Many efforts have been made towards an epistemic break by the subaltern studies and post-colonial theories and the path to that objective has included, in both cases, spatialization as epistemological alternative to linear and universal time. This paper aims to discuss the possibility of applying this new epistemological approach to the understanding of the process of development. To achieve the objective this work will discuss four concepts that can contribute to a more horizontal and spatialized analysis: a) Coloniality of Power as expressed by Anibal Quijano b) Ethnic Centre as presented by Walter Mignolo c) Space-time Compression in the ideas of David Harvey and Frederic Jameson and d) Ecology of Knowledge of Boaventura de Souza Santos.

La diversidad en contextos específicos: Los "espacios inter-religiosos"

Esta ponencia presenta los resultados de una investigación antropológica en "capillas" / "espacios" denominados como "ecuménicos" /

"interreligiosos" ubicados en instituciones públicas de la ciudad de Porto Alegre, sur de Brasil. Estos espacios existen en los hospitales, en el aeropuerto y en un shopping de la ciudad. La investigación de estos espacios tiene dos enfoques: su configuración espacial (especialmente la presencia y distribución de los símbolos religiosos) y su uso (por las instituciones religiosas o sus representantes, o por los visitantes) y gestión (por parte de funcionarios del gobierno o institucionales, o representantes de los usuarios). Este trabajo pretende hacer una exposición comparativa de estos espacios, para discutir cómo el tema de la laicidad se evoca en ellos y cómo en ellos se gestiona la diversidad religiosa. De manera más general, tenemos la intención de contribuir a la discusión de las formas en que el pluralismo se configura y se reconfigura, teniendo en cuenta los cambios en el campo religioso brasileño y las relaciones que se tejen entre el Estado, la sociedad civil y las religiones. Las formas en que el catolicismo pierde terreno en Brasil no son lineales ni homogéneas. Y lo que ocupa su lugar también debe ser analizado de una manera específica, teniendo en cuenta contextos y marcos particulares. La investigación sobre "los espacios inter-religiosos" trata de avanzar en esa dirección.

Roma minority situation during the long years of Albanian transition

Historically, the Albanian population has been characterized by a harmonious relationship between the minorities and the remaining part of the society. The Roma minority is considered a language minority. The difficult situation of the Roma minority is of a complex nature. This situation cannot be simplified into a poverty issue or as an issue of minority policies. It is evident that in practice, there are cases of exclusion and of self-exclusion due to circumstances, economic, sociologic or physiologic. A considerable part of this minority faces serious difficulties in terms of sheltering, education, employment – therefore, it does not have a sustainable socio-economic status. This changeability has an impact on long-term solutions.

The right to affordable housing in New York City: The case of Stuyvesant Town and the conflict over rent control

The towering apartment blocks of Stuyvesant Town were occupied for barely a decade when Henri Lefebvre's influential essay The Right to the City was published; and from the housing project's inception Stuyvesant Town has been an unlikely site for struggles over inhabitation and social justice. Located along the East River above New York's 14th Street in the former Gashouse District, the 28-acre parcel was targeted for redevelopment by Robert Moses as part of the city's post-war plans. Using an early model of Public-Private Partnership, residents of the Gashouse District were displaced to make way for the initially whites-only affordable housing project. Assisted by New York's rent stabilization legislation, Stuyvesant Town persisted as an option for affordable housing (by New York standards) through to the early 2000s, when owners MetLife attempted to sell the property and convert the housing units to market-rate rentals. An unlikely coalition of residents mobilized to block the sale, and by the late 2000s rent controls were reestablished in Stuyvesant Town.

The Stuyvesant Town case brings together significant themes related to social justice and housing including rent stabilization legislation, community activism, and neoliberal marketization strategies. We evaluate the utility of the Right to the City perspective for understanding the struggle for affordable housing. In particular, we question the extent to which Lefebvre's portrayal of a Right to the City conforms to the Stuyvesant Town context, since the movement to protect affordable housing was in this instance led by residents who are not the traditional working-class 'agents, social carriers, or supporters' associated with his concept. While remaining sympathetic to Souza's critique over the vulgarization of the Right to the City concept, we argue a focus on rights can transcend both a limited 'politics of turf' and empty 'rights talk' to create space for broadly empowered and inclusive communities.

Inequities of access to health care in Italy: The role of socioeconomic status

In this paper we analyze the relationship between socioeconomic status and utilization of health care services in contemporary Italy. When it was established in 1978, the Italian National Health Service was supported by a consensus that health care should be financed according to ability to pay but distributed according to need, thereby setting out equity objectives in terms of both financial contributions and access to care. However, as it has emerged from several exploratory analyses, in practice this goal is far from being completely achieved.

We use the 2004/05 Health Conditions and Access to Health Services Survey, a cross-sectional survey on a large probability sample of the Italian population ($n = 107,605$). First, we use multilevel regression modeling to estimate how and to what extent the opportunities of Italian citizens to access (utilize) a given set of health services (preventive check-ups, general practitioners visits, specialist visits, diagnostic check-ups, hospitalization) are associated with their socioeconomic status; in this step, we use need (health status) as a standard control variable. Second, we replicate the analyses using need as a potential effect-modifier variable, to investigate whether the association between individuals' socioeconomic status and their realized access to health care services varies across levels of need.

Our analyses show that (a) a significant positive association between socioeconomic status and probability to access the selected health services exists among the study population; (b) this association does vary across levels of need, and it is shaped differently for the different indicators examined. We conclude that some degree of socioeconomic inequity does characterize the realized access to health care in Italy. Moreover, for some of the services we analyze, need modifies the association of interest playing a major role in shaping this inequity.

Entre la tradición selectiva y la democratización de la escuela secundaria: Escolarización y política social en la Argentina actual

La ponencia presenta los resultados de un estudio sobre los primeros impactos de la política de Asignación Universal por Hijo en la Provincia de Buenos Aires. Se trató de un estudio del diseño e implementación de la política, para dar cuenta de los microefectos en la vida cotidiana de las instituciones y de las familias.

En la Argentina, la Asignación Universal por Hijo para la Protección Social (AUH) se decreta a fines del 2009. A diferencia de las intervenciones sectoriales y focalizadas propias de la fase anterior, la AUH propone una estrategia de intervención integral y la responsabilidad estatal en la garantía de los derechos a la seguridad social, la salud y la escolarización.

En el campo escolar en particular, el discurso de la inclusión que antecede y acompaña la AUH pretende desocultar la selectividad social operante bajo la lógica meritocrática y desplazar hacia la arena pública lo atinente a la trayectoria escolar, en especial en los niveles recientemente incorporados a la escolaridad obligatoria.

La investigación se centró en los impactos en la cotidianeidad escolar de la coexistencia de estrategias políticas fundadas en el derecho con mecanismos de control propios de la política social neoliberal que limitan las aspiraciones universalizantes de la AUH al mantener vigentes una serie de prácticas y representaciones sobre los perceptores que obstaculizan su trato ciudadano en las instituciones educativas. Presentaremos los sentidos que asume la política de AUH en relación con la escuela secundaria en la provincia de Buenos Aires, para analizar los alcances y los límites de esta política frente a las múltiples desprotecciones a las que están sometidos los sectores más vulnerables y el modo como operan sobre el proceso de inclusión-exclusión educativa.

The idealization of the interchangeability of phases of life

Drawing from scholars like Mannheim, Turner, Popitz, Weber, Erikson, Heidegger, and others, the presentation discusses the fundamental importance of the dimension of time for those vast areas of social interaction where the actors do not belong to the same age group and where mutual understanding is hindered by diverging world views in relation to the difference of ages. This barrier between conflicting patterns of thinking and systems of relevance is overcome by an »idealization of the interchangeability of phases of life«, saying that I take it for granted that if I (virtually) change phases of life with my fellow-man so that his »now« becomes mine, I shall have the same attitude towards things and judge them with the same typicality as he actually does. In this way, »temporal« differences of individual perspectives are resolved by the supposition that these differences will vanish in the course of time (»Wait until you're my age!«).

The »idealization of the interchangeability of phases of life« is an enhancement of the »general thesis of the reciprocity of perspectives« developed by Alfred Schütz; a theoretical conception which clarifies the conditions of the possibility of intersubjective understanding, but neglects the factor of time. It assumes that phases of life are characterized by typical attitudes towards life – an assumption that also works in the context of social units, in which the individual passes through definite periods which imply a typical way of conceiving certain aspects of life and world. Therefore, the »idealization« is not restricted to interaction between members of different age groups. Furthermore it has normative repercussions to the effect that e.g. parents believe to know better what is good for their children and therefore adopt certain educational measures – a figure of thought which also appears in relationships between groups and even cultures.

The normative construction of society

The presentation introduces the general sociological theory of Heinrich Popitz (1925-2002), a German sociologist whose work is little known outside the German-speaking context, where the recent publication of two of his lectures is supposed to launch a revival of his thinking.

Popitz uses Max Weber's concept of social action as a starting point for his reflections, enhancing it by the crucial observation that we orientate our social actions not so much towards the past behavior of others, but rather towards their future actions. Hence, social action is essentially about anticipation and therefore is necessarily confronted with the problem of contingency. According to Popitz, the general answer to this problem is standardization, that is, the establishment of behavioral norms. He argues against the idea of a pre-existing »collective spirit« which would guarantee compliance and insists that social order is only possible by implementing binding regulations of action. From this perspective, the scientific interest not so much relates to the phenomenon of deviance, which in a certain sense is »always there«, it rather seeks explanation for why certain forms of deviance are perceived as criminal and get prosecuted.

For Popitz, the analysis of social deviance is not the task of some sociological sub-discipline, it rather leads directly to the core of sociological theory construction. The general orientation of his approach, which resolves the phenomenon of standardization into its formal components, makes it especially useful for intercultural comparisons and historical research. It allows locating exactly the differences between varying forms of societal standardization and control of behavior in different places and through time (»modern« jurisdiction for example is, among other things, the outcome of a historical process during which the right to sanction was limited to a very small group of professional experts – a process which cannot be found in every culture).

Reconciling paid work and care in Germany: Only a women`s matter?

In 2009 2.3 million persons in need of care lived in Germany in terms of the care insurance act. Due to demographic change the number of care dependent persons is projected to increase to approximately 3 million until the year 2020. Home based family care is preferred compared to residential care: two-thirds (1.6 million) of care dependent persons are cared for at home. And it is mostly women who reduce or give up their employment in order to take care of family members. As a demographically induced skills shortage is expected for the future the adult worker model gains in relevance. This means that every person should participate in the labour market. Against this background women who are not employed because of caring for family members are to be activated and supported in order to return back into the labour market or to increase their working hours. But previous research showed: the re-entry into the labour market after a family-related absence is a difficult process which does not always succeed. The presentation would assess the individual consequences of being not employed because of caring for family members and the process of re-entering into the labour market. Our questions are: How can women reconcile work and care responsibilities? Why do women rather than men have to deal with this challenge? Are there differences between the re-entry after caring for children and caring for elderly family members? To answer these questions, we describe the German care system and the current legal regulations as well as the main results of a group discussion with experts. Most of all, we analyze narrative interviews with women who have not been employed for three years or longer because of a care induced interruption and who are trying to re-enter the labour market.

Sociology of Latin-American movements: Practices and theories

This paper presents the main characteristics of current social movements in Latin America, indicating also the principal theories produced to explain them. The current scenario of social movements has changed, with predominant organized marches and occupations, organized online via social networks, denying politics and the politicians. These movements are different from the rebellions of the 1960s, which constituted a great cultural revolution, with engagement in politics. They are also different from those occurred in the years 1970-1980, that showed resistance to military regimes. At that time the social movements had essentially a sociopolitical nature, being instruments of mobilization and grassroots organizing. Moreover, they are different from the movements of the 1990-2000 decades, when institutionalized practices of social organizations prevailed. The economie and political developments of these decades, with its fiscal adjustment and globalization, have produced a generation of excluded by poverty and by the new rules of access to the labor market, especially the young. Currently, participation in events and movements occurs via aggregation ad hoc.

Participatory community governance: Reinforcing or redressing urban inequality?

Proponents of participatory local governance, mainly focused on Latin America, often claim that among its many positive attributes is a focus on ensuring that the poorest, least privileged, most excluded citizens receive more resources and attention from city government. Many European and North American critics, by contrast, contend that the already included, better educated, higher status residents tend to be more engaged politically and to reap the benefits of participatory schemes. This paper examines the effects of one of the most celebrated and replicated forms of participatory community governance, participatory budgeting (PB), on urban inequality. When one examines the empirical record regarding the distribution of resources in cities that use PB, one finds that neither the proponents nor the critics of participatory governance are completely vindicated. While in some cases, PB does correlate with the reduction of inequality and the inclusion of the excluded, in many cases it does not. Are these divergent outcomes a result of who participates, as some critics imply? Or are they a result of who governs, of how PB is designed, or of other factors identified in the growing literature on participatory governance? The paper examines this puzzle through two sets of comparisons. The first is a detailed analysis of distribution of public municipal resources in Caracas, Montevideo, and Porto Alegre, where reduction of inequality occurred in the latter two cities but not the former, even though all three cities were governed by left parties with a redistributive agenda who were pioneers in implementing PB. The second is a broader evaluation of PB experiences in Latin American and European cities that often claim to be modeled on Porto Alegre.

Explaining success and failure in the Middle East revolts of 2011

The most striking aspect of the Middle East Revolts is the great variety of outcomes that evolved from movements that shared pro-democratic aims -- Morocco has seen a conservative constitutional reform, Tunisia an emerging democracy with a surging Islamist party, Libya a civil war, Egypt a struggling democracy with a resurgent military leadership; Yemen a simmering civil war, Bahrain a suppressed democratic movement, Syria and Iran bloodily repressed revolutionary movements, and Iraq a weak democracy riven by sectarian and regional divides. Explaining these diverse outcomes requires close attention to the relationship between movements and states -- examining both state structure and the dynamics of elite actions in response to protests. Looking beyond opportunity structures to social movements viewed as elements in broader relational fields, I examine the internal and external factors that influenced movement success. This approach offers a new integration of insights from the sociology of revolutions -- e.g. the role of personalist states, intra-elite conflicts, international factors, and the development of revolutionary coalitions -- with social movement theory.

Political sociology of science: Universities and organizational resources of science

Political sociology of science draws attention to the changing institutional and extrainstitutional matrix of the scientific field. It assumes that science is a quasiautonomous field of power that is subject to influence from other fields but also possesses a degree of self-governance. Following the idea that science is just a set of institutional error filters for the job of discovering the objective character of the world, we may follow the idea of epistemic modernization, that rests on the tenet that science respects no domain restrictions and will admit no epistemological rivals. Within the public dimension epistemic modernization is intended to capture the shifts in the governance of science that have involved escalating the challenges toward scientific research and technology regulation, the growing permeability of the scientific and industrial fields to both partnership and opposition from various civil society actors, and the increasing legitimacy and institutionalization of such relationships through innovative collaborative arrangements and new forms of governance. In this new situation an old question about the organizational resources of science seems to have a new additional content. The tension between scientists seeking for academic freedom, the state relied on the conception of Humboldt University, and the commercialization of science process leads to a new neoliberal understanding of the economics of science. We suppose that the political sociology of science framework will help us to clarify this tension and will tell us more than other traditional approaches to assess the organizational resources of science.

The gender of the "new citizenship": The mulheres da paz (Peace Women) program

Since 1990, the reevaluation of social policies, especially those which seek to reduce poverty and social vulnerability, led to the emergence of a new institutional paradigm of policy, diversely named. Direct control by the state of policy implementation gives rise to different forms of division of responsibilities with NGOs, churches, communities and individual beneficiaries. Notions such as the development of "human capital" or "capabilities" of the beneficiaries are considered essential tools for the new model of citizenship to be activated, founded on the values of co-responsibility and independence from the market and from the social programs themselves.

Doubtless, each local reality sets specific outlines to this emerging standard. In Brazil this type of policy is increasingly imposing itself and it is remarkable the strategic centrality assigned to women in its implementation, either as the preferred antipoverty programs' customers, as in income transfer programs, or as operators at the local level of government programs for the population considered most vulnerable. Taking the Mulheres da Paz program (Peace Women) as empirical reference, the objective of this paper is to discuss the tensions generated in the design and implementation of this model of social policy, in that the number and variety of political actors involved and in dispute are significantly expanded.

The Peace Women work in "vulnerable areas" aiming to prevent the entry of young people in crime. As we will argue, the program expresses the tense coexistence between different discourses and practices, which simultaneously mobilize maternalist notions and assumptions associated with femininity, put in the service of the goals of social policy, and new concepts of "active citizenship" that are based in the idea of investing in the subjects as individuals and promoting the autonomy and self-development, the so-called empowerment.

Leisure, Environment and Sustainability: Current Challenges

The objective of this research is to understand how leisure and tourism can contribute to sustainability and social and environmental challenges of today. It is necessary to address sustainability considering the various elements that are linked to it: economic, social, environmental and ecological, among others. The concept of sustainability involves not only the environment, because it involves issues such as poverty, population, health, food, work, democracy and human rights, education and leisure, etc. In this perspective, as is highlighted by Unesco, the subject of sustainability should be treated with an inter / transdisciplinary. In this sense, it should be noted leisure, education (formal, non formal and informal), art, politics, internet and social network, as well as many other cultural expressions are needed to address when considering the challenges of sustainability. Yesterday, today and forever it is essential to unravel the conflicts of the present and seek social transformation in the sense of achieving environmental sustainability, social, cultural and many others. For this reason, educators and researchers have the duty and the right to discuss these issues. We can do it from many fronts, but the basic premise of this paper is that leisure can be a very important tool for mobilizing the systematic development of knowledge and experiences committed to sustainability and environmental challenges.

Ocio y redes sociales

Considerando el contexto actual, llamado por muchos autores de Post-modernidad, este trabajo propone un análisis del ocio en cuanto a necesidad humana y dimensión de la cultura, vinculándolo con las nuevas posibilidades generadas por internet y las redes sociales online. Se busca comprender cuales son las razones que justifican el creciente interés de diferentes personas, en todo el mundo, por las redes sociales online, cuales necesidades ellas satisfacen y de qué manera eso viene aconteciendo en relación al ocio. Precisamos aprovechar el potencial de las nuevas tecnologías para satisfacer sinérgicamente nuestras necesidades humanas, incluida la necesidad de ocio, buscando superar la evasión, la apatía, el consumismo, la alienación y las patologías producidas por las varias pobreza, que no se remiten solo a la pobreza económica y material. Así, cada uno/a de nosotros precisa incorporar la condición de sujeto histórico en su propio cotidiano, lo que solo puede ser concretizado por la vía de una educación problematizadora, crítica y transformadora. Ese cambio de paradigma fue identificado ya hace mucho tiempo y ya está ampliamente incorporado en el plano del discurso, pero, precisa alcanzar el campo de las acciones concretas en la cotidianidad de nuestras prácticas educativas. El ocio tiene mucho para contribuir con ese proceso, por eso puede ser visualizado como una importante herramienta educativa a ser potencializada en las redes sociales online. En síntesis, la tesis defendida es que el ocio problematizador, crítico, sinérgico y transformacional puede ser una importante herramienta para movilizar experiencias contrahegemónicas, colaborando con el aprendizaje para la transformación social y cultural, lo que también puede ser desarrollado a través de internet y las redes sociales.

Fotos y relatos en la reconstrucción de procesos de movilidad social ascendente a través de biografías familiares

Las experiencias vividas, los recuerdos y anécdotas permiten a las familias conectar sucesos, lugares y personas para conformar la narración de su historia biográfica. Las fotografías son parte importante en este proceso ya que permiten documentar los cambios ocurridos en sus modos de vida. Capturan momentos que se podrán rememorar, ordenar, mostrar u ocultar siguiendo la lógica de los aspectos y el modo que en que quieren contar su propia historia.

En el marco del proyecto "Experiencias de movilidad social ascendente en familias de origen de clase trabajadora residentes en el Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires (2009-2010)", el objetivo de esta ponencia es indagar cómo las fotos familiares permiten recrear el ambiente en el que se desarrollaron las prácticas cotidianas como así también las huellas del tiempo y las transformaciones inter-generacionales ocurridas en dos dimensiones centrales de la pertenencia de clase social: las condiciones o chances de vida y el estilo de vida. A su vez, consideramos que el uso de fotografías permite confrontar las propias imágenes que el investigador construye en el proceso de entrevistas. Por consiguiente otro objetivo será explorar cuál es el aporte que la utilización de fotografías agrega al análisis de historias de familia. Se analizan comparativamente dos biografías familiares de familias de origen de clase popular que ascendieron a las clases medias a lo largo de tres generaciones a través de dos vías: i. el acceso a la educación universitaria y la inserción en ocupaciones profesionales, y ii. a través del desarrollo de pequeñas y medianas empresas.

Political culture of rural young people in Misiones, Paraguay

Cultura política en el ámbito local: las prácticas ciudadanas de las personas jóvenes en el Distrito de San Miguel, Misiones.

La juventud, como sujeto de planes de participación local suele ser incluido como prioritario para lograr los objetivos de manera sustentable. Sin embargo, la participación protagónica no es abordada, sino mediada por la voz adulto-céntrica. En este sentido, estudiar la manera en que los y las jóvenes interpretan sus formas de participación, cómo están constituidas sus dimensiones afectivas, cognitivas y valorativas de la democracia, los espacios de participación, es necesario conocer para sopesar si efectivamente los y las jóvenes están ejerciendo o no su participación en espacios sociales o institucionales. De esta manera, se abordará el caso de jóvenes de San Miguel, Departamento de Misiones, luego de haberse desarrollado en este distrito, un proceso de implementación del Proyecto de Desarrollo Municipal, que buscó entre sus ejes la participación ciudadana de los y las jóvenes, sin lograrlo en los niveles esperados, sino en forma mediada por adultos que sí consideraron esta población como destinataria de los proyectos que debían ser implementados a nivel local, sin que se haya notado una presencia protagónica de los y las mismas.

Lo que se pudo constatar a partir de evaluaciones fue que se presentaron proyectos dirigidos desde los adultos hacia la población joven. Sin embargo, es posible que los y las jóvenes del Distrito de San Miguel, Misiones, posean concepciones distintas sobre qué es participar, cómo hacerlo, cuándo, entre qué actores.

Por lo tanto, para lograr exitosamente la implementación de políticas públicas dirigidas a establecer mecanismos de participación ciudadana es preciso contar con insumos provenientes de investigaciones que estudien las percepciones y prácticas de las poblaciones a considerar como meta, para de esta forma establecer estrategias oportunas y eficaces con ese fin.

Entre los "indignación" democrática y el "laissez-faire" liberal: Dos formas de conflicto en la comunicación y la participación política

Mientras en España la primera parte del siglo XXI está aportando nuevas formas de comunicación y participación política, fundamentalmente manifestada a través del movimiento social 15M (que hace referencia al 15 de mayo 2011, cuyo punto de partida fue Madrid) seguidor en parte de la consigna de Stephan Hassel, en Chile el fenómeno se presenta de forma distinta, más próxima a la consigna neo-liberal "laissez-faire" para los gobernantes, no para los ciudadanos. Ambos tienen un trasfondo conflictivo común, consecuencia de la insatisfacción ciudadana mostrada de dos formas distintas y opuestas, ante unos gobiernos que se han ido alejando del espíritu de la democracia.

Mientras que en España se pide "una democracia real ya", siendo el emisor el movimiento social más importante de este siglo que tiene sus raíces en las nuevas tecnologías y en las redes sociales, en Chile se escucha: "Hay que dejar que las instituciones funcionen", se afirma desde la publicidad institucional política y gubernamental, habiendo cambiado el emisor que es el gobierno.

Este trabajo quiere problematizar y visibilizar el carácter reificado de afirmaciones como las citadas anteriormente, que ponen de manifiesto el funcionamiento de las instituciones con relación a la comunicación a través de comportamientos colectivos e individuales estimulados por los sistemas normativos que éstas comprenden. Su génesis e historicidad por tanto obedece en un caso, a una dinámica condicionada por los intereses explícitos e implícitos de los actores gubernamentales, que generan una reacción de indignación/oposición dado que han perdido la confianza en sus representantes políticos, mientras que en el otro caso, los políticos reclaman la confianza depositada en ello como representantes políticos y una libertad de actuación, que no resulta aceptada por la ciudadanía.

Se presentan pues dos formas discursivas de conflicto que no hacen otra cosa que, desde dos polos opuestos, expresar la insatisfacción individual y colectiva.

Migrants at the service of gender equality, framing the resurgence of paid domestic workers in the EU

As women increased their participation in the formal labor market, the division of unpaid domestic work that was predicted to change has only slightly done so. In the meantime, the paid domestic work sector, which was once in decline, is expanding in Europe mostly through international migrant workers. Given the EU's double commitment to labor force activation and gender equality, I seek to examine how these goals shape the understanding and location of the current resurgence of paid domestic work, in relation to issues of gender equality and shifts in immigration across the EU and Spain. Using both documents and interview data with political actors, this paper analyzes the ways in which discussions about paid domestic workers is linked to native women's employment. I argue that these discourses have legitimized the expansion of paid domestic work by framing it as a strategy to attain "gender equality". I further argue that the legitimization and promotion of paid domestic work as a strategy for "gender equality" hides a contradiction that becomes visible when we look at the intersections of such arrangement. The contradiction lies in the recognition of migrant domestic workers as workers while marginalizing them as women, and excluding them altogether from the goals of "gender equality" and work/life balance policies. My analyses show this framing to narrow the meaning of gender equality so that it applies only to a privileged group of well-educated native-born women, and to understand the increase of paid domestic work by migrants as replacing domestic labor demands on one group of women without shifting it to men or children. This narrowing of the meaning of gender equality is crucial to understand the organization of women's employment, and a diversion form addressing the division of labor between men and women.

The resurgence of paid domestic workers at the intersection of gender, class and racialized inequality

In the context of increasing women's employment and international migration flows in Western Europe, this paper argues that the recent resurgence of paid domestic work is an strategic location to look at the intersection of gender, class and racialized inequalities. Drawing on quantitative survey analyses and interview data from Spain, where there has been a dramatic increase in the number of paid domestic workers, I propose a theoretical framework to understand the link between the resurgence of paid domestic work and the broader structure of complex inequality. I suggest that the paid domestic sector provides a mechanism by which the within household gendered structure of paid/unpaid work is reproduced through social class and ethnicized divisions, which in turn enlarge inequalities between families and further exclude migrant women. I unpack this argument in two sections. First, I examine how the employment of paid domestic workers affects the gender division of paid and unpaid work within individual families. My results indicate that the growing legitimacy of paid domestic labor not only does not advance gender equality but may also hinder additional steps in that direction, further stalling a gender revolution by discouraging efforts to change men's careers and domestic work strategies. Second, I consider the implications of this growing paid domestic sector for inequality among families. My results suggest that the paid domestic sector reproduces but also exacerbates inequalities among social classes, because it is increasingly related to women's paid work and upward income mobility within dual-earner families. These analyses reveal how the massive change in women's employment and reemergence of paid domestic workers is transforming and affecting social inequality among families in ways directly linked to class, gender and racialized inequalities both within the household and in the labor market.

New objects and social actors produced by positive evidence of the use of complementary and integrative practices in the field of oral health

The Federal Dental Council recognized and regulated in Brazil the Complementary and Integrative Practices (CIP) in oral health: Acupuncture, Laser Therapy, Homeopathy, Hypnosis, Flower therapy and Phytotherapy. The objective of this study is to critically analyze the new objects and social actors in the field of dentistry produced from the results of a systematic review about the positive scientific evidences of the CIP use. We selected Randomized Controlled Trials (RCT) with favorable outcome to the CIP in the period 2000 to 2010. The database used was PubMed, and the RCTs were classified according to the type of clinical application used and specialty of dentistry. We identified 47 RCT, 20 (42%) of Phytotherapy, 14 (30%) of Laser Therapy, 11 (24%) of Acupuncture and 2 (4%) of Homeopathy. The bibliographic findings revealed 23 clinical applications of CIP in dentistry and these most frequently used in periodontal disease (n= 9; 20%), orofacial pain (n=6, 13%), biofilm (n=6, 13%) and surgical analgesia (n=4, 9%). The results indicate, briefly, the predominant use of Phytotherapy, mainly applied in Periodontics and coadjuvant use of all CIP analyzed. The results indicate, briefly, the predominant use of Phytotherapy, mainly applied in Periodontics and coadjuvant use of all CIP analyzed. It is concluded that the official recognition of PIC in the field of dentistry is taking the invisibility of social actors and bringing them into the arena of dispute the model of dental care and healing on many fronts since it already lists more than two dozen applications in the field of CIP oral health. However, studies are needed to analyze the quality and the potential clinical application of these Practices in buccal health as well as the different capitals ported by its advocates and its development strategies. Cuidar de la comunidad: La actuación de las promotoras de paz

La investigación trata de la participación de mujeres en un proyecto del Ministerio de la Justicia/PRONASCI, denominado "Mujeres de Paz". Pretende comprender como se construyen las representaciones sobre el papel de las mujeres en comunidades estigmatizadas, en el caso específico de las comunidades del "Grande Bom Jardim", en Fortaleza/Brasil. Tomando como base la actuación de esas mujeres, se busca comprender sus prácticas y los sentidos que se atribuyen a sus actividades como "promotoras de la paz". Parte de la constatación de que hay un componente moral y estratégico en la resolución de confiar a las mujeres una responsabilidad que las instituciones, en general, no consiguen cumplir. Como estrategia metodológica, hay un acompañamiento de las actividades de las mujeres e son realizadas entrevistas con coordinadores del proyecto, representantes institucionales y con las mujeres involucradas (aquellas que siguen actuando como promotoras de la paz y aquellas que desistieron al largo del proceso).

La notion de risque environnementale et les favelas de rio de janeiro : La flexibilité du discours officielle dans le cas de la favela rocinha

Cette présentation s'inscrit dans un plus vaste projet de recherche qui veut analyser l'influence des catastrophes environnementales au cours des dernières décennies dans la construction des politiques publiques et l'expertise technique pour les interventions dans les favelas cariocas. Cette proposition se focalisera plus spécifiquement sur l'impact des pluies d'avril 2010 sur les récentes politiques publiques concernant les favelas, notamment sur la célèbre favela Rocinha, située dans l'un des quartiers le plus aisé de la ville. L'emploi sans discernement de la notion de risque environnemental classifie certains quartiers de la ville et légitime l'intégration précaire de ces régions à l'espace urbain. La notion de risque et la préoccupation autour de la protection environnementale justifient souvent les intérêts du marché immobilier, négligeant le problème de la qualité de vie de la population qui réside dans ces quartiers. Les pauvres, aux marges, sont souvent considérés comme des coupables des impacts environnementaux, et rarement comme des victimes du processus inégal d'urbanisation. Ce conflit présente des contours moralisateurs, en stigmatisant des groupes et leurs comportements considérés à risque, donc en établissant une ré-signification sociale aux processus d'occupation de ces quartiers de la ville. Cette proposition vise à déconstruire le discours dominant du risque grâce à la cartographie des pratiques de résistance contre les politiques d'éradication des favelas. Dans ce contexte, outre l'analyse des documents publics de la mairie et de la presse quotidienne, cette proposition s'appuiera sur des entretiens avec des fonctionnaires publics et des résidents de la favela Rocinha, dont l'un de ses sous-quartiers (Laboriaux) - consolidé aux années 80 largement sous l'appui de la mairie pour reloger des habitants d'une autre zone de la favela considérée de risque à cette époque - est depuis les pluies d'avril 2011, à son tour, classifié comme zone de risque et est objet d'un possible relogement.

Recombinant DNA technology and the new dynamics of science: Constructing molecular approaches to cancer in Brazil

This work shows the organization of Oncogenomics and the role of recombinant DNA technology in the 1980s in Brazil. This work is result of research at the International Center for Teaching and Research (CIPE - Centro Internacional de Pesquisa e ensino) at Hospital AC Camargo, the main Brazilian lab in oncology (a pioneer in developing basic research projects in molecular biology and therapy of cancer, that have concentrated 63% of the national scientific production in oncology). The text is divided in three parts: (a) the state of art of molecular biology in the 1980s and technologies (recombinant DNA) in oncogenomics (molecular nature/origins of cancer), (b) the role of genomics in medicine, the actors and processes responsible for the construction of molecular approaches to cancer studies in Brazil, (c) conclusions about changes in post-genomic science and the characteristics of cancer research field in Brazil. The study shows that the development of molecular approaches to cancer in Brazil was dynamic. There were policies designed to enable the evolution of the scientific field in the area, supported by bodies such as the São Paulo Research Foundation (FAPESP) and National Council of Technological and Scientific Development (CNPq). The goal is to present how the stabilization of a scientific field is a historical and socially situated process.

TWOP forums: Taking the pulse of an online community

This paper describes a case study of the Television Without Pity (TWOP) forums community in an effort to better understand status and hierarchy in text-based online communities. It builds upon prior studies on Usenet groups to suggest how advances in technology are affecting online interactions and communities. Applying offline ethnographic techniques to a written social setting, the author engaged in participant observation online, becoming an active member of the forum in order to gauge how its members determine status, influence, and authority. The typical offline status indicators of gender, race, and class are superseded by online status indicators of post frequency, direct address or citation by others (in their own posts), and humor. The findings imply that moderators are generally given respect and authority to enforce rules and penalize infractions, that status markers of length of membership and frequency of contribution can determine rank and therefore influence, and that wit and sarcasm are valued by the community and can be used to gain status. Although the TWOP forums are by no means representative of all online communities, they provide a good example of an organized and active participatory online community.

La cultura como observación de segundo orden en sistemas organizacionales

En los últimos años la cultura ha dejado de ser (solamente) una categoría analítica en las ciencias sociales para convertirse en una categoría invocada por distintos actores sociales para describir y observar sus propias prácticas y las de otros. Son las organizaciones, quizás, los actores más destacados en este proceso. Desde la década del '80 los teóricos del management y de las ciencias de la administración han señalado que la cultura constituye una dimensión central en todo ámbito organizacional. Esto ha llevado a que la cultura se haya ido convirtiendo en una categoría reflexiva altamente productiva para la auto-descripción de sistemas organizacionales. Es el objeto de este trabajo analizar los diversos sentidos involucrados en dichas auto-descripciones a partir del estudio comparado de dos organizaciones (una empresa y una ONG internacional-ambas en la ciudad de Córdoba-Argentina). Intentaremos mostrar cómo la cultura se establece como un modo específico de narrativa organizacional que habilita la observación de observaciones organizacionales.

Relaciones interculturales en las instituciones escolar y judicial en Argentina: Modalidades de ejercicio de la violencia simbólica hacia los migrantes externos

La ponencia tendrá como hipótesis central que los docentes y los miembros del poder judicial construyen representaciones sociales discriminatorias hacia los migrantes externos que suponen el ejercicio de una violencia simbólica de difícil visibilización, reproduciendo cotidianamente en ambos espacios relaciones de dominación y exclusión.

Entenderemos a la violencia simbólica como aquella "...violencia amortiguada, insensible, e invisible para sus propias víctimas, que se ejerce esencialmente a través de los caminos puramente simbólicos de la comunicación y del conocimiento o, más exactamente, del desconocimiento, del reconocimiento (...). Esta relación social extraordinariamente común ofrece una ocasión privilegiada de entender la lógica de la dominación ejercida en nombre de un principio simbólico conocido y admitido tanto por el dominador como por el dominado, un idioma (o una manera de modularlo), un estilo de vida (o una manera de pensar, de hablar o de comportarse) y, más habitualmente, una característica distintiva, emblema o estigma cuya mayor eficacia simbólica es la característica corporal absolutamente arbitraria e imprevisible, o sea el color de la piel." An educational model, analyzed from the interdisciplinary research

Inside the cultural policies of our country and the public politics related to the higher education there have been proposed strategies and actions that try to modify the higher education system by means of the diverse institutional formation models.

However, in Higher Education the results obtained reflect a low terminal efficiency and low production in research among other things, in addition to a clear break with the so-called substantive functions of Education at this level.

The previous reference and the experience in the observation of a specific case are located to the investigation in an object of particular study, that of the Educational Model of the National System of Technological Higher education.

The mentioned model is a document that guides the destinations of more than 200 institutions and although it is true it is an extraordinary document in content that is full of these good intentions they have not managed to affect positively in its educational process.

Education under this scheme is part of the big problems that the society faces in our days. As quoted by this table work "is urgent to develop the ability to solve problems with a job team formed for Government, institutions of the third sector, research groups, and social actors.

The participants of the doctorate tackle problems so diverse that they allow to draw the face of a society who has been exceeded to solve them, in the Program of Doctorate in Sciences and Humanities for the Interdisciplinary Development has created this new vision of approach and work for a new generation of investigators.

Therefore for us is necessary the construction of a theoretical and methodological frame, from interdisciplinary research, for offering greater support to specific projects, to find solutions that benefit society.

Today, Individual work is not a job that promotes democracy.

Institutional efforts to promote recruitment, retention, and graduation of underrepresented students

Low-income students and racial and ethnic minority students continue to be underrepresented in health professions academic institutions. However, low-income and underrepresented minority (URM) students differ in important ways. Recruitment programs that solely target underrepresented racial minorities overlook large segments of low-income students (Andersen 2010: 580). As health professions schools (e.g., dental academic institutions) seek to meet their racial and socioeconomic diversity goals, they should consider programs that specifically address the needs of low-income and URM students. Institutional efforts should include components in admissions, advising, financial aid and curriculum in order to recruit, retain, and graduate more underrepresented students.

This paper discusses dental school approaches to achieving racial and socioeconomic diversity and best practices that promote institutional commitment to the goal of equality of outcome. This includes institutional approaches to achieving diversity in 1) admissions, 2) pipeline programs, 2) recruitment and outreach, 3) mentoring, tutoring, retention, and support programs. We analyze qualitative data from the American Dental Education Association California Dental Pipeline Program.

It is crucial for schools to institutionalize successful diversity efforts to ultimately increase health care quality for poor people and racial and ethnic minority groups. In the United States, racial and ethnic minorities tend to receive lower quality of care than Whites even when insurance status, income, age, and severity of condition have been adjusted for (Smedley et al. 2002:2). Because Black and Hispanic physicians are more likely to practice in communities with similar race and ethnicity as their own, research suggests that this will result in better quality of care for racial ethnic minorities and low-income populations (Komaromy et al. 1996:1308). This evidence has led to a shift in policy discussions that increasing diversity in the health care workforce is essential for adequate provision of culturally competent care to our nation's burgeoning minority communities.

Policías por vocación y/o profesión. Articulaciones y tensiones entre motivos "por qué" y "para qué" "ser" policía y las definiciones de "trabajo policial"

La definición de que se entiende por "trabajo policial" cobra una importancia clave al momento en que ciertos sujetos deciden incorporarse a la institución policial y al momento de orientarlas sus prácticas y rutinas cotidianas. La "significación" de lo representado y definido como "trabajo policial" no posee la calidad de ser una definición unívoca e inmutable, por el contrario esta deviene solo en un marco interpretativo que se "rellena estratégicamente" y que se manifiesta ambivalente de lo que es el "trabajo policial"

Complex systems and cybercult@

Researching and developing cybercult@ should be based on a clear conceptualization of complex systems in field research:

This paper will show different traits and conditions shaping the process of facilitation of any emergent local knowledge community.

- a) multidimensional components interacting (social organizations, cultural constraints, cognitive competences, technological appropriation, historical determinations, economic conditions and ecological environment)
- b) facilitation concentrates on passing from none, to weak, and then to strong and intense interdependency of agents
- c) emergent collective behaviours
- d) increasing capacity of self-steering as a collective strategy for confronting local problems
- e) visualisation of enactive bonds in an open network of ELKCs
- f) commute from local to situated knowledge.

Three permanent processes are involved: cognitive open stimulation, increasingly dense agent's connectivity and re-designed consistence as emergent outcomes to problems.

Different disciplines are necessarily required for defining the limits and the internal loops (positive and negative) and limit conditions of this complex system: namely ethno-sociology, social psychology, genetic epistemology and critical pedagogy.

A multidisciplinary team has worked in the creation of three frameworks:

- Epistemic: common position taken and positioned questions
- Conceptual: integrated common conceptualizations of the system
- Methodological: collective strategy for the construction of the complex object

This paper will report some findings of a current project in Charcas, México.

Cybercult@: Emergent local knowledge communities in Latin America

This paper reports a project in which a set of people get together and creates an Emergent Local Knowledge Community (ELKC) in order to face concrete "local" problems by developing their own information, communication and knowledge systems.

Cybercult@ (KC@) is used quite different from the widely accepted "computer interactions in cyberspace".

- a) Originally "cyber" has nothing to do with ICT. Inspired from the original Greek word Kybernetes (pilot, steerman), developing KC@ means the process of collective appropriation of technology for self-steering and conquering degrees of self-determination to solve local problems.
- b) "Culture" is understood as a "cultivation" of a threefold process:
 - Information, as the ability to establish symbolic correspondences between experiences and signs;
 - Communication, as the capacity to organize and coordinate actions.
 - Knowledge, as an emergent process of relating configurations of information in order to transform socio-cognitive structures.
- c) The sign "@" represents a positive feedback loop of intelligent (dialogical) solutions to local problems using ICT as knowledge platforms.

In theoretical terms, fieldwork is inspired on Freire's critical pedagogy, Vigotsky's Proximal Developmental Zone (PDZ) and Piaget/García's genetic epistemology, all of them fully compatible to Burawoy's public sociology and Trueba's ethnography of empowerment.

* denotes a presenting author. Abstracts are organized by first presenting author's last name.

Initial findings relocate conceptually and empirically the discussion on "digital inclusion" in the World-System.

In three years members of ELKC "La otra min@ de Charcas" (students, teachers, workers, housekeepers, technicians, peasants) in México have been generating local knowledge on alcoholism, environment degradation and political problems in a critical territory controlled by "Zetas" drug cartel.

Passing from local to situated knowledge needs a network of different ELKCs facing similar global problems. For this reason, in 2010 other ELKC experiences have been started in Piauí and Paraíba in northwest Brazil.

Gobernanza política y coordinación intersectorial: Cambios en el modelo de regulación de la problemática de derechos humanos en Colombia 2003-2006

En Colombia, ha habido un largo período de cambio en la política pública y en el modelo de regulación de la problemática de derechos humanos, que empezó en el año 2003 como parte de un proceso de negociación de la política de cooperación internacional del Estado colombiano, conocido como el Proceso Londres - Cartagena. Mi argumento es que este cambio se puede definir como el paso de un modelo de regulación estructurado en términos de gobierno – oposición a un modelo de gobernanza política con coordinación intersectorial. En el primero, los sectores interesados de la sociedad civil colombiana tienen un rol de veeduría, denuncia y confrontación con el Estado colombiano. En el segundo, aunque la sociedad civil mantiene estos roles, incrementa su capacidad de incidencia política en la formulación de la política de derechos humanos al participar directamente en un esquema de negociación intersectorial con el gobierno colombiano y actores de la cooperación internacional. Este cambio se puede explicar al analizar explícitamente la forma como se generan y se usan recursos de capital político en este esquema de negociación.

Este es un caso particular del problema general de difusión del régimen internacional de derechos humanos en los contextos nacionales. En mi argumento, tomo como referente el conocido "modelo en espiral" propuesto por Thomas Risse, Steve Ropp y Kathryn Sikkink. El caso colombiano presenta varias características que permiten establecer un diálogo crítico y constructivo con este modelo. Lo principal es que permite analizar en qué medida los enfoques de gobernanza política constituyen una alternativa para abordar el problema de difusión, particularmente en la perspectiva de la participación de la sociedad civil y al analizar explícitamente el efecto de la introducción de recursos de capital político en este enfoque de regulación.

Cultural offers and audience transformations

The transformations on Leon city morphology, from 20 years ago to the date, are a result that integrates cultural practices within its geographical urban context, a temporal dimension that tells us the history of the city and a systematic perspective that brings us closer to the understanding of the transitive processes of one state to the other of the city. The diachronic segmentation of the cultural equipment (based on the socio-structural perspective of the cultural fields of Pierre Bourdieu) would lack of depth without the notion of the sense of the practices (objective and subjective) within its context, which makes an induction that allows an approach to the social reality of the investigation object necessary. Understanding the shifting environment of the socio-cultural relations that both impact and become progress, reinforce the public policy and appropriate complex strategies of social empowerment provided by knowledge, which is by cyberculture's notion, articulated to empower the discursive and autopoietic practices from the community to its own progress. Three fields are studied in particular based on Jorge González and his project "Cultural Offers and Public formation" experiences: culture/art field, food field and the educative field.

Social organizations, leadership, and construction of full citizenship: Two experiences in North Central Mexico

This paper discusses by qualitative ways the recent trajectory of two social organizations that operate in the State of Zacatecas, México, whose interaction with the state (through two different federal government programs) has converted them in political actors locally recognized. Their forms of political activity reflect different conceptions about the goals of the citizen organization and citizenship itself. One such organization, the "Federación de Clubes Zacatecanos del Sur de California" to achieve their objectives is focused on the collective effort of its membership and it shows cooperative with the State, promoting citizen participation centered on civil rights, lobbying and vote. In contrast, the other organization "Antorcha Campesina" acts more as a pressure group based in a conflicted relationship with local authorities and the formation of its political cadres reflects a conception of a rebellious citizenship dangerously associated with clientelistic practices. In both experiences the leadership of the directives has played a prominent role in the grow of the organizations and some political parties have approached them to add up votes, and even invited them to participate as candidates in various elections. However, despite the large participative and organizational learning of these organizations, their practices of organized political action are far from building full citizenship.

This paper seeks to highlight how the construction of full citizenship is a challenge that goes beyond electoral spheres and is related with the formation of organizational identities and concrete practices of interaction between citizens and with the state.

Diseño metodológico de la actividad académica del docente-investigador y su entorno social. Caso de biografía académica

Este trabajo surge debido a la necesidad de poner en práctica, en las actividades académicas que desempeño, la concepción de gestión, que desarrolla la Universidad Central de Venezuela (UCV), a través del Plan estratégico; el cual ratifica los principios de: pluralidad de pensamiento, autonomía universitaria, conciencia crítica, beneficio de la sociedad y los valores éticos, desde el enfoque de la sociedad del conocimiento. En este sentido, el modelo de gestión, plantea un ámbito donde interactúa el conocimiento científico con el saber, en su relación con el entorno, desde las redes sociales, y en función de la oferta de conocimiento, como las demandas sociales (UCV, 2011).

Estas exigencias requieren de la formación de competencias del talento humano del profesor, estudiante y comunidad, desde la línea estratégica de gestión de conocimiento, definida por este Plan, entre las seis creadas (UCV, 2011a).

En cuanto a la aplicación de esta línea estratégica, en las actividades docentes, de extensión e investigación en este caso de estudio; se formulan las competencias cognitivas, metacognitivas y sociales (González, 2012: 3), dirigidas al estudiante y al profesor encargado de la Oportativa, a partir del sexto semestre, en la Escuela de Sociología. Esto con el fin, de que las competencias sean orientadas hacia el proceso de concientización del resguardo escrito, de la memoria oral de la tradición del Niño Jesús de Capaya, a través de la producción de un libro, y su registro documental en una base de datos, con participación de la comunidad (González, 2012: 3). Confronting the uncertain: On crisis, time sociology and the narration of dangerous times

This is an attempt to explore the concept of crisis and its relevance within sociology through a focused analysis on the literature of the sociology of time and attending the role narrative and rhetoric play in making sense of crisis situations. Attempting to tackle the fuzziness of such a concept, crisis is discussed in the context where, according to most accounts, contemporary societies are deemed to be ever more accelerated, prone to change, uncertainty and open towards unforeseeable risks. In order to attain this, 'crisis' is put at the core of the tensions that current debates on the sociology of time expound, in relation to the conflict between diverse temporal logics that arise in an ever more complex world. Nonetheless, this insecure milieu is frequently confronted with our necessity to make sense of events, inscribing them in a narrative that allows for a minimum of foreseeability. In this tension political rhetoric often strives to make sense of economic bursts, natural disasters and other critical situations by inscribing them in a coherent plot, thus mitigating the impact of the experience of uncertainty. This carries within the risk of oversimplifying our quandaries and impoverishing the categories we use to comprehend our world and allow for the emergence of scapegoating strategies. This is followed by an assessment of the tension between our limited knowledge and our need for a narrative of our times, regardless of how insufficient it might be to fathom our predicaments and the role sociology should play in this milieu.

Development, nation and "official futures": The case of the rhetoric of progress in contemporary Chile

This presentation is an attempt to conceptualise, with the aid of various sources that stem from the social sciences and philosophy, the way in which different ways to imagine the shape of time are implicit in Chilean official political rhetoric and how these may affect the way in which we perceive the past, what we understand as possible in the present and the possibilities that the future can bring. Using as examples the way in which some of the most important recent political events in Chile are narrated in the official rhetoric, we endeavour ourselves to unravel the form in which a certain discourse about the Nation, about its past and its identity is related with a form of projecting the future and, in practice, a mode of understanding the political map and the different forces in the present. Likewise, it is an attempt to give an account of the different discursive forms in which the destiny of the Nation and the everyday experience of its inhabitants are woven together, through a narrative in which the risks and sacrifices made in the present are necessary for future development, and how the past is thus interpreted as a plot with a mission. That is, how the uncertainty of the present, the crises it has to face and individual experiences are connected with the idea of its mission to become a developed country, thus reducing contingency in an ever more uncertain world. Finally, a debate on the tensions that this model for "national time" ensues, one of which is the growing political pressures and scissions that are beginning to arise in a country that is growing steadily.

Firearm homicide in Mexico 1990-2009: Trends, spatial variations and associated factors

This paper analyzes the trend of firearm homicide rate in Mexico in last two decades and seeks to identify the social variables that better explain the spatial variations of firearm homicide rate in Mexico in biennial 2008-2009. Data for this study was obtained from official sources; trends of firearm homicide rates by age groups, gender and level of marginalization between 1990 and 2009 were analyzed; for each Mexican state, firearm homicide rates in biennial 2008-2009 were calculated; stepwise multiple linear regression analysis was used to identify the variables associated to interstate variations in firearm homicide rates. Findings show that the proportion of homicides committed with firearms has increased since 2000 (being in 2009 about 65%; the highest firearm homicide rate is observed in age group 30-39 (15 per 100,000 in 2009). Furthermore, male firearm homicide rates are clearly higher than female rates. Throughout the period, firearm homicide rates were much higher in the areas of greatest social exclusion. Moreover, regression model reflects that in states with highest levels of impunity (measured by the ratio "convicted of homicide / registered homicides"), most drug trafficking activities (measured by a proxy "destroyed hectares of marijuana and opiate per 1,000 inhabitants") and firearms possession (measured by a proxy "confiscated fire guns per 1,000 inhabitants") the firearms homicide rates were extremely high. These were the cases of Chihuahua and Baja California -states in U.S. border- and Sinaloa, in northwest Mexico. When these factors are combined with high levels of social exclusion, rates were also high, as the case of Guerrero. In a context characterized by insecurity, impunity and social exclusion, aspects such as improving the standard of living of the population, modify the judicial system or have better control of firearms are necessary to reduce firearm homicides rates in Mexico.

