran libres de tensiones. Este trabajo nos permite observar las motivaciones de aquellas mujeres que acuden de distintos puntos del país, sus vínculos y distancias con diversos sectores de la jerarquía católica, sus mecanismos de organización, argumentos y estrategias de participación; las afinidades y diferencias que entre ellas mismas existen en relación a su participación en los Encuentros, así como su relación con "las otras" y el proceso de construcción del enemigo.

Mujeres católicas contra la despenalización del aborto en la Argentina: Formas de creer y participar en transformación

Frente a los debates por la despenalización y/o legalización del aborto en Argentina, diversos grupos "conservadores" se organizan para oponerse al avance de las legislaciones. Nos acercamos en este trabajo a las mujeres católicas que participan de manera activa en estas acciones en la ciudad de Buenos Aires.

A partir de la metodología de análisis estructural de contenido indagamos en las narrativas y discursos que estas mujeres construyen, los referentes que les dan capacidad de interpretación y táctica, así como la calificación que les permite sostener su posición.

Observamos también los cambios que ha sufrido su relación con la jerarquía católica, así como las diferencias y roces que entre ellas mismas se hacen presentes, a partir de las premisas y estrategias con las que abordan "la defensa de la vida"; lo que nos permite dar cuenta de una pluralidad de posiciones y discursos que se construyen al interior de grupos tradicionalmente identificados como afines o incluso homogéneos y que se revelan como un espacio en el que las formas de creer y de participar se encuentran en pleno proceso de transformación.

Well-being inequality across the globe: Where lives are most unequal, and why

One of the key problems of comparative inequality research has been the lack of a good indicator for the overall extent of inequalities in a society. Typically, in cross-national research inequality levels are compared via measures of income distribution. Taking advantage of recent research from

QOL researchers, this paper uses subjective well-being measures in order to express a nation's overall degree of inequality in terms of happiness inequality, i.e. the inequality in people's satisfaction with life-as-a-whole, and in feeling happy. Pooling data from all available waves of the World Values Survey and the European Values Study from 1981-2008, we compute happiness inequality for 280 units (country-years), using the percent maximum standard deviation approach.

The paper has three main goals: First, to present evidence on happiness inequality in a broad international comparison. We demonstrate in which countries and world regions lives are most equal, and in which they are most unequal. Secondly, we analyse why happiness inequality is larger in some places than others, looking at a range of country characteristics. More specifically, we investigate the impact of three groups of factors, namely objective inequalities, material living conditions, and political institutions. Third, by analysing "feeling happy" and "life satisfaction" separately, we can find out whether these two facets of subjective well-being inequality are driven by the same or by different country characteristics.

Familial experiences among continents (Portugal – Africa – Brazil)

The political movements and the colonial war in Portuguese colonies in Africa in the 1970s were fundamental in determining migration to Sao Paulo (Brazil), of Portuguese settlers and their descendants born in African soil. We seek to understand these migratory flows and its interference in family experiences using oral histories of immigrants, with the addition of other sources. In the case of these immigrants, there was crossed, into their stories, very different experiences of socio-cultural contexts: 1) their belong to the families of Portuguese origin, with the Portuguese colonial context as a reference; 2) the context of African experience, considering that many individuals were born in Africa; and 3) the context of insertion in the state of Sao Paulo. This paper will explore the complex experiences of displacement and integration in the new context and conflicts that this migration process and will put the new experiences of these immigrants: men and women, adults, youth and children. The narratives allow the apprehension of complex family dynamics in the displacements. We verify the conditions for the arrival of Portuguese settlers to African territories and the experiences of generations and immigration to Brazil. We observed the frequent separations in the immigration process and the constitution of families with different "cohabitation" in Portugal, in Africa, and in Brazil. The displacements from Africa towards São Paulo in the 1970s involved the formation of "intercontinental" and mutant families, formed in each context by different participants. The reports make reference to absence of relatives, the meetings and mismatches, to living in long-distance. The displacements did not end for the most part of the families. There is still a constant flow among Portugal, Africa and Brazil; permeating these flows, there are economic, political, and sentimental reasons, which approach/separate individuals from different contexts.

Después de la caducidad: Tareas pendientes en Uruguay

La larga vigencia de la Ley de Caducidad significó un serio escollo para el avance de las investigaciones sobre las violaciones a los DD.HH. realizadas por la dictadura uruguaya. La decisión de anular los efectos de la ley, adoptada en octubre de 2011 abre finalmente la posibilidad de realizar estas postergadas investigaciones. Sin embargo, la existencia de la ley y su ratificación ciudadana en dos casos (aunque en uno fuera por vía indirecta), nos impone la necesidad de pensar como problema la aceptación de la impunidad por la sociedad uruguaya, y la convivencia con perpetradores frecuentes, y no solamente con los ex-dictadores.

Esta ponencia se propone reflexionar sobre las características de esa "cultura de la impunidad" y los medios para superarla, de manera de integrar la defensa jurídica de la dignidad humana a las modalidades habituales de comportamiento de la sociedad, sin que aparezca exclusivamente como una secuela de los episodios ocurridos del pasado. En principio puede suponerse que el camino que se abre a partir de la eliminación de la ley puede ser una vía practicable para lograr ese objetivo.

Irony of "having leisure time" in the absence of men

The main aim of this study is to understand how women's lives change after their husbands' migration from Fatsa (Turkey) to Nagoya (Japan) since the beginning of 1990s. While women's lives have changed dramatically after husbands' migration in different aspects, leisure becomes one of the problematic areas for woman as being "single". Following husband's migration to Japan, fundamental changes take place in woman's area of responsibility and her social status. Woman, who becomes the head of the house as she lives in a separate house, has to take care of outdoor duties. In this respect, despite the assistance of the families or the instructions of man from Japan, the main subject is now woman. Although women can take care of the practical part of these responsibilities, they are psychologically quite consumed away, and they feel themselves alone and different from other married women. Though women's starting to perform outdoor duties appears to be the case that women take part more in social life, it actually increases the pressure on them. Despite they are married, they are treated as "widows" in the eye of the society and family, and even if they do not want they have to accept this new identity. Fear of being gossiped about hinders the fact that women can create a mechanism of solidarity among women remained in Fatsa. For this reason, their lives take a more self-enclosed state and they start meeting only the family members. It is again the woman remained in Fatsa who picks up the cost of this process, which is endured in order to overcome the financial difficulty, with her life turned into a home confinement. During this "home confinement", how is women's so-called leisure time shaped?

Some challenges of contemporary research on ethnic and race relations in Canadian universities

The climate for research funding in Canada has, over the years, shifted from one which supported critical analysis of social institutions, including state funded legal challenges based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and on Aboriginal Land Claims to a climate which has, to be generous, become chilly toward critical social research. There has also been an important shift to the (money saving) promotion – even requirement – of partnerships between researchers and their private and not-for-profit partners, partnerships which are often more viable for profit-making entities than for non-profits, whose resources are already severely stretched. A further shift is toward the favoring of service provision at the expense of research. This paper will examine some of the broad trends within research funding in Canada, with a particular emphasis on how these have impacted on research on ethnic and race relations. It will also consider the impacts on such research of a growing emphasis on targeted research by granting councils, and of the definitions of 'research productivity' and 'quality research' which are increasingly adopted by universities. While some of these trends are not new, the neoliberal political and economic climate has exacerbated the challenges of doing critical research within ethnic and race relations, particularly to the extent that such research is conceived of and executed with community partners, addressing researchable issues that they have identified as salient.

Soldier photographs: Recollections of manhood, icons of nationalism

The soldier portrait photographs which are ignored academically and artistically will be examined in this presentation as discursive elements of nationalism, militarism and masculinity. As a form of family photographs, soldier portrait photographs are produced as individual representation forms of political identities in micro level which are aiming to articulate with hegemonic ideological structures of the nation.

The research is structured in three sections. First, the production process of these photographs, which are designed and modified by means of photoshop, will be described through the interviews conducted with the portrait photographers and the regular soldiers in Ankara in Summer of 2011. Second, a content analyse will be done according to the sample photographs which are collected during the interviews, and by cataloging the most outstanding images, it will be comprised an image repertoire. These image repertoire will be interpreted according to their relation with the discourse of family, nation, women and military. And third, how the photographs are being distributed among the personal networks like family and friendship circles will be subjected in the paper.

In short, through these three sections, the paper attempts to see what is the function of these photographs in constructing the personal political identities and in which ways they reinforced the mainstream discourses of nationalism and manhood.

Transcending representation: Being an activist camera

This paper will attempt to examine the possibility of transcending the forms of representation and capturing the reality, in case of Karahaber, which was a video activist group in Turkey.

In the paper, first, Karahaber, (Black News / www.karahaber.org), which was especially active in 2005-2007 and was defining itself with the motto "from the image of the action to the action of the image" will be introduced in short. According to their own words, in quest for 'true' and 'just' information, participating many street demonstrations with their non-professional video cameras, they produced more than 175 videos (against transvestite decimation, on death strike against F-type prisons, on Hrant Dink massacre, 6th of November Student Demos against YÖK -High Education Council- etc.) and shared them on their website.

After introducing the group, it will be focused especially on the video films about the demonstrations, taking place outside the prisons, in order to support the prisoners in death strike against the impending F-Type prisons. These video images moved the group members in a very peculiar way: The group had to think on its own kind of participation and engagement to the process of death strike. These challenges in the group prompted questions about the ways to construct the real activist gaze: To get differentiated from the police/state camera in form (plans, edits etc.) and in content (discourses, narratives, subjects), to avoid the pornographic gaze, and to improve the ways to capture the reality and distribute it instead of its representation, were subjected.

Here, by analysing the video images on death strike and the group profile and by re-collecting the discussions of that process, I'll attempt to conduct a theoretical discussion on 'being an activist camera'.

Social theory and agency: The cave, social determinism and interdependency

This paper is founded on the principle that social theory does not only interpret social worlds. In some social processes, social theory can also influence some social actions. This is what Giddens called the problem of double hermeneutic: by analyzing social phenomena, sociologists can also affect them in various ways. The theory becomes part of the practice it observes rather than being external to it. Starting from this general principle, I present the related idea that various social theories based on different 'background assumptions' (Gouldner) can have positive or negative effect on the level of agency of people. For instance, in some social processes, some social theories encourage resistance to domination and alienation while others might discourage the same kind of empowerment in similar social dynamics. In the Western culture, the allegory of the cave (Plato), the positivistic quest for social laws and solid social structures and co-determinism (the study of interactions between structures and agency) are examples of theoretical perspectives which can decrease the level of agency. The last part of the paper explores the possibility of one reinforcing approach which can stay away from hard or soft social determinism by also avoiding voluntarism. I call it transactional sociology because it is partly coming from the distinction between self-action, interaction and transaction proposed by Dewey and Bentley. In brief, this approach focus on the interdependency between all the transactors, including the masters and the slaves. I think in some social processes this transactional approach can reinforce the agency of the individuals in realistic ways.

Disability as microcosm: The boundaries of the human body

Emerging from an opposition to medical deviance theories of the 20th century, sociology and related disciplines have brought potent intellectual frameworks to an expanded, non-medicalized analysis of disabled bodies. Yet, scholars have only begun to directly engage in interpreting embodied disablement and responses to it as microcosm, meaning, and metaphor for fundamental social, philosophical, and cultural questions about essential elements and boundaries of embodied humanness.

In this paper, we undertake a substantive examination of the disabled body within sociological and cultural context. Branded and designed as not normal, undesirable, and in need of change, embodied disablement provides a foundation for analysis of the explicit and implicit nature of the legitimate human body, its symbolism, and responses that such bodies elicit from diverse local through global social and cultural entities. Building on and synthesizing historical and current work in the sociology of the body, disability studies, and cyborg studies, this paper examines the criteria for human embodiment that are violated by interpretations of disability and then met with a range of responses from body revision to denial of the viability of life. We engage this analysis through four categories of content.

- Violating humanness: Legitimizing the disabled body - what embodied criteria of "humanness" are lost, never obtained or otherwise not present that assign bodies to the disability category?
- Revising the illegitimate- in order to instill or restore humanness, what elements of disabled embodiment are changed and how?
- Reinventing embodied humanness-How have bodies been re-worked, redesigned to expand/contract the range of humanness (prosthesis, robotic enhancements, cyborg, avatar)
- Denying humanness: When embodied revision or reinventing cannot occur, what historical and contemporary methods are used to eliminate the violating body (selective aborting, terminating life)

In the forefront and yet marginal: Women in the farmers' movement in Gujarat, India

Women have been at the forefront of the most active and successful farmers' movement, the Mahuva movement, today in the state of Guajrat, India. The movement mobilized thousands of local farmers against the construction of a cement factory in the midst of a reservoir they had built to stem the increasing salinity on their coastal lands. From the first public hearing against the factory, to raising awareness in the surrounding villages for over a year, to walking 350 Kilometers in a protest rally, to being beaten up by the so called security guards of the factory owners, they have participated actively in the movement to protect their lands. Yet, beyond their symbolic presence in delegations to meet with the government or address rallies, they are no where to be seen in either the leadership or planning and strategizing. Rather, they were reduced to cooking meals in the latest bicycle rally undertaken by the movement. What explains this simultaneous visibility and marginalization? What has been the role of gender mainstreaming and sustainable development discourses in creating such contradictory realities? What are the consequences and the way forward? These are some of the questions that I will address in this paper.

The possibilities and perils for scholar-activists and activist-scholars: Reflections on the "feminist dialogues"

Feminism, among other critical social movements, has a long and rich history of scholar-activism (e.g., Hewitt 2005). What is increasingly evident now, and less studied, is the ubiquity of activist-scholars, whose primary location is in social movements or NGOs but who also produce knowledge, are in dialogue with feminists in the academy as well as policy arenas, and who move easily between the academy and other sites.

As with other hyphenated identities, that of scholar-activist is also fraught with tensions depending on which part of the hyphen is privileged, who does the privileging, and with different consequences for scholars in the academy and activists in social movements. I begin by reflecting on how I experienced these tensions in my early years as a scholar-activist, how changes in the academy as well as social movements have made this movement across borders easier, and then discuss some implications of this relationship for ethnography as well as for activist-scholars located in movements via the example of the Feminist Dialogues at the World Social Forum.

Participation and aging in the council

The research is about the participation and the representative of elderly, in order to think how the public policies are defined, how the aging is thought by the public policy and has been experienced by the members of elderly council. The study aims understand what is the aging in the policy context of participate and rights.

The councils are a space created by the Constitution of 1989 in an effort to implement a democratic state in Brazil. They are an instance formed by representatives from government and civil society in order to supervise the actions of the state, to define resolutions and needs of the population. Their existence is regarded as one of the elements that became the State more democratic.

Each two years, there is a event that join representatives of councils and others instances that work for and with old people to discuss and deliberate the priorities for the public policies that the state will follow for this population.

The ethnography works with three elderly councils in São Paulo in order to understand the way to think, to classify and to indicate about the aging, and life course in the public policy and in the state. These councils studied are formed by aging: more than sixty years old, as the Statute of the Elderly – a important brazilian document elaborate in 2002 - defined.

The research pretends investigate the way the aging is defined and what it is though in the public policies in Brazil, also the efforts about how, when and why do they are considered elderly.

When the old person is the Other

How to do research on aging whose agents refer about the old person as the other, even when they occupy exclusive places for the elderly? How to think by the definitions of the native when he doesn't recognize yourself in the category that is identified? In Brazil, this occurrence is frequent and shows the lines in which are drawn this stage of life and the life course in the national context.

Old is the other one and is thought together with negative terms relating to personality, as lazy, grumpy, sick, neurotic, sad.

The research is qualitative and discusses about elderly councils in which the most of its members are more than sixty years old, as the Statute of the Elderly – a document on national since 2002 – defines this category. Such members, most of them, are in the council in the senior chair and highlight the work done on behalf of the elderly population. They refer the population that they represent as the bedridden people. The argue is they can not leave their homes to be there. These are called, by elderly members's council, as poor old people.

The councils are a space created by the Constitution of 1989 in an effort to implement a democratic State. Stereotypes built through image and gesture

Immigration from poor countries has significantly increased in Southern Europe since 1996, just as it had done previously in northern Europe and the United States. Therefore, there is a growing need to evaluate the differences and similarities among students into high schools, their racist attitude and prejudices, as a tool to achieve integration and social cohesion in Spanish society. This paper is focused in a part of a Research Project for the Spanish Ministry of Science and Innovation (reference: EDU2009-09425). It aims to evaluate the recognition of alterity by Spanish and Latin American Student and if national identity is built by a "white identity". We have developed a questionnaire, carried out into different Spanish high schools and delivered to 2000 pupils, where pupils have to assign a nationality to different people's pictures, some of them "celebrities" and others not. This part of the questionnaire analyses not only colour attribution, but also stereotypes construction, through gestures and image, among pupils from Spain and Latin American. The methodology used has been a codification of the results, and a statistic analysis and correlations methods with SPSS software. The quantitative data of this part of the research shows significant differences among immigrant students from Latin American and their native peers. Those students from Ecuador have medium (13) and low rates (15) of stereotypes in comparison with Spanish pupils, who have high rates of stereotypes mainly (270). This results highlights that multiculturalism and migration processes make less visible the stereotypes and that the attribution of national identity is not made by ethnic or colour prejudices.

Diseño y artesanía. imágenes en tensión entre lo dominante y lo residual

La emergencia del Diseño en América Latina, tanto el industrial como el gráfico y recientemente el diseño de imagen audiovisual han puesto en escena, nuevamente, la tensión entre lo que circula como modo de producción de lo visible en forma dominante y las manifestaciones de culturas locales, con la connotación de autenticidad que ello conlleva.

Efectivamente, ya consolidado el Diseño como una manera formal de producción de imágenes y objetos de circulación y consumo masivo –instalado en el espacio académico- en los escenarios periféricos, surge la cuestión respecto de los usos y apropiaciones de los modelos dominantes.

En este sentido, cabe aclarar que por Diseño suele entenderse la producción de un determinado tipo de imágenes y piezas que suponen una síntesis funcional, formal, económica, ergonómica y estética. También es necesario recordar que la misma toma como modelo los debates respecto de la producción industrial en Alemania, Inglaterra, USA, centralmente. Es decir, un modelo cultural de producción de dispositivos visuales y objetos.

Por ello mismo suele ser considerado un patrón importado y dominante de la producción icónica y objetual en escenarios, como el latinoamericano, que se distinguen de Europa y USA. Y por ello mismo, las producciones del diseño suelen ser consideradas atentatorias contra la producción local del cultural, emblemáticamente representada por la artesanía.

El interés del trabajo es, precisamente, problematizar la idea de lo central y de lo periférico en la producción de objetos e imágenes de circulación y consumo masivos, a partir del debate entre el "ser" del diseño y de la artesanía, tomando casos testigo de usos, apropiaciones y resimbolizaciones de los objetos cotidianos en el mercado cultural latinoamericano.

Finding the 'low hanging fruit': Modelling and experimentation in consumer debt collection organisations

In the world of consumer debt collection, econometric analysis is often used to help debt purchasers price debt portfolios. But an additional usage is, by looking at the past performance of accounts, to help collectors identify for particular attention what one industry consultant referred to as the 'low hanging fruit'. These are defaulting debtors who have in the past shown signs of being the kind of people that are more likely to repay and/or the kind of people likely to repay more (than others in an otherwise similar situation). More precisely, these techniques seek out emergent, embodied tendencies, formed out of particular combinations of life history and lived body, that, for the collector that can both identify and connect to them, offers a major competitive advantage. These in vitro techniques, in turn, are connected to forms of performative, in vivo experimentation. That is to say, modelling techniques are connected to responsive analyses of the reactions of individual debtors to a range of collections prompts (e.g. letters, phonecalls). Both the debtor's past and their actions as they move through the present are shown to provide the empirical grounding for a process of repeated affective 'testing', aimed at discovering—and profiting from—minute variations in debtor dispositions. In exploring these processes, the paper explores the apparently perverse politics that, at times, these process can appear to imply. It also makes an argument for an STS informed approach to the study of market processes (what has been referred to as the 'economization' programme) sensitive to the centrality of emergent, embodied life to many contemporary consumer market technologies and practices.

Educational aspirations among ethnic minority youth in Brussels: Does the perception of ethnic discrimination in the labour market matter? A mixed-method approach

Recent contributions in educational research have shown that the disadvantage of ethnic minorities in school performances cannot be entirely explained by their disadvantaged socioeconomic status. This ethnic disadvantage is not only composed of differences in academic performance, but also of variations in educational choices and aspirations. While the current debate focuses mainly on explaining ethnic differences in school test scores, much less has been done in investigating ethnic differences in educational aspirations. To contribute to this debate, this paper analyses ethnic differences in the level of tertiary education pupils want to achieve as well as the level of education their parents want them to achieve.

Based on a mixed-method approach (3121 questionnaires and 25 interviews of pupils), our contribution investigates ethnic differences among nine ethnic minority groups of pupils in Brussels with regard to their educational aspirations and the aspirations that their parents have for them.

The multivariate analysis of the questionnaires shows that parents' aspirations of all nine ethnic minority groups turn out to be significantly higher than the ones of the majority. However, only pupils from four out of the nine ethnic minorities hold significantly higher aspirations than the majority group. In addition, our mixed-method results did not support the hypothesis on perceived ethnic discrimination on the labour market in explaining the higher educational aspirations of ethnic minority youth. Among ethnic minority youth with high aspirations, the awareness of the intergenerational social mobility project of their parents and the willingness to pursue it play without doubt a role in the construction of their aspirations and career choices. In this case, the educational aspirations are closely linked to the intergenerational social mobility project of their parents. Thus, we conclude by highlighting the relevance of the positive selectivity hypothesis in explaining ethnic differences in educational aspirations.

Trends and tensions in the professionalization of youth work

Traditions and understandings of 'youth work' vary from one country and culture to another, and an exact equivalent of the term does not even exist in many languages. It is nonetheless true that, if it is understood broadly as informal and non-formal educational and developmental work with young people, then in a number of countries in Europe and in other parts of the world 'youth work' has undergone significant processes of professionalization in recent years. These include developments relating to the nature and extent of remunerated employment, the education and training of practitioners, legislative and statutory basis for services, the establishment of ethical guidelines and codes of practice, the creation of professional associations, the growth of youth work research and scholarship, and so on. Such developments tend to – or at least have the potential to – enhance the status of youth work as a profession. At the same time, a number of features of contemporary society – greater public scepticism regarding 'professionals' of all kinds, heightened awareness (at least in some countries) of child protection and safeguarding issues, economic retrenchment and an emphasis on efficiencies, 'value for money', and measurable outcomes – mean that for many youth workers the exercise of judgement and discretion (long held as a hallmark of professionalism) has been undermined. These contrasting trends are frequently at play within the same countries and practice contexts. In the light of this, and drawing on the insights of practitioners themselves, this paper suggests that youth work is at a genuinely critical juncture in its development and faces the challenge (but also the opportunity) of defining what kind of profession it is and wants to be in the 21st century. In doing so, clarification and affirmation of its value base – what it 'professes' – will be a central task.

Men's experiences of antenatal screening: A grounded theory analysis

Antenatal screening requires prospective parents to routinely participate in, and make choices about, genetic testing. While pregnant women's views of screening have been widely researched, those of expectant fathers remain under-explored. We thus conducted in-depth interviews with 12 men about their experiences, as well six women about their partners' involvement in screening. Interview transcripts were analysed using Grounded Theory. Four categories were constructed, (a) Screening as good parenting, (b) Who am I a father to? Deconstructing the "future child" (c) How will I be a father? Deconstructing fatherhood, and (d) Screening, ambivalence and uncertainty. Overall, the findings suggest that men began to integrate the unborn child into their perception of their family, and considered themselves to be fathers to the child before he/she was born. Participating in screening was part of being a 'good parent'. However men's ideas, beliefs and feelings about the future child were challenged by the information that genetic screening provided. Hence screening caused disruption in men's transition to fatherhood, eliciting ambivalence and confusion. Pregnancy was a period of constant adjustment to new ideas about the growing family, as well as their role as the man within that family. The findings suggest that since men are involved in antenatal screening, they require engagement from healthcare professionals in the antenatal setting. Research using a psychometric scale based on our findings is currently underway.

Risk communication strategies, perceptions and attitudes to risks: A Brazilian case study

The debate about environmental/climate change offers a rich opportunity to analyze how perceptions/attitudes/understandings of risk are shaped by the ways in which risk is communicated through the media and other mediating outlets, including scientists and experts who are responsible for risk assessments.

Making use of social constructivist and social amplification of risk frameworks, we investigate how Brazilian academic scientists involved in a large-scale project of climate change on the Coast of São Paulo, Brazil and Brazilian experts involved in mapping of risk areas have dealt with risk communication. We also seek to illuminate the role of the media in this risk communication process.

Based on interviews and focus group meetings with different social actors, our study seeks to investigate (i) how the communication strategies adopted by academic scientists and experts may interfere with the understanding/perceptions/attitudes to risks of policymakers and authorities; (ii) how the media coverage of risks related to environmental/climate change may influence the risk communication process.

Our results point out that academic scientists and experts are conscious about the relevance of risk communication; however their strategies are different. Efforts cover of actions based on knowledge deficit model to participative risk communication strategies, including delivery of reports to policymakers, direct communication with other groups, participation in public audiences, interviews to the media, and interactive workshops.

Despite these efforts, academics and experts recognize that there are still gaps in the dialogue between those who make science and those who use science to make decisions. These gaps may interfere with attitudes to risks.

Considering the debate about environmental/climate change, the social actors also recognize that the media coverage has a formative role in the risk communication process, not just through the transmission of scientific facts, but through the selection, presentation and framing of information.

Risk governance: A need to cope with risks of environmental and climate change in Brazil

Environmental and climate changes are part of a new set of risks that are characterized by incomplete understanding of their causes and consequences, by the fact of being incalculable, impossible to compensate, and often invisible, uncontrollable and irreversible (Beck, 1992, 1995). Dealing with these risk situations is a complex task. It involves difficulties of working across disciplinary or knowledge boundaries, fails to address the long-term implications of decision-making, and weak articulation between scientific research and policymaking.

Drawing on empirical research on the Coast of São Paulo, Brazil we seek to identify and analyze some aspects of governance of risks associated with environmental and climate changes.

From our perspective, dealing with risk situations associated with environmental and climate changes, which are characterized by uncertainty/strain/controversy/complexity, demands a collective decision-making process. This process, called Risk Governance, takes account of the social and cultural factors that influence individualized and collective answers to risks, and considers the social and economic effects related to these risk situations.

However, our study, which includes the analysis of interviews and focus group meetings with social actors (experts/academic scientists/policymakers/community end users), have showed us some important gaps of institutional actions to cope with risks: a lack of a plan to engage the affected public; and fails in putting in practice the idea that public risk perception should play a key role in shaping natural hazards policy and management response. Our analysis has also suggested that there is a weak articulation between those who make science and those who use science to make decisions.

Our observations endorse a need for a debate/practice of Risk Governance in Brazil. There is an urgent need to put in practice a more distributed and participatory approach, which engages scientists, governments, and publics in a shared enterprise of responsible knowledge making to deal with risks.

Identidades, soportes y experiencias biográficas: Heterogeneidades y regularidades en los procesos de individuación de jóvenes en barrios marginalizados del Área metropolitana de Buenos Aires

Objetivo: En la ponencia presentamos resultados del Proyecto de Investigación UBACyT 2010-2012 código 20020090200376 –financiado por la Universidad de Buenos Aires– cuyo objetivo general es analizar los procesos de individuación de jóvenes de nivel socioeconómico medio-bajo y bajo, cuyos principales espacios de sociabilidad se encuentran en barrios marginalizados del Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires (AMBA).

Metodología: Para la construcción de los datos empíricos utilizamos como principal herramienta metodológica los relatos biográficos –retomando las propuestas de Michele Leclerc-Olive–, escritos a partir de aproximadamente cinco entrevistas semiestructuradas con cada joven, ya que desde los mismos tenemos una mejor aproximación a los procesos de construcción de las experiencias sociales de los sujetos y a las vinculaciones entre las reflexividades, contextos y soportes que participan en sus procesos de individuación. Tanto en la determinación de la muestra –que quedó constituida por 10 jóvenes, 5 mujeres y 5 varones, de entre 19 y 30 años de edad– como en el análisis del corpus construido (entrevistas y relatos biográficos) seguimos los lineamientos de la teoría fundamentada (grounded theory), utilizando como herramienta auxiliar el software Atlas.ti.

Principales resultados: La articulación entre las propuestas analíticas de la sociología de la individuación de Danilo Martuccelli y la herramienta metodológica de los relatos biográficos nos permite captar simultáneamente las heterogeneidades y las regularidades presentes en los acontecimientos biográficos, los soportes, las reflexividades y los contextos –socio-económicos, culturales, de género– que participan en los procesos de construcción de las identidades juveniles. Los datos construidos pueden contribuir a un trabajo de ruptura epistemológica con discursos del sentido común –científico y no científico– que muchas veces reproducen concepciones homogeneizadoras en torno a las categorías de “juventud” y de “individualización” en la actual etapa de la modernidad.

Violencias, consumos de drogas y soportes: Sus vinculaciones en experiencias biográficas de jóvenes en barrios marginalizados del Área metropolitana de Buenos Aires

Objetivos: El trabajo se enmarca en el Proyecto UBACyT 2010-2012 código 20020090200376 (financiado por la Universidad de Buenos Aires), cuyo objetivo general es analizar los procesos de individuación de jóvenes de 18 a 25 años de edad, de nivel socioeconómico medio-bajo y bajo, cuyos espacios de sociabilidad se encuentran en barrios marginalizados de la zona sur del Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires (AMBA). En la ponencia presentamos nuestro análisis de las experiencias biográficas de las y los jóvenes en torno a las violencias y los consumos de drogas, indagando sobre sus vinculaciones con los soportes, reflexividades y contextos sociales que participan en sus procesos de individuación.

Metodología: Para la construcción de los datos empíricos utilizamos como principal herramienta metodológica los relatos biográficos –Michele Leclerc-Olive–, escritos a partir de aproximadamente cinco entrevistas

Principales resultados: Las experiencias biográficas de jóvenes de barrios periféricos en torno a las violencias y los consumos de drogas ilegales se presentan en muchos casos como verdaderas pruebas existenciales, vinculadas con diversos soportes que les permiten a los sujetos sostenerse frente al mundo. La reflexión sobre dichos soportes, a partir de la escritura consensuada de relatos biográficos, tiene potencialidades subjetivantes, constituyendo un valioso recurso para proyectos y políticas públicas con jóvenes.

Articulations among collective actions

In this paper I will discuss the study of collective actions within a theoretical framework that includes the notion of radical democracy as well as social democratization. The notion of 'social democratization' refers to the democratization processes in the private sphere. The level of analysis of public processes - political democratization- is broached through the category named "radical democracy": the construction of counter hegemonies resulting from the articulation of popular struggles. Consequently, the paper reflects upon the emergence and articulation of new demands and contributes to a growing synergy for a new generation of studies on democracy and democratization.

My presentation is twofold: First, I will consider the following approach: a) the studies of social movements stem from an approach that explores acquisition of rights in the context of their appearance; b) the radicalization of democracy involves democratization in the public and in the private sphere. Within this framework, special attention will be given to the analysis of the articulations among collective actions involved in the processes of struggles for the expansion of rights. The methodology used has two main steps: the study of the micro level of analysis (actors' practices and discourses, social democratization) and the macro level (articulations, political radicalization).

Second, I will present a case study of collective actions, developed through eight years in Argentina that explores the articulations between popular movements. I suggest that as a wide range of social movements brought new interests to the public agenda it became possible to explore ways for the construction of new political identities and the expansion of citizenship.

Racismo, violencia y otredad. El caso de los estudiantes tipificados como violentos

La construcción social de la categoría "joven violento" es un proceso complejo dentro del cual se entrelazan luchas simbólicas por su definición y reconocimiento. Las taxonomías sociales (Bourdieu, 1991) constituyen herramientas prácticas de conocimiento y comunicación hacia un "otro" que es procesado a través de un sistema de clasificación oficial (doxa) invisibilizado. La forma de moverse, de hablar (el vocabulario), la vestimenta (ropa deportiva, ajustada), la música (cumbia, rock), las actividades (ir a bailar o no) y los gustos estéticos operan como parámetros de clasificación a través de los cuales los jóvenes se definen y reconocen como violentos o no violentos.

En este trabajo quisiera indagar sobre la sociodinámica de la estigmatización, en términos de Norbert Elias, que se desarrolla en la escuela entre diferentes grupos de pares; fundamentalmente en la construcción de sentidos en torno a los alumnos tipificados como violentos. Si bien la cualidad de "violento" puede constituirse en un elemento de estigmatización hacia un determinado grupo, ese grupo también puede resignificar ese atributo y construir su identidad desde allí tratando de modificar los desequilibrios de poder. Las adjetivaciones que utilizan los propios alumnos para describir las características y rasgos de los diferentes grupos muchas veces conllevan expresiones de racismo (Wieviorka, 2009) que tienen como fin inferiorizar al otro. Estos actos de nombramiento atraviesan a los estudiantes en la construcción de su autoestima e identidad impactando en su trayectoria escolar y social.

Se tomará como material empírico 16 entrevistas en profundidad realizadas a estudiantes de dos escuelas secundarias de gestión estatal de la provincia de Buenos Aires (Argentina) en el marco de mi tesis doctoral que dirige Carina Kaplan.

En los últimos años, gran parte de la literatura que abordó las transformaciones ocurridas en Buenos Aires ha referido a que se ha configurado una ciudad con altos niveles de exclusión y segregación social. Sin embargo, la evidencia empírica muestra que, antes de la existencia de una segregación social y espacial, el espacio urbano de Buenos Aires es un escenario de múltiples usos y ocupaciones que va configurando diversos tipos de conflictos urbanos. El consentimiento en la administración. Un estudio sobre las motivaciones y los sentidos del trabajo en trabajadores de la administración pública

La sociología del trabajo reconoce como una de sus tradiciones el análisis de las razones del consentimiento de los obreros en la producción de plusvalores en la empresa capitalista. Fundamentalmente en el marco de las perspectivas marxistas, en donde es central el principio de la relación contradictoria y antagónica en trabajo y capital, la pregunta en torno al porque los trabajadores explotados en la empresa capitalista, colaboran deliberadamente en la producción de valores que les son extraños, atravesó buena parte de la literatura y continúa interpelando a las ciencias sociales, fundamentalmente a partir de las nuevas modalidades de políticas empresariales conocidas como new management, que despliegan una batería de dispositivos orientados a conseguir la implicación subjetiva de los trabajadores en el proceso de trabajo (e incluso fuera de la producción directa).

Menos atención se ha prestado en general a las relaciones laborales en el ámbito público donde la relación capital trabajo aparece, al menos, mediada; y en particular a las lógicas de consentimiento y de implicación laboral en este sector. En efecto, los trabajadores del sector público, si bien conocen y reconocen un empleador, que ejerce también una coerción vinculada a la conversión de fuerza de trabajo en trabajo efectivo; las formas de esa coerción, así como los modos de vincularse con el trabajo y con el resultado de su labor suponen una diferencia sustancial con lo que ocurre en los ámbitos privados. Nuestra intención en este trabajo es analizar las motivaciones y sentidos subjetivos del trabajo de los trabajadores de la Administración Pública Nacional.

El estudio se fundamenta en un análisis eminentemente cualitativo a partir de entrevistas en profundidad realizadas entre 2005 y 2009, a trabajadores de la Administración Pública Nacional, fundamentalmente en el Ministerio de Trabajo y de Educación.

Estado local y conflictividad laboral durante el gobierno de mauricio macri

A partir de diciembre de 2007 asumió Mauricio Macri como nuevo jefe de Gobierno de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, liderando el partido PRO con el cual ganó las elecciones de 2007 y consiguió su reelección en 2011. Enrolado en una tradición política de derechas, el nuevo gobierno tomó una serie de medidas fuertemente agresivas contra los trabajadores del estado local, y contra sus organizaciones sindicales en particular. Como caso paradigmático e ilustrativo puede mencionarse dos medidas tomadas en la primera semana de gobierno: el despido de 2300 trabajadores contratados acusados de "ñoquis" y la intervención de la obra social manejada por el sindicato mayoritario (SUTECBA).

A lo largo de los cuatro años de su gestión en diversas áreas de la administración local fueron desplegándose conflictos laborales de diversa intensidad. Uno de los más paradigmáticos es el conflicto que se desarrolló en el ámbito del Teatro Colón. Durante las etapas del conflicto que continúa irresuelto, se modificó el estatuto del teatro, se cambió sustancialmente la concepción del ente, se realizaron despidos, fueron reubicados cientos de trabajadores, se intentó despedir delegados sindicales y se demandó económicamente tanto a los delegados como a sus organizaciones.

Dos sindicatos que se distinguen fuertemente por sus tradiciones ideológicas, por sus prácticas de representación y por sus concepciones del estado, se disputan la representación de los trabajadores del Teatro Colón: la Asociación de Trabajadores del Estado (ATE) y el Sindicato Único de Trabajadores del Estado de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires (SUTECBA). En este trabajo nos interesa analizar, a la luz de estas diferencias, las estrategias y prácticas desplegadas por ambas organizaciones a lo largo de este conflicto.

El estudio se basa en entrevistas en profundidad realizadas a trabajadores, delegados y dirigentes sindicales y funcionarios del Teatro, así como en el análisis de documentos y periódicos.

La construcción de la identidad euskaldun a inicios del siglo XXI: Facebook y la juventud vasca Tomando como punto de partida los elementos que caracterizan la gran parte de las sociedades occidentales postmodernas actuales como son el dinamismo, la pérdida de fuerza de las instituciones y el empoderamiento del sujeto reflexivo (Bauman, 2003; Beck & Beck-Gernsheim, 2003; Jameson, 1996; Sennet, 2006, 2007), me he basado en dos pilares teóricos para la elaboración de mi tesis doctoral que está en marcha: la identidad euskaldun y las redes sociales online.

El principal objeto de estudio es la identidad colectiva euskaldun y más concretamente los procesos de construcción social de la misma. Quiero reflexionar sobre la pregunta de estudio que concierne al análisis de la identidad nacional, superando la pregunta esencialista de "qué es ser euskaldun" que trata mediante definiciones estancas (raza, lugar de nacimiento-residencia-trabajo y/o idioma) responder una cuestión sociológicamente irresoluble (Butler, 2004; Hall, 2003) y etnosociológicamente resuelta (CEIC, 2005). Por ello traslado la pregunta a "cómo se construye" (Pérez-Agote, 2008) para profundizar en parte de qué nos hacen sentir esas prác-ticas identitarias defendiendo que la importancia (etno)sociológica no está en ser vasco. Más bien radica en un hacer vasco según lo cual determinadas prácticas convierten al sujeto miembro del colectivo euskaldun de una manera momentánea, pudiendo este poner en práctica a continuación o simultáneamente otra identidad nacional u otras identidades de otra índole (sexo o edad).

Este acercamiento teórico lo realizo desde un estudio de caso: el uso que hace la juventud vasca de Facebook. Desde este campo de análisis parto de una hipótesis analítica fuerte: la identidad euskaldun hoy en día también es posible construirla fuera de un espacio geográfico como es el estado-nación. Lo cual, pone en cuestión la propia noción que de Euskal Herria (Pueblo Vasco) y "Euskal Hiria" (Ciudad Vasca) se tenía hasta el momento y el papel de la Diáspora.

Las configuraciones subjetivas del trabajo precario en Puerto Rico

El propósito de esta ponencia es discutir las configuraciones subjetivas del trabajo precario en Puerto Rico a partir de una visión de la subjetividad desde una perspectiva histórico-cultural. El panorama laboral en Puerto Rico se caracteriza por el desempleo estructural, bajos salarios y el aumento del empleo contingente y a tiempo parcial. A partir del 2006, se ha agudizado la crisis fiscal y la recesión económica. En el 2009, el despido de cerca de 30,000 empleados gubernamentales y el aumento en la tasa de desempleo sobre 16% acrecentó la precariedad laboral. De tal forma, la investigación que presentaré fue un estudio de siete casos de jóvenes con trabajos precarios que tenía el propósito de comprender las configuraciones subjetivas que están en la base de estas experiencias. La aproximación metodológica se apoyó en la epistemología cualitativa, enfatizando el carácter constructivo-interpretativo y dialógico de la investigación. El proceso de construcción de la información inició con dos sesiones con cada participante donde utilicé las técnicas de dinámica conversacional, frases incompletas, creación de un collage y producción de un escrito que sirvieron de incitadores para la producción de sentido subjetivo. Los indicadores (categorías dirigidas a dar sentido a lo no observable) elaborados a través del análisis constructivo-interpretativo permitieron generar hipótesis que, en el proceso dinámico y contradictorio de la construcción de la información, fueron transformadas en una construcción teórica sobre las configuraciones subjetivas del trabajo precario. Este trabajo muestra elementos para comprender las contradicciones que hacen que el trabajo precario pueda ser fuente de placer y de sufrimiento. Además, muestra formas diferenciadas de subjetivación de la situación del trabajo precario, aspecto que puede generar trayectorias diferenciadas en la constitución de la subjetividad.

The role of the fatosphere in obese adults' sense of inclusion and changing responses to obesity stigma

Obese adults face pervasive and repeated weight-based stigma, which has been described as one of the last remaining prejudices within Western societies. In the face of a prominent societal discourse around weight that emphasises the personal responsibility of individuals to maintain and achieve 'acceptable bodies', there is a growing counter-movement that questions the evidence behind this dominant rhetoric and offers alternative perspectives. This research examines the experiences of 44 individuals who are engaged with the weblog (or blog) community known as the Fatosphere – an online fat acceptance community. This online community is comprised of individuals who provide support for fat individuals, and engages in discussion that questions and critically examines the dominant discourse surrounding weight and obesity within today's society. Encouragement for individuals to accept oneself and one's body no matter their size and disassociate themselves from weight loss rhetoric is also provided within this space. This research focuses on individuals' pathways into the Fatosphere and perceptions of inclusion and exclusion relating to their offline and online environments. In addition, the impact of the Fatosphere on individuals' responses and interactions with stigma, perceptions of health and wellbeing, and effect that it had within their offline lives are also examined. The Fatosphere provides a unique opportunity for obese individuals to engage in a community removed from the dominant discourse within society and provides an alternative pathway for individuals to counter and cope with the stigma that they experience in their day-to-day lives.

"I am German, too" biographical accounts of young Muslim women from an intersectional perspective

The concept of "hybrid identity" (Hall 1994) implies that people feel they belong to different hegemonic cultural spaces. This description seems to be adequate for a new generation of young women in Germany who define Islam as a major identity marker and simultaneously feel as German citizens. However, in everyday life this subject position can be highly precarious in different social fields because Islam is still perceived as the cultural other. The aim of this paper is to strongly connect empirical data with theoretical considerations. First, it draws on biographical narratives with young, female Muslims from a religious youth organization to show how they struggle for a Muslim and German identity during adolescence. The biographies reveal the importance of their faith-based community to successfully integrate their religious and national identities. Nevertheless, it also shows the women's experience of double marginalization due to the non-recognition of their new subject position by the host society and within their religious milieu. On a theoretical level it will be argued that the intersectional approach is a fruitful way to analyze life realities and ambivalent social positioning of Muslim-German women. The analysis illustrates how strongly the social representations of a "German narrative" and "Muslim narrative" are bound to and interwoven with categories of ethnicity, religion, gender and class. However, the paper suggests that categories of religion and secularity have been undertheorized in intersectional approaches on gender and migration. This study of representatives of the so-called "second generation" of guest workers in Germany reveals that not gender, class or ethnicity but religion is the major mechanism of social exclusion.

Young, Muslim and German: Precarious identity constructions and the need for communal belonging

"Individualization of religious belief" has been described as the paramount development among post-immigrant Muslim youth in Germany that connects them with European modernity. In many studies this individualized Islam is caught in descriptions of privatization, religious bricolage and the declining importance of religious institutions. The increasing pluralization of a vital Muslim youth culture in class, gender, ethnicity and understanding of Islam reflects these notions of modern adolescence. This paper provides a deep insight into one facet of today's German Muslim youth culture and argues against a one-sided interpretation of individualized Muslim subjectivity. Muslims women from a religious youth organization who resist superimposed narratives of Islam and ethnicity are presented. Their identity constructions are strongly informed by Muslim piety and claims of German citizenship. This study's analysis is based on ethnographic fieldwork, group discussions, and six biographical narratives of Muslim women aged between 16 and 26 years old. By taking contemporary theories of identity and religion into account, the paper will question the individualization thesis in two ways. First, the biographical accounts and collective negotiations within the faith-based community illustrate the need for communal belonging in a context of minority experience, discrimination, and non-recognition of the hybrid self-understanding. The results show that, against a self-chosen and privatized religiosity, having mutual affirmation and collective experience within an institutional setting is a precondition in order to maintain the precarious religious-national identity. Second, the ways these women speak about themselves reveal not only a language of individualism and conscious engagement with the Islamic tradition, but also a strong orientation towards the community and opposition against certain liberal understandings of the self. These findings show a differentiated picture of the ongoing transformations within the German Muslim community and thus encourage us to rethink theories of postmodernity and reflexive modernization in the light of youthful religiosity.

Effects of tuition fees and socioeconomic background on the educational decision for higher education

As academic education was free of charge for decades, tuition fees were introduced at German universities in 2006. However not all German Lander settled the law and implemented tuition fees at the respective universities. From research perspective this is a nice natural experiment, as the change of costs for an academic study is exogenous. According to RATT-theories of educational decision changing cost should yield impact on class specific educational decision. From this perspective a quasi exogenous variation could be used to test the effect of the cost argument on class specific educational decision. The research hypothesis is, the introduction of tuition fees affected the educational decision going to universities and decreased especially the proportion of students from working class background going to university. Difference in differences analyses confirm a treatment effect in the tuition fee introducing areas of Germany, which is strongest for working class graduates.

When culture is turned against heritage: Monumental architecture, urban landscapes and an imagined multi-arts cultural centre in Buenos Aires

Culture and the arts are today at the centre of policy agendas for urban revitalisation and city branding across the globe. Paradoxically, cultural venues and heritage in the city suffer neglect, damage and lack of public funding. This paper seeks to address this contradiction by examining a cultural regeneration project that concerns the transformation of an iconic listed building into a spectacular cultural centre, focusing on the role of culture and the arts in contemporary disputes over public space. The building at stake is the magnificent Post and Telecommunications Palace in Buenos Aires, currently under refurbishment, whose dome has been recently converted into a symbol of architectural prestige inspired by global cultural trends. This operation, which infringed the regulations of heritage protection for listed buildings, was rendered visible in the context of the national bicentenary commemorations in Argentina and was made productive in the process of democratic political revitalisation initiated by the federal government. Based on empirical research (in-depth interviews with stakeholders, visual materials and official documents) and drawing on insights from cultural geography and sociology, the paper analyses the underpinning rationale for the creation of a cultural quarter in downtown Buenos Aires, one which is based on the international hegemonic discourse of the creative industries. If culture and the arts are central to the revitalisation of urban spaces the question of whose culture and whose heritage are being promoted arises. The paper sheds light on the process by which a sense of place (Massey, 1994) is negotiated through the uses of culture and the arts in the shaping of place-making strategies in contemporary cities.

Elites estratégicas y cambio institucional: La construcción del proyecto post- neoliberal en Argentina y Brasil

En la última década, los países de América Latina, han atravesado, en diversos ritmos y maneras, una transición política y económica. El proyecto neoliberal ha ido perdido fuerza y, en contrapartida, se ha revitalizado la discusión sobre desarrollo nacional, prácticamente ausente desde el fracaso del período sustitutivo. La agenda neodesarrollista, aún en construcción, recupera elementos del modelo cepalino-estructuralista al tiempo que se encuentra limitada por herencias del período neoliberal. Se puede afirmar que la expresión que adquiere dicha agenda en el plano nacional es resultado del modo en que se resuelven las tensiones entre rupturas y continuidades. En esta dinámica, las elites políticas son un factor explicativo central. El artículo se propone analizar el papel de las elites, entendidas de modo simple como los actores estratégicos de los campos político y económico con capacidad de influir en el ciclo de políticas, en la conformación del régimen productivo. El análisis se restringe a Argentina y Brasil centrándonos especialmente al período transicional entre el proyecto neoliberal y la ruptura que genera la llegada al poder de coaliciones progresistas que buscan implementar una agenda neo-desarrollista. El artículo se basa en una serie de entrevistas realizadas a decisores políticos y empresarios con actuación gremial y analiza las percepciones que las elites tienen sobre los proyectos de desarrollo en curso.

Las voces de piedra en saramago

¿Cómo una literatura comprometida encontra en la magia y en la mirabilia las condiciones ideales para el desarrollo de su tese social y historiográfica? – La respuesta a esa pregunta és comprender cómo el escritor portugués José Saramago hace la interpretacion de su realidad y la História, así como su obra, refleje el imaginario popular latinoamericano, fusión que agrega el político, la historiografía y las tradiciones populares. És por la subversión de las voces que Saramago produce el escenario ideal para construcción de un universo mítico. Por quitar de el Historiador la voz de constitución del recorrido histórico, el escritor concede a las capas populares el derecho de, a través de la cosmovisión del sentido común, redefinir los paradigmas de una nueva orden social e factual. Esa percepción de un mundo mítico ibero-latinoamericano creado por la tradición popular inserta la obra "La Balsa de Piedra" en la dimensión de reencuentro com la Latinamerica, en un proceso de etno-cartografias de el imaginario peninsular de la Ibéria y su relaciones con el pueblo latinoamericano, entre el hombre, el pasado y la posibilidad de integración geopolítica.

Black graduated women in the workplace in France. Experiences of exclusion and marginalization

The colonial past of France promotes the coexistence of different cultures and backgrounds in the workplace. How are employees with various socially situated characters, like Black women graduates, integrated? Despite the assertion of the republican equality, they experience exclusion, marginalization and racism which take the form of discrimination in access to employment, occupational status, in contracts, salaries and in daily life at work. They are particularly vulnerable to the effect of gender, origin, age and disability. In order to unveil these discriminations at work, semi-structured interviews were conducted in 2008/09 with 10 women of Caribbean and / or African origin, aged from 28 to 56 years. Their community with the author mostly convinced them to participate in the survey. These ten "case studies" can demonstrate that due to their ethnicization, Black women graduates face specific challenges in their careers and have to develop individual coping strategies. This paper highlights management practices, social communication, forms of leadership and decision making as they are subjectively perceived and experienced by these minority women in the French public and private sector. Carried out in the field of occupational psychodynamics, these case studies are also based on empirical sociology, social anthropology, cultural studies and management studies, and aim to contribute to knowledge on ethno cultural diversity in the workplace. This paper also relies on the feminist "standpoint theory", which postulates an "epistemic privilege" of minorities whose experiences of oppression can build a critical and methodological theory of the social world. For this new principle of objectivity, the identity strategies of resistance are answers to the constraints that deny the identity and needs of the selves. The symbolic violence of stigmatizing social representations is examined at three key moments of a career: access to employment, social relationships at work and the exercise of executive functions

How do Cameroon women of diaspora build their professional identity on the web? A study case

What are the posture, statements and engagement of Francophone Cameroon women of Diaspora in Web sites and social networks? They are involved in digital media in order to receive a reward in their community and from the institutions. This paper is based on a case study : a trained web journalist, a web self-educated facilitator and an online chief editor. The first is included in a traditional academic context and is a member of a structured media. The second has an "amateurish" and militant approach. The third holds editorial function without using the forms of communication of social networks. Novel and short stories published at the author, versus sociological research; professionalism versus experimentation; structural constraint versus freedom of expression, professional identity versus ethnic sexual identity, production of information versus militant messages, national perspective versus pan-African approach. And for the last one, a posture based on the generational traditional African family precedence that does not promote individuality. They are ambivalent between their desire of visibility and their posture as females. This paper draws on symbolic interactionism and leans on identity and professionalism in discursive production. The selves produce specific discourses on their practice, on their identity and on other actors. The assumption is that producing statements on the Web is a way to search success and recognition as "opinion leaders".

Mentally disordered offenders subject to conditional discharge: Their views of risk assessment and management procedures

Background: Mentally disordered offenders are a group of people whom policy makers have viewed as posing a high level of risk to others. There has been a growing body of sociological work focussing on the way in which risk has become a defining concept within late-modern society. Whilst research has investigated the way in which health and social care professionals view risk management processes, research into service user views has been less common.

Aim: This paper will present research exploring the level of awareness that mentally disordered offenders have about the risk assessment and management procedures that they are subject to.

Research method: All participants interviewed had been detained under s. 37/41 of the Mental Health Act 1983 (England and Wales) and had committed serious offences such as manslaughter or arson. Service users discharged from this order are normally given a conditional discharge in which they are monitored by mental health staff. The research was primarily qualitative and was based on nineteen semi-structured interviews. Participants were asked to consider how they came to be on the order, their own interpretation of their risk and their awareness of risk assessment and management procedures.

Findings: Although participants generally recognised that risk assessments about them existed, their awareness of the content was low. The majority stated that they had not seen their assessment. A number of participants were unclear about what a risk assessment was and confused it with other procedures. A minority felt that they had been involved in the construction of their risk assessment. When asked to rate their own risk, participants identified a greater number of risks than staff in professional risk assessments overall. However, participants rated their level of risk to others as lower than staff.