Pirate politics and digital ethics

As digital technologies have become increasingly pervasive aspects of daily life for (sufficiently affluent) young people, we have seen a growing challenge to both legal and moral norms associated with copyright and intellectual property. On one level, these challenges remain at the informal level of everyday behaviors. But we have also witnessed the growth of more organized elements of a 'movement' seeking a program of reform to overturn what are perceived as outmoded and increasingly insidious copyright and intellectual property regimes. Prominent examples include the Creative Commons movement and the Pirate Party—a formal political party originating in Sweden and now active in at least forty countries. But how closely aligned are these organized platforms for social reform on the one hand, and the ethical discourses of young people faced with the everyday frustrations and temptations of sharing content in digital environments, on the other? To what extent can young people's everyday engagements be harnessed and politicized by these platforms? What, in short, are the prospects for a mass social movement for change (in copyright law and related areas of civil liberty) fueled by the energies of young digital citizens? This paper offers one perspective on these questions. Based on focus group and social media research, it examines young people's responses to the manifestos and platforms of international Pirate Parties. In particular, it examines the relationship between ethical and political dimensions of young people's behaviors as digital citizens. It considers the extent to which new cultural trends around digital media are, in fact, indicative of a new (political) worldview—and constitutive of a new social movement—around cultural and intellectual freedoms.

Greening the Australian automotive industry

In 2010, it was estimated that there were 896 million cars operating in the world and this number is expected to climb to almost 1.2 billion by 2020. Globally, passenger motor vehicles are responsible for one-tenth of global greenhouse gas emissions. The powerful global auto industry and the commodity it produces, so synonymous with environmental cost, is being held up by some as a transformational prototype, via the proposition that if the auto industry can be greened, every industry can. In 2007, the newly elected Australian Labor government committed to the formation and implementation of a Green Car Innovation Fund, to assist Australia's ailing automotive manufacturing industry green the cars it produces, the manufacturing process and jobs within the industry. This paper engages with the task of examining the three multinational vehicle producers operating in Australia, Ford, GM Holden and Toyota, and how they have responded and engaged with the idea of green jobs, greening the manufacturing process and the vehicles that they produce in Australia. This analysis and discussion is informed by semi-structured in-depth interviews with senior representatives within the Australia auto industry, unions and policy makers and supplemented with industry documents and secondary sources.

The Australian trade union movements engagement with just transition and the green economy

Many policymakers, unions and businesses have embraced the idea of green jobs and a green economy. This enthusiasm for environmentally sound job creation received a significant shot in the arm at the end of 2008, in the context of the global financial crisis, as an important element in the solution to the world's economic and ecological concerns. However, the connection between work and combating environmental problems is an area of significant contestation. This has resulted in highly varied understandings of what constitutes a green job and a green economy. The aim of this paper is to establish how Australian unions are responding to the environmental challenge of climate change. This analysis will focus on the Australian Manufacturing Workers' Union (AMWU) which as a union has repeatedly encouraged the position that responding to climate change represents an opportunity for the AMWU and its members. An examination of the AMWU's positive disposition toward green job opportunities and industries will be developed as an example of the different interpretations which surround green jobs and just transition to a green economy.

Scavenging for work: Informal labor across the north-south divide

Despite the growing scholarly attention paid to the proliferation of informal and precarious work throughout the global north and global south, there has been relatively little comparative research on this pressing topic. This is unfortunate, since social scientific findings in one location can help us to ask a set of unexpected questions about other locations, thereby creating an opening for innovative kinds of inquiry. Drawing upon ethnographic fieldwork carried out amongst socially marginalized and economically precarious sidewalk scavengers in both Buenos Aires and San Francisco, this paper aims to extend our understanding of the organizing strategies of, and the state's reactions to, informal workers. We focus upon two of the most strikingly visible - even iconic - symbols of informality and economic despair: cartoneros, or garbage recyclers, in Argentina and jornaleros, or day laborers, in the United States. First, we compare the ways in which these workers have been socially and politically constructed. Second, we discuss their different strategies of organizing. Finally, we contrast the ways in which these municipalities have endeavored to regulate and manage these populations, arguing that these comparative cases represent different models of neoliberal urban governance. We conclude with a framework for further comparative theorizing about informality across the north-south divide.

Defending your people: The role of street gangs in maintaining the integrity of economically deprived communities

Standard sociological and journalistic narratives of street youth gangs tend to emphasize dysfunction, disorganisation, crime and violence. In Glasgow, however, many street gangs have long histories, sometimes stretching back a century or more. No social institution survives over this kind of time frame without also contributing to the community in which it lives and moves and has its being. Through a participant observation study across two Glasgow communities, this research inquires into the agreement that exists between a gang and its community, finding a role for the gang in maintaining community solidarity against the incursions not only of neighbouring gangs but of the impositions of the organs of the state and civil society. We argue that the benefits of civil society in the rule of law and a neutral police force, education provision, democratic engagement and equal opportunity for advancement do not obtain for these communities, and are experienced more often as invasions and attacks on their integrity. Under these circumstances, in important respects, they have to look after themselves. While the reality is fractured and paradoxical, and compromisued by alcohol and other drug use, the gang is an important element in maintaining community integrity.

El acceso a la universidad en la Argentina y los dilemas de las políticas institucionales

El derecho a la educación superior tiene hoy un consenso declarativo generalizado desde los documentos internacionales (CMES, París, 2009), regionales (CRES, 2008) y nacionales, aunque su concreción es un tema complejo y controvertido. Esta ponencia aborda la problemática del acceso a la universidad en el escenario argentino de las últimas dos décadas. Este escenario se ha caracterizado por una masificación creciente, el establecimiento de nuevas universidades y un proceso amplio de reforma (a partir de la sanción de la Ley de Educación Superior de 1995). El ingreso libre y gratuito—postulado por la mayoría de las universidades nacionales—ha tenido como contracara los fenómenos de la alta deserción y las bajas tasas de graduación, los cuales afectan a distintos grupos de estudiantes, pero especialmente a los provenientes de hogares de bajo nivel socio-económico. Luego de analizar las políticas y programas desarrollados desde el gobierno nacional para el mejoramiento del acceso, la ponencia se enfoca en las estrategias que las universidades públicas han instrumentado desde mediados de la década de 1990, atendiendo en particular a la situación de las universidades del conurbano bonaerense en relación a las acciones de articulación con la escuela secundaria y a los procesos de admisión y de apoyo a los estudiantes de primer año. Se postula que en la implementación de sus políticas de acceso estas instituciones se encuentran ante los dilemas planteados por una transformación de formatos académicos y dinámicas tradicionalmente selectivas que dé respuesta a dos exigencias: 1) la de proveer condiciones para la inclusión de una población estudiantil más heterogénea que la tradicional y con predominio de sectores sociales relativamente desaventajados (tanto en términos de recursos económicos como en su preparación académica); 2) la del mejoramiento de la calidad de los procesos académicos.

A review of major themes and questions in youth studies in post-reform Russia

The review is aimed not only to reveal the first-priority for Russia youth problems and respective directions of sociological researches, but also to create a theoretical and methodological basis for comparative analysis of situation in the youth field in all four BRIC countries under the conditions of rapid social changes, large-scale political and economic transformations, as well as increasing cultural globalization.

From the Russian side the group of authors is presented by the staff scientists of the Institute of Sociology, Russian Academy of Sciences, who in accordance with their scientific interests and areas of activity discusses a certain set of urgent issues and topical problems, including:

- demographic characteristics of youth as well as quite different from country to country demographic factors influencing age-sex structure of population and so on;
- youth social identity as a product of interaction and cooperation between the global and the local;
- new models and practices of consumption and leisure in the context of high level openness of modern youth to the World;
- family, marriage and sexuality;
- the state and political values, including those influencing political activity of youth in the BRIC countries under the condition of transition to market oriented economy;
- mass education and employment opportunities: work as a key factor in the development and affirmation of personal identity and self-esteem, specific pathway for incorporation into the social life as well as for the achievement of economic independence; some certain difficulties for getting a job, etc;

- Internet participation and new models of social communication.

Twenty years of Russian reforms and establishment of a civil society in post-reform Russia

At the end of 2011 Russia will mark 20th anniversary of taking the path of radical social-economic reforms aimed primarily at structural reorganization of the Russian economy. Becoming one of the symbolic events in contemporary history of the country, economic reforms have affected all spheres of the state and social activity.

Debates about the political heritage of their main initiators are still actual for the considerable part of population. Especially under the condition of modern – highly ambivalent – epoch partly inheriting the policy adopted by the reformers and partly being opposed to it.

It is obvious that activity of the reformers of the decades passed often had spontaneous character and were in many respects forced, generated by the conditions of a total system crisis which has broken in the collapsing USSR, when there were no time for the search of «sparing», step-by-step ways of reforming. At the same time mass consciousness is inclined to forget a historical context under which the reforms were carried out, to mythologize and simplify many things. That is why it is so important to turn back to look at the events of twenty years' prescription, to examine them from the point of view of the present generations of Russians.

At the same time it is very important to analyze in what way the changes occurred have affected life of the Russian citizens, their social and material welfare, possibilities of self-realization, evolution of their world outlook installations, national self-identification, opinions as regard the world around, role and place of the state, democratic institutions and norms in life of the society.

The article is based on the results of the national-wide sociological research «Twenty years of reforms through the Russians' eyes» conducted by the Institute of Sociology of the Russian Academy of Sciences in April, 2011.

What does religion do to the people? A case study in contemporary France

As social scientists know well, the definition of "religion" has reached an amount of discussion, contradiction and a state of overabundance that leads some to call upon a Babel tower situation. This state of affairs comes from the "law" edicted by sociology founding fathers not to use pre-notions, but instead to construct one's definition of the subject to be studied. Owing to this rule, "religion" as a common sense word should not be used as an entry to its study. This proposition shall be discussed on the base of our study on What does the religion do to the people in contemporary France. We assume that definition is not the point but the methodology. Instead of starting from dogmas and their general applications, from normative statements and their singular applications, or from practices or beliefs, the case method allows to catch empirically what people bring into the category of "religion", what they make out of it, how it mixes with their ordinary life.

Atención primaria de la salud. Continuidades neoliberales en la "asistencia centrada en la persona"

El desarrollo del concepto de atención primaria de la salud (APS) tuvo un inicio fundacional en 1978, con la Declaración de Alma-Ata (ex URSS) elaborada por los países miembros de la Organización Mundial de la Salud (OMS). Este documento destacaba la necesidad de fortalecer los servicios de salud en el nivel más básico, de atención y prevención, con el fin de evitar intervenciones más complejas y de mayor costo, así como caracterizaba la situación de desigualdad entre países definidos como "desarrollados".

lados" y "en desarrollo". La salud era una tarea y responsabilidad colectiva que involucraba tanto al "pueblo", así llamado, como a "los gobiernos". En el año 2008, con motivo de celebrar la tercera década de la perspectiva de APS en el mundo, la OMS publicó un nuevo documento: La atención primaria de la salud. Más necesaria que nunca, en el que reformuló varios de los principios de la Declaración de Alma-Ata y resignificó ciertos términos de esta postura de provisión de salud. En especial, la nueva versión de APS incluyó, a través de cuatro vías de reformas, la idea de "centrarse en la persona": esto es, prestar interés a las demandas que los miembros de una población formulaban a los servicios de salud y configurar éstos de tal manera que promovieran la satisfacción de los ciudadanos, devenidos usuarios. En este trabajo se intenta señalar cuál parece ser la contracara implícita de estas propuestas reformistas, con la premisa de que su significado conlleva la aceptación de una perspectiva neoliberal sobre la salud que sigue estando presente en la visión de organismos internacionales como la OMS a la hora de trabajar en el área de derechos sociales y políticas públicas.

When your data make you cry: Feelings in research

What do you do when your data make you cry? Is there a place for feelings in research? My essay addresses those questions through an exploration of the methodological questions that arise when one moves from "participant" to "observer", that is, when one's research project focuses on something in which one was intimately involved and only later decides to take as an object of study. After considering and answering the concerns about objectivity that are likely to be raised in this situation, I explore the more pressing methodological issue of "familiarity." While the task of any ethnographer is to become familiar with the group one is studying, familiarity can also obscure interesting research questions, especially if the participant-cum-researcher shares the common sense of the group she is researching. In that case, the researcher may fail to see the group's taken-for-granted as a historical product ripe for investigation. How, then, does the researcher make what has become commonsensical to her into a puzzle requiring inquiry and analysis? How do you unravel your own common sense, and how does doing so affect the questions that you ask and the stories that you are able to tell? Drawing from a larger project that analyzes the emergence, meteoric rise, development, and decline of the direct-action AIDS activist movement in the United States, ACT UP, this essay explores these issues, focusing on the role that feelings can play in research. I argue for an understanding of feelings as a source of knowledge that can facilitate a methodological approach that both tacks between familiarity and defamiliarity and treats one's object historically, emphasizing contingency, conjuncture, and change across time.

Supporting "public debate" as a new unions' strategy? The case of CGIL-FIOM facing managerial referendum in three Fiat factories (Italy)

Among the various challenges facing unions, membership participation and workers empowerment by tools of direct participation within management concretely challenges the ability of unions of representing the diversity of workers' interests. Indeed, a participatory management involves a redefinition of the unions' strategies. Should union blame this trend of direct participation? Recently, these questions were concretely asked to the CGIL-FIOM union, in Italy. In 2010 and 2011, the direction of the Fiat Company decided to use referenda, in order to avoid the refusal of CGIL-FIOM to sign a new agreement about labour conditions in three Italian factories. The direction of the Fiat Company promised, in case of approval by workers, to maintain industrial activities and, in case of refusal, to close these factories. Consequently, the unions were confronted to as strong dilemma: what is the best way to react to this direct participation of workers? Our research about these three referenda is focused on the link between direct participation, public debate and unions' strategies. We present an argument in two main steps. Firstly, we want to show how unions have progressively inverted the democratic sense of these referenda: instead of giving voting instructions, they have chosen to indirectly fuel the public debate, by diffusing arguments and ideas towards workers. The direct participation of workers was used by unions to adopt a "deliberative" activism, to convince workers to resist. Secondly, we also questioned the limits of this strategy: whereas the rates of refusal were surprisingly high within the two firsts referenda, the workers finally decided to support the agreement for the third referendum. These high levels, indirectly supported by unions, have finally frightened the workers, who feared that their factory were definitely. It opens a discussion about the ability of unions to act efficiently within the public debate.

The needs of professional valorization of the teachers are putting the question in central of education policies in Brazil, tensing the teacher's demands accountability for school performance, this is expressed in the adoption of National Professional Minimum Wage and the definition of guidelines to career guidance teacher. The large-scale exams in Brazil are producing a big number of information about the teachers and can be help for learning about who are this person actually, in special if considering the sub national historical context in Brazil (SOUZA, 2009) and in others countries (FANFANI, 2007) for reading about the teachers profile. In this article we will explore the profile of Brazilian teachers from the PROVA BRASIL context questionnaire 2007, analyzing experience, payment, scholarship and labor situation (civil servants or employers with temporary contract) in confront with the teachers evaluation about management conditions in schools that work. The results of the questions about teachers profile reaffirm the inequality between north/northeast and center/ south/ southeast in the Brazilian development amplified for the inequality between the first step of elementary school and last step of elementary school. To measure this scenery we propose to use of a Index of teacher's work conditions that can be a instrument of reading of different contexts for the answers of teachers about the pedagogical project of schools, conditions of participations in the schools, your relationship with the principal in the schools and relations between teachers and students in the Brazilian elementary schools.

Youth and labour market(s) in Europe: 'Opportunities' or just 'risks'? – Findings from the European social survey

Many critics argue that one core dimension of the European Union (EU) 'Lisbon Strategy' (2000) is 'more flexibility and openness to the labour market in teaching/learning' and the 'strengthening human resources at the universities by promoting a favourable professional environment'. Amidst the global financial crisis and the increasing 'downsizing' of the Welfare State, we would like to examine how young adults perceive their current situation and their future educational and occupational prospects within this framework of opportunities?

Using comparative data on educational level and type of education completed, occupational status and income level, on the one hand, and measurement(s) of subjective well-being and job security, experiences of unemployment and work-life balance, on the other, from Round 5 (2010-11) of the cross-sectional European Social Survey, we will try to highlight patterns on how European youth (generally defined as people between 18 and 34 years of age) perceive their life chances in times of supposedly big investment in 'human-capital formation'. Variables such as gender, age, ethnic or religious group, type of area, household composition, parental education and occupation and family income are also taken account in order to control for significant 'personal' and 'external' influences.

Towards social justice and democracy: Unraveling South African youth in the education and labour market systems

South Africa's 1955 Freedom Charter states that 'South Africa belongs to all who live in it'. However, hardly anybody involved in the Charter would have appreciated the current quasi-federalist state, caught between a version of developmentalism and a financialized economy. The current state is at a profound distance from fulfilling earlier notions of social justice and democracy.

The state is showing evidence of dysfunction and failure. The ANC doubts the state's capacity to manage its developmental duties. If institutional capacity is in doubt, then a number of risk factors threaten the state, including the inability to intervene in the key areas of education and labour market. Youth exit from a markedly weak educational system to a labour market that locks them to lengthy periods of structural unemployment.

The response by the state since 2007 was to introduce institutional reforms. In 2010, the Transformation of State and Governance spelled out the motivation, attributes, and structure of the development state. Then in 2011, the National Development Plan: Vision for 2030 elaborated on social and economic problems; and set targets for interventions. However, the reforms and plans have limits, which will be discussed.

The paper aims to examine how the ANC's recent efforts facilitate improving the educational and labour market systems, thereby securing social justice and democracy. Both contradictions and the mutuality of education and the labour market and social justice and democracy will be discussed.

Notably, the emerging criticisms of the plan, in particular, that poverty will be eliminated, and inequality reduced by 2030, will remain one of greatest implementation challenges.

Conceptually, education and the labour market; social justice and democracy; and issues faced by youth will be discussed in simultaneity. Thereafter, the paper will attempt to establish what interventions may be possible in the three systems of analyses.

Pink public transit in Mexico city: Evaluating women-only transportation as a feminist movement

At the turn of the 21st Century, a woman in Mexico City could not board a public bus, subway, or taxi without fearing that she would be sexually violated or even raped before reaching her destination. In a moment of desperation policy makers did what dozens of cities around the world had already done and they established a line of women-only public transportation. Since then, feminist groups in Mexico have campaigned to double the number of women-only transit on the road, and have successfully persuaded the local government to issue a special fleet of bubblegum-pink buses and taxis named Athena, after the Greek goddess of war, courage, and strength. This paper uses both qualitative and quantitative methods to examine, analyse, and evaluate the benefits vs. consequences of using women-only transportation as a solution to gender inequality. Combining theories from the sociology of space and feminist geographers, results show that women-only transportation spatially empowers women by increasing their confidence and power when navigating the city.

Do rights matter? A comparative analysis of children's rights

Do children's rights matter to children's outcomes? Do stronger young people's rights produce superior outcomes for children? For all children? Efforts to promote and strengthen young people's rights are often motivated by expectations that stronger rights result in superior outcomes. This relationship, however, is assumed. This study will present global findings to answer the question of whether stronger rights result in better outcomes for young people. An important component of this study is an examination of differential outcomes among young people within countries. Do stronger rights lead to better outcomes for all young people? Do some young people not enjoy these better outcomes? If so, which young people? This study

Private responsibilities for human rights: "Too big" to be accountable?

The purpose of this paper is to examine the rights and responsibilities private actors, such as corporations, have in upholding human rights. The target of human rights implementation and enforcement typically is the state. While the state typically is a duty holder, the process of fulfilling human rights often requires efforts of non-government actors, such as families, nonprofit organizations, and companies. In this paper, we aim to take a close look at how for-profit corporations are involved in human rights protections and violations, with particular emphasis on what happens when corporations violate human rights. We examine whether for-profit corporations are difficult to hold accountable for their human rights violations due to minimal regulations and ineffective government sanctions. We will look at the legal status of corporations (e.g. personhood), and the global capitalist structure in determining what actions corporations take in implementing human rights. We will explore who is accountable for implementing and protecting human rights, what actions are taken when corporations violate human rights, and if these actions appear to be effective. We will examine case studies of corporations that have taken on human rights responsibilities, and notable corporations that have refused to do so.

In this paper, we conduct three levels of analysis. The first level of analysis will be an evaluation of human rights treaties to identify rights and responsibilities of private actors. The second level will be an examination of how treaty committees, such as the UN Human Rights Committee, deal with private actors in their work. The third level will be case studies of four types of for-profit companies: two companies that have repudiated human rights responsibilities and two companies that have attempted to fulfill human rights obligations. We conclude with a critical discussion of how human rights can be better protected from and by corporations.

Possibilités et limites de la logique des "écogestes"

In France, a large number of local authorities are trying to traduce in their local policies the challenges of global warming. Based on measures allotting 47% of the greenhouse gases to the households, they try to involve the citizens in this cause.

When addressed to individuals, the communication strategy is all oriented to what is called the "eco-gestures"; these refers to practices supposed easy to be adopted, and which would allow citizens to reduce their personal greenhouse gases production.

I have studied a group of citizens, living in a French countryside near Germany, who have participated to an experiment of voluntary limitation of their greenhouse gases emissions. During two years, though a regular measure of their emissions in their habitation, transports, alimentation and consumption, they were receiving some advises from an ecological association to try to reduce these greenhouse gases emissions.

I focused particularly my attention on the conflicts, tensions or gaps that appears between their pattern of an "ecological concerned citizen", and their practices. I observe the way they tend to solve these personal conflicts, through defensive discourses, but also through marginal or more substantial changes. I make two principal assessments. First, the environmental motivations rarely are sufficient to drive to a significant change, but they may help in the decision and the kind of choices made. Second, the minor changes can also lead to a spiral of changes or a "gearing effect". Despite the logical of "eco-gestures" play a role in mobilisation of the citizens, and should not be neglected, it also has its limits, and cannot substitute for action of local authorities at a more structural level.

Desde mediados de 2006, en la ciudad de Oaxaca una protesta gremial cobró en pocos días la dimensión de una amplia y profunda insurrección popular, con un alto sentido antiautoritario. A lo largo de la protesta gente "común y corriente" fue generando nuevas relaciones sociales, se apropió de la ciudad, de las calles, instituyeron sus barricadas de defensa, sus espacios de discusión y comunicación, y sus propios modos de construir formas de vida. Los canales alternativos de comunicación además de transportar informaciones contribuyeron a tejer nuevos nudos sociales entre los participante y fortalecer la necesidad de una comunicación fundada sobre prácticas comunitarias. Tanto la apropiación y uso de Internet como la toma de las emisoras de radio y televisión, por parte de simples ciudadanos, fueron determinantes en la organización y en la construcción de la identidad del movimiento popular. Recuperando la experiencia individual en los medios alternativos que han sido determinantes en la organización y en la construcción de la identidad del movimiento popular, en la presente comunicación proponemos un análisis del proceso de apropiación de las nuevas tecnologías de la información y la comunicación vivido por los insurgentes. A través del análisis de las entrevistas a los protagonistas de las experiencias mediáticas pondremos en evidencia cómo la apropiación y uso de los medios de comunicación se convierte en otro modo de hacer política. Some thoughts on the working of competing orders and links between them

What kind of structures can be found in the realms not reached by the state? This paper focuses on post-war societies and challenges the concept of the 'weak state' which has become the most-used approach to explain the political structure of such countries. The paper argues that beyond the state there tend to be different orders, partly with state-like structures, but rarely mere lawlessness and chaos. Such orders may exist at the community level, where societies organize themselves with own rules and authorities. There might be orders of violence, as in the ghettos of big cities or in territories dominated by militias. The system of the aid agencies and the UN organizations may show features of a self-referential socio-political order beside the state on whose territory they are operating. Large multinational companies investing in natural resources can develop a separate order with weak links to the state on whose ground they are producing. At the same time, states frequently are a source of uncertainty and extra-legal action against social groups.

In order to clarify the notion of competing orders, the paper firstly looks into sources of power of states and other socio-political orders existing on the same territory. Secondly it discusses the ways these orders are functioning and characterizes the 'drivers' which maintain them. Then it elaborates on the links ('currencies') between these orders and the mutual effects of these links on the orders and their structures in the process of exchange, using the example of South Sudan. Some conclusions will be drawn, highlighting possible means of 'conversion' which could moderate the driving forces causing the emergence of multiple orders or even create synergies between them.

La compactación de los materiales reciclables es un fenómeno contemporáneo consistido en un proceso largo y no lineal, intrínseco al capitalismo de producción/consumo. Este proceso industrial no sirve solamente para recoger los "vertederos" en las calles o en puntos de recolección, los materiales tales como papel, cartón, vidrio, aluminio y plástico y separarlos de acuerdo a una clasificación específica de la industria del reciclaje, pero lo hace inserta un complejo conjunto de relaciones sociales y laborales, marcada por la violencia. Mientras que allí, en, por un lado, una gran organización y los incentivos sobre el reciclaje, hay, por otra parte, un gran contingente de obreros distanciados de la distribución de las ganancias, pero sobre todo insertada en el proceso de producción, un proceso marcado por las desigualdades sociales y la explotación de la mano de obra miserable. Mediante la incorporación de la materia, hace unos treinta años, fue vista sólo como chatarra, la producción capitalista incorpora y organiza este grupo de trabajadores y puede suprimir una cierta necesidad social – haciendo de la chatarra el principal material del producto reciclable – Así se satisfas los deseos de consumo de corriente que se basan en la visibilidad del ambientalismo. Por lo tanto, la basura es algo que debe entenderse fuera de los beneficios sociales ambientales del reciclado y eso es lo que esta investigación desea analizar la violencia en la trayectoria de vida de los colectores de materiales reciclables y el proceso de fabricación de la industrialización de la mercadería basura.

Landscapes of risk and resilience: Comparing the socio-spatial production of environmental crisis in Argentina and the United States

How does the process of urbanization generate risk and potential crisis —both environmental and socio-economic—for cities and their residents? How are these risks distributed within urban populations? And how does this distribution reflect preexisting socio-spatial inequalities, as well as post-crisis redevelopment policies? These questions motivate this joint presentation by urban sociologists at the University of Buenos Aires and the University of California Santa Cruz. Greenberg, Herzer, and Merlinsky analyze these crises in the context of historic phases of urban capital accumulation and governance, emphasizing the post-1970s neoliberal phase, with its reliance on deregulation, privatization, and austerity as a means of driving global competitiveness. At the same time, they critique rigid notions of neoliberalism that lack attention to political agency, environmental processes, and urban spaces outside the global north. Through a comparative analysis of cities in Argentina and the U.S., and using the theoretical tools of political ecology and critical urban studies, they reveal neoliberal urbanization to be globally variegated and ecologically imbricated.

The presentation interweaves three case studies. Merlinsky explores the historical construction of risk and degradation of the Cuenca-Matanza river due to land deregulation, industrial contamination, and the lack of sanitation infrastructure for people living on the river's banks. Herzer examines how recurring floods in Buenos Aires reflect public policies that generate increased vulnerability as well as exposure to risk. And Greenberg explores how redevelopment policies following cyclical crises in New York and New Orleans have exacerbated socio-environmental inequality and generated a new scale of risk. Alongside differences and path dependencies, the presenters find that, across their cases, uneven redevelopment shifts the burden of environmental risk onto the poorest citizens while producing conditions for future crises. Meanwhile, they also find innovative, urban-based environmental justice struggles shaped by and responding to these different contexts of crisis.

New urban imaginaries in the branded city: Towards a critical and comparative approach

"Urban branding" in a pervasive aspect of contemporary, market-oriented urbanization processes globally, yet remains little understood from a critical or comparative perspective within urban sociology. In this presentation I synthesize existing literature on the topic, and offer a theoretical framework that situates the phenomenon within critical urban studies.

A wealth of literature is emerging on urban branding in many fields. In media/cultural studies urban brands are analyzed, like corporate brands more broadly, as "market cultural forms" that mediate production and consumption in a symbolically-oriented global economy. Research on urban design, architecture, and planning addresses how iconic, all-encompassing

"brandsapes" extend corporate identities and market logics into the built environment. In urban studies—from geography to sociology—branding is understood as the entrepreneurial practice of marketing "culture-led" developments like arts districts and entertainment destinations in the name of interurban competition.

In this presentation, I seek to bring these illuminating approaches into conversation, and to push them further. Rather than afix urban branding to the realm of culture, marketing, media, and/or design alone, I argue the practice is always, also embedded in urban political economy and governance, and so of central concern for urban social justice struggles. This relationship becomes particularly apparent in times of urban crisis. Drawing on research in post-crisis New York, New Orleans, and Buenos Aires, I address links between utopian urban re-imagining projects and broader forms of market-oriented restructuring. I link these findings to insights in critical urban studies about the strategic, globally variegated role of the urban scale in neoliberal restructuring. Ultimately I argue for an integrated approach that addresses the combined role of imaginary and material processes within capitalist urbanization generally, and that posits the reclamation of utopian imaginaries from the realm of the brand as central to recent urban social justice movements in Argentina and the U.S..

The Israeli regime, Palestinian Arabs and the apartheid analogy

This paper examines the apartheid analogy as a useful tool in analysing the relations between the Israeli regime and its Palestinian Arab subjects. In doing that, it looks at current debates over the question, including the work of the Russell Tribunal on Palestine. The Tribunal convened in Cape Town in November 2011 to discuss the applicability of the legal concept of apartheid to Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Among the questions raised in the ensuing debates are the definition of concepts such as race and racial domination (do they apply only to conflicts that use the notion of physical/biological differences, or also to differences based on ethnicity and national identity), the meanings of apartheid (a regime specific to South Africa or southern Africa, or a generic notion that goes beyond its historical origins), the boundaries of Israel (do we refer to its pre-1967 boundaries, to Greater Israel post-1967, or to all areas – including the Diaspora – in which the Israeli regime determines the living conditions of Palestinian Arabs), and the concrete implications of citizenship, residence and refugee rights.

While much of the debate has been explicitly political in nature, it also raises important issues regarding social theory and methodology: how to use concepts rooted in specific place and time in a broader comparative context? how to examine diverse and multi-layered societies on their various dimensions in a comparative manner? How to do that without restricting the analysis to one or two core dimensions, and thereby over-simplifying it, but also without overburdening it by invoking numerous dimensions and excessive empirical detail, and thereby obscuring the overall picture? In other words, how to engage in a dialogue between theory and historical evidence, without sacrificing one for the sake of the other? The paper thus uses a theoretically informed perspective to examine empirical case studies.

Global inequality and the financialization of food

The global financial crisis has generated new debates over needs. While the financial crisis in the North is primarily understood as a housing crisis, for the global South the financial crisis has meant an emergency of hunger. In 2009 the number of hungry people worldwide increased to one billion as food prices soared to unprecedented levels. This has especially hit hard the world's poor who on average spend 60-80% of their budget on food, resulting in an extraordinary number of food protests around the world (De Schutter 2010; FAO 2011).

Rural sociologists have focused on transnational forces contributing to the food crisis such as trade agreements, uneven subsidies, and climate change. Less recognized is the role of financial speculation in the valuation of food – namely, monetary gains realized from production, processing, distribution, sale, and speculation of food commodities. How the modes of food provision are rendered calculable and how these financial techniques allow for disproportionate monetary gains is worthy of analysis. Financial instruments such as commodity indexes become increasingly important factors in shaping both the length and nature of the value chain.

This paper contributes to a clearer understanding of the financialization of food by employing the lens of standards recently developed within STS literature using a transnational focus. A standards approach is a corrective to accounts that render the activities of finance intangible and subjects to scrutiny the embedded and taken-for-granted models that underlie the value of food. At the same time, a transnational approach to economic sociology expands US centered approaches whose empirical boundaries stay largely within the North. In conclusion, I argue that seeing food with standards in mind helps us to rethink the ways that food systems are configured, as well as the impact of different systems of valuation on meeting basic human needs.

New forms of governance: Parental involvement in schools

This paper argues that parental involvement in their children's schooling is an extension of educational governance into the home and family. What parents describe as involvement occurs across a wide spectrum of activities with their children (St John, Griffith & Allen Haynes, 1999; Standing, 1998). What schooling defines as parental involvement is a much narrower set of activities oriented to the school's teaching and learning agenda (e.g. Epstein, Ontario Ministry of Education website). Currently, this narrow version of parental involvement is touted as a major solution to gaps in children's school achievement by researcher. While the call for parental involvement is not new, recent institutional technologies such as standardized testing, or homework agendas, have increased pressure on parents to do particular kinds of school-oriented work with their children. In effect, work that was traditionally classroom work has been downloaded to parents. This paper explores a variety of sources (interviews with parents and teachers, websites, etc.) to identify these new forms of governance as they extend into global changes in education and the traditionally ungovernable realm of the family's educational work.

El método comparativo de Max Weber: El papel de las tipologías del capitalismo en la comprensión de la economía moderna

Este trabajo, resultado de mi tesis doctoral, propone una investigación sobre el papel del método comparativo en el análisis del desarrollo del capitalismo moderno en la obra de Max Weber. En sus escritos, es posible reconocer la fuerte presencia de las comparaciones entre la economía occidental moderna y las economías antigua (Egipto, Grecia, Roma) y medieval, así como comparaciones con las economías del Oriente (China, India). ¿Cuál es el propósito de hacer comparaciones de formas económicas tan diferentes entre sí en la explicación de un fenómeno occidental? ¿Cuáles son los recursos metodológicos utilizados en este análisis comparativo?

En la comprensión del fenómeno del capitalismo moderno, Weber desarrolla tipologías del capitalismo con distintos niveles de abstracción. Los tipos de capitalismo que componen las tipologías (el capitalismo racional, el capitalismo con orientación política, el capitalismo antiguo, el capitalismo moderno, etc.) funcionan como herramientas analíticas que difieren de los fenómenos históricos que Weber tiene como objetivo investigar. Y, a través de la oposición, de las aproximaciones y de las analogías entre los diversos tipos, las tipologías del capitalismo desempeñan un papel fundamental en la comprensión de una serie de características propias de la economía moderna.

El objetivo de mi trabajo es por un lado, demostrar cómo Weber desarrolla sus tipologías del capitalismo basado en una metodología comparativa. Y por otro lado, tratará de presentar el contexto de los debates de su tiempo que impulsó el desarrollo de tal metodología, entre los cuales se destacan las discusiones entre ciertos grupos de historiadores y economistas acerca del desarrollo de metodologías específicas en el análisis de fenómenos económicos.

GRINBERG, Lev* (Ben Gurion University, grinlev@gmail.com)Traveling resistance: From Egypt to Chile through Israel and Spain

A new wave of mass mobilization spread all over the world following the demonstrations in Tunis and Egypt which succeeded to overthrow their respective dictators. The wave traveled to Spain in May, to Chile and Israel in July, and to the US in October. Although the events in one place encouraged activists in other places, the content and impact of the new movements was determined by the local political conditions. In Egypt the claims "people" claimed democracy, and in Spain the "indignados" protested against neo-liberal policies, in Chile the students demanded public education, and in Israel the "people" demanded social justice.

Activists all over the world are encouraged by the capability to mobilize masses and the example of significant accomplishments. The global events inspire the imagination of local movements, provide ideas of new forms of communication, mobilization and action. However this is not a global movement as it pretends to be, moreover, their interpretation as global movements is de-politicizing the meaning of the movements. While the economy, the media and the images are globalized, politics are local and contextual. By comparing the cases I'll show how much internal politics matter, and make the difference between success and failure of the movements. Although ideas and images travel from country to country, they are adapted and transformed according to the local context. By using the analytical concept of political space the paper seeks to comprehend how State/civil society power relations and their representation or repression in the political arena are crucial to comprehend the cases.

GRISCTI, Ximena* (PhD student at York University, xgriscti@yorku.ca)The space of graffiti in Uruguay's democratic transition

Text-based graffiti is a largely overlooked mass medium that has proliferated in post-dictatorial environments worldwide. In the Southern Cone, where the 'Dirty Wars' of the 1970s and 80s were, as Taussig puts it, "war[s] of silencing", graffiti emerged as a social medium that rendered visible a wide range of uncensored voices in the public sphere. Drawing upon the works of Harvey, Davis, Perelli, Faraone, and Baudrillard, I will explore the role of graffiti during the initial period of democratization that followed the military dictatorship in Uruguay (1973-1985). During the dictatorial regime, graffiti writing was a political tool treated as a political crime. Most, if not all, of the graffiti that emerged during this time was text-based, it was produced by political militants and its content was overtly political. In the transitional era that followed, the graffiti medium exploded in Montevideo, and was produced by a broad sector of the population. It remained predominantly text-based, however its content ranged from the overtly political, to mundane utterances, to the seemingly absurd and irrational, to the artistic and poetic.

My argument will be that all graffiti that emerged in Uruguay out of the dictatorial environment was a form of social mass media in which wide sectors of the population were engaging in direct action against the ideology of the totalitarian regime. The main issues I will be exploring will be the concept of voice within a regime of imposed silence, the idea of visibility in a regime of totalitarian surveillance, graffiti's potential to negotiate and reclaim public space, and the role of graffiti in constructing a collective memory and social history. It is important to underline that graffiti acquires different significance in different sociopolitical contexts, and thus cannot be studied as a single medium divorced from place, culture, history, and economic circumstances.

In spite of the lack of international agreement concerning to the term Functional foods, they represent one of the food sectors with more significant growth in global markets and at the same time one of the most controversial area situated between the food-and-drug boundaries. Claims that functional foodstuffs improve health and the sensation of well-being, and that they contribute towards the reduction of the risk of certain diseases, blur the boundaries between food and drugs (Heasman e Mellantin, 2001). At the same time, specialists warn that there is little understanding concerning the conditions functional foods are being consumed; if the target groups are actually reached. They argue some questions: To whom are functional foods intended? These kinds of food do what they are supposed to do? How much and how long people should consume them to get any health benefits? Furthermore, which are the cumulative effects of their continuous use? A nutrient used as part of treatment of a specific disease should be considered as a medication?

In this paper we analyze the conditions for the emergence of the concept of functional food, the arguments in favor and against the functional foods and the results of an empirical research that took place in Florianopolis, Brazil.

Through 06 focus groups questionnaire and individual interviews applied to patients, we analyzed the perceptions about the role of food in the health-illness process; who guides the alimentary changes; the difficulties to carry out these changes; the strategies used to combine individual will and medical recommendations; the perceptions on the scientific controversies and uncertainties related to the food and health and food as a medication. It was identified the importance of the scientific knowledge in the standardization of the dietary models and in the characterization of what it means to have a "healthy life".

Protección social universal o transferencias monetarias condicionadas: Las disputas por el nombre. Sólo un juego de palabras?*

The field of social policy is often subject to different currents of opinion that establish certain categories and make them compulsory for any analysis or policy design. When studying social policy from the governmentality perspective, one can understand this phenomenon by assuming that they entail power relations linked to regimes of knowledge. When looking into Latin American social policies, the analysis of these relations should account for the conditions of subordination of production and re-production of "poverty knowledge" in our countries. Nonetheless, in recent years, there seems to have been a case of "inversion" in the direction of the traveling of ideas. That is the case for "conditional cash transfers", that after being experimented in LA have been replicated in central countries (vgr. the Opportunity program in New York since 2007).

In our presentation we will build the argument that this category ("conditional cash transfer") becomes the battleground for the labeling of recent changes in social intervention in LA. In this sense, one wonders whether the spread of these schemes by international agencies represent a "recognition" of the limitations of neoliberal strategies in the war against poverty, or an attempt to colonize and domesticate the potential political and cultural implications of an inclusive strategy in terms of "social rights". In order to do so, we analyze the experiences of Argentina, Brazil and Mexico.

As we discuss in our work, the category "conditional cash transfer" assimilates experience with very diverse origins and perspectives, while neglecting that alternative groupings might interpret programs such as universal child allowance in Argentina in light of other experiences developed in previous crises. In particular, we will refer to Aid for Dependant Children designed by Roosevelt in 1935.

GROSS, Matthias* (Helmholtz Centre for Environmental Research - UFZ, matthias.gross@ufz.de)Journey to the heat of the earth: Prelude to a sociology of geothermal energy systems

Sociological studies on renewable energy have pivotally focused on wind, solar, and hydropower. Geothermal power, the Earth's internal heat lurking in the deep, has hardly received any sociological attention. This may have to do with the fact that the tapping of geothermal energy has historically been limited to areas near tectonic plate boundaries. Recent technological developments, however, have expanded the potential of geothermal energy ranging from novel applications in home heating to providing a significant share of the energy mix in some countries, especially when the heat is tapped from several kilometers below the earth's surface. Since this type of energy can be retrieved at an industrial scale or a household level, there are important new sociological questions in terms of the design of the technology and how it is related to existing sociotechnical systems. This also points to the political valences of local energy production versus corporate production. Given that many of the recently launched geothermal power plants and the drilling technologies involved inhibit many scientific unknowns, sociological questions on dealing with these issues (including even earthquakes) appear to be of utmost importance. The presentation thus has two overall exploratory goals: Firstly, to outline possibilities and challenges for sociological research on geothermal energy in relation to other types of alternative energy sources, and, secondly, to deliver suggestions on how to theoretically frame the tapping of these energy reservoirs by building on current insights from the sociology of ignorance. The presentation will be accompanied by some revealing but also ironic comparisons of how 21st century approaches in geothermal energy research and engineering veer towards typologically similar strategies as that used by the researchers in Jules Verne's 19th century science fiction novel A Journey to the Center of the Earth.

The aim of this paper is to undertake an analysis of the socioeconomical profile of the "catadores de lixo" (scavengers), who live and work in a stinking waste dump near the small town of Santo Amaro, Bahia, Brazil. Besides that, we want to discuss the strategies that they employ to survive and try to understand the process of meaning construction of their social identity by applying a survey and using semi-structured and open interviews.

These scavengers, who belong to the lower social class and survive in a subsistence level, collect things that are supposed to be worthless and useless, are not only "poor" and excluded from the formal labour market but suffer a stigma of being like "animals", because they eat food that is not "edible".

Gender and human rights: In search of female otherness

Human rights from the twentieth century suffered a great process of positive, through treaties, conventions and charters. A range of guarantees is to be erected in a universalizing. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 brought a principled and normative basis from which we think the rights alluded to this day. However, idiosyncrasias experienced when we refer to the realization of human rights today are very different from when promulgated the Declaration. Characterization of universal human rights as if they were able to achieve all subjects by simply being human, regardless of their origin, class differences, cultures, etc.. Produces marginalization in groups that are to be considered as "the other", ie they are incapable of experiencing human rights really. In this sense, women as a category of gender, represent an important group that is put the margin of these rights. This is because although they are formally considered subject of rights, are unable to enjoy human rights. We wish therefore to question the character of universality of human rights advocates as a western court, entertaining as subjects only those who are male, white, and why not bourgeois, without considering the otherness of minorities that also through their struggles, emancipation make and unmake human rights.

Justice has many dimensions, from a dogmatic cut, flowing into the judiciary as a body for ensuring the democratic state itself, through the legal pluralism that sees itself not only in the state but in ghettos or several groups composed of women, indigenous people, elderly, children, black etc., forms of recognition of rights. Thus, it is possible to identify in a confluent, a constant concern with the realization of justice. People's right and duty of the State, public policy, justice concerns the form and content of the distribution of justice in Brazil. This paper wants to analyze justice as public policy. Addressing the public policy of justice brings out, in turn, the question of the judiciary as an institution of the Brazilian public administration. There is no denying the increased demands that are brought to the judiciary for enforcing rights, the judiciary in this regard should be addressed and problematized as an important tool for effecting social change and democracy. We succeeded to investigate also how judicial activism contributes to the conformation of the status quo or to the actual realization of the principles and guarantees erected from the constitutional order of 1988. In contemporary Brazilian society, police brutality and his involvement in violent forms of conflict resolution are topics relevant to understand the public security dilemmas.

This paper aims to analyze the relationships between professional identity and police violence: how police practices are represented by police officers and the effects for the law and order.

Such practices are largely a cognitive and symbolic universe from which the police officers conceives it's work in terms of brands, belongs and in social identity categories.

The survey was structured using the theory of social representations. The empirical goal was to obtain the social representations of patrol and judiciary police about their practices, professional performance and relationships with society.

The design of the survey was a sample structured by spatial divisions, hierarchies, roles and sex, comparing both polices: the sample is compounded by 399 questionnaires for the judiciary police, and more 1,182 answered by patrol police officers, both male and female. Also, we have done interviews and focus groups.

The analysis focuses on: motivations for the choice of profession; the pride of the profession; representations of fear, stress, uncertainty and risk arising from police work; and how all this symbols affects its performance and its social construction of professional identity.

Cities and global ecological change: The governance of climate change and biodiversity in Canadian urban regions

What kind of 'systems' are cities? For many sociologists, though they don't often use the term, they are basically socio-technical systems; the most complex systems human beings have created. Cities are the joint product of planned and unplanned action. Urban sociology has tended to stress the social and political production of space and infrastructures, and has eschewed the ecological dimensions of urban and metropolitan areas as determining factors. Sociologists remain sceptical of a too strong ecological approach to the urban way of life. However, is traditional urban sociology not challenged by the global ecological problems and the part cities can play in ecological global governance? The paper will examine sociological approaches to cities with regard to the environment and environmental problems. It will look at the idea of socio-ecological system and its implications for urban governance. Critical of an approach that may tend to 'naturalize' societies, but, on the other hand, conscious that urban areas cannot abstract themselves from their 'ecologies', the paper will present research results on the governance, joint or not, of climate change and biodiversity in Canadian metropolitan areas. What factors help governing, jointly or not, two global ecological problems at the urban level? What factors hinder such an action? Cities greatly differ among themselves and this can be shown in the Canadian context. But they also share common policies especially with respect to urban planning. Are the new planning ideas, such as densification, public transport improvements, urban sustainability in the likes of smart growth and new urbanism, leading to a better grasp of global issues and to a substantial contribution of cities to global governance? The paper will conclude with some considerations on linking a socio-ecological system approach to a sociotechnical approach.

Stairways to peace in an Israeli academic college: Contact, communication, compassion

Academic colleges in Israel are potential key agents of crosscultural transformation, cooperation and tolerance, due to their uniquely challenging multicultural environment in today's deeply segregated Israeli society: Arab and Jewish students meet on a daily basis for several years, as equal colleagues --unprecedented occurrence in their lives-- without having the required skills or experience to recognize and meet each other as such. As tomorrow's educational and professional cadres, students will undoubtedly carry their multi/cross-cultural experience into their families, communities and occupational endeavors.

In these challenging times, the window of opportunity in this volatile region has a limited life, and peace education is pivotal towards hope and sustainable change.

A workshop format was created and implemented in the Kinneret College on the Sea of Galilee to facilitate empathic crosscultural communication skills between Arab and Jewish students towards the development of a planetary/unitive consciousness towards cooperative action. (4th stage of an ongoing Action Research which began in 1999. A fifth stage is planned to train students as peace-facilitators on campus.)

Six formal and 4 informal workshops, each meeting in 4-hour sessions during a whole semester, have taken place. The guiding principles of the workshops are rooted in a wholistic-systemic sociological framework, and the principles of planetary consciousness and activism: interconnectedness of all, sustainability, optimism, the whole person, empathic communication, personal and social/institutional transformation, synergy, from 'power over' to 'power to', among others.

Workshops' processes foster empowerment through shared visions of hope, cooperation and plans for a peaceful and sustainable society -- powerful motivators of social responsibility and action. They highlight the unique leading-role opportunity and responsibility of the academic community in promoting a deeper dialogue, a vision and a model for peaceful, harmonious and healing relationships for the best of all of life.

"La configuración del campo de estudios sobre juventud, adolescencia e infancia en Argentina a partir de la recuperación de la democracia"

En esta exposición se tratará de reconstruir la historia de la conformación del campo de los estudios sobre juventud, infancia y adolescencia en Argentina.

Podríamos afirmar que la demarcación de un campo de estudios académicos sobre Juventudes comienza a manifestarse en los años posteriores a la transición democrática. La declaración del Año Internacional de la Juventud en 1985 operó como estímulo para la transferencia de recursos para investigación desde los países centrales así como para la formulación de programas de intervención social. En el campo académico los estudios sobre Juventud poseían una autonomía parcial con respecto a otros dos campos la Sociología de la Educación y las Políticas Públicas. Esta condición tiene su lógica en concepciones teóricas acerca del rol social de las nuevas generaciones especialmente acerca de su potencial en los procesos de reproducción y/o cambio social.

La configuración del campo de los estudios sobre adolescencia e infancia es aún más reciente, y son otros sus parámetros, mas vinculados al "siglo de los derechos" con la ratificación de la Convención Internacional de los derechos del niño que después fue incorporada junto a otros tratados y convenciones en la Constitución Nacional.

Education and ethnic-racial relations in the Post-Durban context in Brazil: An intercultural sight over the national curricular policies

This study is part of an ongoing research in the Post-Graduate Program in Education of Agrest Academic Center of Federal University of Pernambuco - Brazil. In this paper, we seek based on Post-colonial studies of Latin-American source (CASTRO-GÓMES & GROSFOGUEL, 2007; QUIJANO, 2005, 2007; MIGNOLO, 2005), the relation between the Interculturality and the Curricular Policy of Basic Education in Brazil in Post-Durban context. We started from the presupposed that racism results of a sociological construction and mental of idea race, fruit of a colonial dominance standard founded on the Eurocentric rationality. After the Third World Conference Against Racism, The Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Correlate Intolerance, (2001, Durban – South Africa), that had active participation of the Brazilian Social Movements, the myth of racial democracy (FERNANDES, 1978) it's demystified in Brazil and, unchains a series of measures of Affirmative Actions. We realized that the fights of social movements interfered in the Curricular Policy aiming to promote the confrontation of ethnic-racial and educational inequalities. Thus, we sought to understand in what perspective of Interculturality – Functional or Critic (WASLH, 2007, 2008; SARTORELLO, 2009) – the Curricular Policies is settle down. To SARTORELLO the Functional Perspective serves to the interests of the neo-liberal state aiming a process of subordinated integration of the excluded groups. And the Critic criticizes of the neo-liberal system and considers the Intercultural Education as a right and a mean to transform the subaltern condition of the minorities. From the criteria of Content Analysis (BARDIN, 2004) we selected the corpus proceeded to a documental analysis of the National Curricular Policies (NCPs) that were promulgated in Post-Durban context. Adaptarse y resistir al poder de los actores armados: Dos facetas de la acción colectiva en contextos de violencia

En algunas regiones colombianas fuertemente golpeadas por el conflicto armado, como es el caso del Urabá, han surgido iniciativas de acción colectiva que han sido catalogadas –incluso por quienes participan en ellas– como formas de "resistencia civil" frente a la acción de los actores armados. Uno de los ejemplos más emblemáticos de estas iniciativas es el de las llamadas "Comunidades de Paz". A partir de observaciones realizadas en el terreno e inspirada en enfoques provenientes de la sociología pragmática, esta ponencia busca no solamente caracterizar el tipo de acción colectiva que se gestó en el seno de las Comunidades de Paz del Urabá, sino también determinar hasta qué punto el contexto de violencia moldea y afecta la acción colectiva misma. Se trata pues de comprender lo que significa, desde el punto de vista de los actores, movilizarse en contextos de violencia aguda, dilucidando las estrategias que ellos despliegan allí para, al mismo tiempo, adaptarse y resistir a la acción violenta de los actores armados. Además, la ponencia pretende explicar por qué razones estas formas de acción colectiva, que tienen lugar en regiones marginales de Colombia, no logran adquirir una visibilidad significativa en el espacio público nacional y tienen entonces que apelar al escenario internacional para encontrar apoyos en públicos de ciudadanos extranjeros.