Digital office sentimental: The search of the internet as an aid to love relationships

This paper aims to discuss the search of the Internet as an aid to love relationships, with the object of analysis a site whose content ranges from articles, personal opinions, exchange of experiences or even advice to the public, which is characterized as a kind of contemporary version of office sentimental similar to those seen in other media. In print media, radio and television, the search for guidelines was attended by professionals in the field of psychology and psychiatry to discuss the conflicts and problems of relationships of others. However, the Internet changes this situation, since the training to produce a site or join a forum is not necessarily required. Taking into account these considerations, we seek to discuss the following issues: The Internet has changed the direction to search for love relationships? To what extent does the specialist, focused on a professional profile in other media, takes on new meaning with the use of the Internet? How is the relationship between the public and "advisor", and the relationship between them in the exchange of experiences through forums? The internet would have facilitated the production of counter-hegemonic discourses on love relationships?

Thus, the work focuses on one of the sites that make up my doctoral research: www.sexoerelacionamentos.com.br. This is an information portal focused on topics related to sexuality and relationships that she has two years of existence, with an audience around 319,675 visits per month. In order to check the settings in the Internet search takes for help sessions I will specifically focus on presenting guidelines to relationships, written by professionals in the field of psychology that receive love problems of the public by e-mail, as well as an online discussion forum that also make up the site.

White power activists' use of virtual social space and its implications

Although virtual social spaces on the internet have been used to challenge social inequalities, virtual social spaces have also been successfully used to promote a racist agenda. As Simi and Futrell (2009:83) point out: "The Web has given Aryans a new place to assemble in expansive cyber-communities where they preserve racist and anti-Semitic narratives and build virtual social solidarity. Online forums are echo chambers for hate." Based on interviews of white power activists in the U.S., we consider their perceptions about the effectiveness of the internet in recruiting members and advancing their beliefs and goals. For example, Matt Hale, an imprisoned lawyer and leader of World Church of the Creator, found that the internet "substantially has been quite a boom for us. It has brought us many members and many intelligent members at that." On the other hand JM cautions: "Nothing is a secret anymore. Privacy is non-existent, especially e-mail is NOT safe." Some movement supporters mention concern about censorship. We consider the theoretical implications of their strategies and possible counterstrategies to "virtual hate" (Simi and Futrell 2009: 83) recognizing that "the transnational character of the internet can make applying normal defamation or anti-hatred laws on the internet extremely difficult" (Gelber 2011:18).

Tic y bienestar: El impacto de las habilidades digitales en las trayectorias académicas y laborales de los jóvenes uruguayos evaluados por PISA 2003 (en base a estudio de tipo Panel)

Existe importante evidencia acumulada en torno a la creciente diversificación de las trayectorias académico-laborales de los jóvenes de la sociedad uruguaya contemporánea y sus serias consecuencias para el proceso de reproducción de la desigualdad social y los primeros inicios de movilidad social.

Habiéndose consignado ya los efectos que tienen sobre las trayectorias el clima educativo y estrato del hogar de origen, el género, los centros educativos y las competencias cognitivas desarrolladas hasta los 15 años (Boado & Fernández 2010), el presente proyecto propone la necesidad de estudiar un nuevo factor clave para las oportunidades de bienestar social en las sociedades informacionales contemporáneas: las habilidades digitales (también denominadas e-skills). Se propone que estas destrezas comienzan a posicionarse en el núcleo básico del paquete de activos necesarios para aprovechar las oportunidades que se abren en los distintos ámbitos de la sociedad (Kaztman 2010).

La investigación en la que se basa la ponencia, pretende contribuir a la generación de conocimiento sobre el impacto de las TIC en el bienestar mediante el estudio del efecto de las habilidades digitales en las trayectorias académico-laborales de los jóvenes uruguayos evaluados por PISA 2003. Para llevar adelante dicha tarea se elaboraron modelos estadísticos multivariados de tipo logístico utilizando los microdatos de la primera encuesta de seguimiento (2007) del panel de jóvenes uruguayos evaluados por el Programa PISA (OECD) en el año 2003.

Managing religions in Cuba: Closing the 20th century

African inspired traditions represent a distinct cultural phenomenon within Cuba's national, multicultural aesthetic. Combined with Protestants, practitioners of the traditions experienced major changes in their ability to participate in affairs of the socialist's state. This paper is a descriptive analysis of changes in the relationship between religious believers and Cuban policy. Inspiration for research that undergirds the paper came from Emil Durkheim's proclamation for sociologists that decisive cause of a "social fact" is to be found within the preceding social facts that researchers must investigate. Jürgen Habermas offered a similar assertion that sociology must search for "verstehenden, or interpretive, access" to its research domain(s) because processes already exist for reaching understanding and it is through and in these that the domain is antecedently constituted before any theoretical grasp of it occurs.

The proposition of this paper is that preceding Cuban social facts, though rarely referenced, are directly linked to religious believers' current ability to participate in governmental affairs. This was a major shift for those who practice Cuba's distinct – Africa inspired traditions and for Protestants. Field research with the two categories of religious customs undergirds the paper and the analysis is based on a verstandend/interpretive understanding of the link between preceding social facts and changes in religious practitioners' ability to publicly participate in the socialist government's infrastructures.

Changes for the traditions and for Protestantism were effected in the decade of 1984 to 1994 as the socialist government initiated official sanction for believers' participation in state affairs. President Fidel Ruiz Castro attendance at a 1984 Havana worship honoring Martin Luther King Jr. was the watershed event that precipitated the definitive series of nationally televised conversations between religious believers and state officials and produced the eventual changes in government policy. This paper will engage these issues.

RC21-514.7DOHNKE, Jan (Freie Universität Berlin, jan.dohnke@fu-berlin.de)Participation and market-driven development

Based in the Ciudad Autonoma de Buenos Aires, the paper examines two processes that have a high local impact in the Argentine capital, the construction of high-rise housing in middle- and upper middle-class neighbourhoods and the renewal and gentrification of the historical inner city. Both processes affect different strata of the population in very distinctive ways but ultimately challenge their right to remain within their neighbourhoods under self-chosen conditions.

In both cases, urban planning is guided by a laissez-faire attitude towards private investment and market-driven development, only partially framing or regulating it. As a consequence, options for participation are very limited, causing local inhabitants to organize, voice their claims and find other ways to challenge current urban development. The different strata of the population affected employ very different strategies, which are linked closely to their own resources and power relations both within their neighbourhoods as well as with political institutions.

As local inhabitants try to achieve the same goal, to apply their "right to the city" in order to achieve a more socially sustainable urban development for them, the paper shows that the on-going restructuring of the Argentine capital does not only have adverse effects but also triggers new modes of participation and resistance which might allow to counterbalance current forms of urban development.

RC26-451.2DOMANSKI, Dmitri (TU Dortmund University - Sozialforschungsinstitut Dortmund, domanski@sfs-dortmund.de)Democratization through social innovation - pirate party Germany and new methods of civic participation

The purpose of this paper is to show by applying the concept of social innovation how a political party can contribute to an increasing democratization of a society and its political system. This will be illustrated by the example of the Pirate Party Germany, which has gained importance within the party system due to new methods of civic participation.

Social innovation is understood as a new combination of social practices in certain areas of action or social contexts prompted by certain actors or constellations of actors in an intentional targeted manner in order to better satisfy needs than is possible on the basis of established practices. The growing significance of this concept can be comprehended in light of the paradigm shift of the innovation system, characterized i.a. by co-ordination between different groups of stakeholders involved in innovation activities and increased involvement of users/citizens in processes of co-development.

In Germany, as in many other countries, civil society beyond the party system has been very active in developing new ways of democratization. However, the Pirate Party (founded in 2006) demonstrates that a political party can also successfully contribute to creating a new model of democracy. This model's main features are a significantly increased civic participation and transparency of political decision-making, which are achieved through internet and the method of LiquidFeedback, allowing every citizen to participate in formation of the party platform.

In this context, internet and the LiquidFeedback software as technical innovations enable a social innovation: new way of political work characterized by participative, gradual, decentralized and transparent opinion-shaping and decision-making, which can be permanently revised and updated by everyone. As innovations are measured by impact, 8.9% of votes in the Federal State of Berlin parliamentary elections prove that this new model is an innovation and not a mere invention.

WG02-522.3DOMINGUES, José Maurício (IESP-UERJ, jmdomingues@iesp.uerj.br)Modernity, freedom and this-worldly activism: Max Weber in Latin America, India and China

One crucial aspect of modernity such as identified by Max Weber was the appearance of a sort attitude oriented to this world, ascetic and bent on actively changing the circumstances of social life. This was identified later on by Parsons for instance as the activist thrust of US culture. Weber contrasted this to the pragmatic adaptation of Confucian literati and the flight from the world typical of Indic civilization. Morse in turn suggested that in 'Iberian' America it was a less than ascetic attitude which prevail, although he is not clear about its activist character. Also all of these authors it is only individuals, not collectivities that are at stake. This paper will argue that indeed activism is typical of modernity, that it has spread globally, that it has hybridized with other cultural formations. Whose specific nature has to be identified in the global but heterogeneous modern civilization, and that one of its main manifestation, alongside Weber's stress on rationalization, is the this-worldly oriented struggle for freedom, which he overlooked. Contemporary Latin America, India and China will be compared with this in mind.

Pero, al mismo tiempo, otros elementos dan cuenta de que esa participación social va acompañada de la conservación de roles tradicionales en el marco de la familia, que ponen en tensión su participación social y abren interrogantes acerca del alcance de los avances en la equidad de géneros. La ponencia centra su reflexión desde una perspectiva generacional comparada, en el papel actual de la mujer joven en el reordenamiento del modelo socioeconómico cubano e identifica algunos de los principales desafíos que enfrenta para su consolidación como ente clave en las dinámicas educativas, laborales y del ejercicio del poder a nivel de la sociedad, a la vez que un componente del núcleo familiar que pueda disponer de un espacio de desarrollo simétrico y de un claro ejercicio de su autoridad.

Aunque se intenta que esa transformación se realice de un modo no traumático, está implicando una acelerada transformación en un relativo corto tiempo y un incremento de su heterogeneidad, que está teniendo y tendrá un conjunto de impactos para las juventudes. A partir de resultados de investigaciones sociológicas, se analiza la complejización del panorama del empleo juvenil, cuyos rasgos más significativos son la diversificación de los espacios laborales según nuevos criterios de diferenciación como el tipo de propiedad que heterogeneiza los mecanismos estructurantes del empleo y las correlaciones tradicionales entre calificación profesional, importancia y utilidad social del trabajo, condiciones laborales, ingresos y prestigio social, entre las más relevantes; así como la segmentación de dichos espacios entre aquellos en condiciones ventajosas por las condiciones de trabajo, acceso a la tecnología e ingresos, frente a otros segmentos que, en una escala descendente, se alejan entre sí. Por ello, resulta cada vez más difícil concebir el imaginario laboral de las juventudes sin considerar la creciente diversidad de sus itinerarios y expectativas en relación con el trabajo, asociados a la creciente diferenciación de sus rasgos socioestructurales y su ubicación en los distintos espacios laborales, así como las contradicciones entre el modelo de trabajo en que se socializaron – y se continúan socializando – y el modelo real en que deben desempeñarse. A pesar de esos procesos, las investigaciones identifican un conjunto de particularidades de la relación juventud – empleo en el caso cubano y señalan los retos que representan a las políticas públicas.

'The beautiful business': The new managers of Brazilian football organizations

In the globalized world of sport, the growing notion that football clubs should be run as businesses rather than non-profit social entertainment organizations has changed the organizational structure of Brazilian clubs in the last two decades, in what can be best understood as a process of institutional isomorphism. Clubs otherwise run by elected officials who worked in their free time without pay are now hiring experts to take care of the business side of sport. At the same time, we see new "sports marketing" companies working with clubs, getting them ready for new business opportunities. Does this mean a deep change in the organizational culture of Brazilian football? How do these new sport executives balance the business side and the competitive side of sport? The study of a new field of MBA programs aimed at sports executives points to the rise of a new profession with a complex organizational culture that ties together sporting success, governance, marketability and club fan culture.

Tackling healthcare cost issue with a population health perspective: Challenges and strategies

Healthcare cost containment is the most challenging issue facing nations worldwide. How to provide the public with optimal healthcare service with a sustainable healthcare system is probably the most important task for any government. Canada's spending on healthcare has been increasing sharply in recent decades, and a number of provinces are already running their healthcare systems in a deficit. How to preserve our healthcare system is now a pressing issue to the Canadian government as well as the Canadians. Canada devotes more of its GDP to healthcare than all but five of 32 industrialized nations. In the year 2010, Canada's healthcare expenditure was at $192 billion. Its healthcare spending is 12% above the OECD average. At a pan-Canada level, per capita spending was $5,614 in 2010, while provincial per capita spending was estimated to range from a low at $5,096 in Quebec to a high at $6,266 in Alberta. In the territories, per capita spending was estimated to range from $7,977 in Yukon to $12,356 in Nunavut (CIHI, 2010a). Therefore, healthcare cost escalation and high healthcare cost is the most challenging issue in Canada's provincial and territorial healthcare systems. It is also a major issue to Canadian healthcare system as a whole. The unstoppable trend makes the Canadian healthcare system unsustainable. This paper takes a population health perspective to explore ways in which a reduced healthcare cost can be achieved in Canada. Just as most population health issues can be tackled outside of healthcare settings, healthcare cost containment can be achieved through various efforts.

Estado de situación de los derechos relacionados con el trabajo y la seguridad social en el área urbana de la Argentina, 2004-2011

El objetivo de este trabajo es analizar el cumplimiento de una serie de derechos relacionados con el trabajo y la seguridad social a partir de los datos de la Encuesta de la Deuda Social Argentina (EDSA-UCA), 2004-2011.

Se parte de considerar que en la vida de las personas, el trabajo trasciende la necesidad de satisfacer necesidades económicas, sino que se constituye en una fuente de reconocimiento social, en la posibilidad de objetivar las actividades en un producto, en un factor que promueve el desarrollo humano al generar satisfacción e independencia, y en la posibilidad de identificarse con un colectivo social. Sin embargo, para que dichos factores adquieran un carácter positivo para cada sujeto, se requiere del cumplimiento de un nivel mínimo de normas y derechos, en virtud de que su incumplimiento ocasiona inserciones en el mercado de trabajo de escasa calidad que influyen negativamente en la satisfacción laboral y en el bienestar personal y familiar.

En la Argentina, luego de la aplicación de políticas neoliberales que culminaron en la crisis económica y social de 2001, y de una década signada por el crecimiento y la implementación de normativas laborales protectoras, aún perduran inequidades en el acceso al trabajo y dificultades para lograr un trabajo de calidad.

La evidencia empírica observada indica que aún se debe avanzar para lograr un cumplimiento genuino e integral de los derechos laborales y de la seguridad social.

Los principales indicadores utilizados son la realización de aportes a la seguridad social, la continuidad laboral, el nivel de remuneraciones, el acceso al trabajo, la antigüedad laboral, la insatisfacción con el empleo, la participación sindical y las posibilidades de contar con prestaciones de obra social.

La unidad de análisis a considerar será la población económicamente activa de 18 años o más de los centros urbanos de la Argentina.

Teaching as an act of caregiving: Transforming the lived experience of people with alzheimer's through access to educational programs

The initial intention of this arts-informed research study was to develop and implement art classes for people with Alzheimer's disease, and to examine its impact upon new learning at cognitive, procedural and affective levels of experience. While these goals persist - indeed adult educational theory and quality of life are central to this thesis - the research focus gradually shifted from a constructivist view of the Alzheimer's learner to a phenomenological view of the dynamic relationship between teacher and student. Its power to facilitate the growth of reciprocity and bolster identity within the learning context, whether one-to-one or in small group settings, became more apparent as the research progressed. This revealed the potential of arts-based educational programs to build mutual trust and reciprocity with and among learners with dementia. In turn, these qualities contributed to the expression of positive feelings, improved self-esteem, sense of purpose and communication among the participating group. The overarching assumption of this work is the belief that access to affirmative and active roles for people living with Alzheimer's fosters communication, supports concepts of identity, and bolsters feelings of wellbeing. Furthermore, it views educational programming for people with dementia as an integral aspect of caregiving.

The academic pedigree: A globalized means of distinction?

This communication examines the relationship that exists between students from four elite French schools (Polytechnique, ENS Ulm, HEC, Sciences Po) known collectively as the grandes écoles (GE) and the identities as students from these elite establishments. The sanctioning function exercised by the highly competitive entrance exams into these elite schools is well known: a title of academic nobility will follow the admitted students throughout their entire lives (Bourdieu, 1989). Being admitted thus signifies an automatic change in social status for the student. But how is this status marker experienced depending on being a national or an international student? Does it represent the same process for these two categories of students? If the "institutional rite", as Pierre Bourdieu coined the national entrance exams for the most prestigious grandes écoles, is tantamount to being dubbed for the national students, it cannot assume the same meaning for the international students, those key actors of globalization. Coming from different education systems, being admitted through specific procedures and unfamiliar to the French context and its strong logic of elite distinction, they cannot get the same benefit in terms of social distinction from their identity as students from these higher education institutions. The dramaturgical analysis of organizational identities adopted by national and international students thus lead us to suggest that, in France, the academic pedigree mainly remains a national status marker.

Diverse histories, different outcomes. Social policy and development in Latin America and East Asia

During the 20th century, over two hundred million Latin Americans and South East Asians abandoned their secular agrarian for a modern urban form of making a living. A turbulent, painful, and frequently violent, process that is still ongoing in full transition in the regions as a whole. It was led by the State, through two successive developmental strategies: Firstly, the State had to build economic infrastructure by itself, meanwhile social policy was used mainly as a means to transform backward peasantry into a fairly healthy and educated urban workforce; the second strategy took advantage of these achievements to promote State-led market economies, meanwhile social policy shifted its focus mainly to address the problems of already large urban populations. Both regions are emerging out of this process as significant economic actors of the 21st century, and at the same time their overall indicators measured by UNDP social development index have improved quite dramatically. Yet, in spite of these regularities, wide differences are evidenced in their respective outcomes: Latin America started its transformation decades earlier, but East Asia has changed much faster; the former is the most socially unequal part of the world and relies heavily in the rent of natural resources exploited by a tiny part of the workforce, which relegated in large part to commerce and non productive services, remains in large part poorly educated and precariously unemployed or underemployed; meanwhile the latter is amongst the most egalitarian, and bases its economic might in the value added by its highly qualified, fairly decently and fully employed, mainly industrial, workforce. The paper tries to explain these different outcomes in the history of transition in both regions, analysed in the intersecting spaces of tectonic shifts in their social relations, historical starting points and paths, and institutional arrangements.

Subjectivity, relevance and the constitution of social justice

Classical conceptions of justice, starting from antiquity on, consider equality as one of the constitutive principles of justice. Especially when it comes to focusing "social justice" – a concept which obtained its significance in the 20th Century – the idea of equality is crucial, since the argumentation starts from the assumption that if social justice as shared value concept is present, the aim must be to establish juridical and economic conditions to diminish inequalities. Justice and equality can be referred to actions, individuals, institutions or social circumstances, but primarily individual actions can be classified as "just" or "unjust," it is individuals who suffer from unjust individual or collective action or unjust social circumstances. Therefore, the argumentation focuses on the dialectical relationship between individual and society (Berger/Luckmann) in order to establish a framework which includes the subjectivity of the individual actor for a clarification of the idea of social justice. Social actors perceive their world according to shared ideas including hierarchies of "symbolic power" (Bourdieu), which form the basis for the experience of justice or injustice. But whether specific social circumstances are experienced as just or unjust by the individual actor depends on his or her knowledge and the subjectively experienced biographical situation. Individually experienced systems of "imposed relevances" pre-structure our ideas of social justice, but starting from our "intrinsic relevances" we spontaneously decide to act according to our chosen interests, which also can be considered as just or unjust by ourselves and others. Reflexions at the interface of sociology of knowledge and phenomenology are applied to describe the significance of the subjectivity of the individual actor for the constitution of social justice.

Restructurations and railways workers strikes in France

The railway sector in France and in other countries in particular in Europe, shows deep industrial restructurations (by frank or crawling privatizations, as we can see it in the UK, Belgium, Germany, Italy and France). The various constituents of the working strength sometimes react to these new orientations by fighting with different kind of strikes or threats of strikes.

So, in April 2010, in France, two of the most belligerent labor unions, the CGT and Sud-Rail, made a commitment in a resolute conflict which paralyzed a part (party) of the traffic during more than two weeks. Their motivations were diverse but obviously the real anxiety about the future of railroad transportation, and especially about the consequences of the opening to competition, weighed heavily in this conflict. It's almost true of the train drivers and controllers.

In November 2011, another conflict draws a contrast with the previous conflict. An organization made up entirely of drivers, the FGAAC-CFDT, known for its moderation, had threatened to go on strike on all weekends of December if no negotiation was reached. That was enough reason for the top management of the SNCF (French national railway company) to commit to enter into negotiations and give in to their demands.

We aim to compare these two conflicts in order to the variety of the demands, the strategies and the management of the conflicts by the management of the incumbent operator.

Monarchy and slavery in the political thought of Castro Alves

Our paper is cast to interpret the works of Castro Alves, the "poet of slaves", held as one of the main figures of Brazilian abolitionism. For doing so, we analyse his writings trying to recuperate the values and principles that gave sense to his abolitionism. As we will try to sustain, such values are better understood when we comprehend the images he builds of monarchy and slavery, images that offered him important foundations to think the political role of poetry and prose. A concern that motivates us is to identify which are the terms of the republican sensitivities (sensibilité républicaine, as Claude Lefort put it) of the second half of Brazil's XIX century, moment in which the bases of monarchy and slavery were already losing ground – Brazil abolished slavery in 1888, and the monarchy finally eroded in 1889.

The ABC metalworkers' union and his support for cooperatives: A Brazilian experience

This paper presents the results of a survey involving the participation of the ABC Metalworkers' Union (located in São Bernardo, Brazil) which organization of employees into self-managed work through cooperatives. Since 1996, the union has supported the cooperative movement, focusing on troubled companies and state bankruptcy. We analyze this unusual action practiced by the union, supporting the creation of production cooperatives. We strive to understand why it started to motivate the formation of cooperatives among metallurgists who become members, leaving the status of employees and become the 'working owners'. We searched two groups of workers in different situations: the first one was part of a metallurgical advised by the union which the crisis in the factory was encouraged to create a cooperative to ensure continuity of employment, since the company was in a financial crisis. Despite the union's encouragement, workers have failed to form a cooperative. The second group is represented by an established and prepared cooperative that emerged with the support of the union after the original company goes bankrupt. Emphasizing the union's help, workers were able to organize to rebuild the company by self-management, and it is already producing in the market for over five years. The research method consists in analysis of official union's documents, periodicals, magazines and newspapers, as well as semi-structured formal interviews with trade unionists and workers who were aided by the union to create a cooperative. As a main result, we found this approach aims at the maintenance of union jobs in the region, since this process has begun in a period of an unemployment crisis and the introduction of flexible production in the country, which it has been affected the São Bernardo industrialized region's in a remarkable procedure.

Makeovers of modernity

This paper shall explore issues of modernity to consider a critical conversation between postcolonial propositions and de-colonial perspectives. On the one hand, the terms of de-coloniality have frequently focused on modernity as a primary apparatus of domination, which was inseparable from the colonial making and unmaking of world. On the other, postcolonial writings have revealed more ambivalent, even contending, approaches to modernity. The paper would argue that such mutual tension between the two understandings is not disabling, but can be a spur to thought. This is especially the case if instead of ghettoizing postcolonial and de-colonial orientations as fully finished knowledge(s), which turn upon themselves, they are set to work as part of the wider rethinking of disciplines and worlds. Drawing on a range of recent scholarship I will underscore that questions of modernity have increasingly escaped the limits of (purely) discursive derivation, scholarly formalism, and a priori abstraction. As a result, formations of modernity have been themselves revealed as contradictory and contingent processes of culture and control, as checkered and contested histories of meaning and mastery – in their constitution, sedimentation, and elaboration. On the one hand, it is within such contingency and contradiction that modernity's constitutive hierarchies and formative oppositions are framed and elaborated. On the other hand, these processes are not subject-less procedures, and emerge instead as expressed by subjects of modernity – and not only modern subjects – that are non-Western and Western. Together, all of this raises key questions for a dialogue between the two knowledge formations under discussion as well as between understandings of South Asia and Latin America.

Collective action within cross-border union alliances: Evidence from two contrasting case studies

Among the most important innovations recently displayed by trade unions are international alliances. Beyond their stated objective of socially regulating the activities of multinational companies, these alliances also aim to develop forums where workers, on a transnational basis, can share their grievances and establish strategies to face a common employer. That said, the goal of this presentation is to discuss the way collective action was initiated and developed in two cases of transnational union alliances, in two different industrial sectors. The research involved more than 100 interviews with unionists from various countries around the world. Its working hypotheses derived from the following questions: a) On what basis and how has collective action taken place in the course of these two contrasted alliances?; b) What are the factors conditioning the evolution of the action respectively undertaken in these building processes? Through these investigations, we target two main objectives: first, to seize the way collective action was built and developed in both alliances; and second, to report the conditions of efficiency and sustainability of this action. The emerging analysis is then nuanced and contrasted. On the one hand, it sheds light on the many obstacles possibly hindering the development of transnational union alliances. On the other, it dwells on the impacts of international alliances as an effective tool of renewal for unions from the North and the South.

This presentation is divided into four sections. First, we briefly summarize the different research proposals that guided our analysis. Second, we present the methodology used in our research. Third, we expose our data through a comparative perspective. Finally, we conclude by examining the possible contribution of transnational alliances in terms of union renewal.

Transnational trade union coalition: Evidence from Chile and Peru

This communication seeks to understand the dynamics of cross-border union coalitions through a Southern perspective. It pursues three objectives: first, to document the process through which workplace trade unions developed a coalition in an under-institutionalized context; second, to notify the way they framed this coalition, and identified themselves to it; third, to report the conditions that helped them to foster sustained relationships on a transnational basis. This case study appears interesting since the coalition was mainly set off, and developed through the initiative of local trade unions, in other words, from below. By local actors we refer to workplace representatives and staff from industrial unions that support and coordinate action at plant level. In such a context, we consider that actors need to be creative, and must develop new capabilities, particularly when the coalition involves actors with heterogeneous and asymmetric resources.

We put then much emphasis on the dynamics of cross-border relationships, in particular on the interactions between actors, the way they framed transnational solidarity and adhered to it, as well as on the tensions that shaped the evolution of the coalition. Drawing on previous research, we expect that this dynamic of cross-border coalitions will be shaped, on one hand, by the identity of the actors involved in the whole process. On the other, resources (financial, informational, logistical, technical, etc.) that can be mobilized and the context in which the coalition develops are also to be strongly considered.

The first part describes the research method and the case study per se. The second depicts a chronological account of the action undertaken by unions to build the coalition. The third highlights the challenges related to the process of framing transnational solidarity, with a special focus on the South. The conclusion points out to the conditions fostering sustained transnational unionism from below.

"(Re)configuración en la concepción de la brecha digital. Zona posible igualdad entre la inclusión social y digital"

En el capitalismo informacional la problemática de la brecha digital es motivo de múltiples y variadas políticas públicas. Específicamente, en el sistema educativo de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires dichas políticas se implementan hace veinte años. Tanto en la década del '80 como el '90 el foco se puso en el equipamiento de las aulas laboratorios de las instituciones escolares. Es recién con el nuevo milenio que se advierte que la disminución de la brecha digital no refiere a una cuestión solamente de equipamiento, sino que requiere de una apuesta conjunta hacia los actores del sistema. Es por ello, entre otras cuestiones, que en el 2010 se comienza a implementar el Plan Quinquena "un alumno, una computadora" o "modelo 1 a 1" como la solución que posibilita alcanzar calidad educativa e inclusión social.

Con todo, en el presente trabajo nos proponemos; por un lado, describir los principales programas de inclusión de tecnología (Aulas en red, Laboratorios, Pizarras digitales) en las escuelas primarias porteñas y, por otro analizar la concepción de brecha digital sobre la que descansan. Pudiéndose advertir a partir de la primera década del siglo XXI cierta equivalencia entre igualdad social e igualdad digital. En este sentido ¿Es la posesión de tecnologías digitales aquello que posibilita la igualdad social? ¿O es que la disponibilidad de equipamiento potencia un nuevo tipo de brecha que refiere a los usos de ese tipo de tecnologías?

Para alcanzar lo propuesto se recurre al análisis de datos secundarios (normativas, decretos y reglamentaciones), así como a entrevistas en profundidad a los actores que diseñan el 1 a 1 y sus principales destinatarios (docentes y alumnos).

Límites y posibilidades del sindicalismo en el contexto de una alianza política

Con esta ponencia nos proponemos presentar parte de los resultados de una investigación llevada a cabo sobre la dinámica política en las organizaciones sindicales de base. Se trata de un estudio de caso sobre la Junta Interna de Delegados de ATE (Asociación Trabajadores del Estado) en la Legislatura de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. El objetivo principal de este trabajo es mostrar las variantes que se dan a lo largo de la historia de esta entidad gremial, en cuanto al tipo de acción predominante y a la disposición de los factores de poder sindical, teniendo en cuenta las alianzas que se suceden y la orientación política que asumen los distintos gobiernos nacionales y municipales. Así, en este camino, en el cual diferenciaremos varias etapas, pondremos especial hincapié en la incidencia del factor político en la forma que adquiere la resolución de los conflictos laborales que se van suscitando a lo largo de los años. La hipótesis que recorre este trabajo sostiene que las tradiciones político-partidarias a las que pertenecen los delegados sindicales juegan un rol central en cuanto a la definición de las acciones a llevar a cabo de cara a las administraciones de turno. Para desarrollar este estudio recurrimos a la realización de entrevistas en profundidad con delegados y exdelegados de esta junta interna, y con distintos trabajadores de la Legislatura. También realizamos un relevamiento de documentación de y sobre la junta interna; nos referimos principalmente a boletines publicados por los delegados, a folletos, a notas escritas a las autoridades y sus respuestas, también a actas paritarias y acuerdos colectivos de trabajo. Por último, pusimos especial hincapié en la observación participante llevada a cabo en el local gremial de esta junta interna.

Las memorias en el espacio público: Los casos de la ex ESMA y el parque de la memoria en la ciudad de Buenos Aires

En la Argentina funcionaron durante la última dictadura militar aproximadamente 500 centros clandestinos de detención, insertos en su mayoría en la traza urbana de las ciudades. La relación que estos sitios mantuvieron con sus entornos urbanos y sus vecinos fue ambivalente o estuvo en permanente tensión: funcionaron de modo clandestino, aunque eran, en cierta medida, conocidos por quienes vivían en los alrededores. En los últimos años, estos sitios, profundos debates mediante, están siendo transformados, es decir, están siendo resignificados y re-funcionalizados. Estos nuevos espacios tienen como objetivos estar abiertos a la comunidad y funcionar como espacio de reflexión sobre el pasado reciente. Sin embargo, no todos logran establecer contacto cotidiano con su entorno mientras se enfrentan a los problemas implicados en su gestión: ¿Cómo hacer que la memoria, en constante transformación pueda fijarse en una forma (museo, centro cultural o educativo, parque, memorial, monumento) sin quedar por ello inmovilizada? En este trabajo, intentaré reflexionar sobre el papel que juegan los sitios memoriales en las ciudades. ¿En qué medida cumplen su objetivo de ser espacios abiertos a toda la comunidad? ¿Logran los vecinos o sus visitantes apropiarse de estos espacios, o sentirlos parte del patrimonio histórico y cultural de la nación? En definitiva, ¿constituyen espacios públicos reconocidos por la habitantes de la ciudad? Para responder a estas preguntas, tomaré dos casos: la transformación de la ex Escuela de Mecánica de la Armada en Espacio para la Promoción y Defensa de los Derechos Humanos y el Parque de la Memoria, instalado frente al Río de la Plata.

Migrant women's acculturation modes and attitudes toward women in home and host countries

This paper examines the influence of migrant women's acculturation modes on gender relationships, through the analysis of acculturation modes' impact on perceptions and attitudes toward women in host and home countries. Three studies, already carried out or underway, are conducted in order to analyze links between migrant women's acculturation modes (integration, assimilation, separation or marginalization according to the model of Berry, 2001) and attitudes toward women assessed through the ambivalent sexism inventory (ASI, Glick & Fiske, 1996), the social dominance orientation scale (SDO, Sidanius & Pratto, 1999) and a sympathy scale. These studies have been conducted in Romania and Benin, as emigration countries, and in France, as immigration country. Four descriptions of migrant women (corresponding to the acculturation modes mentioned above) are presented to participants. After reading the description (between-subjects), participants answer the three scales. Contrast analysis conducted on first results show that each dimension of acculturation seems to have its own influence on attitudes toward women. Thus – in home countries – the support of the culture of origin may strongly increase sympathy toward migrant women and decrease benevolent sexism; the pre-eminence of one culture on the other may increase the rejection of social dominance; eventually, adopting the host culture might increase hostile sexism. Complete results will be presented and implications will be discussed during the 2nd ISA forum of Sociology. A discussion point will be the state of strain in which migrant women seem to be placed, expected to support the culture of origin for maintaining positive relationships with their home country but also to fully embrace the host culture in order not to be rejected. In such a situation, is the development of hybrids identities really possible? What kind of strategies can migrant women introduce in their struggle for recognition?

Mobility of scientist: The comparative analysis of Russia, China, India

The paper is based on research "Mobility of scientists as the Mechanism of Russia's Integration Into the World Scientist Community", which has been caring out by the Center for Sociology of Science and Science Studies of IHST of RAS.

Nowadays, the problems of international mobility as a factor in the emergence of the joint scientist space, in internationalization of science and scientific activity have become ever more significant.

Thanks to the migration mobility, research activity has been under constant renovation which provides the cutting-edge research with specialists needed. Mobility helps to supply researchers to new scientific fields as well as to facilitate cooperation between scientists from different disciplines and from various regions and countries. Mobility helps to set up multinational teams and networks and for them to work. Mobility is a tool of optimizing results of scientific research.

Multipolarity of modern science is confirmed by active participation in the global division of labor of the countries like China, India, Brazil, Mexico and others.

On the whole, the scientist mobility in Russia is much lower than in the West, China and India.

The paper will look at new approaches to identifying the basic theoretical assumptions about the notion of mobility, define the types of scientist mobility in the light of current tendencies in science, analyze how the international mobility influences the development of modern science in Russia, India, China and the new division of the global scientific labor.

Interpersonal trust and disasters: The case of Chile's 2010 earthquake

The latest big earthquake to hit Chile (February 27, 2010), had a magnitude of 8.8 on the Richter scale. Hours later, a tsunami that hit the coasts of Chile ravaging several coastal towns.

International evidence shows that antisocial behaviour in these circumstances is less common than generally believed. The main reason why looting is not widespread after disasters has to do with the emotional factors involved, particularly those related to altruism and reciprocity behaviours that arise in cases in which family, friends and neighbours are at risk.

Although the evidence is clear, looting did occur in Concepción not in other places affected by the earthquake. One hypothesis relates to the fact that this city has long been recognized is the one showing the least (or near) levels of social capital in all its forms, including interpersonal trust, in the country.

The context described above prompts the question of whether the spread of the phenomenon of looting and pillaging is related to the low levels of social capital existing in Concepción. We also wanted to learn whether disasters are trust-building instances.

Our main empirical results relate to the correlation between trust and damaged in the province of residence of the respondent. The provinces with higher damage rates show levels of trust that are higher (even controlling by "pre-earthquake" trust). This might be interpreted as evidence confirming that disasters are an instance for the construction of social capital. As expected, this effect was observed particularly in Metropolitan Region. Concepción seems to have missed the chance to create interpersonal trust with the emergence of episodes of violence and looting.

Disaster situations may be seen as an opportunity the construction of interpersonal trust. However, these behaviours will emerge only as long as there is a critical mass of social capital, to prevent the generation of unruly behaviours.

In 2012 we might be able to test whether these effects were transitory or permanent.

Victimization and happiness, the case of Chile

Violence and the resulting victimization have a serious impact on individuals and societies. The result of the experience of violence, whether at home, in the community or as a result of personal assault or abuse, has a devastating effect. Politicians around the world have been expressing concern for decades about the extent to which rising crime rates can affect the lives of individuals in the society. The growing distress over the effects of crime on individuals in rich and poor countries alike is thought to have been fueled by the perception that crime victims suffer greatly in terms of financial loss and psychological trauma from their experiences. These exposures to crime can have long lasting impacts on the victims and those close to them. Therefore, crime and the perception of personal safety are important factors in any assessment of social well-being and an individual's happiness levels. (Powdthavee, 2005; Meadows, 2009)

In Chile two surveys have gathered both victimization and subjective well being data. The first was developed as part of the Oxford Poverty and Human Development Initiative (<http://www.ophi.org.uk/>) in 2009. The second is the 2011 UNDP Subjective Well Being Survey, whose data will be available on 2012 after the 2011 Human Development Report for Chile is released.

Using the above mentioned data together with the ENUSC, a biennial victimization survey carried out by the Chilean Ministerio del Interior, an analysis is performed in order to measure the relation between victimization and well being. An argument can be made as to the (approximate) exogeneity of victimization, so the analysis corresponds to a simple ordered probit or probit.

Analyses using the OPHI survey show a relation between victimization and well being, especially regarding the less severe (but more common) forms of victimization. The UNDP survey has not been yet released but it will be soon.

Infancia, bienestar y desarrollo económico: Hacia un sistema de indicadores que reconozca las particularidades de los niños como grupo social

Este trabajo forma parte de un programa de investigación del Grupo de Estudios del Instituto Argentino para el Desarrollo Económico (IADE), en el cual se realiza una evaluación crítica de los conceptos y métodos de medición y evaluación de las condiciones de vida de los niños en Argentina, para proponer nuevos indicadores.

El trabajo se divide en cuatro secciones:

a) en la primera, se analizan y describen los métodos oficiales de evaluación de las condiciones de vida de los niños en Argentina, incluyendo entre otros: las desagregaciones por grupo etario de las tradicionales mediciones de condiciones de vida, las estadísticas educativas y sanitarias y los informes sobre gasto social en niñez.

c) en la segunda, se critican estos instrumentos, identificando las nociones de desarrollo económico implícitas en los informes oficiales y atendiendo a la especificidad de los niños como grupo social, que, como hipótesis, entendemos está ausente en ellos.

d) en la tercera, se desarrollan una serie de conceptualizaciones acerca de las especificidades de la niñez (por caso, la especificidad del trabajo infantil en tanto algo distinto al trabajo concebido tradicionalmente, la incorporación de mediciones y estadísticas antropométricas o las particularidades de los derechos del niño dentro del conjunto de los derechos humanos).

e) en la cuarta, se esboza una propuesta para un nuevo sistema de indicadores, que, atendiendo a la especificidad de los niños, se base en visiones alternativas del desarrollo económico y social, superando las limitaciones de las teorías tradicionales.

Mediante una mejor comprensión de las necesidades y carencias de los niños, se podrán realizar mejores diagnósticos y, consecuentemente, mejores propuestas de políticas públicas.

La nueva seguridad social Latino Americana: Nuevos derechos, nueva economía, ¿nueva democracia?

En los últimos diez años la seguridad social ha experimentado importantes transformaciones en muchos países latinoamericanos. Si bien el caso argentino es el más resonante (donde la principal política al respecto fue la ampliación de la cobertura previsional mediante un mecanismo de moratorias), en muchos países se registró la creación de programas no contributivos de asistencia social, que en muchos casos tomaron formas institucionalizadas que permiten asimilarnos a reformas de la seguridad social (aquí, nuevamente, Argentina es el caso más resonante, mas los casos de Brasil, México y Perú son muy relevantes).

El presente trabajo pretende dar cuenta de forma global de estos procesos entendiéndolos como una acabada expresión de la crisis del neoliberalismo en la región, una crisis que se expresa en la pérdida de legitimidad relativa de las premisas de los derechos optativos o contractuales y el incremento de la legitimidad de las premisas de los derechos sociales universales.

Por supuesto, estas nuevas políticas sociales y de seguridad social están inscriptas, en muchos casos, en nuevos marcos programáticos de política económica, que han permitido que, con excepciones, que Latinoamérica no haya sufrido las repercusiones de la crisis económica global del mismo modo que en décadas anteriores. Estos nuevos marcos se sostienen en esquemas de precios relativos más favorables a la región, pero también en nuevos consensos (y disensos) sociales que surgen, precisamente, de los devastadores efectos de la ola neoliberal.

Se pretende en este trabajo, entonces, analizar el modo de conjugación entre los nuevos marcos económicos y las nuevas políticas sociales y de seguridad social en términos de la legitimación de nuevos derechos. La pregunta que cierra la propuesta de trabajo refiere a si de esta nueva configuración de derechos y economía es posible extraer una nueva concepción de democracia en América Latina.

Limits to democratic schooling and trust in an era of high-stakes accountability

Democratic schooling, by its very nature, depends upon a significant degree of trust between teachers and school administrators, among teachers, and between teachers and students. However, the Standards-based School Accountability Movement in American education that grew out of the 1983 federal report A Nation at Risk in the Reagan administration and has continued through the "No Child Left Behind Act of 2001" in the Bush administration and "Race to the Top" in 2009 in the Obama administration calls for external accountability and high-stakes testing. This system of externally-imposed accountability assumes that some outside agent needs to hold accountable the individuals who, if left to their own efforts, would fail to perform their jobs adequately. External accountability systems are therefore premised on a hierarchy of distrust. The public and federal policy makers do not trust the states that in turn do not trust the school districts that in turn do not trust their schools, principals, teachers, and ultimately students. The distrust becomes reciprocal. Distrust militates against democratic practices in school by diminishing the willingness of school administrators to accept input from teachers on school policy or curricular issues and limits student participation in subject matter content or instruction, which is then replaced by an emphasis on rote memorization and the so-called "drill and kill" preparations for high-stakes tests. In a hierarchy of distrust actors focus on the appearance of desired learning outcomes and not necessarily the actual attainment of the substance of those learning outcomes. The actors often "game the system" (Dworkin 2008). Using more than 30 years of survey data on thousands of students, teachers, and administrators collected by the senior author the paper will examine how increasingly more rigorous accountability has diminished acceptance of democratic schooling, increased teacher burnout, and exacerbated distrust.

Relations between NGOs, social movements and state: Symbolic boundaries, institutionalization and legitimacy

Although traditionally social movements serve as channels between society and state, canalizing demands of marginalized groups in Latin America, recently NGOs have occupied that space as well. In order to comprehend what the increasing activities of NGOs and declining role of traditional social movements means in the context of changing patterns of interaction between authority and solidarity we point at the Brazilian experience in the last decades. In Brazil, activities that were formerly exclusive responsibility of the state are currently being partnered with NGOs. Despite their growing importance in the political scenario, it is still not clear how the civil society organizations interact with the state in particular contexts. Our analysis is based on 49 interviews with NGOs' directors in Rio Janeiro in 2008, which are confronted with survey data collected among 301 NGOs in five states in Brazil. We intend to analyze i) how the relations between social movements and NGOs have changed in recent years, the institutionalization of those organizations and their increasing participation in political institutional arenas; ii) the perceptions of NGOs' directors about the state as well as the construction of symbolic boundaries between them. Our findings show that NGOs' directors seek to legitimize their organizations' activities by affirming that they occupy a position that is morally superior and operationally more effective than firms and state institutions, respectively.

Social justice and the implications of actors' subjective perspectives

The phenomenological lifeworld analysis of Alfred Schutz explicated the manifold methodological implications of the subjective perspective for the social sciences. One of them is that abstract categories and general concepts must be linked to the concrete, vivid experience of individual actors, their biographically determined stocks of knowledge at hand and their subjective systems of relevancies. This is a transformation process of meaning that must be carefully attended to (and that is often overlooked). Social justice is usually debated on the level of abstract and general concepts like 'equality' and 'human rights' and defined accordingly, as stated in the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action. But what does this mean on the level of concrete social situations, constellations and settings as experienced by individual actors? Taking the subjective perspective seriously – a basic methodological postulate of Schutz – makes transparent why it is so difficult to reach a consensus on social justice in empirically concrete, everyday life situations.

Interestingly, his mentor Ludwig Mises and many friends from the Mises-Circle drew quite different conclusions from the relevance of the subjective perspective. The subjective revolution in economics implies, in their view, taking subjective preferences serious and not judging them (e.g. morally), and leaving the allocation of means to the forces of the market. A free market economy without state interventions, Austrian Economics (as well as neoliberalism nowadays) pretends, will provide the best way to balance the diverse individual needs and wants. 'Social justice' therefore belongs, as Nobel laureate Friedrich A. Hayek proclaims, to the category of 'nonsense.' Alfred Schutz takes a different road, in spite of the heavy influence of Austrian Economics and his own membership in the Mont Pelerin Society. The goal of this paper is to delineate these different positions and investigate Schutz' reflections and analyses on equality.

Stuttgart 21 and the paradox of direct democracy

Although the idea of building an underground train station derived from the mid of the 1990ties, only in 2009 the project started and provoked increasing protest by the local population. What followed were the longest weekly street manifestations in German history and massive demonstrations of more than 100,000 people. The protest became nation wide news when police overreacted and demonstrators were hurt. The election of a new regional (Land) parliament in 2011 has been decided by a coalition that reopened the debate on this contested project. After four decades of a conservative government, the promise for more democracy swept the first prime minister of the Green party into power.

However, the strategy of the protesters against Stuttgart 21 has been failing. When the referendum took place, the majority voted in favour of the multi billion euro project. Paradoxically, it seems that those who have been arguing for more democratic rights were not reaching their objective to stop the project. In this paper, the development of this process which opened up urban planning for direct democracy in Germany for the first time. It will look at the institutional settings, the actors and the different levels of governance, as to explain how the process took note of the pro- and contra arguments and how an atmosphere of acceptance have been shaped. It will pay special attention to the social background and the urban context of Stuttgart, so the particularities and communalities with other initiatives in Germany arguing for more direct democracy in urban affairs will be discussable.

The paper is based on intensive media analysis and interviews that the other have been conducting with different actors of the protest movement.

Attacks on collective bargaining: Lessons from the metropolitan union of postal clerks 1937-1962

As states across this country review the status of collective bargaining in the public sector, organized labor must consider the very real possibility of the loss of dues check-off and the automatic retention of members. In the face of these new realities, it might be instructive to examine the experiences of trade unionists who successfully advocated for their members without the benefit of the collective bargaining process.

One of the ways of gaining insight into what might happen in the future is to look to the past, to a time when government unions could not bargain collectively, enforce agency fees, or rely on dues check-off systems. I examine the history of Local 10 of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks from the mid 1930s through the 1950s, shortly prior to the 1962 introduction of collective bargaining for federal workers. There was little hiring in the Post Office for a decade, and then in 1937 a substantial number of people were hired. Because work in the Post Office was a secure job, and because of the high unemployment of the Great Depression, and because hiring was on the basis of test scores on an exam, many of those hired had at least some college education, and in some cases college degrees. (www.census.gov/hhes/socdemo/education/data/census/half-century/tables.html).

These new hires became the backbone of the union. Over the next twenty years they built the union into a significant presence. The fact that they were prohibited from engaging in collective bargaining until 1962 effectively meant that each and every complaint about working conditions, hours etc. was pursued through direct interactions with managers and supervisors. As the union leaders of this new cohort increasingly confronted the administration, they developed confidence, new negotiating skills and a sensibility regarding political action.

A view from the origin: Examining happiness through a relative deprivation lens

The question of what makes transnational immigrant families happier requires knowing what it means to be happy from both sides of the border. Researchers have established that levels of happiness vary according to location and that happiness does not have a consistent relationship to wealth or resources for the general population and for migrants in particular. To date, the happiness research for transmigrants has largely focused on the destination community where immigrants may not necessarily reside permanently, hence neglecting the transnational aspect of migrants' lives. Missing from the literature is how happiness is constructed at the origin, which is necessary to better understand the complexity of this concept in a transnational field.

Given that the concept of relative deprivation is often cited as a mechanism that encourages migration at a community level, this lens provides a useful framework to assess how migrants in the U.S. and non-migrants in origin communities construct happiness and relative happiness. This paper relies on a mixed methods approach to understanding happiness for migrant and non-migrant families from an origin community in Mexico. The Network Survey of Immigrant Transnationalism (NSIT) (n=600) serves as the main data source for this project. NSIT is an innovative binational survey of a migration network connecting a Mexican immigrant community in North Carolina and Texas to friends and family in their hometown in the state of Guanajuato, Mexico. Follow-up interviews focused on happiness and relative deprivation were conducted in 2011 (n=15) through case selection based on reported levels of happiness, position in binational social network, and migration experience. This paper contributes to a better understanding of the spheres of influence that are important in thinking about well-being for transnational migrant communities. It also introduces a new means for examining happiness in transnational contexts.

Leikelen, una experiencia de identidad colectiva y nuevas oportunidades

Este trabajo se propone compartir una reflexión acerca de las opciones de configuración de identidades colectivas y ejercicio de ciudadanía que se pueden abrir a partir de la creación y apertura de nuevos espacios institucionales. En la mirada analítica de una experiencia de la ciudad de Córdoba, Argentina, desde los barrios al centro, se propone un abordaje del mundo de la vida de algunos jóvenes que pueblan nuestras ciudades. A partir de la posibilidad de entablar diálogos con el contexto histórico, territorial y simbólico que habitan, diálogos significativos con aquellos jóvenes reales y no con el imaginario de una sociedad que se vuelve antropófaga. A partir de la mirada atenta de las identidades y sus relaciones nos proponemos pensar en los jóvenes como actores y agentes de la realidad que construyen, en la que viven y vivimos todos. Esta experiencia se realizó en la ciudad de Córdoba a partir del año 2008, y con un crecimiento sostenido desde su apertura hasta hoy. Le dieron el nombre de Leikelen que en lengua Mapuche quiere decir "abrir los ojos para ver" y es un espacio institucional, nuevo y colectivo en el que se permitió un vínculo de ida y vuelta entre este "centro" y los territorios que habitan los jóvenes en su cotidiano, esas esquinas de cada barrio de la "periferia" de una ciudad cada vez más poblada. En este uso, ocupación y relación entre territorios, los jóvenes hacen efectivo un ejercicio de ciudadanía que es a la vez político, social, cultural y estético, y en estas praxis que son a la vez generacionales e intergeneracionales se pueden observar modalidades de participación política que trascienden formatos tradicionales y son parte de esta realidad multifacética en la que viven los jóvenes urbanos hoy.

Police education in late modernity: Dilemmas and prospects

The Western societies have experienced diffused processes by which, on the one hand, institutionalize democratic political systems, with the expansion of several individual and social rights. On the other hand, they have experienced the development of destabilization processes concerning the social control, based on phenomena such as the development of forms of violence and crime. This ambivalence has been characterized by the concept of late modernity. In this context, the police role, an institution that emerged related to the expansion of State power, is to keep the order, ensure safety of cities and fight against forms of delinquency, but this has been a focus of criticism, especially regarding the issue of the use of force. The classical model of education, given to the policemen, especially the military police, becomes a frequent target of analyses that proclaim the necessity to establish a new professional profile. A model that assists the police authorities to overcome the militarized, hierarchical patterns, which are associated to a combative attitude and focused on crime. Nevertheless, the training of police has passed on a recurring basis, inside the police companies, characterized by the existence of disciplinary standards of conduction that maintains a conformation-specific education, training and consolidating very different mechanisms from those recommended by the critics. This mixing of elements that run through the training processes for police officers (Brazilian and Paraguayan) forms a field of knowledge/power that surrounds the difficulties lived by the policemen concerning their training.

Biographical learning of ethnic and cultural diversity as political processes in the post-war society of Kosovo

In my presentation I want to show some results of an ongoing university project with students from 8 different countries in Kosovo. It is an attempt to attach the approaches of biographical research to the processes of social transformation and human rights. We try to connect theoretical, social and cultural learning processes with the students. The analysis of self collected empirical data helps on the one hand to learn the principles of qualitative research methods and this work brings the processes and the results on the other hand close to their own life-worlds. In reconstructing the dominant patterns in (auto-)biographical narratives we can see the different historical periods and different stages of societal and individual development. In that sense, these seminars have a huge impact on the democratization process and the transformation of this post war society. The goal is to find out something about the many small daily steps which must be done, to create a kind of "normality" after the terrible massacres of an ethnical-territorially defined nationalism in former Yugoslavia. These steps can be very well reconstructed by narrations, by life stories, because personal experiences are naturally linked with social orders.

Asháninka empoderada: Una reflexión antropológica sobre los procesos de empoderamiento de las mujeres dirigentes de la Fremank, un estudio de caso en la selva central peruana

Los estudios de género en contextos indígenas y más aún amazónicos han canalizado sus esfuerzos en registrar las maneras cómo las mujeres y los varones se relacionan a través de la división sexual del trabajo, los aspectos rituales y la preparación y confección de algunos artefactos tradicionales.

Dichos estudios han aportado en una rama muy importante que ha ido documentando las diferencias y similitudes en las relaciones de género con las sociedades propiamente occidentales, esto vinculado propiamente a aspectos ligados a las diferencias biológicas que han legitimado y legitimado ciertas prácticas y funciones tanto entre hombres como en mujeres.

Desde nuestra perspectiva buscamos aproximarnos a las relaciones de género y sus procesuales cambios y permanencias a través de la relación que se establece propiamente con el fenómeno de la participación política de las mujeres indígenas amazónicas.