Crisis y memoria histórica: El golpe de estado de 1973 en Chile

Al igual que en las biografías individuales, en la historia de los países existen momentos de basculación, eventos que carecen de previsibilidad para quienes los viven, y frente a los cuales no hay respuestas disponibles a nivel individual ni colectivo. El golpe de estado de 1973 en Chile corresponde a un evento histórico relacionable a la idea de crisis en un colectivo social, el cual dio origen a importantes cambios en la sociedad chilena de la época, muchos de los cuales se mantienen hasta nuestros días. El presente trabajo aborda el tema de la memoria histórica sobre el golpe de estado de 1973, a partir del concepto de "crisis" propuesto por autores cercanos al enfoque del curso de la vida: ¿Como este evento marca la memoria de las personas, y en que formas representa para ellas un momento de crisis en sus recuerdos? Por otra parte, ¿Cómo este evento marca a personas de distintas edades? Estos aspectos son abordados a partir de los datos chilenos obtenidos por la investigación internacional CEVI (Cambios y eventos en el curso de la vida), que trata sobre la relación entre el desarrollo de las vidas individuales y la dinámica socio-histórica, dando relevancia a la noción de cambio sobre la propia vida o el entorno, y la percepción que los individuos tienen de estos. La muestra fue obtenida en Concepción durante el 2009, y considera cinco grupos de edad que cubren la vida adulta, sin embargo para este trabajo se consideran solo cuatro grupos de edad que vivieron directamente el golpe de estado: 35-39, 50-54, 65-69, y 78-86 años.

El envejecimiento desde la óptica demográfica: Podemos hablar de un cambio de paradigma?

El fenómeno del envejecimiento de la población ha venido despertando creciente interés en la producción demográfica latinoamericana. Ello se debe en parte al acelerado proceso de envejecimiento que están experimentando algunos países de la región, como Brasil y México.

Dentro de la producción académica del área priman los enfoques relacionados con la salud y aquellos que analizan los desafíos que enfrentarán los sistemas de jubilaciones y pensiones ante el fenómeno. Esas perspectivas de alguna manera resaltan un lado que puede ser llamado de negativo o alarmista, ya que tienden a asociar la vejez con la enfermedad o con la muerte y con la insustentabilidad de los sistemas de seguridad social.

Centrándonos sobre la forma en que este fenómeno es concebido por parte de la demografía, el objetivo de este trabajo es elaborar una genealogía del concepto de envejecimiento de la población, enfocándonos en aquellas cuestiones que desde la miada demográfica lo erigen como un "problema". Será realizado un recorrido a través de los diferentes enfoques sobre el envejecimiento de la población que fueron surgiendo, transformándose y ganando legitimidad, colocándolos en relación con las miradas dominantes sobre otras variables demográficas. Para tal fin serán analizados documentos producidos en el marco de las Asambleas Internacionales y Regionales de Envejecimiento, así como los provenientes de las Conferencias Mundiales de Población que abordan cuestiones relacionadas a la temática.

Sustentamos la hipótesis de que los enfoques más recientes sobre el fenómeno, asociados al llamado "paradigma del envejecimiento activo" no puede ser considerado en tanto nuevo paradigma, ya que son tributarios de una concepción de envejecimiento que lo dimensiona principalmente como un hecho intrínsecamente negativo y que acarrea enormes costos sociales.

A "silence" field of struggle: A visual interpretation of the current memorial landscape of military cemeteries in Israel

In the past decade, Israel's military cemeteries have been changing dramatically. These changes include a variety of textual, visual and spatial elements that had not been characteristic of the landscape of military cemeteries (MC's) until then. Even though the rules that articulate the semiotic system in these cemeteries were almost hermetic and uniform, we are witness to some growing "fractures".

The current visibility of MC's in terms of Social Space reveals a multimodal iconography in a contested public space. This iconography is composed by diverse imagery of languages, styles, and genres; however, instead of constituting an arbitrary collection of artifacts, this diversity reveals a new pattern of loss and mourning. We are witness of the existence of a dual structure: the authorized arrangement becomes an infrastructure that is steadily being obscured by an unofficial mantle of forms, languages, and meanings. As well a controlled collective space metamorphoses into a space shared by the public as a multicultural community of individuals. Everyday life practices are being reified via visible artifacts and representations: plants, decorative objects, toys, offerings, photos, and images. The focus shifted from "hard" memory to "soft" memory: from official stone memorials and commemorative objects to unofficial spaces and objects of mourning and loss.

The visual and spatial reorganization and modification of the landscape of the MC's represent an attempt to change the flow of power relations from top-down processes to bottom-up processes. The various participants in the bereavement community are symbolically claiming the space. They reflect profound conflicts within the Israeli society and Zionist ideology that are embodied in the resistance and response to the official linguistic restrictions and policy in MC's. It seems that the landscape in the military cemeteries becomes a "silence" field of struggle between the national and the private claims towards memorizing and remembering.

Equal pay rights and public sector unionism : The story of a long lasting mobilization in the UK (1960-2010)

In the UK, public sector unions have been at the forefront of campaigns for equal pay for the last 50 years, despite enduring strategies of restructuring, privatization and cuts in the public sector. Depending on periods, unions have used various tactics to promote women's rights and pay equity. Building on a multi-method approach combining a variety of techniques (interviews with lawyers, experts and UNISON activists; union archives; legal case study data and secondary academic research accumulation), we will describe the different strategies unions have chosen to defend their members' interests, from labour-feminist coalition-building to collective bargaining, political lobbying and strategic litigation. More specifically we will question the use of legal mobilization, its efficiency and interactions with other union repertoires of action. To what extent and under which conditions have public sector unions turned to the courts to promote equal pay? What impact has mobilizing the law had on making rights a reality? What were the impact of equal pay campaigns and litigation on the promotion of economic justice within the public sector? To understand the evolution and outcomes of equal pay battles in the public sector, we will examine the role of the economic and political environment (notably government led restructuring and "modernization" programs), the impact of the EU legislation, and the characteristics and strategies of the different actors involved (unions, employers, Equal Opportunity Commission, judiciary and lawyers).

Brazil, 1996-2011: Why a racial democracy adopted affirmative action?

The adoption of affirmative action in Brazilian universities, early in this century, greatly increased the number of blacks entering higher education system in Brazil. A recent study of UERJ estimates a 264% increase of Blacks in the private universities and 23% in public ones. My goals in this communication are twofold. In the theoretical front my aim is to elaborate a careful political and conjunctural analysis focused mainly in the period between 1996, when the Ministry of Justice convened a conference in Brasilia on multiculturalism and affirmative action, and 2011. In this period affirmative action programs, mainly quotas for blacks, indigeneous people, and students from public high schools where enacted at 71 public universities. I will advance some hypotheses on the differences among the programs of social inclusion in different universities as an interplay of space and time, of local and national political determinants. In the empirical front my goal is to show the intricate fabric of policies in place on these universities and the first evaluations of some them, seven years passed of the first recruitments based on affirmative actions.

Sexuality as a citizenship right: Social participation in young homosexuals' mentality change

This study comprises a broader research that deliberates about some of the ways sexuality is constructed by young Brazilians who are part of student organizations, political parties and social movements. Through participatory observation and in-depth interviews with young gay men, lesbians and bisexuals, their discourse, which, by relating sexuality and citizenship, is given a political sense, is examined. The narratives evince the understanding of equal rights as a guiding principle to the building of a socially democratic country. They are opposed to normative heterosexuality, subverting this standard through the proposition of sexuality's free expression as a social contract's legitimate condition. This discourse introduces sexuality as a personal attribute claimed for in society under the sign of individuality and power of choice. Thus, individuals socially invisible and stigmatized by their sexual orientation are redefined as citizens. It sets out from the emphasis on a general attribute that abrades differences and simultaneously allows for difference. To import the notion of citizenship from other spheres and appropriate it on behalf of sexuality, requires that sexuality break free from nuclear meanings like intimacy, gender, identity, and be linked to policy instead (laws, rights, respect, coexistence). This vocabulary focuses on the debate for ways to improve homosexual quality of life, pulling away from issues concerning male and female genders' narratives of the self. Relinquishment from the pursuit of the self in sexuality, in this sense, shows that the gender issue, although considered important, is sidelined by the young participants. The specifics of gender, sexual practices and behavior are diluted on the behalf of what would be common to all: citizenship. This refusal to consider the shaping of sexual identities shows an appreciation for the public sphere at the expense of the private one, and unveils the prevalence of political over personal issues.

Youth participation as an individuation and socialization experience: Rebuilding identity

This research examined how participatory experience allows young people to understand and build intersection points between their individuality and the collectivity. A qualitative case study has been performed on groups of young members of a Brazilian NGO involved with education for citizenship and community work for socially vulnerable youths. The following instruments were used: in-depth interviews, participative observation, a field diary and documentary research on the institution's blog. The participatory process stands for a moment of significant immersion in their social context. In this movement, young people confront negative feelings related to the stigmas of poverty and violence of their communities. The development of critical analysis mirrors the awakening of sensibility in the civic engagement in community actions. Within them they highlight the unveiling of a reference to collectivity, which, through cooperation, reciprocity and respect, alters their sense of individualism. Individuation is not only of the narcissistic type, such as that originating from consumption values, but it is made greater by means of connections between the I and the We, which become the discourse matrix used by young people to shape their identity. Thus, social and emotional bonds are triggered from the perception that personal achievements underlie everyday political struggles. The narratives converge in the solidarity incorporated as a value that guides the formation of a responsibility ethics through the multiplication of knowledge in educational projects and collective actions on youth groups connected to community associations, schools and community health centers. Such new social relationships are created as youths see themselves in common projects and collective interests. The meaning of participatory experience is twofold: both as individuation and socialization processes.

Embedded regulation and social inequalities: The blurry frontier between domestic employment and professional care. Brazil in a comparative perspective

Recent literature has been stressing that modes of care provision depend upon characteristics of welfare and gender regimes. Actors' roles and their patterns of relationship, both on providing and financing care activities, differ hence from country to country as they reflect the way labor market and social protection are organized and gendered. In this paper we will join and amplify that perspective introducing a new dimension: professional identities and social recognition among careworkers. Firstly the paper explores the frontier between domestic employees and professional care workers profiles underlying its blurry nature in the Brazilian case, in a comparative perspective based on secondary data for Brazil, France and Japan. Secondly, it analyzes the way 2811 workers (whose activities would be technically described as professional care work) describe the job they performed and auto identify professionally; this analysis relies upon empirical data collected for Sao Paulo Metropolitan region as part of a monthly household "Survey on Employment and Unemployment" (PED). Thirdly, it explores interpretations collected through in-depth interviews with care workers in their union at Sao Paulo. We draw upon the conclusion that, even though there is a growing regulatory and protective effort from the Brazilian State, the embeddedness of those regulations on a social environment characterized by its profound - and gendered - inequalities avoids the consolidation of professional identities and the emergence of collective interests and mobilization.

The informal organization of Bolivian immigrants in the city of Sao Paulo for better conditions of life

Since the 1980s, a large number of undocumented Bolivian immigrants is entering the Brazilian borders in search of jobs and better quality of life. In most cases, these immigrants are incorporated by sewing workshops, especially in São Paulo, where they live in subhuman conditions and face strenuous hours of work. Given this context, the main purpose of this paper is to discuss the situation of informal political organizations that seek social improvements within that particular group of workers, contemporaneously, in the city of Sao Paulo, and secondly, which are their urgent demands. Subsequently, we will discuss to what extent the fear of deportation, associated with the legal restrictions imposed by the Brazilian State, may interfere in the intricate process of looking for social achievements, as well as, basic guarantees, present in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, by these immigrants.

The perception of the discourse of the (human) rights of the Turkish Left

As it is known that Marxism and its perception of Human Rights was/is a problematic relation during the history of Declarations. The Marxist critiques of human rights (and even the discourse of rights) was seen as the bourgeois rights and the idea of fundamental rights of individuals as the advocacy of market values. That was also true for the Turkish Left. Until 1980 the main axis of the struggle for the Turkish left was the class and all the aspects of bourgeois ideology, and also human rights, had to be refused in the name of this struggle. There were no struggle apart from the "class struggle" among the many different branches of Turkish Socialist and Marxist left. However, after the 1980 military coup and its destructive effect (arrests, tortures, extra judicial executions etc.) on the individuals forced the movements to reconsider on the both meaning of human rights and the struggle for the rights. After these years some branches of Turkish Left begin to defend and adopt the human rights discourse in their agendas. In this study, first of all the relation between discourse of rights and human rights with the Turkish Left will be question within a historical perspective. Then I will try to present the interviews conducted with the leaders and senior officials of different Turkish Marxist and socialist parties and movements in order to denote their perspectives regarding the discourse of rights and human rights.

Empowering women through profitable microfinance: A case study of Bandhan

This case study on Bandhan, a microfinance organization, represents a social business. Bandhan provides micro-loans to poor women for undertaking income generation activities. It aims at empowering its borrowers and their family members to break the cycle of poverty. Further, Bandhan projects that it operates as an independent, self-sustainable and profitable organization. It aspires to become a full-fledged bank, consequently bringing its borrowers to the financial mainstream. Therefore, this case study explores whether and how, focused poverty eradication and ambitious profits are simultaneously possible and if there are any tradeoffs involved. Additionally, a key objective is to explore whether the impact of Bandhan on lives of its borrowers is substantial as well as sustainable. To achieve these, the research involved an in-depth field study of Bandhan's operations and its impact. Both qualitative and quantitative data was collected through primary as well as secondary sources. The key participants in this case study were over 100 women who had taken several micro-loans from Bandhan, along with Bandhan employees at various hierarchical levels. The study was conducted in over six districts and 10 field office locations of Bandhan in West Bengal, India, the first state where Bandhan started its operations. The findings of this case study are quite interesting and insightful. The empirical results depict that Bandhan is not only profitable and fast-growing but is also quite successful in improving the quality of life of its borrowers. However, it is observed that Bandhan's dual objective is the underlying reason behind both its effectiveness as well as its challenges. The study also captures several real-life cases of the women participants and depicts the impact of microfinance on their economic, capacity and relational well-being.

What if fence eats the grass?: The micropolitics of forest use and control in Jammu & Kashmir (India)

The supporters as well as critics of participatory forest management programmes have conventionally understood these interventions in relation to issues of cooperation and conflict between forest bureaucracies and village communities. Recently, some scholars have pointed to the importance of power relations within local communities in defining the gap between forest management policies and on-the-ground realities. However, very little attention has been given by scholars to unravel the crucial role played by forest field staff in ultimately shaping the outcome of nature conservation policies.

Taking the case-study of National Afforestation Programme or NAP (a centrally sponsored scheme initiated in 2002) in the Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir (J&K), this paper demonstrates how depending on their differential abilities and respective power to bargain with the forest field staff, village residents are able to devise various strategies to secure their interests amidst the opportunities and challenges created by the NAP. Based on extensive fieldwork and interviews with forest field-staff, members of forest management committees, rural local bodies and ordinary villagers, the paper unravels the problems of forest management and governance and presents the experiences of the village communities with the forest field-staff and reveals new spaces of cooperation, conflict and contestations that have emerged under the NAP in selected villages of J&K.

The principal argument in this paper is that conservation programmes such as the NAP permeate existing relations of domination and subordination, and are reshaped by power dynamics between village residents and field staff, resulting in differential impacts on various categories of forest users. While the relatively affluent residents are able to access forest resources by indulging in illegal timber harvesting, it is the poorest who bear the cost of nature conservation interventions.

Building popular-democratic alternatives in Latin America: A comparative analysis of post-neoliberal movements in Venezuela and Argentina

The loss of legitimacy of neo-liberalism and the exhaustion of traditional forms of liberal democracy have led to the surge of social movements and the rise to power of left-wing governments in Latin America during the first decade of the 2000s. Many observers tend to confirm the fact that the rise of the Latin American left has manifested itself with a strength which is unparalleled in the recent history of the region, and they all agree that a new era has been opened in the history of Latin American social movements (Barrett, Chavez & Rodriguez-Garavito, 2008). In this context, my research aims to understand the politico-cultural implications of the ongoing transformative resistance and the new counter-hegemonic process in Latin America. Building on Otero's theory of political-cultural formation which is founded on a general dissatisfaction with the class reductionism of economic deterministic versions of Marxism as well as the limitations of contemporary social movements theory in explaining the empowerment process of subordinate groups, this research consists of a contrasted case study of communal councils in Venezuela, and of recuperated workplaces in Argentina. The study will be organized around the following research question: "Which politico-cultural factors have an explicit and constitutive role in the empowerment of subordinate groups under postneoliberalism?" My hypothesis suggests that the Venezuelan case is marked by the co-existence of "emancipatory and political-historical models of leadership" (Grace, 1997), "popular-democratic" type of state intervention (Otero, 1999), and a historical-cultural configuration of transitory nature oscillating between "critical" and "naïve" aspirations (Freire, 1998). On the other hand, the post-neoliberal project in Argentina seems not to express the same kind of state vigour and the same level of embeddedness of social movements in political change due to the prevalence of "naïve consciousness", the consolidation of bureaucratic-managerial forms of leadership over emancipatory forms of leadership, and the predominance of bourgeois-hegemonic state intervention.

Emerging Latino civil society in new destinations

This paper will address the rapid emergence—and fracturing—of politically active immigrant coalitions in a "new destination" community outside of Chicago. In suburban Waukegan, the largely-Mexican Latino population make up fifty-three percent of the population. Prior to 2007, the largely undocumented population was politically dormant. Though constituting a large part of the population, their political representation is limited to two Puerto Rican aldermen.

This paper will explore how the political climate has been characterized by a sharp divide between the principally white, 'old Waukegan' and the principally Latino 'new Waukegan.' These two groups hold different perspectives on the meaning of citizenship and the rights afforded to those within/outside of these conceptualized notions of citizenship. Within the political sphere, the city council has been dominated by the 'old', generating a negative reaction to the influx of immigrants from the local legislative body. This reaction materialized in the passing of harsh anti-immigrant legislations 287g and Secure Communities. Though 287g was removed by subsequent representatives, Secure Communities continues to be heavily enforced.

Approaching Waukegan as a site of emergent Latino civil society, this paper argues that this anti-immigrant political climate has generated a dynamic of coalition building and fracturing. The mobilization among local Latinos reacting to 287g marked the initial engagement of 'New Waukegan'. Though the original coalitions splintered, new coalitions push to improve the quality of life of immigrants in the current "enforcement" climate. This paper will explore the internal divisions within the activist community. Though new coalitions share similarly non-traditional conceptualizations of citizenship and belonging, they prioritize different concerns such as class, classic civic participation, everyday subsistence and access, and legal status and vulnerability. Ultimately, this paper will inquire as to the implications of organizing within "new destination" areas and within a harsh-anti-immigrant climate.

Activity of ecological movements at all difficulties makes representation of powers structures of different levels from local to central ones to correct their policy and upraises assignments for ecological aims. But the main task of these movements is formation of public opinion. Researches in opinions, orientations, behavior of different social groups, problems of ecological safety are extremely important to find the connection between existing public opinion, hard ecological problems and ability of science and state to control solving of them. In 1966-2009 the Sociological survey was conducted in Tomsk region.

The following research was described; analysis level of ecological activities of population in Tomsk. To speak about ecological activity of population of Tomsk, facts show that it is not pure «institutional» problem caused by institution of industry and subjected to be solved by other institution, government, without special role of common people in this deal. To check this we turned to population about possibility of it's participation in defense of rights for social privileged suggested for people living in 30-kilometer zone from nuclear objections. It was found that direct active participation.

Problem of ecology is realised by the people as one of the most important ones and is stand in rating of all social problems at second place after criminality.

Version that in public awareness of Russian population ecology is perceived as institutional problem was partly confirmed. However, one fourth (25%) wants to personally participate in activity of public ecological initiatives, 42% answered that do not want this. It is not easy question to explain causes of low activity of population. Special research must be devoted to this question.

Brazil is an outstanding case of institutional innovation experiences of participation and extra-parliamentary representation. Both are nowadays features of the Brazilian state and thus the range and degree of institutionalization of new venues for participation and extra-parliamentary representation are unparalleled: over 30 thousand institutionalized policy councils, not to speak of hundreds of non-mandatory councils created by the city halls in the bigger municipalities. Surprisingly, although Brazil became an emblematic case of participatory governance, we still need to improve our understanding about this new layer of institutions. Most of cumulated knowledge was produced by case studies, but we lack systematic knowledge of these institutions working as institutionalized structure of participatory governance. This paper draws on a new generation of literature intending to cope with this lacuna. We present finding that are innovative in three ways: first, we analyze councils relationally from outside, as used by civil society organizations; second, we examine them as part of a broader organizational ecology specialized in coordinating collective action within civil society and in enhancing civil society policy influence (f.i. councils, fora, federated hubs of civil organizations); and finally, we do so by working in a systematic comparison of the place of councils in that organizational ecology in six of the largest Brazilian cities (Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo, Belo Horizonte, Salvador, Porto Alegre and Brasilia). Methodologically the finds draw on network analysis.

The city of Rio de Janeiro has been central in this strategy, due to play a prominent role in the former event and to take the lead from London after 2012. International press coverage have been keen to explore geopolitical readings in this scenario as a coming out to party for Brazil as an influential economic force, but on a local scale the hosting of mega-events have also been pursued as a strategy for disciplining the urban space and to open up new areas for capital accumulation. This paper focuses on the process of Olympic city-making in the West End of Rio de Janeiro, where the planning and construction of facilities and transport network have adversely affected low-income settlements. The planning of the Olympic Park have become the latest episode in a series of attempts to drive out one of the longest established poor settlements in the borough of Barra da Tijuca. Attention is given to the changing discourse justifying the relocation and the context in which residents have resisted eviction. In another case study, the paper considers the construction of Bus Rapid Transit corridors aimed to improve the difficult access to the area. In this instance, some communities were not able to avoid eviction, being relocated to the western edges of the city or financially compensated. Analysis of the eviction process is drawn from material collected by visiting the affected communities. The paper concludes reflecting on the inexorability of Olympic city-making Rio 2016 and the entitlement to the emerging geographies.

This paper is based on a comparative project of state-society relationships with respect to environmental policymaking. It focuses on the cases of Argentina and Brazil. It shows that in these two countries the relationships between civil society organizations and state officials have evolved toward different patterns in terms of degree of conflictivity, the strength and types of ties linking civil society activists and state officials, and the repertoires of contention adopted. A preliminary conclusion is that, in comparison to the Argentina case, in Brazil networks of collaboration involving activists outside and inside the state have played a more visible role. This paper presents hypotheses about these differences between the cases, in an effort to better understand their implications for activism and policy-making. It also seeks to contribute to broader theoretical debates about social movements and their relationship with the institutional arena.

Cross-sectional indicators usually show levels of poverty and in-work poverty (IWP) that have not decreased or which have even increased slightly in recent decades in Europe. Also, differences between countries with respect to relative poverty levels are stable to a large extent. However, since mobility is usually high in these situations, cross-sectional indicators provide only limited information. Most poverty episodes are short-lasting while many of the people who have come out of poverty return relatively soon to it. As a consequence, the percentage of persons who experience a period of poverty at some time during their lives is much higher than the percentage of persons affected by poverty in a certain year.

The dynamic analysis of poverty is particularly interesting for the study of IWP for several reasons. First, to be able to respond to the question of whether employment is a sure way of avoiding the risk of poverty it is essential to know the extent to which situations that combine employment and relative poverty are temporary or persistent. Second, there is the question of whether differences in IWP levels between countries respond to different mobility patterns and if those patterns can be linked to specific institutional contexts.

The aim of this paper is to offer a dynamic analysis of IWP based on data of the EU-SILC (2005-2007) for a group of four European countries (Spain, France, Poland and the United Kingdom) representative of some welfare regime variants.

Feminization and the coloniality of labour: The case of undocumented Latin American domestic workers in Western Europe

While the demand for domestic and care workers in the EU is increasing, due to the growing incorporation of women into the labour market, an aging population and the privatization of social care, the possibility of entry and settlement for non-EU citizens in the last ten years has been restricted. Meanwhile, State programmes that seek societal answers to domestic and care work are rare. Offers such as "cash payment for care" have individualized care by giving the responsibility of organizing it back to the households. Refusing to assume sole responsibility for the household, professional women opt together with their household members to employ another woman to do this work.

Drawing on the example of Latin American women living in Germany, Austria, Spain and the UK, I will discuss the juncture between migration policies, feminization and the coloniality of labour. Juxtaposing the private households with the dynamics of global interdependencies, the local face of the gendered and racialized division of work of the modern/colonial world system becomes a tangible and immediate reality in private households in Western Europe. It is in this regard that the legacies of a colonial order, reactivated through racial and gendered segregation in the labour market and dehumanizing migration policies, are felt on an individual level and mobilized in our everyday encounters, bringing us back to Anibal Quijano's analysis of the 'coloniality of labour'.

Socio-cultural context of corruption

Corruption counteraction requires definite and consistent ideas about the essence and forms of corrupt behaviour. In other words, in the course of development and implementation of a national anticorruption policy, it is important to consider existing standards or stereotypes in the understanding of corruption. People rely on such standards in their assessments of various dimensions of corruption, which, sometimes, differ from a legislative vision of the essence and forms of corruption entirely. In the countries where the process of implementation of the international anticorruption conventions containing fundamental or model descriptions of elements of corruption crimes has not been completed, the picture is even more complicated.

In the public opinion, corruption may take various forms; and a model described in an anticorruption law is not always acceptable for people. Moreover, there are types of actions that look like corruption but are not corruption from a legal perspective; conversely, circumstances that may not look corrupt at first sight are corruption under the law. It is very important to determine how respondents understand corruption and how they distinguish its various forms in specific everyday situations. From a socio cultural perspective, perceived assessments of corruption depend on the public conceptions of corruption.

The problem has received essentially no attention in the studies conducted in Ukraine. To an extent, an explanation could be that there were no legal experts in the research groups carrying these surveys out and that the conceptions of sociologists in respect of corruption were, at best, incomplete or superficial, because they covered only most common forms of corrupt conduct, i.e. bribery and abuse of power. Legal subtleties associated with the definition of offenders, elements of crime, types of liability and correlation between moral and legal aspects etc. have been left without attention of the methodology designers.

Zqué se crea al fomentar el emprendimiento? Los impactos políticos, sociales, culturales y de solidaridad del fomento del emprendimiento

Las administraciones públicas y gobiernos de todo el mundo han tendido a incentivar el emprendimiento como un valor y capital necesario para la creación de empleo y el crecimiento económico. En las últimas décadas han crecido instituciones destinadas al fomento del espíritu emprendedor, la asesoría de emprendedores y la incubación de empresas. ¿Qué aspectos económicos, sociales, culturales, políticas han potenciado los centros de apoyo y fortalecimiento del emprendimiento? Existen investigaciones empíricas que han mostrado el impacto favorable que tienen las nuevas empresas en el desarrollo y el crecimiento económico (Reynolds et al. 2002; Audretsch y Keilbach 2004a,b,c, 2005; Audretsch et al. 2006; Plummer y Acs 2005; Acs y Varga 2005). Sin embargo, existen amplios espacios que no han sido abordados en profundidad como la relación del fomento del emprendimiento y la creación de capital político, el aumento del capital humano, la solidaridad social y la satisfacción o felicidad. El objetivo de esta investigación es analizar los impactos del fomento de la cultura emprendedora más allá de los meros resultados económicos. Se estudian los impactos del fomento del emprendimiento en el capital social, capital político, capital humano, solidaridad y satisfacción. Esta información es de alto valor añadido para la evaluación de las políticas públicas de fomento del emprendimiento. Los efectos del fortalecimiento del espíritu emprendedor deben ser medidos y analizados para valorar qué tipo de sociedad se está creando. La cultura emprendedora no debe dejarse como un bien per se desconociendo qué consecuencias genera.

Project's results based elections and public management interactive democratic evaluation model

Campaign promises have been the paradigm for government elections for thousands years without a trust evidence of expected results once a candidate or party is elected. Furthermore, Public Management, Government positions and Congress Staff can waste from 3 to 6 years without a systematic work plan to produce results for Society. An Interactive Democratic Evaluation Model based in current technology embedded in Society allow a closed loop Human System to Propose and Prioritize Society's relevant problems; to select the preferred team to work on the problem; to capture solutions from Society's members like Academia, Industry, Minorities, etc.; to Assign Public Resources to the problem organized as a formal Project; to Follow up in real time Project's progress; to Assign a Society's elected team to Evaluate project's results; to publish project results from Candidate/Public; and to Collect and Process Society's educated votes.

The Interactive Democratic Evaluation Model, IDEM, simplify and expedite the democratic process strongly using Technology available to promote from yearly to weekly society participation on public concerns.

The IDEM leverages the budget for Society Education while supporting agile democratic processes along with significant reduction of the carbon footprint derived from the democratic processes not obviously visible for society.

IDEM offers a structured system to recuperate the democratic process to each citizen from a congress distant from society's priorities by electing competent leaders and staff for public management because of their results in projects.

IDEM is a road map for an actively democratized society and its government toward a culture oriented to results, progress under a modern and friendly to natural resources environment, transparency and competencies.

Two food narratives, two identities and one national cuisine: The story of Jewish food in Israel

This article suggests looking at the various meanings of "Jewish food" in Israel by focusing on two simultaneous narratives that bisect the discourse on food along ethnic lines and, at the same time, construct the social meaning of Jewish, ethnic and Israeli food. In Israel, it contends, the food of the Ashkenazim has become "Jewish food" and has never been used to form a distinctive Ashkenazi identity. Ashkenazi dishes have come to symbolize the European Diaspora and an Eastern European Jewish world that has gradually ceased to exist. During the years, the Ashkenazi immigrants have gradually abandoned their native foods. Consequently, the Ashkenazi food narrative revolves around nostalgia for an old food culture and a social life in which this food was consumed. Conversely, dishes of Mizrahi Jews became, in Israel, ethnic foods. Mizrachim continued with their food practices and, as time has passed, their dishes have won popularity among many Israelis. The Mizrahi food narrative focuses on politics of identity and underlies the means through which the Mizrachim have become active social agents who use their foods to form an emerging Israeli cuisine.

Citizenship and nationhood in Turkey. Who is excluded?

Due to movements of ethno-cultural groups claiming the right to diversity and challenging the traditional understanding of the "culturally homogenous" nation-state in Turkey the relevance of this culturally homogenous nation-state has been put into question since the early 1990s.

What are the different concepts of belonging and approaches to the integration of ethno-cultural groups being debated by politicians and scholars of social sciences in Turkey in order to find answers to these challenges?

How does the rapprochement process to the EU influence the current Turkish debate? And to what extent is the recognition of ethno-cultural groups as debated by theoreticians such as Will Kymlicka an appropriate mechanism to achieve "ethno-cultural justice"? Do not the effects of the recognition of ethno-cultural groups as distinct communities potentially promote segregation and decomposition of societies?

By raising and analyzing these issues this presentation seeks to illustrate the topical relevance of the nation-state as a structuring unit in Turkey.

Ethnicity and belonging as lived dimensions in mixed marriages

The authors emphasize the inherent bicultural identity of the second generation of immigrant families.

The first part of this presentation comprises a theoretical outline of the concepts of ethnicity and belonging. Furthermore the history of ethnicity is explained. The theoretical part focuses on the three fields of interest; "gender and belonging", "belonging as a biographical positioning" and on the question of "multiple belonging".

The second part of this presentation comprises viewpoints from media coverage and public debates concerning migration issues in the European countries. The debate in Germany is especially questioned on its reductive views of the national, religious or cultural identity of its migrants.

Thus, the authors conclude that there is no way to identify a person unambiguously with one particular ethnic belonging. According to them, the factor that unifies the diverse affiliations of a person, a couple and their offspring is the biographical work of each individual, not an all-embracing ethnicity.

Public support for vigilantism and confidence in criminal justice

The modern state characterizes itself by only permitting force that is used in preservation and enforcement of the law. The very existence of a criminal justice system is commonly justified by contrasting it with the unjustifiability of citizens retaliating against wrongdoers. Despite this, there have been numerous cases of vigilantism that have induced public support rather than condemnation.

What does it mean when the public supports citizens who deal with crime outside of the law? Does it signify that the legitimacy of the criminal justice system is at stake? Little is known about actual determinants of support for those who take the law into their own hands. Despite its relevance from both a social and legal perspective, this phenomenon has been relatively overlooked in the literature. We do not know what public support for vigilantism constitutes, what causes it and what implications it might have for society.

We conducted two experimental studies using vignettes. We measured the influence of confidence in the criminal justice system on support for vigilantism, as well as that of situational factors. To assess the latter, we varied characteristics such as the response of the criminal justice system to the precipitating crime and vigilante violence. The findings of both studies reveal that confidence indeed affects support for vigilantism: respondents with a higher level of confidence were more outraged at the act of vigilantism, felt less empathy with the vigilante, and had a stronger desire for punishment of the vigilante. However, situational characteristics also had a substantial influence: people were sensitive to the situational variation. Support for vigilantism is thus not necessarily rooted in a lack of confidence in the criminal justice system. We additionally demonstrate the importance of a differentiated measure of support: people can for instance empathize with a vigilante while also desiring punishment.

Education for participatory democracy and social justice

Author relies on the basic sociological concepts and uses them in his sociology courses for democracy education at his institution. The framework defines main social actors and their relations (as social structures) in main sectors of society (economy, politics and education). These relations are a basis for social inequality. This inequality may be justified by social effectiveness. Social actors evaluate their relations from their understanding of social justice. Author uses this framework for an analysis of democracy in Estonia and EU, too.

In Estonia, the representative democracy is complemented with the model of participative democracy. Unfortunately, it enables to manipulate with participation and ignore the reasonable proposals by active citizens and experts. Author has proposed to complement the model of manipulated participation with a model of deliberative democracy. It means that all rejected proposals should be checked by independent experts to find out all reasonable ideas. These ideas would be re-directed to the respective institutions to reconsider their first rejection. If the respective institutions and experts retain their different opinions, then these cases should be made public. As a result, they will influence political processes. If this system becomes institutionalized, then all or almost all good ideas of all citizens and experts will be implemented. This is a system of improvement. This means a real civic society, as all active citizens can participate in national improvement. This system diminishes opportunities for social ineffectiveness and misuse of power by authorities. As a result, also social justice increases.

Such a model of deliberative democracy and social justice is theoretically possible. Unfortunately, many social groups, esp. power groups, both in politics and education, resist to this system. It is vital, to disseminate these ideas among students of social sciences in higher education on both, national and European levels.

Hope, vision and social mobilization

As we have now seen, following about 5 years of a "global slump"-at least for Europe and the US, with the ever present danger of another crisis, perhaps the breakup of the Eurozone, we can also see elements of opportunity coming out of present conditions. Recently, a number of scholars have suggested that the multiple nature of the present legitimacy crises (Habermas) portends a choice between a newly reconstituted society based on liberté, égalité, fraternité the vision of the Enlightenment, or the decomposition of existing society into a dystopic "Mad Max" world. While elites of finance grow prosperous, stagnating economies, growing inequality, declining mobility, and the limited ability of Western governments to foster growth has not only led to number of legitimization crises, but within the various "public spheres" of global civil society, two trends are emergent. On the one hand, we have a number of utopian visions, some rooted in the Enlightenment values of democracy, equality and social justice. I would suggest that within the cultural legacies of the West there have been a number of moments in which utopian visions of empowerment, equality and democracy have been seen-indeed the 1776, 1789 and 1848 revolutions, the Paris commune, abolition, suffrage, can be seen as steps on the way to Utopian visions of what might be- its elements are already evident in the emergence of various progressive movements. One could suggest that play, the ludic contains utopian elements of freedom, agency and community I would argue that social theory resurrect concerns with hope, vision and that we rethink Utopian thought, rooted in the Enlightenment, such diverse thinkers social thinkers as Mannheim, Adorno, Fromm, Buber, Marcuse and Bloch, lest the future portend a more dystopic, authoritarian, polluted, impoverished world.

The bunny hops on: An examination of the creation of playboy clubs and their re-found fame

In a realm of enterprise where life spans are usually measured in a handful of years, if not months, the Playboy Clubs managed to endure for more than a quarter-century in America, from the early 1960s to the mid-80s. The clubs' central attractions were the famous Playboy Bunnies, glorified waitresses in skimpy, corset-like costumes serving patrons of Playboy Clubs throughout the world. The clubs were as carefully planned, routinized, and rigidly controlled. The clubs were key clubs, meaning potential pleasure seekers' had to buy memberships, proof of which was an individually numbered key that served as both admittance and a club credit card. Hefner notes in an interview with Bruce Brandy (2011) regarding the creation of the clubs, "My concern with the clubs was, since we were dealing with dreams and fantasies, how could you re-create that in a club atmosphere? And whatever we did, would the keyholders be disappointed? What we discovered was exactly the opposite. Because it was Playboy, they brought the fantasy with them. Debord(1973) refers to this in his discussion of the spectacle, a particular visual reproduction. It is not simply maintaining the image, which is important, but also creating a relationship between people that is mediated by images. The playboy clubs sought to do establish this relationship built upon an already existing fantasy. Playboy clubs were established to offer a moment outside of the everyday reality. They strategically designed and staffed the clubs to perpetuate the fantasy and rigorously trained their Bunnies to fulfill it. My paper will examine the Playboy club experience. For instance, men enter the club to experience a second life per se, with women serving and adoring them. Their membership status of Keyholder puts them in a particular subculture, and the bunnies simply help to maintain the fantasy.

The role of the elderly in their families – Future challenges

The increasing share of older and elderly people is often equated with an increase in old age dependency ratio. The focus on the old age dependency ratio, however, is misleading in two ways: First, elderly people are not only receivers of transfers and support. They provide support such as grandchild care and elderly care themselves. Second, the old age dependency ratio is not set in stone. Welfare states can adapt to increasing longevity and healthy life years, e.g. increasing labour force participation rates of older workers.

However, there is much uncertainty about the role of the elderly in the future. On the one hand, the family is subject to change and more heterogeneous than in former decades. What the role of the elderly in their families will be depends largely on family structures and how strong solidarity is in the "new families". On the other hand, welfare state policies influence the role of the elderly, e.g. public child care and elderly care services can substitute for family care or legal obligations can enforce family support. Policies to increase older workers and female labour force participation rates limit their time available for informal care and volunteering.

At first, we discuss the role of the elderly in their families in European countries. We focus on family structure, family life and developments in welfare state policies. Second, we discuss future challenges for welfare states and families: How do family structures change and what can be the impact on the role of the elderly in the next decades? What effects have recent trends in welfare state policies on the role of the elderly in the future? Finally, we suggest different policy measures to cope with future challenges.

Anxiety for marriage among Japanese youth

This paper aimed to examine how the expectation for the romantic love arouses the anxiety of young people for the marriage in Japan; drawn on our collective survey conducted by 26 Japanese universities in 2011. An uneasy atmosphere veiled in Japanese society because of depopulation beginning in 2005 although the economic power and the security still kept maintained. The mean age at first marriage is prolonged and the birth rate goes down under 1.3 and.

The concept "individualization of the family" has been discussed in Japanese sociology since the 1980's. Especially increase in possible choices of family is one of the most effective factors for the depopulation. Our central questions are to why Japanese young people have a negative behavior in making family and to what are factors of their behaviors.

In discussing romance and relationships with the opposite sex, Japan has a short history of several decades of male-female relationships in the Western mold. Until 1967 arranged marriages were more popular than romance or love marriages. Japanese traditional marriage was usually forged for economic or social class reasons; it was not formed for the interests of the individuals but strategically, for the sake of the primary social group of the ie (stem family system).

The love marriage has been popular in Japan since the 1970's. The ratio of love marriage attained over 90%. Japanese young people are obliged to look for their partner themselves. It is a serious pressure for them to get their lives. Therefore young people have a tendency to give up their romantic relationship.

Urban segregation and educational inequality in Athens

The paper explores the spatial distribution of unequal performance in secondary education and attempts to model its relation with social and urban inequalities. Educational achievement is measured by the yearly performance (for a specific grade) as well as by the performance in the admission examinations to tertiary education. The data on educational achievement are school averages covering the entirety of several hundreds of school units in the Athens Metropolitan Area for the mid 2000s. Through a GIS application schools and their performances were related to the social and urban characteristics of their surrounding residential areas (census tracts). The independent variables in the explanatory model of educational performance include the social (occupational composition, housing conditions, education level etc) and urban characteristics (centrality, land use etc) of residential areas around each school, as well as control variables pertaining to school quality (e.g. teacher/pupil ratio, percentage of teachers with a post-graduate degree).

Party factionalism in French dominant parties: Relational, structural and cyclical dynamics

The paper addresses the question of the transformation of intra-party conflict within the two dominant parties in France: the left-wing Parti socialiste (PS) and the right-wing Union pour un Mouvement Populaire (UMP). Whatever the specific forms they might take, factions are generally loosely institutionalized, often resting on informal and personal ties. In this respect, they are likely to be more responsive to pressure than other political groups; this characteristic justifies the relevance of a dynamic approach to intra-party party (Boucek 2009). This requires also to pay attention to the delimitation of sub-groups within the party, but also to the broader question of party boundaries.

Analytically, we will argue that these dynamics may result from relational, structural and cyclical processes. In the French case, relational dynamics refer to the symmetrical position of the two parties within the French party system. Mimetic relations accompany organizational transfers and borrowings and finally produce an accumulation of diverse and sometimes contradictory rules. Structural dynamics on the other hand, mainly refer to the impact of presidentialization. It is a long term structural process which has already deeply modified party factionalism, introducing new rules and new incentives. Presidentialization, far from clarifying the situation, increases the confusion since presidential nomination tends to personalize internal divisions. New cyclical dynamics result from these structural changes. Party presidentialization for example reinforces short-term effects that are dependent on the position of the party and more precisely on whether it is in office or not. Depending on this position, conflicts emerge within the party, in this parliamentary group or are externalized on party margins (for instance within political clubs).

Overall, the French case provides evidence of the need to study party conflict by taking into account the accumulation of rules and the combination of relational, structural and cyclical dynamics.

Art as political symbol, fetish and commodity

In this paper I look at the symbolic power of art and how different political movements and regimes use and misuse art. Many artists have created art which is critical to the political or economic power since the late eighteenth centuries, starting with Courbet, who encouraged by Baudelaire painted the heroes of everyday life. Some artists have also been affiliated with political movements, for example Courbet was engaged in the 1871 Paris Commune. Such art may become symbolic representations of ideological movements in their struggle of freedom, equal rights and end of wars. Conversely, some political movements and regimes misuse art, such as the German Nazi regime who claimed that the art of C.D. Friedrich represented the true German spirit. On other occasions artists have been affiliated with fascist regimes, for example the Italian futurists. In totalitarian regimes art and the role of artists have often been misused; dictated to create art to glorify the leaders. Today we witness a commercialization of art in the Western society. Many famous artists create art in factory like studios. Often their art become expensive commodities and fetish objects for superrich, who use art only as status symbols to demonstrate their power and wealth in a similar way as expensive cars and yachts. Although most contemporary artists do not create art for this purpose, a growing number of artists seem to be seduced by the money value of art and contribute with little hesitation to the commercialization of art. From the perspective of art, this is problematic, because in a long term it may waive the art's autonomy. Many artists are also supported economically by corporations or private collectors who become patrons, a practice that diverge from country to country, but where the economic power, rather than artists may dictate the development of art.

Critical art and the lack of art criticism

In this paper I look at problems related to critical art as well as the lack of art criticism. Some art styles within modern and contemporary art have developed as a critic of the political and economical power in the society, or as a critic of war and political events. Critical art may often be the contemporary avant garde, which as described by Bourdieu become more and more acknowledged and expensive as the time goes by. Today many contemporary artists have adopted the visual language of critical art also when the critic is absent, which make their art expressions appear as repetition of former art, instead of being critical or innovative. While critical art can be controversial to express a symbolical meaning, some artists today create shocking and controversial art, which makes their art appear as controversial without a cause, or perhaps because it is good for business. While much art today seem to lack a critical aspect, it also seems to be a lack of art criticism in the society. This may rely on several factors, such as the wealth in the industrial counties which may create indifference in respect of art. But it may also rely on a fear among art critics of being declassified in the role of an art connoisseur, which in terms of Veblen is a mark of the master; as well as fear of declassing as a pretending-to-be art connoisseur, constituted by role games as this is described by Goffman, in a society where cultural capital and art knowledge counts. From an art view, this is problematic, because art criticism is also a corrective to the development of art, and as claimed by Benjamin, it awakes the self conciseness of art, and thus art criticism may also function as a midwife of the art.

The Bologna process and the Portuguese universities

The universities in XXI Century have been suffered great changes because of different pressures. In one hand, the society and the market want more and different things of the university. On the other hand, the university lost State funding and has to find another financial alternatives. In this context, the Bologna process has like objective to create more competition between European Union education system and American education system. Some of Bologna process objectives are: mobility of students and teachers, transnationalization, the same credit system in the countries, etc. So, Bologna process has like main point an economical analysis of higher education and has like subsidiary social aspects like democratization of education. Many social movements as associations of students and teachers have asked for more discussions about the impact of Bologna process and they have been against the treatment of education as a market. In Portugal, the Bologna process was applied with not sufficient discussion with civil society, and the most part of students and teachers are against this process. This situation with the increase of fees in public universities has been created a great dissatisfaction in academic students. On the other hand, teachers say that they have so much work and not have time to do research. On this way, the effects of Bologna process began and the questions about it are so far to be answered.

The appearance and disappearance of "absenteeism" as a problem of health and safety at work (Argentina, 1930-2011)

For much of the twentieth century, one of the most discussed topics in the scientific literature devoted to occupational medicine, hygiene and safety, was absenteeism. At present, however, this issue has disappeared from the discourse on work-health relation, or it is addressed in a very marginal way. This paper seeks to address a set of questions that arise in finding such a transformation. So, first, seeks to establish the discursive and non-discursive conditions that made possible the emergence, by the 30s of the XX century, of the "absenteeism" as a problem for a whole range of knowledge, authorities and institutions. Second, it seeks to elucidate the reasons under which this problem took so prominent place in the health policy of Peronism government, and more generally to understand its significance in the context of a society obsessed with the issue of productivity. Thirdly, it is proposed to explain how an object once widely problematized (classified, described, measured, prevented, etc.) was gradually declining in the final decades of the twentieth century until it practically disappears of scientific discourse and public policy. Finally, questions about a possible reverberation of the problem of absenteeism in the speeches of the government of President C. Fernandez de Kirchner, on the significance of union strikes (and thus, the "collective and concerted" absence of workers from their jobs) to the productivity of Argentina's economy.

The approach to research combines the tools of the sociology of work and historical sociology of labor's knowledge ("labor sciences"). From a methodological point of view, access to data is accomplished through content analysis of a sample of documents consists of scientific articles, labor and health policies, statements by government authorities for the period 1930-2000.

Social geographies: Identity construction among young people in peripheral neighbourhoods of Barcelona

Drawing on the ethnographical fieldwork of my ongoing research with youths from 16 to 20 years old in a peripheral neighbourhood from Barcelona (Catalonia, Spain), I intend to bring forward a concept referring to the interplay between subjective social location and objective structural positions in the identification construction: social geographies. Peripheral neighbourhoods in this city have been built and developed by two immigration flows. The first one during the 60s and 70s constituted mainly by workers and their families from southern Spain. The second began in approximately the year 2000 by workers and their families who came from non-EU countries. Through previous research experience, I have witnessed that young people living in these neighbourhoods are perceived mostly as a social problem, and the image wandering about them is negative. The ethnic and cultural diversity are also perceived as social problems. What is the meaning of these labels for these youths? In what ways are these labels affecting how they see themselves? At the same time, a series of issues are posed related to the way these young people experience social inequalities and social categorizations in their daily lives and in relevant contexts including home, school, non-formal education and leisure spaces.

My aim in this paper is to analyse how these labelling relates to the process of identity construction in the case of these young people, and to see to what extent the reflexive modernization thesis can be applied to this particular case in which there is, at least apparently, a calling upon collective and opposed identities between the "locals" (former migrants) and the "new immigrants".

Court institutions as enablers of women's entry into French baroque music

This paper picks up where the landmark French Baroque Music by James Anthony, published in 1974 left off. It presents two prominent fields of studies that have developed since Anthony: social history and sociology of the institutionalization of French Baroque music, and dance.

The first aim of this paper is to construct a context for the music created amidst major institutional and societal changes propelled by Louis XIV. In order to provide insights into the music and dance background, an institutional account of seventeenth century French culture analyzes the daily life of renowned and unknown musicians, examining the artists in the new academies, from schooling to career, to stardom, to retirement and beyond.

In this context we examine artistic changes and social events, in particular, the court institutions as enablers of women's entry into music, obtaining the legal right to perform as professional artists on public stages, and the implication of this opening to the feminization of the stage that reverberated in the arts. We explore the milieu in which the artists evolved: the Court, Versailles, Parisian cenacles and clubs, the ruelles, as well as the convents, and the churches in Paris and the provinces with whom, and for whom these musicians created.

A second aim is to focus on dance in order to illuminate how music and dance are intertwined in repertoires of the Grand Siècle. We examine French 17th century dances and choreography in the institutions of the court, in Paris, the theaters, the gardens and salons.

This interdisciplinary research is at the crossroads of sociology, feminist studies, reception studies, and musicology.

The creation of a transnational worker or a family lies in both personal factors and larger structural conditions, which reflect the social, economic, and political processes of globalization. In a foreign land, transnational workers and family members often work and live under different immigration statuses and visa categories. How to get to Denmark: The legal profession's construction of the Nordic welfare states and beyond

The problem of how to get to Denmark, as Fukuyama defines it, covers the problem of creating modern state institutions. The problem encompasses the history of the state, the history of the rule of law and accountable government. Such institutions secure, according to Fukuyama, democracy, peace, prosperity and a non-corrupt state organisation. Therefore the international community and developing countries would like to know, how to transform countries around the world into Denmark by importing the ideal type of legal systems of Denmark in the developing world. However, due to its developed institutions, Denmark is a mythical place and could be any Scandinavian country. The question is, as Fukuyama asks, how Denmark itself got to be Denmark. How could the Danish state, the rule of law and accountable governments develop so they created such trust and predictability which was needed in order to establish Denmark? The purpose of this paper is to examine, how Denmark came to be Denmark. The paper argues that the legal profession played a key role in the development of the modern Danish state.