Esto último lo tratamos a partir de un estudio de caso realizado con las mujeres integrantes de la Federación Regional de Mujeres Asháninkas, Nomatsiguengas y Kakintes de la Selva Central del Perú, estudio que presenta los principales hallazgos y argumentos sobre los procesos de empoderamiento por los que atraviesan las mujeres dirigentes de dicha organización a fin de ir ganando espacios de representación que legitiman sus demandas como mujeres y como indígenas, proceso que se alimenta de las posibilidades que facilita el contexto y de los cambios que se van suscitando a nivel tanto local como global en materia de reivindicación de derechos y justicia social.

State-building, coloniality and territory in the periphery: The case of central Brazil

Theories of state-building usually highlight the centralization of state power within a delimited territory as a previous condition for the exercise of modern authority. These theories, however, leave aside postcolonial contexts such as Latin America, where the shaping of state authority was affected by coloniality. This historical/epistemic condition contributed to turn the process of expanding authority over the territory into a geopolitical concept that continues until today.

This paper discusses a case-study focused on the Central Brazil region during the 1940 and 1950s in order to address the problems of state-building in postcolonial contexts. The discussion is based on data (official archives, travel accounts and bureaucratic reports) from the research I conducted on the activities of Fundação Brasil Central (1943-1967), a public bureau created by Estado Novo dictatorship (1937-1945), but I also bring concepts from other Latin American experiences. I analyze bureaucratic discourses by FBC to argue that state agencies created by Brazilian government promoted internal colonialism through practices of spatialization of authority. Therefore, the imposition of state power over the territory should not be seen as a previous historical condition for the legitimization of power, but as an ongoing process marked by a "geopolitical eye". The main theoretical goal of the paper is to discuss state-building theory from the perspective of Latin American coloniality.

Establecer un marco teórico más fincado en las ciencias sociales, para acercarnos a entender mejor los fenómenos que vinculan las naturalezas de las violencias y sus articulaciones y permitiría paliar las diferencias metodológicas y empíricas de las investigaciones.

La pérdida del sueño de una comunidad que implica inseguridad individual abarcando todos los espacios de la vida y de una familia en la que también se experimentan las violencias más íntimas. Estos aspectos –entre otros- se exploraron en una encuesta (NEOTIS) aplicada a 5837 estudiantes; representativa por unidad, división y sexo, lo cual permite ver perfiles que pasan desapercibidos en otros estudios. Entre los resultados obtenidos, destacan: Los jóvenes perciben a las familias mexicanas como un ámbito de violencia, que abarca desde 76.1% hasta 95.8%, dependiendo de la relación y el tipo de violencia que refieren, así como del género. El 63.6% de los hombres y 61.7% de las mujeres perciben su comunidad como violenta. Sólo 18.3% del total, identifican violencia en su propia familia. Abuso sexual es declarado por 12% de los estudiantes y violación por 3.5% del total, siendo 17.7% de los agresores familiares cercanos.

La mayor parte de los actos violentos de cualquier carácter, no han sido denunciados (sólo 15% denunció) y la respuesta más frecuente es la falta de credibilidad en la impartición de justicia y en las instituciones responsables de la misma. Menos de la mitad percibe la universidad como un sitio seguro. Las evidencias obligan a buscar alternativas de prevención y atención en el espacio universitario, reflejo, albergue de la violencia generalizada en México.

The persona of organization theorists - What happened to good old-fashioned relevance?

The role of intellectuals in society has been a source of enduring debate and given rise to heated discussions about values, morality and power. The current paper will make an empirical analysis of this theme in the field of organization theory. The working thesis is inspired by Ian Hunter's argument about the 'theory boom' in the 1960s. According to this argument, a wide variety of academic disciplines underwent a profound transformation which left them in a state of over-theoretical, mutually hostile fractions – absorbed in their sophisticated warfare, rather than in the pursuit of practical relevance. The result is an academic Persona (in this case the organization theorist) subscribing to a position above and outside the world of practice, ever ready to dismantle its parameters and think it radically anew.

In this paper, I will explore Hunter's hypothesis empirically by analyzing classical OT texts and comparing them to the texts and practices of selected OT communities in the present. The analysis draws on the concepts of persona, professional ethos, askesis, and responsibility in order to illuminate possible contrasts between the professional Persona of early organization theorists versus OT Personas in late modernity. The critical concern driving this paper is whether OT has lost its interest in and ability to offer relevant input to a world of practice which seems to need it more than ever.

African immigrant women's entrepreneurs in Canada as pathway for alleviating poverty: Challenges, conflicts and successes

Immigrant entrepreneurship has become part of the economic landscape in Canada and has received recognition from immigration advocates and immigrant-serving community-based organizations as contributing to poverty alleviation among immigrant groups. Ethnic enterprises are providing a large number of immigrants with much-needed income and access to ethnic products thereby contributing to their integration into the Canadian fabric. Nonetheless, the fact remains that immigrant entrepreneurs vary by race, ethnicity, gender and size and are costly and risky to run without social and economic capital. While a number of studies (Hier & Singh 2007, Leys 2006, Galabuzi 2006, Berger et al. 2005, Kloosterman and Rath 2003, Li 2001, 1992) have focused on the ethnicity dimension of enterprises, the gender dimension of entrepreneurship involving immigrant women and specifically African immigrant women's entrepreneurial role in Canada has received limited attention. This paper aims to fill part of this existing gap in literature through an analysis of the findings of my 2010/2011 study of African women's enterprises in two Canadian provinces (Alberta and Saskatchewan). The study explored the experiences of African immigrant women entrepreneurs who run small-scale businesses both out of their homes and in spaces outside their homes. Specifically, factors informing the growth of the small-scale enterprises, challenges facing the women in running their businesses and the transnational dimensions of the enterprises were explored. An intersectionality of race, class and gender framework was employed in analyzing the study's findings which identified cultural identity, discrimination and lack of economic and social capital as major factors constituting challenges to immigrant women entrepreneurs with major implications for success or failure. These factors are worth exploring for amelioration through policies and intervention strategies.

The quality of life of African immigrant women in Canada: A study of small-scale women entrepreneurs in the province of Alberta

This paper highlights the findings of a study of the quality of life of African immigrant women entrepreneurs in western Canada. During the one-year study period, in-depth interviews focusing on variables that included access to housing, health care, training, transportation, social and economic capital, sense of safety and belonging in neighborhoods were conducted with fifteen small-scale immigrant women entrepreneurs in Calgary and Edmonton. The study's findings revealed that in general, an intersection of race, ethnicity, gender and class mediated the women's quality of life experiences. It should be noted that African immigrants started arriving in Canada in increasing numbers in the early 1990s, as a result of changes in Canadian Immigration policies and in response to 'push' and 'pull' factors in sending countries and Canada. Globalization (with its related advancement in technology, communication and transportation) coupled with neoliberal economic reforms and structural adjustment policies have also exacerbated migratory trends (Yusufu 2005). Of significance is the fact that many contemporary African immigrants are women who traditionally did not migrate but are now increasingly doing so to re-unite with spouses/parents and to escape hardships. Their reality is that most of them with substantial educational credentials are often either been marginalized from the labour force or forced by the non-recognition of their credentials and past work experience to engage in low-paying jobs under poor and difficult working conditions (Hum and Simpson 2007, Elabor-Idemudia 1999). Experiences of exclusion and marginalization from the labour force as well as underemployment have stimulated some of the women to create self-employment involving small-scale enterprises operated from their homes and/or public spaces. This resolve to establish small-businesses is informed by the belief that it provides an important channel through which the women as minorities and immigrants escape labour market disadvantages in the mainstream economy (Light 1972, Waldinger 1994).

Gender and privatization : The experience of Argentina 1994-2008

In the re design of public pension schemes today it is important to understand the differential impact of gender and especially the degree of protection from poverty which is provided for women in comparison to men. (Meurs et Ponthieux, 2004; Milewski, 2005). Also it is important to understand the potential impact of privatization by gender. These factors have been studied in Europe (Coëffic, 2002; Bonnet et Colin, 2003; Insee, 2004) and in the United States. In Latin American, however, there has been limited attention to the issues of gender.

The dual system of public pensions and privatized pensions in Argentina from 1994 to 2008 provides an excellent opportunity to study gender differences, not only in rights and outcomes, but also in terms of the choice between a public pension system and a privatized system.

In addition it is important to understand the differences in work histories and employment patterns by gender in order to understand this outcome. While there has been much research on this issue in the United States and other OECD countries, very limited research on women's employment and pension experiences in non OECD countries such as Argentina.

What is the experience of women in Argentina with respect to coverage during part time employment, domestic work and non-formal sector work as well as the difference between women's and men's work histories. This research will use the data from the National Administration of Social Security (ANSES) in Argentina.

What would the structure of a system look like for equal protection of men and women given the many differences?

Este trabajo busca desarrollar una reflexión crítica sobre el ocio en su vinculación con un aprendizaje transformacional, desde América Latina un continente multi e intercultural. Estas temáticas son pensadas a partir de la teoría de la complejidad y desde la necesidad de construir futuros humanos sustentables. Desde esta perspectiva se propone repensar al ocio en su vinculación con la diversidad humana. El ocio al ser una vivencia subjetiva y al ser una dimensión de la cultura puede llegar a ser un significativo aporte para la rehumanización de las sociedades actuales, todo esto al ser resignificado desde un carácter contrahegemónico que rescate la importancia y el valor de las diferencias humanas, entendiendo que, al igual que en un ecosistema natural, la diversidad es un elemento que revitaliza, posibilita y recrea la vida social. Desde este contexto se expondrá como el ocio podrá colaborar con el necesario cambio de paradigma que se requiere, con urgencia, para hacer frente a las problemáticas globales, sociales y ecológicas, del presente. Todo esto se postula como un aporte para descubrir caminos alternativos en la construcción de realidades sociales realmente solidarias, participativas, justas y sustentables.

Las tensiones entre el estado y la sociedad civil en el contexto del sistema de gestión integrada de recursos hídricos del estado de São Paulo - Brasil

El estado de São Paulo es reconocido como uno de los pioneros en el desarrollo de políticas públicas en el área de recursos hídricos en Brasil. Su sistema de gestión de los recursos hídricos, que incluye 22 organismos de cuencas, completó 20 años en 2011 y se ha transformado en una de las referencias para el actual sistema de gestión nacional. Siendo un sistema de gestión fundamentado en los principios de descentralización y participación, el estado asume diferentes funciones, y es considerado uno de los principales actores responsables por el fortalecimiento o no, del sistema. Tal situación no representa la omisión o falta de participación de los representantes de la sociedad civil, pero la consecuencia de las prácticas de gobierno de un estado fuertemente caracterizado por acciones centralizadoras y tecnocráticas. Basados en los principios teóricos de la Sociedade de Risco, este artículo tiene como objetivo analizar el surgimiento de formas de desigualdad dentro de los procesos de negociación presentes en las estructuras de gestión en el contexto de la gobernanza del agua en el estado de São Paulo. Tal desigualdad ocurre no apenas en la distribución del número de representantes del estado y de la sociedad civil en los sistemas colegiados, pero también por la forma de organización y definición de las agendas en discusión en el sistema, así como en la cualificación e involucramiento de los representantes de la sociedad civil. Lo que se observa es una crisis en la representación del sector asociativo y de las ONGs, con poca renovación o cambio en las prácticas. El mayor problema con el cual se han confrontado muchos de los colegiados del sistema es resultado del hecho que diversos actores involucrados en la dinámica territorial tienen visiones del proceso y de los objetivos divergentes.

Consideraciones sobre el envejecimiento en Brasil

El envejecimiento de la población es un fenómeno que atrae cada vez más la atención de los brasileños. Se desarrolla en el país una transformación de su estructura demográfica en razón del crecimiento de la expectativa de vida y también por la reducción de las tasas de la natalidad. De acuerdo con datos analizados por el "Instituto de Pesquisa Econômica Aplicada" (IPEA), en el año de 2009 la población brasileña de 65 años o más representaba 11,4% de la población total. Y es posible observar que la cantidad de jóvenes se reduce progresivamente. Espera-se que el contingente poblacional brasileño alcance su punto máximo en el año de 2030, y a partir de este momento la expectativa es de que este contingente sea cada vez más pequeño. Con esto se constituye un grupo que se engrandece constantemente y que se presenta cada vez más heterogéneo: un grupo de las personas mayores. Es como si en el grupo de dos ancianos hubiesen otros grupos puesto que podemos identificar allí la tercera edad, los ancianos jóvenes, la cuarta edad, los envejecidos funcionales, los centenarios, etc. Teóricos de diferentes áreas de conocimiento apuntan que la definición de quiénes son personas ancianas es compleja y depende del momento histórico y de la sociedad de que se habla. En este trabajo hacemos una reflexión sobre la diversidad de las cuestiones, necesidades y demandas vinculadas al envejecimiento en Brasil. Para esto se hace una discusión sobre el principal texto del país sobre esta cuestión: el "Estatuto do Idoso". Al final se presentan algunas debilidades no sanadas con la promulgación de esta ley, señalando algunos desafíos que todavía existen en la sociedad brasileña para que se respeten los derechos de las personas mayores.

Outcomes of U.S. union mobilization for workplace leave in California and Pennsylvania

The US lags behind many other countries – industrialized and unindustrialized – with regard to workers' rights to leave benefits, such as family leave, sick leave, and maternity/childbearing leave. Workers represented by unions are more likely to have access to such leave benefits in their contracts, but unions also mobilize politically—as social movement organizations—for policy changes that impact all workers regardless of membership. Recently, unions and other organizations in the US have mobilized at the state-level to obtain broader access to leave benefits for workers. This paper reports on a current study asking: Under what political, institutional, and social conditions do unions and their coalition partners win state-mandated leave benefits? Based on transcripts from legislative committee hearings and interviews with union and community organizers, this paper compares movement mobilization in California and Pennsylvania to understand how the contexts of mobilization play a role in outcomes. Both California and Pennsylvania have above-average union density, yet they are starkly different with regard to state-mandated leave. California workers have access to State Disability Insurance for pregnancy and childbearing leave and unpaid leave to attend their children's school activities, among other types of leave. But Pennsylvania has no state-mandated leave. What explains this difference? Preliminary research emphasizes the importance of the political make-up of state legislatures and movement organizations' relationships with elected officials, thus supporting social theories of political mediation. However, union strength and the extent to which unions are involved in movements for state-mandated leave also play a role, raising questions about the fate of state-mandated workplace rights in the current context of a weakening US union movement. The methodological challenges of linking movement mobilization to outcomes, such as policy changes, are well-known. Future work to supplement qualitative case research with quantitative event history analysis will be discussed.

Dreams come true: Mediated socialities and memories

Since the publication of Haraway's celebrated work on cyborgs, through the works of Latour and Akrih, among others, much has been said about the intersections between bodies and technologies, about the limits of the human and the entrance in the 'post-human' and about the processes of embodiment/disembodiment of the Computer Mediated Communication.

This proposal aims to investigate the processes of embodiment and/or disembodiment both theoretically and empirically. We propose the term 're-embodiment' to approach the intersections of bodies and technologies in everyday life. Once thought like science-fiction products, many of the technologies that are available have been incorporated to the human forms of sociability through processes of re-appropriation and domestication that have been extremely fast. The fictional has become an everyday device. The machines that accompany us today shape human imaginaries now.

We aim to analyze the construction of socialities and memories departing from the possibilities favoured by Web 2.0 (and 3.0) and from an ethnographic (and autoethnographic) approach to the uses and conceptualization of technological devices. We will particularly centre in the case of mobile phones and their use in the construction of new forms of localized/deslocalized 'social networks' that are organized around the concepts of shared experience, exposition/exhibition of personal practices and around the construction of collective memories. We will discuss the connection of these CMC 'social networks' that have 'occupied' the name of the sociologically well established (and defined) term with offline social networks. Both settings of human relation are part now of human socialities and have been incorporated to everyday life.

We will propose here that the actual bodies 'attached' to mobile phones that accompany us all the time can be labelled as technobodies as many of the previously 'human' features (such as remembering) have been transferred to these devices.

Talking bodies in public: Embodied activism and strategies for protest

The occupation of public space by signifying bodies is basic for activism. The visibility of demonstrating bodies confronts social meanings, enacts social claims and shapes social imaginaries about the protest and the protesters. Bodies are not just mediators of protest: they are protest.

This proposal aims to analyze the embodied practices as activist practices by considering the articulation of LGTB (Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual and Bisexual) claims with wider political contexts, with the strategies for the visibilization of LGTB claims and with the use of bodies as political instruments in the Spanish context and particularly in Madrid LGTB State Demonstration (labelled by MTV as the best LGTB event in the world and the biggest event in Europe with more than a million participants). The terrain of gender and sex dissidence is a fertile context for the analysis of the vehiculation of meaning and claim through bodies, as gender and sex experiences are profoundly embodied.

Scheper-Hughes and Lock's political bodies, Scribano's social bodies and Bourdieu's, Foucault's and Butler's analysis on social control and embodied practices will be strong theoretical inspirations for this proposal that is based in an intensive ethnographic fieldwork initiated in 2006 (and intensified after 2008).

The changes in the itinerary of the marches (visibility), the changes in participation, and embodied practices such as the use of masks, t-shirts, banners, flags, slogans, and music, will be considered in relation to public protest.

The intersections between gendered presentations, vindication and fiesta, and political and sexual claims will serve to analyze the different strategies of embodiment displayed in Madrid and to compare them to the embodied expressions in other Spanish cities (Barcelona in particular). The presence and absence of particular bodies in the demonstrations (politicians and trade unionists' support through presence/absence) will be also taken into account.

Struggling for new urban futures: Right(s) to a transformed city, to another society

Lefebvre proposed the right to the city, like a cry and a demand but as a transformed and renewed right to urban life in terms of the growth and survival of capitalism. He proposes this right as a horizon for the right to oeuvre and appropriation, the right to autogestion and to the priority of the use value over the exchange value, paving another way for defining another type of citizen. The right to the city is discussed, used and sometimes contested academically and as well as in the urban struggles. The paper aims to elaborate these current ideas and conceptual debates on the right to the city and assess the recent practice/use as a slogan by the groups involved in urban social movements against demolition of houses in different neighborhoods of Istanbul especially since June 2010 in the framework of what Marcelo Lopes de Souza discussed and questioned: 'Which right to which city?'. He underlined the right to the city as the core of entire sociopolitical project but fashionable these days, the more marked by the trivialisation and corruption. The paper aims to discuss theoretically and practically the radical core of the right as an inspiring, unifying claim for autogestion for the conquest of human, urban and social transformation as well as the possibility of a radical change for social justice in a just and free society which isn't be reducible to the right to better housing as de Souza asserted.

Urban movements in istanbul: From local to global, from global to local

The paper aims to explore urban social movements in Istanbul against urban decisions shaped by neoliberal urban policies in different neighborhoods in terms of their ongoing attempts for alliances through the supportive effect of international groups, associations and alliances as in the case of European Social Forum. This process also lead to discussion milieus on urban social injustices, to politicization from local issues to common global resistance. The study will try to examine especially coalitions in Istanbul formed from global to local examining changing new forms of mobilization and organization which are emerged and (re)formed during this resistance process in spite of heterogeneous and conflictual dimensions, different characteristics of urban groups, multiple agents gathered by the commonality of urban issues.

Ballroom bodies: Creating the movement, creating the look

In this paper we focus on the body work ballroom and Latin dancers do to create the appearance of beautiful bodies in motion and in relation to one another. Ballroom is about two bodies moving and interacting, creating the appearance of intimate connection and of romance. It is also about performing the kind of glamour that makes the viewer believe the romance displayed before them. Creating this image involves much more than acting the role, depending on considerable body work on and off the dance floor. Using interviews with dancers who compete professionally, supplemented by ethnography and personal experience, we explore the bodily efforts they invest do to create the image they convey/we see.

Leadership and presidentialization of politics in Argentina

This paper's aim is to analyze the impact of presidentialization of politics in the Argentinian political system. There, the presidential system has often implied the predominance of the executive leadership over the other institutional powers. This characteristic, which relates to structural and historical factors, has been increased as a product of the recent transformations in political representation. They suppose the emergence of leaders whose popularity has to do less to his party membership than to his personality and his direct appeal to voters, reproduced by the media. Related to this, the traditional political identities have lost stability, becoming them fragmentary and fluctuant. As a corollary, the political scene is dominated by popularity leaderships that structure their supports around fluctuant networks and party machines. In addition, the president, being leader of a professional electoral party; controlling the state's resources and being not constrained by the party program, develops a decisionist style of leadership, that can bypass the parliamentary control.

As a sign of this phenomenon, we analyze particularly the 2011 election in the Buenos Aires Province. In this process, the personalization and presidentialization of politics is the key to understand the definition of the executive and legislative lists and the campaign development. The presidential decisions, legitimated by a high support in the public opinion, could easily overcome ambitions of traditional party actors, associated with the provincial and local scenes. Second, we examine the map of the organization power in the light of the electoral results, and specifically, the consequences of a strengthen leadership with a dominant coalition and a parliament majority. Finally, to figure the scope of these changes in political representation, we make comparisons between the Argentinian presidential system and the Uruguayan and Chilean systems, where the party competition is more stable than in Argentina.

Mutation or crisis of the Argentine political parties? An analysis of the peronist party in the province of Buenos Aires, Argentina

This paper is about the changes that the Peronist Party in the Province of Buenos Aires has undergone, taking into account that Argentina has been crossed by a deep process of mutation in its representative system. This political party, like others, has lost its central function of channeling citizen's preferences and providing a stable political identity to its adherents. In this sense, the Province of Buenos Aires (the district with the heaviest electoral weight) is a good example of these changes caused in the organizational structure and the peronist identity. At the same time, we also note the persistence over the time of local and provincial leaders who belong to its structure, which allows thinking about a kind of "hegemony" of this party. Through the analysis of interviews with local and provincial leaders, militants and citizens of the Province of Buenos Aires, we will analyze (i) the extent of the changes in the representative format in the Peronist Party, explaining how it currently appears more like a party linked to the various structures of the state (being a state party, it can acquire resources in order to discipline the opponent actors and convince its adherents) rather than a representative of an identity (peronist) with a definitive program and (ii) the increasing dependence of the party apparatus on the popularity leaderships –provincial and local-whose citizen valuation and mass media image, allows the party structure to reproduce in the provincial scene.

Dilemmas in professional ethics of the researcher

The interinstitutional project about professional ethics in postgraduate programs in Mexico developed by 15 universities and coordinated by PhD. Hirsch reports that the areas of social sciences and humanities have a vacuum in the discussion on the ethics of research; which generates some absences on ethical dilemmas, several of them, very common to which faces the student in the research process.

According to Alvarez-Gayou (2010) Although there are codes of ethics, they are not socialized in forming institutions of researchers, but also approaches found in these codes are not rigid nor considered unique solutions to solve ethical problems that arise in research, particularly in qualitative Court.

In the context of that, in a Mexican State University, was developed a research to know the views and attitudes of students of postgraduate. During a school semester, through a practical course called "Ethics in research", worked with the operative group technique, and discussed four elements associated with ethical dilemmas that face students make their graduate thesis, these elements are: need for informed consent, confidentiality of the data of the informant, consequences for respondents and the qualities of the researcher. Los funerales del panteón de París como disputa simbólica entre el rey y la asamblea nacional

La Revolución francesa impuso una ruptura en el régimen político vigente hasta 1789, trasladando la soberanía del rey a la Nación, sin rechazar, no obstante, el principio de gobierno monárquico. Naturalmente, en el ámbito político, la coexistencia del rey y la Asamblea Nacional generó en la última una oquencia por legitimarse y por legitimar su accionar, pues, a diferencia de los ochocientos años de tradición sobre los que se sostenía la monarquía, el Nuevo Régimen se erigió sobre las nuevas ideas seculares y necesitaba consolidar sus cimientos ante una "legitimidad regia a la vez vaciada de substancia y siempre formidable", para utilizar las palabras de Marcel Gauchet. En ese sentido, la creación de nuevas ceremonias y símbolos nacionales fue una de las tantas estrategias utilizadas para anclar, a través de la participación y la comunión con los mismos, el sentido de perencia en la población y así legitimarse ante ella. En aquella batalla simbólica que la Asamblea libró contra la monarquía, resulta sumamente curiosa la apropiación por parte de la primera de un ritual que no sólo le había pertenecido a la última, sino que además había desaparecido del registro ceremonial hacía más de un siglo y medio: a saber, los funerales públicos. Entendida como una forma de disputa simbólica, el presente paper consistirá así en un análisis de la apropiación de ese rito monárquico, intentando comprender tanto la necesidad de la misma, como las ventajas que representaba para el Nuevo Régimen el desempolvar un ritual como ese, tan perimido en el imaginario colectivo.

Memoria y espacio social. La territorialización de la memoria

El objetivo de esta ponencia es intentar una aproximación reflexiva a la relación entre las culturas de la memoria y la espacialización del recuerdo a partir de la recuperación de un ex - centro clandestino de detención (ex Atila-Mansión Seré) como lugar de memoria.

En las últimas dos décadas la proliferación de estudios sobre la construcción de la memoria social emplazada en espacios significativos de los ámbitos urbanos han cobrado un interés y una relevancia especial dentro de los estudios en las ciencias sociales. Espacios públicos se invisten de nuevas significaciones: la memoria social requiere lugares y tiende a la espacialización.

En esa dirección hemos trazado en un primer momento un esbozo acerca de los lugares de memoria pensados como signo que acentúa el papel del espacio material y simbólico puesto que la relación entre memoria y lugar sólo puede ser comprendida mediante la introducción de un tercer término, el espacio social, entendido como un sistema interindividual y estructurado a partir de prácticas sociales, un espacio relacional y simbólico que contiene varias capas de sentido yuxtaponidas e imbricadas. Allí las prácticas institucionales posibilitan la emergencia de esos espacios de memoria, coadyuvan a delimitar el espacio y a hacerlo visible como marca, como soporte, como mecanismo de disrupción en el entramado urbano. Es así que el espacio no permanece inmóvil y estático sino que se encuentra en movimiento, en un proceso de constante resignificación.

En un segundo momento del escrito, ya con anclaje en la existencia de un ex centro clandestino de detención, hemos intentado poner en relación la triple articulación entre las luchas simbólicas en el espacio urbano, en el espacio institucional y las nuevas formas de territorialización en la construcción de los lugares de memoria.

Media and professional values in students of communication and journalism at fes aragón UNAM

This research rescues the narrative of the students of Communication and Journalism, in an interpretative and descriptive effort of their culture, from the context and relationships analysis at the school, as well as professional values internalized during university education, from a phenomenological approach.

The research main objective focuses on knowledge and analysis of the student's university education of Communication and Journalism at FES (Higher Studies Faculty) Aragon UNAM and the presence of the media in the conformation of professional values, which will enable the identification of a student profile in a professional reality, and reflect on if the knowledge about the values acquired at the university corresponds to the social needs and the expectations of the students. The questions that guided the research were: How important is the school in shaping the professional values of Communication and Journalism students? What values and models the student identifies and internalizes from the media? What relation keeps the labor expectation from the students with the professional values that are taking shape at the university?

Spaces, memory and trauma: Commemorating clandestine centers in Buenos Aires

On March 24, 1976, Argentina suffered from the military overthrow that would all but destroy the livelihood and spirit of its people. During the dictatorship, the military junta acted viciously in their capture, detention, and subsequent murder of tens of thousands of Argentine citizens. These people were not only held against their will, but also their detention within clandestine torture centers went undocumented. The junta would make use of emptied houses and abandoned buildings to create these frightening chambers. Other times, these centers were hidden beneath the auspices of every day buildings (police commissaries, institutional buildings, etc.) that were used for other purposes, nestled in neighborhoods among people conducting business as usual. What happened to these centers after the overthrow of the regime? Were they memorialized or destroyed? What is the purpose of memorialization? Does Buenos Aires fit into contemporary discourse about mapping memory?

In The Untimely Present: Postdictatorial Latin American Fictions and the Task of Mourning, Idelber Avelar writes, "the labor of mourning has much to do with the erection of an exterior tomb where the brutal literalization of the internal tomb can be metaphorized" (9). This paper seeks to explore two different "spaces of memory" located in Buenos Aires – the Escuela Superior de Mecánica de la Armada (ESMA) and El Olimpo –and their role as "exterior tombs" in the process of national mourning. The paper will discuss their histories, stories of reappropriation and current commemorative function. I suggest that these sites serve to engage and empower civilians in reconstructing posttraumatic memory. My project is based on research conducted last summer in Buenos Aires where I examined the dialogue between the city, spaces, and historical trauma. Through this paper, I hope to engender a new type of citizenship that will continue to advocate for human rights in Argentina.

In this study, I will focus on how and why call center workers and IBM Turkey employees have started to organize, how they resist challenges of deskilling, routinization and automation processes and the effects of this proletarianization process. I will predicate my analysis primarily on the relations of production. I will review the literature, conduct surveys and make interviews with call center workers. I have chosen three big companies to study the subject. One of them is the call center of one of the leading banks in Turkey where about one thousand workers are employed. The second company is Burger King Call Center employing approximately 100 people. Third one is IBM Turkey, which is a subsidiary of IBM Global. Social capital: Components and determinants

The study examines the social capital from the community approach in three dimensions: trust and solidarity, collective action and cooperation, and participation in groups and networks. It was conducted in Colombia in 2007, covered 41,543 households with 164,474 people.

Indices were constructed for each dimension. Was performed a multinomial logistic regression model to identify factors that determine higher or lower levels in the three dimensions studied. The determining factors were: sociodemographic characteristics of individuals, (age, marital status, occupation and education), characteristics and relationship in the household (household size, poverty, conflict boarding practices and violence) and territorial context (geographic region, urban / rural, ethnic group membership). The findings of this study allow us to confirm that the different dimensions of social capital behave differently in the same population, are affected distinctively by the individual, family or context determinants.

The predisposing factors for building trust are strongly associated with the duration and stability of relational links that people create in their place of settlement, expressed by the time they have lived in the area, belonging to an ethnic group, have close family ties and not be immersed in experiences of family fragmentation (divorce or domestic violence). The collective action and cooperation, unlike the trust, is strongly conditioned by occupation. They are more likely those who engage in activities that by their nature would demand cooperative attitudes and practices (unpaid family worker or self-employed) and that in turn would require high skills of relationship. On the other hand, is also associated with stable jobs that provide certainty of income, opportunities for interaction and average living standard. Finally, about participation in groups and networks, the determinants are related to the possession of other forms of capital: human (education), economic and cultural (belongs to ethnic group).

Fields of fire: Emancipation and resistance in Colombia

Human rights are sustained by the mobilization of communities. (Blau 2011; Esparza 2011) While mobilization is a facilitating ability of human rights communities, they are also spatially limited in their scope. While communities sustain the conditions for human rights, their sovereignty extends only to the municipal and cultural borders of its mobilizing space. As such, a sociological understanding of rights enforcement is necessary to close the gap between human rights law and rights praxis.

In 2008, over eight-thousand sugarcane workers went on strike in Colombia in solidarity with a platform community campaign to improve human rights in the Valle del Cauca region. Wages, working conditions, environmental concerns, school funding, and housing loans were all among the demands of this campaign. While the economic leverage of the mobilization is typical of labor movements, the strike could not have been sustained without extensive community embeddedness. Likewise, non-economic human rights demands would not have had the economic leverage necessary to lead the movement to victory.

In this paper, I argue that while law is important, human rights is primarily enforced by communities. In their collective refusal to be dominated by authorities, communities create a social space where livelihood reflects a respect for human rights. This is contrasted with the juridical approach, by which individuals are to await rights to be bestowed upon them by authorities.

Post Cold War civil society mobilization in Colombia

The phenomenon of a decline of radicalization within the social movement milieu has not been adequately understood. In Colombia, the FARC (Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia) guerilla movement has now been in decline for at least twenty years. (Arias and Maldonado 2004) This has led to a rise in popular movements on the non-violent Left in Colombia. (Osorio and Weinstein 1998) When Quotations From Chairman Mao Tse-Tung was published in 1964, Marxist revolution seemed achievable to many. Anti-colonial movements were raging at the time and it was also the year that that the FARC was founded. The FARC was one rebel army in a wave of revolutionary movements across the globe. While this tide has long since receded, the FARC, just a vestige of what they once were, remains entrenched in the jungles while losing support in the cities. This decline has led to the rise of popular movements. After the decline of the FARC, no longer having a mass base and now largely seen as a criminal organization, activists formed non-violent civil society organizations to protest for peace. Combined with reintegration programs for former FARC rebels and recent military defeats, this trend has accelerated the decline of the FARC.

Desigualdad social: Un reto para el desarrollo ciudadano de los jóvenes montevideanos

La crisis social y política que vivió Uruguay desde los sesenta puede ser concebida como la lucha entre grupos sociales por la ampliación de derechos de una parte, y de la otra por la clausura de los privilegios que la estabilidad lograda había generado; se asiste a un fuerte deterioro de las condiciones de ciudadanía. Con la reapertura democrática, las organizaciones sindicales debilitadas, y el repliegue del Estado como empleador y garante de la protección social hacen de los derechos de los ciudadanos un tema particularmente problemático.

Este trabajo forma parte de mi tesis doctoral en elaboración: "Grietas en el tejido social. Experiencias biográficas de jóvenes montevideanos desde los "lugares" del espacio social." En este artículo retomamos las relaciones entre desigualdad social y ciudadanía, desde un abordaje crítico de los planteos fundacionales de Marshall. ¿Cómo podemos dar cuenta de las posibles maneras de pensar las experiencias biográficas de jóvenes cuya "membresía" puede quedar en entredicho?

Los jóvenes montevideanos comparten la memoria de un periodo de repliegue de los derechos civiles, políticos y sociales durante la dictadura militar (1973-1985). Y comparten un tiempo histórico en el que se retoma la lucha por los derechos de ciudadanía. Con base en el estudio de 51 historias de vida de jóvenes residentes en barrios montevideanos segregados y estigmatizados, avanzamos el análisis de los sentidos de pertenencia que los jóvenes construyen desde sus lugares. Al tiempo que analizamos las trayectorias educativas y laborales que pudieran favorecer el acceso a una ciudadanía de "pleno derecho", reparamos en las tensiones y limitaciones, experiencias y significados que el ejercicio de derechos ciudadanos tiene para estos jóvenes. Aquí, el acoplamiento de desigualdades sociales (económicas, residenciales, de género, de ascendente étnico) requiere de un estudio minucioso en aras de la profundización de las posibilidades de desarrollo ciudadano real.

Jóvenes y trabajo: De la aleatoriedad al distanciamiento?

En lo que ha sido denominado como proceso de transición a la vida adulta (TVA) se profundizan las desigualdades: la existencia de patrones y calendarios de TVA diferenciales de acuerdo al nivel socio-económico de los hogares de procedencia de los jóvenes constituyen el punto de partida para indagar en las trayectorias laborales de los jóvenes y el sentido que éstos le asignan al trabajo. Presento aquí algunos hallazgos de investigación de mi tesis doctoral en elaboración: "Grietas en el tejido social. Experiencias biográficas de jóvenes montevideanos desde los "lugares" del espacio social." (CES, Colmex).

Procedo en dos tiempos. Primero sintetizo los principales hallazgos para Montevideo respecto de las claves de las desigualdades de entrada al primer trabajo y a las trayectorias en el mercado laboral. Con base en información proveniente de la ENAJ-2008, analizo la desigualdad en las experiencias y sentidos asignados al trabajo entre jóvenes montevideanos, resaltando las manifestaciones locales de tendencias globales.

Seguidamente, argumento la importancia del contexto barrial en la conformación y el desarrollo de sentidos de la experiencia laboral. La hipótesis orientadora indica que las actitudes de los jóvenes frente al trabajo dependen de la naturaleza y calidad de los soportes sociales que éstos pueden movilizar, y que ello se conforma desde la configuración urbana barrial, en una medida que debe precisarse. Recorro al análisis de historias de vida de 51 jóvenes residentes en dos barrios montevideanos segregados y estigmatizados, procurando un análisis de trayectorias laborales y de los sentidos que los jóvenes les asignan, y concateno dicho análisis con el de trayectorias educativas y familiares. La pregunta básica que estructura el análisis puede formularse como: si es cierto que los vínculos de los jóvenes con el trabajo son más aleatorios, ¿quiere decir ello que las relaciones que mantienen con la esfera laboral son más distanciadas?

Cultura política y formación de la opinión pública: La dimensión de la democracia compartida por la población de Bahía (Brasil) sobre la transposición del Río São Francisco

Tomando como base una cuestión ambiental que se traduce en una intensa polémica sobre la transposición de las aguas del Río San Francisco, el objetivo de este trabajo es comprender la cultura política compartida por los ciudadanos "difusos" observando su visión sobre la participación y la representación política, a través de una experiencia concreta. Observamos un proceso de formación de opinión y de la representación social considerada como "una movilidad específica de conocimiento que tiene por función elaborar comportamientos entre individuos en el marco de la vida cotidiana" como señala Moscovic.

Entre Diciembre de 2010 y Febrero de 2011 se aplicaron 430 cuestionarios y se realizaron tres grupos de discusión con habitantes de la ciudad de Salvador (Brasil), de 17 a 80 años. Se destaca entre las conclusiones que la democracia representativa carece de confianza por parte de los habitantes estudiados, en lo que respecta a la actuación de los poderes públicos. Sobre las vías de acción o conductas políticas que están dispuestos a utilizar para intervenir en el proceso decisorio se observó que los ciudadanos de Salvador adhieren a valores defendidos por las organizaciones de la sociedad civil y por el establecimiento de "misiones" ejecutadas por organizaciones ambientalistas, ONGS y Fundaciones (Reis & Natalia, 2006). Aparece por lo tanto una cultura de contraposición a la representación institucionalizada por un proceso electoral o de designación de un representante. Ese escenario ciudadano está acompañado por valores que enfatizan la acción individual considerada como "acción política" (Heller & Fehér, 1998).

Higher education, economic development and international emigration of high skilled population in Latin America and Caribbean

We analyze the current trends in skilled migration from Latin America and the Caribbean to OECD countries, focusing on United States. We discuss theoretical perspectives on skilled migration from a literature review, and detect historical migration trends in Latin America. We used a new database on emigration rates by education attainment. Empirical evidence showed that the stock of migrants increased between 1990 and 2000 in absolute terms, and relative to migrants with low and medium levels of education. Women exhibit higher emigration rates than skilled men. Small states, with low levels of development, have seen emigration increasing at greater rates than others.

Paradoxically, countries with smaller diasporas show higher levels of migration selectivity. It is estimated that about 40% of these skilled, in most cases professional immigrants not find employment in their chosen profession (scientific and engineering) and they are under-utilized and their talent and skills are wasted.

Finally, although the impacts of globalization are difficult to assess, we find that countries with continued and consistent economic and educational policies have smaller stocks of high skilled population living abroad than others (this is the cases of Brazil and Chile). Therefore, despite the limitations imposed by the global situation, it is possible to act at national level to guide the human resources for the development of the country. This point of view permit thinks two kinds of policies: 1) a regional policy of human resources coherent with Latin American labor market demand; 2) a national policy oriented to the institutionalization of the diaspora and knowledge exchange mechanisms between the diaspora and the professionals working in the country of origin

Espacio público y coproducción de la seguridad

En este artículo me propongo introducir una discusión central de mi proyecto de tesis de posgrado, que tiene como objetivo general comprender la experiencia urbana en Puerto Madero, en tanto espacio social atravesado por diversos regímenes de espacialidad y múltiples formas de vigilancia. Particularmente, analizaré la relación entre los conceptos de público y privado en dos ámbitos de aplicación que desde el presente artículo se proponen estrechamente vinculados.

Por un lado, explicitaré la necesidad de alejarse de visiones que oponen tajantemente lo público a lo privado en el análisis de las experiencias urbanas, considerando que en la actualidad cuesta encontrar acuerdos compartidos respecto de lo que cada uno de dichos términos incluye y, por lo tanto, cómo se confrontan. Para ello, profundizando las visiones que acuerdan en hablar de un nuevo espacio público, propondré incorporar el concepto de regímenes de espacialidad, que abre el arco entre lo público y lo privado y extiende su definición más allá de lo espacial, incorporando en ella sujetos que también suelen etiquetarse en uno u otro polo pero que, como veremos, tampoco pueden ser reducidos a tal dicotomía.

En segundo lugar, problematizaré una visión frecuente de las investigaciones sobre las funciones policiales que opone formas públicas y formas privadas de gestión de la seguridad. Afirmaré que la "policía pública", en tanto forma histórica particular del trabajo de mantenimiento del orden, asume lo que los autores anglosajones llaman "policing", que engloba distintas tareas de vigilancia y control, y cuyas acciones pueden ser compartidas por varios grupos e instituciones. Desde este punto de vista, no es posible plantear la emergencia del mercado de la seguridad privada como respuesta a la crisis del Estado ni como una nueva forma de "privatización", dado que se trata de una reconfiguración de la organización de las actividades de la sociedad.

Política y género en el cotidiano: El proyecto "mulheres da paz" en Porto Alegre/Brasil

Hechos relativos a la violencia y las políticas sociales que les son concernientes, como también las discursividades orientadas a la promoción de ciudadanía han trasladado las esferas pública e privada de la vida de mujeres residentes en periferias urbanas. Así, esta investigación busca identificar la singularidad de la actuación de mujeres en la política del cotidiano y en el espacio de las comunidades donde viven, acercándose de la perspectiva de construcción del sujeto mujer (según Judith Revel) y recogiendo, además, contribuciones de Joan Scott, Giuseppe Cocco e Jacques Deleuze. El campo de investigación ha sido las actividades del proyecto "Mulheres da Paz" (Ministerio de Justicia/Brasil), desarrolladas en Porto Alegre/Brasil. En este caso específicamente, lo central fue comprender cómo se organiza la participación de las mujeres en tal iniciativa gubernamental cuando actúan en el espacio público, desde prácticas individuales

e/o colectivas en el trato de la violencia. La investigación utilizó referentes metodológicos que abarcan la análisis de documentos, la realización de entrevistas semiestructuradas y la observación en campo. En este interín, se concluye que el proyecto ha posibilitado la creación de espacios en los cuales las potencialidades de las mujeres emergen, produciendo nuevas significaciones para sus propias trayectorias. O sea, ellas han encontrado otras estrategias de acción y comparten cierta responsabilidad política cuando ocurre la descentralización de la gestión pública. Por su actuación, las mujeres de la paz se organizan en grupos en el interior de las comunidades, articulando otras redes y reivindicando la reducción de las prácticas violentas.

All voices matter: Person-centred care, health inequalities and healthcare professionals

From a societal perspective, Spain is a clear example of a family-based model of the organisation of care where the Welfare State plays a limited role in care policies in old age. Yet, social changes are making evident the step back families are taking in relation to caring for elderly people. Then, the risk of increasing inequalities in old age grows as the push for private provision of care escalates in the public agenda. The need for better healthcare that fights inequalities in old age runs in parallel to the need of person-centred care approaches in healthcare.

Person-centred care (PCC) is increasingly being recognised as the most appropriate model for health and social care provision in old age. When put into relation with home-based health care provision and with housing-with-care policies, PCC is extremely difficult to succeed if there is no recognition and coordination between health services, social services, residential-settings, families and older people being taken care of. The input and implication of all the actors involved in the construction of PCC options is crucial, thus their discourses on ageing and care are an important source on how to better approach this complex coordination and setup.

This paper draws on the results of focus groups carried out in San Sebastian, Spain, in 2011 with social workers carrying out home-based, face-to-face interviews with elderly people who request public, home-delivered care services. Being the professionals having the closest contact with elderly people's daily life in their homes, their discourses and input can inform the design of innovative policy recommendations on PCC options that are both inclusive of every person's uniqueness and contributing to fight inequalities in old age.

How can policies promote healthy and happy aging among the oldest old (85+) and centenarians?

The focus of the paper lies on the importance of taking into consideration the uniqueness of the oldest old (85+) and centenarians and their specific needs when designing public policies on active ageing. There is a necessity not only to think about young old individuals, but also about people 85+ and centenarians' health, cognitive and psychosocial conditions with regard to policy making, as this age group is continuously increasing in many countries.

The paper draws on 257 face to face in home interviews conducted in 2010 in the Basque Country, Spain. The sample consisted of two groups: young old individuals group of those aged between 65 and 74 (n=155) and the oldest old group of those aged 85+, including centenarians (n=102). Cognitive, Health, Emotional, Leisure and Psychosocial domains were evaluated. The paper discusses age-related differences focusing on the exceptionality of the oldest old and on how this exceptionality can inform better policy-making on active ageing for all age-groups across the life span.

En la primera etapa, se trabaja con el elemento como una asignación de parámetros de tomar criterios raciales de clasificación utilizado por el IBGE. De la información total de 3.989 estudiantes, que se encuentra un número de 207 estudiantes de negro, entre ellos 64 completaron el curso, de 60 años no han concluido y 63 están en curso. Para las entrevistas hemos tratado de llegar a toda la población de estudiantes negro identificado. Las entrevistas tuvieron un carácter dialógico que buscan establecer la familia social, económico y en el que los estudiantes están incluidos. Si bien existe una discrepancia en el acceso de los estudiantes de negro en la institución (sólo el 5%) se destacaron en las entrevistas de su creencia en sí mismos, poniendo en un plan más pequeño y más bajo de los obstáculos externos, lo que demuestra que también es una cuestión psicológica.

In search of a great transformation: Weaving together a new historical subject

Neither the multitude nor the nation-state is capable of moving the global political economy toward the great transformation that the world needs, though both must play a role. Classic models of the self-emancipation of the working class must also be radically reconstructed in order to be theoretically serviceable. The historical subject capable of providing the kind of great transformation that will enable human society to outwit the destructive logic of global neoliberal capitalist accumulation is like to be a very complicated creature.

Each of the current forms of potential agency is seriously flawed. The rhizomically organized multitude can exercise disruptive creativity, bringing down vulnerable local elites and forcing new conversations onto the political agenda but can't reconstruct the global capitalist order. Even progressive nation states are likely become instruments of regressive nationalist agendas in the absence of powerful social movement pressure. But, there is a symbiotic interaction among the "horizontal," calculating nationalist politicians and the persistent multilevel campaigns of the myriad social movement organizations that combine rhizomic networks with traditional command and control structures. This symbiosis creates a threatening "witches-brew" from for those whose vested interests require preservation of the established global order, which is to say it creates the possibility of a great transformation.

Drawing on the cornucopia of concrete movements and organizations that have succeeded in transcending national borders and the North-South divide, in braiding together diverse constituencies, and in operating at multiple levels from the local through the national to the global, this paper seeks to sketch out the organizational forms and discursive strategies that characterize of existing efforts at counter-hegemonic globalization assess the possibility of creating the more robust articulation that would be necessary for these movements to force changes in existing structures of power.

Practice, organizational form and the production of alternative visions

What kind of practice and what sorts of organizational forms might be conducive to incubating an alternative vision that will enable human society to outwit the destructive logic of global neoliberal capitalist accumulation?

The character of the incubators will be driven in part by the hurdles that an alternative vision must surmount. To challenge the ideological hegemony of global neo-liberal capitalism an alternative vision must unify two apparently contradictory propositions. First, an alternative vision must convince billions of people living in the most disparate circumstances around the world that they share interests that can become the basis of a common political agenda. This universalistic agenda must be accompanied by a clear commitment to respectful recognition of the full diversity of identities that have emerged from disparate circumstances and histories. The first requires the broadest possible networks of debate and synthetic capacity. The second requires a multiplicity of rootedness in dispersed sites of contestation.

Drawing on the cornucopia of concrete movements and organizations that have succeeded in transcending national borders and the North-South divide, in braiding together diverse constituencies, and in operating at multiple levels from the local through the national to the global, this paper seeks to sketch out the organizational forms and discursive strategies associated with an emerging composite vision of counter-hegemonic globalization.

The social networks they develop, experiences of being appreciated and valued by friends, feeling secure and safe within their community. The research examines their experiences of inter-ethnic social networks and possibilities to express their ethnic belonging within the community. The youths are aged between 14 and 18 years and live in the multicultural centres of Western and South Western Sydney with it's intermix of young people from Arabic and Middle Eastern, Pacific Island and Asian heritage. The research shows that young people who feel valued by friends also feel more secure in their community, more trusting of people and express a positive feeling about living in their adopted country.

Los procesos de integración de los inmigrantes en Uruguay: Desde el "melting pot" hacia el "multiculturalismo atenuado"

Uruguay es un país fuertemente marcado por los procesos migratorios desde su mismo nacimiento como estado independiente hasta la actualidad. En un principio predominaron los movimientos inmigratorios. No obstante, y a partir de 1963 en adelante, se invierte el saldo migratorio positivo produciéndose una mayor salida de emigrantes que entrada de inmigrantes. Centrándonos en los procesos inmigratorios vale decir que a estas orillas del Plata llegaron y continúan llegando –aunque actualmente en menor proporción- inmigrantes de variadas procedencias.

Bien pronto, la cuestión de la integración de los diversos contingentes arribados a nuestro país, se tornó en tema de interés no sólo para los intelectuales y políticos sino también para diferentes actores sociales involucrados en la "problemática", tanto del pasado como del presente. En un primer momento se pensó que, a través del llamado modelo del melting pot o "crisol de razas", los recién llegados se integrarían totalmente en nuestra sociedad. No obstante la realidad fue muy distinta, porque en la práctica el modelo de integración que se fue gestando en nuestro país fue otro, el multiculturalismo, al cual podríamos clasificar de "atenuado". En el presente trabajo se presentarán los resultados preliminares obtenidos por la línea de investigación "Migraciones de Ida y Vuelta" de la Facultad de Ciencias Humanas de la Universidad Católica del Uruguay, los cuales nos permiten realizar precisamente la afirmación anterior de que la sociedad uruguaya actual y del pasado se caracteriza por ser multicultural, eso sí, de forma atenuada y agregaríamos en un contexto transcultural sin el cual no se podría entender, justamente esta peculiaridad del proceso de integración de inmigrantes del Uruguay de hoy y de ayer.

How does the crisis affect employability insertion of university graduates in a context of high youth unemployment?

Is education a defense, individual and social, from the effects of the crisis in which we are living? Or does this crisis place us in a situation of overeducation, which makes raising the educational level of young people ineffective? The European Union official documents say that overcoming the crisis implies raising the educational level of young people (Strategy 2020). In Spain we are close to achieving the high educational levels that this document proposed; however, the crisis that began in 2008 increases youth unemployment levels, which are among the highest in Europe. Is it the same for university graduates? How has the crisis affected them? In this paper we propose to compare the labor insertion process of a graduate generation that entered the labor market at a time of economic expansion with another, which has done so during the crisis. We have two surveys in Catalonia (Spain) about labor insertion of graduates, a pre-crisis and another during the crisis. The first one explores the employability situation in 2008, of the people who had graduated in 2004; and the second one analyzes those who graduated in 2007, who were interviewed in 2011. These surveys were carried out by the Agency for the Quality of University System of Catalonia. The comparison between the results of these surveys shows that, while the crisis has affected graduates, it has had a significantly lower impact on the level of unemployment compare to the rest of young people. Our goal is to explore the labor insertion and examine whether factors such as social origin, gender, background and academic performance affect the type of insertion achieved four years after graduating in two different contexts: that of economic expansion and that of economic crisis.

Two models of social stratification: From a classification scheme to a typology

A model for analyzing social stratification should take into account the occupation of all members of the family. Although this statement is not new at all, the empirical operationalization of this concept has been slightly used because of the complexity involved in the procedure. Synthetic indicators, as occupational position of male breadwinner, have been considered as effective as the most complex ones.

The classification of social stratification, based on the occupational position, used on the well-known book by Erikson and Goldthorpe, entitled "The Constant Flux" has been considered the mainstream of social mobility analysis for the last 20 years.

The aim of this paper is to compare our model of stratification with that of Erikson and Goldthorpe. The model proposed takes into account the household as a unit of analysis. In addition to highest occupational position of every adult member of the household, the model includes educational, housing and income. It uses a multivariate approach, combining Multiple Correspondence Analysis and Cluster Analysis in order to obtain social strata.

We contrast both models in order to indicate its potentialities and its limitations for social stratification analysis, and we use the same data source: the Labor Force Survey of Argentina. This country experienced between December 2001 and February 2002, a deep economic and institutional crisis, installed in the international collective consciousness because of the default debt. The periods selected for analysis reflect two different socio-economic growth stages: a pre-crisis period (1997) and a post-crisis stage (2010).

The legal discourse as a producer of gender subjects: An analysis of trials by jury in Porto Alegre/RS/Brazil

This study aims to understand, through the trials in cases of homicides between men and women, in Porto Alegre/Rio Grande do Sul/Brazil, how do the gender aspects emerge in legal discourse in these judgments. Which arguments are used by lawyers to say that somebody is guilty or innocent? Which aspects of social life take part in that legal construction. Through a critical theoretical perspective to the law, according to Boaventura de Sousa Santos and Pierre Bourdieu, it is intended to highlight that the administration of justice is not neutral, unlike it reproduces the unequal relations that exist in society.

Through a systematic observation and ethnographies of the judgments it's possible to realized that there is a adaptation to social gender roles which are largely used in the space of trial and, in addition to express and reify a particular conception of gender relations in society. In the construction on legal discourse about guilty and innocent some victims are more victims than others and, in the other hand, some defendants are better or worst according to the enforcement of gender roles. In these way, some people are more deserving of justice that others, which expresses that there is a unequal access to justice, based on gender aspects.

In this paper, I intend to understand the dynamic of subjectivity existing in the contemporaneous phenomenon called Self-Help, directly towards to women, keeping in mind that this is an effective "gender technology" since it is an instrument of cultural imposition with the objective of maintaining the unequal gender relationship. I will have a brief analysis considering my lines of research: the discourse present in the top five books sold in Brazil about this subject; the debate forums of one of the researched websites – Bolsa Mulher; and the follow-up interviews with the users of the previously mentioned website. Among the main objectives, I would highlight the critical mapping offered by contemporaneous Self-Help to people that use it and by ethnography, explore in what ways these people make use of these "Self-Technologies". Testimonials of important historical aspects of the interviewed people were collected with the objective of understanding how and when these discourses have become part of their lives and what role these discourses have to their process of subjectivity (re)elaboration. This is also about bringing to debate the specific characteristics the therapeutic discourse assumes nationwide with the advent of technologies such as the internet and also within the network dynamics, since they create unprecedented possibilities of sociability in what concerns to the Self and the affections. I have in mind that these "subjectivity management discourses" can move together with de development of capitalism and a possible individuality mercantilization.

Minorities, high-risk behavior, and social resistance

Across societies, non-dominant minorities often exhibit higher rates of involvement, compared to the dominant group, in high-risk behaviors such as smoking, drug and alcohol use, sexual risk behaviors, overeating, and unsafe driving habits. Over the years, different explanations have been put forward to explain this phenomenon. These theories tend to fall into two classes: macro-structural or micro-agentic explanations. Also, they tend to regard individuals as passive players who are influenced by the social environment or by psychological problems, or who fail to make "good" choices.

This research tests an integrated theoretical framework that incorporates both micro and macro explanations and that perceives members of non-dominant groups as active players. The social resistance framework suggests that power relations in society encourage members of non-dominant groups to actively engage, consciously or unconsciously, in everyday resistance practices that include various high-risk behaviors.

To test the research hypotheses, two surveys were conducted among representative samples of two non-dominant minority groups and two majority groups. We conducted the first survey in Israel among 530 Israeli Arabs and 530 Jews, and the second in the U.S. among 200 African Americans and 200 whites. The results indicate that among both non-dominant minority groups, social resistance was positively and significantly correlated with engagement in various high-risk and unhealthy behaviors – such as smoking, alcohol consumption, and traffic violations – after controlling for various variables.

The findings provide preliminary support for the social resistance framework and suggest that people who engage in high-risk behaviors make risky choices as an agentic expression of their resistance. Therefore, we should focus less on delivering educational messages and shift more attention to people's underlying motivations for choosing particular behaviors, e.g., by developing interventions that will change the target of the resistance or channel it to less risky alternatives.

Emergence of a global social movement: World says no to inequality

Since the Arab uprising in 2010 the world has realized that mass mobilizations and social movements could still be feasible means of achieving socio-political goals. The movement which started in the Middle East, later spread to Spain, Greece, England, Chile and recently with the Occupy Wall Street Movement which originated in the USA, to the rest of the globe. The main concern of the protestors is increasing economic inequality. The demonstrators have been framing this as the opposition of 99% against 1% of the society. Some link their protest to the crisis of capitalism and the others associate it with an ongoing struggle for democracy.

The movements of 1960s were referred to as 'new' in contrast to the 'old' workers movements. According to the New Social Movement Theory, the emergence of the 'new' social movements was then linked to emergence of a 'new type of society' which could generate 'new' demands and therefore, 'new' types of social movements. Considering the fact that since 1960s, this is the first time we are witnessing a globally expanding movement, uprising of this global movement has given rise to a very essential question: are we witnessing emergence of the 'post- new social movements' and consequently a 'newer type of society'? My main objective in this article is to answer this question. The article has three sections. First, by incorporating original research to the existing data on the movement I present an overall, coherent overview of this newly emerged global movement. Second, with reference to the New Social Movement Theory, I provide an analytical framework for the analysis of the movement. Finally, I point out the implications of emergence of such a global movement for New Social Movement Theory.

La visión acerca de la política económica en los principales actores socioeconómicos de la Argentina de comienzos de los años '90

El trabajo analiza la visión de los principales agentes socioeconómicos (grandes empresarios, economistas, sindicalistas) acerca de la política económica del menemismo. Para ello, toma como punto de referencia el año 1993, momento de sedimentación y consolidación de la hegemonía menemista. La metodología se basa en el análisis del discurso público de los principales actores socioeconómicos. Para ello, se utiliza un marco teórico basado en la perspectiva sociopolítica del discurso de Ernesto Laclau y fuentes provenientes de los principales diarios de circulación nacional (Clarín, La Nación y Página 12), complementado con el análisis de declaraciones provenientes de la revista IDEA, perteneciente a la corporación empresarial. Como objetivo general, se pretende indagar en la disputa por la hegemonía del espacio público y, específicamente, en la perspectiva de cada actor clave acerca del proyecto socioeconómico de país en la Argentina neoliberal de comienzos de la década de los '90.

HIV/AIDS care, coping strategies and work environmental stress among nurses in Botswana

Since 2006 there has been universal acceptance in both developing and industrialized societies that HIV treatment and related services, including more effective prevention programs, be available to all citizens. However, as a result of the worldwide recession and shifting health priorities, progress toward these goals has stalled. While the epidemic continues to grow, fewer resources are dedicated to treatment and prevention than previously, and clinical staffs, especially nurses, are challenged by more patient care responsibilities. This paper focuses on the relationships of HIV/AIDS care, coping strategies, and work environmental stress for nurses working in an African country with a significant epidemic, Botswana. Data for this study was obtained through questionnaires completed by a sample of 201 nurses working in different types of health facilities in rural and urban areas of Botswana. Results show that most of the nurses (65 percent) frequently provided care to clients with HIV/AIDS. Only 35 percent of the nurses provided care to clients with HIV/AIDS infrequently. Those care givers who often worked with patients infected with HIV reported significantly more "role demand" and "shift work" stress and said that their coping strategies included physical exercise and taking food supplements. Implications of the findings for professional "burn out" among HIV/AIDS care in developing societies are discussed together with strategies for more effective allocations of health care personnel.

The educational market/state dyad: The Chilean case

Educational markets and the state are understood, by many scholars, to be separate entities. It is thought that while markets allow parents to choose schools freely, the state regulates minimum standards of quality and equality, in positive, neutral and transparent ways. Nonetheless, the author argues that, within the Chilean educational context, the market and state have an interdependent relationship. State discourses, technologies and devices (e.g. national tests, league tables, awards) are crucial for activating and intensifying competition, as they produce a symbolic capital that is disputed within the marketplace. Based on data from four case studies, the author shows diverse ways in which educational institutions mobilize resources, deliver multiple strategies and invest significant efforts in order to produce visible symbols of a 'successful school' according to state standards and classifications.

It is expected that educational institutions dispute these state devised symbolic capitals for increasing school vouchers, motivated by economic interests. Nonetheless, the data evidences that these are not straightforward links; market practices involve a complex amalgamate of interests (economic, political, pedagogical, emotional) that go beyond an economic rationale. Moreover, competing practices for state-symbolic capital entangle institutions that participate within the marketplace, as well as other segments of the educational arena that are not expected to compete for student enrolments (e.g. parents, rural school, local Ministry). In other words, state technologies designed for regulating the marketplace trigger performative activities and a competing rationale that expands pervasively beyond the market boundaries. Overall, market competition exceeds the market itself. The effects of the interconnected state/market technologies are profound and extensive. The state is not just another actor within the Chilean educational market or the 'regulator' of minimum national standards, but a core producer of it.

How does one navigate the terrain of research in the native country of one's parents? As the daughter of immigrants from Peru, my fascination with the country has existed since childhood. Returning to Peru now as a feminist researcher who was born, raised, and educated in the United States, I encounter a series of methodological dilemmas as I try to make feminist sense of a country my family left decades before. As I currently embark on research about the human rights of domestic workers in Lima, Peru. I must grapple with a series of conflicting realities because I have such an intimate connection to this place.

In my paper, I explore, but do not necessarily resolve, a series of questions: How have frequent trips to Peru to visit family since childhood made Peru both familiar and unknown to me? How do I conduct ethical research with domestic workers given our economic and material distances? How do domestic workers interpret my research as a Peruvian-American feminist scholar? How does having familial origins based in one of the region's poorest country to currently residing in the most powerful country in the region (if not the world), produce new challenges in terms of reconciling the power between researcher and subject? What is a feasible way to conduct research that is sufficiently transparent and ethical given the marginalized community of primarily indigenous women I am working with and study? What is my responsibility to the domestic workers I interview? How do I explain the research to family members in Peru who employ and have problematic relationships with their own domestic workers?

Modern social renouncers : A new idiom of distress ?

This paper will present an ongoing research on what we have called « social renouncers », that is to say reclusive people who have withdrawn from social life. Behaviors of this kind are seen as a growing phenomenon among young people that our pluridisciplinary and comparative study, comparing French cases to the exemplary phenomenon of Hikikomori in Japan, intends to understand. Our view is that, even though some cases might be understood under the concept of social phobia, it is unlikely that all cases of social withdrawal, even in its most extreme form – self-reclusion at home, or pure « virtual life » – boil down to nothing but to a mental disease. As much as it is also unlikely that all cases could be explained by economical issues and changes in the job market in our modern societies. Instead, we intend to discuss the hypothesis that social withdrawal could be becoming, like depression, addiction or trauma, an « idiom of distress ». Such an idiom should be understood as a way to confront modern constraints linked to the collective imperative of autonomization and the changing paths to adulthood. The fact that such attitudes are linked to withdrawal or renunciation has to be addressed : why withdrawal rather than other forms of behavioral reactions (addiction, violence, etc.)? Social renouncers could be therefore a new profile of mental suffering. This is why we will be interrogating, from a sociological perspective, meanings and normative backgrounds of such a phenomenon (adulthood and autonomy, standard emotions, cultural meanings of the domestic spaces). Following this path, and based on the analysis of clinical cases and testimonies both from the Japanese and the French field works, we will examine how social withdrawal tends to have become a normative way to feel and express malaise or social misfitness.

Diversidad en la infancia brasileña: Perspectivas y desafíos de las investigaciones con niños y niñas pequeños(as) en el campo de la sociología de la infancia

Abordaremos un actor social excluido, que las ciencias sociales todavía no han dado la atención debida: los niños pequeños. En la actualidad, los niños e la niñez han ganado visibilidad en las investigaciones de las ciencias sociales, principalmente en la sociología de la infancia. El concepto de infancia todavía no ha sido muy discutido en el campo de la Sociología, y, en general, es comprendido en una oposición entre naturaleza y cultura, al revés de mostrar que la naturaleza humana es justo la producción de cultura. Discutiremos una noción de infancia que presupone su trayectoria como un niño histórico, social, político y cultural. Plantearemos la construcción social de la infancia como un nuevo paradigma, con énfasis en la necesidad de elaborar la reconstrucción de ese concepto marcado por una visión occidental, colonizadora y "adultocéntrica". En esta perspectiva, mostraremos investigaciones brasileñas que desarrollamos en espacios colectivos de educación, las cuales construyen una sociología de la infancia postcolonial. Aunque Marcel Mauss hubiera cuestionado la 'infancia civilizada' de Piaget en los años 1937; Florestan Fernandes en 1946 construyó los conceptos de 'cultura infantil' y de 'grupos infantiles' cuando investigaba a los niños jugando en la calle. Evidenciaremos las especificidades y la diversidad que los niños pequeños brasileños nos presentan y las diferentes formas de opresión en nuestra sociedad, tales como el prejuicio de clase, la discriminación sexual, racial y étnica, regional. De esa forma, la sociología de la infancia contribuye para la construcción de una pedagogía de la diferencia. Entendiendo a los niños pequeños como sujetos de derechos, esas investigaciones consideran relevantes sus cotidianos y vivencias, destacan como las diferencias marcan sus condiciones sociales de vida, identifican los movimientos de resistencias, oposición y afrontamiento, en las transgresiones, en la manera de actuar y de querer de estos(as) brasileños(as).

Fronteras discursivas: Travestismo, transexualidad y transgeneridad en los discursos del estado Argentino

En el presente trabajo me propongo compartir mi propuesta de investigación, centrada en el análisis de los discursos del Estado argentino en torno al travestismo, la transexualidad y la transgeneridad desde la entrada en vigencia de los edictos policiales hasta la actualidad. Se trata de un análisis de la forma variante en la que el Estado argentino, en sus distintas instancias y a lo largo del tiempo, establece definiciones y regulaciones sobre las personas cuyas expresiones de género no se conciben con su corporalidad bajo los términos esperados por la matriz binaria de género dominante.

Considerando la operatividad social de los discursos es posible afirmar que la disputa por la ampliación de los límites de inteligibilidad de los cuerpos y las identidades se da en el plano de la representación, del discurso y de la nominación. De este modo entiendo al Estado como un actor fundamental en la producción de los múltiples discursos definitorios de las fronteras de las sexualidades legítimas, abordando los discursos estatales de forma articulada con una episteme histórica particular que cifra de manera específica aquellos deseos y corporalidades que desafían la linealidad hegemónica del sexo-género-deseo.

Atendiendo a dicho planteo, el objetivo de la presente exposición es el de poner en discusión la perspectiva epistemológica adoptada así como el encuadre metodológico desarrollado, centrado en el análisis temático de documentos. Asimismo compartiré los resultados preliminares obtenidos en mi proceso de investigación.

21st-century collective movements

This paper aims to contribute to theoretical debates on XXI century collective movements, such as the so-called Arab Spring, the Occupy Wall Street movement and Indignados initiatives. It will focus on the meanings associated with causes of insurgence, an individual's sense of subjective implication, and the construction of an arena of conflicts underscoring these collective initiatives. The paper will also analyze the importance of ICT use, notably the internet, in the construction of these initiatives. We will investigate the intersection of cultural, economic, social and political stakes buttressed against the construction and reaffirmation of individual and social life at local, national, regional, global and cyberspatial levels. The first part of this paper is on the one hand, dedicated to the analytical definition of these movements. On the other hand, it suggests a theoretical perspective to distinguish these movements from protests related to interest groups, riots and the neo-populist mobilizations. The second part of the paper is focused on: a) the causality of this insurgence; b) the sense of individual involvement in its construction; and c) the modalities of these initiatives. The third section of this paper analyzes the construction of arenas of conflict, and the meanings produced by these movements as they intervene in the construction of social life as it is articulated at local, national, regional, global and cyberspatial levels.

La legión extranjera. un análisis de las técnicas de reclutamiento del personal proveniente de otras fuerzas en la policía metropolitana de la ciudad autónoma de Buenos Aires

En el presente trabajo pretendemos dar cuenta de los procesos de reclutamiento del personal policial con experiencia que desarrolla la Policía Metropolitana de la Ciudad Autónoma de Buenos Aires.

La Policía Metropolitana (PM) de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires comenzó a funcionar en el año 2008 a partir de la sanción de la Ley de Seguridad Pública. Una las principales cuestiones que marcaron la conformación de la nueva fuerza de seguridad fue la necesidad de cobrar visibilidad social y por consiguiente de contar con policías que ocuparan el espacio público. En este sentido, la incorporación de personal con experiencia fue (y continúa siendo) una de las principales estrategias para abultar las filas de la PM. Teniendo en cuenta que hasta la actualidad hubieron dos promociones de cadetes formados por la Metropolitana, cada una de aproximadamente quinientos cadetes y que el total de policías metropolitanos es de dos mil quinientos, no es menor el dato de que cerca del 60% de los policías Metropolitanos provenga de otra fuerza de seguridad o de fuerzas armadas.

En el abordaje de dicha temática analizaremos los parámetros de la convocatoria al personal con experiencia, los requisitos a cumplir para ingresar a la fuerza, la duración del curso de nivelación, la conformación de dicho curso y sus partes y las formas de evaluación. En torno a esto esbozaremos algunas líneas teóricas que nos ayuden a comprender cómo se conforma la identidad del policía metropolitano teniendo en cuenta la convivencia de culturas institucionales diversas que suponen formas de entender y de hacer diferentes.

Legal activists and intellectuals interactions with workers who are on the margins of law in Cordoba-Argentina

This paper intends to look into the relationship between workers and intellectuals in cases in which workers' status recognition as such is not clearly defined in the juridical system (legally marginalized) and legal activists and intellectuals are in possession of legal knowledge, therefore operating within the juridical field.

We found those particular relationships interesting for two main reasons. On the one hand, in their interaction with workers, legal activists or intellectuals might face certain issues which are inherent to the mainstream logic of the juridical field, such as: language colonization, conflict expropriation, binary labels in law, normalizing or emancipatory function of rights, legitimated knowledge, etc.

On the other hand, workers who's status recognition as such is not clearly defined in the legal system could be considered as being on the margins of law. Workers who's position is on the margins of law might build a tense relationship with law and therefore those perceptions and experiences can also be translated into the concrete interaction with legal activists and intellectuals.

We will examine three experiences from Córdoba-Argentina related to: 1) sex workers, 2) enterprises recovered by workers, and 3) jail-guards. These three cases are linked by the fact that workers involved have had interactions with intellectuals and legal activists as a way to deal with their struggles to change their position in law. All of them have challenged the set of juridical norms and therefore their position in law and society, many times hand by hand with legal activists and intellectuals.

Social imaginaries of teaching ethics in two public administration schools in Argentina

In addition to teaching a profession, the university must transmit civic values that contribute to improving the social order, in the way that students and future professionals acquire skills to think critically and independently.

The analysis of the university ethics training should include both the specific content being taught and the attitudes and practices of teachers in the teaching-learning process and also students' own perceptions.

We recover the concept of social imaginaries as those schemes that allow constructing reality, perceiving something as real, and explain and operate from specific references in the symbolic universe, that produces every community from which one perceives and elaborates its purpose.

From this theoretical framework, this paper exposes the results of the Research Project "Ethics in the training of managers" that tries to recognize the social imaginaries of teachers and students about ethical / unethical practices of managers as well as the methods and attitudes within the teaching process in the Administration Schools of two recognized Argentine public universities: Buenos Aires University and La Plata University. Coincidences and differences between teachers and students are analyzed.

Individual well-being in Italy: Combining subjective and objective data through partial orders

In this paper we present a novel analysis pertaining to well-being in Italian regions, for year 2010, combining subjective and objective ordinal data into a consistent and unified framework. The analysis is performed through a new evaluation methodology, based on partial order theory, which produces well-being scores without involving any aggregation among attributes. This way, the ordinal nature of the data is fully respected and the main drawbacks of the classical composite indicator approach, when applied to non-numerical variables, are overcome. For sake of completeness, results obtained using this new methodology are compared with those from more traditional approaches, showing the benefits of using partial order theory in evaluation studies, in terms of both data respect and results interpretation.

Inside migration: The countryman's integration through the "caipira music"

Within a few decades in the 20th century Brazil went from being a country with the majority of its population living in rural area to be a predominantly urban country. Based in this historical fact of national scenario transformation, we conducted a research to analyze this phenomenon and the consequent process of countryman integration in the urban environment through the songs of that time.

This analysis - that we have been performing in the sociology doctorate program in the Universidade Federal de São Carlos (UFSCar) - is concerned with a typical music genre of the Brazilian southwest region: "moda de viola" which integrates, together with other genre and beats, the "caipira music".

Due to the defining characteristic of narrating events in the countryman's reality, now migrant, the "moda de viola" is a vantage point to analyze and comprehension of dilemmas and tensions in the integration process which reflections aided to define the national capitalism characteristics.

The emerging role of diaspora in the restructuring of the Nigerian state

RC 31, Session E

The changing world economic fortunes as affected the 3rd world countries has brought about various Structural Adjustment Programmes by the World Bank and other International organizations to cushion its effect on these regions. Over the years, the economic progress of these countries have remained dampened and even become worse while at the same time, the richer countries have become richer. In these circumstances, various other programmes, projects and methods have been designed to bring about development and turn things around for these countries and their regions. Poverty has been the obvious indicator of the hopelessness of the people of these regions of which Africa is said to have the highest number of such poverty-stricken countries and people living below the poverty level. Migration of people of these countries to oversea countries such as the USA, Europe for instance, is viewed as an opportunity to alleviate the suffering of families by the remittances the migrants send to their families back home. In recent times, researches have confirmed the importance of remittances by Africans in Diaspora. In fact, such remittances have exceeded official development assistance and Foreign Direct Investments as the Diaspora are becoming a vocal voice by their achievements in the countries of their abode which by and large they are beginning to be of immense assistance to their countries of natural birth by the positive contributions they make. This is basically the focus of this paper to examine the roles which the Diaspora have discovered for themselves in assisting Nigeria to address the developmental problems at the grass root with particular reference to poverty alleviation programme and such other roles they can embark upon in recognizance of their competencies and financial capabilities in the restructuring of the Nigerian State economically, socially and politically.

La esma como sitio de memoria: Del testimonio al centro de interpretación

El trabajo analiza el proceso por el cual el predio donde funcionó la ESMA (Escuela de Mecánica de la Armada, uno de los principales centros clandestinos de detención de la dictadura argentina – 1976-1983) se transformó recientemente en un sitio de memoria. Sobre todo, se pregunta por los dispositivos memoriales utilizados para mostrar el Casino de Oficiales (edificio en donde se centró la actividad represiva en la ESMA), transformado hoy en un centro de interpretación que recibe visitas de todo tipo: grupos de estudiantes secundarios, periodistas, investigadores, visitantes extranjeros y público en general.

El análisis pone el énfasis en los testimonios y en la manera en que han servido para instalar una señalización en el Casino de Oficiales, teniendo en cuenta que no se ha recurrido a imágenes, ni a objetos, ni a ningún otro "vehículo de memoria" en ese sitio. El trabajo analiza esta señalización, indagando en las maneras en que los testimonios citados en los carteles funcionan como dispositivo de mediación memorial. ¿Cuál es la narración que construyen estos testimonios? ¿Cómo se los presenta? ¿Qué testimonios fueron seleccionados para ser exhibidos allí? ¿Qué "diálogo" generan con la producción testimonial previa y posterior? ¿Cómo se relacionan estos carteles con el espacio en donde fueron ubicados?

Esta indagación se realiza en tres tiempos, tratando de establecer las distintas "capas memoriales" que se han ido superponiendo –como estratos geológicos– a lo largo de los años. Se exploran los primeros testimonios de denuncia sobre la ESMA, publicados durante la dictadura en un informe de derechos humanos (1979); el informe de la CONADEP (1984); y los testimonios que se exhiben actualmente en los carteles (instalados allí en 2005).

Lives in green, white and black: Whiteness, national identity and anti-racism in Ireland

In Ireland, the rapid transition from a country of emigration to one of in-migration, and the racialised construction of 'the migrant other' that has accompanied it, has profoundly destabilised notions of Irishness. The perceived 'crisis' of migration, the racism experienced by migrants, and attempts to articulate 'integration' policies have, in turn, exposed not only the racialising dynamics underpinning the hegemonic notion of Irish national identity and the state formation that relies on it, but also its propensity to marginalise and occlude many located within the so-called majority white ethnic society (Feldman 2006, 2008). Yet while research and civil society have focused primarily on migrants' experiences of racism and othering, this, as argued elsewhere, ultimately leaves whiteness uninterrogated and deracialised, continuing to function as the unmarked norm, over-racialises and essentialises the 'otherness' of visible minorities, and thwarts deeper understandings of the intersecting and multiplicitous dynamics of marginalisation and othering which underpin all racial and cultural positionings (Brah 1996; Nayak 2003; Frankenberg 1999).

As Knowles (2003) observes, it is in the nexus of peoples' personal crises of existence and the regimes that shape their lives where the racial social order is both constructed and subverted. As such, this paper draws on biographical interviews with white Irish people active in anti-racism and migrant solidarity organisations to gain insights into the experiences and epiphanies contributing to their development of interculturalist or 'race cognizant' (Frankenberg 1993), as opposed to primordialist, orientations, how these have shaped their anti-racism involvement and practices, and their implications in the wider contexts of race/identity politics and debates. It also considers the ways in which biographical approaches can illuminate the intersectionalities of race, class and gender, and the complex inter-relationships between national identities, othernesses and racisms, as they both inspire and undermine anti-racist mobilisation and the transformation of racialised social orders.

Políticas públicas para la inclusión socio-digital y apropiación social de las TIC: El caso de San Luis, Argentina

El paper describe los avances de la investigación "Observatorio del uso social de las TIC en San Luis" dirigida por Susana Finkelievich y Alejandro Prince. Su objetivo es efectuar un seguimiento de la difusión, de los usos y hábitos de apropiación de las tecnologías de información y comunicación (TIC) en la vida cotidiana de una muestra testigo de pobladores de localidades alcanzadas por los programas de inclusión digital, San Luis Digital (SLD), en la provincia de San Luis, Argentina. En un estudio anterior se midieron los alcances e impactos logrados por las prácticas y las percepciones en el uso de TIC en el desarrollo social y la calidad de vida de la población de la Provincia de San Luis, a partir de la implementación de los programas de SLD. En la actual investigación se trata de identificar los usos progresivos que los habitantes de San Luis le dan a estas tecnologías en su cotidianidad y en sus actividades sociales, culturales y económicas, así como de relevar y explicar el proceso de la difusión y adopción, y de la valoración de los programas SLD.

Se analiza cómo ejercen las TIC un efecto viral, difundiéndose en familias y vecinos, qué transformaciones educativas y culturales han tenido lugar, cómo han influido las TIC en actividades como agricultura, servicios, turismo, a qué nuevos comportamientos individuales y colectivos han dado lugar y cuál es el potencial de creación de nuevos emprendimientos usando TIC. Dichos impactos se estudian sobre cuatro localidades geográficamente distribuidas de la Provincia, por medio de entrevistas en profundidad reiteradas a distintos usuarios de Internet según ocho roles sociales claramente diferenciados.

Seeking for new patterns of development in Brazil: The case of a science park in São Paulo state

This paper consists in a case study of a Science Park at the State of São Paulo, Brazil. We aim to explain how universities, companies and the State are innovating their relationship by getting in touch in the parks, environments created with the proposal of fostering innovation and competitiveness. We start with the idea that the relationship between universities and companies has been changing in Brazil, following an international trend. Universities look forward to add value to their research, mainly by transferring the results to the productive sector. By its turn, the productive sector is increasingly using basic research to get new products or even innovative processes and services. This is a new situation, which some authors call the economy / knowledge society, in which science parks have an important role in promoting Science, Technology, Innovation and Development. The main hypothesis of this paper is that the government plays a key role in the success or failure of technology-based ventures (such as science parks) in Brazil. Policies of Science, Technology and Innovation are a strong stimulator for science parks' companies become able to bring economic and social impact. The park studied here is a relatively recent Science Park experience in Brazil, which was created under the spectrum of public policies to foster innovation, from the federal and local governments. Our findings suggest that public policies of science, technology and innovation, mainly direct investments in companies and programs that put universities and companies in touch are crucial for the in park companies survival. The methodology is shaped on mixed methods, from which we could evaluate the role of public policies to foster innovation in Brazil.

"Origen, historia y preocupaciones de los movimientos socio-ambientales en sergipe"

La investigación tuvo como objetivo estudiar la emergencia, el papel y las posibilidades de los movimientos ambientalistas en Sergipe, en este momento crucial de la historia del planeta, abarcando un período de análisis entre 1983 y 2011. Este objetivo se ha guiado por el tema central de la investigación, que consistió en analizar la relación entre la misión, estructura y acción de las organizaciones ambientales en Sergipe. La justificación de la investigación fue la necesidad de mapear y evaluar críticamente el movimiento ambientalista en Sergipe, porque el Estado no existe, una búsqueda que trae todos los temas relacionados con el movimiento ecologista desde su nacimiento. La metodología utilizada se basó en la búsqueda de bibliografía, documentos de estudio de Sergipe un intervalo de tiempo de 28 años, el análisis detallado de los nueve "movimientos" entrevistas exclusivas y en profundidad semi-estructuradas con decenas de actores sociales involucrados en el área. En conclusión, se observó que el ecologismo en Sergipe, desde sus inicios, se asoció con la recuperación de la conciencia sobre el medio ambiente en la lucha contra los problemas emergentes locales, y la búsqueda de la legitimidad de la opinión pública. Aunque el movimiento ecologista han recibido atención en algunos momentos de los medios de comunicación, el movimiento no logró salir del nicho de mercado y lograr una porción más representativa de la sociedad. Todavía se puede ver la profunda relación entre el perfil de líderes ambientales, la fuerza del capital y los resultados prácticos de las acciones del medio ambiente y, por último, se observó que la acción de los movimientos tiene vínculo mucho más fuerte con la relación de la Organización y de sus principales líderes con los otros "ambientalistas", que con la estructura y la misión de la institución.

Urban a/effect: Experiencing urban change

Now that the majority of the world's population lives in cities - of increasing cultural, social and ethnic diversity - the capacity for urban dwellers to negotiate difference is essential for the promotion of social cohesion and sociability. A defining characteristic of cities is that we live among strangers; it's a place where we meet with and brush up against the "Other" (Barthes 1986). A cornucopia of sights, sounds, smells, feelings and auditory sensual input, living in the city can be an emotional experience that requires specific skills, tactics and tolerances. This is all the more the case for cities that have experienced intensification of urban development and change, as many have since the latter part of the twentieth-century.

Based on a study of the rapidly developing city of Brisbane, Australia, this paper considers the role of emotion in people's relationship with their changing inner-city neighbourhoods. It presents data from interviews and surveys with residents that highlight the ways in which emotion and sociability are central to people's experience of their urban habitat and how their changing environment is perceived. The current focus on environmental sustainability should not overlook a critical understanding of affect, experience and the consequences for social sustainability which is vital for the development of democratic and harmonious places.

Female directors as signalling device: Status, legitimacy and gender diversity in corporate governance

The consistent finding that gender diversity in corporate boards is not related to firm performance runs counter to the normative idea that gender diversity equals good corporate governance. It also conflicts with those theories from social psychology that claim diversity to be an antidote to 'group think' and helps to increase the problem solving capacity of groups.

In this paper we take a different point of departure and lift the analysis of board diversity from the firm level to the level of the broader corporate elite. We argue that board diversity is best understood in terms of a signalling device. Gender diversity may add to the status and legitimacy of corporations and their boards. We will study the consequences and underlying mechanisms of this proposition both on the level of individual firms as well as on the level of the business community. We use longitudinal data on board compositions in the Netherlands and Europe from 1976 to 2010. The results lend support for the argument that board of directors increasingly serve as 'showcase' towards (institutional) investors and society at large. Firms that suffer from legitimacy problems tend to have more female board members. Within the business community, gender diversity seems to be contagious beyond a threshold. We will apply the theoretical insights from group theory to the business community as a whole.

Globalización y patrimonio cultural ¿Cómo defender el patrimonio cultural ante las nuevas tendencias políticas, sociales, culturales y económicas de México y el Mundo? ¿Qué nuevo sentido debe adquirir la protección del patrimonio bajo estas nuevas circunstancias? El Estado Nación está en crisis; todo aquello que lo llenaba de sentido, se desmorona y fragmenta, y el deslave del Estado Nación se lleva en su torrente a todas las concepciones que surgieron en su seno, incluido el concepto tradicional de patrimonio cultural y las políticas tradicionales para su protección. Desde finales del siglo pasado se ha implantado, en México y el Mundo, un nuevo sistema económico y político: el capitalismo neoliberal. Con él llegó, -como pieza fundamental del engranaje-, la globalización, la cual busca -a través de la educación, las modas, la informática, entre otros-, borrar y desvanecer las diferencias culturales, minimizarlas, desaparecerlas para generar un cúmulo de individuos idénticos en gustos y tendencias. En contra de lo esperado, las comunidades actuales han combatido los embates de la globalización resistiendo y tratando de arraigar las singularidades culturales que los diferencian y distinguen de otras; lidian por reivindicar su existencia y su derecho a la diferencia. El refugio actual se construye en la particularidad; en la generación y defensa de lo que denominamos pequeños legados culturales. Por lo tanto, los sectores sociales actuales -tanto los ya existentes como los que surgen constantemente- crean nuevos conjuntos de símbolos e imágenes que los llenan de sentido y los identifican en la diferencia. Es, precisamente en este ámbito -donde florecen las identidades particulares en resistencia- que tenemos que replantearnos los objetivos de nuestras investigaciones y las propuestas de protección hacia un mundo donde miremos el patrimonio cultural como un recurso que permita la reproducción de las diferencias entre las comunidades culturales y asegure su existencia y sobrevivencia.

Memorias andinas de resistencia: El cuerpo como territorio en disputa

En el mundo andino han existido diversas expresiones sociales de resistencia ante la colonización hispánica, y posteriormente a la consolidación de los Estados nacionales, constituyendo las danzas y las borracheras formas de resignificación y lucha situando al cuerpo como territorio de disputa, temáticas que han sido totalmente excluidas de la historia de los movimientos sociales indígenas de nuestro continente. En esta exposición se reflexionará sobre memorias andinas de resistencia tanto coloniales como actuales, analizando las borracheras andinas en la Colonia como prácticas sociales liminales, y su relación con el movimiento Taki Onqoy del siglo XVI, canto, danza de la enfermedad, de la región de Huamanga, Ayacucho, Perú, donde comunidades indígenas reivindicaban el retorno de las wakas (entidades sagradas) como rebelión ante la colonización hispánica, y su reelaboración actual en la zona como danza de tijeras. Luego se revisará el rito del tinku de la zona de Macha, Potosí, Bolivia, en tanto confrontación, encuentro, lucha entre las dos mitades de una comunidad para restablecer el equilibrio, la armonía, y su reconversión en una danza que hoy ocupa un lugar central en Chile en marchas que poseen como eje diversas demandas sociales (indígenas, ambientales, educacionales). Finalmente se analizará el takanakuy, festividad que se celebra actualmente en distintas provincias del Perú, que tiene como foco una serie de peleas entre parejas de sujetos.

Muertes heroicas y ajusticiamientos en la Revolución de Mayo. Buenos Aires, 1810-1812

La Revolución de mayo de 1810 introdujo una serie de cambios políticos, económicos y sociales en el espacio virreinal rioplatense, del que Buenos Aires fuera la ciudad capital. Estos acontecimientos sacudieron a los grupos de poder coloniales y redefinieron –aunque fuera parcialmente– las fuentes del poder y del prestigio, inaugurando un proceso de transformación de la élite. Asimismo irrumpió, de manera insoslayable, una intensa movilización y una significativa participación política de la plebe –subordinada pero decisiva– en el proceso revolucionario. En este contexto abierto por la revolución y las guerras de independencia, la ponencia estará articulada alrededor del problema de las representaciones y usos políticos de la muerte.

Los objetivos del trabajo serán: en primer lugar, analizar las representaciones de la “muerte heroica” y los reconocimientos públicos brindados a los soldados que murieron defendiendo la causa “patriota” por parte de los gobiernos revolucionarios. En segundo lugar, se intentará comparar estas muertes con las ejecuciones de los enemigos o contrarrevolucionarios, atendiendo especialmente a los casos de Liniers y de Álzaga.

Policies of inversion. Students riots as civilizing processes in Chile

Paper tries to reach two main objectives. The first one consists in a practical application of Norbert Elias' Civilizing Theory (1993 [1939]; 1990) based on contention social movements analysis, specifically two of them deployed in Chile during May-June 2006 and during 2011, which were leaded by high school and university students, which have had unexpected and critical consequences to democratic institutional design of Chilean society. Simultaneously as second objective, paper discusses a formal contribution to Civilizing Theory and in order to outline theoretical and methodological tools, which fit with empirical observations of figurations, about its course and development. Starting on that synthesis, paper investigates on perspectives of formal comprehension of evolution processes of societies, on which inversion as a sort of figuration capable of beginning to see unforeseen possible worlds through shared interests, plays a core role as social evolution forerunner.

Cultos pentecostales y procesos étnicos identitarios: La danza evangélica como aspecto diferencial significativo del pentecostalismo qom (toba)

La presente ponencia se propone reflexionar acerca de uno de los aspectos más relevantes de la vida social de los aborígenes qom (toba) asentados en la ciudad de Rosario (Argentina): el religioso. Originarios de la región chaqueña, los qom profesan en su mayoría el evangelismo pentecostal, habiendo conformado desde la década de 1950 una serie de Iglesias independientes, de carácter nativista, dirigidas y conformadas por miembros de dicho grupo y otros grupos aborígenes chaqueños. La impronta anti-intelectualista y la afirmación del carácter universal del sacerdocio sostenida por el pentecostalismo han favorecido a la conformación de un campo religioso propiamente qom en el que las transmisión de la doctrina en general, y la preparación de los líderes religiosos en particular, se vincula con el uso de una serie de técnicas corporales entre las que cobra particular importancia las danzas circulares cuya incorporación en las reuniones religiosas ha sido objeto de conflictos y disputas.

El presente artículo es parte de un proyecto de investigación iniciado en abril de 2010 en los diferentes asentamientos de dicho grupo en la referida ciudad. La metodología utilizada es de carácter cualitativo, habiéndose implementado dos técnicas de investigación fundamentales: observación y entrevistas semi-estructuradas y estructuradas. A partir del material relevado se observa que la incorporación de las danzas a la estructura regular de los cultos constituye un aspecto diferencial significativo al interior del campo religioso del pentecostalismo toba. El análisis no se centra en los rasgos estilísticos de cada una de dichas variantes, sino la influencia que las mismas revisten en la configuración del campo del pentecostalismo qom y en la construcción de procesos étnicos identitarios. Se busca de este modo contribuir con el estudio de procesos socio-identitarios al interior de la comunidad que contribuyen a reforzar una conciencia revalorizadora que trasciende el ámbito meramente religioso.

Ocupar, resistir, producir, sostener. El problema de la sustentabilidad en las experiencias de gestión colectiva del trabajo

La literatura sobre autogestión del trabajo destaca que uno de los principales desafíos a los que hacen frente estas experiencias radica aquello que desde este campo se define como “el problema de la sustentabilidad”. Esto es, la capacidad de asegurar los retiros de sus integrantes a partir de los ingresos generados en base a la comercialización de su actividad. Desde el año 2002 hemos venido realizando trabajo de campo con empresas recuperadas y otras experiencias de autogestión del trabajo en el Área metropolitana de Buenos Aires. Estas investigaciones nos han permitido observar que el “problema de la sustentabilidad” genera una serie de tensiones que (re)configuran y (re)define el “proyecto político” desde el que se construyen estas experiencias.

Esta ponencia nos proponemos reflexionar sobre la categoría de “sustentabilidad” analizando cómo esta tensión permea las prácticas cotidianas que las personas involucradas en estas experiencias desarrollan. A modo de hipótesis de trabajo, sostenemos que uno de los principales problemas se vincula con el modo en que la categoría de sustentabilidad se basa en una conceptualización según la cual la gestión “económica” de estas experiencias constituye un problema “técnico” que por lo tanto queda escindido de las prácticas “políticas” que también sostienen a estos emprendimientos sociales. Desde esta reflexión nos proponemos contribuir a una mirada que permita desplazar el foco de análisis de los aspectos “económicos” para pensar la relevancia de estas experiencias como espacios de construcción política.

Participación y espacio público en la reforma de salud en Chile

El enfoque de derechos en las políticas públicas releva la participación de la ciudadanía como un derecho en sí mismo y un factor clave para la justicia y la legitimidad de las políticas. La reforma de salud implantada en 2004 en Chile aplicó un enfoque de derechos al hacer exigibles un conjunto de garantías de atención a enfermedades graves, caras y frecuentes. La investigación analiza los arreglos institucionales de participación en salud durante el período 2004 -2010, en su potencialidad para derivar en el fortalecimiento de la ciudadanía y espacios públicos consistentes con el enfoque de derechos que la reforma adopta. El estudio de tipo cualitativo, transeccional y descriptivo indaga en tres niveles de investigación: las normas, políticas e instrumentos de gestión que constriñen a los actores; los arreglos institucionales de participación en 5 Servicios de Salud de tres regiones del país, y los sentidos que sus directivos otorgaron a la participación ciudadana y cómo estos se tradujeron en medidas político-administrativas en pro de su despliegue. Sus resultados muestran que los espacios de participación dependen fuertemente de la voluntad política de los cuerpos directivos y que su transformación en espacios públicos está condicionada por los sentidos que los directivos le atribuyen, las restricciones de capital ciudadano en los territorios, y por el relativo aislamiento de la política impulsada en la escala territorial en la que se desempeña el Servicio de Salud. La política de derechos, limitada a salud, a un racionamiento concreto en ese mismo campo y a una extrema complejidad para su aprehensión por las comunidades, redundó en una insuficiencia para promover ciudadanía activa, ya que no alcanzan a ser percibidos como tales por las comunidades locales.

"Luz, cámara y justicia ambiental". Análisis y reflexiones sociológicas sobre el activismo ambientalista en las narrativas audiovisuales

La configuración de un escenario de "crisis ecológica mundial" se manifiesta en el aumento indiscriminado de la explotación de los bienes naturales y en la degradación generalizada del ambiente, acompañados por un nivel creciente de organizaciones sociales que reclaman justicia ambiental.

En ese marco, el interés por los problemas ambientales se manifiesta no sólo en la atención que están prestando las ciencias sociales sino también en la mirada de las realizaciones audiovisuales del cine documental, aspectos que cobran especial relevancia si tenemos en cuenta el aumento de la cantidad de investigaciones sociológicas y de films relacionados.

Sin embargo, el incremento del uso del video no es exclusividad de realizadores profesionales, sino que quienes utilizan herramientas audiovisuales y organizan ciclos de cine, suelen ser también activistas, investigadores, ONGs, y representantes de organismos públicos - tanto nacionales como internacionales.

En Argentina, es posible registrar en los últimos años cierta proliferación de una serie de festivales y ciclos de cine ambiental. Entre los documentales proyectados, es posible observar el abordaje de una multiplicidad y diversidad de conflictos ambientales en los cuales diferentes organizaciones y activistas sociales disputan por el significado, el acceso, el control y la gestión de los "bienes naturales", así como exigen cambios político-institucionales y avances en materia de derecho ambiental.

Teniendo como base herramientas teóricas en torno a la justicia ambiental y desde un enfoque teórico- metodológico cualitativo audiovisual, me propongo analizar comparativamente las características que asume el abordaje del activismo ambiental en las narrativas audiovisuales, a partir del relevamiento de: (a) una serie de entrevistas a realizadores de videos y organizadores de festivales, de (b) análisis audiovisual de los videos, así como de sus sinopsis y gacetas informativas, y (c) de observaciones participantes en los festivales mencionados.

Intercambio de apoyo entre hijos adultos y sus padres mayores en Chile: Retos y desafíos actuales

Chile está convirtiéndose en una sociedad envejecida, lo cual genera una serie de desafíos especialmente para las familias y los hijos adultos, quienes deberán cumplir con la tarea de dar ayuda a sus padres en caso de necesidad. Sin embargo los cambios socioculturales están poniendo en jaque el rol de las obligaciones familiares. Es así que utilizando los datos de una encuesta presencial a una muestra representativa de 600 adultos de 45 y más años de la ciudad de Santiago de Chile, este estudio busca dar cuenta de la red de apoyo existente entre hijos adultos y padres mayores, profundizando en el sentimiento de obligación que los hijos dicen sentir hacia sus progenitores, como posible motivación para dar apoyo. También se indagan otros factores que puedan estar explicando la entrega de apoyo, tales como sexo, edad y educación de los hijos, tenencia de pareja e hijos menores de 25 años, número de hermanos, cercanía geográfica con el progenitor y calidad y reciprocidad en la relación. Además se incluyen características de los padres, tales como sexo, edad y si tiene pareja.

Utilizando modelos de regresión logística con cluster standard errors se encontró que entre los factores estructurales que explican una mayor entrega de apoyo destacan: ser hija, percibir ingresos suficientes, contar con menos hermanos y vivir cerca o con el progenitor. Asimismo se encontró que en cuanto a las motivaciones, la reciprocidad en el intercambio es un elemento central, especialmente en el caso de los hijos, mientras que en las hijas es la norma de obligación filial. También para las hijas el tener al menos un hijo dependiente reduce las posibilidades de dar apoyo. Finalmente se confirma que los padres sobre 80 años son quienes más ayuda reciben, dada la mayor necesidad asociada a esta etapa de la vida.

When your friend asks you for moderation. New challenges for the Argentine unions. The case of the Teamsters Federation

Since 2003 the teamsters' federation has been one of the most important actors in the national governing coalition in Argentina. But how did it become so powerful? This paper argues that explaining the rise and consolidation of the teamster federation as the vanguard of the Argentinean labor movement requires assessing the impact of market reforms on the power of workers and labor unions. Our analysis demonstrates how processes of economic internationalization and liberalization can increase the power of certain workers while diminishing that of others. Political factors are also relevant for our explanation. During neoliberal administrations of the '90s, the teamster federation confronted the government while the leadership of the CGT (General Confederation of Labor) cooperated with it. This confrontational strategy turned Hugo Moyano, the leader of the teamsters, into the main spokesman for the workers opposing the neoliberal model. So when an anti-neoliberal government took power after the 2001 crisis, the teamsters became a powerful ally from within the labor movement. This political alliance helped the teamsters consolidate their leadership over the rest of the unions and continue with their organizational expansion. In a context of economic growth and low salaries, the teamsters' fight for better wages was aligned with the government's macroeconomic objectives. But since 2009 the macroeconomic context has changed. In a context of relatively high wages, slower economic growth and high inflation rates, the government requires restraint on behalf of its ally from organized labor. How can a union that constructed its power based on its confrontational strategy moderate its demands without endangering its capacity to represent the rank and file? Thus, we argue that complying with the wishes of the government they support presents new challenges for the teamsters' leadership.

Cambiando de ubicación y de marco. Interacciones y diversidad en un aula universitaria Argentina

La categoría de "alternancia de código (code-switching, CS)", corriente entre lingüistas, permite estudiar al pasaje entre actividades, pasaje que se marca por un cambio de lengua, de registro o, al menos, de entonación o ritmo. La sociolingüística, principalmente la influida por los trabajos de John Gumperz, ha producido análisis fundamentales del uso de este recurso para interpretar y para volver inteligible las acciones propias y ajenas. El CS es uno de los recursos que permite tratar los malentendidos en contextos interculturales. Funciona como "índice de contextualización" entre personas que, normalmente, no comparten el mismo saber de fondo (background). Propongo estudiar el CS como índice de lo que Erving Goffman llama "footing", término que podría traducirse como "ubicación". Para Goffman, cambiar de ubicación en una situación social es alternar de actitud, de rol o de tarea comunicativa, sin abandonar ninguna, manteniendo varios focos de involucramiento a la vez. Desde una perspectiva interaccionista y pragmática, se analizan algunos cambios de ubicación observados en un aula de Mendoza, entre estudiantes de diferentes departamentos que comparten la categoría "habitantes de zonas rurales", recién llegados a la ciudad. Se trata de becarios de un programa de acción afirmativa de la UNCuyo. Se describirá cómo esas alternancias de ubicación son marcadas por un CS y son realizados prácticamente (accomplishment) en la vida cotidiana del aula por estudiantes y profesores, a través de recursos lingüísticos, paralingüísticos (entonación, ritmo) y no lingüísticos (desplazamiento, gestos y manipulación de objetos). Se mostrará cómo un CS puede marcar el pasaje a una nueva tarea y a un nuevo marco, aproximando o distanciando institucionalmente a los presentes. La base del análisis es un corpus audiovisual de interacciones en un aula.

Voces y personas. Pistas para pensar de modo dialógico la diversidad

La invocación de figuras o personajes en la conversación de un locutor ha sido especialmente estudiada por lingüistas y filósofos del lenguaje. Pero pueden encontrarse en tal fenómeno otros aspectos que exceden los intereses simplemente lingüísticos. Por ejemplo, desde una perspectiva interaccional se han estudiado los procedimientos sociales de "incrustación" de la palabra en un encuentro con diversos participantes. Todos estos análisis, de discurso indirecto, han mostrado la naturaleza intrínsecamente dialógica del lenguaje, incluyendo aquí la producción erudita y la comunicación cotidiana. Consideran que todo mensaje es doblemente determinado, por locutor y emisor, en vez de ser el simple producto de la mente de un emisor. Cada enunciado –oral o escrito– puede ser comprendido y respondido sólo en relación con enunciados previos y con respecto a las respuestas proyectadas de oyentes diversos, en cierto contexto. Apelando a una investigación sociológica en Mendoza, con estudiantes universitarios de zonas rurales que intentan su adaptación a la vida universitaria y ciudadana, se propone en el texto un repaso de la productividad del modelo dialogista del lenguaje para dar cuenta de su experiencia como "recién llegados", y del modo en que las diferencias de pertenencia y de origen son tratadas cotidianamente. La perspectiva dialógica permite comprender la constante invocación de los estudiantes y de los profesores a figuras familiares o administrativas en la organización de tareas instituciones cotidianas. Se comparan las propuestas de dos referentes del dialogismo, M. M. Bajtin y Erving Goffman, y se propone un modelo reflexivo que las enriquezca. Así, se estudia la producción de diferencias sociales de modo secuencial, multimodal –la voz, el tacto y lo visual, los desplazamientos y la orientación corporal–, multipartito –no sólo interviene un locutor– y apelando a elementos del entorno –el celular, el pizarrón y el escritorio, sobre todo.

Recalibrating welfare states in the OECD world? The (R)evolutionary expansion of family policy

By analyzing the dynamics of family policy over the past three decades we can clearly identify a revolution within the OECD world. For the time period 1980-2008 we demonstrate that the Conservative welfare states of continental Europe, for a long time perceived as the most unlikely countries to implement 'a modernised' family policy, have indeed revolutionised their family policy approach, embarking on a trajectory towards a clear Swedenisation. Swedenisation can be understood as a process towards family policies encompassing comprehensive childcare services and (long) leave entitlements with high replacement rates. This analysis is based on Comparative Family Policy Database (Gauthier, 2010). Furthermore, we will identify the casual drivers of this process; among others we hypothesise that this revolution is largely due to: (1) a shift of public opinion towards the support of modernised family norms, (2) the role played by the employers, (3) the change in the political discourse, and (4) the degree of statism.

Weight trouble: Between eating disorder and obesity myths

Within the past few years, attention has been devoted to exploring ways to integrate the prevention of eating disorders (ED) and obesity (OB). Research reveals considerable overlap between the risk factors for OB and EDs. Yet, collaboration between the two fields remains strained largely due to differences in philosophies and training. Discourses have been initiated in the form of discussion papers and knowledge exchange events about how to break down the silos between the two fields. Yet, to date, no study has gathered empirical data on how practitioners, researchers, policy makers, and the general public perceive these health issues. The Beyond Obesity and Disordered Eating in Youth (BODY) study is a qualitative project that sheds light on the different meanings that individuals attribute to the "body shape and weight trouble". Data have been collected across Canada through interviews conducted with 35 researchers/practitioners who work in either EDs or OB (for a total of 70 in-depth interviews) and five focus groups conducted with 26 youth (aged 16-26). The proposed paper will unpack the basic assumptions, discourses, and practices alive in the eating disorder and obesity prevention "camps." In particular, I will focus on: (1) How and why two "camps" exist; (2) The existent "myths" alive between them and their consequences; and (3) How practitioners morally position themselves in the two "camps" debate and how this influence current prevention work. Finally, I will introduce a new ethical framework, called Corporeal Ethics, which aims to achieve both gender equity and equality in current prevention practices by being more in harmony with the bodily reality and experiences of youth.

Training for self-management and solidarity: Challenges and future prospects

The proliferation of social economy enterprises in Brazil in the last three decades led to the expansion of training schemes and the emergence of new challenges such as growing demands for qualification; disarticulation of trainers among themselves and with the workers, lack of theoretical and methodological reflection and need for intersectoral coordination. The training considers the centrality of work in the construction of knowledge and popular education as a methodology. The paper presents the research conducted in the period 2010 to 2011 about the limits and expectations of the training in the social economy in Rio Grande do Sul, considering the experiences and narratives of workers, of the support entities' trainers and of the Training Centre in Solidarity Economy's (CFES) managers and participants. CFES is the first Brazilian public policy in this field, demanded by the movement of solidarity economy and executed by the National Solidarity Economy (SENAES) from the Ministry of Labor and Employment (MTE).

The research instruments applied were observations, semi-structured interviews, focus groups and Sociopoética, an innovative method of democratic and self-management knowledge production. The results suggest that the field of training has been divided between those who have the principles of solidarity and self-managed associations in daily work and political activism and those who rely on a "fad" to access resources without adherence to the project ethical and political project through the creation of social organizations with the purpose of training in the social economy. The limits revolve around the existence of different needs and expectations among workers and trainers and the reproduction of traditional and hierarchical principles and methods. The future prospect indicate the need of the validation of the employee as subject of training and the recognition of practical knowledge from the associative work on the formative processes.

The redefinition of the judiciary role after world bank technical document nº 319: The experience of Rio de Janeiro state court of law

From the 1990s, in Brazil, redefines the state structure itself. The country opens up to the market for foreign products, there is a wave of privatizations, finally, states that the neoliberal project. As part of these transformations, in the late 1990s, the country has undergone profound changes over the role of the judiciary. The Technical Paper Number 319 of the World Bank was prepared for the purpose of proposing the modernization of the State in Latin America and the Caribbean, "making an important contribution to global development," through reforms aimed at "improving the quality and efficiency of justice by fostering an environment conducive to trade, finance and investments. " (World Bank 1998, p.07). This article aims to analyze and reflect the nature of the reforms implemented in the Brazilian Judiciary, especially those occurring at the Court of the State of Rio de Janeiro, from the careful reading of the recommendations contained in that document. Concerning the nature of the reforms, the article aims to consider the context of creation of this document and its main areas of intervention, and to his reflection, this article is dedicated to presenting data of the Court of Rio de Janeiro to show that criteria for the desired Document, namely, productivity, efficiency, responsiveness actually materialize. The findings indicate that the subordination of the Brazilian judiciary in this document, in many situations, creates a righteousness that distorts the quantitative nature of adjudication and, consequently, of the Judicial Branch. The judicial structure is subordinate then the economic power, constituting a sort of arena uneven, prevails in fighting slow, predictable and a speed in harmony with economic interests. This condition is far from meeting the demands of society for justice, equality, equity, can produce greater social inequality, since there is a prevalence of economic interests over the social.