Internationalization of the social research in Lebanon

This paper aims to investigate the extent to which social research in Lebanon is internationalized and the interplay between the local and international factors influencing the research practice. It will be based on a sample of some 65 interviews with Faculty on American University of Beirut, focusing on semi-structured in-depth interviews focusing on their biographies, their authorship and research practices. This research will enable us to understand:

- How research topics are decided and how choices are made, at the institutional level in the university? How does the promotion system influence the ranking system of publication, as well as the quality of research?
- How do international collaborations affect the decisions of researchers in the university? And what countries and topics are privileged?
- How does the university structure affect the organization, scientific choices, and publication patterns of researchers?
- What is the importance of local vs. "international" publications, publications in Arabic vs. English and other foreign languages?

- How funding sources affect scientific research done by the university's academics?

While data concerns all the disciplines, we will first deal with faculty in social science and humanities and then compare this data with the other disciplines.

The conditions and the consequences of the movement demanding the civil society institutions: The case of NPO law in Japan

The institutions to develop civil society in Japan are now being established. In 1998, NPO Law (Law to Promote Specified Nonprofit Activities) was legislated, that enables many civil society organizations to get legal status. Then, in 2011, NPO Law was drastically revised, making such NPOs much easier to collect contributions. These legislation and revision of NPO Law were consequences of continuous lobbying by civil society organizations themselves.

This paper examines how the movement demanding the development of civil society institutions in Japan succeeded, and what consequences this movement produced. In order to accomplish these objects, we interviewed the members of civil society organizations and politicians concerned. We also collected the material of public policy.

Major findings are summarized below. The legislation of NPO Law in 1998 and the revision in 2011 were caused by the similar combination of political and social conditions: the change of government and the great earthquake.

In early 1990s, Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) lost domination and formed the coalition with Japan Socialist Party (JSP). This made LDP to compromise with the progressive forces. Then, The Great Hanshin-Awaji Earthquake occurred in 1995. The activities of volunteers contribute the legislation of NPO Law. In 2009, Democratic Party of Japan (DPJ) won a majority against LDP. DPJ's socially liberal policies included the revision of NPO Law. Although there was a sharp confrontation between DPJ and LDP, all parties agreed with the importance of NPO Law after The Great East Japan Earthquake.

Between 1998 and 2011, however, the role of civil society organizations has changed. In 1990s, the civil society organizations were considered to be "left", so they had trouble to persuade the conservative politicians. By contrast, in 2010s, civil society organizations functioned like a hinge party in the confusion among parties.

The present and the future of the towns where Fukushima nuclear plants are located: On some social aspects of the disaster, displacement, and reparation of the community

The ongoing disaster in Fukushima following the March 11th earthquake and tsunami in 2011 has provoked one of the most serious crises to date derived from nuclear energy generation policy.

The situation is even more serious when one considers the vast numbers of displaced people from the areas which are heavily affected by nuclear accidents, but especially from the towns in which Fukushima nuclear power stations are located. They have been —or will be— living in many places outside the towns for a long time, and some of them are skeptical about their towns' possible reconstructions.

The relationship between the issue of reparation and the social aspects of the widespread displacement, however, has received less attention than either issue alone. It is important to see how the reparation affects the people and how the scattered people gather and show their collective opinions to influence the policy.

This is why each of us began field research and the Research Team on the Widespread Displacement of the People of the Town of Tomioka (led by Assoc. Prof. Yamashita, Tokyo Metropolitan University) was set up to investigate the lives of displaced families.

Using data drawn from the statistics and interviews, we will first examine the conditions of the local governments and populations on the move, and secondly will discuss how families, neighborhoods and workplaces are being dis- and re-organized. By so doing, we will suggest how their sense of themselves as a community, or the phrase "we the townspeople," faces difficulty.

Finally, however, we will focus on why "towns" are becoming important again, by showing how town-meetings are being argued necessary and how the practice is being revived, from the point of view of connecting the fluid local governments and populations, through using now scarce but meaningful resources of families, neighborhoods, or workplaces.

Massification, governance and inter-urban disparities

The idea that the concentration of particular 'high level' functions - especially in financial services - in a small number of cities enables them to occupy leading positions in the international urban hierarchy has been well established within urban social science ever since the publication of Saskia Sassen's The Global City (1991). Since then much research, often based on case studies, has focused upon the way in which urban leaders representing cities at various levels of the urban hierarchy have engaged in competitive strategies designed to attract flows of capital and skilled labour. The focus of these efforts has invariably been on sub-national tiers of elected government and the way in which they have used their autonomy and influence to build horizontal and vertical coalitions for change. What is less clear, from two decades' worth of research, is (a) what the net impact of various forms of 'massification' (i.e. the uneven accretion of resources at the urban-regional scale) has been on national urban hierarchies, and (b) what role semi-autonomous non-governmental urban institutions (e.g. football clubs, universities, cultural organisations), and the variety of governance arrangements which guide institutional behaviour, have played in encouraging (or managing or discouraging) massification processes.

This paper builds upon preparatory work being undertaken by the N8 group of research-intensive universities in northern England under the theme of 'just cities and rebalancing'. It will draw upon empirical analysis of the extent to which key urban institutions (including football clubs and universities) in particular city-regions have experienced increased domestic and international flows of labour and capital and analyse, through case study work, the extent to which the various governance arenas in which they operate (sector-specific, national, European, inter-national) have encouraged massification processes. If a German research partner can be added, the paper will include UK-Germany comparisons.

Choosing health care: A view from the sociological literature

Promotion of choice is a common theme in both policy discourses and commercial marketing claims about health care. But how do healthcare 'consumers' or patients understand and experience choice? In this paper we review the sociological literature on the practice of healthcare choice and decision making along two dimensions. First, we identify and compare the literature in terms of the key arenas and scope of choice (for instance, between public and private health care services; decisions about whether or not to undergo particular tests or procedures; choice of conventional medical and/or CAMS treatment options; and the national and international contexts for health care choice). We also identify and analyse the primary metaphors and concepts associated with healthcare choice, including navigation, individualism, interactions with healthcare practitioners, risk and trust. We argue that more attention must be made to researching and theorising the limits of healthcare choice and the differential capacity to choose.

Gender, 'ideals' and body image in ballroom and Latin American dancing

Ballroom and Latin American dancing is currently a popular form of leisure in many countries around the world, yet until recently it has been relatively neglected by sociologists. This paper draws on ethnographic research at a dancing school in the South of England in order to explore how the experience of learning Ballroom and Latin American dancing shapes individuals' feelings about their bodies. It focuses particularly on the narratives of men and women who take part in Ballroom and Latin American dancing competitions as part of their leisure activities. The paper explores dancers' images and understandings of the 'ideal dancer' and how these differ for men and women across Ballroom and Latin disciplines. The way in which dancers negotiate the gap between themselves and the 'ideal' will be discussed. Furthermore, efforts to achieve the gendered ideal, such as losing weight, investing in costumes and learning to appear more confident will be examined. Finally, this paper considers the interaction between the performance of masculinities and femininities on the dance floor with those performed outside of it, for example in the workplace. It is hoped that this paper will contribute and increased understanding of the complexity of the stories that male and female ballroom dancers tell about their bodies and the experience of learning to dance.

Moving racisms, shifting targets: An analysis of race in postcolonial Britain

In order to explore the contemporary manifestations and meanings of race and its operation within racist discourse and practice, this paper draws on a secondary analysis of two qualitative research studies. The first study involved young separated migrants seeking sanctuary in Britain and the second focused on the experiences of lone white mothers of mixed-parentage children. Here we analyse the everyday and structural racism experienced by each group in order to consider how seemingly different manifestations of race and racism are in fact linked together and in some ways dependent on each other within a postcolonial logic that reconstructs race and racism to serve shifting hegemonic interests. The discussion seeks to address the salience of race and racism in contemporary Britain and how this interrelates with other social inequalities, such as migration status and family composition.

Growing up in the world risk society – Reflections on the status of young people in the western late modern societies

The governance of youth at the nation state level has recently been in a significant change around the world. The influence of neoliberal economic governance, state economies in crises, explosively spreading media coverage, international human rights treaties and the new governmental technologies, travelling from nation to another, have started up to form the status of young people and the goals of youth policies in a new and intensive way. In the western late modern societies, youth and young people are often characterized in an ambivalent way (Giddens 1991; Lee 2001). On the other hand, the young are represented as the national resource in future and the targets of social investment e.g. (Lister 2006). On the other hand, the growing generations are more than before constructed as "risk" or "threat", reflecting the problems of social cohesion and the cracking generational contracts. Historically speaking, there is nothing new in these constructions. It seems however that the current era is aggravating this polarized discussion, highlighting the latter "risk"-oriented perspective (e.g. Beck 1992).

In my presentation, I will reflect the relation of the national level governance of youth and young people to "global", "supranational" and "international" (e.g. Beck 2005). How the different aspects of globalization, supranational tendencies and international influence and claims enable and constrain the national governance of youth, and on the other hand, how the influences originating from the hegemonic cultural areas of the globe penetrate to the national and local practices? In this theorizing, the theory of governance (Dean 1999; Foucault 2000; Hardt & Negri 2001; Miller & Rose 2008) is utilised in order to conceive multilevel actors, mentalities, games and techniques forming the strategic network, world risk society.

A pedagogy of democracy - teaching, learning and performance

This paper seeks to consider the relationship between democracy, education and the arts through the role of teacher and learner in higher education. In particular, the analogy of education as performance, or as performative, and the educational context as a theatre in which knowledge or meaning is constructed, owned and experienced, will inform how we might think about the profession of teaching and its potential contribution to democratic society.

The power relationships between the institution, the teacher and the learner in the construction and ownership of knowledge demonstrate the potential to both facilitate and subvert democratic thinking and practices. As a consequence, this paper will propose ways of developing a pedagogy that prioritises the unknown over the known, and the discovered over the prescribed as a participatory process. It will extend this concept further by privileging experience as a means of knowing and re-inscribing meaning (Winter, 1987) as a key phenomenon of personal freedom and empowerment.

The concept of a pedagogy of democracy will be further explored through and as performance where the interactions between the director, the performer/actor, and the audience draws attention to the role of the participant. Barthes (1977), like Winter, places ownership in the hands of the viewer/reader and destabilises any fixed ideologies or positioning - highlighting our powers as individuals and as educators to perceive, choose and interpret, and to re-affirm the meaning of democracy.

The positional puzzle of uprisings and revolutions in the Middle East: Regional inequalities in world-historical perspective

While orthodox political scientists present the Arab Spring as a belated "catching up" of the region with global norms and institutions of liberal democracy after decades of "authoritarian persistence," this view cannot explain why such events took place circa 2011 instead of, say, circa 1989. Notably, while the Arab Spring and its Persian cousin in Iran are portrayed as stemming from economic discontent related to poverty and inequality, the MENA region has historically exhibited low inequality combined with low poverty in comparison to regional averages in the most of the developing world, especially vis-a-vis Latin America and Sub-Saharan Africa. In this paper, I frame recent political contention in the Middle East in world-historical perspective in order to rethink these "Why Here? Why Now?" questions. First, I show within-country inequality of MENA states in comparison with other regions from the post-colonial era to the present, illustrating the region's unique trajectory of low inequality vis-a-vis the Third World. Second, I argue that this is an outcome of post-colonial state formation, which embedded broad social welfare compacts within relatively robust authoritarian states that survived the end of the developmental era and well into the neoliberal turn. Third, the cross-class coalitions that initiated the Arab Spring and its Persian cousin, I contend, were produced by these MENA welfare regimes during earlier bouts of state-led development. Yet, these coalitions became a disloyal opposition as MENA elites dismantled and restructured existing social compacts. Grievances in the Arab Spring stemmed from this widening "fear of falling" among new middle and working classes, whose positional status vis-a-vis both their own elites as well as other developing countries were perceived as in rapid decline. While the sparks were contingent and diverse, the "chained" mobilizations across the region relied on these common self-understandings rather than timeless democratic desires or regionally exceptional misfortunes.

Anti-nuclear activities and public awareness in Japan before and after the Fukushima nuclear disaster

Before 3.11 Fukushima nuclear disaster, Japanese government policy to promote nuclear energy has been too stable and too coherent since mid-1960s regardless of so many changes in related spheres and other countries, and the change of government in Sept. 2009. I explained it based on the following factors: (1) the centralized political system under one party dominant system was not so open to movement influence, and the electrical utilities maintained monopoly control over the energy market for several decades (POS), (2) relatively weak anti-nuclear groups lack of financial base and professional staffs (resources) and (3) framing "extremely dependent upon external energy supplies" and strong faith in technology (framing). (4) While they were relatively unconcerned about supply of electricity, majority of people had basic trust in Japanese government, electrical utility company and Japanese technology.

The Fukushima nuclear disaster drastically changed this situation. People suddenly forced to face real nuclear risks and radiation exposure. People got strongly angry at, distrust of and disappointed at national government, TEPCO, media and nuclear experts. Public awareness on public opinion poll by newspaper shifted to more negative from mid May. 1) People realized the seriousness of the situation. 2) Prime minister's announcement of demanding to temporarily close the Hamaoka plants triggered the shift of public opinion. There is sharp contrast with few media coverage on negative side against nuclear energy, before 3.11.

New characteristics of current upheaval anti-nuclear activities are 1) using twitter and face book to mobilize like a "Jasmine revolution", 2) new participants including non-political young mothers and students, farmers and fishermen, 3) typically using "sound demo" with music and songs, stressing self-expressiveness, 4) based on distrust of information disclosure and strong anxiety about the effects of radiation and 5) stressing "media activism".

Youth labor movements in Japan: Their conditions and characteristics

The majority of labor organizations in Japan have been company unions, which have mainly middle-aged full-time male employees. In contrast, in the youth labor movement (YLM), which has emerged since 2000, union members are not only regular workers but non-regular workers, job-seekers, and hikikomori (people withdrawn from society). They have united outside of companies and have achieved a new solidarity. Based on statistical data and qualitative research of these union members, this report attempts to clarify the conditions and characteristics of the YLM in Japan.

In Japan, it becomes more difficult for workers to transition from non-regular employment to regular employment as they get older. People who could not find decent jobs in the economically depressed period of the 1990s are in their thirties or forties now. Additionally, despite economic growth in the mid-2000s, the number of young non-regular workers has been increasing since that time. Therefore, being trapped in non-regular work is a problem both of young adults and of older adults stuck in a kind of extended adolescence. Representing older, fulltime workers, existing unions have been uninterested in this problem. So, the YLM has occurred as a movement by general unions outside of companies.

The solidarities of the YLM have two characteristics. First, work is not regarded as the basis of solidarity; unemployed people, hikikomori and so on are included in the unions. Second, YLM members define themselves not as workers but as a "precarariat." Nevertheless, this broad self-definition does not preclude conflicts between individual and collective identities. Using K. McDonald's concept of "experience movement," we can see that the conflicts are an attempt to reconstruct the movement as a place where people can struggle both to find their own subjectivity and to acknowledge the experience of each other in a shared time and place.

Internal migration and the population registration system in post-socialist Kyrgyzstan: Revealing a new spatiality of discrimination

Enacted throughout the former USSR to fulfil the demands of a planned economy, the propiska – a form of residence permit and population registration system – was designed to restrict any form of mass migration from rural areas to cities. Despite sustained attempts to reform its economy, and shed other aspects of its socialist past, Kyrgyzstan retains key elements of this legal relic. In my paper, I argue that this fusion of continuity with so-called "transition" in Kyrgyzstan reveals a new form of discrimination that is inherently spatial. Using the analytical framework of legal geography, I illustrate that this form of discrimination is only visible, however, when one goes beyond examining official sources of law and instead focuses on the quotidian practices of internal migrants and how they experience and produce law.

Population registration systems are often targeted by academics, international organisations and human rights' groups alike for continuing to restrict freedom of movement within post-socialist states (Schaible, 2001; Amnesty, 2008; OSCE, 2009). While I balk at refuting this observation, I aim to offer a more nuanced perspective by demonstrating the contemporary role that property rights play within Kyrgyzstan's registration system and, in particular, the distinction that the law imposes between ownership and renting property. A combination of Kyrgyzstan's transitional property regime with inherited state apparatus from the former USSR that restricted migration creates an interface where the continuing meets the transforming. A new spatiality of discrimination towards internal migrants emerges at this interface that raises fundamental and contemporary challenges in respect of human rights as well as for migration and post-socialist studies in general.

Fighting for a democratic police: National policing fields and the differential incorporation of public management and community policing in Argentina and Chile

In this paper I discuss how the Chilean Carabineros and the Argentine Federal Police differently incorporated public management and community policing models in the recent neoliberal and democratic period. Questioning the approaches that see changes in police bureaucracies as bureaucratic adaptations to high crime societies (Garland), as the passive adoptions of neoliberal political rationalities and managerial techniques (O'Malley), or as almost natural tendencies after democratic transitions, I propose a field-theory approach to explain the emergence and differential consolidation of new these two policing models in two national police bureaucracies in similar socio-political contexts. Locating those police bureaucracies within national policing fields—spaces of struggle over policing policies and priorities that involve the police forces, authorities, experts and civil society organizations—I explain the successful incorporation of public management and community policing models in Chile and the initial superficial incorporation and later reversal and final abandonment of these models in Argentina.

With this approach I explain why, paradoxically, in Chile, where the central government had almost no control over the police in the democratic period the police changed—adopted these models—, whereas in Argentina, where the central government controlled the police from the beginning of the democratic period police reform failed. I argue that the greater bureaucratic autonomy of the Chilean police lead to a self-transformation of the police in which the police incorporated the new models to legitimate itself and retain its bureaucratic autonomy. In the more heteronomous Argentine police, authorities introduced the new models into the police, but later on halt the reform, and revert to harsh policing strategies in line with their penal-populist orientations. The field-theory analysis, focusing on variations in bureaucratic autonomy and on the (sometimes perverse) effects of political interests, shows we need to rethink the link between democratic influences and institutional police change.

Las múltiples vidas de la rehabilitación: Campo penitenciario y usos estratégicos del discurso correccionalista en los sistemas penitenciarios de Argentina y Chile

En este trabajo explico la paradójica re-emergencia de los discursos de rehabilitación en Chile y Argentina tras la vuelta de la democracia y su diferencial realización al interior de los sistemas penitenciarios nacionales. Explico la re-emergencia del paradigma de la rehabilitación a partir de las estrategias de inversión en el campo penitenciario por parte de agentes excluidos durante la dictadura en combinación con la llegada de nuevos agentes al campo. Defino al campo penitenciario como un espacio de lucha por las políticas y prioridades penitenciarias que involucra a distintos tipos de burócratas penitenciarios, políticos, expertos y organizaciones de la sociedad civil.

A la vez, explico el diferencial impacto que han tenido estos discursos en las burocracias penitenciarias en el periodo neoliberal democrático analizando en sistema de luchas y alianzas en este campo. En el caso chileno, analizo como el modelo de rehabilitación es efectivamente incorporado dentro del semi-privatizado sistema penitenciario, explicando la alianza entre "rehabilitacionistas", concesionarios de cárceles y el gobierno central por su común trayectoria ascendiente al interior del campo y su común oposición a los militarizados oficiales a cargo de las prisiones. En el caso del sistema penitenciario federal argentino, el discurso de rehabilitación es reintegrado en un espacio con distintas estructuras y alianzas. Allí los nuevos y antiguos expertos, inicialmente cercanos al gobierno, son progresivamente dejados de lado por una alianza entre el gobierno y los militarizados agentes penitenciarios, resultando en una orientación ritualista hacia la rehabilitación en una cárcel depósito administrada por militarizados burócratas. Como vemos, el neoliberalismo político y administrativo no lleva necesariamente a un abandono de la rehabilitación. Esto depende de la estructura de intereses en el campo penitenciario y en particular de la composición y posición de los expertos en este espacio y de sus cambiantes alianzas.

Unionisation of homebased workers in Turkey

One of the most important results of the transformation in the organization of production is the growing number of homebased workers who combine earning cash for their families with unpaid household work, agricultural work and other forms of informal work in all parts of the world. Homebased work is largely informal i.e. outside formal systems of employment and social protection. The majority of homebased workers are women and they are also generally outside of the formal trade unions. However, new forms of organising have been developed which are a combination of extending traditional union organizing (Madeira, TCFUA / Australia, Turkey), new kinds of women's unions (Nepal, India, Chile) or of cooperatives, associations or self help groups (Brazil, India). All these organizations are fighting together in new ways, including internationally, and challenging traditional concepts of employment and workers' rights. Here I focus on the experience of Turkish Union of Homebased Workers (Ev-Ek-Sen). Ev-Ek-Sen was launched in the late 2009 by women homebased workers. It fights for recognition as workers and for social protection and decent work. Its case is a brilliant example of how homebased workers develop their rights based organization i.e. how to organise themselves around the priorities of their own, as well as how Turkish State responses unionization of a group of unprotected workers.

Resonance of creative visions in poetic language among the Karimojong herders in a Savanna landscape

This paper explores resonance of poetic language with life, bodily movement and a landscape among the pastoral Karimojong society in dry land savanna, Northeastern Uganda. Domestication provides time and space for man-animal interaction allowing herders' identification and memory of individual animals. Karimojong shepherds compose songs comprising of individual name of each animal herded by the composer and sing for the animals to graze better. Composition of songs is continued throughout their lifetimes, during which the songs are memorized and accumulated by repeated singing. The sources of the poetic imagination are collaborative activities involving the composer and others such as herding, raiding and begging animals, and visual perceptions revolving around animal bodies, causing illusions through reversals of figure and ground, distance collapse resulting from varying sizes between objects, and adaptations to dark and light, all of which result from common pattern of moving and looking during herding. Their imagination develops according to the individual life stage. Herding songs about goats are sung by younger boys spending most of their day accompanying the herd. Men start joining cattle raids in their late teens and lead raids during their thirties. By this time, a man has not only accumulated experiences of raiding but has also played a leading role in animal management for the survival of his family. Therefore, raiding is the main topic of the songs sung by men in this age group. Herders receive creative visions, remember them as pastoral songs, and connect individual animals to different times and spaces via events and phenomena experienced by putting themselves in.

The sticky wicket of regulating violence against women in polygamy: Feminist perspective on the constitutional challenge in Canada

In 2010, the Canadian Supreme Court of British Columbia embarked on an unprecedented reference case to test whether Canada's prohibition against polygamy is consistent with the freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A central concern of the case is whether polygamy perpetuates inherent harm to women, children, and society by increasing their risk of and exposure to physical and psychological forms of violence. Both the Attorney General of British Columbia and of Canada argued that polygamy increases men's ability to control the reproductive capacity of women and perpetuates a rigid, patriarchal system that increases the likelihood of harm and violence to women and children. On the other side, the Amicus argued that some women freely choose to enter into polygamous relationships, and that criminalizing this family form offends their dignity. In 2011, Justice Bauman ruled that, although the law violates the religious freedom of fundamentalist Mormons, the harm against women and children outweighs this concern. He concurred with the attorneys general that the understanding of harm to women specified in international treaties like CEDAW is consonant with the harm of polygamy. A consequence of this ruling means that, in the name of protecting women from the harm of violence and patriarchy that is possible in polygamous relationships, women who practice polygamy are made criminal under the law. Feminist scholars in their theorizing and activism against gender violence have long grappled with the tensions between victimization and agency that this court case brings to light. Using a critical discourse analysis (CDA) of data collected from legal documents, this paper will examine the ways that violence against women and women's agency is addressed in the court case and the consequences of this formation of harm and agency for social justice.

Chicago voices: Youth workers struggling with schooling and welfare

The paper uses the voices of Chicago youth workers who are students in a community college program geared to the professional education of youth work practitioners. This college program sits within a wider national movement to professionalize youth work in which both welfare approaches to young people and the ideology of schooling still dominate much of the field. Explicit social justice frames of reference have limited presence in much U.S. youth work, in part because of the dominating power of schooling and welfare ideologies.

While there is a strong Federal drive to improve U.S. college graduation rates, youth workers receive very limited support for higher education participation and many youth workers struggle with higher education realities; are employed in increasingly vulnerable community-based agencies; and, see an employment market in which their qualifications have limited value.

Assessment data using the voices of Chicago youth workers highlight the challenges workers face in establishing more democratic youth work practices and the struggle to move away from the dominant 'risk' paradigm that as long historical roots in adult interventions into the lives of young people.

The paper presents a critique of newer program quality initiatives that have come to dominate the field in Chicago and across the U.S. It concludes with a call for a realignment of the youth work field and investment in professional education premised on the values of social justice and democracy.

Immigrant occupational composition and the earnings of immigrants and natives in Germany

In this paper we examine the influence of immigrant occupational composition on wages of immigrants and natives in Germany. Using data from the German Socio-Economic Panel Study and the German Microcensus we test several sociological, social-psychological, and economic explanations relevant to this topic. The notion of quality sorting states that the differences in wages that are associated with the immigrant share within occupations are due to differences in qualification requirements in those jobs alone. A cultural devaluation of occupations with a high immigrant share should have a negative influence on both immigrants' and natives' wages above and beyond quality sorting. Group threat theory predicts that the negative effect of immigrant presence within an occupation on wages is stronger for immigrants than for natives. Inter-group contact theory suggests that with increasing immigrant presence relations between immigrants and natives improve, leading to a curvilinear effect of immigrant occupational composition on wages. The results indicate that quality sorting is clearly at work, but there is an additional wage penalty tied to immigrant presence within occupations, speaking for cultural devaluation. We do not find evidence for the group threat argument, but there is a curvilinear relationship between immigrant share and wages, which is in line with the inter-group contact hypothesis. Gender differences exist only for the native sample, with native women being more strongly subject to the negative effects of immigrant presence than native men. Additional analyses on samples stratified by occupational position reveal that the wage dynamics tied to immigrant position are restricted to white-collar occupations. This partly explains why native women's wages are overall more strongly affected negatively by devaluation. All of these results are robust against accounting for selection bias. We discuss the implications of these findings and of ongoing changes in the German labor market for future immigration.

The impact of regional differences and anti-immigrant attitudes on exclusionary policy preferences in Europe

The issue of migration regulation is not only a critical point of public debates throughout Europe, it also taps exclusionary sentiments that are easily mobilized by right-wing parties. The present paper is dealing with majority preferences for immigration restriction in Europe in a cross-national and cross-regional multilevel perspective. We distinguish a preference for a quantitative reduction of immigration from the more qualitative approach of selecting immigrants by certain credentials. First, we investigate to what extent these policy demands are tied to country- and region-specific structural differences. Does regional immigrant presence and regional unemployment drive the demand to reduce immigration, or are these policy preferences completely decoupled from these contextual factors? In a second step we inquire to what extent different forms of perceived immigrant threat and prejudice towards immigrants are tied to a demand for curbing immigration. For instance, what is the relative importance of economic and cultural forms of perceived threat for preferring to reduce immigration or to select only certain immigrants? In order to answer these questions, we employ multilevel modeling on data of the first round of the European Social Survey 2002 in conjunction with aggregate data from Eurostat. We furthermore make use of the regional level location variables present in the data set. The results show that immigration reduction preferences are unrelated to immigrant presence within the regions, and regional unemployment plays a significant role only for the inclination towards a numerical reduction of immigration. Economic and cultural concerns are similarly tied to a preference for a numerical reduction of immigration only. For a leaning towards establishing qualitative entry criteria for immigrants, cultural concerns play a larger role. We close with a discussion of the broader social and political implications of some notable differences in the result patterns for the two forms of immigration restriction.

Projeto político pedagógico democrático e participativo

Nos dias atuais, com o mercado de trabalho tão focado em trabalho em equipe e democracia além de competitividade, não podemos mais ter uma escola que tenha somente como objetivo formar alunos para passar nos vestibular, precisamos de instituições democráticas, participativas que formem cidadãos críticos pensantes capazes de transformar o meio em que vivem.

Para que isto aconteça, é necessário que o próprio projeto político pedagógico da escola venha a ter a participação de todos os envolvidos na instituição, e que não seja mais um documento engavetado.

O projeto político pedagógico deve ter a participação desde o pedagogo, como o gestor escolar chegando até o porteiro pois dentro de uma instituição de ensino todos são educadores. Os pais também deverão ter sua participação através da sala da comunidade, e assim por diante cada um fazendo a sua parte, mais não perdendo o foco, a maneira participativa de se fazer um projeto político pedagógico.

Como a própria referencia bibliográfica utilizada nos evidencia, que para esse documento ser realizado de maneira democrática e participativa é necessário se ter um gestor que seja flexível, que concorde com mudanças e que venha promover a participação de todos neste documento que rege a escola.

Este artigo vem de acordo com o FORUM, no sentido de estar ligado a parte educativa e buscando democracia e participação ativa dos cidadãos que estão inseridos nas instituições de ensino.

Não basta dizer que a escola é democrática, é necessário que ela viva a democracia e a participação de todos na prática, e nada melhor que se ter início pela construção democrática do projeto político pedagógico.

The effects of grades on labour market outcomes for welfare state professionals

The proposed paper examines the effects of grades from initial education programs on labour market outcomes, such as employment and income, for the welfare state professions. Grades from higher education may be viewed as an assessment, from the place of study, of how well the student masters the knowledge and skills taught in initial training. Whether or not employers regard good grades as an expression of valuable skills, and whether good grades are rewarded in the labour market, is uncertain, and the proposed paper will examine this question. The analyses then, will examine whether or not employers tend to reward good grades, and will not determine why employers possibly tend to do so (if they regard good grades as an expression of productivity enhancing human capital or as a signal of other valuable traits). Of course, labour market outcomes depend on several factors other than grades, such as social networks, social background, ethnicity and gender, and such factors may be correlated with grades as well. The analyses will therefore include controls for such factors. The question above will be examined by analysing data consisting of all graduates in social work, nursing, teaching and preschool teaching from Norwegian university colleges. The data are extracted from university college registers, and supplemented with national register data for each individual. Preliminary analyses indicate that there are positive effects of grades on both income and the risk of being unemployed, but that these effects vary between educational groups.

Surviving poverty and workfare: Lone mothers' families survival strategies under conditions of extreme social insecurity

This paper centers on the survival strategies deployed and support networks mobilized by welfare-reliant lone mothers in Israel. Support networks and survival strategies are analyzed within the context of welfare state retrenchment and a redefinition of the Israeli state commitment to women as mothers. Based on the analysis of 25 in depth interviews with lone mothers participating in a workfare experimental program, we ask how welfare reliant lone mothers cope with extreme poverty and what is the role played by formal and informal support networks in the provision of their families needs in crisis situations (such as the interruption of social assistance allowances).

Our findings indicate that our interviewees deployed two main survival strategies: attempting to enlarge their limited pool of resources by taking small loans from families, friends and banks, food packages from charities, buying at thrift shops, and by strictly administering their limited budgets. Moreover, in situations of extreme need lone mothers' find temporary relief in their families of origin, mainly elderly parents, even if the parents have limited means. The institutions of the welfare state and the various NGOs can only offer very limited support, and the extended family is turns into the last resort safety net.

Islam, ambiguity, and social change in Turkey: The organizational practices of the Fethullah Gulen movement

Turkey's "Gülen Movement" (GM) is the country's largest and most influential Islamic identity community. Loyalists to the retired preacher and writer M. Fethullah Gülen, control one of Turkey's largest media conglomerates, a number of the country's most globally linked companies, and over 700 privately owned or privately managed schools throughout the world. Since 1998, Gülen has lived in self-imposed exile in the US, where GM loyalists are now very active in intercultural outreach, commerce, political lobbying, and charter school education. The GM's growth and impact both inside and outside Turkey is highly significant in regard to Turkey's emergence as a regional power in a transforming Middle East. This paper assesses the GM's transnational impact by focusing specifically on its organizational strategies as a "flexible" network of people and institutions. Comprised by vertical, horizontal, and diagonal patterns of authority and belonging, the GM has rationalized a system of "applied Sufism" that is anchored upon a foundation of patrimonial respect, duty, and service. Gülen's employment of Sufi categories, however, does not indicate that either he or his followers are representative of Islamic mysticism. Quite the contrary, the GM's application of Sufi metaphors serves a variety of non-spiritual, non-mystical purposes, and thus signifies the ways in which the teachings of a charismatic Islamic community leader have become rationalized to meet the demands of a competitive market economy. Based on fourteen months of fieldwork conducted in Turkey and in the US, this paper argues that the GM's reliance upon social, financial, service, and ideational networks constitutes connectivity in a complicated system of partial, fragmentary, ambiguous relationships. Relying upon maximum efficiency through the "flexible production" of these networks, the GM cultivates collective identity through extensive social ties, shared practice, and communal loyalty on the one hand; and through market competition on the other.

Why culture makes a difference: Explaining women's prostitution by social closure and the traditionalist gender norm

One of the central questions about prostitution is whether there is a connection between becoming a sex workers and poverty of women. The stakes of this question are quite high, not least because it may inform the so-called 'prostitution war'. Both policy and the intellectual debate ask for social-scientific empirically informed answers. This paper calls for such a debate.

We explain the proportion of young female sex workers in a sample of 40 countries worldwide. Two models are tested.

The starting point of the first model is economic theory, where in the past decade or so a number of parsimonious and highly consistent theories have been formulated. The economic model predicts that the sex ratio, urbanization, development and regulation explain the supply of women in prostitution. The second model starts from the intuition that becoming a sex worker is predominantly a survival strategy of women who have little alternative opportunities. In other words: when women are blocked from 'mainstream' ways of making a living, they will 'choose' for prostitution, or be pushed into it, as a last option. The blocking of women from economic means is conceptualised with the help of the Weberian concept of social closure. We introduce both objective social closure factors (relative access of women to jobs and income) and a cultural variable measuring citizens' attitudes toward women's activities (the traditionalist gender norm).

Stepwise regressions and bootstraps reject the former model and partly confirm the latter. The traditionalist gender norm hindering women's access to socio-economic resources has the strongest effect. Where women are expected to stay as mothers and housewives and not move into work, prostitution markets tend to be bigger.

In his classic work Homo Ludens, John Huizinga decried the transformation of play and leisure in industrial societies. In his view, activities that once featured relatively free and open public discourse had become "managed" by large social and political organizations. The result was a narrowing of personal and public expression and a diminution of social vitality. The current paper reviews Huizinga's account of the historical transformation of play and then extends it to the new patterns of organization and activity that have arisen in the late twentieth and early twenty-first century. A special focus of the paper is what the author terms "pleasure domes," commercially-sponsored settings that construct "enjoyment" for their patrons. The author analyzes these in terms of the degrees and kinds of freedom that they represent.

Gran minería y riesgo en la provincia de San Juan, Argentina

La actividad minera es considerada como una actividad de alto riesgo. Desde los enfoques actuales del desarrollo, el tratamiento de los riesgos mineros debe considerarse como parte de los desafíos del crecimiento con equidad y la sustentabilidad ambiental.

El marco regulatorio minero argentino actual se ha mostrado insuficiente para comprender la magnitud de los impactos que genera la actividad minera de escala, incorporar la multiplicidad de actores que afecta, sin contar su incompatibilidad con la legislación ambiental. Todo esto, más el inicio de la actividad minera metalífera de escala en la provincia de San Juan, Argentina a partir de 2003, despertó en las poblaciones localizadas en el área de influencia del proyecto preocupaciones, incertidumbres y miedos, estrechamente vinculados a la falta de información sobre los procesos productivos de la minería y el peligro ambiental que estos implican.

Las zonas de influencia de los megaproyectos mineros comprenden pequeños poblados, aislados (respecto de los centros urbanos), de escasa población, equipamiento y servicios, gobiernos locales débiles y marginales hasta entonces a la economía de la provincia. Poblados que a partir del desarrollo minero se ven insertos en circuitos de economía globalizada, que contribuye a generar un crecimiento anual del PBG del 16,6%, que ha crecido desde el año 2003 hasta hoy en un 115%, el mayor de toda la Argentina basado en la explotación de recursos no renovables.

Esta ponencia pretende poner en evidencia cómo se define el riesgo desde el marco regulatorio actual, qué riesgos se identifican y cuáles se dejan de lado, esto es, los peligros a los que se expone la vida humana y el ambiente.

The increasing popularity of the new social media technologies such as Facebook™, MySpace™, Twitter™ and YouTube™ have brought about significant changes in the ways in which we connect and communicate both locally and globally. The interactive, intense and instantaneous nature of the communication coupled the ability to reach large global audiences makes these mediums a source of possibility but also new sites of risk. On the one hand, a number of social science and feminist research on online spaces have heralded the disembodiment of 'race' as a social marker, freeing people to explore different alternative identities. However, on the other, a number of social science researchers also argued that online spaces merely became another site for old forms of 'race' and racisms to be reintroduced and reinforced. Recent examples of how these online spaces have been used to espouse old and generate newer forms of racisms abound. As a result, this paper aims to comparatively and critically explore how 'race' and 'racisms' are experienced online.

This paper will explore the diverse experiences of recently arrived visible migrants and refugees who have resettled in regional and rural Australia as part of a wider critical comparative policy framework. We argue that the dynamic and diverse nature of migration in the 21st century has not been fully reflected in existing research nor in the design and delivery of migration policies and as a result, certain individuals, groups and communities tend to be further marginalised, essentialized and/or misunderstood. This is especially evident when looking at the arrival of more recent visible entrants within the Australian context - a continent that remains deeply complicated by the racial legacy of an Indigenous invasion and an explicit discriminatory policy of migration - the 'White Australia' policy. This paper draws specifically on in-depth interviews with recently arrived migrants and refugees within rural and regional Australia, to outline how their settlement experiences are shaped by multiple and often simultaneously competing structural and individual factors. In order to fully appreciate these factors, we argue for a shift to a more context-sensitive conceptualization of migration and settlement.

Est-ce que le développement a été une promesse de justice sociale et d'égalité des chances ? Est-ce que ces notions ont été comprises de la même façon par les cultures locales et globales ? A qui et comment reviennent les progrès apportés par la mondialisation ? Les concepts de développement, de justice sociale et d'égalité des chances ont été très utilisés lors des dernières décennies. Ils ont soutenu différentes stratégies pour améliorer le développement des « défavorisés ». Cependant, ils ont négligé les transformations sociales, culturelles, identitaires et environnementales qui se sont déclenchées de différentes manières au niveau local. Ils ont négligé tout un « monde invisible » qui va au-delà des pratiques nettement productives. Derrière ces pratiques productives se trouvent des vies quotidiennes, avec des stratégies individuelles et collectives, des identités et une mémoire populaire.

Revenir sur la notion de « monde invisible » est important pour approfondir ce qui est la mondialisation. Le travail agricole lié à l'agro-industrie d'exportation, une forme de travail qui a émergé des transformations socioéconomiques produites par une stratégie de développement du monde rural au Chili, est un exemple. L'émergence d'un travail agricole lié à l'agro exportation a particulièrement bouleversé le monde rural, en touchant les sphères sociales, familiales et culturelles. Ce sont des changements qui ont affecté la vie ordinaire, les formes de travail, les rapports sociaux et les identités de milliers de personnes.

Cette présentation s'intéresse au revers de la médaille du développement, en analysant son complexe et paradoxal monde invisible, très particulier au Chili, grâce à une enquête ethnographique menée dans la Vallée du Limarí avec la réalisation d'interviews aux acteurs du monde agricole actuel.

The relevance of new types of visualization for emotional styles in the field of Christian religion

In this presentation the focus lies on the question: what role do new types of media usage in Christian parishes play for the development, representation and analysis of new emotional styles?

Three key points shall be emphasized:

1. The importance of visualizations in the form of images/pictures and texts for Christianity is well known. For hundreds of years, artistically designed church windows, illustrated church interiors and opulent Bible editions and prayer books have borne witness of this. It seems, however, to be interesting, how Christian parishes include nowadays visualizations by means of new technical solutions. This development may be partly caused by the factor that the lifeworld of religion is not unlinked to the other lifeworlds believers dwell in, but is rather in fact tightly interwoven with them.
2. For the analysis of emotions in Christian parishes, the employment of new means of visualization provides an important entry point. This is especially true with regard to the performative, communicative dimension of emotions, which becomes accessible for us, when we interpret image and video data materials created by members of the parishes themselves.
3. By doing so, it becomes clear, that the photographs, images and video clips the parishes present on their web pages, provide the spectator with a visualized knowledge of the "feeling rules" (Hochschild) or parts of the "emotional regime" (Riis and Woodhead) of a parish or a recurring event.

Expectations about higher education in City of God, Brazil: Does diversification in access make a difference?

The paper will explore some preliminary conclusions from a study conducted by the author over the last year regarding the factors that influence the choices and expectations of 3rd year high school students in the neighbourhood of City of God, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. This area is known by low human development indicators and low level of education of its population.

Through a research among the students of the only high school in the community, the analysis will examine their views about the perspective of entering higher education in the future, which are the strategies designed for that and which are the reasons for possible lack of interest in this path. Moreover, this study investigates how and if the recent policies adopted by Brazilian government to expand the access to higher education in Brazil are contributing for greater interest and positive expectations of these students to enter higher education.

For this reason it is also important to understand how these programs are being implemented by the higher education institutions located in the metropolitan area of Rio de Janeiro, where probably students from City of God might want to apply for. Among the access programs it is possible to find quotas for black and low income students, additional scores for low income students, fellowship programs in private institutions, public credit for university tuition. The study will also collect the data about how much of this information and types of access is known by the high school students in City of God.

Performance, perception, and legitimation in academic science

Do careers in modern-day professional science have peaks? It is often thought that careers peak when one is young and that creativity declines with age. This work challenges both claims and draws different conclusions. Using a sample of 60 academics at different stages of their careers and employed at three different types of universities in the United States, this study examines performance in a profession by determining whether peaks mark scientific careers, how common they may be, and when and with what frequency they occur over time. The study utilizes mixed-methods. Qualitative data gathered from interviews with academics are used to examine their experience of work in order to discern how professionals biographically depict "highs" and "lows" across a career. Quantitative data gathered from academics' publication records are used to construct alternate depictions of their evolving professional biographies. Two different types of career peaks are examined: those established subjectively by scientists' perceptions and those established objectively by scientists' performance. The two types of peaks are then compared with each other in order to see the extent of their correspondence. We are thus able to assess questions, such as: Are people as good objectively as they subjectively believe? Are people better performers than they believe themselves to be? Variation in perception and performance by field is considered, as is variation by university type and by career stage. The paper concludes by discussing the importance of career peaks to the construction and maintenance of status orders. Subjective and objective status orders operate as differing means by which legitimation is established in stratified fields of activity, as emblematic in professions. Legitimation creates a ground on which members of a group, varied in their performances, can lay defensible claim to a robust work identity.

Professional services: Questions to take into account for a possible regulation in a globalized world

This presentation aims to raise a number of issues concerning the understanding and interpretation of elements which, in the opinion of the authors and given their inclusion in the General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS), need to be specified and implemented.

Nowadays there are regulations providing for quality control procedures for educational services, whether in the form of requirements for new establishments or regular subsequent checks. Under no circumstances can such precautions taken by States be compared to trade barriers. What really is at issue here, especially in cases involving some form of cross-border supply, when local regulations do not apply, is the need for agreements to be reached on the means of controlling the quality of the services offered and users' and consumers' right to such services on an equal basis.

On the same way, talking about professional services, and given that the providers of such services have themselves had to gain qualifications involving study and success on a higher education course, guarantees are required about quality of such services. It must be -at least- equivalent to that of the services available in the country itself, or failing that, that reliable information on professional service quality is available to people seeking such services, thus enabling them to make their own comparisons.

The challenge facing us is therefore to develop acceptable and reliable quality standards which take progress in the fields of educational competence into account, drawing on the experience gained at regional and multi-lateral forums on integration and cooperation in education and professional services, such as those of the European Union and Mercosur, inter alia.

Sociología del trabajo y nuevas articulaciones laborales

En 1995 nos preguntábamos si era posible que la Sociología del Trabajo, con sus paradigmas disciplinarios, pudiera dar cuenta de las nuevas realidades que, por entonces, estaban emergiendo como producto del postfordismo en el capitalismo globalizado.

Sosteníamos que la crisis de la disciplina en los 90, estaba signada por un reduccionismo economicista que tendía a considerar a los actores sociales como meras categorías del "modelo fabril"; pero también de la transformación radical de los actores socio-laborales del siglo XX, que se estaba produciendo en aquellos años y; por la necesidad de incorporar las dimensiones subjetivas en el marco de análisis disciplinario..

Partíamos de hacer un racconto histórico de los procesos que afectaron a las relaciones laborales desde los '70 –que caracterizamos como "hechos fundadores"-, particularizando en Argentina y América Latina, desarrollábamos las nuevas realidades que estaban emergiendo y proponíamos marcos interpretativos novedosos, acordes a las preguntas que nos hacíamos.

Un quincenio después, siendo la precariedad y las nuevas articulaciones laborales el sino común de la reorganización capitalista globalizada, se impone realizar una revisión crítica de lo sucedido, de los nuevos "hechos fundadores" que sucedieron en la región y el globo, de la consolidación del capitalismo financiero con la fuerza política para subordinar gobiernos y sus crisis a repetición, con la transformación tecnológica como fuerza productiva dominada y el desplazamiento (en dos sentidos: subproletariado y migraciones forzados por la pobreza) y extinción de poblaciones, así como los nuevos significados del trabajo y el general intellect. La Sociología del Trabajo debe realizar un esfuerzo para superar un marco analítico que ya era insuficiente para dar cuenta del mundo laboral del fordismo, dando cuenta de las nuevas corrientes latinoamericanas para abordar el cambio social con los aportes del pensamiento crítico. De eso se tratará este trabajo.

Acción colectiva y autogestión

Valoración de la toma como viabilizadora de prácticas autogestivas en trabajadores de empresas recuperadas.

Con la crisis social iniciada a principios de siglo se difundió la recuperación de empresas por sus trabajadores como una forma de enfrentar el cierre de las fuentes laborales. La "toma" u "ocupación" de la unidad productiva, fue la modalidad de acción colectiva emblemática en la lucha por obtener la tenencia y reiniciar la producción bajo gestión de los trabajadores.

En este sentido, se pretende indagar las valoraciones que tienen los trabajadores integrantes de empresas recuperadas acerca de estas formas de acción colectiva, que desbordan los mecanismos institucionales de procesamiento de los conflictos.

¿En qué medida la "toma" u "ocupación" es valorada como forma de acción colectiva? ¿Es estimado positivamente que otras identidades recurran a la toma como modalidad de acción colectiva, en pos de llevar adelante sus prácticas autogestivas?

¿Cuáles son los criterios de justicia que subyacen a las distintas valoraciones?

La hipótesis de trabajo sostiene que la valoración positiva de "la toma" u "ocupación" como forma de acción colectiva, está asociada directamente a la participación en el proceso de recuperación y la intensidad del conflicto involucrado en el mismo.

Para cumplir con el objetivo propuesto, se utilizarán registros realizados en 17 empresas recuperadas de CABA, durante el periodo 2010-2011 en las que se indagan valoraciones y percepciones de la acción colectiva.

Counter-hegemony and the sociology of place: A preliminary study of new social movements at Parque Duarte in Santo Domingo

This paper is part of an ongoing research project on new social movements in the Dominican Republic. In spite of and quite often, in direct opposition to the conservative hegemonic project led by the Dominican Catholic church and the extreme political right, there has been a marked resurgence of new progressive social movements led by young activists. This has taken place mainly in the capital including environmentalists, feminists, LGBT activists, Haitian-Dominicans, as well as members of cultural collectives.

The paper focuses on the spatial and symbolic strategies deployed by those groups by looking at the case of Parque Duarte, a small yet incredibly important public space in the colonial center (Zona Colonial) of Santo Domingo where most of these movements concentrate. The paper starts with an overview of life at the park during the last 20 years and how it became a vibrant icon of cultural resistance and political inconformity after having been neglected by the authorities. According to several interviewees, two movements, the errantistas ("the wanderers", a group of radical cultural activists), and the LGBT community were key in creating the conditions that allowed others to feel safe in this abandoned public space.

However, the increasing visibility of the LGBT community prompted calls for repression by several public figures including the Cardinal, a controversial figure in Dominican politics, who resides a few blocks away from Parque Duarte, which is located in front of two churches. Police repression was in effect for two months until the beginning of 2011. The paper looks at these developments by combining insights from the sociology of place, Gramsci's hegemony framework, and cultural and social movement studies. Fieldwork consists of interviews with movement members and leaders, journalists, Zona Colonial residents, and academics and participant observation of people and events at Parque Duarte.

"Take your rosaries out of our ovaries": Counter-hegemony, and the multiplier effects of the dominican feminist movement

As it is the case elsewhere in the region, the Dominican feminist movement has to reckon with the Catholic Church's immense public legitimacy. The paper analyzes the movement's contributions to democratic consolidation by focusing on the counter-hegemonic tactics it used during the first public debate on abortion by focusing on the case of the "Women's Forum for Constitutional Reform." The Forum's strategies were tested in 2009 and 2010 during the national debate around an anti-choice provision in the new Constitution introduced by President Leonel Fernández.

For the first time in Dominican history, feminist groups were able to mobilize other sectors to publicly oppose hegemonic anti-choice discourse and policies. Journalists, doctors, civil society organizations, intellectuals, scientists, as well as women and men of all ages and walks of life took part of demonstrations against the so-called Article 30. Moreover, a 2010 national poll indicated some important cultural shifts: 80% of Dominicans were in favor of interrupting a pregnancy when it puts the woman's life in danger. In contrast, only a third of Dominicans favored a woman's right to choose in 2008.

Congress ended up approving the anti-choice provision, which became Article 38 of the 2010 Constitution. Nonetheless, vocal opposition to it as well as feminists' long standing work regarding violence against women has contributed to the radicalization of other movements, particularly among previously demobilized constituencies. The paper analyzes these developments vis-à-vis their potential in deepening the country's democracy based on Gramsci's hegemony framework and Fraser's concept of counterpublics. The paper looks at the Women's Forum as well as its connections with two new movements: the "4%" initiative challenging government to implement the law devoting 4% of the country's GDP to education, and more recently, a movement of men against gender-based violence.

Uncertainty and reproductive responsibility: Men and assisted reproduction in Chile

Since the birth of the first baby conceived as the result of in vitro fertilization in 1978, new reproductive technologies have diversified and globalized. However, as shown by studies in societies as different as Israel, Egypt, Ecuador and China, the use of these technologies is reconfigured according to each local context. Healthcare professionals and potential patients only accept multiple options made available by assisted reproduction techniques when these are seen as reasonable within the context of social relations and cultural norms existing in each society.

In Chile, having children is considered to be the 'natural' way of things for every person and couple. Becoming a parent is perceived as something essential to personal fulfillment. While birth control methods have made people feel that they can control conception, couples facing infertility see this illusion of control fall apart and have to face reproductive uncertainty.

The arguments wielded in this paper are based on the results of a qualitative research project I conducted in Santiago, Chile. I interviewed forty-nine women and men who have chosen adoption or assisted reproduction in order to become parents. Through the analysis of the reproductive narratives of men who conceived by means of assisted reproduction in Chile, this paper aims to understand how these fathers accommodate and curtail global reproductive technologies to their local realities. The viewpoints of men undergoing infertility treatments are usually ignored in sociological and anthropological studies since these technologies operate in women bodies. When opting for assisted reproduction, these fathers have to make decisions about embryos to be implanted, cryopreservation of fertilized eggs, donation of eggs and embryos. These decisions place them in totally unknown scenarios and up against new uncertainties. They have to intervene in matters they believe to be the domain of God or Nature.

Between formal exclusion and new forms of belonging: Latin American undocumented women in Germany

By drawing upon findings from my empirical research conducted with undocumented Latin American women in Germany, the aim of this paper is to examine a specific configuration of formal exclusion and practices of belonging, with particular attention being paid to its gendered and racialized conditions and effects.

Taking the production of 'illegality' in the German context as a starting point, this paper will analyse the different ways through which undocumented migrant women contest their precarious status and negotiate new forms of belonging. Focusing on their activist engagement in community organisations and migrants' rights advocacy groups, this paper will examine under which conditions undocumented Latin American women become engaged as activists and which material and symbolic resources (e.g. pre-migratory political engagement, cultural capital, the recourse to familiar / cultural traditions) do they therefore mobilize in a society where their existence is criminalized.

Given the fact that domestic work in private households is one of the largest employment sectors for undocumented Latin American women in Germany, the formation of activist subjectivities that challenge the national logic of legitimate belonging is closely related to the work they perform at their employers' households. In their narratives, they claim the right to belong based on the care responsibilities they assume: they see themselves as providers of services that are crucial to the functioning of German society and link their notions of rights and responsibilities to the work they perform in the private sphere.

On the methodological plane, I argue that a narrative approach offers a privileged vantage point for understanding the processual dynamics and interplay between the precarious status and formal exclusion of undocumented Latin American women, and their participation in community organisations and migrants' rights advocacy groups.

Towards a politicized arts philanthropy? Corporate social responsibility and the arts in the UK

As a result of recent government cuts to public funding for the arts in the UK the encouragement of private philanthropy has become a widespread practice, even if not new, supported by an unprecedented professionalization of fundraising in the sector. However, less discussed is the impact or social significance of arts philanthropy, especially in view of the claim that philanthropy is intrinsic to the maintenance of the conditions necessary for the capitalist mode of production. This paper thus discusses the potential of artistic production and consumption practices to produce views and knowledge that challenge and question the status quo under such an increased reliance of private funding. It explores the possibility of a politicized form of arts philanthropy by highlighting the recent controversial donation by BP (British Petroleum), as an instance of corporate social responsibility towards the arts, to fund some of London's key cultural institutions, including Tate Modern.

Group-based activities, mutual support and poverty relief: Women in microfinance in South Africa Economic characterisation places South Africa amongst upper-middle income countries, but in reality, it is one of the world's most unequal societies. Women are disproportionately represented among the poor, requiring greater assistance to develop sustainable livelihoods than men. However, as nurturers and homemakers, they are dominant in family and community maintenance. Consequently, women are the preferred targets of financial institutions offering poverty relief, including those in the micro-finance industry. Control of the credit to which women have access is often influenced by traditional, mainly kinship, factors, particularly the fact that women are regarded as minors and possessions of their patriarchal families. Furthermore, the collectivist spirit associated with 'community' and the notion of ubuntu that are manifest in principles of interdependence and participation by all the members of a group in activities that affect it, also impact on the use of credit. These issues have significant implications for women's involvement in microfinance.

Against this background, and drawing on qualitative research, this paper discusses how group-based activities and mutual support contribute to poverty relief among women who are members of the Small Enterprise

Foundation (SEF), a SME (Small and Medium Enterprise) in South Africa. SEF's operations in a province characterised by one of the highest unemployment rates in South Africa are primarily based on the voluntary formation of small groups of women who provide mutual support and morally binding assurances to each other, based on social and cultural factors that produce close relationships between them. Negative implications of women's access to credit are significant, but in the impoverished rural environment where the women live and work, access to microfinance to establish micro-enterprises demonstrates the value of microfinance where no other forms of sustainable livelihood are available.

Higher education, youth unemployment and social justice in Sri Lanka

Higher education is an expanding area of private investment today many countries. This is partly the result of the increasing demand for higher education, particularly among relatively more affluent youth in the developing world. The exodus of youth from the developing world for higher education has led to a debate as to whether private investment in higher education should be encouraged to create more educational opportunities at home. This has become a contentious political issue in Sri Lanka where state universities have long dominated the higher education sector. Establishment of private universities is perceived here as a measure that could marginalize existing universities and thereby their products in the employment market.

The state universities in Sri Lanka absorb only about 20% of the secondary school leavers qualified for university admission. Yet many of the local graduates remain unemployed for several years. While the state sector does not offer adequate employment opportunities for them, private firms often do not absorb them due to their alleged unsuitability for private sector employment. Though greater public investments in general and higher education appear to be the way to improve quality of education and the employability of graduates, the governments tend to give priority to areas such as physical infrastructure and social services.

This paper examines the recent trends in enrolment in universities and unemployment among educated youth in the of the light data drawn for the national youth survey of Sri Lanka conducted under the direction of the data drawn from of the author in 2009. This paper also looks at recent investment patterns in education in order to examine the adequacy of public investment in the sector, persisting structural inequities and their implications for equity and social justice.

It wasn't my fault

As assaults against women and young girls become more visible, institutions thought to be protective are being put into question. Sexual abuse within the family happens to young girls. Violence in schools has increased since the turn of the century often affecting girls and their teachers. An increase in the use of violence against women in the family has been observed. Workplace sickness and injuries involving women are on the rise. Yet, research shows that medical employees working in the emergency room of a major hospital in Sweden think that a woman who is a victim of violence has her self to blame. Although, women seeking social justice within the legal system have often faced the idea that they are to blame for rape, the idea that also women battered by men are to blame is gaining ground. This paper analyzes changes in the legal system in advanced societies, the importance of development of human rights and the rise of social movements for the protection of young girls and women. A key point of the paper is a discussion of the concept of blame and responsibility and how changing definitions and narratives mitigate the importance of increasing violence against girls and women in contemporary society. The contrast between formal advancements of the rights of women to protection against violence is placed against growing perceptions that violence is not a matter of public concern but should be dealt with individually and privately. The paradox of more legal protection and less public concern is of utmost importance in the everyday lives of young girls and women in society.

Functions of social capital for residents of depopulated area in Japan

"Who's afraid of population decline?" In Japan, they are residents of rural areas. The Japanese countryside is suffering from severe depopulation. Due to the lack of job opportunities, many young people migrate from their home villages, leaving the elders in difficult living environments.

Moreover, according to government reports, 423 villages will be deserted within the next 10 years due to the decline in population. Therefore, Japanese rural people are apprehensive about the population decline.

However, in Japan's rural areas, courageous people who are very satisfied with their lives hope to continue living in their home villages despite the possibility of desertion due to rapid depopulation. What kind of social background makes these people confident and courageous?

In this report, I use data from my fieldwork, which includes a case study and social surveys of Shimoguri village (loosely translated as "a village of chestnuts"), Iida city, and Nagano prefecture in Japan. The residents of Shimoguri village are confident and courageous even though their home village's population has been decreasing rapidly.

Two types of social capital, "bonding" and "bridging," are the key concepts of this report (Putnam 2000). The data of the social survey conducted in Shimoguri village show that both "bonding" and "bridging" promote residents' feelings of satisfaction and reinforces their intentions to continue living in their villages. "Bonding," in particular, has a strong influence.

"Bonding" social capital plays an important role in the maintenance of depopulated rural areas.

Political economy of nostalgia and transnational migration between Mexico and United States

En este trabajo se discute de qué manera se construye la nostalgia de los migrantes mexicanos hacia sus lugares de origen en el contexto de la migración transnacional entre México y Estados Unidos y cuál es el impacto de esta emoción en la economía, las relaciones sociales y de poder, las prácticas culturales y la representación de identidades.

Mediante la descripción etnográfica y el análisis del caso de la migración de Jalostotitlán, Jalisco, hacia California, se pretende ilustrar una nueva forma de nostalgia, la que surge en esta era de intensa movilidad de personas y circulación constante de bienes, información y símbolos.

La separación física de sus patrias chicas y sus seres queridos, la distancia espacio-temporal entre "aquí" y "allá", el contraste sociocultural entre su país de origen y el país receptor, las experiencias de alienación en el trabajo y en la vida social son algunos factores que les hacen a los migrantes sentir y narrar la nostalgia hacia sus patrias chicas. Por un lado, esta emoción ha motivado a los migrantes a replicar los símbolos y prácticas culturales arraigadas en sus lugares de origen en el país receptor. Por el otro lado, les ha fomentado realizar visita de regreso a sus lugares de origen en el período vacacional.

Sin embargo, en el contexto en que los migrantes mexicanos han sido vistos como consumidores y feligreses potenciales y como nuevos sujetos de desarrollo por los distintos actores que rodean su vida transnacional, la nostalgia ha dejado de ser un simple sentimiento romántico para colocarse en el centro de una nueva economía política de sentimientos que está transformando la realidad social, tanto en los lugares de destino en Estados Unidos como en los lugares de origen en México.

The government of illegalisms in São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro: A comparison of the informal street markets

The presentation is an analysis of the relationships between forms of social control and popular illegalisms based on ethnographic research of the informal street markets in the cities of São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro.

On one side are found the modern practices of "good urban governance" whose police, tax and urban instruments produce the urban socio-spatial device of social control. On the other hand the popular illegalisms situate the conflicts and tensions of the groups that dispute politics economics and urban space.

The articulation between "good urban governance" practices and the network of old and new forms of illegalisms enlightens power settings of groups in the cities, the differential management of illegalisms, as well as the social cleavages that emerge from this contest.

Urban law and right to the city: Urban struggles in the inner city of São Paulo

Brazil is known for the advances achieved in the field of urban legislation, mainly in reference to the City Statute established in 2001. The city of Sao Paulo was a pioneer in this regard, being the first to integrate legal instruments from this avant-garde law into its Strategic Master Plan. Promulgated in 2002, this plan classified specific urban areas as ZEIS - Special Zones of Social Interest. By establishing areas in which the use of social housing is a priority, the plan has become an important element to enforce social justice. The "Nova Luz" project, currently being conducted by the Sao Paulo municipality, provides a valuable case study. The project will be the first of its kind, simultaneously applying two urban instruments, the Urban Concession and the ZEIS. The intervention will take place in 45 blocks of the centrally located Luz neighborhood, an area known for its profit potential. More than a project of "urban renewal" aimed to interest the real estate market, disputes between the "users" of the space (residents, local business, homeless and social housing movements) and the municipality reveal a singularity whose elements allows us to reflect over the "Right to the City." On the one hand, this struggle reveals the limits given by the structural condition of contemporary capitalism on the production of the city, making us question the supposed advances in the Brazilian urban field. At the same time, the emerged conflicts point to forms of social resistance that are only possible through the presence of an urban condition, which replaces the terms of Lefebvre about a possible urban society.

Digital inclusions in internet cafes and their problems: Comparative study on the internet access for overseas Filipina domestic workers in Hong Kong, Singapore and Taipei

This paper aims to clarify the reality of digital inclusions for overseas Filipina domestic workers in Hong Kong, Singapore and Taipei by focusing on internet cafes and to consider the future of them in each city. The reason why this paper focuses on the internet café is that, taking the financial situations and working conditions of those people into account, it plays an important role in providing the Internet and personal computer access for them.

In this presentation, firstly I will confirm the financial situations and living conditions of overseas Filipina domestic workers in three cities by referring to previous studies on them. Secondly, I will introduce their uses of internet cafes, while pointing out that one of the most concentrated areas of internet cafes in each city overlaps where they come together on Sundays or holidays. Thirdly, I will also pay attention to the ordinances regulating the operation of the internet café in order to figure out the differences of general perceptions of it in each city. Finally, I will designate the insufficiency of digital inclusions for overseas Filipina domestic workers and consider the future of them in the social context of Hong Kong, Singapore and Taipei.

Argentine folkloric dances: State policies and actor perspectives

Through the analysis of Argentine folkloric dances, this paper focuses on the intersections between state cultural politics and the dancers' practices and reflections on their activities. It shows how the Argentine state has historically worked on the construction of an official repertoire of dances to represent the nation, and how nowadays this repertoire is promoted in competitive folkloric dance venues. Based on four years of ethnographic research with a folkloric ballet participating in these competitive events, I discuss how the dancers display their agency to appropriate the hegemonic order in the sake of their own interests. At the same time, through an analysis of their narratives, I show how youngsters' engagement with the artistic dance project - independently of the nationalist ideology associated with the folkloric dances - provides them with tools to weave social bonds, and helps them develop capacities for social interaction and democratic building.

Higher education and the social impact of the postgraduate studies in a Mexican university

The third phase of the Research Project about Professional Ethics that is being developed in the National Autonomous University of Mexico consisted in the design and application of an open interview guide for the forty program coordinators of the postgraduate studies (Master and PHD). Two of the eight questions are directly related to the social impact of this level of studies: the social functions of scientific research and the challenges that the Mexican society presents to the university in its role of preparing professionals from all the knowledge areas. The empirical categories constructed from the multiple responses, obtained in relation to the question about the social impact of research are: Create new knowledge, Form human resources of the highest level, Finding useful solutions for society, Spread knowledge – contribute in the interrelation between university and society and interact with other disciplines; Contribute to a scientific culture in the country and the Preservation of culture. In relation to the question about the challenges of society, the program coordinators expressed specific problems and some possible solutions. The problems were: Limited preparation in the previous learning levels in terms of knowledge and study habits, Problems for the university graduates in terms of finding and maintaining good jobs, Lack of recognition in the Mexican society about the necessity of experts and the fact that the postgraduate studies are already attending several problems that constitute real challenges. The proposals were: To promote a bigger interaction between the diverse knowledge fields, Promote flexibility and a better adaptation to change in relation to the students, Locate development areas, Obtain results that benefit science and society, Maintain a high level, Respond to the social necessities and Achieve effectively a better articulation between university and society.

Food and the construction of the ethnic self among Mizrahi immigrants to Israel

During the 1950s and 1960s hundreds of thousands of Jews from North Africa and the Middle East arrived to the newly established Israeli state. These immigrants, referred to in Israel as "Mizrahi" (lit. Eastern), brought with them diverse food repertoires, most of which were unknown to Israelis of European descent ("Ashkenazi"). Although the popularity of "Oriental food" (i.e., a reduced and adjusted repertoire of Arab foods) increased during the 1950s, immigrants' food repertoires were subjected to various efforts of reform by instructors, teachers, nutrition experts and other educational agents. Sources suggest that in spite of these efforts the first generation of immigrants stuck to the food habits of the home country. Especially immigrants who were sent to agricultural settlements planted seeds of familiar foods they had brought with them from their countries of origins, as well as consumed vegetables, fruits and cereals they picked from the Arab remains in the vicinity of the villages. According to a research conducted in the 1960s, the second generation to families of immigrants already abandoned large parts of the home repertoire. It was only in the 1980s that a "rediscovered" repertoire of Mizrahi foods became a part of the construction of "authentic identities" and "nostalgic selves" by immigrants' descendants. This was due to several processes, among them the development of ethnic consciousness, and the emergence of a full blown consumer society in Israel.

Based on interviews with Mizrahi immigrants from the 1950s and 1960s the paper will examine immigrants' own experiences of these processes: what were the meanings of food—both the home repertoire and the one encountered in Israel—in the migration process? How did immigrants experience the marginalization and debasement of their foods in the public sphere? Special emphasis will be placed on food's role in the construction of the "ethnic self".

Hummus in Israel: Between the industrial and the artisanal

Hummus in Israel is not only an extremely popular dish—it is considered one of the very signifiers of "Israeliness." Following the emergence of a gastronomic field in Israel in the 1980s, and the development of an omnivore orientation in food consumption among members of the new middle class, hummus consumption has undergone differentiation in culinary discourse and practice. Among other factors, handmade hummus became more sharply distinguished from industrial varieties of the dish. In the research literature too, consumption of industrial food and that of handmade food are conceived in opposing terms.

Based on my research on hummus consumption in Israel I argue, that instead of taking "the industrial" and "the artisanal" as two opposite and competing realms, we should examine their interrelationship and mutual construction.

Thus, for instance, the entry of the big food corporations to the field of salads production in the 1990s has not only increased significantly the consumption of industrial hummus in Israel, but also of handmade hummus prepared in a hummusiya (hummus restaurant). Hummus producing companies are organizing public events where handmade hummus by specific hummus chefs is celebrated alongside industrial varieties of the dish, and owners of popular hummus restaurants are cooperating with the industry in order to promote their restaurants.

The research is based on interviews with various actors in the hummus industry and in the culinary field and on analysis of various types of published materials concerning hummus production and consumption (the most significant being the daily press).

Constructing the self-responsible welfare recipient by law – biographies and everyday life after the German welfare reform

Germany's welfare paradigm has undergone a severe change during the past decades, having had its peak so far by establishing the new Social Code II for long-term unemployed in 2005. Stressing the notion of self-responsibility and employability welfare recipients are no longer seen as 'victims' of social and labour-market risks. This perspective is the result of a shift in the attribution of risks and its consequences from politics and society towards the individual – in theory as well as in the public discourse. The main task of social policy programs addressing long-term unemployed is no longer seen in compensating market failures but in activating the individuals. By this social policy is not only a means to an end in terms of welfare. Moreover – following e.g. Foucault – it has become part of those powerful social technologies aiming at (re)shaping the subject in order to foster 'governmentality'.

On this background we will give a short analysis of German Social Code II as a means to feature and "produce" a new mode of subjectivity of the welfare recipient, especially focusing on the practice of contractualization as a means to attribute (self-)responsibility. We will refer to data gained from qualitative panel research on welfare recipients from 2007 until 2011. The results give evidence that the implementation of 'new welfare' not only encompasses an institutional change but also aims at people's self-concepts, biographical orientations and everyday lives.

Young people's assessments of factors for doing well in life: A comparative examination of Norwegian and British youth survey data

This paper examines data from two British and two Norwegian youth surveys, where respondents have been asked to evaluate the significance of various factors for doing well in life. Investigating how young people evaluate assets and obstacles connected to family background in contrast to how they assess factors more within the control of the individual, the paper aims to critically engage with propositions which have been recurrent both within theories of individualization and the sociology of youth. Unveiling empirical variations in young people's assessments across national contexts and to a lesser degree, class backgrounds, the paper argues that there is a need to rethink such propositions.

In Beck's theory of individualization, individuals are increasingly forced to take responsibility for the consequences of their life choices, even as institutions at the level of society gain increased power over individual life situations, "contrary to the image of control which establishes itself in consciousness" (1992:131). Similarly, Furlong and Cartmel's influential thesis of an 'epistemological fallacy of late modernity' suggests that the individualization process in effect erodes young people's perception of structurally rooted inequality, which instead gets interpreted as being based on individual merits or shortcomings (2007:144).

Part of the analysis lends credence to the propositions, as class background has a much clearer impact at the level of educational attainment and choice than at the level of perception. Furthermore, findings indicate a near consensus emerging around the centrality of education and individual effort. Questions about the significance of coming from a poor or wealthy family, however, divide both populations. While class background is found to have a modest impact on such assessments, the more striking finding is that Norwegian youth are substantially more ready to acknowledge the importance of family affluence than their UK peers.

Olympic culture shock: When equestrianism gallops to Hong Kong

As a Special Administrative Region of China, Hong Kong was abruptly asked to co-host the 2008 Beijing Olympics with just a single event—equestrianism. This paper seeks to discuss the collective culture shock experienced through the Chinese consumption of the Olympic movement, which has been described as the hallmark of western culture. It focuses on how the brusque consumption process connects and clashes with the Hong Kong culture, and brings a crucial reflection to the transnational promotion of the Olympic movement ("when West meets East") for the fifth time in Olympic history.

With Olympism and nationalism as theoretical underpinnings, the present research seeks to adopt Adler's (1975) five stages of culture shock to illustrate the Hong Kong community's experience with the co-hosting process, namely, honeymoon, disintegration, reintegration, autonomy, and independence. This study adopts a qualitative approach based on 30 dialogues with key Olympic stakeholders, staff, teachers, volunteers, and students in the form of individual in-depth interviews, focus groups, and an ethnographic fieldwork from the perspective of a selected volunteer at the Olympic equestrian event in Hong Kong.

The initial excitement about the opportunity to co-host the equestrian event as a result of the principle of "One Country, Two Systems" represented the honeymoon stage. Meanwhile, the tripolar communication of Olympic messages amidst the exaggerated popularization of equestrianism, the promotion of Chinese nationalism, and the global ideologies of Olympism were illustrated in the culture shock stages of disintegration, reintegration, and autonomy, respectively. The stage of independence in the conclusion aptly highlighted the sustainability of these efforts, and provided a crucial reflection of the Olympic legacy—the cross-cultural transition that the Olympic movement brings to the small Chinese city of Hong Kong.

Social theory in Melanesia: Cellular globalization in the mountainous rainforests of the island of Malaita

This paper seeks to bring sociology to the rainforest by looking at what social theory, through applied sociology, can reveal about emerging Melanesian cell phone practices. As there has been a paucity of qualitative, ethnography-based research on this topic, much work needs to be done not only in regards to generating ethnographic material, but also in regards to identifying and establishing a theoretical framework that accounts for the particularities of Melanesian modernity and its global encounters. The purpose of this paper is, therefore, to examine the dimensions of this theoretical framework by analyzing where Social Theory can be applied to intervene in both academic research as well as the engagement between Melanesians and globalization through cellular technology.

Latour's actor-network theory and Boltanski's pragmatic sociology of critique, among others, will be brought to bear on the case of cellular technology in the secluded mountains of the Kwaio jungles on the island of Malaita and in so doing this paper brings Sociology in Anthropology's backyard, Melanesia. In the backdrop of a protracted civil war generative and symptomatic of a failed state, this paper argues that the arrival of digital technology allows for the emergence and creation of a "second-state".

Institutional ethnography and people with schizophrenia

In this study we have followed the principles of institutional ethnography focussing on the life-world of people with psychosis as it is influenced by professional paradigms, institutional structures and the actions of other actors elsewhere in a larger system.

The data of the investigation stem from three separate studies focussing on the patients' experience of their mental disorder and their interaction with professionals in mental hospitals and community psychiatry. The studies comprised one and a half month observation of activities and interaction between professionals and clients in each of six different regions in Denmark, including a great number of individual interviews and group interviews with professionals and patients engaged in in-patient and out-patient activities. In addition, questionnaires were distributed to a total of 453 users of out-patient services.

By putting together the different accounts from users of the professional psychiatry as well as the professionals themselves, we seek to identify the institutional barriers for 'recovery' or more correct: Living on own terms with a psychosis. Though it is difficult to define what we really mean by 'own terms', it seems to be a bit easier to identify the barriers linked to:

1. A categorical diagnostic system that includes a reductionist and stigmatising picture of the patients' ability and disability.

2. A segregation of the psychiatric support in relatively autonomous systems (child psychiatry and adult psychiatry, affective disorders and psychosis, in-patients and out-patients, treatment and social support, hospital and community psychiatry).
3. Some basic factors linked to the governance of social problems and the self-governance of people with social problems. Factors embedded in the governmentality of modern welfare states that seems to 'put the blame on the victims' and transform personal and professional experiences and insight into categories that serves governmental aims.

Psychosocial strain and conflict management at residential homes for adults and young persons with developmental disorders

In the last years there has been increasing international attention to situations where young persons and adults with developmental disorders and reduced cognitive and emotional capacity have been victims of abuse in residential homes. At the same time we know from several studies that staff members of these institutions experience a great extent of psychosocial strain at work, including violence. It is important for residents and staff to find out how such outcomes can be avoided.

The aim of our study was to reach a better understanding of the mechanisms that may lead to conflicts and misunderstanding between residents and pedagogical staff. We paid special attention to communication and forms of social interaction in everyday situations, as well as to pedagogical practice and conflict management in local institutional settings.

Five residential homes were included in the study. The investigation was designed as an institutional ethnography including a mixed method design comprising field observations, focused individual and group interviews with staff members, and a questionnaire study to all frontline staff members.

The analysis of these data identified crucial results as regards the relationship between forms of interaction, professional paradigms, workload and conflicts. The analysis showed that the psychological strain on the professional staff members are primarily connected to conflicts they do not understand and cannot predict. It challenges their professional identity and self-esteem. Concurrently there seems to be a contradiction between the theories they refer to and the practical experience they have from being in day-to-day interaction with people with developmental disorders. This specific problematic of the field seems to indicate that we are facing a deeper limitation in our comprehension of these people. The results furthermore indicate that the guidelines for the professional support might themselves generate the conflicts they are meant to prevent.

The outraged passenger - Complaint letters as sources for a sociology of emotions

For this session I am proposing a presentation that will focus on one of the main sources of my current research project on subjectivities in urban infrastructures of transit: letters of complaint by passengers of the New York City subway from the period between 1956 and 1992.

Having only recently been discovered in the archive of the New York City Transit Museum, they provide a unique and valuable source that allows to address the dynamics of subjectivation and emotion in the context of urban transit.

These letters draw an image of the New York City subway as a highly tension-laden and emotional charged territory, with most emotions and conflicts played out along lines of race, class and gender. Moreover, the complaints allow insights into the heterogeneous experiences and structures of feeling of the passengers. In the administrative responses and framings of outrage, self-disclosure, anxiety, pleas and threats, the complex and multilayered forms of passenger emotions become visible and negotiable. As such, these complaints can also be read as testimonies of overstraining and anxiety that highlight the fragile emotional conditions of actors in urban spaces.

As rich as these ego documents may seem, the question how to analyze them opens up a wide set of problems and methodological issues. As such, they not only touch the broader conception of how we can analyze structures of feeling and subjectivities via this type of data, but also address the relations between individual subjects and broader social structures and dynamics.

In my presentation, I will discuss the methodological complexity of this source and propose strategies of analysis, also drawing from methods from the disciplines of history and historical anthropology.

Feeling your way: Exploring emotional reflexivity in joint interviews with couples in distance relationships

A robust sociology of emotions needs to include consideration of emotions not just as a topic of research but as something done within interactions with research participants, and perhaps especially within joint interviews. This chapter considers emotionality, or ways of being emotional within couples in distance relationships. It focuses particularly on how best to examine emotional reflexivity using in-depth joint interviews. The quality of data obtained from interviews depends not just on relations between researcher and participants, but on the emotionally reflexive relations participants have with absent others such as family and friends. By looking at data from across the joint interviews and then concentrating on one solo interview as a case study, it is possible to compare joint and single interviews as tools for studying emotional reflexivity in ways that capture its richness and ambivalence.

Productive misunderstandings: Global modernity and non-western rationalities

Global modernity arises from the interactions between an increasingly global cultural matrix and local modes of appropriation. Based upon predominantly Western principles of 'rationalized' modernity, a 'world culture' (J.W. Meyer) has come to provide the framework of individual and corporate action, i.e. a set of expectations about what constitutes a state, an organization or an individual as an 'actor.' Expectations may be met – or disappointed, rejected, ignored. Thus the framework of global modernity does not presuppose homogeneity. It merely informs observations of convergence or divergence and does not as such determine the adoption of specific ideas or institutions. Closer inspection therefore reveals a plethora of persisting variations. The globe is covered by 'nation-states,' but sometimes they lack a nation, sometimes an effective state bureaucracy. There are only few countries which do not call themselves democratic, but often that democracy does not have much to do with the parliamentary democracy of Western Europe. Invoking the same concepts obviously does not result in sharing the same practice. As a result, the sociology of global modernity faces the challenge of analysing variations beneath the surface of appearances. Using the example of modernization in Thailand, I show that the diffusion of modernity rests on two rails of (productive) misunderstanding: On the one hand, changes brought about by modernization may be depicted in terms of other rationalities, e.g. Buddhist standards of right conduct, to make them acceptable for local audiences; on the other hand, traditional practices and institutions such as the monarchy may be framed in a modernist manner to gain the approval of global observers. In both cases the heterogeneity of global modernity, particularly the extent to which it is based on contradictory rationalities is concealed – and thereby made possible.

Multicultural communities in a global age: What the 311 taught us and beyond

With the revision of the Immigration Law in 1990, the number of migrants drastically increased during the 1990s, more than one million foreign nationals living in Japan today.

Especially recent immigrants naturally find it difficult to adapt themselves to unfamiliar cultural milieu, not the least because of their limited

Japanese language skills. So local governments, NGOs and NPOs, communities, and volunteers actively try to provide non-Japanese residents with multilingual information concerning welfare, medical services, and education, all of which are generally regarded as basic human rights.

In addition, as Japan is frequently and severely hit by massive earthquakes like the 311 disaster, foreign residents also need access correct information in their own languages so as to quickly evacuate and literally survive at the critical moment. Actually, multilingual information and evacuation trainings, intended to keep foreigners well prepared for emergency, are available in many parts of Japan.

However, Japanese people in general still do not understand and even avoid people with different cultural backgrounds. What is worse, xenophobic reactions can happen in chaotic situations, as is shown by widespread rumor among the local people that foreigners were committing criminal activities in the devastated areas after 311.

The 311 disaster showed us that Japanese society has failed to develop enough multicultural understanding among people in general. Besides basic information in several languages given to everyone, Japan is required to construct more democratic, global-minded, and inclusive society for both Japanese and foreign people.

Cortes supremas y justicia transicional: Estudio comparado entre Argentina, Brasil y Uruguay

En el tema más amplio de justicia transicional, que ha ocupado un lugar privilegiado en la agenda política de los Estados latinoamericanos, bien como en la reflexión de las más diversas ciencias humanas, el objetivo de ese trabajo es comprender el papel ejercido, la forma de actuación y la lógica decisoria que las Cortes Supremas de Brasil, Uruguay y Argentina adoptaron cuando tuvieron que pronunciarse acerca de la validez y del alcance de las leyes de perdón o amnistías que fueron negociadas o impuestas en las redemocratizaciones operadas en la década de 1980. Se pretende analizar el proceso de judicialización de la demanda del derecho a la justicia (persecución penal) en relación a los autores de los crímenes de lesa-humanidad en las dictaduras de esos países y la argumentación adoptada por las Cortes Supremas. Especial atención se conferirá a las interlocuciones entre las Cortes Supremas e, también, entre ellas y el Sistema Interamericano de Protección a los Derechos Humanos. Esa análisis comparativa permitira comprender las aproximaciones y diferencias entre los casos, bien como la permeabilidad de las instituciones judiciales al derecho internacional de los derechos humanos. Además, será posible aferir en que medida hubo diálogo entre las distintas experiencias examinadas.

Negotiating deaf bodies and corporeal experiences

Throughout socio-history, nonmedical definitions of the "body" have become "defined and treated as medical problems, usually in terms of illness or disorders" (Conrad, 1992:209). There are many examples of these definitions in the name of race (the "one-drop rule" for African-Americans), ethnicity (the 1/16th rule for American Indians), sex (having certain physiological properties), and disability ("limitation of a major life activity") including deaf populations. However, unlike deaf populations, these "medical" definitions now have been demedicalized while deaf people remain very much confined in the medical framework of humanity. The medical language, as the power to name bodily dysfunctions, creates the "problem" for the deaf person through disciplinary techniques of bio-power (Hughes & Paterson, 1997). The notion on what it means to be deaf based on social constructions also includes the role of technology to shape cultural identities and corporeal experiences. The evolution of technological devices for the ear has provided diverse ideological perspectives concerning what it means to be deaf and normal. What is missing from these discussions is a nascent critical theory of deafness leading to critical systematic study on social constructed "bodies" for the deaf in a theoretical framework; a framework that moves from emic aspects toward healthy etic aspects of deafness in ways that open dialogue and collaborative inquiry on larger important issues such as what it means to be human.

Negotiating nationalism and identity: Cross-comparative analysis of deaf early childhood education in Japan, France, and United States

This proposal involves members of a research team who are conducting a comparative ethnographic study of kindergartens for the deaf in France, Japan, and the US. Our study is in a sense doubly ethnographic, as we are studying enculturation into Deaf culture in Japan, France, and the US within the larger national cultures and socio-political contexts. In this session, we present the study's method, show videoclips from our study (in the classrooms and panel discussions from teachers, administrators, and parents), and share early findings. Our central research question focuses how kindergarten schools for the deaf function as sites for acculturation/enculturation negotiate identity into both Deaf culture and national cultures. Another central theme of the session examines various micro/macro perspectives via diverse languacultures (whether it is their national language or sign language) on Deaf Early Childhood Education. Because the great majority of deaf children have hearing parents, acculturation of deaf children into Deaf culture occurs largely outside the family, and the enculturation process usually starts in school. Thus, schools and the pedagogy of language (which is inseparable to culture; thus, languaculture) plays an important and delicate role to the social construction of deafness; as such, this paper explores the ways that these two – schools and language/culture – plays a crucial role in the identity construction on what it means to be deaf in three countries both on a micro-level (deaf community/culture) but also on a macro-level (nationalism).

Gender equality in the safety culture

This paper aims to rethink how to enhance the safety culture for everyone in the world through the case of work safety, which is most associated with our everyday life. We have often underestimated the risk, no matter how important it is to promote the safety in the workplace. And once an accident has occurred, a person who is in a vulnerable position would fall victim to the accident, so that it shows an inequity behind our prosperity. How can we improve such a situation? In this paper, it is stressed that an equality between men and women needs to be realized for work safety.

As for the method, statistics based on Introductory Report: Decent Work-Safe Work (ILO, 2005) and Gender Inequality Index (GII), index showing the loss in human development due to inequality between men and women, are mainly employed to conduct this study in terms of comparison among about ninety countries.

We have obtained from our analyses that accidents have been decreasing in number in the industrialized countries, while it is on the contrary situation in the developing countries. Knowing that, according to the ILO, 28 countries with Established Market Economies (EME) have only 5% of the work-related fatal accidents in the world, we recognize that, not only domestically but also worldwide, there is a large disparity in safety practices between industrialized countries and developing ones. Confronting safety inequality and injustice among people in the world, we are strongly asked to endeavour to promote safe work.

As a conclusion, this study reveals that "Gender Equality Promotes Safety". It will be one of the important guidelines for today's safety culture as well as for an open society where everyone is welcome.

Comprehensive access and outcomes: Modeling the impacts on student-level outcomes of attention to resourcing tertiary education opportunities for underserved students

Access to most Chilean postsecondary institutions, especially the most selective, remains stratified along economic and indigenous lines (Espinoza, 2008; Koljatic & Silva, 2006; Matear, 2006; OECD, 2003). Further, even among those who gain entry, persistence and graduation rates are similarly disparate (OECD, 2009). For Pontificia Universidad Católica de Chile, the comprehensive process of admitting students and awarding financial support is primarily driven by the use of the Prueba de Selección Universitaria (PSU) scores alongside economic need to make selection decisions. Even prior to 2007, the most economically disadvantaged were already receiving assistance. However, beginning in 2007, almost all students with financial need systematically received one or more scholarship benefits, although the combinations of national and institutional scholarships have varied.

The present study considers these issues to answer the following questions: 1) Are there differences in persistence rates, by race, ethnicity, and indigenous status, of students who enrolled with different combinations of national and institutional financial scholarship benefits packages and similar students enrolled absent the benefit? 2) What factors predict persistence among the financial aid beneficiaries, and do these factors play a similar role for similar students who were admitted under different criteria?

To examine the relative persistence patterns of need-based scholarship students over time, initially the study employs event history analysis using Cox proportional hazard regression models to understand the net influence of the receipt of various combinations of one or more need-based awards on Bachelors degree completion and time to degree. Additional regression discontinuity analyses are employed to assess the effectiveness of the policy intervention on PPA.

It is hoped that the study may provide inferential evidence of how a full range of policies might affect the student body makeup and, among those already admitted, the relative contributions of various individual characteristics toward retention and graduation outcomes.

'Affective political articulation': A new approach to examining the role of the media in the construction of infectious disease risk(s)

The media has long been recognised as a powerful force in constructing, as well as amplifying, the risk(s) of infectious disease transmission, particularly in high-income countries. In both Critical Discourse Analysis (CDA) and cultural studies approaches to media analysis, the notion of the 'frame' and 'spectacle' of media attention have come to speak to this phenomenon. In this paper, I draw on an analysis of public 'texts', including media articles, policy documents and focus groups concerning the 'immigrant TB' 'threat' and attendant 'risks' to human 'health' and 'national security' in the Australian context. I suggest that a new approach to exploring the role of the media in the construction of 'risk', and one that moves beyond the limiting, and arguably essentialising, tenets of CDA, is needed. Arguing from both a theoretical and empirical purview, I advance the notion that analyses of media texts need to account for the way in which specific affects, such as anger and shame, are articulated in both the media and everyday life and are thus rendered meaningful, within particular political discourse(s), always grounded in specific spatio-temporal context(s). Such an approach, which is intertextual and beyond the confines of the written text alone, is capable of taking us beyond merely examining the 'circulation' of affects in public, and media, discourse(s) of 'risk', towards a situated understanding of how they operate in specific contexts and permeate our everyday lives.

We couldn't live without it – Youth representations, beliefs and practices about energy consumption

It's increasingly clear that behaviour has a fundamental role in energy efficiency. The representations, beliefs and values are translated into behaviours that affect how individuals position themselves in relation to energy consumption. Given that this is one of the most serious problems affecting the living conditions of millions of people and compromise future generations, it's essential to promote behavioural changes, especially among young people for themselves and for the influence they have on their families. This paper presents part of the results of a larger study which aims to assess the practices and representations of the individuals' energy consumption and to implement an intervention plan at the schools to increase energy efficiency. A key objective of this project is also to analyze what impact the intervention done in schools will have on the families' energy consumption.

The results, based on the analysis of a survey to 731 students of a school in Lisbon and 300 households, have identified significant differences in gender, level of education and social class. Even though men show more knowledge about energy, women show more concern about the need to reduce consumption. Nevertheless, we find that women are more exposed to information about saving energy. While men tend to associate more energy with science and technology, women show a more traditional approach, very focused on electricity consumption.

In what concerns social class, we conclude that individuals from the middle class (Class B) have more knowledge about energy issues. The data also show a strong representation of renewable energy as one of the solutions, or even the only solution, to the problem of excessive energy consumption. The reduction of energy use as a way to save money is the main reason that people evoke to reduce consumption in context of economical crisis while energy prices are increasing.

Patients and community participation

While many people and agencies like the government, associations of healthcare professionals and lawyers have worked to solve the problems, the collective action of people with illnesses and disabilities and their family is just as important. The aim of my paper is to examine the role and the meaning of patients' groups (PGs) focusing on their advocacy activities. As for data collection, I used a multi method survey including questionnaire survey, interviews and participant observations both in the United States and Japan. I distributed 360 questionnaire sheets to members of nine PGs in both countries (180 in the US and 180 in Japan). 239 sheets were returned (response rate is 71.1 per cent). I conducted individual interviews with 21 patients from groups of Post-Polio Syndrome, Chronic Fatigue Syndrome, Brain Injury and Stroke. In addition, I made two focus group interviews with a stroke survivors group in Japan and in USA. The results of questionnaire survey shows that patients had a great expectation for their groups' activities being able to change governmental healthcare policy to provide adequate medical and social services and eliminate discriminative perception against their illness or disabilities. Several cases showed that the advocacy activities of PGs have achieved change in governmental policy. This study addresses that the advocacy activities of PGs is getting more important for both patients themselves and health policy making. A sign of the social transformation of the policy making structure, from bureaucrat driven society to civilian driven one, can be seen at this study. This process of people's involvement would be the key factor to design a sustainable and affluent healthcare system.

Pressures which sustain or transform training programmes run by regional headquarters: Organisational fields of multinational corporations in Singapore and the perceptions of their managers

This paper proposes to clarify the mutual transformative interaction between Japanese multinational corporations (MNCs) and their immediate social situations in foreign lands. For some time now various theories have been put forward to explain the forms in which mutual interdependence exists between the MNCs and their host society. In this paper the concept of embeddedness and the organisational field are adopted to define major actors, rules and structures of the organisations as they undergo transformations. Singapore is chosen because of its ability to help us identify responses that relate to the economic regionalisation of Japanese MNCs (JMNCs). The activities of multinational corporations in Singapore have steadily increased since 1970s, attracted by the strategic location and the government's industrial policies. With the advance of a globalising and knowledge-based economy, Singapore's character as a regional industrial hub has been strengthened. Singapore is now identified as a key centre of global production networks which involved MNC firms in the ASEAN region. The JMNCs in Singapore are analysed with a focus upon their regional headquarters (RHQs), since it is from there that the enhanced technological level of subsidiaries is accelerated, and therefore their training programmes are a crucial factor for their performance in the ASEAN region. The research data has been gathered from various interviews and some surveys since the beginning of this century. The analysis considers the changes in the RHQ's training programmes that have come about from changed relationships between JMNCs and their host community. The actual transformation of the organizational activities will be conditioned by the MNCs managers' perception of the change in the perceived patterns of embeddedness and of the field itself.

Homelessness: Incarceration, escape or freedom?

Homelessness is a serious and complex worldwide situation that admits to be defined as a condition of people without a regular dwelling. It encompasses a highly heterogeneous and susceptible group of people whose origins are closely associated to the uncontrolled spread of modern cities and to the regulatory and adaptive mechanisms developed by society in order to maintain its own stability. Several studies have addressed the risk factors associated to homelessness; incarceration is on the top list. The concept of incarceration is intimately linked to crime. It is not known whether crime is directly associated to homelessness or if homelessness itself is a kind of social incarceration; or even if homelessness could be interpreted as a condition of social escape. On the contrary, could it represent a state of freedom? The present article questions assumptions concerning society and its relation to this intriguing phenomenon.

Shaping social innovation by social research – The new role of the social sciences

Referring to the momentous implications of the current and constricted debate on innovation policy the paper describes the increasing importance of social innovation becoming apparent. This development is used to outline a sociologically founded, post-industrial innovation paradigm. The basic assumption is: The transition from an industrial to a knowledge- and services-based society corresponds with a paradigm shift of the innovation system. This paradigm shift also implies an increasing importance of social innovation, as compared to technological innovation. Whereas innovation used to focus primarily on natural and engineering sciences generating new products and processes, social innovation will become more and more pivotal. Consistently, the social sciences will be challenged to redefine their functions with regard to innovation.

The paper provides an overview about the roots and tracks of social science-based innovation research showing the great and increasing interest on the international level. It is shown that this development is reflected in some concepts of European and German innovation policies where key elements of an appropriate understanding can be found, nevertheless the domination of the technological paradigm keeps being valid. The paper argues that innovation is a collective learning and creation act between different actors from different sub-systems exchanging their knowledge. If social science does not reduce itself to traditional functions – this is what the last section covers – it could be a strong performer in such networks of knowledge.

Mothers' social rights and neoliberalism in Poland

Public philosophy of neoliberalism relies on women providing social reproduction services at little cost to the state as the latter withdraws from many areas of social welfare provision. Neoliberal economic policies imposed on the post-communist European countries by the World Bank and The IMF in the 1990s as well as budget cutbacks made by Polish government in the early 2000s to meet the requirements of the accession to the EU have drastically affected single mothers' families and increased the feminization of poverty.

The grassroots mobilization started in the fall 2002 after the government announced that due to austerity measures stemming from joining the EU the Alimony Fund would be eradicated. It ceased to exist on 1st of May 2004 leaving single mothers with no support.

The Single Mothers For the Alimentary Fund Movement has been so far the most spectacular response on the part of civil society to the character and dynamics of social and economic transformation in Poland. Unlike the situation in Latin America where the power of "motherist groups" arises from the ability to draw upon the feminine imagery of Catholicism against the state by evoking the image of the suffering mother and her sacrifice, Polish Single Mothers called on the civil rights and the constitutional principle of the protection of family. They have been attempting at changing the discriminatory law as mothers-citizens fighting for social rights; neither using the essentialist notions of womanhood nor calling themselves feminists.

Based on the results of a research conducted in 2005-2011 the paper analyzes collective political mobilization of single, poor and marginalized mothers. The activities and strategies pursued by Single Mothers reflect the ongoing processes of re-conceptualizing of the "nuclear family," mothering practice and more broadly reconfiguration of public/private dichotomy and their consequences for women's citizenship in a post socialist context.

Sociology as social memory: Narrative identity and knowledge construction in the study of "Chinese modernization" in postwar Taiwan

Man is a story-telling animal and sociologists are not an exception. Sociological works are often more informed by historical narratives that function as particular forms of social memory than sociologists would have admitted. The purpose of my article is to demonstrate how sociology may be a major agent of social memory and identity formation by analyzing the sociological study of "Chinese modernization," especially the case of Kwan-hai Lung (1906-1983) as one of the major founders of sociology, in postwar Taiwan. The study of Chinese modernization in social sciences in general and in sociology in particular were promoted primarily by scholars of Chinese Mainlander background who exiled to Taiwan after 1949 owing to the Chinese Communist Party's victory in China's civil war. These scholars constituted the major part of the first and second generations of social scientists in postwar Taiwan and dominated social sciences up to the 1980s. The two generations of exilic Mainlander sociologists were haunted with the bitter memory not only of their displacement, but of modern China's cultural trauma caused by foreign oppression. Embracing Chinese nationalism and the modernization theory imported mainly from the U.S., they hoped that China (Taiwan as "Free China" at the time or an envisioned unified China which included Taiwan and the Chinese mainland) could become a rich and powerful nation by modernizing itself. By integrating two time frames or historical narratives, the metanarrative of global modernity and the metanarrative of Chinese modernization, into their sociological works, they became a major story-teller that narrated the past, present, and future of Taiwan. As an important source of public narratives, the sociological study of Chinese modernization helped in the construction of social memory and national identity in postwar Taiwan.

Explaining the resilience of a decentralized production network: The case from Taiwan Increasing globalized production has cast doubt on the sustainability of certain aspects of the territorial embedded production system such as industrial districts/clusters. The original thesis of the industrial district involves an extensive division of labor in production among a system of small- and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) clustered in a geographical locale, with each participating in complementary economic activities. The presumption is that the current local inter-firm network may be dissolving as production moves offshore. Moreover, to compete with production from low-wage countries, innovative capabilities by firms are required. The literature assumes that this necessitates large firms and quasi-hierarchical governance, which, in turn, tends to undermine the cohesion that sustains the existing inter-firm network, and raises the question of the viability of the industrial district as a model. Empirically, however, the vitality of industrial districts/clusters has gone hand in hand with the increasing expansion of global production networks. The mechanisms that permit their vitality remain rudimentary. This paper attempts to explore the mechanisms that allow such a phenomenon to occur through a case study of the bicycle industry in Taiwan, where the domestic inter-firm production networks have continued to persist while the firms actively coordinate and participate in the internationalization of production. Two key factors relevant to understanding the process are identified: a) the roles of inter-firm alliances in collective learning, and b) the role of the Taiwanese state in facilitating learning within a decentralized production network. The state agencies do this by initiating information exchange among different domestic production networks so that they can search for a recombination of information and ideas.

Dynamic networks of interlocked directorates in Taiwan semiconductor industry: 1995, 2000, 2005, 2010

The interlocked networks of board directors in Taiwan semiconductor industry has dramatically changed since 1995. The semiconductor industry has increased continuously and upgraded to the leading positions in the world. The number of firms, board directors and the percentage of directors crossing two more firms have increased as well. We create the affiliation networks among board directors in 1995, 2000, 2005, 2010, and examine the network characteristics of large components each year. In the early period of Taiwan semiconductor industry, very few cohesive elite directors coming from the same state sponsored research institute governed the network field with high local network closure and less bridges. However, after a series of global economic depression and strong industrial competition, the networks of interlocked directorates have transformed to be characterized by moderate degree of local clustering and centrality betweenness (brokers).

Most of the old elites with state background retired, and newly emerged elites with investment bankers and industrial executive background governed the networks with more crossing firm ties and became the brokers of multiple components. The business community of Taiwan semiconductor industry seems to transform into a robust networks which are available for innovations.

Embeddedness of innovations:

Since the rapid decline of the global semiconductor markets in 2000, the restructuring of the global production networks in this industrial field made Taiwan semiconductor firms have caught up the technology from the world leading IC firms even faster than before. Consequently, innovations have become the dominant belief of industrial upgrading in this industry. This paper will propose a framework of inter-organizational technological collaboration networks on patent innovations with considerations of the Taiwan contexts. We build up the longitudinal data on a firm's ego technological collaboration networks and patents from 2001 to 2005, and attempt to examine the effects of the network mechanisms of technology leverage networks on the patent innovations. The state role (or collaboration ties with ITRI, Industrial Technology Research Institute) is getting declining in the patent creation, and those weaker or smaller firms tend to depend on more collaborative ties with ITRI. However, the status signal mechanism seemed to become more important in the patent innovations. Those firms with more overlapping technological collaboration ties with other firms in Taiwan semiconductor industry tend to create more patents. The path dependence mechanism (measured by repeated ties with the same collaborators) still plays important role in keeping trustful technology knowledge sharing relations which are advantageous for the subsequent patent innovations.

Dining table as a battlefield: Chinese immigrant brides' food practice after migration

This study aims to explore the complexities embedded in food habits/practices in the cross-border marriages between Taiwanese men and Chinese women. Analyses are based upon data collected through ethnographic research conducted in various sites in Taiwan.

Food is not only a necessity in daily life, but also a site where gender, class, and ethnicity intersect. Chinese immigrant brides, as marriage migrants, are usually depicted as gold diggers in the Taiwanese mass media. They suffer various forms of discrimination not only from the general public but also within their own families. The cross-border marriages between Taiwanese men and Chinese immigrant brides often adopt a "three generation cohabitation" living arrangement, and in this research the dining table becomes a battlefield with intergenerational conflicts between Taiwanese mother-in-law and Chinese daughter-in-law. Taiwanese mothers-in-law tend to criticize Chinese immigrant brides' culinary skills and food practices. Moreover, Taiwanese mothers-in-law associate certain characteristics of Chinese immigrant brides' food habits such as the way they use condiments with the socio-economic background. One common saying among Taiwanese mothers-in-law is that because these Chinese immigrant brides come from a less developed country, therefore they do not possess modern knowledge of low-sodium and low-fat diet, and their food practice is harmful to the second generation. The difference between Taiwanese and Chinese food habits thus become interweaved with sensitive cross-strait politics. Facing such criticism, Chinese immigrant brides often claim that unlike many restaurants in Taiwan, what they cook are the real "authentic" Chinese food. This research argues that though being stigmatized, Chinese immigrant brides are not without agency. They develop a nationalist discourse as a strategy of resistance – a means of asserting their subjectivity and the legitimacy of being a good mother.

Shifting paradigms? Towards a qualitative sociological approach for international comparative gentrification research

The lack of comparative gentrification research on a global level is regularly addressed by the scientific community. Moreover, the prominent call by human-geographers for a "geography of gentrification" maintains a problematic status quo: we are currently confronted with a multitude of isolated case-studies in various scientific journals, but we can only refer to very few papers or books, where a global selection of gentrified neighborhoods is compared.

It is hypothesized that to a large extent the lack of international comparisons is based on the limits of quantitative secondary data. Besides the problem of availability of data, the diagnosis also detects an insufficiency in comparability, which affects the definition of boundaries of neighborhoods as well as indicators for social change.