Representation and equality in contemporary theories of democracy

The contemporary theories of democracy tend to assume the normative dimension of this concept. In doing so, contemporary authors intend to understand democracy as something more than the "possible and real democracy", in contrast with thinkers like Schumpeter and others that sustain a minimal concept. Participatory, deliberative, republican and multiculturalist democracy theories share the same goal to present a model with is capable to announce "what democracy we want". Despite this, each one of them presents a specific model as the most adequate.

However, the term democracy remains as a standard in the middle of all disagreement. If each theory intends to present a different model, why those all keep the same term to name it? It is important to notice that the term democracy refers to the Greek experience in Classical Antiquity, but acquires, in Modern and Contemporary ages, totally different meanings. But, if it is true, why do we keep disputing the meaning of this same concept for different realities and goals?

The paper intends to demonstrate, in a theoretical perspective, that all the paradigms of contemporary democracy keep two points that justifies the use of this concept: worries about the representation in the "govern of the people" and about equality. Both of these points are present out in a normative dimension, in terms of what representation and what equality we want. Notwithstanding this common base, each model of democracy defends a specific way to deal with these points.

Environmental concerns in Brazil, China, Africa and Australia

This paper intends to unveil some of the main backgrounds and current tendencies of environmental policies in Brazil, China, Africa and Australia, especially climate policies.

We are mainly interested in providing a historical reconstruction of the societal internalization of environmental concerns in Brazil, China, Africa and Australia, on both state and civic levels, with an emphasis on the transformations that took place over the 1970–2000's period.

In the Brazilian case we argue that environmental civil associations do not find either a legal idiom or public forums by means of which they could turn their demands and moral concerns into a binding juridical code. This is so because, on the one hand, their moral concerns, even when based on de-traditionalized and abstract principles, are not paralleled with an autonomous legal framework, strong enough to set limits to the functioning of both the political-administrative apparatus as well as to economic actors. As we contend, this helps to explain why the environmental legislation in Brazil is rhetorically manipulated on a regular basis—and, hence, set aside whenever it contradicts other priorities. On the other hand, environmental concerns have always met with difficulties to become a priority in the Brazilian polity.

We also have analysis of these issues in China, Australian and Africa through the study of official documents, recent papers and visit some important institutions that have a traditional work with environmental issues in these countries.

Social and ecological dimensions of climate change on the coast of São Paulo, Brazil

Ostrom (2009) argues that single policies adopted only at a global scale are unlikely to generate sufficient trust among citizens and firms so that collective action can take place in a comprehensive and transparent manner that will effectively reduce global warming. Furthermore, simply recommending a single governmental unit to solve global collective action problems is inherently weak because of free rider problems. It is considered that efforts to reduce global greenhouse gas emissions are a classic collective action problem that is best addressed at multiple scales and levels. Given the slowness and conflict involved in achieving a global solution to climate change, recognizing the potential for building a more effective way of reducing greenhouse gas emissions at multiple levels is an important step forward. The key question is how can demographic and social dynamics interact with the ecological dynamics of forest cover to produce a region of high environmental vulnerability, in a context of global climate change along the Coast of São Paulo, Brazil? This study is broken up into four axes: the growth and morphology of cities and the vulnerability of their populations, infrastructures and locations; public policy at the local level; conflicts between urban expansion and forest cover and consequences for global environmental change; and : impacts on the biodiversity of the urban expansion and environmental changes. Quantitative socio-demographic data, public policies, use, and coverage of the land will be covered regionally. The Caraguatuba Micro-region (Northern Coast) was chosen for in-depth studies by all of the components chosen. The main results are the role of local governments in study areas; political-institutional strategies on climate change; human occupation along the shoreline in urban areas; survey of social actors and institutional decision-making arenas, interaction patterns and action strategies; civil associations and and impacts of the Caraguatuba Gas Treatment Plant.

El sentimiento amoroso en las vidas de lo(a)s soltero(a)s en la contemporaneidad

Tras el análisis preocupada de la Escola de Frankfurt con el rumbo tomado por una emergente sociedad de consumo y de la cultura de masas, seguida por la flexibilidad extrema de la posmodernidad, fascinada por nuevos estilos de vida surgidos con estos cambios, comienzan ahora a ser delineadas nuevas vías de comprensión social. La sociología de las emociones es una de ellas, donde los estudios han tratado de incorporar las contradicciones de la modernidad, desplegadas por el capitalismo y el individualismo, analizando el complejo entramado que se produjo entre la intimidad y los grandes sistemas sociales.

En lo nivel afectivo, estas contradicciones están muí agudizadas en el grupo de personas que viven solas. La reinvencción de las relaciones amorosas, agrandadas tanto por las estructuras sociales, la influencia de la tecnología y la hegemonía capitalista cuanto por la explosión de la identidad, encontró entre aquellos que no tienen pareja estable, sea por opción, sea por circunstancia, su elemento más emblemático. No se puede negar lo efímero, la liberación de las prácticas sexuales disidentes, el individualismo, el empoderamiento de las mujeres, la constante negociación, la relación menos jerárquica y la racionalidad creciente que caracterizan a estas nuevas relaciones de amor. ¿Y el sentimiento de amor, aunque aparentemente igual o más valorado, tendrá la misma centralidad en la vida de las personas, como ocurrió en la modernidad clásica?

Mi objetivo es discutir las posibilidades del sentimiento amoroso en la sociedad contemporánea, a través de una investigación teórica y empírica teniendo como base a las historias de amor de las personas solteras y la análisis de este sentimiento, ofrecidas por autores como Hoschild, Illouz y Zellizer.

Palabras clave: amor, sociología de las emociones, contemporaneidad, solteros

Citizenship and Bolsa Familia

This article shows and argues findings in Bolsa Familia Program, in Brazil. Beneficiaries have lived in Grajau, high vulnerability area in Sao Paulo city. Study has aimed investigate if program offers better material conditions of live and a positive access to public services, improving citizenship experience. Citizenship is defined by Marshall and Fleury as equal access to take a part in rights and collective heritage.

Brazilian social protection system was institutionalized in 1930 and just some Brazilians had access to social rights. Brazilians who worked on rural areas and informal labor market could not have access to social protection. It is necessary to salient most were informal or rural labors. So there was secession: people protected and non-protected.

Martins shows public service are divided, there was a group of elite public servants, who worked on important areas, were professionals, clientelism not influenced them. But the most Brazilian public servants were not qualified workforce and clientelism influenced them. Poor people were attended by not qualified workforce.

In 1988, a new Federal Constitution gave new and democratic principles, social system was transformed and social rights were universalized. Bolsa Família Program was created in 2003 as consequence from these new principles.

This study has investigated if Bolsa Familia can contribute to increase access to take rights. We have interviewed beneficiaries about employment conditions and taking rights experiences.

Findings reveal positive effects. People are less vulnerable but they are exposed to precarious employment conditions and to a lot of non-legal experiences. Beneficiaries reveal negative aspects of Bolsa Familia. They have no information and how long they can be beneficiaries. Public servants cannot explain well rights and rules. We can observe Bolsa Familia can enlarge opportunities but there are still obstacles to access to take rights because public service is not so efficient and democratic.

Movimientos de vivienda, autogestión y política habitacional en Brasil: Del acceso a la vivienda al derecho a la ciudad

La autogestión en la producción social de hábitat es resultado de un proceso histórico de organización social a partir de una demanda material concreta: la vivienda. La lucha que comienza por la vivienda digna, se amplía a la lucha por el acceso a la educación, a la salud, al ocio, a la ciudad, constituyéndose en una lucha emancipadora de la población como sujeto de derechos.

A la lucha por la redemocratización y elaboración de la Constitución Ciudadana de 1988, le siguió la lucha de los movimientos sociales urbanos por una política dirigida a la vivienda popular. Así, en la década de los 90, los movimientos de vivienda construyeron una propuesta de iniciativa de ley para la creación de un Fondo Nacional de Vivienda Popular.

Este artículo pretende discutir, en un primer momento, el papel de los movimientos de vivienda en la construcción de una política de vivienda de interés social. Argumentamos que, la demanda por recursos, programas y acciones que financiarán la producción de vivienda realizada de forma autogestionada por movimientos organizados, resultó no solo en la retomada de la actuación del Estado, en el ámbito nacional, en temas habitacionales, como también ha fomentado la construcción de un proyecto colectivo alternativo de sociedad, basado en los principios de igualdad y justicia social.

En un segundo momento, buscaremos identificar las experiencias autogestionadas en la producción social de vivienda que vienen siendo realizadas a través de programas federales. A partir de este mapa, pretendemos levantar algunas cuestiones que involucran el papel de la autogestión en la política habitacional y en la crítica a la producción de ciudades las cuales solamente reflejan el tratamiento de la vivienda y de los servicios urbanos como mercancías y no como bienes y servicios indispensables para el derecho humano a la vida y a la ciudad.

Sociological explanations of crime, deviance and social control in a democratic South Africa

Although several diverse theories could be applied to explain crime and deviance, the functionalist and Marxist perspectives are useful to explain and analyze crime and deviance in South Africa. Functionalism focuses on societal stability, while the viewpoint also exists that a certain amount of deviance contributes to stability in situations of rapid social change and lack of social integration as it occurred in South Africa over the last two decades. Marxism on the other hand, emphasizes unequal distribution of power and resources and links deviance to inequality, profit and subordination. These are macro-structural approaches considering society as a whole in developing explanations of deviant behavior. These approaches are used to explain crime and deviance in South Africa, with special reference to the transition from an authoritarian, apartheid state to democracy after 1994, corruption which is rife, the history of poverty, the role of a weak state bureaucracy and the criminalization of the state, and the globalization of crime effecting South African societal structures.

Well-being in a changing Europe: A class and gender perspective

Well-being associated with a positive perspective is a quality of life subjective indicator. Knowledge about European citizen's well-being perception becomes possible thru ESS rounds 1 to 5. We have access, then, not only to a powerful instrument for quality of life comparative analysis between countries but also it is possible to contribute for policy makers informed decisions on this issue.

Subjective well-being study increasing relevance is due to the impossibility of reducing relevant social analysis to traditional economic measurement indicators, as for instance GDP per capita.

Therefore, one of the aims of this paper is to map well-being across Europe and calculate Gross National Happiness. Our main contribution, however, is to illustrate how social class and gender do differentiate individuals' subjective well-being.

Key-words: Subjective Well-being; Gross National Happiness; social class; gender

Dime como defines cultura y te diré que relevas

En este trabajo nos proponemos realizar una primera aproximación a la problemática de la representación del territorio y sus dinámicas socioculturales en diversos catastros culturales.

Si nos referenciamos en los Objetivos del Milenio planteados por Naciones Unidas y de la Carta Cultural Iberoamericana, en los cuales se plantea el ejercicio de la cultura en tanto dimensión de la ciudadanía como elemento básico para la cohesión e inclusión social, al elevar la confianza y la autoestima tanto de los individuos como de sus grupos de pertenencia, encontraremos que estas propuestas no se plasman en las acciones políticas de las áreas públicas culturales.

A partir de la creación de la cuenta satélite de cultura se hizo foco en las industrias culturales (cine, televisión, teatro, editoriales, la web, etc.) y en los aspectos a ella vinculados. La relevancia de estos indicadores y la facilidad de su medición se constatan al analizar las cartografías y mapas culturales de algunos países de la región. Centrar las mediciones en este tipo de categorías implicó la invisibilización de otros aspectos vinculados a las diversas manifestaciones culturales que se desarrollan en un territorio que por definición es multicultural, heterogéneo y cambiante.

Por lo tanto, problematizar qué categorías e indicadores se han utilizado, los mecanismos que operaron para su selección y las metodologías implementadas en los catastros culturales constituyen una prioridad ya que permiten evidenciar decisiones políticas e ideológicas que involucrarán las concepciones sobre cultura de los actores implicados, como la dirigencia política y las organizaciones de la sociedad civil.

Pro-ecological politic actions. Analysis of two towns in Argentina

The objective of this sociological study is to analyze the ecological political actions developed in two Argentine cities in relation with water resources. We compare two significant cities: Buenos Aires and Gualaguaychú. The first one was selected because a) in the nineties it was the focus of the largest privatization of water services in the world. b) Buenos Aires developed as a city away from the river Rio de la Plata, despite being founded on the banks of the widest river in the world. The second city – Gualaguaychú – was chosen because of the international relevance of its environmental movement in defense of a trans-boundary river visibly threatened by the installation of a foreign pulp mill on the other bank of the Uruguay River.

Political behaviors we have considered as significant references: a) The mechanisms of citizen's participation and civic responsibility, their utilization, and the public access to the environmental information, and b) The Citizenship Global Environmental Project of UNEP, one of its objectives is "acquiring a better knowledge of environment in order to use that information as a tool for responsible citizen environmental action, both individual and collective".

The central question of our study is which are the types of political actions in defense of water-dependence of ecosystems.

Our initial hypothesis is that the institutionalization process of environmental rights and the diffusion of ecological ideas and values are causal variables of the direct participation of the citizens' direct participation in water environmental conflicts. Nevertheless, this direct participation is incidental to the ecological commitments in its strict sense.

The Brazilian contemporary art market: Challenges and limits of internationalization in a fast growing sector

This paper presents the first results of a research on the Brazilian contemporary art market involving 40 galleries. The research aimed primarily to draw an economic portrait of the sector. But, beyond significant quantitative information - such as layers of budget per gallery, number of artists represented, participation in international art fairs, etc. - here we would like to discuss some qualitative aspects which are particularly interesting for sociological analysis:

a) Young galleries and new models of business

Contemporary art market in Brazil growing in the last years: 50% of the galleries participating in the survey were created in the last decade, most of them increased their business in almost 40% in the last 2 years. How is this fast growth affecting the traditional business model, based on a gallery-artist relationship?

b) Challenges and limits of internationalization

Although most of galleries have a strong focus on international insertion, their income is mainly generated by the national market. It seems internationalization is a key strategy that has to be understood beyond economic interests.

c) Institutionalization of the market

Within a context where public art institutions are highly dependent on private sponsorship and are not able to follow and collect contemporary art production, the art market and its agents end up playing an important role in the support, recognition and circulation of the contemporary art production, much beyond their commercial primary mission.

The contemporary art market has been a current theme of the sociology of the arts, and an interesting field to explore the effects and limits of cultural globalization processes in different contexts (MOULIN, FOURNIER, QUEMIN, VELTHUIS). We hope to contribute to expand the discussion by bringing into light the context of an emerging economy: Brazil, a new player in the international contemporary art field.

Front page: Identity and social exclusion in headlines of popular newspapers

There is a quite special group of newspapers, which present three subjects invariably in Brazil: the football, the eroticism and the tragedy. These subjects are shown in the capes of the newspapers through photos and small headlines. With appellative way the images show half-naked women, murdered or grotesque and deformed persons. The content of the texts is mocked and comically, including when the headlines they refer to barbaric crimes.

The analysed newspapers are the "Expresso" and "Meia-Hora", that have a quite specific public. In the interviews and development of the survey we notice that the readers of these newspapers, who are persons of "low-schooling", unemployed or people who occupy menial jobs, were identifying with the characters of the capes of the newspapers, principally in the headlines that show the violence. The crimes shown in the newspapers were happening, invariably, in the peripheric districts and slums. Many readers inclusive knew the involved ones in deaths and crimes. These newspapers show the poor districts only for the slant of the violence and tragedy.

Observing the speeches of the interviewed ones we realize what they recognize like actors who occupy a place that makes part exclusively of the crime, the grotesque thing and the extreme violence. These persons formulate his identities in this place of social exclusion. The principal focus of the work is this: the construction of the identities of the excluded ones through the popular newspapers.

Russians in Germany: A new diaspora literature in the making

Contemporary Russian literature in Germany is a result of the fourth wave of Russian emigration. This wave is Russian not so much in factual ethnic composition as in the cultural sense and includes mostly Russian Germans and Russian Jews. Naturally, many contemporary writers living in Germany have emerged from these two groups. Some of them have entered German-language literature, like for example, the ethnic Germans Lorena Dottai, Elvira Schik and a Jew, Wladimir Kaminer. And there are writers of different ethnic origin who write solely or predominantly in Russian, for example, the ethnic Germans Igor Hergenroether and Vladimir Shtele and the ethnic Jews - Boris Rublov (pen-name of Boris Rubenchik), Juri Kudlatch, Alexander Khurgin and Oleg Jurjew.

A foremost motif, in immigrant fiction is the identity of the descendants of mixed families. A special bitterness is needed for maternal and paternal sides of a character to be perceived as mutually exclusive - for example, one is Jewish and the other is Ukrainian, or Jewish and German. Another frequent motif in Russian literature in Germany is the conflict between the ethos of the Great Patriotic War which is still very important for former Soviets, and the current immigration to Germany. Its representations are inherent in the works of Russian Germans and Russian Jews alike, even though they experienced different types of trauma.

"Russians" of various ethnic origins have spread all over the world, and the Russian literature in Germany is a part of a Russian literary diaspora in the making.

Moving bodies; Proprioception and socio-political inscriptions

Looking at specific moments of dance in our western culture through the 20th century this paper argues the intimate relationship between government funding of dance and the socio-political organization promoted by that regime.

Dancing bodies communicate through the sense of motion. Motion receptors are located within the body; proprioception is described as «one own's perception», to sense motion is to sense the self[1]. In that perspective, celebrating or suppressing the self, is inseparable from the socio-political milieu discourse. While individual propositions, in new ways of moving / feeling, reinforce values of democracy and contribute to the richness of the sensory landscapes, totalitarian regimes try to unify all individuals under the same kinesthetic values.

From muscular control to «free flow» motion, from the hierarchic structure of ballet to the total democratization of the dancing body, this presentation tries to put into light the sensuous continuum between muscles' tensility, choreographic structure, inner organization of dance companies and the political regime under which the dance is created.

What link is there between freedom of motion on stage and freedom of motion within the society? What physical approach can reinforce social order and/or promote democratization? How does the choreographic structure reflect the social organization? How are viewer perceptions and/or expectations confirmed or disrupted? Does contemporary dance exist in totalitarian regimes? If not why? What is a democratic body?

Focusing mainly in the mid 70's, I will compare ex-Soviet Union ballet companies that were acclaimed around the world and American post-modern dance artists whose influences are still vivid and have affected the course of dance history.

«Conocer las condiciones de vida de los jóvenes tiene interés social, académico y político. Se pretende identificar factores que producen transiciones con rasgos de vulnerabilidad, para el diseño de políticas orientadas a asegurar el cumplimiento de los derechos de los jóvenes, así como fortalecer condiciones de equidad y de integración social. Se describen las transiciones relativas a cuatro eventos: constitución de hogar diferente al hogar de origen; salida del sistema educativo, ingreso al mercado laboral e inicio de vida reproductiva, tomando como variables de corte: clima educativo del hogar de origen -indicador de las condiciones de partida de los jóvenes-; nivel educativo alcanzado por los jóvenes -indicador de sus resultados individuales-, y sexo -indicador de las brechas de género- lo que permite distinguir diferentes tipos de transiciones en los jóvenes del Uruguay. Por último, se comparan los calendarios de algunos eventos de transición a la adultez de los jóvenes de 1990 y de 2008 en Uruguay a partir de las Encuestas Nacionales de Juventud realizadas en esos años. Se muestra un incremento de las desigualdades.»

Culture and body practices in traditional communities of the center west of Brazil

The body practices are social constructs capable of expressing identities of the subjects. The manifestations of these practices represent senses and meanings that change according each culture and we can therefore infer patterns of variability between urban-industrial cultures and traditional cultures. Traditional societies are pervaded by a dense network of sociability and communication building a complex whole where collective arrangements stand up to the individuals. Based on this, the study had as research question: What is the meaning of the relation between body and culture expressed by children and young people in traditional communities of the center west of Brazil? The research subjects consists on children and young people that live in those traditional communities in the center west of Brazil, in particular, demarcated by Quilombo populations of Goiás and African decedents living in Brasilia Federal District. The research design is characterized by a sociological analysis, based on ethnographic exercise. The research was developed through techniques such as observation, interview and recording images. With the aim to obtain information from children, it was also used drawings as a form of data construct. The results show that the relation between body and culture to children and young afro-descended people presents multiple identities. They hold multiple references that have as meaning the constitution of fluid process considering modern cultural patterns in traditional societies. The presence of fluidity – cultural hybridation – can be found in the dances, games and drawings (in this case children). The results allow to conclude that the constitution of identity processes is resignified daily and somehow towards new meanings that break with the prevailing cultural standards.

The ideal body to the body that speaks: An appropriation of Goffman and Becker for the formation of sociology of the body

The social production of bodies in the everyday of different cultures is object of interest and research of humanities and social sciences, intercepting in disciplines such as Sociology, Anthropology and Education. Based on that, the understanding of the dilution and fluidity of boundaries between the disciplines is reflected in research and investigations on this issue. This work - part of the project Body and Society – has the aim to analyze the bibliographic of the production on the subject body, comprising in particular the relation with the technical body, the conception of the ideal body and the body language of the deaf, here understood as bodies that are used as producers of the speech. For this purpose, we performed a literature research centered on interpretive categories presented in the works of Goffman "The presentation of self in everyday", "Stigma" and "Rituals of interaction" and in the book "Outsiders" from Becker. The reading and interpretation of these works led to the construction of a conceptual design to guide the research based on studies of Sociology of the Body in the contemporary context, particularly based on the notions of stigma, face, pattern and deviation. Those notions were considered crucial for understanding the meaning of what is the pattern of the ideal body as well as what is considered out of that pattern (outsider), because it is different to the conventional, i. e., the body as an expression of body language that produces the speech in deaf people.

Lima Barreto's thought on race and migration: One exception in the Brazilian debate of the First Republic

The relationship between race and migration flows was a central theme in Brazilian social and political thought in the First Republic (1889-1930) (SKIDMORE, 1976; VENTURA, 1991; SCHWARCZ, 1993). As a tropical country that had received thousands of black slaves, Brazil was condemned to decay by the geographical and biological determinisms of the science practiced at that time in Europe. The writer Lima Barreto (1881-1922), posthumously considered one of the nation's most important authors, attempted to articulate one answer to the scientific racism in his novels, tales and chronicles. Based on the counter-discourse of Jean Finot, Quatrefage, Célestin Bouglé, Kropotkin, among others, Barreto asserted that races don't exist, denying the biological hierarchy established by authors like Ernst Haeckel, often mentioned in his writings. As a mulatto, Barreto disclaimed the idea that the interracial mixing would lead to degeneration and obstruct the development of a civilization. Instead he suggested that this mixing would be sociologically necessary in a country like Brazil. The writer rejected the ideal of "whitening" adopted by the migration policy of the Brazilian government, according to which migrations flows from Europe would lead to the whitening of mestizos and the extinction of the "black race" (LACERDA, 1911). In contrast to the dominant opinion among Brazilian intellectuals, Barreto didn't establish conditions for the admission of migrants. In his words, Brazil would be of everybody: "Germans, blacks, caboclos, Italians, Portuguese, Greeks" (BARRETO, 1919). Expressing these ideas through fiction and non-fiction, Lima Barreto was an exception in a debate marked by pseudo-scientific racism, nationalism and restriction to migrations flows. His efforts to deny the process of production of scientific knowledge resemble what is nowadays called postcolonial studies.

Seeds of change: The mobilization of farmers as knowledge-users

Since the 1980s, the provision of new plant varieties has become increasingly privatized and concentrated by transnational corporations. These have pressured states around the world to reform intellectual property regimes in ways that would maximize their share in the economic returns provided by the plant varieties they commercialize. In many cases, this has meant curtailing the rights of farmers as knowledge-users, especially the right to save seeds for future cultivation. Farmers have responded to this challenge in different ways, with important implications for their capacity to shape intellectual property regimes. This paper compares the mobilization of soy growers in Argentina, Brazil, and Paraguay in disputes over intellectual property on seeds from 1990 to today. The analysis shows that transnational competition undermines the capacity of farmers to halt intellectual property reforms. On the other hand, successful mobilization on the national level depends on the capacity to articulate a public discourse in terms of the national interest, to coordinate actions nationally and persistently, and to act independently from other segments of the agribusiness.

Compositions et recompositions des secteurs ferroviaires en France et dans le monde. proposition d'une grille analytique dans le cadre d'une comparaison internationale L'objet de cette communication est de proposer un dispositif d'observation et de constituer un réseau de recherche en vue de réaliser une comparaison internationale des secteurs ferroviaires dans le monde. Pour imaginer les devenirs possibles du transport ferroviaire, nous souhaitons également replacer notre analyse dans une démarche historique et diachronique en vue d'en saisir les dynamiques. La grille est construite à partir du cas français et testée sur quatre autres nations ferroviaires : en Europe (Royaume-Uni et Allemagne), mais aussi en Amérique du Sud (Argentine) et en Afrique (Tunisie).

Il s'agit notamment de :

- Comprendre comment se sont construits les monopoles historiques dans le ferroviaire.
- Analyser l'entrée en crise du mode antérieur de régulation.
- Retracer finement les étapes de l'ouverture plus récente à la concurrence (régimes de justifications, performativité de l'économie, jeux d'acteurs collectifs et individuels, rôles des institutions européennes, françaises, des patronats ferroviaires, des lobbys européens, etc.) ;
- Lorsqu'elle a eu lieu, décrire les conséquences de la libéralisation pour les cheminots, notamment en ce qui concerne les conditions d'emploi, les conditions de travail et les relations professionnelles, etc.). Pour ne prendre que l'exemple de la France et du Royaume Uni, le service rendu aux usagers et les conditions de travail des cheminots ou des railway workers (publics ou privés) se sont dégradés avec la mise à mal des monopoles historiques.
- Analyser les logiques étatiques et leur rapport aux logiques de marché versus logiques de cohésion sociale et de développement des services publics notamment tournés vers les groupes sociaux les plus vulnérables.
- Enfin, regarder si les formes d'emploi, de travail et d'organisation du secteur ont tendance à converger en direction d'un modèle où si elles restent largement déterminées par le cadre politique-culturel et national dans lequel elles s'insèrent.

Do economists hold power? The role of economists in the French railway market liberalization (1970-2011)

Our paper focuses on the liberalization of the French railway sector. We argue that the social construction of a free market was not created from scratch but, on the contrary, was anticipated decades ago. In this respect, we seek to determine the specific role of economists with regard to the introduction of competition and its implementation methods.

One example out of many is the impact of Maurice Allais' theory of social return, which was supposed to embody the public interest. His principles had a great influence on the reorganization of the national state-owned company SNCF in a commercial direction in the 1970s, resulting in the development of subsidiaries that compete with each other, the creation of a marketing department, the introduction of price discrimination, etc. Additionally, the theory of contestable markets developed by William Baumol had a significant impact the separation between infrastructure operators and railway companies in order to encourage market openness. Nowadays, the work of Jean Tirole is particularly influential.

However, recent studies on the real interface between economic research and public decision-making prompt us to reconsider the role of performativity of economics. Does the French transport policy always follow the advice of economists, or does this only happen when their recommendations are consistent with the state's strategy? We believe that it is a mix of both and the purpose of our communication is also to show precisely by which mechanisms the economists involved in the debate can influence the future of the railway (e.g. through the « grands corps d'Etat », think tanks, lobbies, etc.).

We finally emphasize that an increasingly economic and financial approach of the railway sector can be a powerful mechanism used by technocrats to discourage the other stakeholders, such as the railway workers, unions and transport users, from being a part of the debate.

Invisible divides: Marriage & migration among high-skilled Syrians

Utilizing data from thirty-one in-depth interviews collected over two and a half months, this paper examines marriage choices made by transnational migrants who left Syria as adults and later returned to the homeland to enter the labor market. The literature on international marriage traditionally focuses on migrant settlers, conceiving marriage as an event that occurs following international migration from peripheral to core countries. Moreover, scholars of international marriages focus almost exclusively on marriage choices among low-skilled male migrants. This paper broadens the transnational marriage literature by focusing on the previously unexplored issue of marriage choices among high-skilled return male and especially female migrants whose initial intention to settle was flexibly determined. Although the migrant men discussed in this chapter had opportunities to marry during the migration period, all married upon return. By examining the marriage decisions of high-skilled women and men in their homeland, this paper illuminates the cultural logics of a burgeoning sub-class within the Syrian upper class. I show how the nexus of marriage and migration is linked to larger questions about national identity, cultural maintenance, and gender ideologies across time. I argue that for Syrian men, academic credentialing in the West vastly increases their marriage options, both within Syria and on the international marriage market. Whereas for returning women, their Western degrees became a mark of cultural deviance, decreasing their marriageability in a manner distinct from the previously researched effects of earning an advanced degree. This paper expands our understanding of global masculinities, marital selection, transnationalism, and migration.

Big business in Chile: An assessment of makro-regional class formation

Big business in Chile is comprised of different factions. Beside long-established conglomerates (Matte, Edwards), there are diversified grupos económicos which started their ascent in the second half of the 1980s (Angelini, Luksic and some smaller groups). After the transition to democracy new local players emerged. They all profit(ed) from far-reaching privatization and radical market reforms.

Alone or together with foreign partners, they control the natural resource-based export industries of low value-added commodities. Despite transnational capital penetrated the domestic market, they still dominate retail and maintain strong positions in the banking, assurance, real-estate and telecommunication sector. Since the 1990s they constantly expanded their key businesses beyond the borders. While first attempts failed, the Chilean groups are now active in the neighbouring countries such as Columbia, Brazil, Argentina and Peru as well as in the NAFTA and the APEC area.

In my contribution I examine the trans-national economic strategies and class agency of the top segment of the Chilean corporate class. The empirical investigation focuses on business strategies (orientation towards the world, regional and/or domestic market, ownership structure, relationship with foreign capital and the degree of internationalization of the firm) which leads to a typology of fractions. Simultaneously, information on political network activities such as the membership and appearance in local, regional and transnational think tanks, policy and lobby groups is gathered by using data bases and the internet.

The objective of the investigation is to find out if there are different class projects underway. The study hereby intends to substantiate the assumption of transnational class formation and should enable us to differentiate it at the same time by establishing specific regional patterns of transnational class formation.

Networks of power: Central bankers in Latin America

In the course of neoliberal reform, the idea that the authorities responsible for piloting and regulating the economy must have "economic neutrality," has become a dominant theme – in the case of monetary authorities it has become the rule. In the 1990s, all Latin American governments except Brazil implemented independent central banks. An important part of the new central bank legislation was "operational autonomy" and "political independence to design monetary policy".

Conditional lending practices and political pressure from the international finance institutions in Washington and regional development banks were crucial for adopting the reform. Domestic political elites were another driving force. They sought to insulate the central bank (and other key economic institutions) from the politics of bargaining. But there is something else too: Central Bankers themselves actively guided the institutional change. These individuals have been represented as specially trained experts and independent technocrats with no ties to political forces. This disguises the fact that central bankers have been intimately involved in, and often profited directly from, neoliberal transformation.

While there is now a set of studies on the transnational community of Central Bankers and the transformation in post-communist EU accession states, Latin American actors are still under-researched. In my contribution I present the preliminary results from a study about training routes and career paths of central bankers in selected countries. Particular importance is likely to attach to their involvement in think tank networks and transnational/regional policy and lobby groups. The study is part of a broader research project on transnational discourse coalitions and think tank networks. Aim is to further an actor centred analysis of the relationship of institutions, knowledge and power in globalization processes.

Beyond "idealized" models in citizenship education: Embodied cognition, metaphors and democracy

This paper proposes that the relationship between schooling, citizenship and democracy--so often taken for granted and discussed using idealistic perspectives--is better understood when using the lens of "embodied cognition" (Lakoff, 2008) and a focus on metaphorical and prototypical ways of thinking. Our goal is to examine the always conflictive and elusive relationship between citizenship and schooling using conceptual tools developed in the fields of cognitive science and linguistics and apply them in the field of sociology of education. To do so, first, we present a brief introduction of the conceptual roots of the strong association between schooling, citizenship, equity, and governance. Second, we explain metaphorical and prototypical ways of understanding "citizenship", focusing on the "nation as family" metaphor. Then, we conclude by describing how the conceptual model we are advancing explains differing views on how to deal with issues of democratic governance and the relationship of schooling and citizenship and the relevance of this conceptual model for sociology of education..

Unwelcome, unwanted, and persistent: Institutional responses to bullying and gendered violence in Ontario schools

On October 15, 2011, Jamie Hubley, an openly gay high school student from Ottawa, Ontario, Canada, took his own life after years of being verbally insulted in school by fellow students. In response, the premier of Ontario introduced new anti-bullying legislation in December 2011 known as the "Accepting Schools Act." The Act allows for the expulsion of students who have bullied others in schools. In this paper, I use institutional ethnography (Smith, 1987) to examine the textual discourses embedded within this new legislative document. The paper reviews the critical "bullying" literature as well as common policy responses to bullying in North American schools. I argue that the Premier's approach to gendered violence and homophobia is depoliticizing and potentially destructive for students and staff in schools. By coaching school violence through generalized discourses of "bullying," student experiences of homophobia, heterosexism, and gendered violence are hidden and the social relations of school violence remain unaddressed. Moreover, using expulsion as the official response to school violence is a method of deterrence through exclusion. As a process, school expulsion has been criticized for further isolating students, and criminalizing the behavior of male students of colour and special education students in particular. When fellow students label another student a "fag," the school response transforms his embodied experience of gendered violence through particular organizational processes and routines, which teachers, school staff and school administrators must follow (Smith and Smith, 1998). These processes and routines are the ruling relations, which are textually mediated and "connect us across space and time and organize our everyday lives" (Smith, 2005, p.10). In this paper, I map the textually mediated processes and routines that shape, and obscure, a student and staff person's experience of gendered violence in schools.

How is New York City incorporating hybrid collaborations among the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation, the New York Restoration Project—a non-profit organization focused on enhancing underused green spaces throughout NYC—and citizens of the city to plant and sustain a million trees? This paper presents results from the MillionTreesNYC initiative, focusing specifically on volunteer stewardship in the program to gauge the effects of this innovative program. Although recent academic and policy studies have focused on the increasingly wide range of organizations working as stewards to conserve, manage, monitor, advocate for, or educate the public about the local environment, it remains unclear how individual citizens get involved in local stewardship initiatives and the effect of such involvement in the quality of the environment, as well as on the levels of civic engagement of those involved. This paper is broken down into three sections. First, I discuss the hybrid arrangements that have made this program successful. Second, I explore the role that is specifically being played by the volunteer stewards who make the planting and maintenance of the trees possible. Third and finally, I discuss the implications of this program on civic participation in New York City and the environmental quality of the city. Within this discussion, I focus on the broader effects of this program, which is being touted as an city-wide initiative to mitigate climate change.

Understanding the role of civic environmental stewards within a dynamic system of hybrid governance

How do we understand the social, spatial and political interactions among actors working on urban stewardship? In recent years, locally grounded civic groups have responded to public problems by working along with and outside of government agencies and the private business sector as environmental stewards. As stewards, civic groups conserve, manage, monitor, restore, advocate and educate their friends, neighbors, and representatives about a wide range of quality of life issues on public and private urban land. Using data collected from a survey of nearly 3,000 civic groups in New York City, this paper looks at the ways that civic, government and private sector groups engage in hybrid arrangements associated with governing urban natural resources. The paper is separated into three sections. First, we present a conceptual framework for understand hybrid governance and a set of hybrid arrangements. Second, we present information on the organizational characteristics, networks and evolution of civic stewardship groups as they partner on particular aspects of urban stewardship. Third and finally, using data collected from volunteers on the Million-TreesNYC city-wide tree campaign, we discuss the emerging role of the individual steward in this larger system of urban environmental governance.

Recycling as a predictor of a "cultural greening"?

Are recycling behaviors good predictors of other green attitudes and behaviors, that are expected to emerge through the process of ecological modernization? Using a representative sample of undergraduates and faculty from a single college campus (n=590), this case study tests if familiarity with the local recycling guidelines, belief in the efficacy of the local recycling program, self-reported effort to recycle, and knowledgeable participation in the local recycling program predicts a variety of measures of "cultural greening" such as concern about personal waste generation and green consumerism. Results suggest that while self-reported efforts to recycle do predict many measures of cultural greening, more meaningful measures of participation in the recycling program are weak and inconsistent at predicting cultural greening. Findings also indicate that self-reported recycling efforts should be used cautiously in future research, particularly if the intent is to measure actual environmental impact.

Exporting justice, importing security, and the rise of the EU as a normative power

At a first quick glance, the idea of a 'normative power EU' seems to contradict the idea of the EU as a constructor of "Fortress Europe". In other words, the EU concerns with human rights, justice, truth and democracy appear to run counter to its concern with security and migration. In my presentation I would like to highlight the efforts of the EU to export human rights, justice, truth and democracy and also its efforts to ascend to the role of a global 'normative' player, to then focus on how these efforts in part stem from and in part are undermined by its security concerns. The (seeming) contradiction between the professed adherence to human rights and the disregard of these rights in the case of (potential) asylum seekers and 'illegal' migrants costs the EU the support of its domestic critics. It also gains it critical appraisals beyond its borders. Yet we cannot wholeheartedly condemn or approve of the export of human rights, justice, truth and democracy in general, but instead have to take a closer look at the meaning and effects this export has at various points of destination.

Transnational social movement as a governance babushka

Since the 1980s a top-down, lateral and bottom-up movement for truth, justice and/or reconciliation (MfTJ&R) has developed its own strong momentum, pushed forward by politicians, transnational institutions and accords, foundations, TNGOS and civic societies. This movement has developed its own aspirations, concerns, sensibilities and vocabulary as well as own requirements, spelling out appropriate conduct, gestures and emotions. Among its most vocal academic proponents are historians, philosophers, public intellectuals and lawyers. In some countries victims of the past atrocities push for and even benefit from this movement. But there is also much contrary evidence. Among clear beneficiaries of this movement are millions of "Western" and west-educated volunteers recruited from the ranks of historians, legal and forensic experts, psychologists, trauma specialists, foundation employees, etc. who (help) set up, run or assist archives, courts, tribunals, commemoration ceremonies and re-conciliation rituals. To study the MfTJ&R requires other instruments than those provided by regular social movement research, even more so, since from a bird's eye perspective, this movement is securely nested in the UN, US and EU transnational politics. Focusing on the EU it can be shown that the EU, which after 1995 both developed new security concerns and began to aspire to a role of a key international player as a 'normative power EU', gave a major impetus to the MFTJ&R in its Southern and far Eastern 'buffer zones'. Whether in Morocco or Rwanda, the outcomes are rather disturbing.

Desafíos en el monitoreo y evaluación de una policía local

El trabajo pretende analizar aspectos y desafíos en el desarrollo de sistemas de monitoreo y evaluación del desempeño de una policía local, en particular la de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, a fines de fortalecer tanto la eficacia como la rendición de cuentas en el marco de una sociedad democrática.

De tal forma, se analizarán las características, competencias, contexto y problemas de la organización policial para luego a partir de ello poder desarrollar el sistema M&E; se discutirán distintos criterios que deben regir dicho sistema en general y a los indicadores en particular; se relevarán las distintas fuentes de información viendo su alcance y limitaciones, y respecto a los sistemas de información policiales se sostendrá la necesidad de una adecuada supervisión "democrática" para evitar situaciones de riesgo moral y de asimetría de la información.

Asimismo, se propondrá un marco lógico de la producción policial como esquema simplificado de visualización de los indicadores[1]. Los indicadores específicos de actividades, producto y efectos directos serán organizados en diferentes dimensiones, primero de acuerdo al tipo de tarea policial (preventiva, reactiva o proactiva), segundo respecto a la interacción de la policía con otras instituciones o con la comunidad (incluyendo especialmente indicadores dirigidos a evaluar aspectos de relativamente nuevos paradigmas policiales como las Orientadas a Problemas, o Comunitarias). Por otro lado, se incluyó una importante dimensión ad hoc que es el de "Incidentes y Graves Violaciones a los Principios de Actuación" con el fin de que se priorice la visualización de los problemas serios del funcionamiento policial. Los indicadores de eventual impacto se presentan en forma separada a raíz de su menor relación causal, y que para su adecuada comprensión exigen modelos de evaluación más complejos.

Masculinities in mutation: A study about gender relations among university students

This paper has as proposal to present some partial results of the research developed in my master's degree in sociology at the Universidade Federal de São Carlos – UFSCar (Federal University of São Carlos), with funding from the Fundação de Amparo à Pesquisa do Estado de São Paulo (FAPESP). The research investigate the visions that undergrad students (male and female) from UFSCar have about masculinity (ies), and if it changes from the university experience (moving to another city, incorporation of household duties in the fraternity houses, new sociabilities and preparation for adult life or work life), through an ethnography conducted at university itself, in some of its fraternity houses, and also in its parties and sporting events. The study aims to understand and point the relational dynamics present at the creation of masculine identities. Based on theoretical sources in gender studies and, in particular, Queer Theory, which focuses on the difference and sees gender relations beyond the binarisms of the heterosexual matrix of intelligibility of gender presented by Judith Butler in her book Gender Trouble (2003), the analysis focuses on the normalizers processes that create and categorize the masculinities (or masculine identities) as hegemonic and subalterns - these positions are here thought of as situational and circumstantial – in order to understand if the changing aspects of masculinity among these young guys have possible connections with sexism and homophobia.

El uso medicinal de plantas nativas, encuentros y desencuentros

Por generaciones los pueblos originarios han usado las hierbas nativas de su entorno para mejorar su calidad de vida. En el uso medicinal de estas plantas, una comunidad de Esquel, noroeste de la Patagonia argentina, esta práctica se contraponen con las prescripciones de la autoridad científica sobre su uso, ya que los farmacobotánicos encuentran al uso del paico (chenopodium chilense schrad) como tóxico para la salud. En el encuentro entre el conocimiento científico y el lego, se produce un conflicto que desencadena una serie de investigaciones que logra atraer la atención de la comunidad científica local, sobre una práctica ancestral teñida por las costumbres traídas por las migraciones europeas a fines del siglo XIX y principios del XX, en su gran mayoría, abonando aquellos conocimientos generados en la propia comunidad y que fuera transmitido de generación en generación. El objetivo de este trabajo es mostrar el recorrido del "uso del paico con fines medicinales" y los diferentes sentidos que se le da en distintos ámbitos. Uno de estas significaciones es la que llega al laboratorio biofármaco de la universidad de esa ciudad, movilizándolo a la indagación preguntando por qué esta planta tiene efectos tóxicos. Se utiliza la entrevista a los actores involucrados en el caso y la observación de las actividades desarrolladas en el laboratorio. También se asistió a un taller de extensión, como participante, para observar como este nuevo conocimiento y resignificado, es difundido a la comunidad a través de talleres donde las voces de la ésta, en general a mujeres adultos mayores, comparten sus experiencias promoviendo rescatar la identidad cultural. La flexibilidad interpretativa con que se le da sentido a un conocimiento, se sustenta en el campo de otras disciplinas científicas como la Etnobotánica, Farmacobotánica, Farmacognosia, específicamente en la interacción entre el aspecto social y el natural.

Las políticas de bienestar y desarrollo para las personas con discapacidad en México: De la exclusión al asistencialismo incompleto

Los últimos años a nivel mundial han visto una transformación muy importante en materia de políticas de bienestar y desarrollo para las personas con discapacidad producto de la entrada en vigor de la Convención Internacional sobre los Derechos de las Personas con Discapacidad en 2008, la cual busca generar una conciencia que permita el paso de la exclusión a la inclusión de esta población, a través del pleno reconocimiento de su derecho al trabajo, la educación, la vida y el bienestar en general. El caso concreto de México (principal promotor internacional de esta iniciativa) resulta interesante, pues estas modificaciones han tenido que darse en el marco de un régimen de bienestar históricamente excluyente de grandes segmentos de la población, entre estos el de las personas con discapacidad, por lo que las tensiones jurídicas, normativas, políticas e institucionales han provocado la aparición de un panorama especialmente adverso, que se debate entre la dotación de servicios sociales que promuevan la integración y desarrollo con derechos de estas personas y una acendrada tradición política de atender a las discapacidades a través de instituciones asistenciales con el acento puesto en la atención sanitaria y de rehabilitación. Dada esta situación, el bienestar para las personas con discapacidad en tanto grupo vulnerable en México atraviesa un momento de crucial definición, en el que prevalecen las prácticas segmentadas y desarticuladas, sin generación derechos pero tampoco generando un asistencialismo básico, dando por resultado la existencia de un sistema para el bienestar y desarrollo de estas personas incompleto y carente, capaz de profundizar las barreras históricas y culturales que han impedido la integración eficaz de las personas con discapacidad.

Actores, racionalidades y redes de significación en un cuadro de modernidades y culturas múltiples

A raíz de los cambios en los sistemas interpretativos acerca del carácter de la modernidad y de sus transitos actuales, hacia distintas dimensiones representacionales, – (cultura, territorio, identidad, prácticas materiales y simbólicas, conflictos de intereses, de organización política, económica de comunidades locales, empresas económicas de mercado regionales, nacionales e internacionales, instituciones socioculturales, etc.) – es bueno que se investiguen otras categorías de análisis en conexión con las anteriores, capaces de plantearnos cuestiones sobre si las modernidades múltiples pueden ser pensadas a través de racionalidades híbridas, o sea, como puntos de encuentro o de alejamiento de situaciones emergentes en tensión entre distintas formas de co-existencia de culturas y modos de accionar de los individuos y de sus colectivos. Para hacer un inventario de los fundamentos de los sistemas de racionalidades que hemos propuesto confrontar, es menester presentar, de comienzo, el núcleo duro de la racionalidad occidental, a través de algunos de sus fundamentos en la obra de referencia de Jürgen Habermas (Teoría de la Acción Comunicativa) para después confrontarlo con otras lecturas críticas (Enrique Leff y Jacques Rancière) que basan sus concepciones desde "territorios de significados" de una modernidad acometida por una falla estructural, y a la vez hegemónica en sus mecanismos de mercado (político, económico y cultural), pero también posible de una crítica sobre sus bases unidimensionales, desde otras racionalidades (del desentendimiento y de lo ambiental) ancladas en las experiencias de resistencia cultural y existencial de las sociedades locales arraigadas culturalmente en sus tradiciones y proyectos autóctonos. Es bueno que se diga que ambos modelos suenan como recursos típico-ideales justamente para subrayar las radicalidades de cada uno, a fin de que podamos identificar situaciones que se aproximan o se distancian de estos modelos.

Es posible conciliar justicia ambiental y superación del especismo?

La perspectiva de la Justicia Ambiental es un abordaje que reúne un punto de vista ético-político y una base epistemológica. El primero deriva de su precisa definición de "injusticia ambiental" como aquella que impone daños ambientales desproporcionales a grupos sociales específicos en función de su posición social subordinada. Su base epistemológica proviene de la afirmación de que las divisiones sociales predefinen la lógica de distribución desigual de estos impactos y la exposición desigual a ambientes insalubres, degradados o de riesgo. De esto resulta un nuevo vigor para la crítica social inherente a la discusión ambiental que siempre estuvo presente en la agenda ambientalista pero que ha perdido espacio en función de abordajes de consecuencias más conservadoras. Por otra parte, la Ética Ambiental es un campo de reflexión cuyos trabajos vienen examinando los criterios valorativos que fundamentan las acciones humanas en relación a los seres vivos no-humanos, áreas silvestres y paisajes naturales. Parte importante de lo producido en este campo establece objeciones serias y bien fundamentadas a su utilización meramente instrumental y sustenta, a través de diversos abordajes, la importancia de reconocer valor intrínseco a los mismos. Son recolocadas así las objeciones contra el antropocentrismo que fueron agenda fundamental del ambientalismo pero que perdieron espacio en relación a cuestiones centradas en atender intereses humanos más o menos inmediatos. La constatación de ambas contribuciones substantivas y la verificación de su relevancia llevan a preguntarse sobre la pertinencia y posibilidad de formular proposiciones de convergencia entre ellas. Este trabajo pretende explorar estas cuestiones tomando como referencia trabajos realizados en Brasil bajo la perspectiva de la Justicia Ambiental y las contribuciones de Peter Singer en el campo de la ética ambiental con énfasis en la discusión del principio de igual consideración de intereses y la crítica al especismo que él ha formulado.

Injusticia ambiental, eventos climáticos extremos e industria de la inundación

El trabajo analiza la dinámica política asociada a los "desastres naturales" en los últimos cuatro años en la ciudad de Blumenau, Santa Catarina, Brasil. La ciudad, situada a orillas del río Itajaí Açu, convive con estos fenómenos desde su fundación a mediados del siglo XIX, pero observa actualmente su intensificación como resultado de la urbanización desordenada y el aumento de eventos climáticos extremos. Así, a pesar de se tratar de una ciudad razonablemente bien integrada en el ciclo económico de los últimos años, ha sido especialmente recordada nacionalmente en virtud de estas calamidades. Entre los eventos más recientes merecen ser destacados los ocurridos en 2008 y 2011. El primero, porque incrementa al conocido fenómeno de las inundaciones, el de los deslizamientos de tierra, que provocó costos en vidas y materiales muy superiores a los conocidos anteriormente y porque evidenció más dramáticamente la distribución desproporcional de los efectos para la población más vulnerable y sujeta a segregación socio-espacial. Se afirma que esta segregación caracteriza una injusticia ambiental porque reserva desproporcionalmente a estos sectores las áreas de mayor riesgo y exposición a los desastres. El segundo, porque muestra la reafirmación de la antigua retórica de "convivencia solidaria" con la inundación junto con un proceso de instrumentalización política y económica del desastre. El trabajo explora la hipótesis de que en estos cuatro años tiende a consolidarse un nuevo ciclo de producción social de los "desastres naturales", mientras tienden a mantenerse las condiciones sociales los generan, como la segregación urbana, la ocupación desordenada y el déficit habitacional. Este nuevo ciclo estaría ocurriendo al amparo de la "industria de la inundación y la reconstrucción", en el campo económico, y de actores políticos capaces de obtener beneficios inmediatos aprovechando las visiones naturalizadas que consideran los desastres apenas como fatalidades naturales que afectan a todos por igual.

Images, activism, education and research: The uses of audiovisual by self-managed, autonomous groups in Argentina today

Este trabajo aborda los relatos que dan cuenta del aprendizaje producido al interior de colectivos auto-gestionados que propenden a la construcción de sentidos orientados por la búsqueda de la equidad, la justicia, y la toma de decisión directa sobre los asuntos comunes, es decir que tienden a la autonomía como proyecto. Se analizan materiales audiovisuales buscando comprender:

- los tipos de colaboraciones establecidas entre participantes de colectivos autogestionados, investigadores y activistas políticos, analizando los contextos de producción y uso (Burin y Heras, 2009) de lo audiovisual, y las implicancias para la construcción de aprendizajes que estos materiales proveen;
- las formas narrativas desde lo audiovisual (analizando lo estético, lo poético, lo argumental, las relaciones entre lo ficcional y lo documental de investigación, la yuxtaposición de diferentes texturas tales como la animación, la ilustración animada y no animada, el registro fílmico directo, etc.);
- los mensajes que se producen a partir de estas combinaciones, caracterizándolos en tres orientaciones que hoy aparecen diferenciadas: la activista, la educativa y la de investigación, caracterización al menos útil para el contexto de producción y uso de este tipo de materiales en la Argentina de hoy, y que puede extenderse a otros contextos internacionales.

Se sugiere la posibilidad de que quienes producen este tipo de documentos apelan, en cada uno de los casos, a recursos del lenguaje audiovisual diferentes. Se reflexiona sobre las posibilidades de que dichos recursos puedan permear los tres ejes, presentando una discusión sobre las riquezas potenciales de un tipo de enfoque a la vez activista, educativo y de investigación.

RC29-83.1FOCAS, Brenda (CONICET/ UBA, brendafocas@yahoo.com.ar)Medios de comunicación y sensación de inseguridad

"La sensación de inseguridad" no es ajena a lo que algunos investigadores sociales califican como un fenómeno mundial que tiene lugar como consecuencia de la caída del Estado de Bienestar y del auge de políticas neoliberales. El ascenso de las incertidumbres (Castel, 2010) presenta un escenario de gran vulnerabilidad, un entramado de situaciones objetivas de desamparo, violencia civil, frágiles inserciones laborales, y falta de perspectivas de integración hacia el futuro. En este contexto de mutaciones estructurales, en Argentina, se duplicó el porcentaje de personas que teme ser víctima del delito, mientras que la tasa de criminalidad, luego de experimentar un aumento, se mantiene constante en los últimos años (Kessler, 2009). En esta ponencia se propone, en un primer lugar, analizar el rol de los medios de comunicación en torno a la construcción de los discursos sobre la inseguridad, fenómeno que se transformó en una sección mediática estable. La cámara en el lugar del hecho, la actualización constante de la información por Internet, y la utilización de un estilo narrativo sensacionalista configuraron un cambio sustancial en los contenidos periodísticos. Además, las reiteradas imágenes sobre el crimen en la televisión, generaron una cotidianeidad en la que se institucionalizó "la experiencia del delito colectivo" (Garland, 2005). En segundo lugar, se propone indagar en la literatura sobre algunas líneas teóricas y/o autorales desde donde se pensó el proceso de recepción y circulación de la representación mediática del delito. Para finalizar, se intentará reflexionar sobre el papel de los medios (como responsables o posibiladores) de la "inseguridad", en un ethos epocal marcado por la incertidumbre, la in-diferenciación cultural y la exclusión social.