To face this challenge, a research project with a qualitative focus was designed to develop an analytical scheme of categories as an instrument for international comparisons. As it was intended that the categories should emerge from actual field work in different urban contexts, a theory-based actors-model was formulated. The actor-analysis was conducted in three gentrified neighborhoods in Vienna, Chicago and Mexico City from 2008 to 2011.

The 36 semi-structured interviews were analyzed in a qualitative content analysis and afterwards linked again to the theoretical gentrification-framework. The outcome of this synthesis is an analytical scheme consisting of 14 categories.

First, the paper will therefore summarize the argumentation for the specific methodological approach, which was chosen for the research project. Secondly, the scheme of categories will be presented and its potential for application in comparative gentrification research on a global level will be discussed. It is emphasized, that this instrument can provide a perspective to face the significant lack of comparisons, which is moreover assumed to be responsible for the current stagnation in gentrification research.

Child poverty: The link between poor adults and children's rights Rooted in the macrosociological approach of the 'new sociology of childhood' (Qvortrup) we analyse the current welfare state regulation of child poverty in Germany. With this example we intend to demonstrate a specific link that can be generalised to other countries: the link between the political regulation of adult citizens in poverty on the one hand and the realisation of children's rights on the other. Hereby, we focus our analysis on the economic level of the multi-dimensional phenomenon of child poverty. Hence, in terms of poverty and social justice research we focus on a crucial capability of every individual in a market-based society as well as a relevant factor of growing up – in terms of macrosociological childhood research.

In this particular focus, we investigate the thesis that a specific perception, construction and regulation of different parental groups is crucial for the ring-fencing of welfare state funding linked to a significant expansion of economic redistribution for children in poverty. To verify this assumption we introduce two central sorting criteria, which in the current political discourse, are relevant to the perception of (potential) parents and their relationship with society: the will to (labour market)-inclusion and to reproduction.

With regard to the political regulation of two different, ideal typical (potential) groups of parents we demonstrate via a discourse-analytic approach that this analytic heuristic also has a social political relevance and forms a serious obstacle for realising children's social rights. Our conclusion in terms of social justice in the sense of 'justice as recognition' is that social justice for children cannot be realised without realising social justice for adult citizens in poverty.

Does the global north still dominate the international women's movement? A network analysis of women's international organizations, 1978-2008

By both framing issues and shaping agendas, women's international nongovernmental organizations, or WINGOs, actively promote women's rights. Although WINGOs have been around since the late 1800s, their presence on the international stage has increased over time. As the international women's movement has grown in size, individuals participating in WINGOs have also changed. During the first wave of women's organizing, White Western women dominated the international women's movement. During the second wave of women's organizing, women of the global South increasingly participated. Yet, the degree to which the South has closed the gap in women's international organizations is currently unknown. In this paper, we collect network data on more than 500 universal and regional WINGOs founded between 1875 and 2008. For each organization, we code whether it has a feminist orientation. We then construct affiliation matrices every five years from 1978 to 2008. We analyze the global North-South divide, for both feminist and non-feminist networks, in three ways. First, we use visual network tools to explore and display network structure and how countries in the global South are situated in networks over time. Second, we generate measures to quantify changes in country network position. We use these measures to test whether countries in the global South do, in fact, become more central in WINGO networks over time. Third, we use network methods to identify cohesive subsets, or cliques, of countries in WINGO networks. That is, we examine the extent to which countries in the West and the global South form clusters and how membership in those clusters changes in different time periods. Overall, analyses of if and when regional clusters form can help us to understand how changes in network structure link to changing power dynamics in the international women's movement.

What drives social pension reform? Comparing latin america, Asia and sub-Saharan Africa

The purpose of this paper is to explore the reasons why countries in Latin America, Sub-Saharan Africa and Asia have adopted social pension programmes and which factors have influenced their specific design. It aims to provide a better understanding and to propose a framework for analysis of the politics of social pension reform in developing countries and to identify policy lessons for informing the design and implementation of social protection schemes for older people.

The paper reviews experiences with introduction or reform of social pension programmes in selected countries in the different regions, in order to illuminate the political processes leading to their introduction and implementation, their institutional characteristics and design as well as their impact on poverty and social development. The paper argues that pension schemes must be understood in relation to the broader development and welfare regime of each country, with several external and internal factors and actors influencing the feasibility and results of reform processes.

A starting point for the analysis is the hypothesis that social pensions tend to emerge from two distinct processes: either through the reform of established pension schemes, often as part of a process of retrenchment, economic restructuring or a demand for increased coverage; or through the expansion of anti-poverty or social protection provisions particularly in lower income economies or those hit by crisis.

Citizen security as a new human right? Securitization and the new moral economy of rights in Latin America

This paper explores the human rights framing of the growth of violence alongside democratization in Latin America. It takes as its focus the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights (IACHR) thematic report on Citizen Security addressing the growth in diversity and intensity of violence in Latin American societies. The IACHR report argues that violence has been exacerbated by the policy of securitization on the one hand and legal impunity on the other. This human rights framing of violence in democracy sees securitisation as trading off the rights of the poor for the rights of the rich and sees impunity arising from the lack of legal protection through policing and criminal prosecution. This paper argues that crisis of 'citizen security' must be understood as a product of the intersection of the globalization of public violence and the globalization of human rights. The globalization of public violence involves the rescaling of organised violence (transnationalisation of security, state franchising of violence to private organisations and the transnational organisation of crime) and the globalization of human rights (the intensification of victim politics and human rights consciousness). Securitisation through rescaling and privatization of violence is accompanied by a new moral economy rights based on prioritizing the rights of the rich over the rights of the poor. The paper argues that securitization is an index of the diminished capacity of the state to achieve the rule of law for all by protecting rights selectively. Governance through securitization is producing a new form of authoritarianism based on democratic consent to deny rights to those blamed for the violence. Examples are drawn from Argentina, Colombia, Mexico and Brazil.

Authoritarian school: A nurturing place for autocracy

A school is said to be a transitional place for inculcating basic values of human living across generations besides a place for learning academic disciplines. Children enter the school with a diversity of attitudes and behaviour patterns that are the outcome of their domestic environment. School is a place where attitudes and behaviour patterns of tender minds are shaped according to the needs of society. School teacher is the agent of the society in relation to other role performers in education to pursue this task. For that he and other role performers should be in the possession of desirable values. Numerous reports and studies have highlighted the authoritarian attitude of school teachers and other role performers in school education system. This paper is based on a preliminary study to investigate the prevalence of undesirable attitudes and behaviour patterns among various role performers in school educational system with particular reference to school teachers in an Indian state of Punjab. A comparative prevalence of undesirable behaviour among male female teachers is also depicted in the paper. Reasons for prevalence of undesirable behaviour also form the part of the paper.

Formation of a social personality is said to be the first and foremost function of education that contributes towards social stability or social cohesion, a societal function of education. If education enables the individual to internalise ideologies, values, norms, attitudes and behaviour patterns institutionalised in the society then it contributes towards the formation of social personality. Formation of social personality of individuals helps them assume the role of responsible citizens. School teacher is said to be the agent of society to accomplish this task across generations. For that he ought to be first in the possession of basic values of human living and then the professional values. A lot of studies and reports have highlighted the erosion of these values among the teachers of Indian school system. Social mix or gentrification: Contradictory perspectives on urban regeneration in Berlin-Neukölln

Not too long ago, Berlin's district Neukölln used to be a no-go area, infamous for its 'problematic' social structure, characterized by high unemployment rates, high shares of migrant populations and poverty. Only a few years later, the New York Times travel guide recommends the North of Neukölln as new 'place to go', and the district attracts artists, 'new' tourists and students from all over Europe and Germany. The derelict housing stock has become an insider tip for international investors; rents are rising. Whether attributed to the joint efforts of urban regeneration programs or to Berlin's increasing housing shortage, these developments provoke very different reactions at the local level: protest by activists who fear gentrification; relaxed approval by planners and urban development agents who admittedly do not mind a new social mix which is in their view necessary to prevent the financial collapse of the district; and slight indifference by most residents who welcome infrastructure and public space investments, but are already confronted with displacement due to rising rents.

The paper focuses on the way the fuzzy ideal of social mix is employed in planners' and public discourse to welcome Nord-Neukölln's transformation and its new resident groups. Meanwhile, protesters fight against gentrification, for Neukölln's right to 'remain dirty' and for their right to the district. The case illustrates that the controversies are not only about financial capital, but at this stage foremost about the unequal appreciation and valuation of different forms of social and cultural capital, which determines whether developments are called 'social mixing' or 'gentrification'. The paper shows the contradictions and argues that normative questions need to be raised more openly to cope with these challenges.

Christian negotiation of non-heterosexual rights in the UK: Challenges and dilemmas

In recent years the United Kingdom, much like other western democracies, has seen the proliferation of non-heterosexual rights. Many faith communities are now challenged by legislative enactments that advance the equality and citizenship of non-heterosexual people and prohibit discrimination in various economic and social spheres. This paper will explore attitudes and views of Christian churches and organizations generally to non-heterosexual rights and legislative advances more specifically. The paper will show that there are a variety of responses. Conservative churches have come out strongly against such developments on moral grounds and advance freedom of speech to advance their vehement views. Most of the mainstream denominations are divided in their views of non-heterosexuality but nonetheless endorse the rights agenda. Campaigning groups are however more strident in their views which have tended to have become increasingly polarized. This paper considers the key issues and interprets these varying approaches as, firstly, a result of increasing marginalization in a post-Christian society and, secondly, a reflection of struggles between the conservative and liberal wings of the Christian community in the UK.

Aging, frailty, and intimacy: The gendered experience of close relationships among adults 75+ who have multiple chronic conditions

The majority of older adults will experience at least one chronic condition in later life and the average number of chronic conditions has been found to increase with age. In this paper we examine how older men and women who have multiple chronic conditions perceive and experience intimate relationships, including sexuality, friendship, and familial ties. We draw on data from multiple interviews with 19 women and 16 men, aged 73 to 91, who had a range of range of three to 13 chronic conditions (with most individuals reporting an average of six health problems). The most commonly reported chronic conditions included: arthritis (28), back problems (26), heart disease (24), cataracts/glaucoma (14), and cancer (12). Mirroring demographic trends, most of the men (n=11) in our study were partnered, whereas the majority of the women (n= 17) were single. Our analysis revealed that the participants' discussions of intimacy were underscored by the social and physical realities of their health issues, their marital statuses, existing social support resources, and experiences of social isolation. Additionally, the participants' stories and the meanings they attributed to their intimate relationships reflected gender norms. While the men's perceptions and negotiation of intimacy were framed by masculinity norms (including the privileging of autonomy, invulnerability, physical pro-ess, stoicism, and self-reliance), the women's experiences were shaped by femininity norms (such as the importance placed on appearance as well as on being nurturing, cheerful, family oriented, selfless, and sensitive to the needs of others). We consider our findings in relation to Laz's (2003) concept of doing age and West and Zimmerman's (1987) concept of doing gender as well as with respect to the existing literature concerning intimacy, friendship patterns, intergenerational relationships, health, and gender in later life.

Hallowed be the director's name: The structuring power of sanctification in the field of theatre

Just like any other artistic sphere, theatre is a relatively autonomous field of cultural reproduction where the fight for artistic legitimacy is crucial. Insofar as the theatre director is at stake, processes of consecration (critics, awards, staging opportunities) play an important role in this struggle: Not only are they structuring individual careers, but also the status order of the theatrical society (with its more or less renowned venues, its higher or lower ranking positions etc.) as a whole. My paper, which bases on a field analysis and the reconstruction of contrastive trajectories, aims at discerning respective logics of consecration in the domain of German-speaking theatre. It will depict the interdependence between (1) the autonomization of stage directing as a distinct artistic genre (the 'Mise-en-scène') and its emancipation from the field of literature; (2) the socio-historical emergence and symbolic alteration of the theatre director's famousness; and (3) the structuring power of sanctification with regard to the interplay of directors' habitual dispositions, their artistic positioning and their position-taking in the field. From this integral perspective, the contribution will shed light on two phenomena: First, it shows that up to nowadays instances and mechanisms of consecration both reproduce the most notably male codification of the director's profession and the predominance of bourgeois socialized individuals in field-positions linked with the highest normative power. In that sense, consecration processes reproduce some eminent 'symbolic boundaries' (Michèle Lamont) demarking the theatrical field. Second, one can trace quite a dramatic change in the logic of artistic consecration itself: Whilst until the 1990ies sanctification used to be subsequent to ones artistic merits, there has been a shift to consecration on credit in recent years, indicating that the 'obligation to success' (Sighard Neckel) has infiltrated the art world of theatre production by now.

Strategies and outcome of citizen participation in current planning conflicts in Santiago de Chile

Over a long period, civil society played a minor role in urban politics of Santiago. Due to profound processes of de-regulation, liberalization and privatization, urban development is heavily influenced by the private economic sector. At the same time, weakening of civil society organizations and clientelism on the local level forced during the military dictatorship continue to have an effect on Chilean democracy. In recent years, however, conflicts of interest in urban development have been on the increase. Citizens are increasingly fighting against uncontrolled developmental measures such as large-scale real-estate or infrastructure projects.

In that context, the contribution examines the extent to which these strategies of participation in urban development contribute to a change in local governance processes and opportunities of participation. Two planning conflicts the Metropolitan Area of Santiago are studied in-depth. While the first conflict is located in the upper income municipality of Vitacura, the second conflict is taking place in the socially heterogeneous municipality of Peñalolén. In both cases, the attempts to change the local land use plans provoked strong protests, due to associated processes of densification and displacement. By means of different strategies, existing and newly emerged social movements and citizens' organizations were able to stop the intended modifications.

First results show that negotiation processes are varying strongly depending on factors such as resources of the urban movements and citizens' initiatives as well as the practices and interests of the respective municipality. Although the local governments partly react to the growing number of protests by incorporating additional participation instruments, rethinking of planning practices seems to be low and political will for real citizen participation is still missing.

Exclusion process and mental health services

From 1985 a process of desinstitutionalisation of the psychiatry based in community was settled in the province of Río Negro, Argentina. People with severe mental disability are treated with several techniques and resources covering the ninety percent of the territory of the province. In the last years, the mental health services have been receiving new types of psychiatry demands, for which there is not treatment tools that seems really effective.

These new demands are mostly not voluntary demands. Guard hospitals or judicial orders are at the base of them. Multiple addiction persons and anti-social behavior are their characteristics. More of them are young patients, that from their youth experienced institutionalization in others areas of the State in closed and controlled care systems.

From the notion of "desafiliation" of Robert Castel, this article argues in two directions. First of all, later social investigations showed a different language, logics and cultural dynamics among excluded sectors and state institutions. Secondly, within this process of "desafiliation", the high specialization and distribution of knowledge and disciplines of the State, contributes highly to the exclusion process.

Professional values in high school teachers

All through the end of XX century and XXI century, Latin American countries have made educative reforms, derived from changes promoted by the emerging paradigm the knowledge society has brought about. These reforms have common core features, as they have been promoted and oriented by the same international economic institutions, mainly the OECD (Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development), the IDB (Inter-American Development Bank) and the WB (World Bank).

For the last decade, the Secretariat of Public Education in Mexico, has designed and introduced reforms for the three educative levels systems (basic, middle and higher levels) in almost all educative levels and in most educative institutions.

The new predominant conditions in the world of professions and teaching, there is not an exception. These factors have been demanding a more dynamic and versatile profile to improve and enhance Good Educative Practices and to guide students to an integral citizen formation; one in which students merge the acquisition of abilities and competences, the capacity to adapt to the swift changing times that we live and a moral formation to instill values promoted by society.

The purpose of this study is to identify and analyze -in the framework of the Integral Reform of High School Education- the professional values that teachers consider essential for their teaching practice and whether or not these values match the ones their students perceive in a pedagogical model based on competences. We present advances of an ongoing research based on the Case Study Method, this research is carried out in one high school located in the state of Morelos, Mexico.

Innovative maternal child health programs: Argentinax plan nacer

After the socioeconomic crisis of 2002, the new Argentine scenario posed a challenge: how to provide ameliorative public policies? Emergency social programmes implemented from 2002 onwards attempt to deal with increasing poverty, unemployment, and further deterioration of the health status of the population. A novel, 'ground-breaking' maternal and child health insurance plan – Plan Nacer – launched in 2003 claims to target problems related to maternal and child health and nutrition. This new initiative involved similar programmatic goals as the ones targeted by long-lasting Maternal Child Health and Nutrition Programs (MCHNPs).

In addition to traditional deficits regarding institutional capacities in Argentina, the new challenge for present and future MCHNPs is to address the 'double burden' of malnutrition. A public policy approach must center on how to articulate MCHNPs to address this double burden, while improving program effectiveness and impact through existing and enhanced national and local institutional capacities. Plan Nacer is the first social program in Argentina to include regular impact evaluations from the design stage in Argentina. In terms of public policy implementation, Argentina suffers from the combination of historically-weak state capacities, the persistence of the patronage system when implementing social assistance programs, and the aftermath of a decade of neo-liberal de-regulation. An under funded state threatened with dismantling (as being characterized during the 1990s and the early 2000s) may be especially unable to provide the social policy solutions required for this social and economic emergency, most particularly so if gaps between institutional capacities and programmatic goals are not addressed. This paper analyses programmatic features, implementation and impact evaluation reports of Plan Nacer. These results are compared with previous research on long-term maternal child health and nutrition policies in Argentina, emphasizing programmatic performance, overall public policy implementation, and institutional capacities.

Social function as intermediate group of leisure service industry in local community in a Japanese mountain village

In modern Japanese society, the cohesiveness of the intermediate group between individuals and total society, such as family, kinship, enterprise and new religions, has weakened and become difficult for people to enjoy its inherent benefits. The dichotomy between the two perspectives of a self-decision by an individual's free will or re-distribution by national administrative intervention has existed. Recently, the conception that nation should support the individual has strengthened in Japan.

Some sociologists, however, pay attention to the intermediate group and claim that it should be positively expected so that society can function in modern society as a consequence of the progression of leveling and fragmentation through globalization.

It becomes a problem on the other hand with respect to the intermediate group in the process of socialization of youth. Misgivings exist regarding the weakening and dismantlement of the intermediate group that socially subsumes the youth as well as having a social function to protect them from social exclusion.

In this presentation, the social function as the intermediate group is discussed while introducing the case of a local community in a well-known Japanese leisure mountain village where many young people flow in from larger cities to live and work. The following is argued. The youth, from urban where intermediate groups have been weakened or dismantled, might be made socialized and connected with society, as a result of the experience in the village where the leisure service industry as the intermediate group functions partially. The youth predominately tend to come in search of pleasure and hobbies, to seek their own identity rather than wages and conditions. As one of these factors, "family" managing accommodations and "hobby group" sharing the same winter sports function as a "home place" for them. Moreover, staying there for a while connects them with general society without obstacles.

Organizaciones territoriales y prácticas comunitarias de cuidado infantil en el campo asistencial. Surgimiento y consolidación de los comedores comunitarios en el área metropolitana de Buenos Aires (República Argentina)

Frente a la nueva configuración que adquiere el régimen de marginalidad urbana a partir de mediados de la década del setenta (Wacquant, 2001), se observa a partir de la década del ochenta un progresivo afianzamiento de los programas asistenciales en América Latina. Estos programas si bien han permitido dar una respuesta parcial a las situaciones de carencia de los sectores populares, han resultado insuficientes para abordar los procesos de exclusión y vulnerabilidad social.

En el marco de la agudización de las situaciones de carencia y de la insuficiencia de las políticas públicas, se visualiza la irrupción de diversas estrategias de los sectores populares destinadas a garantizar las necesidades de supervivencia. Estas estrategias tendieron a consolidarse como organizaciones barriales o territoriales, adquiriendo mayores niveles de institucionalización y formalidad.

El objetivo del presente trabajo es analizar el surgimiento y consolidación de los comedores comunitarios (organizaciones territoriales centradas en la gestión y provisión comunitaria de alimentos principalmente a niños/as y ancianos) ubicadas en distintos barrios populares del Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires (AMBA) (República Argentina). Para abordar dicho objetivo se llevará a cabo un análisis descriptivo a partir de información sobre 212 comedores relevados en distintas zonas del AMBA en el marco del trabajo de investigación que sustenta la Tesis de Maestría del autor (en proceso de elaboración).

Se apunta a poder visualizar las condiciones en las que emergieron estas organizaciones en tanto estrategias de los sectores populares frente a las situaciones de pobreza extrema y las trayectorias de las mismas hasta la actualidad. A través de esta descripción se pretende dar cuenta de la reconfiguración de las redes territoriales destinadas al abordaje de las necesidades de supervivencia de los sectores populares y por ende también de las prácticas asistenciales y de cuidado, poniendo en tensión la predominancia del enfoque familiarista (de Martino, 2004).

In sociology of law & political sociology, adequate attention to connection between political power & law tends to weaken with the increasing studies based on Foucault's asserting that the main form of political power has transited from legal sovereign power to disciplinary power & bio-politics. However, law is still important condition for formation & augmentation of political power. The aim of this paper is to explore new way of thinking about mechanism of formation & augmentation of political power, & function of law in its mechanism in the light of Luhmann's theory of power led by his theory of symbolically generalized media (1975, 1993, 2000). In order to do so, the author identifies core ideas of "symbolical generalization" of power media as well as "second coding of political power by law" in Luhmann's theory. According to Luhmann, political power needs not only to organize physical violence but also to consolidate its own code to control application of power, & to ensure generality & consistency of application of power in order to augment its capacity. Legal system contributes formation of such code in political power. Subsequently, the author compares this Luhmann's explanation with traditional view about relationship between law & political power. Firstly, Luhmann's explanation is different from Weber's explanation based on concept of legitimacy. Secondly, it is also different from view of classical liberal constitutionalism (Ashenden 2006). Because, in Luhmann's explanation, law is something to contribute generalization of power, enlargement of sphere of influence of political power, & enhancement its mobilization capacity rather than reduction of it. The paper concludes with the suggestion for a new way of thinking about contemporary rule of law.

Diversification of judicial scriveners' practice and where shall it go: The fluctuating boundaries of law-related occupations in Japan

In Japan, besides attorney (bengoshi), there are several law-related occupations, including judicial scrivener (shihōshoshi) who in tradition mainly represent clients in various registration formalities, such as real estate registration. Recent years have seen diversification of the judicial scriveners' scope of practice. Subject to certification requirement, they can represent clients in summary court civil lawsuits. This paper first discusses the historical development of judicial scrivener's practice and its recent diversification as aforesaid. This is followed by an analysis of the current situation on the basis of relevant data and results of questionnaire surveys in the North-Tohoku region (a relatively remote area) and Saitama (a prefecture adjacent to Tokyo). The survey results indicate that some judicial scriveners handle the kind of legal works in which attorneys are not interested. These works are non-lucrative. However, despite handling legal work, these judicial scriveners do not see themselves as legal experts (hōritsuka). The analysis in this paper will throw light on our evaluation of the state of legal service in Japan nowadays. While judicial scriveners have been called as "hōritsuka in embryo", this paper however argues that the concept of "hōritsuka (legal experts)" as well as the legal service in Japan in fact may still be in an embryonic stage.

State violence against protesters in Turkey

The Turkish state is getting more and more repressive against the dissidents towards the actual government. Since 2001 the population in Turkey increased 4.2% whereas the number of people sentenced for terrorism increased 250%. Today, 70 journalists, 15 mayors, and 442 provincial council members and 600 students are under detention.

A large number of these students are arrested in political street demonstrations and protests against unaffordable tuition fees, hydroelectric power plants or neoliberal policies; and detained in prison for reasons like resisting to security forces, damaging public property, unfurling a communist banner, throwing eggs at a political figure, planning and/or participating in demonstrations, denouncing a police crackdown on anti-government demonstrators, being member of an illegal organization and in some an "unknown organization" but also for reasons like of an or "planning a bombing attack" like the case of the Galatasaray University student Cihan Kirmizigul, in prison for 22 months, and accused for planning a bombing attack, based on the statement of a secret witness, whom later withdrew his statement.

Therefore the aim of this paper is twofold: first to examine the rising state violence against protesters and especially students in Turkey; and second, to explore the methods of mobilization (demonstrations, sit-ins, occupations, protest walks, blogs, petitions, press releases...) employed by civil-society (solidarity initiatives, unions, academia...) to struggle against these arbitrary arrests, detentions and imprisonments.

"It": Of mimesis

In the morning one suddenly notices that she a body. She, however, has an ambiguous sense about finding that "it" within her body "it" surely is there. A bird is flying away if she looks up the sky. She notices that she is not a bird while at the same time she also thinks that "it" would be a bird later on. She wishes to let "it" out from her body to see, to touch, so listen, and to lick "it." Since it is impossible to let "it" out from her body, she simply shouts in frustration. If many things and matters are forgotten, she can leave her frustration alone. Since she cannot do it she starts using words as écriture. "It," therefore, has many names because of écriture, and these are: "self," "spirit," "identity" and "I," for example. "It" successfully gets a name, however, she still cannot lick "identity." It's unfortunate for her, therefore, she can merely find fear so she decides to dance. In ancient Greek culture, all arts such as music were considered as mimesis. According to both Plato and Aristotle, art represented the inner human spirit, the so-called ethos. European Renaissance thought argued that melody should reflect the ethos, through the words. The Canadian composer R. Murray Schafer, who proposed the concept of soundscape, thinks about mimesis differently from this European tradition. Schafer found "it" in his body and then tried to assimilate "it" into acoustic space. In short he found "it" in his auditory nerve. There are two different kind of mimesis in music and dance: 1) The concept of mimesis based on logos (Greek tradition); 2) Mimesis as human echoes towards soundscape as Schafer sees. This paper attempts to contribute to that discourse.

How migrant women successfully appealed for a change of the anti-domestic violence law in Japan

Migrant women who married Japanese men become often victims of domestic violence by their partner. In 2010, around 10% of protected women in the public shelters for battered women were foreigners. Despite the high rate of sheltered migrant women, until a revision of the law in 2004, they were excluded from the protection by the anti-DV law which has come into effect in 2001 as a matter of practice. It was because they were undocumented migrants due to their husbands' noncooperation to the renewal of their visas. The police reported systematically an undocumented migrant woman even if she was battered and injured by her partner and come to the police station asking for a protection.

This paper analyses the process of empowerment of migrant women in Japan who successfully appealed for a change of the anti-DV law. In 2003, with the support of Japanese feminist groups, they organized a lobbying group for a revision of the DV law. Difficulties of lobbying are not only because they are not fluent in Japanese but also because they don't have good command of the official language which is used in the public sphere. They can make understand themselves in the affinity group. They are voluble with their peers of the self-help group. Outside of the intimate affinity group, they found themselves helpless and deprived of a language which makes sense in the public sphere. This is because of deprivation of sense of self-respect as a consequence of the violence and the denial of their personality by the partner.

A success of the lobbying has come true only after their recovery from helplessness with the help of supporting group. Their certitude that they were finally heard by the National Diet members made them empowered.

Education priority policies: Issues regarding the treatment of poorness as social diversity

Massification of education in Latin America, or democratization of access, has meant the entrance of social groups previously excluded, entailing not only the need to rethink pedagogical matters, but also a new way of dealing with poorness through school (known as "socio-educational policies"). Compensatory programs, or corrective justice, developed during the 1990's seeking to work specifically with the most vulnerable groups in their local contexts, are now strongly criticized for not promoting real equality but stigmatizing populations. The need to "universalize" educational policies emerges nowadays as an imperative, tough the conditions to put it into practice, mainly in terms of resource availability in different contexts, leads to regional inequality. This paper presents the first conclusions of our PhD theses concerning the evolution of education compensatory programs in Argentina as a political way of making the school responsible for dealing with poorness and social exclusion.

Closure and opening in asymmetrical communication about one's belonging

In everyday interaction in Germany, provenience is often inquired about by speakers who feel entitled to be unquestionably "German", in legal terms and in terms of social recognition. While – depending on region and age – one fifth up to one half of the population is of other than German descent, questions concerning provenience persist, marking difference and a previous status quo. The complex formal and informal regulations as well as the hegemonic discourse of who is regarded as "German" support demarcations, usually beyond the awareness of those who ask (and who perceive their question to be of general human interest). The question "where are you from?" actually presents communicative closure. The answer is cut down to identifying oneself on a checklist of "foreign" descent. Thus, in place of telling about grandparents who immigrated as migrant workers, about parents and oneself growing up in Germany, the short-cut answer would be "from Turkey" to preclude further questioning.

Communicative situations turn tense when difference is pointed out by a question, because of an asymmetrical relationship of who gets to ask and who is supposed to answer (even though every one would have a story to tell). The answer is tied to the expectation that the respondent will disclose what is already implied in the question, namely, his or her "non-German" belonging – which in turn becomes typified in combination with what else is perceived of the person in question (as a sort of 'anthropological' quest). What is the experience of persons who continuously have to react to such questions? Which ways of coping have been devised in facing short-circuits in communication?

Data analysis of everyday conversations and autobiographical-narrative interviews will be presented and a study of notions of "difference" and "culture" in narrative expert interviews with psychotherapists and psychiatrists who treat migrants.

Políticas del desarraigo: Un ejercicio de comparación en torno a la emergencia de las "nuevas diásporas"

Las diásporas adquirieron un notorio protagonismo en las ciencias sociales de las dos últimas décadas del siglo pasado. Ingente cantidad de trabajos abordan de diferentes maneras esta forma de reconstrucción del sentido y la identidad que genera la dispersión de poblaciones. Un prístino concepto –el de diáspora– que, con los aires transnacionales, va mudando de su opaca y negativa concepción durante la era del Estado-nación hacia lugares más visibles y consideraciones más benignas y promisorias. Sorteando "nacionalismos metodológicos", es posible ver en las diásporas un actor paradigmático de los nuevos tiempos: son transnacionales; encarnan en sus relaciones a la sociedad red; viven en las nuevas comunicaciones; son productos del mestizaje cultural y la hibridez, etc. La puesta en evidencia de esta realidad arrima el debate hacia una deriva pragmática del concepto: las diásporas, amén de sus variadas determinaciones históricas y tipologías, son realidades de vínculos sociales sobre los que es posible proyectar cambio social y, por lo tanto, un ámbito fértil para ejercicios políticos que activan y capitalizan esa economía de vínculos que transcurre más allá de la política soberanista y territorial. La ponencia que propongo relaciona esta deriva histórica reciente del concepto de diáspora con dos experiencias (también históricas y de campo) en las que circuló profusamente el concepto y sirvió a ejercicios políticos de signo bien diferente. La comparación –en principio fortuita y caprichosa– pretende juntar la experiencia de los vascos en América, con la de los mexicanos en Estados Unidos. Se persigue así hacer evidente la productividad política y social del concepto de diáspora descubriendo en éste el único pero significativo punto de unión entre los dos términos de la comparación que abre una suerte de "política del desarraigo" en la era transnacional.

The circulation of bioethics. The production of contemporary Catholic bioethics in Argentina

The purpose of this paper is to analyze and reflect on the current constellations of the production of Bioethics under the Catholic Church's umbrella in Argentina. Although bioethics is a discipline historically rooted in the Catholicism – Catholic Universities started working in this subject during the 1970s- it was only during the 1990s that the Vatican promoted a perspective to monitor the development of Science and Biomedicine. This (roman) Bioethics spread around the world in different ways. First, doctors, biologists, lawyers (priests, nuns and lays) attended to masters and PhD studies in Rome Then, they went back to their countries and founded local Bioethics' Institutes (with postgraduate studies) at their Universities. Finally, they conducted several academic conferences and promoted a socio-religious space for the development and training of new bioethicists. This process of interchange of knowledge and ideas – particularly in LatinAmerica - is conducted by people who travel around each country lecturing about Bioethics. Argentinean Catholic bioethicists are immersed in this process, they travel around Argentina and other LatinAmerician countries in order to teach and lecture about Bioethics. Their teachings have a specific political deployment: the local bioethicists are trained to participate in the public arena. They learn how to take part in public hospitals ethics' committees and influence parliamentary debates on sexual and reproductive rights. This represents a challenge in the Argentinean contemporary democracy where legislation on civil, sexual and reproductive rights is being debated.

Mortal politics of the U.S. labor movement: When? Where? Why? Success?

The early U.S. labor movement faced a highly repressive environment, one often characterized as the most violent of all Western capitalist nations. Drawing on our unique data set, we address several key questions surrounding the study of death as the ultimate mode of repressive politics. We ask when and where the labor movement faced lethal violence and offer an empirically-grounded theoretical explanation for why lethal bloodshed was directed toward the labor movement unevenly across, time, space, and industry. We also offer some preliminary evidence on the question of success—i.e., did the use of lethal violence against the labor movement actually retard its self-organization?

We find that strike-related deaths were disproportionately located in the historical period between the 1870s and the Second World War, with regional and industrial peaks shifting over time. Over this highly contentious era, there were no less than 270 strikes wherein at least one person was killed; at least 1,150 perished in strike-related actions, and no fewer than 240 were eliminated in movement-related actions other than strikes. The long-term forces driving the epoch of violent contention between capital and labor were shaped primarily by: the lack of labor rights that made it relatively easy to treat labor self-activity as outlaw or insurgent; and forces of armed repression were heavily privatized and available for use by employers against labor uprisings. Both conditions changed in significant ways by World War II. We also find that lethal violence tended to undermine the fortunes of labor by retarding union formation, at least in the period before WW II.

Our findings have important implications for the U.S. exceptionalism debate, for theories of labor organizing, and for the role of violent repression in the study of social movements.

Jóvenes haciendo el estado. Reflexiones etnográficas sobre otros modos de "participación" juvenil

La "participación" política de los jóvenes y las políticas públicas orientadas a este segmento de la población fueron objeto de múltiples investigaciones sociales en las últimas décadas. En términos generales, unas se concentraron en comprender las modalidades de agencia juvenil desarrolladas en ámbitos tales como partidos políticos, movimientos sociales, agrupamientos culturales, estudiantiles, religiosos y otros. En cambio, las otras colocaron a los jóvenes como objeto de intervención estatal, cuestionando el escaso margen de decisión que quedaba para ellos en los procesos de formulación e implementación de las políticas.

Esta ponencia propone una discusión en la intersección de estas arenas de debate. En el marco de un estudio etnográfico en curso en un barrio del sur de la ciudad de Buenos Aires, reflexionamos sobre la participación política de los jóvenes en el marco de políticas de juventud. Buscamos desplazar la mirada de espacios que han sido privilegiados para el análisis de la agencia juvenil para analizar cómo un conjunto de jóvenes de distintas generaciones y de diferentes sectores sociales se relacionan con las políticas en su vida cotidiana, contribuyendo a producir, reproducir y dar forma a las políticas y al estado.

A Centenary Appraisal : Sir James George Frazer(1854-1941)'s Golden Bough(1890;12vols 1911-1915) We have long seen a variety of discussions around modernization,modernity,postmodernity, and even postmodernization,etc., finally ,it seems to me,setting upon the globalization-polemics. Western modernity focuses itself on the following three thematizations, namely, religion, science(& technology), and capitalism. J.G.Frazer touches upon each of them, in the way that he deals with religion as most important component of the modern even referring Hegel's Lecture on the Philosophy of Religion(1832) in his postface to the 1911 edition of The Golden Bough; in the way that he shows a linear evolutionary process from magic to science, and in the way that he observes the primitive society taking up an important idea of tabou. In conclusion, I would like to make clear the position of Frazer's Golden Bough in the history of sociology of religion, and furthermore to make it as subject matter of the origins of modern sociology in general.

Movilidad social y lengua Catalana: Análisis de la "segunda generación" de inmigrantes de Colombia en Cataluña

El objetivo de la ponencia es explorar el valor instrumental del catalán en la movilidad social de madres y padres de origen colombiano y sus respectivas hijas e hijos, considerando el contexto de los flujos colombianos en Cataluña. Los resultados forman parte de una investigación financiada por el Instituto de Estudios Catalanes mediante entrevistas biográficas realizadas a las familias.

A partir de los relatos juveniles se constata que las competencias lingüísticas son desarrolladas en la escolarización obligatoria. Existe una mayoría que se declara bilingüe respecto al catalán y castellano. Estas competencias, junto a otras, son valoradas positivamente por el mercado laboral. Las y los jóvenes entrevistados, al ser castellanohablantes, dan cuenta de la necesidad e importancia de desarrollar las competencias lingüísticas en catalán para promocionarse social y laboralmente. En las relaciones de amistad, vecindad o pareja, el uso del catalán, por parte de jóvenes de origen colombiano, es relativo ya que predomina cierta lengua en determinados espacios.

Para las hijas e hijos, el catalán posee una valoración simbólica como signo de pertenencia a la cultura catalana. Las competencias lingüísticas, por un lado, aportan en la movilidad laboral y, por otro, facilitan la movilidad social al actuar como un factor de integración y pertenencia de las segundas generaciones en la sociedad de destino. La valoración simbólica del catalán pasa precisamente por esta necesidad de integración. Para lograr una movilidad social satisfactoria es importante el sentido de pertenencia y reconocimiento en la sociedad de acogida y el dominio lingüístico, no basta con tener un empleo, educación o una vivienda, la integración también significa participar en la visión común que otorga el lenguaje. Con todo, se concluye que existe una valoración instrumental de la lengua catalana como vehículo de integración social y movilidad laboral para las segundas generaciones de familias colombianas en Cataluña.

Sujetos de (ciertos) derechos: La participación de las niñas y los niños migrantes en Chile

El objetivo de esta ponencia es reflexionar sobre la participación y el ejercicio de los derechos de la niñez migrante en Chile. El estudio –parte de la Tesis Doctoral de la autora– se basa en la Sociología de la Infancia que comprende a la niñez en tres dimensiones. La primera, como una construcción social alejada de una idea esencialista del ser infantil y expresada de diversas formas en cada contexto sociopolítico. La segunda, como categoría sociológica permanente de la estructura social –aunque sus miembros se renueven constantemente–. Y la tercera, entiende a las niñas y los niños como "actores sociales con capacidad de agencia" que despliegan relaciones de poder generacionales y de género con otros actores, en sus familias y otros espacios sociales. No obstante, dicha actoría pocas veces es reconocida en la sociedad y en el ámbito académico debido al adultismo que les discrimina, esencialmente, por su edad y la posición de dependencia económica en que se encuentran, característica de la infancia moderna (Jenks 1982; Qvortrup 1994; James y Prout 1997; Mayall 2002; Gaitán 2006).

En Chile se han diseñado ciertas estrategias gubernamentales para garantizar algunos derechos a la niñez migrante, como la educación y salud, pero su alcance sigue siendo muy limitado. Se trata de un reconocimiento como sujetos de "ciertos" derechos; mientras otros, como la participación y la opinión, difícilmente pueden ejercitarse. Mediante observación participante y entrevistas en escuelas públicas, se concluye que los obstáculos para el ejercicio de derechos en las familias son las relaciones generacionales de poder y en las escuelas y el barrio, especialmente la discriminación y el racismo. Además, quienes viven en condiciones de pobreza padecen la exclusión socioeconómica. Con todo, se denota la falta de una política pública migratoria que garantice efectivamente los derechos de la infancia extranjera residente en Chile.

Forced migration and adaptation after Lausanne Convention: The case of Güzelyurt, Turkey

The objective of this study is to understand in what ways the emigrants, who have settled down in Guzelyurt county of Aksaray after the population exchange enforced by the Lausanne Convention, adjusted to the region. The main techniques used in data collection for this study are participant observation and in-depth interviewing.

This study surveyed the facts preventing the emigrants to have social relations with inhabitants of the region they settled down in and the factors which abolish these handicaps after the forced migration. Thus, the study focuses on variables such as spatial length and difference, demographic alteration, traditional differences and establishment of kinship relations. Some factors like traditional discrepancies, two different living spaces and the fact that emigrants had a greater population than the inhabitants after the population exchange prevented the emigrants to have social interactions for a long period. Later on, because the emigrants migrated outside the county, population advantage turned in favor of the inhabitants. This situation forced the emigrants to assemble into the dominant population.

Cultural interaction is a mutual process. However, acculturation process does not always take place mutually creating equal terms for both sides. Considering the issue from this point of view, it can be assumed that the emigrants are on the more changing side of the equilibrium.

One other point to take into account is that the traditions and customs of these two different societies are quite alike today. On the other hand, this cultural conformity can easily be decomposed into a competitive atmosphere of economics and politics. The current economic and political domain has been donating itself as a legal ground for both sides to express the othering attitudes they have been bearing towards each other.

The Japanese kuuki theory: As applied to reality construction, problem resolution, and social change

The great earthquake that devastated northeastern Japan in March 2011 and the Fukushima Atomic Power Plant disaster have served to reacquaint the Japanese with the word "kuuki" and what that entails. Some linguistic equivalents of kuuki are words such as "air", "atmosphere", "climate", "environment" and "circumstance". These words originally referred to physical phenomena. They, however, can also be applied to human relations, reality construction, problem resolution, and social change.

Social or political problems that threaten an established social or political system tend to create kuuki at the macro level that is peculiar to each situation. It exerts social pressure and contributes to problem resolution. Manipulation of kuuki by a talented leader can bring about various social changes.

Western intellectuals have gradually accepted the idea of kuuki, and the word kuuki has been included in the fifth edition of the Dictionary of Media & Communication Studies (Watson & Hills, 2000) as an independent entry and "Japanese kuuki theory" has been included in the Encyclopedia of Communication Theory (Littlejohn & Foss, 2009).

So far, most of the studies on kuuki have been done in the areas of interpersonal and political communications. However, situation creates (through the "definition of the situation") its own kuuki (the "indexical" process) and kuuki affects the development or change of the situation (the "reflexive" process). This particular study is an attempt to relate the Japanese kuuki theory to modern sociological concepts and theories such as indexicality, reflexivity, reality construction, problem resolution, and social change.

Recuperated enterprises: Changing work?

Once the workers recuperate the enterprise they have to put it to work. This means that they have to find a way to reorganize the routines of the process of production or the provision of services. Workers know how this was done in the previous period, when they worked under a boss, but they did not want to reproduce that order. Yet, the challenge for the workers is to organize everyday tasks so they can generate income for the enterprise and for themselves. In fact, the question of self-management and increasing opportunities for self-direction and creativity at work has been a recurrent part of reform and utopian movements. Alienated work separates the workers from their fellow workers, self-management has the potential of overcoming this because workers have to come together to decide on how to organize work. In this presentation I investigate the ways in which the workers of the recuperated enterprises organize their work life. I focus on two aspects of the process of organization of work. The first has to do with the norms that organize work life at the enterprise. This chapter focuses on the concrete ways in which workers solve the problems that every workplace—regardless of ownership or management—face: how to make sure that workers come to work and how to remunerate them. The second aspect has to do with the routines involved in the work process. To what extent are they able to organize the daily routines of work to allow for more self direction and less alienation?

Políticas sociales y clientelismo. Límites de la inclusión social con igualdad de derechos en dos programas sociales en Argentina

En este trabajo se analizan la implementación de los programas sociales "Banco Popular de Buena Fe" que tiene como objetivo el desarrollo de microemprendimientos y "Argentina Trabaja", que promueve la conformación de cooperativas de Trabajo; para mostrar que los destinatarios no sólo se incluyen en las dinámicas que proponen estos programas sociales, sino que también lo hacen en redes clientelares de las que participan funcionarios municipales e intermediarios.

Se sostiene que si bien las redes clientelares permiten y garantizan el funcionamiento del Estado, ya que a través de ellas los programas sociales nacionales llegan hasta sus destinatarios; ponen en entredicho los principios universales de igualdad y de justicia en tanto que no todos los destinatarios poseen las mismas chances de acceder a los beneficios de los programas.

Con este argumento se discute sobre las limitaciones que presentan las propuestas de inclusión social incluidas en las orientaciones de políticas sociales del estado nacional y la posible superación de estas limitaciones por parte de otro programa social de corte universal (como la Asignación Universal por hijos) que se implementan simultáneamente con los programas anteriormente nombrados.

El trabajo se realizó a través de una metodología cualitativa que combinó observación participante y entrevistas en profundidad durante el 2010, en diversos ámbitos de implementación de los programas sociales nombrados, en un municipio de la Provincia de Buenos Aires.

The 2017 problem: A next revolutionary situation

Similarities and regularities among recent revolutions in North Africa and historical revolutions of the 20th and 19th centuries can be explained with use of classical theories of revolutionary situations (V. Lenin, C. Tilly, T. Skocpol). Tunisian and Egyptian cases demonstrate that despite all specificities three components of revolutionary situation remain the same: 1) crisis of the old ruling elite ability to govern; 2) crisis of loyalty among youth cohorts of lower middle strata; 3) crisis of living standards what makes possible fast and massive mobilization. Classical theories have been focused on political and economic aspects of revolutionary situation while crisis of the youth loyalty represents also cultural dimension of 3D-configuration of revolutionary situation.

Theoretical model of three crises constellation could be projected on the period around the year 2017 when old-fashioned leaders of restricted and manipulated democracies like post-soviet Russia, Belorussia, Azerbaijan or Kazakhstan probably will face coincidence of 1) next cyclical recession of global economy entering the downswing phase of the 5th Kondratieff cycle; 2) inefficiency of legitimization and control patterns oriented towards 'baby-boomers' generation expectations and based on mass media and welfare; 3) uprising of alternative movements mobilizing the youth which avoids traditional patterns of political participation, uses non-armed violence, flash mob tactics, and newest media for ad hoc groupings.

For advanced democracies like USA, UK or EU the 2017 problem does not seem to provoke a wave of fast revolutions colored or flowered, but during next decade general social transformation can occur as absorption of new radical movements challenging relatively weak economy dominated by financial markets and global brands; politics saturated by image making in branding and show business styles; culture divided by intergenerational gap in value-orientations and patterns of communications.

The next transformation: From glam-capitalism to alter-capitalism

Globalization has resulted not in the 'world society' but rather in networked enclaves of globality like big cities: New York, Tokyo, Hong Kong, Moscow, London, Buenos Aires etc. People in such enclaves experience globality through intensive flows of consumer goods, technologies, migrants, money, media-generated images. And capitalism there has been transformed into glam-capitalism being in sharp contrast with traditional social reality. Preconditions for new form of capitalism have been generated by virtualization of social structures.

By the 2000s intensive commoditization of images and commercialization of networks had led to overbranding and triviality of the virtualization strategy that has provoked shift of competitive advantages to hyper-virtuality of glamour. Being since the 1930s specific aesthetic form, glamour has become now rationality of newest capitalism. Glam-capitalism raises when producers at the hyper-competitive market place must glamour consumers and when goods / services must be aggressively beautiful to be attractive for targeted groups. Value creation process now is related more to trends, than to brands, not only in traditional fashion industry and show business but also in high-tech and financial industries. Owners and creators of trends compose new status groups – glam-capitalists and glam-professionals, which are core of new middle strata above shrinking traditional middle class.

Alternative movements like 'copy left', 'open source', and 'pirates' violating 'intellectual' property rights challenge regime of glam-capitalism and represent the authenticity revolt against hyper-virtuality of glamour. Non-armed violence of anti-globalist and anti-capitalist flash mobs undermines regime of glam-democracy.

Burocracia, clientelismo y liderazgo: Una inmersión desde abajo en los retos y callejones sin salida de la democracia venezolana del siglo XXI

A partir de una investigación etnográfica empezada a final del 2004, y de una tesis doctoral en curso, quisiéramos interrogar tres grandes tópicos, o lugares comunes, de la política participativa venezolana. Estos temas son de gran relevancia tanto en el discurso científico como en el discurso de los actores de la participación (consejos comunales y militantes del PSUV básicamente), sin embargo no se le han dado suficiente ilustración empírica. Mediante una experiencia en diferentes sectores populares y de clase media de la capital venezolana, pondremos de relieve estos amplios problemas, no en una perspectiva exhaustiva sino para definir un patrón de entendimiento de los problemas que surgen a raíz de la "radicalización" democrática (Bosteels 2001, Parker 2001, Ellner 2003, Cohen y Fung 2004, Laclau, Mouffe 2009). Consideraremos las posibilidades que vislumbran en cuanto a los 13 años de experimentos, a la evolución de las expectativas en el seno de los actores participantes y las miradas subyacentes al "fenómeno chavista" (Ramos Jiménez 2002). Estos temas nos permitirán establecer unas consideraciones situadas con respecto a la orientación sociológica y politológica de la realidad venezolana, y los analizaremos de manera conexa a la idea de "cultura política participativa" a fin de subrayar los cambios producidos en este país.

A feeling of hopelessness, health status and lifestyle in East Asia

The theme of the East Asian Social Survey (EASS) 2010 module was health and society in East Asia. Besides questions on physical conditions, lifestyle habits, and health-seeking behavior, the survey incorporated the Medical Outcomes Study 12-item Short Form (SF-12) designed to assess general health related quality of life (HRQOL). Although hopelessness has been found to be associated with mortality, cardiovascular disease, depression and suicidality in Europe, the prevalence of hopelessness and correlated factors remain unknown in East Asia. Using the Japanese and Korean data, the present study found the following results: (1) On average, hopelessness level was lower in South Korea, but the proportion of people who were in the "high hopelessness" group was higher in South Korea; (2) In both countries, high hopelessness was more prevalent among older women; (3) In both countries, high hopelessness was significantly associated with count of chronic diseases and low income; (4) High hopelessness was associated with less education and negatively associated with everyday exercise for men; (5) Korean men exercise more often than Japanese men; (6) Japanese men drank more often than Korean men, but their everyday drinking was negatively associated with high hopelessness, while more moderate frequency of drinking was negatively associated with high hopelessness for Korean men; (7) For Japanese women, high hopelessness was associated with smoking; (8) For Korean women, high hopelessness was associated with everyday drinking. (9) Hopelessness was strongly associated with Health-Related Quality of Life, especially with its vitality subscale scores. The results of China and Taiwan will be also discussed.

Status of elderly in modern family structure

Population ageing implies the ageing of family and kinship networks. Because the absolute number of the frail elderly is set to increase, notwithstanding the increase in life expectancy in good health, a top-heavy intergenerational chain is likely both to put stress on the middle generation, and result in the older and younger generations competing for their support where Pondicherry, India not an exception. The familial care of elderly is undergoing a process of change in accordance with the changes in the family structure. The elderly people face verbal admonition through passive neglect to active forms of humiliation, harassment, physical violence etc..

In the present study to understand the socio-economic and health status of rural elderly in the study area and an attempt was made to understand the personal life style, living arrangements and familial relationship of elderly in the families. Descriptive research design with purposive sampling methods has been undertaken. The interview schedule was used to collect primary data for this study. The statuses of the elder's are more just after their retirement with gender difference. Those elderly who are single face difference status in their family. At the time of illness they are very much depend upon others for their daily works. Nevertheless, the elder in Puducherry are dissatisfied with their own social life form different aspects. The present study analyses the status of elderly in all aspects. Government support by old age homes is never replaced by the familial care to the elderly. However, the over all the status of elderly in terms of social security drags them to be abused, where single elderly spouse feel more isolated.