RC32-13.4FOGIEL - BIJAOU, Sylvie (The Academic College of Management, sylvieb@colman.ac.il)The future is still waiting for us: Arab-Israeli women in the Israeli labor market

In the two last decades, the rate of Arab women, citizens of Israel, joining the labor market has slightly increased from 12% in 1990 to 19% in 2006. However, this rate remains very low compared to the rate of labor market participation of Jewish women's which increased from 46% to 56% (age 15+) during the same period of time. Based on data from Arab Israeli NGOs' reports, on official data and on recent research, I try in this paper to analyze this problematic situation. For that purpose, I first point to the fact that the very low participation of Arab-Israeli women in the labor market is related to the fact that the structure of opportunities open to these women, which discriminates them on two fronts and counts, did not change: As Arabs, they are discriminated against on the labor market; as women, they are discriminated against both in the Israeli society at large and in the Arab-Israeli Society. I then emphasize the fact that due to an increase in Arab women's education, this development has been also associated with some decreasing gender inequality, reflected, inter alia, in more legitimacy given to women's work; a strengthening of the civil society and of feminist organizations and, at different time, three Arab women elected at the Israeli Parliament. Thirdly I argue that the constitution of a feminist intelligentsia; the activism of the Arab-Israeli civil society and the reference to the International Law could be seen as democratic institutional changes, effective in promoting Arab women's more equal participation in the labor market. I conclude that, although strong anti democratic currents exist nowadays in Israel, the summer 2011 civil protest and the global protest, may give us some hope for a better future

The past years have seen efforts by women's rights agencies, groups and feminist activists to clamor for women's rights including their rights to land in developing countries. While efforts in the domain of land rights have yielded some positive results in the form of institutional reforms that advocate for gender equality, field realities are far from being encouraging.

Women do not still have equal rights and power over land like their male counterparts. Women's land rights thus remain on papers (international instruments, constitutions, land laws, etc) most of which are far or disconnected from the experiences of the rural women. Based on recent studies from Cameroon, this paper argues that legal provisions that advocated for gender equality in land rights are sometimes enacted by institutions and men who neither believe nor understand the need for gender equality. This situation, the paper argues, accounts for the gap noticed between land reforms and field realities. It submits that the main problem lies with the fact that a disproportionate attention is paid on women (building the gender capacity of women to be aware and advocate for their rights) than on men in patriarchal societies who though, pose a threat to women's rights, might not necessarily be aware for their actions. We argue strongly in this paper that strategies for promoting women's land rights must focus on men and pay equal attention to building the gender capacity of male agencies in understanding and enforcing women's land rights and gender equalities.

RC07-625.1FONSECA, Dora (Faculdade de Economia da Universidade de Coimbra - CES, dorajfonseca@gmail.com)New actors on stage: Analysis of the emergent forms of collective action in the European context

The European context has been remarkably characterized by the emergence of new collective actors that exhibit distinguishable features both in what concerns the modes of action adopted and the detachment from the traditional institutional dynamics. Their formation takes place in a turbulent context of changes that reveal the difficulties, by modern societies, in accommodating the modernizing processes: the rising of unemployment, the dismantlement of the welfare state, the dictatorship of markets, the segmentation of the labor force, and so forth.

The European context and its welfare state tradition are affected by the proliferation of market ideologies and the new politics of production. The challenges of the new order are not easy to accommodate and by no means desirable. However, given a great number of interrelated constraints, the institutional responses – especially the trade unions – are not as effective as desired. Nevertheless, responses are by no means inexistent. The civil society has come to display a great capacity of self-organization, turning to be a locus of conformation of political actors and of processes of contentious dynamics.

Our aim is to highlight and analyze these processes in the context of the recent mobilizations in Europe, widely known as "Indignados" movement, born in Madrid but rapidly disseminated throughout other European countries. By analyzing the international context of mobilization, is also our aim to demonstrate in what ways it relates with mobilization's national realities, largely embedded in the context of the precarization of labor relations. Given the limitations of both the Resource Mobilization perspective and of the European (Identity based) paradigm in what concerns these new forms of collective action, it was our choice to combine other theoretical options, as the analyses of the dynamics of contention and the elements provided by the theoretical approaches of authors as Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe.

RC14-200.2FONTENELLE, Isleide (Fundação Getulio Vargas, idefontenelle@uol.com.br)For a genealogy of responsibility in consumption

Although the autonomy of consumers - in the sense of freedom to define their needs and desires and to make their choices - is at the center of the liberal tradition, the culture of consumption throughout the twentieth century, never explicitly suggested that consumers assume responsibility for their choices. On the contrary, this consumer culture was constituted far from any public or private discourse that would point to a "responsible consumer". It appealed, instead, to the imperative of excess and disposability, which it could - and should - "enjoy" at any price, as is vividly demonstrated by the marketing strategies that began being used as from that period, particularly advertising.

But as from the mid-1990s, the discourse about responsible consumption began to gain greater relevance, especially the discourse about the environment. Strictly speaking, criticism of the excesses of consumer society is also nothing new, dating back as it does to the same historical period as the hegemonic discourse on the blessings of the consumption culture. However, it was marginal criticism, either in the academic field, or adopted by the currents of aesthetic or social movements. The new aspect that this article intends investigating is the moment when this discourse begins to become hegemonic and part of the mainstream, and what this indicates.

In order to grasp this phenomenon, this study proposes a genealogy of responsibility in the field of consumption that considers both the theoretical and critical production of consumer society, as well as the new marketing production that constructed the discourse about responsible consumption.

New developments in social support practices and private-public collaborations

The aim of this article is to examine a form of private-public collaboration for the development of social support practices in mental health systems in Brazil. Specifically, we intend to analyze the work developed conjointly by CAPS (Center for Attention to Mentally ill Persons, a municipal agency), and several NGOs developing the practices of so-called "Communitarian Therapy", a technique developed to introduce psychotherapy into communities. The objective of this technique is the care of mentally ill persons through listening and counseling. People from the community, called lay therapists, are trained to conduct the sessions.

Communitarian Therapy is currently being adopted by the CAPS Agencies, frequently in association with NGOs. This approach empowers communities, creating ties between families, neighborhoods and technicians. The article argues that these new practices strongly contribute to improving the quality of life of the mentally ill, due to the fact that this collaboration between the municipal agencies, the NGOs, together with increased involvement of the families and the community reduces one of the worst effects on persons with mental health problems, namely isolation and exclusion

Social network analysis in the Lusophone scientific community: Adoption and diffusion of an innovation in the periphery

Social network analysis (SNA) has been widely disseminated in the USA and Europe since the 1970's, and it has been growing exponentially. However, and despite the increasing mobility of researchers and the expansion of the Internet, SNA has emerged late in Lusophone countries. Only in the 21st century we can observe an important scientific production with applications of SNA. Notwithstanding, the presence of scientific production of Lusophone social network analysts in the international scene, is still very weak.

Our perspective is to look at the use and application of SNA by Lusophone researchers as the adoption of an innovation. The adoption and diffusion of any innovation and of a scientific methodology in particular, is a social activity and as such constrained by the structure of social relations in which actors are embedded. Hence, the analysis of the interdependencies among Lusophone social network researchers, and among those and international social network researchers, through the use of SNA, seems to be the most adequate methodological strategy. After identifying Lusophone researchers who authored or co-authored articles using applications of SNA, we sent them an online questionnaire. Results show that the professional and academic trajectory of Lusophone social networkers, as well as their collaboration and co-authorship relational patterns, are still very much directed to national institutions and colleagues. The results of our study are consistent with those saying that despite trends towards globalization, high income countries still dominate social science knowledge production (Gingras 2002). It has been said that international collaborative networks grew at a spectacular rate between 1990 and 2000 (Wagner and Leyderdorff 2006) but this network, like many others, organizes through a preferential attachment mechanism: in spite of a growing centre it will continue to take longer, and represent higher costs, for the periphery to get to the centre

Women and foreigners: Understanding the importance of mobility in science careers

The aim of this presentation is to debate the experience of academic women who have periods of international mobility along their careers. Women are still experiencing diverse forms of social interdictions, which affect their social promotion and their self-concept and which may be considered as forms of inequality objectively and subjectively experienced. In the case of migratory or mobility trajectory, women are still socially restrained from the point of view of dominant male culture, which tends to conceive international mobility as a men's competence, connoting women with lower emotional skills to support mobility, unless they are accompanied by a man[1]. Indicators continue to signal an increasing number of women researchers in mobility[2]. Nevertheless, the most striking conclusion is that women are experiencing these embargos in the crescent of a globalized world, allegedly much more transnational and free from traditional patterns. So, the questions we pose in this text are the following: what does it mean to be (academic) women in mobility? To what extent do the categories of women and academia reinforce each other? What is their self-concept and how do they see and represent themselves? This presentation is based in a research project made in Portugal about the trajectories of portuguese researchers using interviews and content analysis.

[1] Transnational feminism has been fundamental in this regard.

[2] We considered in the study the Frascati manual definition of researcher. Literature on leisure and travelling shows the historical persistence of the categorization of women from the point of view of the steadiness and with home and nation safeguarding.

[3] This idea has been the object of several analyses in social theory.

[4] Independently from the diverse socio-cultural and political contexts of action, there is a notable similitude between patterns at different scales and levels of analysis.

Digital media and community planning in US cities

In 2006 the MacArthur Foundation launched a $50 million digital media and learning initiative, which has produced funds for a variety of research, practice, and capacity-building projects in the US. These projects have predominantly focused on education and learning efforts, although they have spread to community planning projects in the past few years. From Boston to Los Angeles, researchers and practitioners have begun to employ a range of digital media in expanding the scope of public engagement in planning efforts.

The emergence of digital media as a community planning strategy reflects a broader shift in the way urban spaces are conceived. The image of the centralized, modernist city run by bureaucrats has given way to a decentered, networked space populated by public, private, and civil society agents. Knowledge is increasingly understood as cooperatively produced by experts and lay people, as the value of historical contingency, place, and context becomes increasingly recognized. Various forms of digital media reflect and enable this cultural transition, as new technologies broaden the scope and methods for public engagement in urban planning projects. The putative existence of new methodologies does not, however, guarantee a qualitative difference in the performance of urban planning projects. Therefore the question remains: to what extent may digital media deliver emancipatory potential for twenty-first century community planning?

This paper reviews cases in a number of U.S. cities to examine the potential and the potential pitfalls of using digital media in community planning projects. Digital media considered here include immersive 3D models, social network media, participatory mapping, smartphone, and cheap cell-phone-based engagement. Cities include Boston, Raleigh, Los Angeles, and Seattle. Themes discussed relate to media access and meaningful engagement; the use of digital media in understanding and designing place; and control and ownership over data production, consolidation of findings, and the research agenda.

Abstract.

From the critique of the risk's geopolitical and its conception of "internal enemy", we keep track of the Instruments for the New Doctrine for Hemispheric Security, making a comparative study between statements and derivative transactions of the Conference of Defense Ministers the Americas and the strategic role of the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) in its Security Council, highlighting the disputes, breakdowns and restorations, as well as their potential, obstacles and challenges as a possible regional space in the building sovereignty and self-determination of the subcontinent.

Old songs, new media: Facebook, protest songs, and social identity in Wisconsin's capitol occupation

This paper investigates the development, growth, and sustainment of a new social movement that grew out of the mass mobilization that arose in response to attacks on collective bargaining rights in Wisconsin in the spring of 2011. The study explores the ways in which a loosely structured community formed around a musical vigil for labor and civil rights that has taken place at the Wisconsin Capitol every weekday for more than nine months. Drawing on literature from sociology and communication studies (Castells, 2009; Friedland, Hove & Rojas, 2006; Oliver and Myers, 2002; Snow & Benford, 1986) this study explores the following research question: How do new social movement actors use new media (e.g., Facebook) as a mobilization tool, for social adhesion, to align with actors' previously held values and beliefs, and to share information? The research is based on 11 in-depth interviews with core participants, leaders, newcomers, and one interview with a political office-holder, as well as ethnographic participant observation of the weekdaily sing along for three months from October 6 thru December 12, 2011. The author also analyzed the community's Facebook page and the daily postings, cross-postings, and comments of the self-designated photographic archivist. The paper advances the understanding of how new social movement participants evaluate the effectiveness of their organizations in raising public understanding for a cause, creating meaningful social change, and connecting to other social movements, past and present.

The emergence of a digital communicative media

This work presents a theoretical discussion about Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) from perspective of general sociological theory and under the premises of the Luhmannian General Social Systems Theory (GSST), which accentuates the sociological centrality of communication and establishes a theory of modern/world society. This perspective considers the ICT beyond the reflections about the relationship between technology and society and it frames them inside the general problem of social order. Our paper proposes: 1) to determine three epistemological obstacles (technologicism, sociologicism and diachronical overload) that block the general theoretical work on the issue, 2) to conceptualize the structural transformations produced in the field of the dissemination of communication by the digitalisation of ICT, by Internet and by the technological convergence, and 3) to evaluate those transformations from a societal theory. Our main hypothesis affirms that from the strengthening and globalisation of digitalisation, technological convergence and Internet have emerged a communicative media. This digital, interconnected and nodular media transformed the disseminating structures of society, and it makes already possible the communicative agency of informatic nodes, the global and simultaneous accessibility to applications and resources and the communicative syntheitisation of remote utterances and understandings.

Caio prado júnior, marxism and coloniality of knowledge

The focus in this paper is to indicate the Caio Prado Júnior's Marxist theory about the Portuguese colonialism in Brazil as a way to understand this experience in a non-Eurocentric perspective. According to this historian, the meaning of the Portuguese colonization it was to explore all the Brazilian wealth. Because of this fact, Brazil was introduced under a subordinate condition in the Modern World-System since his birth. Thus, the Caio Prado Júnior's concept of meaning of the colonization refutes mechanical transpositions of Marxists conceptions in non-Western contexts, because it emphasizes the Brazilian's formation specificities. So the criticism of Caio Prado Júnior over the Iberian colonialism can also be understood as a critique of the coloniality of knowledge within the Marxism.

Contesting la concertacion: Working-class demobilization and the production of oppositional political subjectivities in Chile's 'democracia del libre mercado'

Drawing from interviews with thirty-nine residents of low-income, peripheral neighborhoods in Santiago, Chile, my research examines the formation of working-class political subjectivities in a context of low union density and elite-dominated political parties. I examine the class coalition of urban poor, working-class and liberal professionals formed by La Concertacion in the late 1980s, and account for the gradual breakdown of support from the urban poor and working-class. Using a Gramscian framework, I argue that La Concertacion built its hegemonic project on a return to formal democracy and social welfare, with a legitimizing ideology of equality of opportunity. However, the daily experience of working-class life in the market society has led to a widespread recognition that social mobility is difficult to come by, and so the ideology of the market, rather than being absorbed wholesale by working-class people, has found limited popular success. Experiences of the market have led to a broader critique of the incompatibility of neoliberalism and democracy. However, despite the pervasiveness of a critical discourse on neoliberal democracy among the urban poor and working-class, the lack of institutional channels for meaningful political participation and mobilization of these groups has led to disillusionment and cynicism. One response to this situation has been recourse to individualized market strategies. In particular, large numbers of poor and working-class families have responded by making significant sacrifices to help their children acquire post-secondary education. I analyze this strategy as essentially a labor struggle deferred to the education sphere. Finally, I argue that the current crisis of representation and perceived lack of state and party legitimacy among poor and working-class Chileans is an instance of a Gramscian organic crisis, exemplified by the mass mobilizations of the Chilean student movement in 2006 and 2011.

Diablogging about asylum seekers

Using Wetherell and Potter's seminal analysis of the rhetoric of racism, this paper argues that blogs are sites where racism is both expressed and contested. Despite Mapping the Language of Racism being two decades old this year, the discursive repertoires used by the New Zealand middle class in interviews about issues to do with indigenous Maori appear as relevant as ever among Australians blogging about the current bug-bear of contemporary racism, asylum seekers, and arise in similar patterns in online discussions. This paper tracks the ways the discourses are reproduced but also the ways they are challenged by bloggers attempting to change these views. Discursive analysis reveals the ways blog interactional structures limit the ability of researchers to determine whether the dialogue actually changes peoples' opinions. However, the potential of blogs to work as a Habermasian 'public square' is argued for.

Uudle-izing higher education: Constructing a global accountability relation

The story of UUDLEs (otherwise known as University Undergraduate Degree Level Expectations) is one of how an organizing text is developed, implemented as policy, and becomes an actual condition of people's everyday work within a faculty of education. I have begun the articulation of the textually-based work sequences that inform my understanding of UUDLEs. I have done this in order to produce an ethnographic account of the "... day-to-day text-based work and local discourse practices that produce and shape the dynamic ongoing activities of an institution" (Turner, 2006, p. 139). I could understand that something invisible was happening (and I was a part of it) and that this invisibility was generating a set of experiences for myself and, as I learned from conducting interviews, for my informants. As an institutional ethnographer my goal is to locate the actual so a portion of my data collection involved the tracing back and following of clues from the local site (a faculty of education) and the data that I collected therein and beyond (Campbell & Gregor, 2002). The beyond is where I wish to explore in this presentation. The sequences that I have mapped actually shape the global foundation upon which future teaching and further policy development occurs. What became visible was that the initiative that I understood to be specific to Ontario, Canada (the UUDLEs framework) in fact transcends across multiple locations and institutions. While the name UUDLEs might be specific to Canada, this movement of articulating and adhering to quality assurance frameworks is actually taking place and changing the everyday work of teachers on an international scale – all in the name of quality teaching, the student experience, and transfer of credit. Commensurability of education is the new actuality for higher education.

Visualizing culture and power: The aesthetics of farming among African-Americans in the rural U.S. South

The realm of aesthetics provides a space for considering the sensuous, implicit, and practiced aspects of culture. Aesthetics is also a space for political re-imagining and resistance to status-quo policies. Within my research I investigate how aesthetics are used by rural African-American communities in the U.S. South to reframe a historic legacy surrounding the act of farming, to resist current oppressive trends in the dominant agricultural system, and to develop and promote community food production. In particular, my research focuses on the Federation of Southern Cooperatives/Land Assistance Fund (FSC/LAF), a collection of agricultural and rural cooperatives that promotes rural development. My research site is centered on the FSC/LAF's Rural Training and Research Center in Epes, Alabama. In conducting my research, I follow the efforts of local organizers, work with local farmers, and observe the practices of two local farmers' markets.

A key method I use for observing and understanding the role of aesthetics is visual ethnography. I produce films in collaboration with the FSC/LAF and local participants in order to solicit, capture, and analyze the performed aspects and practiced meanings surrounding farming and food production. In addition, I participate in the work and practices of the farmers and market organizers, collect oral histories, and conduct interviews on camera. Drawing on preliminary research and findings, the paper I will present illustrates how resistance figures into practices of everyday life and examines the role of aesthetics in promoting community-based development. The paper also discusses the use of collaborative film production as a research method, detailing the nature of collaboration and agreement between the FSC/LAF and myself. Finally, the paper considers the benefits and limitations of a visual methodology.

Presidential leadership of Hugo Chavez: Resources and strategies in the exercise of power

The main objective of this paper is a descriptive historical analysis of Hugo Chavez leadership in his first years in office within a theoretical framework which rests on the study of subjective and objective resources the Bolivarian leader had in government action. In this sense, describes the first steps taken by Chavez during those years, paying attention on the style and nature of presidential leadership in the use of the resources available and obtained through the exercise of power. Similarly, as seen from the use of available resources, the president of Venezuela achieved a significant expansion of social rights which allows to strengthen his leadership against an opposition that is losing its resilience. This expansion of social rights simultaneously unfolds a process of restricting citizens' rights, but for the imaginary of the Venezuelan society do not seem to be an insurmountable contradiction. That is, in a rating scale, this extension of rights is greater than the restriction and becomes one of the components of the strength of Chavez presidential leadership.

On the other hand, the article focuses on the process of "policy presidentialisation" (Poguntke - Webb 2005) taking place in Venezuela and how it affects the political dynamics and the parties within low institutionalization representative presidential democracies (Ollier 2011). In this institutional design in which the centrality of leadership is central, this paper attempts to analyze how it affects the phenomenon of "policy presidentialisation" the party system, a president-opposition relations and governance nowadays takes place in this country.

Choosing ayurveda as a health care practice in Argentina

Ayurveda is an ancient Indian medicine that was introduced in Argentina in the late '80s, and whose popularity has been on the rise among middle and upper class sectors. As a holistic approach that integrates physical, emotional and spiritual dimensions, it encompasses self-care through lifestyle changes and treatments tailored to the patient's biotype. Treatments are provided by local physicians and other health professionals specialized in Ayurveda, and they are neither covered by the social security nor by private insurance plans. They are not part of the public health services, either. Therefore, patients have to pay for them out-of-pocket, and their costs are considerably high. Additionally, to sustain a lifestyle according to Ayurvedic precepts, their local followers usually need to buy expensive products (such as organic food, and Ayurvedic herbal products manufactured abroad) and devote time and "effort" to daily routines of self-care. In sum, Ayurveda is a health care option available to the privileged social sectors. On the one hand, by stressing a healthy lifestyle and individual responsibility in health maintenance and improvement, Ayurveda resonates with the normative discourse of biomedicine. But, on the other hand, it represents an alternative to the dominant health care discourse because it goes beyond the physical body to understand health and illness processes, and also because some self-care practices are counter-hegemonic in the local context (to follow a vegetarian diet, to use natural remedies instead of pharmaceuticals, etc.). Based on in-depth interviews we conducted with twenty patients and followers of Ayurveda in Metropolitan Buenos Aires in 2010 and 2011, we analyze why they got interested in this healing approach and, given the diversity in how users of Ayurveda engaged with this foreign medical tradition, how they evaluated the possibilities to sustain the practice of Ayurveda in the local socio-cultural environment.

Médicos que practican medicinas no convencionales: Marginación histórica, nichos de integración institucional, y modalidades de práctica profesional

Basándonos en entrevistas en profundidad con 42 médicos formados en Homeopatía, Ayurveda, y Acupuntura, indagamos las razones que los llevan a alejarse de la práctica médica convencional e integrar medicinas alternativas y complementarias (MACs) en su trabajo clínico, las variantes en sus modalidades de práctica heterodoxa, y las posibilidades y limitaciones que han tenido para desarrollarla en distintos ámbitos institucionales. Se consideran MACs a los enfoques médicos que no se enseñan en las facultades de medicina ni están integrados en el sistema de salud, o bien, a las prácticas de cuidado y productos que se diferencian de la medicina alopática. Los límites entre las MACs y la medicina convencional han cambiado en los últimos años en distintos contextos nacionales, a través de procesos emergentes y dispares de integración. Se han propuesto diversos escenarios, especialmente en los países centrales, para analizar la articulación entre biomedicina y MACs atendiendo a dichos procesos emergentes, siendo la tesis dominante la de cooptación. Esta da cuenta de dinámicas macrosociales y organizacionales que reproducen la dominancia de la profesión médica frente a competidores externos, pero limita observar procesos de marginación intra-profesional en torno a la práctica médica no ortodoxa. En Argentina, hasta la fecha no se ha implementado una política nacional de incorporación de las MACs en el sistema de salud, y los planes de estudio de las facultades de medicina no incluyen a las MACs. La oferta de cursos de formación de postgrado es excepcional, y también los son las experiencias de integración de MACs en los servicios de salud. En este contexto de marginación institucional pero amplia difusión de las MACs, recuperamos las experiencias de médicos y médicas pertenecientes a diversas generaciones que decidieron formarse en ellas e integrarlas en la práctica profesional. El estudio se realizó en el Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires.

Subjective well-being and OECD

From the second half of the XX century on, new concepts of how to measure development of a country and the well-being of its citizens have gained prominence around the world. Social researchers, political actors and international agencies introduced multi-dimensional ways to measure the social progress, which took into account more factors than just the figures of GDP.

These new perspectives started to take into account, among other factors, subjective aspects of the population's well-being, trying to understand how social changes affect the way individuals evaluate their life as a whole.

The present work aims to study the emergence and historical evolution of these new discourses that deal with subjective well-being and development. Our intention is to understand more clearly how the debates about these themes have taken place, trying to identify the key actors (individuals, research groups and institutions) who were responsible for inserting them in the worldwide discussions about the measurement of well-being and the political decisions.

Some exploratory research pointed to the vital importance of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, OECD, in the discussion about this theme: currently, this institution shelters the most influential social and political actors concerned with the issues of well-being and with inserting other aspects apart from the GDP in national progress estimates.

Our study concentrates, therefore, on a detailed reconstruction of the emergence of the new discourses on subjective well-being that have taken place in the OECD since the 1990s.

Violencia simbólica y construcción de los datos: El potencial de las metodologías participativas en la investigación con jóvenes en situación de pobreza

En un contexto donde la mayoría de los países latinoamericanos ha establecido la obligatoriedad de la escuela secundaria, al menos en su primer ciclo, los problemas de acceso a y, sobre todo, de permanencia en el nivel de los numerosos jóvenes que en esta región viven en situación de pobreza estructural adquiere importancia fundamental. Tales problemas aparecen ligados a las condiciones de vida de estos jóvenes y sus familias, pero también a una oferta educativa que no responde a sus necesidades e intereses. En este marco, la investigación sobre sus experiencias educativas, su modo de habitar la escuela y sus demandas con respecto a ésta cobra centralidad.

Sin embargo, nuestra experiencia de investigación nos ha mostrado que el abordaje de estas cuestiones con jóvenes que han vivido –o viven– trayectorias escolares difíciles, marcadas por un percibido “fracaso”, no resulta sencillo, aún con las técnicas cualitativas tradicionales, que buscan recuperar la perspectiva del actor. En esto operan no sólo los efectos de la asimetría de poder simbólico que ha señalado Bourdieu, que hace que algunos grupos no se sientan “competentes” –esto es, socialmente “autorizados”– para hablar de determinados temas, sino también el carácter estigmatizante y doloroso de las vivencias escolares, asociadas a un “fracaso” asumido como responsabilidad propia.

La ponencia, que se inscribe en el eje metodológico de la sesión, busca analizar los efectos de esta problemática sobre la construcción de los datos, como asimismo discutir, a partir de la propia experiencia de investigación con jóvenes del conurbano bonaerense, la potencialidad de las técnicas participativas que apelan a formas expresivas variadas (collage, dibujo, dramatización, medios audiovisuales, discusión grupal) para recuperar la mirada de estos jóvenes sobre los procesos escolares asociados a la falta de pertinencia de la educación secundaria.

American dreams in Argentina: Making financial self-help global Financial success books produced in the United States have become increasingly popular throughout the world. Today, almost all financial self-help resources are produced in the United States and exported to other countries. My presentation analyzes the social uses of these popular American resources (including the board game Cashflow) under the starkly different conditions of stability of the Argentine economy and financial system. I argue that the local work of adapting foreign advice to domestic conditions is what makes these products exportable to different economic contexts.

Users in Argentina are aware of the American character of financial self-help products and most are initially suspicious. Recurrent devastating crises (such as the 2001 crash) have taught Argentinians not to trust financial institutions. But they do not give up and use the advice from gurus by disentangling the theories from the concrete applications. In fact, for many users a scenario of financial instability not only makes the advice from the books more relevant. According to them, recurrent crises also provide excellent opportunities for those with the right ‘financial intelligence.’ Financial self-help groups are crucial in this quest, because readers discover a world of thousands who are trying to apply American ideas to the Argentine context. These social networks are as important as the products themselves, because by trying to solve the problem of adaptability, they make the products globalizable.

Collectively, users actively engage with the financial advice emerging from these products to make them fit the Argentine context. For example, Cashflow players contrast game with reality and try to figure out what the game is telling them and what they can make of it, regardless of its dubious realism. This engagement is what makes American products work in a different national context. This local translation is what makes it global.

The compass of memory: Uruguayan belated transitional justice and the social struggle between the right of victims to ‘truth and justice’ vs. policies of oblivion (1985-2011)

This article looks at the future-oriented process of social mobilization for the memory, ‘truth-seeking’ and ‘never again’ in cases of ‘crimes against humanity’ recognition and accountability in Uruguay’s twenty five years of transition. It seeks to analyze the successive “waves of memory” in the particularly unfavorable context of Uruguay’s transitional Politics of Oblivion (Políticas de Olvido), political silencing and institutionalized impunity (1985-2011), leading up to the most recent successful developments since 2005, and particularly focusing on developments in 2011.

Uruguay’s legacy of trauma and amnesia/latency under post-authoritarian transitional is used as a lens to analyze some of the complex cultural and psycho-social processes of the social dimension of traumatic remembering and healing in their intersection with state policy after state political violence. In this context, how were the silenced experiences and categories of human rights crimes under the civic-military regime (1973-1984) categorized, remembered and represented? How were they transmitted and contested in the public realm, by what means and agents, and how did they relate to the possibility of personal and social healing and repair?

What official political memory excluded for decades was paradoxically sustained by civic “communities of memory” who carried out a “memory work” and pushed for a cultural processes for decades after the initial transition, which made ‘silenced memories’ of human right abuse readily available for their re-emergence and inclusion into the public and social culture in recent years. I conclude with a reflection of memory’s forward-capacity for healing –personally and collectively– as dependent on a supportive community, and consider the iatrogenic effects of an adverse socio-political public framing for transitional memory, reconciliation and redress.

The right to justice vs. policies of oblivion: Uruguay’s transitional justice domestic developments and the inter American court of human rights’ Gelman case sentence (2010-2011)

Uruguay has gone from having the highest per capita rate of political imprisonment and torture in the world to one of the best records in human rights in the developing world –in a region that has gone through an intensification of justice accountability processes. The presentation will provide an analysis of the development and latest challenges brought by the civic struggle for accountability and justice and the dismantling of institutionalized policies of oblivion and impunity in Uruguay (1986-2005) concerning gross human rights crimes committed during the civic-military dictatorship (1973-1985), and the overturning of the expiry law which sheltered perpetrators of gross human rights abuses after 25 years of institutionalized impunity. ‘Politics of Oblivion’ are here understood as dominant state policies and practices purposefully oriented to blocking targeted civilian-victim’s path to seek accountability, truth and justice for gross human rights state crimes of the authoritarian period during the transitional regime (1985-2005), policies and institutionalized practices which have recently been challenged both by domestic civic social and legal as well as regional mobilization. The impact of exemplary social and legal mobilization legal cases on these developments will be examined, such as the Elena Quinteros (2008-2010) and Julio Castro case (2011-2012) and the Gelman vs. Uruguay case, heard before the Inter American Court of Human Rights (IACrHR) in 2010 and sentenced in March 2011, in disabling impunity regime’s central legal piece, a 1986 Expiry law (Ley de Caducidad) after twenty-five years.

Part of the working class? The cost of depoliticization for union legitimacy among migrant workers in China

Why, just as the Chinese state was becoming increasingly preoccupied with class conflict in 2003, did the state-run All China Federation of Trade Unions proclaim that migrant workers were now part of the working class? Why do migrant workers fail to recognize the legitimacy of this claim? And what are the consequences of this for class formation and politics more broadly? I argue that the state and union’s attempts at depoliticization of labor conflict has primarily focused on individualization; and yet, it has become increasingly clear that this strategy has failed to reduce the volume of unrest. As a result, the ACFTU has continued to invoke the language of class in what has so far been a process of failed incorporation and cooptation. The ACFTU’s inability to win recognition from migrant workers indicates the weakness of the organization’s symbolic power. Through an analysis of current activities of ACFTU-subordinate unions, I provide empirical evidence which demonstrates that the state recognizes the legitimacy of such unions even if migrant workers do not. By precluding “traditional” modes of class formation that emerge through the process of representation, Chinese state policy is producing a mode of labor politics markedly distinct from that of other countries undergoing capitalist industrialization.

RC12-167.1FRIEDMAN, Lawrence (Stanford University, lmf@stanford.edu)The politics of judicial election and selection

In the United States, federal judges and a few state judges are appointed; most of the rest are elected. The paper briefly recounts the history of the electoral process for judges, and the social forces that led to this unique system; as well as those which, in the 20th century, produced significant changes. Recently, these elections have become much more politicized and partisan. The paper discusses why this has occurred; and reviews some of the empirical literature which has explored the question of the behavioral consequences of the election system, and how it bears on the issue of judicial independence, autonomy, and impartiality.

This presentation discusses clinical sociology - a type of sociological practice - and its relation to the human rights paradigm. Clinical sociology will be defined and the history of field (with an emphasis on developments in the United States) will be discussed. Some of the main approaches that have been used in research and intervention in different parts of the world will be identified. Concluding points will be made about the history, current situation and future developments in the field of clinical sociology in relation to human rights.

RC46-159.4FRIITZ, Jan Marie (University of Cincinnati, jan.fritz@uc.edu)Gender and inclusive peacebuilding

This presentation focuses on United Nations Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 1325 (Women, Peace and Security) and its mandates for men and women to include women in peacebuilding efforts. There is a particular interest in women who are in decision-making, peacekeeping and peacemaking roles in transition countries (particularly ones emerging from autocracy). The UN Resolution "urges member States to ensure increased representation of women (in) all... mechanisms for the prevention, management, and resolution of conflict" and "to take further measures to improve women's participation during all stages of peace processes." First, selected peace processes (including peacebuilding) will be defined and then there will be an explanation of UNSCR 1325 and its mandates regarding peacebuilding. This will be followed by a discussion of some of the barriers women face in their societies and, finally, some examples will be provided of inclusive peacebuilding efforts in selected countries.

Esta es una comunicación de una evaluación de los proyectos financiados FECOP. En resumen, esta es la presentación de un campo de investigación con sus respectivos resultados, la razón de sus dificultades y recomendaciones para el futuro de la experiencia. El proceso de evaluación desarrollado a escala de los impactos de las intervenciones del proyecto para reducir la pobreza en el Estado de Ceará, teniendo en cuenta la medida en que los proyectos en realidad lograron sus objetivos. La medición de los impactos socio-económicos se produjo a través de la construcción de un índice de calidad de vida (ICV) de los indicadores sugeridos por las Naciones Unidas. Los datos fueron recolectados a través de cuestionarios y grupos focales con los beneficiarios y no beneficiarios del proyecto. Trabajar con estos dos grupos se produjo como resultado de la metodología elegida: Propensity Score Matching. El área de estudio se concentra en siete municipios de Ceará (Brasil). El proyecto, como lo demuestra la evaluación, contribuyó a la calidad de vida de una parte muy pequeña de los jóvenes en la necesidad de Ceará. Sin embargo, para los beneficiarios, el proyecto proporcionó una oportunidad no sólo un cambio de comportamiento, sino en las relaciones con sus compañe-ros y profesores, la experiencia, los cambios en las actitudes y la cooperación. El monto de la beca era pequeño, no puede tener un impacto significativo en los ingresos familiares. Los indicadores cuantitativos y cualitativos muestran que el principal objetivo, la cualificación profesional, se ha alcanzado. Sin embargo, no significa que no haya problemas: los datos cuando son sometidos a PSM indican que no hay un impacto positivo en la comunidad. Esto apunta a la necesidad de algunas medidas inmediatas y una discusión teórica sobre la naturaleza de dichos proyectos.

Regionalization of human rights is an important trend observed since the mid-twentieth century. In the Americas this trend is represented by the Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (1948) and the American Convention on Human Rights (1969) - the most comprehensive regional laws signed. Such regionalization is also evidenced by the Inter-American Commission (1969) and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (1979) - institutions whose mandate is to investigate violations of these and other human rights treaties.

This articles aims to investigate the parameters and procedures adopted by the Commission and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights concerning child rights violations processes.

It is in the inter-regional scale that effective punishment to rights violations committed by the State takes place; however, these regional institutions have structural limitations to judge all violations demands. This initial presupposition triggers the need to investigate the following questions:

- 1) What are the parameters and the procedures adopted by the Commission and the Court to select and solve the demands of child rights violations?
- 2) What are the repercussions of the court decisions related to the processes of child rights violations in the State where these violations occur?

The empirical investigation consists of a comparative research of all child rights violations cases judged by the Court between 1993 and 2004. These cases are analysed from two perspectives: a) At the national scale, the possibilities which delimit the access of the violations cases to the Inter-American system are verified b) At the Inter-American scale the court decisions are analysed to understand its procedural tendencies in relation to child rights violations issues.

Más allá del contexto: Los factores que hicieron posible el "descongelamiento" del sistema de salud durante el primer gobierno de izquierda en el Uruguay

El cambio generado por el primer triunfo electoral de un partido de izquierda en el Uruguay, generó una ventana de oportunidad para el desarrollo de reformas de corte estructural cuya necesidad estaba presente en la agenda política a partir de la segunda mitad del siglo XX. El caso del sector salud es particular en ese sentido, ya que sólo registró modificaciones sustanciales bajo regímenes autoritarios. Sin embargo, en este contexto poco propicio para los cambios, el Frente Amplio logró comenzar a instrumentar un Sistema Nacional Integrado de Salud en un contexto de debilidad estatal y fortaleza de los actores colectivos principales (trabajadores, profesionales, empresarios).

La propuesta llevada adelante por el nuevo gobierno pretende modificar los procesos de financiamiento, gestión y atención del sistema, fortaleciendo las capacidades del Estado, buscando articular la acción de los proveedores sanitarios públicos y privados. Una nota particular de la reforma sanitaria es que, a la vez que se fijaban los pilares del nuevo sistema, se formalizaban mecanismos para el involucramiento directo de sus actores principales, incluidos los usuarios.

En esta ponencia se indagará en las condicionantes políticas e institucionales que permitieron evadir los puntos de veto que tradicionalmente bloquearon el sistema. A partir de los hallazgos presentes en la literatura que aborda las reformas de los Estados de Bienestar contemporáneos, es posible inferir que varios factores incidieron en este proceso, entre los que se destacan: el agravamiento de una crisis sostenida del sector, la orientación ideológica del nuevo partido de gobierno, su nexos con las organizaciones sociales promotoras del cambio y, fundamentalmente, el estilo "flexible" para llevar adelante sus iniciativas.

Hemos elegido estudiar los "cambios" que jóvenes y sus familias perciben sobre dos "instituciones" que se tornaron relevantes en el transcurso de una investigación para una tesis de maestría. Analizamos las relaciones y el discurso acerca de los "cambios" que acontecen en torno a la práctica del rugby masculino en Buenos Aires y alrededor del rol de la escuela y la educación, dos "instituciones" relevantes para este grupo social. Nos interesa describir de qué modos se tensan, producen y se nombran las relaciones intergeneracionales entre jóvenes y adultos en sectores de clase media alta y alta en Buenos Aires sobre las transformaciones sociales de las que acusan recibo en su cotidianidad y en sus discursos.

La generación de bienestar a partir de la experiencia de los beneficiarios del programa pensión alimenticia para adultos mayores en el Estado de México

Uno de los temas más importantes que denotan el comienzo del siglo XXI es el aumento gradual y creciente de la población adulta mayor; lo cual representa no solo la modificación de las estructuras demográficas, sino los retos que implica, principalmente para el Estado, generar bienestar en este grupo poblacional.

En este marco se desarrolla el presente análisis, cuyo planteamiento se origina en el estudio de los programas sociales emanados de los aparatos gubernamentales, enfocados a la generación de bienestar, en este caso, sobre un sector específico: los beneficiarios del Programa Pensión

Alimenticia para Adultos Mayores del municipio de Toluca, en el Estado de México.

Se parte de realizar un acercamiento al estudio del bienestar desde la perspectiva de aquellos (gobierno) que señalan generarlo u otorgarlo, y aquellos que lo reciben o lo disfrutan (beneficiarios), sin perder de vista el matiz de la desigualdad social. Este enfoque analítico permite entender lo que el aparato gubernamental denomina como bienestar y por qué lo genera u otorga mediante los programas sociales, al tiempo que explora el bienestar desde la perspectiva de quienes lo reciben o disfrutan, en el contexto específico de los sujetos de estudio. Lo anterior abre el debate para aproximar el estudio a los resultados de los programas sociales ¿Generan bienestar o acentúan las condiciones de desigualdad?

The hardships for the small independent business brought by neo-liberal globalization: The case study of barber shops and beauty salons in Japan

Neo-liberal policy, started from 1980s in Japan, brought abolition of legal protections for hair industry. As a traditional industry, barber shops and beauty salons have been one of the small businesses which target to local market and depend on only their ability as a technician. For these reasons, it is difficult for them to expand their market. They can not increase the productivity by machinery nor get foreign exchange by trade. In short, the industry has no international economic competitive power.

For 40 years until the middle of 1990s, barber shops and beauty salons had been given favorable treatments. They could maintain agreed price and settled business days and hours as a legal cartel, nationally. The tax system applied for them was arranged especially for small companies. One of the reasons for these treatments was that the small business traders like barber and hairdresser had been the sources of votes for the Liberal Democratic Party, the Government party of those days.

However, the Liberal Democratic Party lost office in the middle of 1990s. The legal protections were abolished and new larger capitals (for example IT capital) started to invest in the hair industry. As a result, barber shops have reduced their number and beauty salons have suffered from the price competition caused by large capital.

In conclusion, neo-liberal globalization put a question before them. What is the ground on which they demand political and legal protections? Now, barbers and hairdressers have to reform their jobs as it ought to be.

Mathematical economics in the USSR as an intellectual movement: Theory of optimal functioning socialist economy

Russian economic history in the period of 1960 – 1970 is marked with high dynamism and strong influence of economic approaches on policy-making. Initiated in 1965 Soviet reform of economic management and planning aimed at bringing market measures into Soviet command economy soon met a strong critics from a group of scientists developing a so called theory of 'Optimal Functioning Socialist Economy' (OFCE). Despite confrontations with the representatives of the official discourse and public acceptance on the inconsistencies of the main ideas of the movement it became very influential for the period of the 1970-1980s and soon decayed.

The presentation is summarizing key findings from a research project on historical, social and institutional aspects of the 'collective biographies' of the OFCE group members, forms of their social organization and position within the intellectual landscape of the period. The study is based on the analysis of series of interviews with economists representing different schools and camps as well as investigation of their common background characteristics. Special attention is paid to the influence of OFCE theory on other research schools, forms of economic knowledge and development of the country.

On statistical framing of emerging technologies - A case of nano-technology in Russia

Continual emergence of new technologies has been accepted as one of the pillars of innovation-based economic growth. Their development and dissemination within the different sectors of economy bring together various actors and require elaboration of indicators enabling to follow this evolution and to measure economic, societal, and environmental impacts. Despite the number of statistical data on S&T development available across countries there is lack of knowledge about the evolution and impact of new technologies.

The paper provides a brief overview of the main challenges for measurement of emerging technologies, world practice and national state of the art in developing nanotechnology statistics as well as recent findings from public opinion polls, drawing a different picture of technological growth. While statistical data describes financial flows that allows eliciting key actors of the nanotechnology development process and give information on the direct economic impacts (e.g. in terms of sales, employment in nanotechnology related sectors, etc.), results of the recent public opinion polls summarizing expectations from this rapidly evolving area as well as personal experiences and perception of possible risks.

Bringing these observations into a wider social context it is argued that statistics provides a basic vocabulary for interaction of different expert groups and decision-makers, forcing institutionalization process of nanotechnologies through negotiations on basic definitions, classifications and key indicators actors in the field. The key question then concerns measurability of emerging technologies ante omnia in terms of economics, while taking into account findings from surveys on social aspects of technology development can help policymakers to provide better conditions for wider acceptance and legitimating further regulation of the evolving S&T areas.

Brazil: New developmentalism and environmental conflicts in Latin American

The developmentalist debate returned to the public agenda in Brazil in early 2000. This ideology, conceived from the ideas of the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLAC) was established in the country during the 1950s. In general terms it advocated State intervention in the economy and political nationalism in order to promote industrialization so that Brazil could overcome its subordinate and dependent status in the international division of labor. Today, the so-called New-developmentalism is being discussed by scholars and governmental actors not only as a proposal for theoretical analysis but also as a national project. The Growth Acceleration Program (PAC), assumes, in this configuration, a prominent place. The main projects of PAC are characterized by their grandeur in terms of environmental impacts and the numerous social conflicts that arise from them. The same logic is the basis for projects aimed at the expansion of Brazilian capitalism in neighboring countries in Latin America and in Africa. Target of complaints related to violations of rights by different social movements, especially those formed by traditional peoples, the criticism of these actors are based on questions about the mechanisms by which this development model is implemented and who benefits from it. In this article we intend to analyze the main proposals of regional development policies included within the "new-developmentalists" model, focusing on a project that aimed at constructing a large highway that would run through the territory of the Isiboro Secure National Park (Tipnis) in Bolivia, the focus of protests by Bolivian and Brazilian organizations. The project would cost US$ 415 million, 80% of which would be financed by the Brazil Economic and Social Development Bank (BNDES) and its construction would be carried out by the Brazilian construction company OAS.

The plural morality of forgiveness: Insights from a qualitative interview study of cultural codifications

² Charité Universitätsmedizin Berlin, Department of Psychiatry and Psychotherapy

Forgiveness can be regarded as a fundamental means of societal integration depending on the level of 'common knowledge'. Controlling affective responses after a transgression has multiple functions for conflict resolution, the maintenance of social relationships, for fostering reconciliation and sustaining cooperation as it is taking for granted that forgiveness is an indicator for what is universally considered right or wrong in societal groups.

Given these pronounced interpersonal functions of forgiveness, it is interesting to note that actors' understanding of forgiveness is substantially framed by different cultural discourses and social practices and thus exhibits a pronounced moral and normative stance.

We will present results of a recent study highlighting (1) the reciprocal social constructions of both individual emotional settings and normative discourse in granting or receiving forgiveness as well as (2) the links between emotional and cognitive processes in forgiveness, considering the relevance of 'common knowledge' in the practice of forgiveness towards actors' moral framings. Findings based on in-depth interviews imply that victims of transgressions regulate resulting negative affective and motivational states such as anger, resentment, and sadness by markedly recruiting perspective taking competencies. The willingness to forgive is associated with the cognitive ability of 'understanding' others' actions, a certain level of 'common knowledge', and the capacity of taking wrongdoers' perspective, all of which require reference to general knowledge structures and cultural framings prevalent in a cultural setting.

Consequently, forgiveness can be taken as an example of the interdependency between individual emotion stands and collective normative stands in consideration of different cultural codifications of significant moral, values and norms.

Capitalism without enlightenment: Islamic Calvinism in Turkey

Rise of Islamist politics and social movements since 1980s had coincided with the expansion of Islamic capital in Turkey. Islamic capital contains not only the commodification of religious materials and symbols, but also Islamic type of capitalist relations among capitalists and workers and an Islamic social vision. Islamic capital had generated a transformation in religiosity that is named "Islamic Calvinism" i.e. a rather earthly religious vision suggesting that working hard is a form of service. Associations belonging to the Islamic capital such as MÜSIAD, TUSKON, etc. present themselves as moral entrepreneurs, and they even reject to be named as capitalists for that they perceive the term as "Western" and are uncomfortable with the notion of class struggle. Therefore, patronage is one of the major themes in the employee-employer relation.

Islamic Calvinism indicates that Islam is not an obstacle for free market economy, but the new ideology of it in Turkey. This is parallel with the anti-Enlightenment character of the "postmodern" era, and the outcome is "capitalism without Enlightenment" in Turkey. Elimination of Enlightenment from the hegemonic ideology brings also the elimination of concepts such as class struggle, equality, and welfare state and this creates a safer and more profitable social and economic system for the capitalists.

Políticas de desarrollo social en comunidades de origen de migrantes

La ponencia analiza la relación que existe entre el proceso de migración y las estrategias de vida familiares, para poder entender cómo la articulación de las familias transnacionales o translocales presenta retos para las políticas de desarrollo social en los países de origen. El documento contribuye a los debates sobre migración y desarrollo al continuar un esfuerzo, relativamente reciente, de prestar más atención a las comunidades de origen de la migración, específicamente en áreas urbanas. El trabajo analiza resultados empíricos de un proyecto en marcha (financiado por el Concejo Nacional de Ciencia y Tecnología, iniciado en 2011), con familias que viven en condiciones de pobreza en la ciudad de Monterrey, Nuevo León, México. Se utilizaron métodos cualitativos, llevando a cabo trabajo de campo etnográfico, así como entrevistas en profundidad con distintos miembros de familias en zonas marginadas. A grandes rasgos, los resultados muestran cómo las estrategias de vida familiares implican distintas combinaciones de recursos económicos (provenientes del trabajo, la migración y las transferencias condicionadas); humanos (en términos de la educación formal e informal) y sociales (derivados de la pertenencia a redes y grupos). En este sentido, entender el manejo de estos activos e integrarlo al diseño de la política social ayudaría a mejorar la incidencia positiva que ésta puede tener en la calidad de vida de los hogares, especialmente de los migrantes, disminuyendo por tanto la desigualdad y generando un sistema social más justo.

Más allá del IWA 4: Los intentos de racionalizar el gobierno desde una perspectiva local

En los últimos decenios se ha intentado racionalizar la vida a través de estándares técnicos que ayuden a conseguir una eficacia en los procesos productivos fundamentales, que se han ido aprobando a través de normas ISO en miles de campos. No era fácil pensar que llegaríamos a plantearnos también normas semejantes en campos sociales como la eficacia de los gobiernos locales, pero el sueño ha acabado realizándose.

La reciente aparición del IWA 4 y su evolución durante los últimos cinco años hasta estar traducidas sus propuestas oficialmente por ISO en 9 idiomas. Las experiencias positivas realizadas en numerosos países y las propuestas de transformar esta norma sobre gobiernos locales confiables en un estándar de la norma ISO 9.000 similar a las que se han propuesto para planteamientos puramente técnicos supone un hito y un desafío.

Trataremos de explicar la generación del IWA 4 y su evolución hasta nuestros días con algunas consecuencias sociales que supone su aplicación en el campo del gobierno democrático con un enfoque especialmente rico desde lo local. Se trata ahora de ver, con la experiencia acumulada, como es posible avanzar en una estandarización del gobierno que supere la calidad de los sistemas de gobiernos actualmente en uso en una estrategia global desde lo local. El ciudadano se enfrenta especialmente con problemas a nivel local, pero también estatal y supraestatal, y debe ser consciente de la necesidad de una arquitectura de calidad del gobierno para conseguir una sociedad justa y eficiente.

La puesta en práctica de este proceso de desarrollo social se está ya planteando a través de propuestas cooperativas donde las nuevas tecnologías están teniendo un papel especialmente importante, al permitir a los ciudadanos una intervención fácil, evitándose las dificultades de la intermediación de agencias asesoras que manipulen los resultados en función de los intereses.

Hipótesis sobre hacer ciudad, una mirada a través del indoamericano

A partir de los numerosos conflictos por la tenencia de tierras y falta de acceso a soluciones habitacionales dignas que tuvieron un gran hito en la toma del Parque Indoamericano en diciembre de 2010 y que han seguido sucediéndose en todo este año 2011 tanto en Buenos Aires como en otros lugares de Argentina, nos interrogamos en este trabajo sobre los modos de producción de ciudad, los de arriba y los de abajo, sobre las formas de hacer la ciudad que se ven contrapuestas, contradichas y desbordadas por los acontecimientos de la realidad.

Tomamos el conflicto del Parque Indoamericano como fragmento, caso y situación. Una mínima célula de realidad contemplada que equilibra con su propio peso al resto de la ciudad: no como un hecho excepcional sino en la medida en que permite apreciar una complejidad de niveles y dinámicas que convergen hoy en esas otras formas ambiguas y difusas del (hacer) ciudad. No intentamos explicar el Indoamericano a partir de un análisis abstracto y totalizante de la ciudad sino que, al revés, nos proponemos pensarla a partir de referirla inmediatamente a estas singularidades, y a las tendencias y luchas sociales que la constituyen. ¿Cuáles son las particularidades que el conflicto de la toma del Parque Indoamericano desató en la ciudad de Buenos Aires? ¿cómo releerlas?

A nuestro juicio en este hecho se jugaron buena parte de las formas de transformación urbana de la ciudad complejizadas en varios planos superpuestos (toma, vivienda, trabajo, racismo, derechos, necesidades, espacio público, subsidios, prosperidad, consumo...etc). Deshilachar desde una mirada micropolítica del acontecimiento la comprensión de lo que ocurrió en ese episodio, resume las principales hipótesis para una reflexión sobre las formas de hacer ciudad contemporánea, acerca de las lógicas y formas de producción que tienen al mercado inmobiliario, formal e informal, como principal agente.

The uniqueness of solidarity entrepreneurship in the fight against social exclusion

The paper aims to bring evidence that the solidarity economic undertakings, based on voluntary association, productive cooperation and self-management, employ a singular rationality, different from the capitalistic one. Due to this, the solidarity economy can be considered an alternative to generate income, face poverty and break the social logic of inequalities, since it promotes the protagonism of the poor, needed by political interventions in this field to achieve efficiency and generate decent work. The paper discusses this subject by analyzing evidences brought up by qualitative researches and by the final data of the first Brazilian national mapping of Solidarity Economy. Comparing the general characteristics of Brazilian companies registered in the national statistics with the solidarity economy enterprises, certain singularities stand up, such as the tendency of the solidarity enterprises to protect jobs and hold equalitarian principles regarding income and benefits arising from their economic activities. Despite their weaknesses and limitations, these experiences reveal the existence of a particular associative kind of entrepreneurship, guided simultaneously by economic and social objectives. This provides convincing empirical arguments as to adopt a specific approach about the entrepreneurship in the context of the solidarity economy and, under certain aspects, in the broader context of the small enterprises. The paper underlines that the role played by self-management and cooperation must be considered, as it leads to an alternative model, contrasting from the conventional patterns in terms of understanding and fulfilling the needs of the popular economy and its capacity to generate income and welfare.