When does population 'growth' end? The case of New Zealand

Depopulation is typically acknowledged only when it is in evidence at the level of the total population. It would certainly seem some distance off in a population still growing at or above the global growth rate, as is the case for New Zealand. However sub-national analysis identifies that just on half of the nation's growth now occurs in just one city, Auckland, which, together with a further seven Territorial Authority Areas (12 per cent in total) share 80 per cent of all growth. The cause of this disparity is that the age structures of most non-urban areas are no longer conducive to growth, structural ageing from conventional drivers being accelerated by net migration loss at young adult ages and/or net gain at older ages. The paper argues that this scenario is now escalating, and will continue until zero growth or population decline embraces all but the major urban areas, with attendant social, economic and political implications. Accordingly the paper posits that it is time to re-evaluate the question: when does population 'growth' end?

RC54-628.1JAGUDINA, Zaira (University of Skovde, Zaira.Jagudina@his.se)Synchronization of forms of vitality dynamics in the music therapy

This paper presents the results of the case study of the Functional music therapy sessions with the autistic children. It investigates how and to which extent an interpersonal interaction and understanding can emerge and be created between a music therapist and an autistic child. One interpretation of the empirical results is that a development of this kind of social interaction is enabled by the coupling of dynamic forms of vitality between a therapist and a patient. Vitality has a basis in physical action and in mental operations. The experience of vitality in human interactions arises through linking five events - movement, time, force, space and intention/directionality (Stern, 2010). Theoretical explanation is furthermore based on G.H. Mead's concept of gestures and a socio-psychological concept of spontaneous social responsibility. According to Mead (1934/1967), the objects are created within the social process of experience, through communication and mutual adjustment in behavior among the individual organisms. The interpretation of gestures is not a mental process; it is an external, open, and physical process which goes on in the sphere of social experience. 'Social responsibility' and engagement in the spontaneous play are fundamental prerequisites for our human subjectivity and wellbeing (Asplund, 1987/2004; Berg, 1992/2004). Music can be viewed as communication that engages emotions and thoughts and bodies. Even if it often does not have referential meaning, it still can mediate a dialogical process of mutual engagement.

This paper deals with the relationship between human rights movement and the Catholic Church, through the following question: Which is the new relation between human rights discourse within the Catholic Church and the increasing political pluralism of human rights movement after 2000 in Peru?

It analyzes how has this ecclesiastical logic responded to new events related to human rights in Peru? Both events are: The public handing over of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission Report (TRCR) in 2003 and the enactment of the National Human Rights Plan (NHRP) in 2005. Both events have shown different aspects on the human rights discourse and practice, and also an underlying consistent logic on ecclesiastical policies.

The TRCR publication revealed two tendencies within the Peruvian Catholic Church: one for and one against. These disputes showed the discourse in every sector of the Catholic Church on human rights fostering, and also, they showed how these disagreements managed to mobilize and legitimize a life model based on ecclesiastical geopolitics.

Simultaneously, the Plan (NHRP) history shows the process in which the results of the work bench were altered by the Catholic Church intervention, which was interested in sexual and reproductive rights and LGBT rights within this process.

RC45-207.1JAIME-CASTILLO, Antonio M. (University of Málaga, amjaime@gmail.com) and MARTINEZ-COUSINOU, Gloria (Centro de Estudios Andaluces)Distributive effects and moral justification of corruption

The moral justification of corruption differs within and across countries. In general terms, rich individuals will have more capacity to invest resources in corruption than low income earners. On the one hand, high income individuals can better face the cost of corrupt transactions, when necessary (for example, when bribes are required). On the other hand, high income individuals might have incentives to promote corrupt deals in areas where high public expenditure is involved, especially when accompanied by highly political discretion and lack of transparency. In this sense, as the public expenditure increases, those who are potential beneficiaries from grand corruption (high income earners), will increase their opportunities for rent-seeking. On the contrary, low income individuals not only lack enough resources to involve in petty corruption deals, but also they are more afected by the deviation of public resources that grand corruption implies. As the literature points out, corruption distorts the efficient distribution of public expenditure. That is, corruption may imply that political decisions related to public expenditure favor some individual interests against the interests of the majority. In this sense, corruption diverts resources from the poor to the rich. Therefore, we can expect that income will have an impact on justification of corruption. We empirically test the relationship between income and the justification of corruption by using a sample of 50 countries worldwide. Multilevel models allow us to take into account the effect of contextual variables at the aggregate level. Specifically, we analyze the impact of inequality on the moral justification of corruption at the aggregate level and how inequality has an impact on the relationship between income and justification of corruption at the individual level.

The process of development involves change in the desired direction motivated by the interests of public welfare. Often such change brings in conflict of mutually opposite interests. In terms of theory of social engineering as propounded by Dean Roscoe Pound, the individual, social and public interests come into conflict with each other. These conflicts are to be taken care of by the legislators, law makers and policy makers.

The proposed paper deals with the how mega development projects (e.g., major irrigation dam projects, Special Economic Zones, real estate projects etc.) are promoted in the interests of corporate world or to serve larger public interests at the cost of individual interests of those who are settled on the land for past many generations. This development leads to displacement and migration of multitude of people losing their livelihood, hereditary habitat, culture and community life.

This paper is concerned with the rights of these migratory people in the wider context of post-independent Constitution and Law in a socio-legal perspective. This paper raises various legal issues pertaining to various constitutional provisions and human rights in this regard so as to analyze it in a holistic socio-legal perspective of the phenomenon.

Youth and changing leisure patterns: A study of youth in urban India

The importance of leisure-time activities in the psychological, cognitive and physical development of young people is recognized in all societies. Leisure-time activities include games, sports, cultural events, entertainment and community service. Leisure can contribute to building a constructive personality. Appropriate leisure programmes for youth are elements of any measure aimed at fighting social ills such as drug abuse, juvenile delinquency and other deviant behaviour. While leisure programmes can contribute greatly to the development of the physical, intellectual and emotional potential of young people, they should be designed with due care and concern so that they are not used as a means for excluding youth from participating in other aspects of social life or for indoctrinating them.

Information and communication technologies have affected leisure time habits, as larger portions of socializing now take place through text messaging and on-line meetings replacing the face to face contact with virtual contact. The change in leisure tools has greatly impacted the inter relations between family, friends and colleagues.

The present paper attempts to study the changing patterns of leisure in the youth in urban India.

Distintas perspectivas sobre la vinculación política- Juventud en la última década: El discurso de los medios y de los actores en clave comparada

El objetivo de nuestro trabajo es describir el imaginario existente en torno a la participación política de jóvenes de sectores medios urbanos en la última década a partir de una comparación entre el tratamiento que los medios gráficos han hecho sobre este vínculo y el relatos de los propios actores.

El imaginario sobre la participación/identificación política de los jóvenes pasó del hastío generalizado, resumido en el "que se vayan todos" de 2001, a ser estandartes de la generación del futuro. Consideramos que el contexto socioeconómico ayuda indefectiblemente a entender parte de este proceso y que es por ende necesario analizar estos dos momentos de ebullición social como elementos posibilitadores de redefinición de las identidades. Asimismo, entendemos que los medios de comunicación son una herramienta que permite un acercamiento complejo al imaginario de época en tanto no sólo reflejan la discursividad de algunos sectores sociales, sino que además construyen hegemonía discursiva.

Si bien los medios resultan un dispositivo que impone agenda e instala visiones y divisiones del mundo, resulta también esencial incorporar el punto de vista de los propios actores. En el marco de una investigación de mayor envergadura, realizaremos un análisis del discurso mediático en torno a la participación juvenil, para luego introducirnos en la descripción que hacen los jóvenes de su propia experiencia política en la última década.

Para ello, realizaremos en primer lugar un acercamiento exploratorio a partir del relevamiento de periódicos como Clarín y Página/12, seleccionados tanto por su masividad como por su diversidad ideológica que nos permita describir la construcción mediática de las identidades políticas de los jóvenes; y en segundo lugar entrevistas en profundidad a jóvenes de sectores medios urbanos que posean algún tipo de participación política y/o identificación partidaria, para acercarnos a la trayectoria de dichos actores y a la reconfiguración de sus identidades.

The nanny series: A postcolonial reading

In this sociological case study, Laura James, a professional visual artist, and professor Sonia James-Wilson draw on postcolonial theory and visual art to address issues of gender, work and motherhood. As a conceptual lens, postcolonialism was particularly fitting because it recognizes both historical continuity and transformation, and more importantly, asserts the promise, possibility, and necessity for social change (McLeod, 2000).

In this research, James and James-Wilson were concerned with the ways in which identity is constructed and deconstructed for female domestic workers, and how their common experiences of exploitation and marginalization have fueled a grassroots social movement. Participants included women from former colonies in the Caribbean, Africa, and South Asia, and members of Domestic Workers United (DWU), an organization that advocates for industry work standards and a voice for all domestic workers, especially those who are not organized.

The Nanny Series, a collection of 20 paintings by James, served as a catalyst to encourage women born in the Global South to produce "texts" that told their stories, helping to make connections between their multiple identities. Interviews with family members conducted by James-Wilson revealed the consequences of their work for their own children, and focus groups conducted with DWU members illustrated how the practice of interrogating colonial discourses have empowered these women to advocate for better wages, improved working conditions, and the respect of their employers.

This proposed presentation will include a summarization of the design, data collection, data analysis, and findings of this case study, and a slide show of images from The Nanny Series.

Neoliberal globalization and the pension reform in Panama

For the economic crisis of the 1980s, the Latin American nations experienced neoliberal globalization. In the process, the financial problems of the Pay-As-You-GO (PAYGO) pension scheme, upon which most of the Latin American nations had their pension insurance basis, had been highlighted. While some Latin American countries including Chile and Peru reformed their pension system to have private insurance companies operating scheme as a solution to the issue, the others did not. Panama did reform their pension system as their financial status was at risk. However, Panamanian's choice was different from the countries that adapted neoliberal reform for their national pension system.

This thesis aims to analyze why countries like Panama chose the pension scheme that might not be endorsed by both the multilateral and bilateral donors; especially when Panama is not only vulnerable to the external economic pressure, due to its openness, but also subordinate to the external debtors such as international financial organizations and donor countries, for its large liabilities. By bringing the definition of globalization as the interactions between the outside forces and inside responses borrowed from Cerny(2005), this paper analyzes the processes and results of the pension reform in Panama.

Most of the research papers that have focused on the social policy in Latin America after neoliberal globalization are either statistical researches with the panel data in the range of whole Latin American countries or case studies with big countries in terms of economy and population such as Chile, Argentina or Brazil. However this paper attempts to find out how the small open economy in Latin America has responded to neoliberal globalization by the case of Panama's pension reform.

The risky comparisons of international organizations

The UN and many other INGO's are used to intervene into many affairs of modern society. One of the most critical affairs in this sense is state-building or peace-keeping in cases where the nation state has failed. This contribution will point out the contradictions and paradoxes of INGO interventions into systems which are (at least in principle) capable of and claim self-determination. These contradictions and paradoxes will be interpreted as risks of intervention into complex systems. The paper will focus on the destructive effects of risky comparisons by bureaucratic organizations itself.

The social order in failed states is routinely compared to some kind of a liberal (market or democratic) regime, which is taken as a global standard to which a disturbed social order should adapt (Paris). It is this comparison with an effective normative order (mostly liberal regimes) which devalues the existing identities as well as underlying structures in failed states. This devaluation establishes itself in routine operations on military, administrative, economic and political issues – but it is presupposed and backed by the cognitive activity of comparing (and observing this act of comparison).

This paper will focus on forms of resistance – like devious cooptation, infiltration, insurgency and terrorism – to these social and cognitive pressures triggered by international comparison. Such resistance will not be downplayed as marginal or temporary as neo-institutionalist scholarship tends to do (Boli). It will be interpreted as reaction on risky interventions. Solutions of the denoted forms of resistance, which are perceived as problems in the process of state - or peace-building, lie in mobilizing alternatives to rigid liberal models (Barnett) as well as in tolerating operative deviances from those norms. These alternatives are simultaneously devices for reducing the risks of intervention by comparisons.

Black women victimization of domestic violence in Brazil

In Brazil, recent researches indicate that 43.1% of women over 10 years have been victimized of domestic violence.

In the 1970s, feminism emergence as a solid and organized movement in Brazil was related in a great deal to combat battering. In the 1980's, when Women's Studies proliferated as a research field at Brazilian universities, they inherited the centrality of the topic from the feminist social movement. Such magnitude accounts for the remarkable production which has been developed about the phenomenon so far.

In parallel, 'race relations' are also a traditional and prominent research field in Brazilian academia. Theoretical and empiric investigations on the issue have contributed to the visibility of sharp disparities in social conditions and opportunities for whites and nonwhites.

However, investigations on the incidence of domestic violence which incorporates race as a control variable are almost nonexistent in Brazil.

Domestic sphere is permeated not only by the power asymmetries that are articulated in gender relations, but also incorporates other axes of hierarchy. 'Race' thus appears as an analytical category that may help to elucidate domestic violence against women as a social phenomenon.

On the other hand, appreciating the intersectionality of race and gender on the configuration of domestic violence against black women may contribute to the understanding that the category 'women' encompasses dissimilar experiences that should not follow unnoticed by academic research and public policies.

Las trabajadoras del servicio doméstico inmigrantes en la Ciudad Autónoma de Buenos Aires. La normativa actual que las protege contrastada con el nuevo Convenio 189 de la Organización Internacional del Trabajo

El objetivo de la presente ponencia es analizar el contenido del Convenio 189 de la Organización Internacional del Trabajo (OIT) y contrastarlo con la normativa actual que cubre a las mujeres inmigrantes insertas en el servicio doméstico, que viven en la Ciudad Autónoma de Buenos Aires. La metodología a implementar es la revisión bibliográfica de ambas leyes.

Las personas que se insertan en el sector doméstico sufren discriminaciones entrecruzadas, algunas no están registradas y viven en situación de precariedad y vulnerabilidad. En la Ciudad Autónoma de Buenos Aires, muchas de las mujeres inmigrantes dedicadas a esta labor están relativamente desprotegidas en términos legales, ya que, la normativa que las cubre data de la época de la dictadura (el decreto-ley nacional 326/56 de 1956 y el decreto reglamentario nacional 7.979/56). Adecuar la normativa nacional a las normas internacionales de Derechos Humanos y de Derecho Internacional Laboral se hace necesario para proteger a este sector de la población.

En junio de 2011 se aprobó en la reunión número 100 de la OIT un nuevo convenio internacional que considera la necesidad de implementar el trabajo decente para las trabajadoras[1] domésticas en el mundo. Este instrumento internacional, numerado como el Convenio No. 189, considera a un sector de la población mundial que ha estado desprotegido históricamente en términos legales, pero que ahora pretende equiparar al resto de los trabajadores incluyéndolos en el régimen de contrato de trabajo.

[1] Para la presente ponencia se hablará en femenino dada la excesiva feminización del sector doméstico, sin desconocer que muchos hombres están dedicados a esta labor.

Responsabilidad como justicia: Espacios de los movimientos sociales en democracias emergentes

El artículo parte de dos ideas centrales: La primera es que la consolidación y la radicalización de los derechos sociales en países de democracia emergente necesitan incorporar el tema de la responsabilización como sinónimo de justicia. La segunda idea es que los movimientos sociales que empezaron expresarse en el año de 2011 (Primavera Árabe; Indignados en España y Estudiantes en Chile) apuntan para un nuevo espacio de lucha política frente al desgaste de los pactos políticos que gobiernan las democracias liberales representativas.

Para avanzar en la primera idea, el artículo trabajará, en una primera parte, con el concepto de responsabilidad desarrollado por Iris Young en su libro "Responsibility for Justice" (2011. Oxford: Oxford University Press), donde establece una relación entre esta noción y la cuestión de justicia social, principalmente, en las democracias emergentes.

En la segunda parte, el artículo discutirá de forma rápida la limitación de los pactos políticos vigentes en enfrentar la cuestión de la justicia social, para después analizar los movimientos sociales que empezaron a manifestarse en 2011. Mi propósito con esto es indicar las potencialidades y los límites de estos movimientos de que sean los portadores de la lucha por responsabilización y justicia social a través de nuevas formas de relacionarse con el campo político.

The role of environmental sociology in interdisciplinary environmental research

In the tradition of sociology, we find quite different views on cooperation between sociology and natural science, and the same goes with environmental sociology. Today in environmental research broad interdisciplinarity, interaction across the deeply rooted conceptual and cultural boundaries between natural and social sciences, is increasingly favoured in research calls, for example. At the same time, societal, political, scientific and managerial trends are pushing environmental policy and natural resource management towards more collaborative approaches. Stakeholder engagement, collaboration, or participation and shared learning have become buzz-words and hardly any environmental assessment or other policy effort today can be presented without some reference to public participation, stakeholders and their involvement in the process. It seems that we need methodological solutions and analytical tools which, on the one hand, allow citizens and stakeholder groups to participate in their own terms and with their expertise, and which, on the other hand, can be used to make information (originating from different sources or disciplines) commensurate for environmental decision-making. This paper explores the role of environmental sociology and sociologists in the field of interdisciplinary and transdisciplinary environmental research. First, it discusses the theoretical premises of sociology as a discipline in interdisciplinary research. Then it looks at the definitions, categories and typologies of interdisciplinary and transdisciplinary research. Third, the paper examines research cases in which environmental sociologists have participated. It is suggested that the most comprehensible role for sociologists is in empirical and methodological interdisciplinary and transdisciplinary cases in which integrated approach as well interactive and dialogic expertise are needed. Sociologists are good knowledge facilitators or mediators between different sources of knowledge reminding, for example, that lay knowledge(s) cannot be considered stable and fixed, but evolving as science does.

Remit or reunify? U.S. immigrant parents, remittances, and the sponsorship of children

This paper explores the relationship between the sponsorship by an immigrant of family members - family reunification - and remittances provided to family members using data from both rounds of the New Immigrant Survey. In this preliminary exploration, we assess to what extent the two behaviors are linked, using a simple model of the household to guide our analysis in which an altruistic family selects who among its family members to sponsor and to whom to provide transfers. Our findings on transfers conform to those from most of the literature on transfers - transfers flow from higher-wage migrants to lower income recipients. We find that among immigrant's children, the less educated who are resident in low wage (low prices of skill) countries are more likely to receive transfers. However, our estimates on sponsorship indicate that parents choose to sponsor those who are higher-skilled and living in countries where skills are less rewarded. Thus we find that family reunification is positively selective on skill and negatively selective on the home-country skill price, while remittance behavior is negatively selective on both skill and the price of skill in the origin country.

Multiple sources of belonging, difference and resistance: Conceptualising second generation youth identity(s) and experience(s)

Situated within the narratives of 'home', and notions of 'migration' and 'settlement', second generation youth identity construction is bound to both individual and collective experiences. In this paper, we draw on in-depth interviews conducted with second generation youth of New Zealand descent in the Australian context to examine the dynamics of negotiating and 'establishing' identities shaped by, and through, access to multiple sources of 'knowing' and belonging. We argue that current discourses of second generation identities and experiences purport an essentialised, static notion of second generation 'youth-hood' as a 'culturally conflicted' stage between migrant family, community and the 'host'/'mainstream' society. Instead, we highlight that second generation youth identities are somewhat bound to migration as a physical process of relocation and a socio-political experience, through the memories and narratives of 'significant others', as well as personal imaginaries of the 'home', often maintained and fostered through transnational and local linkages and journeys. In particular, the seemingly convivial bilateral relationship and distinct relations of migration, involving a relatively unrestricted migration arrangement, between Australia and New Zealand provides a unique, and equally complex, foundation for the construction of second generation youth identities within and across multiple boundaries. Within this context, the process of identity construction for second generation youth draws on connections to, and engagements within, collective 'spaces' of difference and resistance, including 'cultural' groups and 'communities', virtual spaces and 'mainstream' institutions. We thus argue that the identities of second generation youth are ultimately (re) shaped and (re)presented at the intersection(s) of collective spaces and individualised understandings of difference and belonging, located within the socio-political dimensions and narratives of everyday life.

Risky or resilient? Moving towards an understanding of multiplicity and difference in youth experience(s) through a conceptual framework of 'resistance'

Discourses of risk and resilience have come to dominate studies of youth across sociology, psychology and health, vying for attention and prominence as operative logics. On the one hand, resilience theories, derived from psychology, promote a strengths-based view of youth wellbeing, highlighting the ability of young people to become 'resilient' through exposure to different life experiences and situations, seemingly building their capacity for empowerment, both individually and collectively. Alternatively, notions of youth 'risk' and 'vulnerability', suggest a 'deficit-model' of conceptualising 'youth-hood', insofar as this life stage is constructed as a period of uncertainty and turmoil as youth struggle to grapple with the challenges of life. These challenges are said to include 'identity crises' and issues negotiating conflicting experiences within the 'spaces' of everyday life, such as the 'school' and 'home'. In this paper, we argue that both the 'resilience' and 'risk' research frames present limited possibilities to (re)present the complex nature of youth health and wellbeing, primarily by framing youth as either dependent or 'passive'. In this paper, we begin by charting the development of these theoretical perspectives, highlighting the way in which they have come to occupy positions of considerable influence within current understandings of, and research into, youth health and wellbeing. Then, drawing on a number of case studies from within the Australian context, we propose the notion of 'resistance' as a nuanced conceptual framework from which to explore young people's ability to navigate the journey of 'youth-hood'. We argue that a 'resistance' framework allows for an appreciation of both structure and agency, as an interconnected, bi-directional dynamic, by introducing the 'political' as well as the 'spatial' within discourses relating to the positioning of youth amidst social change.

Sex work, identity and space occupation in the downtown of Belo Horizonte, Brazil

This article aims to discuss the relationship between gender, identity, work and territory among women who work as sex workers in the central area of Belo Horizonte. We sought to think if and in what measure the construction of a professional identity can contribute to the empowerment of these women in the sense of favoring an organization that allows them to demand among other question, their permanency in this area that has been historically a territory of prostitution in the city. Despite this historical occupation by sex workers, this is a region that has always been targeted by urban planning policies that sought "to clean" the area, removing from there the hotels and pension where those women sell their services. So, if sex workers are seen as hierarchically inferior, in the sense employed by Rubin's definition of sexual hierarchy, and therefore, stigmatized, the idea that they have to be "rescued" or at least hidden is a very common one, as well as the proposal to remove prostitutes from the downtown of large urban areas. However, in Belo Horizonte these proposals never went ahead and they still are in the area, in spite the fact that there is a huge project to revitalize the central area in consonant with the preparations for the World Cup in two years. Today, there are in the region around twenty hotels where almost two thousand women work daily. Hence, our discussion if in this area of the city, the construction and maintenance of their identities as prostitutes - identity that implies in the sharing of meanings about their profession, gender and of a space - would contribute to their political organization face to the "other", non-sex workers.

Body as a site of contestation and reconciliation: Learning from an "STI management program" in India

This paper draws from research on a global health initiative to prevent HIV/AIDS among female sex workers [FSWs] in Rajahmundry, Andhra Pradesh, India. Treating and preventing STIs among FSWs was a critical goal of the initiative to protect the health of the women and their communities. It was also a cost-effective way to slow the spread of HIV, especially in rural areas where laboratory facilities are unavailable. In this context, the STI program was implemented in a two-pronged strategy. The first involved setting up a clinic and providing STI services that included condom promotion, regular check-ups, asymptomatic treatment, syndromic case management and counseling. The second included the formation of a Health Committee, consisting of FSWs, PEs [Peer Educators] from the FSW community, and medical doctors to monitor the program, ensure quality treatment and so on. While the latter strategy emphasized "community ownership" and had as a goal that FSWs would eventually own the program and take decisions, the former strategy gravitated towards close surveillance and regulation of sex workers' bodies. On the other hand, sex workers' reactions to these strategies varied over time: from contestation or resistance in the initial period to negotiation and reconciliation later on. Following the arguments of embodiment theorists, we argue that FSWs' response to the STI management program cannot be reduced to "body governance" which over-emphasizes "docile bodies", making bodies subservient to discourses, technological advancement and structures of society. Rather, we illuminate how the body also exercises agency in the world and therefore, is also an instrument of refusal and rejection. Indeed, FSWs reconciled with the STI management program only when the intervention restructured the program in ways compatible with FSWs' convenience.

Inside the pyramid of disputes: Naming problems and filing grievances in California prisons

Literature on disputing and legal mobilization suggests that stigmatized, self-blaming, and/or vulnerable populations often face insurmountable barriers to naming a situation as injurious and claiming redress, even in the face of seemingly dramatic harms. Contrary to this literature, prisoners in the United States—among the most stigmatized and vulnerable of populations—file tens of thousands of grievances annually to contest the conditions of their confinement. To explore this apparent paradox, we draw on an unprecedented data set comprised of face-to-face interviews with a random sample of 120 men incarcerated in three California prisons. These data, supplemented with a random sample of 459 inmate grievances, interviews with prison staff, and official data, reveal that almost all of these prisoners are willing and able to name problems, and almost three-quarters of them have filed at least one grievance. While some prisoners expressed self-blame for their incarceration and most of them said there were staff reprisals for filing a grievance, the majority overcame these potential impediments to filing. We argue that the institutional context of prison—a total institution in which law is a hyper-visible organizing force—may enhance this form of legal mobilization by prisoners, trumping the very social and psychological factors that that context otherwise produces and that in other populations tamp down claimsmaking. However, these men are by no means immune to the pressures of the prison context. While staff disrespect was named frequently as a leading problem in prison, grievances against staff—a category of appeals that these prisoners reported triggers the most retaliation—were relatively rare. In concluding, we note that the U.S. Supreme Court recently found California prisons violate the 8th Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment, a finding that reveals the inadequacy of the inmate appeals system despite prisoners' repeated efforts to hold the State accountable.

The effects of religious beliefs and practices among urbanites on attitudes toward gender roles in marriage: Cross-national perspectives in 38 countries

Objectives: Despite evidence of real changes in gender equality, attitudes toward marital gender roles continue to be a matter of inequality and controversy in much of the world. This research examined variability in the relationship between religious beliefs and practices and attitudes toward gender roles in marriage within urban populations worldwide. Sample: Data used were from the International Social Survey Programme: Religion III (ISSP 2008; N=38, 562). Findings: The opinions of urban married men in the study were inclined toward hierarchical gender role traditionalism in marriage while gender role equality was the preference of urban married women and women in general. Sex role traditionalists among religious urbanites of both genders were more likely than egalitarians to hold fundamentalist Christian beliefs of authoritative biblical literalism and regarded belief in the supernatural and sacred (heaven, hell, life after death, religious miracles) as integral to their faith. Traditionalists had higher church attendance rates than egalitarians, attributable in part to the influence of family religious socialization among conservative Catholics and Evangelical Protestants. Urban egalitarians on the whole tended to be more secular and viewed the bible in decidedly rational terms as an ancient book of legends and moral precepts recorded by men. Protestants who believed in gender-role equality in marriage were likely to retain denominational homogamy from childhood (11-12 years old) into adulthood which contributed to significant marital homogamy. Traditionalists in relation to the labor market were characterized by the historical typology of working male head-of-household and the status of women as housewives. In contrast, rising levels of women's workforce participation have increased the influence of the egalitarian viewpoint among women worldwide; this trend has been heightened in dual-earner families with children when each spouse is in the paid labor force and working full-time or part-time outside the home.

Corps-machines dans le jeu du vertige-contrôle: Les jeunes et les courses de voitures et des motos

La recherche ethnographique a comme thème les courses clandestines des voitures et des motos (« rachas ») à Londrina-Brésil, dont une partie s'exerce dans l'autodrome, dans une tentative d'institutionnalisation de ces pratiques dangereuses. L'objectif est d'appréhender comment les jeunes hommes proposent des défis, en prenant des risques qui mettent en danger leur vie, contrairement aux discours dans lesquels les risques sont niés et contrôlés dans notre monde technologisé et sécuritaire. Il s'agit de comprendre les significations qu'ils attribuent au risque encouru dans ces courses ainsi que à l'expérience de la vitesse et à leurs expérimentations de dérapage, de dérapage et de manoeuvres. Dans leurs récits, ils préfèrent valoriser leur capacité de maîtriser leurs machines, de jouer et de jouer. Cela s'exprime sensoriellement par le visuel (les phares appelant au « racha »), par l'auditif (le son des moteurs), par l'olfactif (l'odeur de carburant et des pneus) et par le tactile (la trépidation corporelle). Conjuguer le vertige de la vitesse (dérapage contrôlé) avec celui de la maîtrise dans la « rigolade », c'est ce que semble rechercher ces jeunes. D'autres pratiques à risque font interagir cette double recherche de vertige et de contrôle, en permettant à l'individu d'exorciser son sentiment quotidien d'impuissance à partir du sentiment de contrôle de son corps. L'expérience proportionnée par les machines semble causer une (re)intensification des sensations corporelles et des émotions, et en plus gérer aux jeunes un sentiment d'appartenance et la possibilité d'échapper à la sensation de déracinement et au piège de l'uniformité moderne. Ainsi, il n'y aurait pas de contradiction entre la surestimation de soi et la sous-évaluation du risque de la part de ces jeunes dans un contexte socioculturel, qui, d'un côté, conjure les risques et multiplie les assurances et, de l'autre, valorise le succès matériel, l'initiative, la performance et la reconnaissance personnelles.

To study lives over many years. The meaning of ageing in the research process

The aim is to present some reflections over a methodological issue that is hardly ever addressed in ageing research: How does ageing – not only the respondent's/participant's ageing but also the researcher's own ageing – influence their relationship and the shaping of the research process, in longitudinal qualitative studies? What is the impact of their historical location and the passing of time, not only for the participant's meaning making, but also for the researcher's perspectives and priorities? And what are the long term implications of the relationship between the researcher and the participant, not only for the research but also for their respective lives? The presentation builds on a study in which a group of chronically ill, visually impaired people were followed through repeated interviews over 30 years.

The historical location was important for the original design of the study. However, norms and timebound themes took on more complex functions in later phases of the research process and its design. The researcher's own ageing influenced – changed – the focus of the study over time. In the 30 year-perspective, it also seemed clear that the relationship between the researcher and the participant had been more important for the researcher than it had been for the participant, in his or her life. In retrospect, the results from the study appeared quite fluid, under constant change. Some of these observations seemed to give reasons to problematize the common tendency in research to draw conclusions from an analysis based on data collected on one single occasion. Furthermore, the qualitative researcher probably often tends to overemphasize his or her importance for the participants and their lives, this is a conclusion that will be drawn.

Globalismo, individualización y clase media

Como sabemos, en el régimen de bienestar social, las clases medias se fortalecieron, principalmente con la creación de universidades públicas y el acceso a estas de un amplio sector de los hijos de los trabajadores, que con el tiempo, una parte, se convirtieron en profesionistas asalariados burócratas.

Sin embargo con la implementación del régimen neoliberal, esta clase social y en específico su sector social, los profesionistas asalariados se han visto vulnerados en sus derechos sociales y laborales.

Siendo ellos principal base de contribuyentes cautivos, son los menos favorecidos, pues los gobiernos benefician con sus políticas, públicas, programas sociales a los más pobres y a los más ricos.

Ante este adelgazamiento de las funciones y políticas sociales del Estado-nación, aunado a la expansión del modelo del globalismo capitalista se ha generado un proceso cosmopolita del sistema de clases sociales en las ciudades globales, como es en lo particular, la ciudad de Guadalajara, Jalisco, México, simulando un sentido imaginario colectivo de ser una sociedad de clase media.

Mas, la clase media y sus estratos sociales experimentan un proceso de reconfiguración, o en términos de Lash, una des-diferenciación en la praxiología del habitus, modificando procesos de usos y posesión de capitales (económico, social, y cultural –simbólico-) y su posición en los diferentes campos sociales, así como en sus derechos sociales y humanos.

Esta des-diferenciación se refleja en la individualización del individuo, la autonomía y des-salarización laboral, así como la globalización y flexibilidad del mercado laboral, que afecta el estilo de vida cotidiana y visión social, por lo que el sentido de comunidad se desvanece.

Por lo tanto se hace imperante crear programas sociales de acción colectiva ciudadana que contribuyan a consolidar sistemas autogestivos comunitarios y la construcción de ciudadanía para gestionar políticas públicas para el desarrollo social de este sector vulnerado.

Research projects coming from the bottom-up in the economic south countries, should they be encouraged?

Third World countries insist on pursuing the road to development followed by the industrialized countries. With respect to science, this has not produced the desired results due to the social and economic conditions of Third World countries, quite distant from that in the First World; hence it results somewhat utopian to try to close the scientific-technological gap in just a few decades. Countries in the economic South arrive late into modernity having a too small impact. Statistics show that the expense in S,T&I of countries of the economic South is very small compared with the budgets of industrialized countries.

Some scientists in countries with a low development level have realized important efforts to produce science aimed to solve local/regional/national problems felt by the community, with good results. The examples described in this paper give a short account of alternative forms of learning, that place emphasis on the student and his learning experience vs. the traditional emphasis on teaching. These alternative forms are offered by CIDE (Centro de Innovación y Desarrollo Educativo, Centre for Innovation and Educational Development), and the paper will focus on this experience.

Efforts made so far by the countries in the economic South to expand their academic communities is not negligible, on the contrary it has allowed them to maintain certain international visibility and keep themselves informed of the current advances of science. Moreover, a number of Third-World scientists belong to the elite that lead international science. This endeavor should continue. What we claim is that the "other" way of doing science –bottom-up- should be encouraged and institutions like CIDE should be officially supported. This paper aims to show some successful examples of research inspired from local conditions solving felt problems of the population with immediate benefit for them.

El género de la "delincuencia"

Este estudio tiene como objetivo describir y analizar las actividades y los discursos desarrollados por los educadores junto a los y las adolescentes en conflicto con la ley que cumplen las medidas educativas en entorno abierto en una organización no gubernamental en el distrito de Ciudad Ademar/San Pablo, Brazil. El énfasis central está en la capacidad de desarrollar enfoques que tengan en cuenta que un 88% de ellos son varones y presentan un perfil socioeconómico y demográfico de convergencia con lo que ha sido diezmada por el asesinato: son pobres, baja educación negros, y viven al margen de las grandes ciudades. Este es el grupo para el que la Organización Mundial de la Salud pide prioridad en la ejecución de acciones de los distintos órganos en el esfuerzo por revertir un marco nacional clasificado internacionalmente como un "verdadero genocidio". El predominio masculino se entiende en esta investigación, a partir de los estudios de género sumado a la comprensión que Foucault ofrece acerca de los mecanismos de seguridad para reflexionar sobre cómo las penas se distribuyen en el funcionamiento de la sociedad como dispositivos que organizan, regulan y distribuyen poder. El procedimiento metodológico es un estudio cualitativo exploratorio desarrollado a través de visitas al campo y entrevistas semi-estructuradas entre los años 2011 y 2013. El marco para la interpretación del discurso es la teoría de Foucault. Durante el año 2011 se desarrolló la primera etapa y las principales consideraciones son: 1) la llegada de los adolescentes depende de la temporada del año, 2) hay indicaciones de un aumento de mujeres adolescentes involucradas con actos infraccionales, 3) la aplicación por el Poder Judicial de diferentes medidas sociales y educativas, más fuertemente sobre los adolescentes que no cuentan con la participación de la familia en el proceso judicial o tienen peor aspecto.

Land and housing markets in consolidated irregular settlements - Findings from the LAHN project

A project was undertaken in Guadalajara (LAHN, Guadalajara), between 2007 and 2011, to look into the current situation of low-income settlements that were formed more than twenty years ago. As most of the residents of these apparently consolidated settlements have services and legal titles, they are thought to have no pressing problems. Little attention has been given, in the literature and by policy makers, to the opportunities that these settlements offer to low-income groups. The study reveals that the residents do have problems. One is that the housing market in these consolidated settlements is almost frozen. This is a growing problem, because when the owners die, the children who inherit the property cannot sell it to divide the inheritance. The study also shows how a great variety of land and housing options, that these originally informal settlements offer to low-income people, has changed as they consolidate. It highlights the fact that these settlements are quite significant, as they cover almost as much land as that occupied by the Metropolitan Area of Guadalajara's expansion in a decade. This supply of housing is significant as the public sector and formal private sector have little to offer to the 69 per cent of the population earning less than 3 minimum salaries in Guadalajara. Currently, even when the supply of land in these settlements is nearly exhausted and the housing market is practically "frozen", there is still a wide variety of housing available. Thus, changes overtime to households, have prompted changes to the plots and houses, and also to the tenure. The new arrangements and needs in these settlements, require public interventions with appropriate policies and programmes that can alleviate the problems of the low-income groups who are now in a new phase of housing problems that has remained almost invisible.

Estrategias simbólicas y contextos migratorios

Toda migración implica un proceso mediante el cual se cambian las fuerzas que actúan sobre los sujetos. Las personas que emigran pueden, con este movimiento, desplazarse tanto del influjo de las fuerzas materiales cuanto simbólicas que pesaban sobre ellos en el país de origen. Desde la teoría de Pierre Bourdieu buscamos analizar cómo las estrategias simbólicas de los migrantes se apoyan en la discordancia entre lo nominal y lo real, acrecentada por el contexto migratorio. En el mismo, no sólo se trata de la diferencia entre todo sistema de palabras enclasadadas y enclasantas, y las distribuciones materiales. En el contexto migratorio se suma, además, la discordancia entre dos sistemas clasificatorios: el que se trae incorporado desde el espacio social de origen, y el que funciona en el espacio social de destino.

En esta comunicación nos proponemos explorar cómo ha afectado la migración a los enclasmientos de un grupo de inmigrantes argentinos en España, y las estrategias simbólicas que los mismos han elaborado durante el proceso migratorio. Analizaremos estas estrategias en torno a dos ejes clasificatorios: la condición de inmigración y la adscripción de clase. Asimismo, indagaremos cómo inciden estas percepciones en el espacio social de destino, redefiniendo los proyectos migratorios de los sujetos.

Las referencias que los migrantes hacen de los enclasmientos en el espacio social de origen tienen consecuencias diversas para dotar de sentido a los propios proyectos migratorios. Una de ellas es que, al tensionar los esquemas de percepción (habitus), éstos son aplicados a un medio para el que no son del todo adecuados. Esto hace que los agentes lean el espacio social español con las categorías de percepción del argentino. Además, esta disonancia permite a los migrantes jugar con el (supuesto) status logrado en destino, de cara a los grupos de referencia en origen.

Laughs in the stream: Discourse and networks in Twitter parody accounts

This paper examines Twitter parody accounts focused on the Arab world from both a sociolinguistic and a sociotechnical perspective. It contends that the design of Twitter and the way Twitter integrates parody accounts, official accounts, and accounts of everyday citizens fosters a computer-mediated form of parody significantly different from previous forms of parody in terms of both performance and audience. Within this context, this study investigates the discourse and conversation features of tweets from such parody accounts as well as the networks they perform within and to.

Data is drawn from almost two hundred parody accounts collected since January 2011. Parody accounts focusing on the Arab world have proliferated ever since the 2010–2011 Tunisian revolution triggered popular protests across the Middle East and North Africa. While most perform a character based on a specific real-life individual, others parody a particular state media service, and still others personify more amorphous groups, such as baltagiya (governmental thugs) or mokhabarat (intelligence services), without situating these in a specific region or regime. Accounts vary in terms of frequency of tweets, content of tweets, language and script choices, types of interlocutors, and target audiences.

This study first asks, what are the characteristic elements of a tweet from a parody account? Within this context are examined linguistic codes, speech acts, hashtag indexing, inclusion of hypertext, and popularity (measured through retweets). Second, this study investigates the composition of parody accounts' networks through: 1. Analysis of public "conversations" formed by directed tweets (messages addressed to specific Twitter accounts; these may be other parody accounts, official accounts, or neither); and 2. Examination of follower patterns and how they change. The paper concludes with a brief description of how the design of Twitter itself grants a certain parity of authority to tweets from parody accounts.

Mass incarceration as a contemporary mechanism of racialization in the United States, United Kingdom, and Brazil

This paper discusses the broader consequences of prison expansion by focusing on the concentration of men of African descent in prisons in the United States, England, and Brazil. While these countries have different histories of race and racial identification, their prison populations reflect similar patterns of racial disproportionality. A great deal of research has focused on the causes and consequences of disproportionate rates of incarceration for African American men, but few have addressed the racial implications of mass incarceration in an international context. Ultimately, this paper develops the idea that mass incarceration operates in various countries as a contemporary mechanism of racialization—a structure for economic marginalization and social stigma that reproduces racial caste.

Fear abatement and oppositional mobilization: Comparative perspectives on democratic movements in repressivestates

Abstract: This research paper focuses on two theoretical threads in the field of protest studies that have been present for about a decade: (1) the renewed interest in emotional aspects of collective action; and (2) a dynamic and relational approach to collective action, specifically the search for general mechanisms and processes (McAdam, Tarrow, and Tilly 2001) that operate across different episodes of contention. Drawing on empirical examples both from current events in the Middle East, Russia and China, and from several separate research projects in authoritarian states, the study elaborates the mechanism of fear abatement as a necessary process in the development of democratic oppositions in repressive settings. The research suggests that the fear abatement mechanism develops out of the internal contradictions of authoritarian control in complex societies, which allow cracks in the repressive apparatus where free spaces develop. The social exchange and network basis of these free spaces change calculations of risk and experiences of fear, undermining Kuran's notion of "preference falsification" in the public sphere. There is also evidence of hidden but significant cases of "preference facilitation" among middle-level state authorities. The result is that relationship between protest and repression is neither linear nor curvilinear, as existing theories might predict, but rather path dependent on the social relations among state and society of late authoritarianisms. These relations can intensify, mask, and redirect or mitigate emotions. The notions on "losing your fear" and "fear being dispelled" were widely reported in accounts of the democracy movements in Tunisia, Egypt, and Syria, and it is important that our theories of democratization account for them. Drawing on data from the cases mentioned above, this report elaborates the mechanism of fear abatement as first step in imaging a democratic future in nondemocracies.

Movimientos democráticos en regímenes autoritarios de alta capacidad: Comparaciones desde el Medio Oriente, la Rusia, y la China

This paper examines democratic opposition movements against authoritarian states in a broadly comparative perspective. It draws on examples of movements in numerous authoritarian states, but with special analytical focus on the prevailing strategies (Koopmans and Kresi 1998) of China, Russia, Iran, Egypt, Tunisia, Lybia, and Syria. The goal is to identify the generalizable processes of democratic mobilizations and state responses to growing demands for political openness. The analysis focuses on three dimensions of high-capacity authoritarian states: (1) diversity of elite interests, (2) the complexity and vertical structure of social control apparatus, and (3) the microlevel, quotidian reality of interaction between the political opposition and forces of social control. Each has its own impact on the outcomes of protest mobilization at different junctures in the development of the opposition. Drawing on examples from several high-capacity authoritarianisms mentioned earlier, I identify junctures when elite interests may diverge, thereby creating opportunities for oppositional mobilization. Another goal is to identify patterns of challenge and threat when elite interests converge, thereby leading to increasing repressive measures. The dual principles of divergent elite interests and vertical state heterogeneity (as measures of state capacity), however, make broad generalizations difficult, as is apparent in variable outcomes of Arab democratic movements, and stalled democratization in China and Russia. The forces of political opposition and state repression are engaged in a "dark dance" that is dynamic, recursive, and iterative. Moreover, the complexities at different levels of the social control apparatus of high-capacity authoritarianism makes democratic outcomes highly contingent on elite adaptability.

The influence of scientific mobility on the direction of research collaboration

Highly skilled return migrants contribute to the establishment of sustainable ties between the home and host system. This phenomenon offsets some of the costs implied by the theories on brain drain and return brain drain. This paper studies how the scientific social capital which Argentinean researchers built up during the time spent in foreign research systems influences their collaboration behavior upon return. Not only does it confirm the expectation that having foreign work experience is positively correlated to the propensity to collaborate internationally, but it also shows that researchers collaborate to a higher degree with their former host system. The latter is an effect of scientific social capital, which is independent of scientific human capital. Another central finding is that the impact of articles published by returnees is considerably higher than that of the average Argentinean paper. This effect wears off over time.

Planning instruments and practices in adjacent areas to the city centre: Maputo's case study

The urban population's increase is at pace with the rapid urbanisation of developing countries and the global neoliberal hegemony, a combination that reflects itself in the peri-urban expansion, densification, and the rise of social and spatial inequalities (Davis, 2006).

In Maputo, planning instruments and practices seem unable to counter the existent duality between the urbanised city centre and the peri-urban areas, semi-urbanised, where most people live. By the end of the 1980s, the opening up to the market economy is accompanied by the State's withdrawal, along with the privatisation of urban services, the appearance of an urban land market (albeit land was nationalized in early independence years) and the adoption of urban management frameworks of neoliberal inclination (Raposo, 2007). The city centre is valued and progressively rehabilitated, causing adjacent areas to be under intense real estate pressure, thus driving the urban poor away from the centre, either due to market pressure, either by choice.

In order to unpack the operative planning instruments and practices used in these adjacent areas, two paradigmatic interventions will be approached as case studies: Maxaquene and Polana Caniço. The aim is to analyse the role of the producers of space – herein understood as a product of the social and capital realms, in line with Lefebvre (1974) and Harvey (2001) – and to understand in what measure do these interventions reveal a more significant socio-spatial (in)justice.

Malaysian immigrant women in Australia: Culture, education and work

This paper is about the transnational identity practices of a group of Malaysian immigrant women working in the Australian education sector. These immigrant women negotiate cultural and occupational discourses vis-a-vis cultural politics, and work ethics within highly stratified, ethnicized and politicized Malaysian context. They also negotiate discourses in relation to migration, and work within the Australian 'western', capitalist, secular society. Contemporary immigrants from the Asian regions (eg Malaysia) are not only highly skilled and educated, they also possess cultural resources to live and work in diverse cultural spaces given the multi-ethnic and religious contexts of their home countries. The majority of these Asian immigrants come through the skill stream to Australia. However, this mobility of 'intellectual labour' is not fully tapped into given the work, social restrictions and discrimination in Australia. There are questions around aspects of social integration and the ways in which their culture, knowledge and skills from their pre-migration experiences shape their new lives post-migration. In-depth interviews focus on the ways in which these immigrant women draw on multiple cultural and educational resources in the (re)making of their identities as transnational educational workers. These women deploy essentialist definitions of binaries that are located within multiple discourses (such as Asian/Malaysian, Australian/Western, Chinese, Muslim, Indian) in coming to understand their transnational material realities as migrant educational workers. Yet at the same time, their transnational identities are located at the interplay of structure and agency.

'The U.S. is for working, Brazil is for living': Quality of life expectations for Brazilian migrants in the U.S.

Much research has examined how immigrants socioeconomically adapt to and are incorporated into their host societies, generally in the Global North. Yet, less research has explored how these immigrants perceive their quality of life in the host society relative to their home society. Furthermore, less research has explicitly examined how individuals' motivations for migrating influence migrants' expectations for their quality of life in the host country. Using data from interviews with 49 Brazilian return migrants (who migrated to the US and subsequently returned to Brazil) in Governador Valadares, Brazil, I demonstrate how respondents' quality of life expectations differed based on the country where they were residing. Respondents intended to temporarily migrate to the United States for the purpose of earning money and returning to Brazil to start a business or purchase a house. Therefore, they did not expect to have a "better" quality of life in the US.

Their perception was that life in the US was for working while "living" would occur in Brazil after returning from the US. This perception influenced many respondents' decisions to work extremely long hours in physically taxing jobs in order to have delayed gratification and relaxation once getting back to Brazil. I also discuss how the return migration was less than ideal for respondents and argue that the respondents led liminal or marginal lives due to their difficulty to readapt to life in Brazil after the US migration.

Race, migration, and the transnational racial optic

In recent years, many immigration researchers have examined how transnational migration affects gender relations, political involvement, and religious practices among immigrants in receiving societies. However, less research has explored how moving across geo-political borders can reconfigure immigrants' understandings of racial classification and relations in their host and home societies. In this paper, I develop the theoretical framework of a "transnational racial optic" to consider how immigrants to the United States negotiate race "here and there." I define the transnational racial optic as a lens which immigrants utilize to observe, interpret, and ascribe social meaning to race in the US, but also to readapt to race after temporarily or permanently returning to their countries of origin. I argue that five factors influence the strength of the transnational racial optic for migrants: (1) age of arrival to host country; (2) differences in the social construction of race in the home and host societies; (3) ethno-racial background of the migrant; (4) strength of transnational ties with home society during migration; and (5) temporary or permanent returns to the home society. The contentious history of race relations and rigidly-defined racial categories in the US is challenging for many immigrants to understand and negotiate. Thus, exposure to the US racial system provides another lens -the transnational racial optic- that transnational migrants develop to help them renegotiate racial relations in their countries of origin after the US migration. Using data from 49 interviews conducted with Brazilian return migrants (who migrated to the US and subsequently returned to Brazil) in Governador Valadares, Brazil, I illustrate how the transnational racial optic shaped these individuals' racial classifications, perceptions of racial stratification, and awareness of racism in the US and Brazil during and after the US migration.

The inclusion/exclusion-process of the foreign brides in Taiwan

This article will look at marriage migrants from Southeast Asia and China coming to Taiwan. Using mostly empirical discourse and interview data from politicians and marriage migrants, it attempts to analyze critically the social constructions of marriage migrants in Taiwan from the perspective of exclusion and inclusion.

The following points will be discussed:

1. The naming of foreign/continental brides as being a by-product of Taiwanese national identity, which is constituted in the exclusion of disqualified citizens and elements. This exclusion must happen in Taiwanese society and contributes to the formation of Taiwanese society in the full sense, paradoxically a racist identity. In this sense, foreign/continental brides are - in an excluded way - included in society.
2. That the self-naming of marriage migrants as new migrants is an effort of self-empowerment. It is reasonable that marriage migrants begin to interpret and define themselves. But on closer inspection, this new definition is still made at the collective level, though of course in a positive way. It could not distinguish one new migrant from another and is therefore not sufficient to explain the gradually apparent claim for someone to be "exclusive" as an individual in her own right.
3. Following the reflection on the categorizing, even if positively made, I will discuss the possibility of exclusive individuality. According to this idea, the focus will be placed on the exclusive individuality as unique, de-categorized.
4. Finally, this article will suggest that in addition to the idea of humanity and full citizenship "all men are created equal" (inclusive individuality), the idea of otherness "all men are created different" (lifestyle, habits of eating and so forth) should also be underlined. In so doing, a new idea of integration is proclaimed, that is, otherness is a social resource, but not a barrier that forestalls social integration.