Forjar un oficio: Cómo se formó la profesionalización en educación física en la Argentina

Si se tuviese que datar cuando nace en Argentina la Educación Física como tal, podría establecerse que es el 9 de Marzo de 1903, con las palabras que Enrique Romero Brest, Inspector del área, le dirige a Juan Ramón Fernández, Ministro de Justicia e Instrucción Pública: "solo me resta pedir al señor Ministro me permita proponer que en el programa de las Escuelas Normales figure esta materia con el nombre de 'Educación física', nombre más apropiado a la clase de estudios que comporta en estas Escuelas. Se trata en ellas de algo más que los simples Ejercicios físicos, desde el momento en que no solo se actúa sobre el individuo como organismo físico sino también como ser psíquico y moral y pues que se emprenden estudios extendidos de fisiología e higiene, lo que comprende algo más que la simple expresión 'Ejercicios físicos'".

Además del sentido político y propositivo de estas palabras, cabe destacar el contexto del pedido: resulta significativo que la primera vez que se explicita la intención de sistematizar el conjunto de prácticas educativas bajo la denominación "Educación Física" sea para el ámbito de la formación profesional, carta que se produce en el marco de la redacción del Programa para los "Cursos Normales de Educación Física", uno de los pioneros esfuerzos estatales para la profesionalización de la disciplina.

Partiendo de afirmar que la disciplina nace como tal recién cuando puede reproducirse, y que son sus efectos los que la configuran y dan forma, la presente intervención esgrime como tesis que puede pensarse una historia de la Educación Física a raíz de que se forjó un oficio, se instaló una práctica y se generó un habitus; tres procesos que presentan sus particularidades pero que, a la luz de los estudios socio-filosóficos de Pierre Bourdieu, pueden ser pensados de manera imbricada.

We are the last ones here... The experience of growing old in gentrifying post-socialist urban environment?

Gentrification might be analyzed through the processes of the displacement of specific groups of lower economic and political power. However, it might also be studied as a process of cultural change and the establishment of cultural hegemonies and dominances, as a multidimensional cultural practice (Zukin 1987). Especially in the post-socialist city, the concept of gentrification is tightly bound with the transformation of the meaning of the inner city and other urban areas, especially when the structure of housing was one of the main path-dependencies of the previous communist era, which shaped population distribution in cities by specific forms of central distribution.

The paper is based on the "Ageing in the environment: regeneration, gentrification and social exclusion as new issues in environmental gerontology (2010 – 2012)" research project realized in three biggest cities in the Czech Republic: Prague, Ostrava and Brno. In the qualitative part of our research we focused on the perceptions of the neighbourhood changes by the inner city inhabitants over 60 (individual in-depth interviews and focus groups), and on their experience of growing old in different parts of the city centres, while in the quantitative follow-up surveys we aimed to grasp the perception of urban change in more comparative way to be able to differentiate between certain groups of elderly dwellers. One of the main issues emerging from the results is disparity between feelings of growing otherness of the living environment ("the city is not ours") with persisting willingness to "stay put" expressed in individual life strategies. The concluding discussion raises question whether and how different forms of regeneration of the cities create risks (symbolic) exclusion of older people and how these are heterogeneously incorporated into older people narratives. The key issues of autonomy, in/security, in/stability and experience of fear of displacement are discussed.

Three actors and engagements on the outskirts of Sao Paulo

It points out the political actions of these actors vis-à-vis the trajectories, experiences, social relations, networks of interaction with local institutions and state, and the cultural dimensions involved. The literature of the displacements of the peripheries in the various spheres of life has discussed a context in which various organizations and people began to dispute the young, but also the family, with the crime. It is precisely in this context that has been emerging various types of engagements, grammars, codes and moralities that integrate political actions to "solve" violence. Of those who attempt to secure rights from ideals of social justice and solidarity anchored in Liberation Theology, and links with social movements and the Partido dos Trabalhadores (PT). On 17 September 2007, 143 nations voted in support of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. However, Australia was one of four nations who did not initially endorse the declaration while subsequently adopting and endorsing the Declaration in April 2009. While this appeared to be a shift in policy, the continued support for the NT Intervention by the current Government seems in stark contrast with the rights of Indigenous peoples and is more reflective of the history of Indigenous peoples in colonial settler societies such as Australia. This paper explores the tensions and contradictions inherent within policies on Indigenous rights, as well as the securitization of contemporary debates on immigration and multiculturalism and the ways in which public debate on policy is framed by media and political discourse.

Prácticas religiosas extrainstitucionales en la cotidianidad urbana

El trabajo se propone indagar sobre las prácticas religiosas extrainstitucionales en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. Abordar la presencia de altares e imágenes religiosas en espacios públicos porteños - ya sea en su instalación, gerenciamiento, actividades que allí se desenvuelven, regulaciones sociales, eclesiales y estatales, etc.- nos permite reflexionar por un lado, sobre la manera en que la religión es experimentada en la vida cotidiana, y cómo se facilita la práctica y las devociones extra-institucionales, ya sean dirigidas a símbolos religiosos reconocidos por la Iglesia (cuya presencia es dominante) como a figuras de la llamada religiosidad popular. Por otro lado, la apropiación y producción social del territorio dan cuenta de entramados de poder y una concepción diferencial y cambiante del espacio público/privado, sagrado/profano.

Scales of community and solidarity in the global age: Le role of collective activism in shaping identities among (national minority) youth

This paper seeks to reassert the role that others play in youth identity construction, by focusing on collective political experience.

Much research attention has been directed recently to the individualization of identity construction processes. This stems both from theoretical standpoints (defining identity as a reflective and subjective construction) and from an undeniable explosion in the varieties and multiplicity of identities among youth.

However, this focus on singularity overshadows the crucial role that others play in this reflexive construction; yet, the identity process is fundamentally interactive (most notably in the form of identity ascription, identity strategies, or the circulation of imagery and social representations of identity groups). Drawing on over 20 in-depth qualitative interviews with politically active youth in Quebec (a French-language national minority) engaged in global issues, this paper explores two dimensions of the interplay between collective experience and identity construction.

Firstly, identity seems best defined as a sense of belonging to one or a small set of collective entities (which the individual deems important and characteristic of whom he/she is). Such entities may be of different types and scales, but they are all made of people who share some form of meaningful attributes or traits (cultural codes, practices, mentality, history, language, etc.). Hence, identity seems deeply intertwined with sense of community and, perhaps, solidarity. We will thus explore how different scales of collective belonging are articulated together in the discourse of young global activists who are part of a strong nationalistic minority group.

Secondly, by distinguishing four overlapping modes of activism among youth today, we will show how the two more collective forms of activism (organisational/institutionalised; underground/subcultural) shape senses of collective belonging differently and more concretely than the two more solitary modes of activism (expressive/artistic; personal practices), which tend to sustain more singular identities and abstract senses of solidarity.

Transnational youth subcultures as pathways to cosmopolitan openness

Recent international values surveys point toward a gradual transnational harmonization of core values among youth. Indeed, Beck and Beck-Gernsheim argue that sociologists may very well be witnessing the rise of a cosmopolitan generation who are co-developing and able to share common symbols and consciousness. For Delanty, "cosmopolitan imagination occurs when new relations between self, other and world develop in moments of openness".

However, global youth is not "a single, universal generation" (Beck and Beck-Gernsheim). National contexts still play important roles in shaping the daily lives of most people (Brett and Moran), and there is much variety within youth of the same nation. Cosmopolitan attitudes may also coexist alongside various other allegiances, including national ones (Skrbiš and Woodward). Thus, not all youth are becoming cosmopolitan and those who do may navigate a variety of paths. In this paper, we shall explore if and how adherence to youth subcultures may be such a path toward becoming cosmopolitan.

Although they stress specific in-group commonalities and out-group boundaries, subcultures might be an interesting path toward cosmopolitanism for several reasons. They often rest upon transnational communities. Within these, the contents of common identification and the shared subcultural imaginaries are not ethnocultural or nation-based. Thus, there exists national variations within subcultures: despite obvious similarities, a punk anarchist might be different in Japan than in America or France. This ethnocultural diversity within the range of a common ideological or subcultural community could bring these youth to embrace ethnocultural diversity.

This exploration of how subcultures shape transnational senses of belonging will draw from three qualitative empirical studies: one explores identity among young global activists from a strong nationalistic minority; another documents the articulation of local and global influences in the cultural consumption practices of youth; and the third explores how trust is built within the transnational couch-surfing community.

The Brazilian trade unionism during Lula administration

The Brazilian trade union movement has been experiencing a process of reconfiguration since the rise of the Workers Party (PT) to the federal administration. This process is caused by several factors, which this communication is going to analyze. First, we must consider the discontent of some trade union currents with the PT government policies, especially in its first term: indeed, while maintaining the key elements of macroeconomic policy of Fernando Henrique Cardoso's administration, Lula has promoted and/or tried to implement a series of reforms that have reduced or threatened to reduce labor rights. One of them, the pension reform, held in 2003, led to the withdrawal of rights of public servants, heavily unionized sector and with great integration with the Unified Workers Central (CUT), the largest and most long-lived Brazilian union federation, triggering a process of fission and promoting the creation of new organizations: the National Coordination of Struggles (Conlutas) in 2004 and Intersindical in 2006. Second, we must highlight the strategies adopted by the Lula administration to involve the trade union movement with its political platform: tripartite bodies have been created (the Council of Economic and Social Development (CDES) and the National Labor Forum (FNT) to discuss the pension reform, tax, labor and trade union in an attempt to build consensus around the most controversial issues and to minimize a possible reaction of workers to policies to be adopted. Finally, as part of Lula's administration strategies to the union movement, we must recognize the role of legislation that established the funding and recognition of unions, which led to a further rupture inside CUT, with the creation of the Central Workers of Brazil (CTB).

Conciliación vida laboral y vida familiar en mujeres obreras de cali, Colombia

En esta ponencia se indaga sobre los modos de articulación de las dos formas de trabajo femenino: el trabajo productivo y el trabajo reproductivo, realizado en este caso, por mujeres obreras vinculadas a una fábrica de la ciudad de Cali en Colombia, entendiéndose la Conciliación de la Vida Laboral y Familiar como los arreglos sociales y estrategias que, generalmente, despliegan aquellas mujeres que se enfrentan a la doble presencia, es decir, a la labores dentro de la fábrica junto con las actividades propias del espacio doméstico, para compatibilizar las responsabilidades laborales y familiares.

Este estudio sirve para demostrar que la familia se organiza alrededor de una división de responsabilidades que nacen de la necesidad de las mujeres por mantener en armonía aquella relación vida laboral-familiar, y que son asumidas entre la pareja o entre los miembros adultos del hogar, pero que sin embargo, sobre la mujer recae gran parte de la responsabilidad del trabajo reproductivo puesto que deben dedicar buena parte de su tiempo y esfuerzo al cuidado de la familia, lo que permite observar cómo se enfrenta esta problemática en las relaciones de género. Es un supuesto que dentro del hogar existe alguien dedicado exclusivamente al trabajo reproductivo, es por esto que las mujeres toman la iniciativa para llegar a acuerdos.

La descripción y análisis de las formas de conciliar vida laboral y familiar de seis mujeres con la particular característica que impone su condición de obreras, y algunas modificaciones en las formas de conciliación y en sus estilos de vida a partir de la inserción en la fábrica, son los aspectos que se desarrollan en el texto tras un trabajo de campo de orden cualitativo en el que se desarrollaron entrevistas a profundidad y observación en los hogares.

Perspectives from the South: Documenting home to break and to build stereotypes

Most theories dealing with the cultural and ideological functioning of photography understand the photographic eye as a process of social construction of reality by an individual. The photographer usually belongs to a socially superior class to the one portrayed, this 'other' that ends up being an object in this representation. Trying to reverse this logic of power relationship, two groups of photographers from different parts of the Global South (Brazil and Bangladesh) are questioning the representations 'others' make of them, bringing new perspectives to the traditional ones that put "we" and "them" on opposite sides. Representing "themselves" as a way to participate visually and politically in contemporary society, these two groups of militants' photographers show us new ways to expose and to challenge how power operates, with stereotypes, in social relations. They also point an important contemporary space of resistance: culture, presented by its members, visually and virtually. Reflecting on the images they produce, we could dislocate the traditional bipolar fields of reflection to another one in which we are both 'others', building relationships, narratives and representations in a field of tension where multiple representations are presented and powerfully communicate to each other. In this set of representations, the everyday life appears as an alternative to the spectacle of extraordinary events, and culture to violence. As they present their perspectives, they teach us not only about power relationships, stereotypes and how to question them, but also about new ways of producing shared and visual sociological knowledge.

Photo-documentation and political participation: The role of photographic self-representation in Brazil and Bangladesh

This communication aims to analyse the work of two groups of photographers that build their discourses (words and images) to change the negative image people have of them. The first one, a Brazilian group of photographers from Rio's favelas, try to deal with a process of criminalization of poverty that exists in the Brazilian society, and that causes a series of interventions of the State, through the police, in their neighbourhood. These conflicts generate various types of violence: symbolic, physical and lethal. The second one, a Bangladeshi group based in a middle class neighbourhood in Dhaka, is concerned about the image the "Western World" has about them. The image of poor and hungry victims of the natural tragedies got even worst after the 9/11, when they also came to be seen also as potential Muslim terrorists. How these photographers react through photos to these troublesome representations (whether an ethnicity, a religion or a social class) is the subject of this discussion. Through a cross-cultural comparison, I will analyse some of their photographs combined with other types of data collected during different qualitative empirical studies undertaken with both groups. Therefore, I will reflect on how these photographers are using these subject feelings of deprivation, injustice and exclusion to build new forms of protests, contentions and organize themselves to change the perception 'others' have about them and their insertion in the world (in a local or a global perspective). Preserving their peculiarities, I will reflect on how negative (re) presentations one makes about 'others' can produce a single unit around questions, such as identities, representations, selfness and otherness. I will also analyse how this is been used as a tool of protest or even a movement to fight for justice and (social) inclusion.

Bourdieu y lo simbólico: Mecanismos de (re)producción de la dominación y la posibilidad de su subversión

Este trabajo indaga la concepción del plano simbólico desarrollada por Pierre Bourdieu, en la cual es dable hallar una fuerte impronta de la dimensión subjetiva, del modo diferencial en que distintos actores perciben y aprecian al mundo social. Esto marca una clara diferencia para con las conceptualizaciones de raíz post-lacaniana de lo simbólico, tal como la que puede hallarse en la perspectiva de Ernesto Laclau, la cual no da lugar a ese interrogante por las categorías subjetivas de (di)visión de lo social.

Sobre este trasfondo, puede percibirse la potencialidad de la concepción bourdieuana de la "dominación simbólica", y del poder a ella ligada; concepción que se enraíza en una reapropiación del modo en que Weber tematiza la "legitimidad", especialmente en lo atinente al "reconocimiento" que ella entraña y a la probabilidad de encontrar obediencia que así se genera. Sin embargo, la dominación simbólica no sólo implica esta dimensión de reconocimiento, por parte de los agentes sociales, de una específica capacidad (de producir un discurso, de ser "distinguido", etcétera), también se asienta en el "desconocimiento" de los mecanismos sociales por los que esa capacidad, y los capitales a ella ligada, están desigualmente distribuidos en el espacio social. Desconocimiento que permite que esa desigualdad sea experimentada como "natural" (como propia de una "segunda naturaleza") por tales agentes. Problemática, esta última, que implica una singular relectura de la concepción marxiana de la "ideología".

En este sentido, nos interesará dar cuenta de cómo la concepción bourdieuana de la dominación simbólica se construye "con" elementos propios de estas dos teorías clásicas, pero sin descuidar como, esa misma operación, entraña elaborarla "contra" parte de lo planteado por tales autores. Pues es sólo en ese marco que puede indagarse el modo de dar lugar a una "subversión simbólica" de los mecanismos que (re)producen dicha dominación.

Para una teoría crítica reflexiva. Una práctica de lectura de la dialéctica negativa de Th. W. Adorno a partir de la sociología reflexiva de P. Bourdieu

Este trabajo aborda la perspectiva crítica desarrollada por Th. W. Adorno, haciendo un especial énfasis en su concepción de una dialéctica "abierta" y en "la primacía del objeto" que él sitúa entre los fundamentos de su propuesta teórica. Ambos elementos nos permitirán discutir con los "Estudios Culturales" –predominantes en el escenario actual de la sociología de la cultura argentina y, en cierta medida, también latinoamericana–, los cuales tienen uno de sus presupuestos básicos en la dispersión de lo social cuyos fragmentos son estudiados sin dar cuenta de su mediación por el conjunto del entramado relacional en el que ellos se encuentran implicados; diluyéndose así la dimensión crítico-política de tales "estudios".

Sin embargo, esto no implica retomar sin más la perspectiva adorniana, pues en ella puede detectarse una tendencia a restringir la potencialidad de un agrietamiento de la lógica dominante a aquellos materiales propios de la "alta cultura" occidental o, para decirlo con Pierre Bourdieu, propios de la lógica "escolástica" (lo cual incluye a la propia práctica de la teoría crítica). Frente a ello, planteamos la importancia de una crítica capaz de volverse reflexivamente sobre sí misma y sobre los condicionamientos que entraña su condición escolástica, como un paso hacia la captación de las potencialidades (no meramente reproductivas) contenidas en otro tipo de materiales culturales, ajenos a los cánones occidentales, de la "alta cultura", o a ambos a la vez.

En definitiva, se indaga la posibilidad de un des-centramiento de la perspectiva crítica de la Alemania de las primeras décadas del siglo XX. Para ello retomaremos, entonces, algunas de las reflexiones bourdieuanas sobre el "centramiento" del punto de vista escolástico; en tanto es en ellas (antes que en los trabajos de Habermas o Honneth) donde encontramos la preocupación por ilustrar (reflexivamente) a la ilustración acerca de sí misma.

Artistas y gestores culturales. Conocimiento para el desarrollo social Inhibition of art and culture as a key aspect of social and professional development is a challenge that requires investigating how to articulate the cultural management knowledge for the realization of cultural and artistic projects.

In 2002, Hector Schargorodsky, Cultural Observatory, Faculty of Economics at the University of Buenos Aires, upon the request of UNESCO, a study of cultural profiles professionals in the region. Variations between countries in Latin America, which have incorporated cultural management for their area of professional development, are sensitive in differ on the type of skills to be developed by the manager or promoter of culture, it also recognizes the need to strengthen the links between training institutions and cultural industries that produce goods and services, but particularly emphasizes

"Ultimately, we are on the way towards the professionalization of management in the cultural sector in this transition, the contribution of the university system should become one of the most important factors. Not only in terms of training, but also in the production of information through research. (Schargorodsky, H., 2003: 10)

On the other hand, in Mexico during the 80's, was established by government initiative the first cultural training program from the Ministry of Public Education (SEP) by the Department of Culture and the Directorate General of Cultural Promoters, known as Plan Cultural Activities to Support

Primary Education (PACAEP), aimed at teachers of primary level, but at the insistence of cultural promoters outside the SEP was created alongside the Education and Training Program of Cultural Promoters (Brambila, B., 2011). Thus, it is noteworthy that in Mexico during the past 30 years, the government's dialogue with universities, civic associations and social networks have shaped the conceptual and methodological cultural management "from an academic point of view and not just activist" (Galindo, J., 2011: 24).

Critical Marxism in Mexico

One of the limitations of the actual Marxist discussion is the fact that the ethnocentrism of the industrial, military and political dominant countries and its inhabitants exists even in this branch of contemporary thinking with great force. But the discussion about a new critical Marxist theory only can be realised successfully, if it is developed in an international way. For this reason it is necessary to know about the theoretical production of Marxist in the so-called third world.

In our paper we present the two most important critical Marxists of the contemporary Mexico: the philosophers Adolfo Sánchez Vázquez and Bolívar Echeverría; both former professors at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, UNAM. Based on a reflection about their historical and theoretical background, we'll expose some central philosophical concepts of each one: the concept of praxis in Sánchez Vázquez and the concept of historical ethos in Bolívar Echeverría. Sánchez Vázquez is one of the first Marxists in Latin America who breaks with the dogmatic interpretation of the works of Karl Marx. The central concept to realize this rupture is the one of praxis which he develops in an authentic way. Bolívar Echeverría tries to overcome the eurocentrism in the latinamerican left with the distinction between different forms of (capitalist) modernities and their different historical ethe.

Finally we'll make a theoretical confrontation of these concepts and the two intellectuals generations in Mexico and Latin America which are represented by Sánchez Vázquez and Echeverría: the anti-fascist generation of 1936, exiled from Spain in Mexico and the generation of "1968".

Negotiations : A case where intellectuals invested with and by labor activists

This communication proposes to explore which intellectuals invest with and by labor activists about a particular and contemporary theme of management, object of various practices and representations : collective bargaining. To produce and conduct union training on negotiation, activists call and use works of intellectuals. After the Second War, particularly in United States, a current of sociology develops games theory to treat collective bargaining in industrial relations. Progressively, intellectuals develop models and suggest one best way to conduct negotiation : negotiation "win win", presented as creator of social link between labor activists and employers in charge of negotiation. Models are diffused in Business Schools, Schools or Institutes of Management, but also in union trainings. In France, models are imported by Canadian and French sociologists and took up by consulting firms. More, some unions, in particular the CFDT [Confédération Française Démocratique du Travail], try to export these models of collective bargaining practices in developing countries (notably in Mexico). Who is invested by unions and why ? How do knowledges circulate between US and France, then between France and countries of South ? From interviews, research on archives and observations of union trainings, this proposal restitutes trajectories and careers of intellectuals invest with and by few unions to understand how references on such and such intellectual can impact union representations. With an historical approach of trainings and representations of collective bargaining in France and in developing countries since the 1980's, we show that even if linkages between intellectuals and workers aren't claimed, intellectual works impact representations and practices of union activists.

Cultural policy and creative industries: The info-communication network industry

Nowadays digital technology is part of our everyday life. The info-communication network industry becomes a fact of life for civil society worldwide, involving many actors – politicians, newspapers, broadcasters, activists, non-governmental organisations, info-communication firms, software providers and political parties. The info-communication network industry has transformed the online newspaper and online broadcasting experience. Instead of having content trapped on static print pages and on traditional television channel that are updated daily, the online edition can offer timely breaking news much like a online television or radio news show, and like online television, provide online video access to important news events and newsmakers. This raises obvious questions for the role of the newspapers, the television and the radio in the recent cultural and economic crisis. As the info-communication network industry gets more complex and chaotic, regular citizens/users/consumers are gaining access to digital entertainment, information and education anywhere and at anytime.

This paper examines and analyses the digital content production, the structure of the info-communication network industry and the role of digital content management in the information and knowledge society. Moreover, it analyses the crisis in the cultural policy together with the recent crisis in the creative industries. Finally, it strongly recommends that the info-communication network industry is likely to be the main digital platform for producing and disseminating the digital content in the free market economy.

The global info-cash (GIC) as practical way for Europe to emerge of the cultural and economic crises

Digital technology has changed the traditional way in which we communicate, express our ideas, understand freedom and make transactions in our everyday life. In 2011, more than 50 per cent of the world's population had access to some combination of mobile phones, the Internet users are about two billion. The broadband subscribers are more than 100 million and the majority of transactions are digital in the global free market economy. The cultural and economic crisis is an opportunity, not a barrier, in that it provides the European countries with a platform from which distinctive solutions can emanate. European political and economic cultures should be reformed due to recent monetary crisis in order Europe to be an active player in the info-communication globalisation. This paper examines and analyses the role of the info-communication globalisation in recent cultural and economic crisis. It introduces the digital form of currency and the cultural economy as analytical 'tools' to examine the European crisis. Moreover, it analyses the European crisis together with the recent crisis in the USA. Finally, it strongly recommends that a practical way for Europe and the USA to emerge from the recent cultural and economic crisis is: to switch off the physical form of the Euro and dollar currencies, i.e. the cash payments using different currencies such as the Euro and the Dollar and switch on the digital form of single currency the Global Info-Cash (GIG), i.e. the info-cash payment using the digital subdivision of the Global Info-Cash, such as Info-CashGR and Info-CashUSA.

Health, risk and internet

Over the last twenty years, the world has witnessed an intense technological transformation that, among other consequences, has provided enormous growth in access to information. The volume of information available is becoming greater, and access to it is increasingly easy and fast (Giddens, 2002). There is a profound connection between that and the present times, that authors like Giddens and Beck call "late modernity", a period of uncertainty, instability, unpredictability and general skepticism that has the Internet as an icon, or even epitome. This extraordinary scientific progress, especially the advent of information and communication technologies, particularly the internet, acts as part of the structural dimension of the "risk society" and "late modernity", at the same time trigger and maintainer. There's a tendency of questioning traditional institutions and expert systems, including those related to science and health/medicine. Contrary to what was expected, open access to scientific information brought, instead of more confidence, questioning and doubt, a paradox between disillusion and dependence of medicine and health professionals. For these reasons, more and more people are accessing the internet to obtain information regarding their own health conditions or those of a relative. These are individuals who seek information on diagnoses, diseases, symptoms, medications and costs of hospitalization and treatment. All these informations, and much more, can be found on the countless websites covering topics that are connected with healthcare. This prominence can be explained insofar as healthcare has, over recent years, has acquired a paramount value. A qualitative study with semi structured interviews was performed to observe the impact of this phenomenon on the illness experience of chronic patients. Important questions related to physician patient relationship and the medical consultation gained prominence. The Internet may be an excellent tool for health education, but at the same time may deepen the medicalization of society.

Internet as a tool for health promotion projects

The development of individual and social skills, in the sense of acquiring greater control and produce Empowerment, is considered a very important strategy for Health Promotion. Access to information is one of the bases for such process. Over recent years, the world has witnessed a wide-ranging technological transformation that has substantially expanded the access to information, especially through the internet and much has been said and written in the last two decades about its immense potential. Several studies point it as a special tool to obtain information and develop skills, both individual and communal. Based on national (Brazilian) and international scientific literature on Health Promotion, Health Information on the Internet and Digital Divide, this paper aims to discuss the possibilities of using the Internet as a resource on Health Promotion projects in Brazil. For that, we highlight strength points and potential barriers, especially the digital divide. The authors believe that the Internet may be a great ally in building projects for Health Promotion, however, in developing these projects is essential to consider potential risks, such as a reinforcement of the discourses of (medical) professionalism and the hegemonic medical model (biomedicine) and an increase of social control through health care, among others. It's also fundamental to understand that the strategies and programs in health promotion area must be adapted to the needs and possibilities of each site and take into account social, cultural and economic differences.

La violencia contra las mujeres un asunto público en Colombia: Una descripción de la acción estatal

Esta ponencia presenta los resultados de una investigación empírica que se pregunta por cómo la violencia contra las mujeres se ha construido como un asunto público en Colombia, desde la aprobación de la Convención Interamericana para prevenir, sancionar y erradicar la violencia contra la mujer en el año de 1995 hasta el año 2010. Entendiendo por asunto público aquello concerniente a la esfera de la acción estatal, se interpretó como referentes empíricos la normatividad jurídica y las formulaciones de políticas públicas encaminadas a legislar e intervenir sobre este tipo de violencia. Es así, como a partir de fuentes documentales (Leyes, decretos, autos, y políticas públicas) se llevo a cabo la construcción cronológica del proceso en el que la violencia contra las mujeres se consolida en un asunto público en Colombia y posteriormente se interpretó este proceso identificando tanto las etapas como las continuidades y discontinuidades. Se ejecutó la investigación desde una perspectiva constructivista e histórica desde los planteamientos de la Sociología jurídica y las teorías de género.

Se concluyó, que en Colombia la violencia contra las mujeres ha sido un asunto público pero de diferentes maneras. Primero, se entendió la violencia contra las mujeres en asunto público como un compromiso estatal; posteriormente, se especificó la manera en que el Estado comprendió el compromiso, adelantando acciones con respecto a la violencia intrafamiliar y sexual; y por último, se introdujo a manera de generar un nuevo derecho. Etapas interrelacionadas, que se conciben como partes de un proceso de larga duración y contextos que posibilitan acciones posteriores. Esta reconstrucción sociológica permitió describir cómo el Estado interpreta un asunto y cómo éste al intervenir en un asunto antes de la esfera privada reconfigura sus formas de intervención.

El sector nuclear Argentino en la década de 1990

A comienzos de la década de 1980 el sector nuclear argentino inició una serie de procesos de retracción que implicaron una drástica reducción presupuestaria para la Comisión Nacional de Energía Atómica (CNEA) y la cancelación de proyectos en marcha, tales como el de enriquecimiento de uranio y la construcción de la central nuclear Atucha II. Dichos procesos se asociaron tanto con la firma de tratados internacionales de no-proliferación como con la crisis económica nacional y el incremento de la oferta energética termoeléctrica convencional.

En los años '90 la tendencia iniciada en la década anterior se profundizó, a partir de una reforma tendiente a la descentralización del sector que implicó la transferencia de la administración de las centrales nucleares a la empresa estatal Nucleoeléctrica Sociedad Anónima (NASA) en vistas a su posterior privatización y la creación de la Autoridad Regulatoria Nuclear (ARN) con el objeto de controlar y fiscalizar las actividades nucleares en el país.

El objetivo del presente trabajo es reconstruir los procesos de transformación del sector nuclear argentino en la década de 1990. Con tal objeto se analiza, en primer lugar, el marco legal que posibilitó dichos procesos. En segundo lugar, se estudia la relación de los mismos con las políticas científico-tecnológicas implementadas por el Estado nacional durante el período. Por último, se indaga la reconfiguración de los diferentes actores del sector y sus estrategias de adaptación al nuevo escenario.

Enfoques teóricos y metodológicos para el estudio de la acción colectiva en el resurgimiento de los movimientos sociales en Chile: El aporte de la sociología analítica

Desde un enfoque normativo, la acción colectiva que viabiliza movimientos sociales es muy relevante porque promueve la justicia social y económica. Por ello, es importante profundizar en el plano positivo, en el caso de Chile, el conocimiento sobre las condiciones que favorecen su desarrollo. En este sentido, en la ponencia presentamos aportes teóricos y metodológicos provenientes desde la sociología analítica, útiles para el estudio de la acción colectiva en el resurgimiento de los movimientos sociales en Chile. Para este fin, en primer lugar, enunciamos el problema fundamental desde el cual explicar la acción colectiva: cómo surge a partir de la cooperación de los actores, quienes cooperarán con otros considerando sus motivaciones en contextos de interacción estratégica y además, considerando que el resultado de la acción colectiva es un bien público. En segundo lugar, caracterizamos los enfoques teóricos y metodológicos disponibles desde la sociología analítica para formular explicaciones del problema señalado. En este marco, presentamos el elemento central del enfoque de la sociología analítica para el estudio de la acción colectiva: análisis de las transiciones macro-micro-macro desde la explicación causal intencional a través de mecanismos sociales. A partir de lo anterior, como enfoques teóricos analizamos la teoría de juegos, la teoría de redes sociales, las tipologías sobre el pluralismo motivacional y el enfoque sobre las heurísticas y el framing que permiten analizar la lógica de la situación. Como enfoques metodológicos revisamos las narrativas analíticas, el análisis de redes sociales, los experimentos de laboratorio y la simulación social basada en agentes. En tercer lugar, ilustramos cómo los enfoques metodológicos han sido utilizados para analizar casos de acción colectiva a partir de los enfoques teóricos señalados. Finalmente, identificamos líneas de investigación desde los enfoques expuestos, útiles para delinear un programa de investigación para estudiar casos de nuevas expresiones de acción colectiva en Chile.

Ageing in the countryside and the need of public policies of social security as means to implement the rights of elderly rural workers in Brazil

In the contemporary society, the rural labor is still essential for the maintenance of the economy. However public policies still favor large scale and exporting agriculture, and landed estates, while smallholdings, focused on the domestic supply, are facing difficulties. In this context, the rural workers, already rejected over the time of working activity, is still more abandoned when they cannot produce or be inserted economically in the system. Such situation coincides, mostly, with a phase of marked ageing, characterized by physical, psychic and social changes including the transition to non-working, prejudice and abandonment of a generation who contributed so much for the development of the society.

Historically, rural elderly people were treated with contempt by the legislation and nowadays they are still considered obsolete and outdated, after all "a rustic". However it must be noted the relevance of the agricultural activity to the nationwide economy, especially in relation to the production of foodstuff by small farmers, for domestic market; and the changes resulting from the Brazilian Federal Constitution of 1988 which introduced into the national legal order, new guarantees for the rural worker, for instance, by means of the principles of social security such as solidarity, uniformity and equivalence of benefits and services to the urban and rural population.

The present work examines the need to implement such principles, especially in the perspective of the rights of rural workers to the social welfare in Brazil. The focus lies in peculiarities of ageing in the countryside, available or required public policies, as well as the possibilities of access to benefits at the time of labor incapacity, which shall occur, even, from different treatment because of the characteristics of their activities and as a result of constitutional and infra-constitutional commandments which ensure social protection to all.

Una mirada más compleja del amor: Niveles analíticos y métodos específicos. love as a scientific object: Analytical levels and specific methods

El presente trabajo es producto de una investigación en curso referida al cuerpo y la afectividad como objetos de estudio en la sociedad contem-poránea. En este proyecto se ha vuelto evidente que, en la actualidad, distintas ciencias sociales en el mundo están retomando al amor como objeto de estudio. Aunque la tendencia es global, hay diferentes formas de aproximación al objeto (teóricas y metodológicas). Estudiosas como Stevi Jackson han planteado la necesidad de estudiar al amor complejamente en varias dimensiones (estructural, de significado, práctica y subjetiva), aunque no han reflexionado respecto a los métodos que cada una de estas dimensiones implicaría. El objetivo del trabajo es presentar, a través de una revisión de diversos artículos científicos entre 1989 y 2008 en tres distintas plataformas electrónicas (SAGE, Persée y E-Revistas), la existencia de cuatro niveles analíticos en las ciencias sociales para aproximarse al tema del amor que utilizan métodos específicos. Estos niveles son: a) el nivel social (instituciones que sostienen y reglamentan las prácticas amorosas); b) el nivel cultural (discursos y símbolos que aparecen en las películas, revistas, pinturas, literatura); c) el nivel de la interacción (el amor como proceso social de vinculación con el/la otro/a); y d) el nivel individual que se puede dividir en: discursivo, práctico y de la experiencia (lo que el individuo dice que es el amor, cómo expresa/realiza en sus acciones el amor, cómo experimenta el amor). El trabajo buscará sustentar cada uno de estos niveles mostrando ejemplos de las diversas ciencias sociales y los métodos utilizados. El objetivo final es mostrar la necesidad de complejizar las observaciones del amor y sus métodos (incluso aunque esto implique contradicciones entre los niveles). Además se problematizará la utilidad de los métodos y aproximaciones de otras ciencias sociales para la sociología.

Nuevos actores políticos en la democracia participativa. Organizaciones afros e indígenas en la construcción de políticas públicas en Cali

Esta es una investigación que indaga sobre la relación entre los procesos de institucionalización de la democracia participativa y la acción de comunidades étnicas y raciales en el escenario político.

Los actuales debates sobre el rumbo de las democracias, han llevado a la reflexión sobre el reconocimiento de una sociedad plural y diversa culturalmente. En la actualidad el tema de la política cultural en las sociedades pluriétnicas y multiculturales se hace evidente. Salen a flote diversas teorías desde la Filosofía, la Sociología, la Economía y las Ciencias Políticas, en aras de generar insumos para abordar estos temas y contribuir a la formación de sociedades más justas. El problema surge en el establecimiento de nuevas formas de democracia, un evento no puramente político, sino también económico, y en la actualidad, con un enfoque cultural donde las reivindicaciones de reconocimiento o de identidad hacen presencia en las nuevas agendas políticas de los gobiernos.

En este estudio se analiza la acción-participación de grupos indígenas y afrocolombianos en el contexto de oportunidades políticas de dicho modelo democrático que se ha venido desarrollando en Colombia. El lugar de estudio es la ciudad de Cali donde estas comunidades han entrado en el escenario público participando en la construcción de sus respectivas políticas públicas, politizando la diferencia cultural en un proceso de instrumentalización de la cultura como eje de reivindicaciones de éstas y como elemento central en la construcción de un discurso basado en la identidad en el marco de la democratización. La relación entre la estructura y la acción, la democracia y el multiculturalismo serán ejes centrales en la puesta en marcha de políticas culturales.

Democratization process in cultural regional legislations: A systemic approach

One of the biggest challenges in México and in most Latin American countries is the update of the juridical frame that contributes for the democratization of the culture. Cultural legislations in some Mexican States have a partial approach and some of them obsolete, slanted, and in practice inoperative due to its inconsistency. The challenge to update a law needs a process that it implies adapting the existing ones, incorporating new elements, but especially harmonizing interests in the spirit of new democracy strategies within cultural specialist and politicians.

We face these challenges, by means of an Adaptive System heuristic strategy that has allowed us to carry out a process of permanent adjustment, integration and valuation of contents involved in the cultural legislation. This strategy implies not only successive approximations on observable valuations and its integration in categories but adjustments to structural configurations.

In this paper we propose how to get such heuristics and present the different construction phases for a real legislation configuration. We analyze a case study of cultural Legislation of Nayarit State in México. The computer system is in line with sociocybernetic approach to complex social analysis.

Ciudad marca y planes estratégicos en metrópolis de la cultura: Una aproximación a Madrid y Buenos Aires

Nos proponemos en este trabajo explorar algunas de las variables de los cambios que acontecen actualmente en las dinámicas de regeneración urbana de las grandes metrópolis contemporáneas que apuestan por modelos de economía urbana incorporados a la globalización. El peso de la producción cultural y de las industria creativas han redefinido buena parte de las dinámicas productivas apareciendo nuevos personajes y estilos de vida directamente vinculados a la "nueva economía", innovadora y social, cuyos movimientos representan hoy la piedra de toque de las dinámicas urbanas que afectan a las áreas centrales.

A partir de los casos de Madrid y Buenos Aires analizaremos el rol del Planeamiento Estratégico como reflejo de unas políticas urbanas de nuevo corte, que debido a nuevos modelos de gobernanza han hecho también variar el enfoque de las actuaciones sobre las áreas centrales: desde postulados que defendían la conservación con más o menos carácter historicista a los largo de los años ochenta, a la preservación de los mismos como áreas visitables o temáticas; y por último, la consideración de los mismos como áreas vivas que puedan ser al tiempo exponente de la identidad o esencia de una ciudad acompañándose de políticas de adecuación y cambio de imagen.

Por último plantearemos una revisión crítica de la generación de Marca como instrumento y modelo de construcción de la ciudad en relación parámetros de sostenibilidad social urbana en dos aspectos que se ven atravesados en buena medida por la crisis sistémica: las dinámicas del mercado inmobiliario y acumulación del capital frente a la enorme riqueza y diversidad de expresiones culturales y nichos de cooperación social que subyacen en las grandes ciudades.

Políticas de vida digna: Propuesta para atender la crisis del trabajo

El propósito de esta ponencia es presentar una propuesta que integra cuatro políticas para atender la crisis del trabajo actual y promover el tránsito a una sociedad emancipada. Estas políticas son:

1) La reducción del tiempo de trabajo; 2) La ampliación del tiempo libre; 3) El ingreso social garantizado; y 4) La renta social. En la ponencia explicaré cada estrategia y puntualizaré en la potencia de las mismas para constituirse en políticas sociales de vida digna.

La reducción del tiempo de trabajo integra en positivo la revolución tecnológica en curso, liberando el tiempo de trabajo para todos. Esta liberación brinda a los humanos el tiempo para restituir el poder sobre la vida. Implica la repartición de tareas no pagadas, por ejemplo en la esfera doméstica, y la gestación de actividades para el tiempo liberado. Esta repartición y gestación de actividades suponen la utilización creativa del tiempo disponible como el principio orientador de la reproducción social. El tiempo disponible estará al servicio de la producción de cosas socialmente útiles y propiciará la eliminación del trabajo excedente (acumulado por el capital).

La reducción del tiempo de trabajo estará acompañada por la obtención de un ingreso social garantizado que asegure una vida digna; por lo tanto, no implica una pérdida de ingresos. En este sentido, los humanos aunaremos esfuerzos en dos planos: por la humanización y el enriquecimiento del trabajo, y por la reducción de su tiempo sin pérdida de ingresos. Una caja de garantías remunerará la vida por el tiempo de trabajo economizado. Los ingresos de las personas se compondrán de un ingreso directo y una renta social, recaudada y distribuida por el Estado, que garantizarán la vida digna en periodos de trabajo y tiempo disponible.

Valores y formación militar en México

The paper seeks to establish the link between the national values, principles and military training process through military education, in various levels of learning. We will center our work in the case of Mexico. A part of military training uses examples based on history to recognize the traditions that sustain military values in addition to innovation. At the same time from the hierarchical nature of the military structure each stage of training is a factor that locate, promote and maintain all the persons involved and creates at the same time the "body spirit" to face the tasks of the institution, in periods of time peace or war. The paper also makes an approach to development of this model in the traditional education and also, since 2009, in the virtual mode, to keep time controls in the work and ranks. The military is considered a "total institution". The information obtained was possible because of the opportunity to offer several courses and seminars to officials in high posts in the Mexican navy in the last 25 years.

Neoliberal civil society? INGOs in the Montreal protocol

Global Environmental Governance has shifted over the years, moving away from government regulation, command-and-control policies, and usage of the precautionary principle. Nowadays, entrepreneurial solutions, trading instruments and other market-based models are most common in global environmental discourse and policy. These approaches to global environmentalism can be roughly linked to neo-liberalism. In the paper, I will illustrate this shift in global environmental governance, and show how it has affected international environmental nongovernmental organizations (IENGOs) operating in the Montreal Protocol. It is argued that IENGOs contribute to the neo-liberalization of ozone governance, in some cases changing tactics to fit the neo-liberal discourse of the treaty. Consequently, some IENGOs have recently abandoned what appear to be outdated discourses of global environmental health, global security, and social welfare to address neo-liberal concerns of individualism, competition, and transparency in ozone politics.

Implementing participation to build new local political relations: The case of Santa Tecla (El Salvador)

The city of Santa Tecla, near the capital San Salvador, in El Salvador (Central America) has experimented a participatory mechanism of urban strategic planning, based on territorial and sectorial roundtables and in two annual general "Citizen Assemblies". This case took place after the end of civil war and in the context of democratization, in one city where FMLN, the political party of the former guerilla, win the local election. This experiment, supported by international funds and technical assistance, has led to renovation of the city center and the building of new public buildings, but also to the integration of popular suburbs. One of the objectives of this experience is to break old clientelist networks. The participatory assembly has the purpose to build of new kind of relations between local authorities and the representatives of social sectors. In fact the success of the implementation of projects is based on new formal and informal links between the authorities and the local society. One of the key explanations of the success is on the fact that old clientelist ties had been replaced by a strong leadership of the mayor of Santa Tecla, in the office since 2000 and its ability to reshape political relations and to attract international cooperation and private funds. This leadership cannot be understood as a new form of clientelism, but must be considered as a way of reshaping political ties between local authorities and urban population.

Repression of the Culto de la Santa Muerte in Mexico

This paper will consider how direct repression has been carried out against the Culto de la Santa Muerte, a religious movement which has had great social impact during the last decade. Mexico is legally under a regime of laicidad since 1860 and Church and state affairs have been separated since then. In order to repress the Culto de la Santa Muerte the Catholic Church, international media and the Mexican state at different levels have constructed a social representation of the movement and its followers as members of what has been called "narcocultura", that is, a variant of popular culture linked to Mexico's drug traffic. As a result this cult of the sanctified figure of death is not its has even lost official status as a religious association. Repression against the Culto de la Santa Muerte has affected leadership structures and provoked schisms in the movement which ironically may allow it to survive.

Visualizing SlutWalk: Participants, the public and the media

SlutWalk is a new global movement speaking out against the blaming by authorities and society of sexual violence and harassment towards women based on its victims' appearance. Launched in Canada in 2011, SlutWalk protest marches and activism have spread globally, challenging 'rape cultures' and related mentalities while championing the empowerment of women and their right to personal safety and expression free from sexual intimidation and violation. Adopting, reclaiming, and redefining the inflammatory label 'slut', the movement's hallmark protest marches encompass a diversity of expressive and provocative ideas, clothing and protest signs decrying sexual violence, women's oppression, and advocating for feminist and other out groups rights. Media, public and feminist responses to the incipient phenomenon has been controversial and varied - especially as the movement has moved into conservative and patriarchal societies in Asia and elsewhere where it has sometimes encountered aggressive, dismissive, and contemptuous responses from those repudiating the calls for social justice for women and victims of sexual violence. Even as SlutWalk defines itself, there are those who reject the movement and its message by attempting to derisively portray it and its members as deviants, objects of curiosity, and even, targets for exploitation. This paper proposes to examine imagery and visual activism associated with SlutWalk as expressed in its marches, by its members, and the connected depictions in mainstream media and local communities where SlutWalk events have been hosted. Though more expansive, the point of departure for this paper will be the December 2011 inaugural SlutWalk Hong Kong march.

En un contexto caracterizado por ciertas transformaciones en los vínculos básicos de las democracias, y en el que se advierte un cambio en la relación de los ciudadanos con los asuntos públicos, los medios de comunicación adquieren un rol predominante como espacios de representación y articulación de identidades. La revolución tecnológica, centrada en torno en las TIC, sigue modificando la base material de la sociedad a un ritmo acelerado.

Asimismo, durante los últimos años se ha evidenciado un incremento significativo en el uso de las redes sociales, tales como Facebook, Orkut o Twitter, así como de los mensajes de texto, como manera privilegiada de comunicación entre sectores particulares de las juventudes. Consideramos que los procesos mencionados adquieren una nueva significación en el marco de lo que se denomina como "vuelta a la política" o repolitización, en la cual los jóvenes asumen en la actualidad un protagonismo destacado.

En el presente trabajo nos interesa dar cuenta de las nuevas formas de participación política en el espacio público que estos jóvenes realizan, en

Movimientos sociales en escena, el fin de los partidos el re-nacimiento de la política

El grito "que se vayan todos" que emerge en la Argentina al despertar el siglo XXI y que recorre buena parte de América Latina, se escucha fuertemente en Chile una década después. Si bien, el descredito por la práctica política era ya una constante de hace años, las movilizaciones sociales del 2011 terminan de correr el velo. Nunca como ahora los niveles de credibilidad y rechazo al sistema de representación y a los conglomerados políticos estuvieron tan bajos. El conjunto de expresiones colectivas que han tenido lugar en la sociedad chilena en el último año, marcan un fuerte desprestigio y pérdida de confianza en las instituciones representativas y en específico en el papel de los partidos políticos como instancias aglutinadoras de interés y transmisoras de demandas. Paralelamente, se consolida la reinstalación en la esfera pública de actores colectivos históricos como los estudiantes y los pobladores, además de otros nuevos como el movimiento ecologista, todos síntomas de un modelo de relacionamiento social que se encuentra agotado.

En ese esquema, el propósito del trabajo descansa en explorar los factores que están en la base de la polémica que se introduce en el pacto de la gobernabilidad transicional con la instalación de nuevos actores políticos, que desconocen la legitimidad del sistema de representación y desconfían de los partidos. La interrogante que guía las reflexiones, se pregunta ¿Asistimos a un proceso cuyo horizonte es la transformación del sistema democrático? o más bien, ¿Las movilizaciones sociales corresponden solamente, a un malestar generalizado que demanda una nueva fase distributiva?

Gender inequality in the division of paid and unpaid work: A comparison of Swiss regions

Switzerland has one of the strongest federalisms in the world and can thus be seen as a "policy laboratory". The 26 political units (cantons) are quite diverse in terms of gender equality policies, cultural contexts and socio-economic structures. Also, there are disparities in extent and form of democratic principles. Our project investigates the links between these institutions and gender inequality. For this, we need to know whether and how the 26 regions differ in terms of gender inequalities.

Switzerland is often classified as one of the top countries in international comparisons of gender equality (e.g. UNDP 2010, World Economic Forum 2010). But such findings should not hide the facts that gender inequalities still persist and that there are considerable regional disparities. Previous research published in a Gender Equality Atlas found least gender inequality for urban areas in the French speaking part and most gender inequality for rural cantons in Central Switzerland. Other studies have shown the wage gap to vary substantially by region. One of the areas in which gender inequality is most clearly visible is the division of paid and unpaid work. We measure this gender gap with an index and a typology and consider inequalities in paid work, household and family work and volunteer work.

In the first part the basic construction principles of indices and typologies are discussed and adapted to our goal of comparing Swiss cantons. The second part then presents the typology we have developed and in the third part our attempt to measure regional disparities by a composite index is illustrated. The comparison of the typology and the index in the fourth and concluding part discusses divergent cases between typology and index.

Acerca de las personas de edad en las universidades Argentinas, desde la perspectiva de género

Presentamos una experiencia no tradicional que estamos desarrollando en la Universidad Nacional de Luján, en el Seminario EL envejecimiento en la sociedad actual, Carrera de Trabajo Social.

En nuestro país existen grupos de mujeres voluntarias organizadas a través del INSJJP/Pami, en el Programa Abuelas Leecuentos. Las voluntarias visitan a los niños de escuelas primarias con el objetivo central es promover la lectura de libros en los niños de edad escolar.

Acordamos con la idea de que la gente joven en general y fundamentalmente lxs estudiantes de trabajo social, necesitan entender y tener relaciones significativas con las personas de edad.

Tradicionalmente lxs estudiantes universitarios toman contacto con los programas sociales a través de informes, libros, lecciones, conferencias, material escrito en general, pero, en este caso, al convocar a las voluntarias a hablar y relacionarse con estudiantes, estamos generando un cambio en la enseñanza.

Invitamos a las voluntarias del Programa de Abuelas Leecuentos a nuestra clase con el objeto de crear conciencia entre las personas jóvenes del potencial de la gente de edad y generar sentido de cuidado y respeto hacia ella.

Discusión: Nuevas experiencias para todas las personas. Entre lxs estudiantes es una forma de oponerse a los estereotipos existentes sobre las mujeres mayores, y estimular conciencia emergente sobre su propio proceso de envejecimiento. Entre las mujeres de edad es también una forma de contra atacar los estereotipos hacia las personas jóvenes y promover su autoestima y una revalorización de sí mismas.

Finalmente, consideramos que la motivación para la enseñanza acerca del envejecimiento y la vejez debe ser promovida y cultivada por lxs docentes reforzada por las propias personas de edad con su ejemplo.

The crime of being a woman: Selectivity in the Brazilian criminal justice system

The phenomenon of prison overcrowding and the acknowledgment of the criminogenic effects of imprisonment are the key arguments that support the alternatives to prison approach, in relation to criminal and penal policies in Brazil. Such approach, question the criminal justice system, particularly with regard to its selectivity. The proposal of this paper is to discuss the selectivity of gender in the criminal justice system from the records of imprisoned women Brazil. There has been the increase of female prison population in the country, over the last decade. This phenomenon brings some questions as: is there a new pattern regarding on female crime? Or the appeal of the punitive demand (more social control, and criminal control in the country) has its effects over a portion of the Brazilian female population. Methodologically, will be used empirical data and public statistics, besides official documents from penal institutions and the criminal justice system, about the object of study. This paper seeks to show a panorama of female imprisonment in the overall prison population in the country, throughout the available information in the Penitentiary Information System (INFOPEN) of the National Penitentiary Department / Ministry of Justice. Also, it searches for the matrix of discourses, which legitimise the increased of female imprisonment, and to discuss the fine line between criminal and social selectivity in the criminal justice system.

Science in practice ignorance and knowledge mobilization dynamics: PrioNet epistemic ecosystem laboratory case study (2005-2011)

How does a predominantly basic research university science laboratory adapt to membership in a primarily commercially-driven network? To address this question we propose a new concept – ignorance mobilization (IM) – within a dynamic model of ignorance and knowledge mobilization theoretical context. IM can be understood as the use (or consideration) of ignorance towards achieving social, cultural, political, professional, and or economic goals. If ignorance is a key indicator of a knowledge society

(Gross 2010; Smithson 2009; Kasperson 2009), gaining greater understanding of its dynamics is relevant not only for science policy but more fundamentally for science in practice – understanding the probationary and dynamic nature of scientific knowledge and ignorance and related epistemic and social processes.

The knowledge mobilization (KM) approach of investigating processes in knowledge generation, transmission, reception, evaluation, and management has proven insightful in investigating scientific activity. Focusing on the case study of a university laboratory in a scientific network (PrioNet Canada) we explore a potential KM approach blind spot, however, IM. IM is reminiscent of 'usable ignorance' (Ravetz 1987). Though integral to scientific practice and a subtext in scientific policy, ignorance generally remains ill-accounted for the theoretically and analytically (Bammer and Smithson 2009; Gross 2010; Schneider 1962). In this regard KM falters by inadequately addressing the increasingly interdependent and complex relationship between ignorance and knowledge production especially where production and application converge. This is particularly relevant for networks where commercialization and commercial capital production are valued knowledge application processes.

The case study is an application of the proposed theoretical context where we argue that, from 2005 to 2011, the dynamic calibration and recalibration of IM and KM appears to have been one of the main laboratory adaptation processes. Analysis draws on scientometric methodology with temporally-sensitive social network analysis, semi-structured interviews and scientific publication discourse analysis.

Shades of green: Exploring the engineering profession-environment relationship in three Canadian provinces

Research on risk and uncertainty and on environmental issues often refers to 'decision-makers', 'science and technology decision makers' or 'science-engineering decision makers' (i.e., Murphy, forthcoming; Ascough et al., 2008; van Asselt, 2008; Walker et al., 2003; Freudenburg, 1996, 2000, 2011). The conflation of administrators and science and technology actors undoubtedly reveals the interdisciplinary (Walker et al., 2003) make-up of environmentally-related decision makers but, conversely, the conflation also leads to further questions that are particularly relevant for sociological analysis in order to understand underlying social dynamics. Expert division of labour research also frequently conflates 'science' and 'engineering' (discussion in Petroski, 2010). In this paper I explore the latter group of experts and my guiding question is, how has the profession of engineering ecologically modernised its environmental governance in Canada? My main goal is to compare ecological modernisation of the profession's environmental governance in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. I explore the profession-responsibility-environment triadic relationship through the lens of ecological modernization theory by incorporating responsibility in environmental governance analysis. An underlying argument in this analysis is that the focus on individual actor or industry-specific environmentally-related responsibility detracts from the critical institutional, structural and mostly invisible responsibility role played by professions in almost every aspect of mobility, infrastructure and the treadmills of production and of consumption. I zero in on the profession of engineering with its privileged knowledge and pivotal yet oftentimes overlooked environmentally-related role and decision-making. In addition, instances of environmentally-related encroachment between 'linked ecology' professions that provoke and shape respective 'professionalization' (Adams, 2004) are brought to light. Analysis reveals the profession of engineering's varying shades of green in the three provinces under study. Finally, I hope to contribute to the understanding of profession-environment dynamics at the meeting point between environmental sociology and the sociology of the professions.

De Fukushima a atucha. Discursos sobre la crisis nuclear Japonesa en el debate ambiental de Argentina

Este trabajo tiene como objetivo estudiar la crisis nuclear producida en el noreste de Japón desde marzo de 2011, entendida desde el punto de vista planetario, a partir del enfoque del análisis de los discursos sociales.

En particular, se propone indagar qué cambios produjo este acontecimiento en el debate sobre la política energética en Argentina, a través de un corpus ad-hoc formado por documentos oficiales y artículos de la prensa escrita.

Partimos de considerar que la crisis ambiental pone en discusión algunos de los fundamentos de la sociedad moderna. Por un lado, un sistema económico productivista, que se basa en la tecnocracia y el dominio de la naturaleza. Por otro lado, la propia globalización de la economía, y la aparición de fenómenos como el cambio climático, también ponen en relieve la interdependencia de las naciones, y el imperativo del diálogo intercultural e internacional.

Para ello, el trabajo aborda primero una reseña histórica de la formación de la sociedad moderna mundial, a partir de la colonización europea. En segundo lugar, analizamos brevemente el caso de Japón, a partir de la modernización Meiji, la política económica de posguerra y la crisis del petróleo de 1973. Luego, se postula a Japón como centro del sistema-mundo, su apoyo a la energía nuclear, y cómo afecta a este sector la crisis de Fukushima.

De este modo, se aborda el corpus buscando identificar las condiciones productivas del discurso, con énfasis en el concepto de circulación del sentido y la tematización que se produce sobre Japón en función del debate centrado en Argentina. Para finalizar, se discute el vínculo entre política energética y política climática como factor de debate para el sector nuclear. Así, se considerará que la cuestión ambiental necesita un abordaje integral que dé cuenta de su complejidad.

Contesting neoliberal hegemony - The case of Bolivia

It is widely recognised that some of the most important challenges to the hegemony of neoliberalism have come from Latin America. There is however very considerable debate about the degree to which actual practices match the radical discourses of governments and political parties in countries such as Venezuela, Peru and Bolivia. This paper focuses on the case of Bolivia (Geddes 2009, 2010a and b). Bolivia is an interesting case in that the discourse of the governing MAS party (in which the vice-president, Alvaro García Linera, is a Gramscian intellectual) has veered between explicit anti-neoliberalism and notions such as 'Andean capitalism', while the degree to which concrete policy and practice exhibits continuities as well as breaks with neoliberalism is hotly disputed both by actors within Bolivia and by academic commentators. This paper reviews both the academic literature and Bolivian political and policy developments in recent years in exploring the challenges of contesting neoliberalism. A specific focus is on the interaction between national, local and transnational action spaces (such as ALBA) in attempts to construct an alternative hegemonic discourse and practice.

Nuevas tecnologías: Análisis de nuevos lazos de solidaridad, modos de sociabilidad y subjetividad en el marco de la interrelación a través de los juegos online

Teniendo en cuenta los cambios efectuados en las últimas décadas, que comprenden una transformación en las relaciones de producción y consumo (pasaje del capitalismo industrial a un capitalismo informacional/cognitivo), la expansión de Internet y su penetración en todas las esferas de la vida social, y un proceso de diversificación, flexibilización, desregulación en las relaciones sociales, comienza un proceso de cambio en las relaciones y vínculos sociales "típicos" del capitalismo industrial donde las nuevas tecnologías brindan el marco para la constitución de nuevos tipos de sociabilidad.

El presente trabajo buscará analizar los diversos lazos y relaciones sociales que mantienen los individuos desde el año 2009 en la plataforma del servidor argentino de un juego MMORTS analizando las relaciones sociales y lazos de solidaridad generados entre los participantes de este juego en el marco de una Comunicación mediada por computadoras cristalizada en la conformación de una comunidad virtual (Castells, 1997), ver como los vínculos constituidos se extienden a otras esferas de la vida humana, las representaciones sociales y simbólicas generadas al interior del grupo y los cambios y producciones surgidos en la subjetividad de los usuarios en esta comunidad virtual arriesgando como hipótesis central la conformación un nuevo tipo de lazo de solidaridad al que denominaremos como informacional en contraposición a los lazos de solidaridad orgánica basados en la división del trabajo industrial (Durkheim, 1893)

La metodología constará de efectuar entrevistas semi-estructuradas a actores claves para abarcar trayectorias de juego, motivos de permanencia en el mismo, lazos y vínculos sociales generados al interior y fuera del juego y los cambios que han observado en sus subjetividades e interrelaciones desde que iniciaron su participación.

La relevancia será el analizar esta formulación de lazos y relaciones diferentes a los formulados bajo el capitalismo industrial mediante la interacción en el soporte de las nuevas tecnologías.

Desajustes y solapamientos entre elites de posición y decisión

El Ministerio del Interior y los hombres fuertes del Poder Ejecutivo"

A lo largo de todo el siglo XX, el Ministerio del Interior ocupó un lugar central en relación a la investidura del Estado, la negociación con los distintos actores políticos y la intervención sobre coyunturas críticas. Particularmente situado en la tensión entre Estado y gobierno, se trata de uno de los espacios fundamentales para comprender el trabajo político cotidiano y la construcción de gobernabilidad a través de acuerdos y vínculos de confianza. Más aun, cuanto que los partidos pierden organicidad a partir de las sucesivas "crisis" o "metamorfosis" de la representación y los actores políticos territoriales ganan preeminencia desde la reforma del Estado operada a inicios de la década del '90, este espacio de "armado" político adquiere una relevancia singular.

Esta ponencia reconstruye sus principales atributos y se interroga sobre aquellos espacios que a través del tiempo comparten o disputan su importancia. En un primer momento se dará cuenta del singular lugar del Ministerio del Interior en el Poder Ejecutivo Nacional, historizando algunos de sus ámbitos de intervención e interlocutores, así como los instrumentos que lo hacen un poderoso organismo de negociación y arquitectura política. En un segundo momento se analizarán las trayectorias de sus elites y se identificarán los saberes que se despliegan en este espacio, atendiendo a la vez a su valoración en la prensa y a los principios de evaluación que aplican sus propios protagonistas. Finalmente, reflexionaremos sobre el desajuste entre elites de posición y elites de función o decisión a partir del solapamiento entre los desafíos de este ministerio y otros espacios fuertemente políticos del Poder Ejecutivo, particularmente la Secretaria General de la Presidencia y la Jefatura de Gabinete de Ministros, creada en la reforma constitucional de 1994.

La construcción social de las categorías niñez, juventud e inclusión social: Terrenos y disputas

Nos proponemos indagar las prácticas, sentidos y disputas que alrededor de las categorías de niñez, juventud y de su inclusión social se están llevando a cabo en 3 territorios: una institución gubernamental de retórica ciudadana, una organización social con perspectiva política y un barrio vulnerable del conurbano bonaerense.

Nos interesa conocer las instancias y criterios sociales que se ponen en práctica a nivel local para organizar los ciclos de vida en los sectores sociales con un vínculo inestable con los marcadores hegemónicos etarios: familia, escuela y mercado de trabajo. A su vez, analizar cómo son articulados y puestos en tensión con los sentidos hegemónicos de los grupos etarios, lo que implica un conflicto entre distintos ordenamientos morales (por ej. lo que debe ser un niño). En particular, aquellos sentidos sostenidos en las instituciones que trabajan con estas poblaciones. ¿Qué procedimientos llevan adelante frente a estas "inadecuaciones"? ¿Cómo se relacionan con su objetivo de inclusión social de niños y jóvenes? Para ello presentamos resultados parciales de una investigación doctoral en la que realizamos etnografías múltiples situadas en estos territorios.

Urban territories : A multi-scale analysis of public policies (Brazil, São Paulo)

Doing fieldwork about the so called new social politics (health and assistance) in Brazil during, and after the « Lula » era (second half of the last decade) by an ethnographic approach (participant observations and biographical interviews) within urban outskirts in one of the most important metropolitan areas (São Paulo), with a population of about 20 Million people, we met with the notion of urban territory in various and miscellaneous ways. In this paper, we will try to make ends meet, and to confront the ways in which this category is defined by different groups of actors and how these often contradictory meanings (trickle-down, bottom-up) make public policies work in practice. We will try to show how the multi-faceted category of territory allows to mediate between forms of state governance, as well as other forms of market administration, and forms of appropriation and spatial uses of the local population. What may be the social and political outcomes of these processes of negotiation, and on the handling of social conflicts?

To do so, we will analyze the different levels of the social construction of two different public programs, one in the health sector (PSF-Programa Saúde Família) and the other in the sector of assistance (PAF-Programa Ação Família) whose putting into practice we have accompanied during several years in two different outskirts of São Paulo. Within each program, we will show the ways in which the territory is shaped by the different levels of public governance which define these politics, from its legal and administrative definitions to the forms they are locally negotiated by subcontracted intermediaries and professionals – nearly always in interaction with concurrent markets – as well as by the use of the population of public equipment, forms of participation and sociability.

Dangerous liaisons: The role of traditional and social media in instigating the ethnic riots in Bulgaria

The death of an innocent boy in the Bulgarian village of Katunitsa, victim of a feud between the local population and a Roma oligarch, became the reason for ethnicizing a criminal act and triggering unprecedented mass anti-Gypsy and anti-Turkish riots in the country in September 2011. Social discontent was supported by nationalistic parties, football fans and ultra-right elements, but key to the organization of the riots was the role played by the social media, serving as the medium for exchanging, channelling and radicalizing pre-existing discourses of everyday racism (Essed, 1991). Strong anti-Gypsy and anti-Turkish sentiments can be traced historically, to the maintenance and proliferation of which traditional media used to contribute significantly in the previous years.

The paper studies the connection of traditional and social media with nationalistic ideologies and structures of power, the strategies applied by them and their potential for triggering ethnic tensions through discursive means. Applying CDA, it focuses on the linguistic means for creating and sustaining ethnic prejudices and stereotypes and their escalation into strong racists, anti-Gypsy, anti-Muslim sentiments and Nazi slogans expressed in the social media, as witnessed during the ethnic riots. An attempt is made to establish the connection between "racetalk" in such forums and the leap to social action. Racism is studied dynamically, as an ideology, practice and process, operating systematically through culture, seen as an expression of structural conflicts and manifesting itself discursively in interaction (Essed, 1991; Wodak & Reisigl, 1999).

What is concluded is that radicalized anti-Gypsy attitudes in Bulgaria, blaming the Roma for the failed reform and aggravated socio-economic conditions, tend to place greater emphasis on criminality and deviance and ethnicize social problems, presented in the form of incorrigible cultural difference - reactions provoked by fear, anger and despondency, easily mobilized into action by collective nationalist sentiments.

Examen criminológico y control social

La ejecución penal brasileña, al proponer el desarrollo de mecanismos para la rehabilitación de los presos, hace uso, más allá del Derecho, de conocimientos especializados (por ejemplo: Psicología, Psiquiatría, Servicio Social). Uno de los principales instrumentos utilizados en este contexto es el examen criminológico para la progresión de pena. El presente trabajo tiene por objetivo problematizar la constitución y el propósito de este documento, así como su (in)compatibilidad con las actividades del (de la) profesional de Psicología. Producto de la investigación "Sistema Punitivos Contemporáneos: Justificación, Aplicación y Ejecución de Penas y Medidas de Seguridad", el estudio parte de un referencial teórico interdisciplinario y utiliza las técnicas de investigación cuantitativa y cualitativa, para hacer el análisis de 15 informes psicológicos para progresión de régimen penitenciario, hechos en procesos judiciales de encarcelados en la Prisión de Alta Seguridad de Charqueadas (PASC), Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil. El análisis del material recogido pone de relieve que los informes criminológicos se destinan a una "clientela" específica, compuesta por presos socialmente vulnerables (incluso antes de la entrada en el sistema penitenciario). Centrándose en este público, el examen criminológico investiga categorías como "peligrosidad" y "arrepentimiento"; así que hace uso de procedimientos moralistas de atribución de culpa individual en respuesta a problemas sociales complejos. Por lo tanto, a pesar del discurso humanizado que lo constituye y en perjuicio de la libertad y del bienestar individual, este instrumento sirve para el mantenimiento de mecanismos punitivos. Manifiesta, por lo tanto, contradicciones con las atribuciones de los expertos en Psicología.

Juvenile justice in Brazil

JUVENILE JUSTICE IN PORTO ALEGRE

Coupled to the constitutional principles of the due process of the law and access to justice, the Brazilian Child and Adolescent Statute (Estatuto da Criança e do Adolescente - ECA) guarantees full protection to minors under the age of 18. The ECA came into force in 1990 establishing not only specific procedures but introducing the understanding of children and teenagers as subjects of rights. Despite this legal improvement, adolescents in conflict with the law still face extreme discrepancies between their legal rights and the actual reality of the treatment they receive, especially when the socio-educational measures include incarceration. The University Legal Assistance Service (SAJU/UFRGS) is formed by both volunteer students and lawyers and provides free legal assistance to adolescents in conflict with the law. This group has an interdisciplinary approach due to its conformation as it includes not only law students but psychology and education volunteers. This cooperate work aims to a broad and qualified defence during all stages of the legal process. Since the beginning of the group, we've been struggling to ensure full compliance with the principles of the legislation and recognition of the human rights. In the matter of juvenile justice, the SAJU/UFRGS has witnessed the process of institutionalization and segregation of socially vulnerable teenagers in Porto Alegre. Furthermore, the amount of constitutional rights violation seen during the working cases of the group has allowed us to create a critical view towards the juvenile justice system. Through a case-by-case analysis, it is manifestly evident that in spite of advanced legislation, the rights guaranteed to adolescents in conflict with the law are allegedly infringed.

Re-inventing tradition for the sake of "belonging there" – Ruptures and dissonances

Politics of Belonging are often centred on the question of place and territory. Claims to territory are articulated by particular sections of society such as so-called indigenous people and put national integration and minority accommodation to the test. In most cases, constructions of cultural tradition, agrarian modes of production and the special relationship to land are important arguments. The claims, however, are usually not made by individuals for whom these specific ways of life count but rather by (professional) activists who are used to represent in translocal and global contexts and whose way of life has taken a very different shape.

Based on empirical material concerning indigenous activism in Bangladesh, this paper explores the specific constellations of representation along with the ruptures and dissonances in the place-related politics of belonging. It argues that the specific rhetoric of indigenism and the reinvention of tradition is taking place in the translocal networks between indigenous professionals around the world. The relationship between those inhibiting these translocal "expert worlds" and those they seek to represent is often ambivalent and conflict prone, which necessitates investigating the re-invented tradition vis-à-vis the significance of tradition in local people's every-day life.

Generations relationships in the periphery of São Paulo

The objective of this presentation is to discuss the generation relationship of the leaderships and militants that operate in social movements in the periphery of São Paulo, Brazil. The investigation aims to understand the development of social action among these leaders and the resources that are mobilized in the political practice, taking into account the transformations observed in the periphery of the city in the last thirty years. Changes associated with globalization have inserted the city in the logic of transnational fluxes of markets and people. The prevalence of market logics in the functioning of social and economic processes has complicated the formal labor market through the addition of an expressive quantity of workers employed in precarious jobs. Changes in the mechanisms of social action and political representation have also been introduced throughout the process of the transition to democracy in the country. New modes of social struggle have arisen in the city, introducing different elements than those in the traditional social movements of the 1970s and 1980s. Through the establishment of a generational contrast among old and young leaders it is possible to observe the occurrence of new modes of organizing political action on the part of young leaders at the same time as it is possible to note the permanence of certain practices in continuity with the traditions of social struggles for urban reforms developed in the periphery of city. Beginning with this generational contrast between young and old leaders, the study aims to understand the possible inter-generational relations in social movements, in particular, the relations that youth establish with previous generations, and the political practices that they develop in the city.

The emergence of social structure: Employer information networks in an experimental labor market

We use laboratory experiments to investigate how and under what circumstances networks amongst employers emerge that facilitate information sharing about the trustworthiness of job candidates, when worker opportunism is possible. The experimental design allows us to distinguish between mechanisms underlying the relations amongst employers and those between employers and workers. The data show that substantial information sharing within employer networks emerges. Two types of information networks are observed. One consists of 'anonymity networks' where information is anonymously and voluntarily provided as a collective good for all employers to use. The other type is a 'reciprocity network' where information sharing is driven by the rewarding of previously given information by the requestor. Emerging reciprocity networks tend to crowd out anonymity networks. Both types of network enable employers to recruit trustworthy workers, thereby increasing the surplus from trade, which benefits both the employers and workers involved. However, restricted access to the networks may increase social inequality amongst employers. Social inequality amongst workers may occur as a consequence of limited access to certain jobs.

From binarism to ternarity: Yuri Lotman's theoretical vision of the post-Sovietism

This paper refers to the culturologist Yuri Lotman's latest political-philosophical reflections on the future of Russian culture in the post-perestroika period.

In the early sixties, the Jewish-Russian philosopher gave life in Estonia – where he was exiled because of his origins – to the academic axis Tartu-Moscow, becoming one of its maximum theorists and impressing in it an ethical habitus based (not coincidentally) on the concept of otherness.

Crossroads of theoretical and methodological instances and particular historical conditions (previously the Soviet regime, afterwards the perestroika), Estonian experience gave, as its ripest fruit, the so-called "semiotics of culture", meant as an open discipline in continuous dialogue with the other human and social science: in primis, linguistics, anthropology, sociology, and cultural studies –: Lotman's ultimate aim was, in fact, to establish a culturology based on the interdisciplinary method.

The attitude towards dialogue and for adopting the distinction between "own" and "other" (svoe and čuzoe), as a method of research and discernment of cultural dynamic, resulted in the last Lotmanian writings in a more and more stressed attention for the cultural mechanisms of translation, re-semantization of memory, semiosis of collective passions, for the heterogeneity of human language, for the alterity as building component of the culture.

Hence, the topic of this paper: the "last" Lotman's focus on the history dynamic. These reflections, arisen after the perestroika experience, engaged finally the cultural process in the historical dimension, presenting it as a mix of graduality and unpredictability, linearity and cyclicity, where the discontinuity is as important as the continuity, otherwise the endorsement of the Hegelian "superior unity", as synthetic resolution of the difference, often translated in the ideology of the single thought and in the heteronomy.

Trabalho, conflito e cidade: Luta de projetos na periferia da Buenos Aires contemporânea

Na Argentina do começo da década de 2000 ganharam visibilidade ações coletivas de setores dominados que questionavam a ordem política e econômica vigente. Destacavam-se a ocupação e gestão cooperativa de fábricas em crise – as recuperadas – e as organizações de desempregados piqueteras que reivindicavam trabalho e responsabilizavam ao Estado pela sua condição. Buenos Aires, especialmente a sua Periferia, era não somente o contexto, mas o alvo de ações que tentavam mudar as condições de trabalho e de vida. Construindo uma identidade com o "bairro", essas ações coletivas quebravam a distinção analítica entre lutas dentro e fora da fábrica. Se a tradição argentina de classe trabajadora continuava nessas ações, também se transformava no próprio processo de relação com outros sujeitos. As organizações entravam em conflito, mas também em negociação e acordo, com agentes e iniciativas de "políticas sociais focalizadas" do poder público e ações de "responsabilidade social corporativa". Seus Projetos Políticos se relacionavam assim com os pequenos projetos, ou projects, propostos pelos dominantes que carregavam valores da gestão empresarial, próprios do que Boltanski e Chiapello denominam como novo espírito do capitalismo.

O trabalho indaga sobre a tensão entre os Projetos Políticos e os projects da gestão para compreender melhor tanto as ações dominantes na Periferia quanto as dos dominados que tentam mudar suas condições e construir outras territorialidades. Analisam-se as principais mudanças e permanências nos processos históricos de lutas de classes e de territorialização, observando como relações de conflito são desenvolvidas ou tentam ser absorvidas no manto das políticas dos projects e das parcerias.

A metodologia da pesquisa consistiu no estudo de duas organizações de desempregados na Periferia de Buenos Aires entre 2004 e 2010, discutindo também a literatura sobre a ação coletiva e o território, tanto no âmbito argentino quanto no latino-americano.

Cultura policial, saber hacer y estereotipos: Exploración sociológica en la ciudad de Santa Fe

Este trabajo se inscribe en el marco de aproximaciones a la denominada "cultura policial", concepto que ha sido estructurador de investigaciones académicas dentro de la sociología de la policía en los contextos de habla inglesa desde la década del setenta, pero que ha sido escasamente rescatado en los estudios de América Latina y particularmente en Argentina, donde los estudios cualitativos sobre las representaciones de los policías son recientes y pertenecen en su mayoría a la rama antropológica.

Partiendo por eso de los desarrollos teóricos vinculados a la cultura policial y a la sociología del estereotipo, el presente trabajo intenta indagar el proceso de construcción de estereotipos policiales. Se centra específicamente en cómo los policías de la ciudad manifiestan realizar la prevención del delito, objetivo institucional que requiere de tipificaciones particulares.

En marco de la Beca Estímulo a la Vocación Científica, y respaldada por el Proyecto de Investigación de la UNL "Aproximaciones sociológicas a las experiencias, representaciones y opiniones de los funcionarios policiales de la Provincia de Santa Fe", este trabajo se asienta en un contexto muy específico y casi inexplorado: la ciudad de Santa Fe. Como una primera aproximación cualitativa, el trabajo de campo consiste en entrevistas semi-estructuradas y en profundidad a policías en distintos cargos y jerarquías de dos seccionales policiales de la ciudad de Santa Fe, ubicadas en enclaves territoriales diferenciados, en las que se indaga -entre muchos otros puntos- cómo ellos aprenden a actuar en el espacio público y a detectar "sospechosos".

New feelings of belonging, new territories and religious conflicts: Mapping the Afro-Brazilian religious temples in Rio de Janeiro Submitted continuously to discrimination and persecution, African-based Brazilian religions have only survived through time thanks to a two-folded strategy: syncretism – that is, constructing a symbiosis with Catholic practices -, and desired marginality, or clandestinity, of their practices as well as their worship places.

Globalization came to sharply shake the Brazilian religious universe. On the one hand, the significant growth of neo-pentecostal denominations can be noticed, having as consequences both a inter-religious market competition, and a symbolic and physical violence against african-based religions. On the other hand, ethnic-based social movements reckon their belonging to a diaspora, re-valuing their African heritage as much as their religions. Replacing the old syncretic ambiguity and the desired clandestinity, a new strategy that reinforces the African descendants' public image, their religions' visibility - now strongly re-africanized - and their worship sites ("terreiros" or simply "houses") gains territory.

The project now presented, "Mapping African-based religious 'houses'", was born out of a demand from a number of "mães-de-santo" (female religious leaders) directed to the Interdisciplinary Center of Memory and Afrodescendant Research at the Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro – (PUC-Rio). The project aims at the insertion of African-based religious references together with their worship sites, or 'houses', on top of official city maps, over which urban planners and their decision-makers counterparts generally look and work. As such, the project's objective is to make space for the recognition of, and to positively affirm, the African-based legitimate religious references in the urban landscape.

This new action-research experience brings together academics, religious leaders and ethnic movements, while making use of new technologies such as GPS, in order to explore and open new land use possibilities to subaltern religious segments (mostly led by women) traditionally expelled from prime real state sites.

Promotion of participation and citizenship in europe. Engaging citizens in the fight against corruption through the advocacy and legal advice centres of transparency international

The paper aims at presenting results from the EU-funded project entitled "Promotion of Participation and Citizenship in Europe through the Advocacy and Legal Advice Centres (ALACs) of Transparency International" supported by the European Commission under the Seventh Framework Programme. The research project is a joint venture between the Transparency International Secretariat and a team of scholars based at the universities of Konstanz, Duisburg-Essen and Warwick. The fight against corruption within member and candidate states of the European Union (EU) as well as in a range of countries around the world to date has made obvious that there is a gap between centrally designed anti-corruption measures and public perceptions of corruption. Against this background informing the public, i.e. raising public awareness about the problem has increasingly become over the recent years one of the most important aspects in the international anti-corruption field. In order to enhance public participation in the fight against corruption and thus to enhance the rule of law and democracy, the internationally leading coalition against corruption, Transparency International (TI), has launched since eight years an anti-corruption tool entitled Advocacy and Legal Advice Centre (ALAC). ALACs have become over the last years an important instrument within the frame of the so-called International Anticorruption Regimes. ALACs enable direct engagement of citizens in the fight against corruption. They empower both victims and witnesses of corruption and provide channels for their grievances. The paper provides first of all insights into history, structure and function of ALACs as an important anti-corruption and citizens participation tool in more than 40 countries worldwide. By doing so, the paper comparatively focuses on how ALACs translate concerns of ordinary citizens on corruption cases into actions for systemic (legal, administrative and institutional) anti-corruption improvements through case and public advocacy.

Church interpreting in Germany: Making a case for a combination of conversation analysis and grounded theory in ethnographic fieldwork

Church interpreting - i.e. oral mediation of the sermon into another language than the language used by the preacher - is a routine practice in the growing sector of Evangelical and Pentecostal/ Charismatic churches in Germany and a powerful instrument of their global mission culture. Interestingly, little is known about the emerging Evangelical subculture in Germany and Evangelical practices of language mediation are, too, significantly under-researched in terms of their cultural, performative and linguistic characteristics. Research on the dynamic appearance of new groups in the German religious landscape necessitates an explorative approach and resists methodologies where empirical data just serves as a token to confirm or refute established assumptions about a particular group. Doing justice to these emerging environments means choosing designs that recognise the normative arrangements in interaction (Heritage, 2004) but are also flexible enough to treat context and identity as "locally produced, incrementally developed and [...] transformable at any moment" (Ten Have, 1999, p. 174). While subtle situational dynamics in the micro-context of interaction are excellently traceable by applying conversation analytical approaches to interpreted interaction, the CA paradigm is, however, clearly suspicious of using larger sociological or ethnographic categories or including data and context knowledge stemming from beyond the interaction itself. Yet, factoring out context knowledge seems neither feasible nor desirable if one seeks to account for the reasons and parameters that lead to the occurrence of a setting-specific linguistic behaviour and to delineate a social practice against its institutional macro-context. In this paper, I explore the possibilities and limits of combining aspects of the interactionist CA paradigm with the action theoretical approach of Grounded Theory and illustrate avenues for integration with sequences from my data.

Juicios por jurados

La ley de juicio por jurado sancionada en 2004 por la legislatura cordobesa, surgió en un contexto social movilizado por la crisis de legitimidad del Poder Judicial. A casi seis años de su sanción, Córdoba continúa siendo la única provincia en la República Argentina que tiene vigente este instituto, no obstante ello el debate en torno a su implementación se está extendiendo, tanto en el plano federal como en el provincial. Es por ello que el presente trabajo, pretende revisar la pertinencia de los planteos realizados durante los debates legislativos de la Ley Provincial 9182, previos a su sanción. Para ello, se utilizarán las sentencias dictadas por todas las Cámaras del Crimen de la Provincia de Córdoba que llevan adelante este instituto, desde su puesta en marcha hasta el 2010, en comparación con las dictadas por la Cámara Segunda del Crimen de la ciudad de Córdoba, que en razón de haber realizado un planteo de inconstitucionalidad a dicha ley, no ha implementado hasta ahora el juicios con ocho jurados populares, limitándose a emplear la versión prevista por la ley anterior, que dispone su integración con dos jurados legos (art. 369 C.P.P. conf. Ley 9122). Los aspectos fundamentales a analizar serán, por un lado si efectivamente la presencia de jurados populares implicó un endurecimiento de las penas, y por el otro si existe una diferencia sustancial en el número de sentencias dictadas, debido a la posible dificultad que implicaría la conformación de los jurados para la audiencia de debate, dado que la Ley subió de dos a doce el número de personas que deben integrarlo. Asimismo, será pertinente indagar cuántas de las decisiones tomadas con jurados populares fueron confirmadas en Casación por el Tribunal Superior de Justicia.

Reforming low income housing subsidies: Barriers, risks and opportunities in an era of fiscal austerity

Professor Kenneth Gibb, School of Social and Political Sciences, University of Glasgow, 29 Bute Gardens, Glasgow G12 8RS, United Kingdom

The UK Government has launched a twin attack on the pivotal Housing Benefit system that helps pay the rents of low income tenants. On the one hand there have been fiscal deficit cutting reductions in the support to private tenants as well as separate proposals that affect social and private tenants. In the medium term, the Government also proposes to wrap up all means-tested benefits to working age households, including Housing Benefit, in a single Universal Credit that will be paid direct to low income households. While there are significant problems with the structure and design of HB, both kinds of reform proposals present considerable difficulties for tenants, for social security and for the delivery of housing policy. The reasons for these difficulties: poor design, difficult trade-offs, path dependency - are discussed, along with the major risks flowing from the proposals. However, the process of change does also offer opportunities for more progressive and sustainable reform of low income housing subsidies and these are also examined.

Roadmaps for social transformation: Arab spring

This paper explores assumptions about the future of children in certain societal contexts.

At these moments of Arab Spring, it is intriguing to explore whether attitudes towards children in Moslem societies are undergoing any changes? The researcher examines the socio-cultural circumstances of orphanages in Egypt. Questions are raised about varied forms of local family values and attitudes, and how these connect with views about children, in particular those without known family lineage (orphans).

The research data show particular patterns over the last 6 years and significant alterations of certain values and attitudes as a result of revolution and change of regime, in Egypt. The questions asked in this work, relate to new policies that have been emerging from Egypt's Ministry of Family Affairs. We ask, how do these relate to attitudes about family that reflect contemporary and future policies and realities?

societal As sociologists, we need freshly, to examine the democratization process, as we look to the social qualities of particular societal futures. It is useful and expedient, to examine and critically analyze certain aspects of the unrest that are alive in Tunisia, Syria, Morocco, Yemen and Libya during these moments. Geography and temporality offer us valuable insights into society, as it re-fabricates the future. Egypt, the most populace of these named nations of the Middle East, offers us a rich social laboratory.

The researcher uses longitudinal and ethnographic material to document changes that address the varied role of children, as essence of an Egyptian future.

This work explores threads of Islamic culture, that grow from definitions of a renewing society - the Arab Spring, in the context of contemporary Egypt. The researcher, as sociologist and ethnographer, investigates aspects of the global and local, as she looks at ambiguities, cleavages and impasses between art, culture and religion.

Inevitably, questions arise that address the new democratic aspirations; these aspirations are linked to the micro-culture of Tahrir Square. We look at physical, social, spiritual, aesthetic and intellectual dimensions of the life of the Square; and in these processes, the emergence of new and contemporary discourse. The research points to trends, aspirations and perceived ongoing realities in the new Egypt.

Objectifying sight through eye-tests: Using video to study the senses in social interaction

This paper reports on an Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) funded study that employed ethnography and video methods to analyse the processes of testing vision in optometry consultations. The analysis is based on the examination of more than 70 video recordings of one-to-one consultations between optometrists and patients. The paper presents sections of video data to demonstrate the ways that the subjective vision of the patients is made accountable and objectifiable for the purposes of professional scrutiny. We look at the methods through which optometrists and patients attempt to make visual experience available to one another.

Using this data, we will discuss the potential value of video methods for scrutinizing the senses and sensory activity within social interaction and we show how sensory activity can be turned into a sociological concern. Instead of treating 'sensory experience' as phenomena that are inaccessible to researchers, we regard the creation of mutual intelligibility in social interaction - and the application of the senses within this process - as being observable in real-world contexts. The study draws on an ethnological perspective, and adopts assumptions about the situated character of communicative action as constitutive of the meaning of social scenarios. The paper reflects on how sensory scholarship may benefit from the study of situated practices through video methods in order to better understand how people make sense of their own, and their fellow interlocutors' sensory practices.

La insoportable pesadez del ser... profesional de la salud. Alienación y enajenación en los trabajadores de la salud pública

Existe una profusa literatura destinada a indagar los cambios acontecidos en la profesión médica. Particularmente en la argentina existen trabajos que sintetizan el periodo de consolidación del gremialismo médico entre el '20 y '40 entorno al debate sobre "la crisis" que los afecta. Nos proponemos en el presente trabajo analizar estos procesos y debates resumibles en las tesis de "desprofesionalización", "proletarización" y "corporatización", para el caso de los trabajadores de la salud pública pero a la luz de la tradición teórica alemana de la alienación y la reificación (K. Marx, G. Simmel, G. Lukács, entre otros).

La proletarización y la introducción de la racionalidad capitalista se sintetizan en el pasaje del "artesano" a la "manufactura" con las consecuencias que acarrea la "cooperación" dentro del Hospital, la división de trabajo vertical y horizontal y el creciente ingreso de trabajadores con "funciones simplificadas" intercambiables entre sí (S. Krakauer) que afectan directamente los estándares de "autonomía" y "control" (del trabajo de otros) de la profesión.

Asimismo nos proponemos adentrarnos en la complejidad representada por el doble carácter de la labor médica en tanto reproductor de las relaciones capitalistas de producción al restituir la fuerza de trabajo y, a la vez, como trabajadores explotados y alienados (múltiples investigaciones de corte funcionalista que hablan de "burn-out" de los profesionales de la salud) con formas de organización y lucha propias del proletariado tradicional como el caso de CICOP (Pcia. de Bs As, Argentina).

Migración y familia a través del atlántico. Un acercamiento a la reconfiguración de los vínculos familiares transnacionales de migrantes Latino Americanos en España

Esta ponencia presenta resultados preliminares del trabajo de campo transnacional realizado en Colombia, Ecuador y España, en el marco del proyecto "Políticas migratorias, transnacionalismo familiar y estratificación cívica. Las migraciones latinoamericanas hacia España", financiado por el Plan I+D+i del Ministerio de Ciencia e Innovación español, cuya finalidad es analizar las imbricaciones entre las políticas de migración familiar y las formas de organización de las familias migrantes procedentes de América Latina, asentadas en Cataluña y Madrid. En esta oportunidad nuestro objetivo es explorar la reconfiguración de los vínculos familiares sostenidos por los y las migrantes latinoamericanas en el marco de una (nueva) crisis económica global y de endurecimiento de las políticas de control migratorio en los países europeos, tomando como casos de estudio las migraciones de Ecuador y Colombia en España. En particular, nos interesa indagar el impacto que las estrategias de retorno -ya sea del grupo familiar o de alguno de sus miembros- detectadas en las entrevistas realizadas en Colombia y Ecuador, tienen en las dinámicas de género y generacionales al interior de las familias.

En un momento de mayor fragilidad económica, las familias migrantes latinoamericanas comienzan a ensayar estrategias diversas, que incluyen la vuelta al país de origen del núcleo familiar o de algunos de sus miembros o la migración a nuevos destinos. Si hace una década se elegía al miembro del grupo doméstico que reunía las mejores condiciones para migrar; actualmente, se reflexiona sobre cuál es la mejor maniobra para combinar el retorno de algunos integrantes y la permanencia de otros que puedan seguir generando recursos económicos en destino. Nuestro trabajo de campo indica que tanto las nuevas emigraciones como los retornos están siendo selectivos y organizados sobre la base de las nuevas estrategias migratorias que se están diseñando y poniendo en práctica en estos momentos.

Las tic y las redes sociales virtuales como proceso social y comunitario

En esta década vemos como los procesos sociales y comunitarios se han venido trasladando al ámbito de las redes sociales virtuales, esto como una manera de utilizar esta herramienta para tener un mayor impacto dentro de la población juvenil de las ciudades y que cada vez son más dependientes de este tipo de comunicación; los retos que se generan para estos procesos están desde lograr cerrar la brecha tecnológica en el acceso a estos medios hasta la buena utilización de estas redes; el caso de la comuna 6 de Medellín que se viene construyendo trata de integrar a cada uno de los actores que se presentan en la comunidad para lograr que este proyecto sea de gran impacto social, donde se busca romper con la apatía hacia los procesos sociales por parte de los jóvenes que en muchos casos se ven envueltos en la delincuencia; pero no solo se ve en este proceso la utilización de las redes sociales virtuales, también las TICs se ven como un forma de aminorar los costos de acceso de la información y la producción de conocimiento y donde los centros educativos son pilares, esta generación como ninguna otra tiene entre sus manos una herramienta poderosa y en muchos casos ignorada ya que el interés puesto por el gobierno en dar acceso a esta herramienta es muy poca. La respuesta que se da es que este proceso debe darse desde las bases sociales las redes sociales construidas por las comunidades deben también ser trasladadas a la esfera de la virtualidad y al mismo tiempos servir a las TICs como un elemento transformador de la vida de los ciudadanos que puedan tener acceso a la información y al mismo tiempo ser partícipes de la construcción de una modelo más equitativo.

Examining political biographies from the opposite direction: The case of Israeli settlers of the West Bank and Gaza

We often ask; what contributions have qualitative methods got to offer well-researched fields such as the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Perhaps now is the time to ask also: what potential contribution has controversial and subversive fields such as the one mentioned above got to offer a well-established epistemology in return? What contribution can be gained from researchers employing qualitative methods for cases holding unto opposing political backgrounds, and especially of those challenging the very legitimacy of 'qualitative' assumptions like multi-culturalism? They bring to the fore questions like: is for example multi-culturalism a valid universal concept or is it merely political and relative? In other words: they bring to the fore the question of hegemony (Gramsci, 2004).

Dedicating research to the empowerment of marginalized voices seems to have become the mainstream in recent decades. Indeed, a huge corpus of literature describes and analyzes the voices of the underprivileged from an essentially empathic perspective. Yet it is my contention that within such a socially and scientifically important and much valued move, some concessions might be resting. Thus biographic and narrative epistemologies can greatly benefit also from a completing move: that of exploring narratives and biographies of the supposedly opposing political perspectives, to which such empathy is not so often directed. Unlike what their small representation in research ostensibly suggests, these structures do thrive "out there". That summons the question: what is their source of attraction? And what rests behind the difference?

My analysis of the formal Israeli Settlement Discourse detected the claim that Israeli settlers represent a deprived minority as members of both religious and right wing minorities. In both instances multi-culturalism had been thus attacked as political, i. e. as reflecting left-wing pretensions for hegemony.

Socio-economic inequality as main cause of deviance and crime

According to many sociological theories the principal cause of deviance, including criminality, consists in a social and economic inequality (K. Marx, R. Merton, "Critical Criminology" and others). Contemporary empirical researches in Russia confirm this hypothesis.

The differentiation between the incomes of the 10% least prosperous and the 10% most prosperous increased from 1:4.5 in 1991 up to 1:15 in 1999 and 1:18 in 2005. There are the official data, but the opinion of experts is: the real difference of the incomes rise up to 23-25 and in Moscow up to 40-60 (Human Development Report in the Russian Federation 1999; Just and unjust Inequality in Contemporary Russia 2003).

The Gini index (i.e., index of economic inequality) in Russia increased from 0.289 in 1992 to 0.422 in 2007. According to S. Ol'kov (2004), during 1990-1999 the index was at its maximum in 1994 (0.409) and the number of homicides was at a maximum too (32,300); the index was at its lowest in 1990 (0.218) and the number of homicides was also lowest (15,600).

According to I. Skifsky (2007), coefficient of correlation between trend of Gini index and trend of homicide during 1980-2004 is 0.9253; and between trend of Gini index and violence crime is 0.8433.

The class of the excluded constitutes the social basis for various forms of deviance including crime and organized crime (Gilinskiy, 2006).

About 30% of Russian population have income lower of official living wage (The World Bank, 2005). More than 50% of the Russian population is excluded (F. Borodkin, 2000). There can be therefore Russia is high on the list in the world on rate (per 100,000 population) of murders, suicides, alcohol consumption.

Learning to succeed: Entrepreneurial subjects of development

Stories abound celebrating the triumph of modern democracy and free markets as the pathways to the socioeconomic development of the third world. In place of modernization projects rectifying the "backward" ways of the poorest, an apparently more self-sustaining mode of development has gained credence, which in giving agency to the underdeveloped renders them (everyone!) responsible for their own social, political, and economic transformations. Although ostensibly the more ethical and respectful way, this developmental ethos obscures the dynamics of a neoliberal governmentality whose strategy entails bringing more and more people into an entrepreneurial middle-class, leaving the externalities of poverty to the charitable few.

Instead of being given the gift, we are given the dream. If only we fashion ourselves the right way, a world of opportunities awaits us. Yet, how exactly are people in out-of-the-way places being trained to prosper in a global marketplace and succeed as cosmopolitan citizens?

In this paper, I grapple with these questions by investigating the booming industry of learning/teaching English – the claimed currency of global trade, media, technology, and so forth. Specifically, I explore the complex dimensions of civic and entrepreneurial training at private English-language centers in Rio de Janeiro, designed to prepare cosmopolitans-in-training to compete in "glocal" economies. As one of Brasil's biggest businesses, addressing alleged gaps in the transition from authoritarian regimes to modern-democracy-and-free-markets, these centers have come to occupy various positions with respect to (i) establishing credentializations and work ethic; (ii) nurturing corporate/social responsibility and volunteerism; and (iii) teaching self-improvement, leadership, and managerialism. These everyday training-grounds of a knowledge-based economy elucidate the cultural politics of middle-classification that captures the spirit of the new (Lula) way to develop Brasil. What is at stake in training vast numbers of people into the tastes, dispositions, and expectations of a cosmopolitan entrepreneurial middle-class as the pathway to socioeconomic development?

Intentionality within organizations: Reflectivity and the human rights agenda

My intention within this essay is to articulate a theoretical framework for understanding the nature of human rights through the lens of social power as wielded through organizational structures. With the rise of large-scale multinational corporations whose structures transcend nation-state boundaries, there is an ever-increasing urgency to reconsider the moral accountability of organizational structures. My conceptual framework is designed to reorient sociological analysis of large-scale, bureaucratic organizations by melding a neo-Weberian framework regarding organizations with the pragmatist theorizing of Mead and Dewey. Such a perspective seems essential to explore how human agents might be able to hold these organizations morally and socially accountable and, in the process, reshape them.

In articulating my position I will first briefly outline the contributions sociologists can and should make to human rights discourse and practice. Second, I will outline a general theoretical position regarding human rights that accounts for modern organizational life with respect to human dignity. Finally, I will posit some possible strategies for holding powerful organizations accountable by subjecting these organizations to serious social scrutiny, by reflective human agents, that could result in the reconstitution, restructuring or abolition of existing organizations and the creation of new organizational forms as a means of addressing the human rights agenda. In particular, I will focus on a theoretical strategy that seeks to enhance the ability of human beings, within the organizational context, to use and manipulate social structures in accordance with moral principles based on human rights.

New work organisation in public services

Face à une rhétorique de modernisation des grandes entreprises publiques, cette contribution étudie l'organisation du travail post-taylorienne dans des activités jusqu'alors épargnées par la mesure du travail comme dépense d'énergie. Le cas de La Poste française, qui affronte actuellement la libéralisation des services postaux en Europe, est, à cet égard, heuristique pour comprendre les changements vécus par les organisations soumises à une double logique de marché et de service public. Nous analyserons les tensions générées par une rupture historique aux plans gestionnaire et organisationnel en confrontant les stratégies postales à la socialisation au travail des postiers afin de mettre en évidence de nouvelles formes d'organisation du travail. L'approche repose sur une comparaison territoriale (Méditerranée/Île-de-France) et générationnelle. La combinaison de plusieurs techniques d'investigation (observation participante au sein de la DRH de La Banque Postale, enquête longitudinale prospective par panel menée auprès d'apprentis conseillers financiers, monographie de bureaux de poste et exploitation de données statistiques) permet de croiser l'analyse de l'activité de travail aux politiques stratégiques d'emploi, de travail et de formation.

Uncertain identity orientations : New workers generation and professional socialisation

The entry of young workers' generations to employment in a context of job uncertainty and work rationalisation policies questions their professional socialisation as a process of unstable identity construction in front of a plurality of standards. Between a managerial project of professionalisation carried by the organisation and job ideals built by their previous work experiences, they have to construct their own professional practices by confronting the model of an autonomous and productive worker which is valued by the institution. The study of the process of professional socialisation of young financial advisers apprentices of La Poste brings to light very different positions around the model of the "good adviser" portrayed by the organization. The combination of four elements, namely the professional models carried by young people, significant others in work, representations of work and objective conditions of apprenticeship, allows to understand how they build these positions and shows identity uncertainty around the apparently paradoxical order between advice and sale. This study is based on a territorial comparison (Mediterranean/Parisian region) as well as on a generational survey led on The French Post office. The combination of several investigation techniques (participative observation within the HR Direction at La Banque Postale, longitudinal panel survey conducted on financial adviser apprentices, monograph of post offices and exploitation of statistic data) allows crossing of biographical paths (personal and career) and the structural elements of employment politics analysis, work, and training at La Poste.

Unaffiliated believers in Argentinean cities

En esta presentación abordaré los tránsitos de las personas en los márgenes de las identificaciones religiosas, desde la perspectiva de los sujetos. Me propongo estudiar las trayectorias de las personas y su relación (o su falta de relación, o el tránsito de una hacia la otra) con las instituciones religiosas, con las creencias de formato religioso, con las prácticas. Y para ello enfocaré aquel espacio en el que los márgenes de los grupos religiosos se dilatan, donde habitan las personas que antes formaban parte de las periferias de las instituciones, que han pasado a definirse como externas, ajenas a los marcos institucionales.

La mirada que los científicos que estudiamos fenómenos religiosos hemos llevado sobre nuestros objetos, que sigue el camino de la institución o grupo hacia los sujetos, nos ha permitido acumular conocimiento sobre ciertas dinámicas sociales, pero ha definido amplias zonas grises. Estos espacios a los que es más difícil llegar, son los lugares sociales en los que el compromiso se diluye, las pertenencias se disuelven, sin ausentarse totalmente, pero dejando de constituirse en ordenadores centrales (y aún periféricos) de las vidas de las personas, de los sentidos de sus acciones, de sus actividades y motivaciones.

Se abordará aquí la cuestión de la "salida de la religión" a partir de una doble estrategia metodológica. Por un lado, rastrearé el camino de salida, el alejamiento de los marcos institucionales del catolicismo, y también su permanencia como matriz de pensamiento, a través de la técnica de la historia de vida de habitantes de la ciudad de Buenos Aires y su periferia. Por el otro, me acercaré al fenómeno de los indiferentes religiosos y de los católicos desafiados desde los datos de una investigación cuantitativa realizada en 2008/ 2009 en Argentina.

The trembling hand: Visual documentation of the Israeli human rights organization B'Tselem

This presentation takes account of the last developments in human rights politics by offering an interdisciplinary examination of their representations. It draws on visual documentation of the Israeli human rights organization B'Tselem, an Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories. The presentation focuses on revealing the influences of visual strategies and technologies on the (in)visibility of social (in)justice and violence.

For two decades (since the first Intifada), B'Tselem has exposed and denounced the Israeli human rights policy towards the Palestinian by publishing testimonies as proofs of violations of Palestinian's rights. Among these testimonies were still photographs serving as evidence of human rights abuses. They allow the viewer to peer on the victims of the wrongdoings from a safe distance. The safe distance is even more obvious from the Israeli viewers' point of view. The local conflict fixes the Palestinians as foes in the Israeli observers' perception and prevents them from seeing the Palestinians as victims.

In 2007 B'Tselem initiated a new project named "Distributing Cameras" in order to overcome the obstacle of seeing the Palestinians merely as foes. Palestinians in high-conflict areas were provided with video cameras. The project aims to report information instantaneously, and to show the conflict from a different angle than that is usually seen. It is possible to understand that making the injustice and violence visible is an effort of this project to overcome Israeli sightlessness to the Palestinians suffering. Viewing the scene from the Palestinians angle one sees the Israelis' actions and not the Palestinians'. I will additionally argue that these images can be seen as an effective production of "authentic evidences". The project is achieved through a collaboration between Israeli organization and affected Palestinians and between professional human rights workers and amateur photographers.

Contribution to the theory of social movements on the internet

Recognizing the difficulty of defining the theoretical concept for social movement in the so-called post-industrial society, information society or society of post-material demands, this article explores the major consensus on the new social movements to analyze whether the movements on the Internet in this context may be considered of not social movements. Therefore, it is addressed, first, the mobilization of groups on the Internet, to understand it in its political place; this implies the analysis of the role of media in contemporary democracies, and specifically an analysis of strengths and disadvantages brought about by Internet. The Free Software movement, a movement of post-material demands, is therefore approached as a paradigmatic case that not only takes advantage of the network structure as a means of mobilization, but also has as content an activism for a freedom that is typical of the digital world, a conjunction, therefore, of means of action and goals. A preliminary study of the degree of institutionalization of the movement and a classification of their demands is also carried on. This work is thus to perform a brief outline of these two aspects, to put the debate, and, finally, reach a critical position in relation to both the performance of movements through the internet and regarding the understanding of whether the Free Software movement can be understood as a social movement in the existing paradigm.

Políticas públicas, acceso a la vivienda y derecho a la ciudad. Apuntes de investigación sobre complejos habitacionales de la ciudad de Buenos Aires

A lo largo de este artículo describimos y analizamos las particularidades que han asumido dos políticas habitacionales que se desplegaron en la zona sur de la ciudad de Buenos Aires en diferentes momentos de su evolución sociohistórica. Concentramos la mirada, por un lado, en una modalidad de producción masiva de viviendas "llave en mano" vigente durante la década del '70 y bajo la cual se edificaron grandes conjuntos de interés social con vistas a satisfacer el derecho a la vivienda de diversos sectores de la población. Por otro lado, dirigimos la atención hacia una política habitacional más reciente y que ha generado la construcción de pequeños complejos habitacionales destinados únicamente a la reubicación de población residente en villas de emergencia de la ciudad.

El abordaje propuesto resulta fecundo para reflexionar sobre las políticas de vivienda locales desde una perspectiva comparativa y confrontativa; es decir, para desplegar un análisis que nos permitirá reconstruir continuidades y rupturas, reconociendo al mismo tiempo contrapuntos y tensiones entre: políticas universales y políticas focalizadas; operatorias abiertas vs. operatorias cerradas de adjudicación de viviendas; iniciativas de erradicación de villas e iniciativas de radicación/urbanización de villas. Nuestra propuesta se nutre de un trabajo de campo socioantropológico/etnográfico llevado adelante por las autoras en conjuntos habitacionales situados en la zona sur y suroeste de la ciudad de Buenos Aires -un área históricamente relegada de la urbe-; metodología que nos ha permitido recuperar las prácticas y experiencias de los distintos actores involucrados en la temática bajo estudio.

Democracy, financial crisis and economic alternatives

Democracy and Financial Crisis are part of the existing correlation between the structural changes and the political regimes in Europe and Latin America in the economic, political and social history of the last years. The economic crisis that already points to the course of six years within the most tragic and unfolding of unemployment of social loss of wealth being has affected economic alternatives without solving the economic growth and the economic development. On the other hand, the yield fight has influenced the decisions of the International Monetary Fund (the IMF) in favor of the financial markets. Businesses run by Mexican women have grown at a higher rate than companies headed by men over the course of the past decade. Women-run businesses represent 28.2% of all companies in the United States. Of this total, 8.3% correspond to Hispanic and Latina women. It is interesting to observe that while the average annual growth rate (AAGR) of the number of companies in the United States was 3.4% during the 2002-2007 period, while the corresponding figure for women-owned businesses was slightly higher than 3.7%. Spatialization and development: A non-hegemonic view Critical views of development, such as post-development or alternative to development, have emphasized that the idea of development is constructed in accordance to a linear and universalist logic of time based on the Western social experience. This epistemological critique, although powerful, has been unable to present a new approach to the subject that go beyond the critique itself.

In a scenario of emergence of south-south based experiences of development, reinforced by the economic and political crises of the western industrialized nations, a new approach to the subject can find new practices and ideas.