A experiência internacional na formação de executivos de empresas transnacionais Brasileiras

A internacionalização de empresas brasileiras é um processo importante no cenário econômico da história do país, aparecendo como mais proeminente na década de 90. Essas transformações tornam-se mais dinâmicas com a criação do Mercosul, as privatizações e a abertura de mercado, causando mudanças significativas para a gestão das empresas nacionais. A competitividade torna-se maior, forçando as empresas a inovarem tecnologicamente e buscarem qualificação dos seus quadros. Nesse contexto, em que os executivos deparam-se com um novo cenário de internacionalização, as competências gerenciais a serem desenvolvidas devem estar no nível de seus novos concorrentes, assimilando conceitos e posturas multinacionais. Com o desenvolvimento econômico mundial, o profissional torna-se mais técnico e o apelo aos conhecimentos técnicos inovadores tomam mais espaço, dando abertura a capitais diferenciados. Ao sentirem esse impacto na mudança de direção no modelo de profissionalização, observam na carreira internacional uma forma de reconhecimento e de inovação para diferenciação no mercado de trabalho. A necessidade constante de aperfeiçoamento dos profissionais, impulsionados pela competitividade dentro do mercado de trabalho, influenciam não só o campo da gerências das empresas transnacionais como também o tipo de formação acadêmica e profissional dos executivos, que legitimam essas mudanças expandindo para a sociedade como um todo as transformações ocorridas, determinando os agentes que se colocam como dominantes de poder de decisão sobre os rumos da área. O estudo internacional faz-se um meio de inserção competitiva no mercado, onde a importação de conhecimento caracteriza-se como um elemento de destaque para aqueles que se pretendem uma alta posição em suas áreas. A disputa por espaço, onde se tenha evidência profissional, configura-se como uma competição em torno de controle de valores individuais, não só do mercado ou do Estado, mas de significados que atuam na direção dos modelos pretendidos.

Creating activists. How do U.S. unions try to build membership-based campaigns for collective bargaining?

In the US, labor contracts are usually only enforceable on each particular worksite. At regular intervals, local unions bring to the negotiating table their members' working conditions. Hence, negotiating labor contracts is both exceptional and usual in the local unions' life. It stresses the relations between members and union staff. I focus on strategies developed by union staff in order to get members involved in negotiation campaigns. Indeed, most union staff convoke members only at the end of the collective bargaining round for a ratification vote of the new labor contract while few of them, decide to take other paths.

Based on a one-year ethnography of one of the largest UFCW local unions, this presentation deals with a major collective bargaining campaign this local had to cope with. The local union had to negotiate a new labor contract that covered half of its membership employed at various positions by supermarket chains belonging to the same European company. This multinational recently extended its power over UFCW by acquiring non-unionized supermarket chains where organizing campaigns remained difficult to win, primarily because of the workforce's specificities. It allowed the company to be more reluctant to any conciliation in already organized workplaces. Facing this new resistance, the local re-organized the shop-steward structure, carried out a members' engagement program and even hired some members within the staff.

I will pay attention to the organizational and ideological shift that happened in this local at the end of the year 2000, with new elected officials and union staff. I will show that members' engagement program produced an ephemeral and staff-driven activism, strategically used during the campaign by some newly hired staff dedicated to this task. I will point out that staff-driven activism incrementally overshadowed the previous staff/members relationship inherited from social distance and years of servicing members.

Rethinking state capacity: A comparative study on the colonial state and the neoliberal state in Korea

This study examines a transformation of the state capacity through a comparative analysis on the Irrigation Association Project (IAP) of the colonial state in the early colonial Korea (1910-1930) and the New Town Project (NTP) of the neoliberal regimes (2002-2010) in South Korea. On a comparative-historical perspective, we could answer the following puzzles as analyzing two historical institutions: First, what are institutional efforts to consist of state capacity? Second, how does the state try to formulate institutional interactions vis-à-vis a society? Third, how can the society respond such an institutional framework? Fourth, what is a critical factor to transform state capacity?

In the early colonial Korea, the colonial state tried to achieve state's economic and political purpose by constructing efficient governance structure through the IAP. These institutional efforts were propelled by strong state capacity by producing institutionalized interactions with colonial society. Landlord class positively responded to such an incentive structure in order to maximize their economic interest. Peasants and tenants, however, were structurally excluded from the institutional framework, and they objected to being incorporated within the IAP.

In the beginning of twenty-first century, the neoliberal state initiated the NTP at the metropolitan areas for the economic stimulus and the political interest. Land and building owners and the capital sector – construction corporations and financial institutions – actively responded to such an incentive structure in order to maximize their economic interest. However, small land and building owners opposed to being incorporated this structure, and tenants were structurally excluded from this institutional framework. Particularly, the global economic crises brought a political cleavage about incentive structure among the state, the society, and the capital sector. Consequently, forces of global factors and a growing organizational capacity of the society against the NTP have overwhelmed forces of state capacity to promote the NTP.

World-historical structure and dynamics of protest waves on the global south, 1894–2010

In this research, I attempt to examine the world-historical structure and dynamics of protest waves on the global South over the twentieth century. From a world-historical perspective, we can find the process that each single protest located in different regions is linked to each other by the world-scale layer of governance structure and the incidence of popular protest is related to cyclical rhythms of the world-economy, particularly to cycles of global hegemony and rivalry. For overall mapping out world-historical pattern of protest waves, I use the New York Times Index and the Times Index to generate systemic and long-term records of popular protest.

One of the most immediately distinguishable features of the world-historical protest wave in the global South is the interrelationship between worldwide radical mobilizations and the worldwide intensification of nationalism and democratization. In the initial observations, there are found that key movement clusters of the period in overall popular protests in the global South are the year during the great resistance for national liberation and democratization in Latin America, Asia, and Africa in 1929-1937, 1958-1968 and in Asia and Eastern Europe in 1986-1990. The results show to concentrate on charting temporal and spatial diffusion of antisystemic movements across a large set of countries.

From this overview, I draw out the following questions to compare each period and location: First, why did protest activity frequently appear in 1930s, 1960s, and the late 1980s than others? Second, what were the social bases of the protest waves and where were the geographic locations of these clusters? Third, what was the main issue of each protest cluster? Fourth, what kind of movement ideology did support the mobilization? Fifth, what is the interrelationship between the current protest waves and the past protest waves?

"Opportunity of a lifetime": Paraprofessionals in New York City schools, 1967-1978

This paper examines the impact of paraprofessionals on public schools in New York City, the United Federation of Teachers (the local teachers' union), and the local communities from which the paraprofessionals themselves were drawn. Launched in 1967, the paraprofessional program sought to improve classroom education, create jobs, and enhance school-community relationships through the recruitment of local women on public assistance in New York City's "poverty areas." Hired as low-wage workers, paraprofessionals organized through the United Federation of Teachers (UFT) at a time when the UFT was deeply distrusted in their communities on account of the racially-inflected fight over "community control" of schools in 1968. Asserting their status as pedagogical employees and their right to a living wage, these women, the vast majority of whom were African-American or Latina, won sizable raises and developed a career ladder program through their contract that helped many of them to become teachers. As paraprofessionals, they also engaged their communities, working to improve relationships between parents and teachers and educating teachers on local perspectives, needs, and cultures. Running counter to the dominant narratives about the failure of community control, the limits of the War on Poverty, and the power of the conservative backlash, the paraprofessional story demonstrates the potential for a seemingly marginal group to reshape education and open municipal bureaucracies to local issues. While the paraprofessionals were not and are not a panacea, their experience suggests lessons about the ways in which education might be democratized and improved through engagement with communities.

Sistema de saúde brasileiro: Mudanças e reconfigurações (1988-2010)

A ideologia se faz presente em todos os aspectos da sociedade, inclusive na produção intelectual das ciências sociais. O objetivo desta pesquisa é investigar as questões ideológicas que colaboram para que os serviços públicos em saúde sobrevivam em condições precárias. Um eixo inicial de análise partirá dos discursos sobre a "individualização" e da "eficiência" aplicados à saúde como uma configuração ideológica que se opõe à ideia de direitos sociais. Um dos focos do trabalho está na transição do SUS, de suas origens no movimento sanitaria dos anos 1970 até o presente, analisando as origens da precarização dos serviços do SUS e o fomento à expansão do sistema de saúde complementar. A análise teórica reflete sobre o discurso da individualização, que será considerado a partir de duas vertentes: a primeira se refere à concepção tradicional, ou seja, no sentido de "individualismo metodológico", que fundamenta as estratégias de mecanismos de mercado na prestação de serviços públicos; a segunda corresponde à tese da individualização institucionalizada, como proposta por Ulrich Beck e Elisabeth Beck-Gernheim. Ainda há muito a fazer para que o sistema de saúde brasileiro se torne universal. Nos últimos vinte anos houve muitos avanços, como investimento em recursos humanos, em ciência e tecnologia e na atenção básica, além de um grande processo de descentralização, ampla participação social e maior conscientização sobre o direito à saúde. No contexto atual, as relações entre o SUS e a saúde suplementar, provocam desafios para o futuro do sistema universal.

The politics of 'reform' of migrant labour regulation in the Middle East

In this historical period of the "Arab Spring", there is increasing pressure from NGOs and human rights activists not only for improving the democratic rights and conditions of citizens, but also those of non-citizens such as unskilled migrant workers, who in some Gulf countries far outnumber nationals in their populations and workforces. The paper highlights attempts at contract and legislative reform in Lebanon, Jordan, Bahrain and Qatar and looks specifically at two examples of proposed reform of the kafala migrant sponsorship system – in Lebanon with regard to female migrant domestic workers; and in Qatar with regard to male workers in the construction sector. It is argued that despite evidence of political will to introduce reforms that are consistent with international labour standards and conventions, the core elements of the kafala system remain that ensures a lack of freedom and the vulnerability of migrant workers to abuse, exploitation and trafficking.

Comparative urban housing market neoliberalization – A methodological framework

For some three decades neoliberalism has dominated housing policy discourse and formulation across advanced capitalist societies. In recent years, particularly urban housing markets have become central to market-based reforms. Initially, theories of housing neoliberalization have been developed mainly in the North-American and UK context. But over the last years a growing body of work focusing on the continental European and Asian experience has become available. However, studies that deal with housing policy change at the level of cities and systematically compare reforms across diverse political, geographical and cultural contexts have so far been rare. As a result, to date, little is known about contextual differences in form and effects of marketization across cities. This paper presents a methodological framework to investigate market-based housing reforms in a comparative manner. Housing marketization thereby is understood as a general feature of contemporary urban development, which however takes path-dependent, locally-specific forms in different contexts. The applicability of the proposed framework is demonstrated with a case study of reform experiences in three world cities located on different continents, New York, Amsterdam, and Tokyo. Main argument of the paper is that a comparative perspective on urban housing market neoliberalization is urgently needed to shed light on the context-contingent forms of market-based policy changes that transform cities across (advanced capitalist) societies in the contemporary period.

Beyond the distinction between 'music' and 'noise': Representing sounds

Hearing is an unprotected sense. While one can choose what to see, to touch, and in many instances, what to smell, only 'technology' can screen out sounds. This does not imply that the interpretation of sounds or their representation is unambiguous. During the last century, sound recordings have been used, among others, to classify sounds mathematically, measure physiological reactions, trace the distribution of sounds in language, or investigate them as evidence of types of interaction and of psychological states. In the realm of aesthetics, grasped as a unique domain, sounds are researched in comparative musicology, while the use of 'natural' sounds in and as music is also extensively discussed. In sociology sounds can be seen as a channel for mapping performances of everyday life shaped by hegemonic social structures,^[i] that impose taken-for-granted reality through the control of sound configurations. Relating to the variety of approaches to studying sound, Potamitis and Ganchev^[ii] state that the differentiation of frameworks for analyzing sounds undermines scientific understanding. They conclude that 'there is much space for knowledge transfer between the different subfields of sound classification, which seem to evolve independently ...'. Knowledge transfer can begin with representation. Once the cognitive barriers between 'music' and 'noise' are removed, it is possible to see that categories deployed in musical performance can represent sounds of all kinds, and provide the ground for comparison across 'subfields'. Illustrations from kindergarten ethnographies shed light on the potential of such analyses.

University level educational policy in economic crisis : Observations and interpretations by Albanian immigrant university students

Our study looks at Albanian university students in Greece reacting to the aftermath of the recent higher education reform after the removal of official and unofficial immigrant student support systems. A research, interviews and questionnaires were conducted in order to bring to light general tendencies and special issues.

More specifically, we describe economic crisis dictated measures taken by universities and their impact on immigrant students as perceived by them. Specific measures: a. Teaching personnel reduction ,b. Scientific paper distribution reduction, c. Library financing reduction, and d. special benefit reductions, against the backdrop of prevailing economic circumstances that recast higher education operational cost management and reconsiders the investment return value of education in terms of future professional accomplishment and its expected socioeconomic concomitant of high status.

We note the sample students' interpretation of the step by step defoliation of the substitution of even an imperfect educational provider by a cost minded redesigned and operationally restructured educational model. The rising rate of their successful access to higher education in connection with the overall Albanian family upper mobility and professional placement in the host country is juxtaposed with the phase of instability that undermines at present their very status as immigrants. As University serves as a minimal educator spring board to further basic training of the lower strata to be channeled to a lifelong ever variable market determined educational process, immigrant students stand out as destined to exclusion on account of their immigrant identity, in addition to being excluded in terms of class along with the rest of socially and economically downtrodden humanity.

The point in question is the silent contribution to vertical social discrimination in times of economic crisis that legitimates the political system and further limits the already limited educational privileges accorded to immigrants within the framework or civil rights.

Entre la xenofobia y el derecho a una vivienda digna

Este trabajo problematiza la forma de emergencia del derecho a migrar y el derecho a una vivienda digna en el marco de los conflictos, reivindicaciones o problemáticas contemporáneos en torno al acceso a la tierra y al hábitat.

Un primer objetivo es discutir la potencialidad –política- del "derecho a la ciudad" para canalizar las demandas de los sectores afectados, así como la productividad –teórica- de estudiar los fenómenos de desigualdad espacial, segregación residencial y la espacialización de la pobreza urbana desde las propuestas conceptuales acerca del "derecho a la ciudad".

En segundo lugar, se brindarán elementos de análisis para contrastar y comparar casos concretos de manifestación de conflictos por la tierra y la vivienda en dos ciudades argentinas de tendencia y consolidación urbanas diferentes (Ciudad de Buenos Aires y la Ciudad de Puerto Madryn, Chubut) en relación a dos ejes relacionados: i) la naturaleza de las operatorias discursivas xenófobas y racializantes, que se manifiestan a través de la "extranjerización" de los actores y de una interpretación de la cuestión social-habitacional como un problema migratorio; ii) la consolidación de la incidencia espacial de la lógica inmobiliaria (junto a la creciente mercantilización de las relaciones y los espacios públicos) y la interacción/asociación de las instituciones y agencias estatales con el mercado para la definición de la forma urbana y de los contornos de las nuevas desigualdades espaciales.

Racialización y migrantes limítrofes, hacia una lectura del lugar del inmigrante en la ciudad de Puerto Madryn

En la Argentina no se suele considerar a la raza como una categoría importante a la hora de analizar formas de jerarquización sociales. Sin embargo, a la luz de la revisión histórica que significó la aparición pública de colectivos como los pueblos indígenas y los afrodescendientes se ha puesto en duda la narración de la nación según la cual Argentina era la más europea de América Latina. Al poner en duda el modelo de "crisol de razas" que excluía de la nación a estos colectivos, se empiezan a vislumbrar distintas formas de imbricación entre clase, género, etnia y, de a poco, se comienza a poner en cuestión el lugar de la raza en este entramado de formas de jerarquización social. En este proceso, resulta de particular interés el lugar del inmigrante limítrofe, que ha adquirido una creciente visibilidad en los últimos veinte años.

El presente trabajo indagará en el lugar del inmigrante limítrofe en la historia argentina, y buscará comprender cómo leer las marcas de su hipervisibilidad actual en nuestra sociedad, a la vez que explorar en los sentidos que cobra esta dimensión en una ciudad pequeña pero de importante crecimiento demográfico relativo de la Patagonia argentina como es Puerto Madryn, en la Provincia de Chubut, para finalmente analizar la extranjerización que se hace de sectores populares protagonistas de conflicto sociales en términos de racialización o etnicización.

Interaction between public policy and social capital: Child-care policy and birth rate

This exploratory empirical study examines whether municipal policy for child care (i.e. institutional environment) enhances or counteracts the effect of its residents' support network size (i.e. social capital embedded in network) on the expected number of their children. Residents living in four purposive sampled municipalities with progressive child-care policies (n=321) and those in four random sampled ordinary municipalities (n=310) in Nagano prefecture completed surveys about satisfaction with their municipal policies, support network size, and the number of their children. Descriptive statistics shows that the level of satisfaction with child-care policies, such as consulting service for child bearing/rearing and financial support for public education, is higher with residents of progressive municipalities than those of ordinary ones. An OLS regression of the number of children to progressive municipality dummy, support network size, and the interaction term of both of them controlled by age indicates that the interaction of municipality and network size has significantly negative effect on the number of children. This means that institutional environment (public policy) could diminish the necessity of social capital embedded in network for one's life chance.

School and political conscience. Representations of the young people on the inequality and the exclusion

Young people historically have been crossed by his condition of subalternity. A testing for our social history demonstrates that the student mobilizations simultaneously that have helped to generate social own conscience have paid a high cost in young blood. There is a two faced argument about young people: they are the promise of the future as well as violent criminals who threaten "social peace". The extensive fear to which the young people commit homicides does not condice with the facts and statistics but it does prevail as axis to justify the social view of dangerousness. There a social-speech sublies which tries to be imposed as truth establishing a sense of the doxa: the image of the secondary juvenile thing since delinquent has deep roots in our social counterfoil. In this work, on the one hand I will support the need and the relevancy of historicizing the social look, enclosing racism, who has constructed respect of the young people themselves, as social category, which is reinforced in contexts of strong differentiation and inequality. At the same time, I will detain in the analysis of a series of results of groups interviews made to students of secondary education of the province of Buenos Aires, in Argentina, which allow to understand the dynamic social cause of the stigmatization and the exclusion and to interpret the symbolic effects on the auto-stigmatization and auto-exclusion of the young people. I will contribute a series of dimensions to think about the political formation in the school life from the subjective experiences of the consulted young people.

Same past, different narrations

The presentation is based on the PhD project dealing with remembrance of 1980 military coup d'état in Turkey. On 12th of September 1980 in regard to stop increasing opposition of left movement, military realized a coup in Turkey. Hundreds of rebellions were executed, thousands were tortured in military prisons, many were arrested for years and many took refuge in European countries. The research aims to understand how the same past of military coup d'état is being reconstructed by victims of military coup d'état who continued to live in Turkey and exiles who moved in Germany. Within last two years I conducted 18 interviews in Germany and Turkey with the 'victims' who are still active in political movements. Additionally I participated in different activities on September the 12th of different political organizations. These commemorations give me the possibility of locating biographical narratives within the collectivity which at the end will help to analyze the collective memory of the rebellions. The research, shows that, as argued by Halbwachs' theory of collective memory and remembrance practices, individuals tend to remember the past within surroundings of their present needs and beliefs. Besides these multiplicity and differences in remembering process (or in opposite mostly similarities) the other important finding of this research which should be emphasized is the remembrance of exiles in Germany. Exiles have experienced both violence of September the 12th and the phenomenon of being asylum seeker. We may assume that their memories of military coup d'état would be even stronger since it is one of the basic reason of their migration and so to say part of their identity as refugees. I will try to discuss in my presentation how memory is being reconstructed by individuals and groups to meet the needs of present in the case of September the 12th.

Public sculptures and ceremonial behaviors in the public sphere: Cyprus as a case study

Cyprus is an exemplary case of emotionally and historically charged site. The sculptures situated in its public spaces preserve a strong visual narrative element and militaristic character and reflect to a high degree social notions and political behaviors. The vision alongside the wording, in the form of slogans or identity data, obtain a complementary role in these monuments and shape a complex, multi-layer ideological construction strengthening the collective memory in the internal of the social body.

Public sculptures have a dual function as they build cohesions both between general and individual concepts based on the interpretation of their iconographic and symbolic components. These cohesions nourish ceremonial behaviors and become part of society's cultural structure: they intervene in the everyday life shaping ethical codes and imposing distorted approaches of reality. It is interesting to note that the element of visual narration is dominant on the Cypriot flag too, drawing the attention to the past heroic sacrifices of the country and, thus, identifying the Cypriot nation to a heroic pattern altogether. The sacred dead heroes create sacred territories, real or imaginary at the same time, and become the fertile soil for intervention and reaction against the 'other' which is differentiated to the 'us'.

In the above context, artworks are deprived from any aesthetic quest. They become merely the means through which emotion, focused on the grief of the heroic sacrifice, the innocence of the victim and lamenting, is expressed. A comparative study of the island's public sculpture proves that modern sculptures are extremely rare and usually make part of the outdoors premises of private entities.

Being deliberative and analytic in environmental policy contexts – An analysis of effectiveness of scientific advice in environmental assessments and management

There is great demand in environmental policy contexts to improve the simultaneous use of analytical tools and deliberative processes needed for good environmental decision making. Due to high degree of complexity, uncertainty and ambiguity in many areas of environmental policy, a combination of thorough analysis and informed deliberation is clearly useful and important for management and policy formulation. In the best cases, there are innovative interdisciplinarity and transacademic collaboration in the process, and scientists and analysts in these cases can be seen as 'honest brokers' showing or opening up different views and policy options, or in the worst cases, they end up to closing down issues, and using 'black box' methodology which nobody can understand. This paper discusses theoretical, methodological and empirical challenges applying analytic-deliberative approaches, especially interactive decision analytic approaches, in cases of natural resource governance and impact assessment. It evaluates what additional value this kind of framework can bring to environmental management and assessments. This evaluation is based on the concept of assessment effectiveness. According to that idea assessments and scientific advice is most likely to be effective in influencing decision making to public issues to the extent that they are perceived by their audience and relevant stakeholders as demonstrating credibility (expertise; scientific credentials of assessment), salience (relevancy of assessment; addresses key problems) and legitimacy (assessment perceived as fair).

Occupational choice for personal vs. public benefit: Comparison of Soviet and post-Soviet youth cohorts

Increase of population education level is supposed to be tightly related with economy growth, increase of wealth, and decrease of poverty and unemployment. After the restoration of independence in Latvia in 1991, a constantly increasing number of students in higher education and graduates broke into the labour market. At the same time, the transition to market economy fostered inequalities: rapid stratification based on wealth, and spreading poverty. In the paper we approach these contradictions through cross-generational comparison of young people's transition from education to employment, their occupational choices, and effects of education on further life-paths. Analysis is based on the data from representative national youth surveys carried out between 1970 and 2011.

Just 25 years ago, upon graduating from secondary school there were only two options provided for young people: to start employment, or to move towards a higher education diploma. Each kind of secondary education came with rigid programme and corresponding type of career path. At the time, close links between education levels, corresponding economy sectors, and assignments of work places, kept education system and labour market synchronised; thus, transition from education to employment was clear and foreseeable.

The following decades released all forms of higher education from imposed limitations and stimulated development, which led to the growth of student cohorts.

The present day young people's career values are powered by requirements of well-paid positions and progressive career opportunities. However, regardless of labour market demand, school graduates' actual choices still show dominance of social, law and business disciplines. Then, transition from education to labour market puts graduates face-to-face with other reality: unemployment, uncertainty, job insecurity in long term, low pay that often doesn't correspond to education level — these are just few of risk factors that threaten youth inclusion into labour market nowadays.

Socio-cultural dynamics of institutions among the Sugalis of South India

As south Asia is hub of under-privileged communities, it is very crucial to understand their institutions and its effects on their lives and livelihoods. Despite of geographical limitations and introduction of Panchayati Raj Institutions (PRI's), these communities have retained traditional institutions with lot of fervor. These institutions play crucial role in the maintenance of community well-being and social relations between them and in and outside of the community. It is clearly evident from the different studies that the institutions such as family, marriage and kinship and inter-relationships among them resulted shifts and turns but maintain its traditional functions. Though there is outside cultural and social influences, these institutions still got prominence among the Sugalis lives and livelihoods. This is clearly evident from the Sugalis of south India. The present paper tries to bring out these shifts and turns of socio-cultural dynamics prevailed among Sugalis and also the changing nature of these institutions due to the influx of outside culture. The present paper draws its inferences from the data gathered from the empirical study among the Sugalis of south India.

Exploring the goals of older people with high support needs in the UK: Does their consumption match their aspirations?

Much has been written by policy makers, think tanks, practitioners, gerontologists and others about the importance of involving older people in determining what they need in order to function in the ways that they choose. As part of a larger programme entitled The 'Better Life' programme funded by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation in the UK, this study (Katz et al 2011) explored the views of a diverse group of 25 older people with high support needs including those with differing lifestyles, past experiences, ethnic and cultural backgrounds, financial and other resources, family and network composition, education. These individuals might face additional challenges resulting from complex health conditions as well as discrimination.

This study which took place across the countries of the UK focused on (a) ascertaining whether previously unresearched older (and some younger) people with high support needs (PHSN) would validate values identified in the few prior studies undertaken, and (b) enabling participants to describe their specific needs and express freely their own aspirations. This paper describes the contexts in which these questions can be asked through identifying some of the challenges of interviewing people from different backgrounds, with varying degrees of literacy and with a wide range of high support needs, including severe communication or sensory difficulties. The Facets of Life Wheel (Peace, Holland and Kellaher, 2006) was adapted for this purpose and interviews were video and/or audio recorded.

This paper will present findings from this diverse group of people with high support needs including issues about service provision, information, finance and biographical factors, to explore individual participants' experiences of accessing, and of failing to access, goods and services that they maintain could enhance their quality of life. Age discrimination and human rights are central to this discussion.

Understanding informal carers' decision-making in choosing a care home for a person with dementia in hospital

This paper describes findings from a recently completed two-phase study undertaken in the UK by a multi-disciplinary research team. The first phase of the study consisted of an on-ward semi-structured interview with the person with dementia (PWD) if they were assessed as able to respond, and with a family member self-identified as involved in their care at that stage.

111 pairs of PWD/carers were recruited from patients referred to a specialist psychiatric liaison service in two general hospitals in England. Data was also obtained about quality of life (QoL-AD and EQ5-D0), severity of dementia (MMSE), carer stress (GHQ), activities of daily living (I-ADL) physical illness and depressive symptoms (GDS), and economic data on care services and resources. Where possible these measures were repeated at six months and at twelve months after baseline.

In the second phase of the study we identified a sub-set of 15 PWD due to move into a care home on discharge. With their carers they participated in an in-depth qualitative study of their experiences pre, during and post hospital admission and the transition to care home living. This paper presents themes identified in the second phase of the study, incorporating relevant data from the first phase.

Family carers described how they came to the conclusion that discharge to a care home was in the best interests of all parties. The paper explores their feelings of guilt, remorse and responsibility for the PWD and their hopes about the Home's capacity for improving the QoL of the PWD. It presents their criteria for choosing a care home and the extent to which expectations were met. Their reflections following admission to the care home are also discussed.

Public- Private and beyond: Looking towards new meanings of public space

Kulwinder KAUR, Department of Sociology, Jamia Millia Islamia Central University, New Delhi. E-mail: kulwinder10@gmail.com

The discourse about "the end of public space" and the "right to the city" that has dominated urban social theory for the past few decades is largely derived from the neoliberal experience of Northern cities of the globe. On the contrary, the same theory neglected to focus on the public spaces in the southern cities by arguing the absence of public/private dichotomy in these cities. For example, it is common to find the actions which we club in the realm of 'private' such as defecating, bathing, cooking, physical intimacy, so much so as giving birth, are routinely carried out in the open spaces in cities across South Asia. However, to dismiss it as a cultural trait and to conclude it as an absence of the public-private sensibilities in a vast section of world's urban population may obstruct the way we re-imagine the meanings, forms, and functions of public space. The deterministic views have tended to perpetuate stereotypes of urban public space in the North as being privatized and that in the South as being democratic, open and inclusive. While the observations of public spaces across the globe show juxtaposing trends which pose a threat to our very understanding of the concept of "public space". Based on my research and empirical observation of a vast variety of urban spaces of city of New Delhi, I want to argue in this paper about a need to transcend the comforting bipolarities of inclusive/exclusive and public/private.

Rupturing aesthetics from order: New challenges for inclusive urban design

If ever there could be any remotest acknowledgement of the tussle between 'right to beauty' and the 'right to the city', beauty would have lost even before the contest began. It was no contest at all as the right to livelihood is a more basic human right compared to the right to live aesthetically. Besides, there was the problem of subjectivity in the aesthetics of urban design. The 'utopias' were charged with being the instruments of creating 'order' as the so called 'lack of order' was celebrated by post-structuralists. What appeared as chaos was 'the dance of humanity' to others. In such a scenario, if anyone dared to resurrect aesthetics, it was at one's own peril. By labelling aesthetics as an elitist concern, however, sociology ignored one of the crucial dimension of urban environments, i.e. design.

However, empirical evidence suggests that the 'spatial tactics' can turn into hegemonic practices of gang wars, crime and street violence leading to new forms of 'habitus'. The neoliberal urban design, too, leaves dark shadows beneath the glitter and the 'spectacle'. It becomes a challenge for urban designers to create aesthetic and inclusive cities. The city of New Delhi experienced an aestheticization drive in preparation for Commonwealth Games, 2010 and in the process millions of city dwellers lost their 'right to the city'. Some of them were re-located on the urban peripheries under the social housing schemes of the central government. One such group housing location was Bhawana on the North-West border of the city. This paper would address the above issues in the context of housing needs of the urban poor in India.

Cultural engagement and global creative cities: Singapore, Shanghai and Tokyo cases

I would like to present cultural engagement in Asian Context, particularly focused in the following two points. One is taken in Singapore case and I would deal with the detail content developed during these 20 years. It is very interesting case, because Singapore government has successfully accomplish the cultural institutions. Of course there have been some intensions between government and Singaporean people. I introduce the concrete cases and analyze them. During 20 years Singapore government considerably planned and systematically managed some artistic areas including artistic participation, art education, artistic outreach activities. And it will be included a famous ethnic public policy in Singapore. I would trace the historical transformation and analyze the sociological meanings. Second I would compare with other typical Asian cases. Particularly I would take both Shanghai and Tokyo. Both cities are global creative cities just the same as Singapore. Of course each city have had its original history and have making its unique type by itself. But there exist Asian Share-ness among the three cases. Mainly I would point out the relationship between national/city government and people. If possible, through the session I would like to compare south America's cases and discuss with them.

Cinema as a visual tool for immigrants' welfare

At least one of the sessions in any international meeting of sociology is reserved for the matters of immigration and immigrants. It is clear that immigration and immigrants are among the fundamental practices and facts inherited from the oldest periods of the history of mankind. We know that there are reasons for this practice and fact to continue to exist and that various studies have been made on them. In this study, not those reasons but the subject of cinema will be discussed as one of the means which have effects on the process of gaining a place in the new homeland by the immigrants. The artistic field of cinema will be examined as a means for telling various sentimentalities through aestheticization.

The fact of immigration and immigrants is a highly abundant resource for cinema. Cinema can function as a former of perceptions about immigrant groups who are in need of gaining a place within the already established society. In this sense, the sponsors of the relevant genre are also critical. The Turkish immigrants in Germany have been the subjects of various movies. The theme of that type of movies is mostly the personal dilemmas of individuals who, because of their cultural background, can not attune themselves to the existing social practices in the immigrated country. Whereas, in their motherland, they are portrayed as people who have alienated themselves to their original culture. The message is clear on either side: they can not manage to be happy wherever you choose to stay.

Does cinema really have a potential to be utilized as a means to overcome the existing problems and ostracism in immigrated societies? How can cinematic immigrant representations provide us with opinions about the processes of social equity and democratization in the immigrated society?

Autochthonous languages of Siberia as our national heritage, which might be lost

The value of cultural and linguistic diversity is now widely acknowledged, as well as the fact that in the modern world this diversity is seriously endangered. In my paper I am going to speak about autochthonous languages of Siberia forming the linguistic diversity of this territory. Practically all Siberia is the area of language contacts, but it is the contact with Russian, the state language, which dominates practically in all official and quite often also in unofficial communicative spheres. As a result, the situation of language shift is today quite common for autochthonous communities. I am going to approach the issue regarding autochthonous Siberian languages not as the heritage of respective ethnic communities (which they undoubtedly are), but as the national heritage, which should not be wasted. Doing my fieldwork in autochthonous linguistic communities, I sometimes feel present among linguistic ruins. Can it be helped? As it was put by Pierre Bourdieu, language market dictates its rules. The prejudice that to learn the language of the majority, which gives access to education, professional career and prosperity, is only possible abandoning the ancestral language is still wide-spread both inside and outside ethnic minority groups, it is wide-spread in different social strata including educational authorities. The first thing to be done to support autochthonous languages is to overcome the prejudice. Advertising the advantages of multilingualism could be most helpful. It is being done quite successful in some European countries, but is not in practice in Russia. In this context the globalization and network society could be helpful.

Everyday anti-blackness and anti-racism in contemporary France

How do French people who self-identify and are identified as Black in contemporary France struggle against and are complicit with the mis-recognized and unacknowledged ways that racism and discrimination are interwoven in their everyday lives? How do they prove the existence of such violence and cope with the damage that it wrecks on them as Black people when French law prohibits the collection of ethno-racial statistics to study these issues, a ban also supported by groups discriminated against? To self-understand as French and Black is to exist in a state of contradiction with France's powerful discourse of indivisibility or non-distinction of its citizenry, particularly in terms of race. The French Republican model relies fundamentally on seductive fictions of universalism (masking a hegemonic uniformity) and race-blindness (euphemized as color-blindness) that interpellate as they insist on undifferentiated inclusion. And yet, the implicit frame of reference of that very model remains prima facie and in practice normatively white. In short, ethno-racialized French people are intrinsically rendered invisible in this model and along with them their claims of anti-blackness as French people, especially anti-blackness in its everyday, less explicit forms. This paper explores not only the under-analyzed realities of anti-blackness in contemporary France but also how "French Blacks" strategically and pragmatically engage in anti-racism struggles, all with a distinctively French cast.

Examining the role of governance structures in the planning of health reform

Internationally, a meshing of top-down and bottom-up approaches to policy development has been viewed as the most effective way to address social inequalities. The governance structures underpinning such interventions are critical to their success or failure and yet are rarely studied. We use social network analysis to understand the role of committee structures in planning reform and the role of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people in those processes.

Methods Data about governance structures and their interrelationships was obtained through document review and interview. UCINET was used to graph and analyse the network data. Connectivity and in-degree centrality were analysed to identify the power of participants to enact system change in each of the networks.

Results The results suggest that governance structures are important in shaping relationships between participating organisations. Peak bodies for Aboriginal organisations, National and State governments are all central players in planning. The shift to regional planning processes has led to an increase in the number of organisations involved in planning. This increase is exponentially greater for mainstream organisations than Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander organisations. Differences in the governance structures used to join regional planning with higher level planning have a significant impact on the density of the network structures.

Conclusions Australia has entered a period of unprecedented reform in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health. This study highlights the challenges facing Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander organisations in regional planning structures and the types of governance structures that support better connectedness.

Artisanal work and production in the contemporary society: Realities, changes and challenges

This paper to make a theoretical and empirical analysis on the new configurations of the artisanal work and production in their embeddedness in the contemporary economy and society, particularly in the handicraft value chain. This paper investigates the artisanal work and production, your conditions and organizational forms and the embeddedness of artisanal work in the networks of socio economics and institutional relations and their immersion in cultural and natural environment. The social investigation of artisanal work and production groups arises as important theme because the handicraft is a traditional activity as well present in the contemporary society. The investigation uses qualitative research methodology through the case study of the artisans who use as raw material the fiber of buriti associated in the Cooperative of Artisans of Lençóis Maranhenses (Artecoop) in the Cities of Barreirinhas - State of Maranhão - Brazil. Makes a triangulation of case study with documental research, direct observation in the field work and the use of semi structured interview. An important question is the investigation of the artisanal work organization on cooperatives and association and how your products flows at handicrafts value chain. Evidence of research show a socioeconomic reality where predominates the precarious and informal work performed at home. The organizations of craftswomen are embedded in networks both of cooperation as of competition, subordination and dependency. This investigations are relevant for describes the new configurations of artisanal work and production immersed in the contemporary society.

Reframing gender class and retirement rights in Vietnam

Some argue that a rights-based approach to development is appropriate in contexts where gender-based discrimination, unequal pay, high levels of violence and continued exclusion from political arenas marginalize women as workers and citizens. However, others suggest that rights-based claims for women may find little resonance in local contexts, and be resisted as a donor-led fad or inappropriate to local contexts. Human rights frames have been found in some cases to depoliticize movement organizing around recognition or redistribution claims to social justice. There is increasing evidence that processes of knowledge production can have a circular effect so that activists engaged in "rights talk" may end up speaking more with each other and neglect the people they claim to represent. Using the case of an unusually public retirement rights debate in Vietnam, this paper considers what happens when women's rights that are discursively framed in neoliberal human rights terms, enter the public sphere, and come into tension with national ideals that privilege women's citizenship obligations as necessarily conjoined with their roles as wives and mothers. I specifically employ a political project framework to examine how "women's rights are human rights" frames are engaged, by whom and for what purposes during these debates and to make visible how gender, generation and class intersect and continue to complicate opportunities for transnational feminist organizing around issues of gender equality and work-life policies.

Growing up after the GFC: Untimely re-imaginings of identity, democracy and enterprise

The Global Financial Crisis has had a range of consequences, some of which, in some settings, may unfold for generations to come. So-called sovereign debt crises in Eurozone economies, the US, the UK and elsewhere, and the implementation of government austerity programs represents a successful framing of responses to the downstream effects of the GFC as being principally about State debt levels. In this discourse those that depend most on State provided payments and programs will be the ones to carry the greatest burden as governments implement austerity programs.

Today's young people, and the generations who will follow and grow up in the unfolding aftermath of the GFC, will carry a particularly heavy burden in terms of changed education and employment opportunities; physical and mental health and well-being; consumption, housing, relationship and parenting aspirations; and a sense of self in relation to the possibilities of participation in the liberal democracies. Drawing on the work of C W Mills, Foucault and Bauman this presentation will sketch a critical research agenda for the challenges coming generations will face. This agenda will be framed by an untimely re-imagining of the possible relationships between the following key concepts, and the ways in which they re-configure understandings of generation: Identity: the ways in which young people develop and perform a sense of self on an ongoing basis in their relationships and interactions with others, and with an array of institutions and systems that structure their daily lives: Democracy: A way of understanding forms of human relationships, governance and participation in complex, globalised settings characterised by competing ideas about freedom, choice, the life-course, regulation and government: Enterprise: An idea – often too narrowly conceived in terms of individualised, market based economic activity and practice – that carries contested understandings of autonomy, aspiration, learning, development and obligations.

Doing "biographical fieldwork". Combining ethnographic field research with biographical analysis

Ethnographic fieldwork is a strong research method in qualitative research – as for example in case studies on mobility and migration. In this research field the method of multi-sited ethnography by George Marcus is rather prominent. Researchers follow their migrants to different contexts of settlement mainly focusing on different forms of practice. Migrants' access to different forms of networks and their life-strategies during the migration process seem to be of special interest. However, referring exclusively to ethnographic material, the specific meaning of migration experiences does oftentimes not come to the fore.

On the basis of longitudinal ethnographic fieldwork combined with a biographical approach I would like point out in my presentation in how far both concepts could profit from each other – being aware that each approach has its own research focus and perspective.

Wal-Mart and transnational union solidarity in the South African competition tribunal process

The merger of Wal-mart with the South African listed company Massmart set headlines buzzing for most of 2011 in South Africa. This deal is to be the first major entry of a foreign multinational into South Africa's dominant food retail sector, and the first effort by the world's largest retail employer Wal-Mart to gain a foothold in Africa. This paper considers the role of the Global Union UNI and support by the US based United Food and Commercial Workers (UFCW) in the Competition Tribunal and Appeal processes in South Africa. Through interviews and participant observation, this paper examines the role of global union solidarity and local activists in conditioning the terms of capital mobility and accumulation and in influencing state actors. It seeks to problematise the prescriptive literature on 'new labour internationalism' by examining the motivations and contradictions of multiple players in the process. By doing so, it unpacks a core contradiction in the aims of a global campaign against Wal-Mart, one that will surface more widely as Wal-Mart continues to enter more countries in the Global South, that between labour rights and 'development'.

Es kommt net raus – El papel de las redes en la manutención lingüística y en la construcción de las identidades

El mito de que en Brasil se habla sólo una lengua siempre estuvo relacionado en las más variadas instancias, y en especial en la educación y en la política. Sin embargo, se sabe que se habla sobre 200 lenguas en el país: son alrededor de 170 lenguas indígenas y 30 relacionadas a contextos de inmigración y de frontera, además de las variedades desprestigiadas del portugués. En Río Grande del Sur, hay diversos contextos de contacto lingüístico – de frontera y de inmigración. En este trabajo, damos relieve a uno de esos contextos de contacto lingüístico. Se trata de un pueblo situado al pie de la sierra gaucha, con alrededor de 6.000 habitantes, cuya población, en su mayoría, es bilingüe en portugués y Hunsrückisch, una variedad desprestigiada del alemán. ¿Pero cómo es posible que con más de 190 años de inmigración en esta región la mayoría de la población aún tenga el Hunsrückisch como lengua materna? El objetivo de este trabajo es de analizar el papel de las redes sociales en el proceso de manutención o sustitución de la lengua materna minoritaria y las cuestiones de identidad que se desarrollan de ello. Las redes sociales (MILROY, 1987) representan los grados de contacto entre individuos que se relacionan informalmente, mediante dos propiedades – densidad y multiplicidad – de las cuales resultan redes sociales densas y múltiples y redes flojas y con poca multiplicidad. El relativo abandono por la que la comunidad estuvo sometida hasta hace poco tiempo parece haber contribuido para su organización multiplex, lo que contribuye para la manutención lingüística. Aunque con la creciente urbanización, acceso a los medios de comunicación, televisión, teléfono e internet, esa realidad tiende a cambiar, transformando la cultura eminentemente rural en urbana, lo que tendrá fuertes impactos también en la lengua.

How do economic downturns affect gender inequality within work-arrangements? A comparison of Swiss regions

The world is still facing the consequences of the financial crisis in 2008, e.g. rising unemployment, rising national debts, a slowdown of wage growth as well as rising social inequality. In this paper we focus on the consequences of economic downturns on the gender-specific distribution of paid and unpaid work in Switzerland. There have been three economic downturns in the last 20 years, measured with the annual change of the GDP. As Switzerland is strongly marked by its federalism, we hypothesise that the economic downturns affect cantonal economies and policies and therefore cantonal gender inequality to varying degrees. By using data from the Swiss Labour Force Survey, we analyse regional variations in Switzerland within and between the work spheres, based on indicators regarding gender inequality.

In terms of the economy, we expect cantons with e.g. a strong services sector to be much more affected than those with a strong industrial or rural sector. In terms of the political system, we expect conservative cantons to have a stronger rise in gender inequality than progressive ones. Moreover, in terms of welfare regimes, in liberal cantons, the impact of the financial crisis may be worse than in conservative or social-democratic cantons due to a different degree of de-commodification. Furthermore, the impact of the economic downturns also varies over time. We assume that the downturn of the 90s had much less influence on the volume of paid work of men compared to women than it had in the rise of the downturn beginning 2008. All in all, we expect major changes within the cantons in terms of shifts between paid and unpaid work. The degree of transformation and the differences between men and women depend on the political, economic and cultural framework of the respective cantons.

University of KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa

There is wide agreement that field trips offer students benefits to learn in an informal environment as they help them to visualize concepts introduced in class laying the foundation for a deeper understanding of the discipline. In the merged university of KwaZulu-Natal, after a long absence of teaching sociology through field trips due to serious political violence raising safety and security concerns, this approach to learning was re-introduced in 2007. This presentation takes the form of visual representation of level three sociology students from diverse racial and socio-economic backgrounds on their experiences in high risk research localities which are often avoided by many field researchers. The visual presentation captures the sociological experiences of students who under normal circumstances would not have visited such localities anywhere in South Africa due to the social construction of such spaces as a haven for a myriad number of problems making it out of bounds for locals. Given the racial inequalities in South Africa, such localities are often labeled dangerous spaces for ordinary citizens. Students' experiences after their field trip attest to how their understanding of such spaces was reshaped from it being portrayed as zones of human misery to the prospect of researching and studying a large section of the South African populace who are structural victims of poverty and inequality. The visual presentation illustrates how the sociological imagination of undergraduate students are captured through field trip training and can serve as a hallmark to renew and sustain the training of future sociologists in a rapidly transforming and challenging post apartheid context..

RC35-136.3KHARLAMOV, Nikita (National Research University-Higher School of Economics, nkharlamov@clarku.edu)Hybrid subjectivity and understanding of social action: On the phenomenology of ambivalence

Much of the history of sociological theory is rooted in the metaphor of culture as a bounded, well-defined whole, which serves as the ultimate frame of reference for everything social. In particular (as epitomized by Parsonian theory), social actions have, as their final source of reference, the system of norms and values characteristic of a particular culture. As Billig and Urry have shown, such a conception is firmly grounded in the post-Westphalian political concept of nation-state. Abandonment of this nationalist and colonialist discourse forces us to depart from what Bhabha characterized as "our sense of the historical identity of culture as a homogenizing, unifying force, authenticated by the originary Past, kept alive in the national tradition of the People". Indeed, in a world of hypermobility and hyperconnectivity many people are immersed in multitudes of ambivalent cultural patterns and social norms on a daily basis, as well as over life course. In these conditions we can no longer refer to the monolithic, solid, bounded notion of culture as a source of values and symbols, or society as a source of norms, in our understanding of social action. I revisit the Weberian categories of action and Bourdieu's notion of habitus through the lens of hybridity and marginality, and in light of dynamic co-development of personal and collective culture. I question the basic metaphor of culture as a well-defined region and suggest that the metaphor of fluid, and the notion of collective culture as a locally specific, temporarily assembled mixture of cultural patterns, can be used to understand the genesis of personal culture. This latter—thus conceived as an inherently hybrid subjectivity—may serve as a source for phenomenological teleological understanding of individual action in conditions of permanent ambivalence, and as a useful framework for discussing justice in a world of ambivalent difference.

RC21-738.2KHARLAMOV, Nikita (National Research University-Higher School of Economics, nkharlamov@clarku.edu)Navigating ambivalence in public places: The atmospheres of heterotopias

Multicultural cities are constellations of processes and activities of very diverse cultural origins, and are thus sites of mixing and hybridity. Public spaces are interspersed with locations that have the potential of creating ambivalence in human encounters with them. This ambivalence could be present in 'festival marketplaces', where capital colonizes historic places, or in navigating the boundaries of urban zones. In this paper I explore the atmospheric dimension of these quotidian encounters with the fabric of built environment through the lens of Foucault's notion of heterotopia. This notion is used to characterize those locations in the city that upset the homogeneity of the spatial fabric and challenge people in terms of their possible meanings. I focus on the elusive, indeterminate character of the city, its 'feel', which, as Boehme notes, humans are perfectly capable of ordinarily recognizing in their daily lives, despite its indeterminate ontological status. From the standpoint of biosemiotics, I discuss the psychic mechanisms involved in the emergence of meaning of places, and the role of personal culture and experience of the person in navigating the ambivalent possibilities involved in the particular encounter with places. I draw on a study of walking in the inner city neighborhood (Main South, Worcester, MA), focusing particularly on how people navigate the diffuse spatial boundary of 'the university campus', and how they make sense of the 'Buddhist meditation temple' situated in the neighborhood. I underscore the dynamic, developmental character of the emergence of these meanings, and discuss its possible trajectories in terms of how people draw on their experience and, in Ingold's terms, their skills of dwelling in the environment, in their encounters. I discuss how this perspective translates into an understanding of public space and spatial justice as emergent out of dynamic, locally assembled encounters of cities and their inhabitants.

RC07-481.3KHONDKER, Habibul H. (Zayed University, UAE, habibul.khondker@zu.ac.ae)Institutionalizing democracy, strengthening state: Bangladesh experience

By using Bangladesh's experience with democracy and governance, this paper argues that the debate on whether democracy is a precondition for development or a strong developmental state is a pre-condition for democracy is somewhat unproductive. Rather than starting from such a stark opposition, this paper argues that it may be possible to pursue the two goals: creating a strong developmental state and deepening democracy at the same time. The argument is based on Claus Offe's argument that democracy is parasitical on strong state. Conversely, a weak state is a bad host and a poor driver for democracy. Following this line of argument, and modifying it slightly, this paper argues that one of the reasons for the weakness of democracy in Bangladesh is rooted in the weakness of the state. A strong state based on a citizen-focused governance can achieve meaningful developmental outcomes and aid in deepening democracy. And yet, the evidence from Asian Tiger economies reveals that governmental efficiency in achieving meaningful and inclusive development may sometime compensate for the absence of a vibrant democracy. So the key conceptual challenge is how to pursue the two goals at the same time?

Bangladesh started as a democracy, however, the post-independence circumstances defeated that goals of democracy, the transition from parliamentary to presidential form took place in less than 4 years of independence. Following military coups and a trail of authoritarian rulers between 1975 and 1990, Bangladesh was governed by regimes based on elections without democracy and made a transition from elections without democracy to democracy without citizenship from 1990 to the present. The glaring defect of Bangladesh's democracy is the weakness of rule of law. The neo-patrimonial state in Bangladesh results in the absence of rational bureaucracy and rule of law.

RC11-214.3KIKUZAWA, Saeko (Hosei University, skikuzaw@soc.hosei.ac.jp)Care service utilization among frail elderly in Japan

Since the national long-term care insurance (LTCI) system was introduced in 2000, Japanese elderly have become "consumers/users" of care services. They can choose services and providers themselves. Under the system, there are a variety of services on the menu and insurance covers 90% of the payment for the service use, up to the benefit limit that is set by the level of support required.

Still, it has been suggested that the system is under-utilized by the frail elderly. One of the factors associated with the under-utilization may be the uneven distributions of the care service providers across communities (e.g., urban vs. rural). For instance, hospitals and clinics are typically concentrated in the urban areas under the national health insurance system in Japan. Similarly, care-service providers may concentrate in the urban areas, so that the limited service provision may prevent the rural elderly from using those services.

Nevertheless, there are not many studies which have examined the factors affecting service use of the elderly under the system, especially community-level factors such as the level of service provisions in the community. This study explores how individual and community level factors affect care service utilization among the frail elderly living in various cities, towns, and villages by analyzing the LTCI receipt data using multi-level modeling.

Explaining differences in involuntary admission practice between German federal states

Background: Involuntary psychiatric admissions rates in Germany are among the highest in the western world and they are continuously increasing during the last decade. However, involuntary admissions rates indicate significant differences between German federal states which can neither be explained by differences in the prevalence of mental disorders nor by different legal bases.

Aims: To examine differences in involuntary admission practices between German federal states from the perspectives of psychiatric staff members and the patients.

Methods: For a period of three months, all cases of involuntary admission to five psychiatric hospitals in three federal states were systematically documented. Patient recruitment and data collection were performed by the same researcher on a rotation basis during 15 months. Patients' views of involuntary admission were assessed by means of standardised questionnaires and open patient interviews in order to describe the admission process and appreciate the patient perspective of the admission experience.

Results: Study results indicate that the patients' perception of the reasons and the specific occasions of involuntary admissions differed from the clinicians' perception. However, no differences occurred between cases from different federal states. Nevertheless, differences in the distribution of diagnoses and the assessment of patients' dangerousness indicate a variance in the selection process at the level of persons and institutions who initiated the admission process.

The meaning and the assessment of empowerment in patients with psychotic and affective disorders

Background: Empowerment is regarded as a crucial factor in modern psychiatric treatment. However, there are no suitable, standardized measurements to assess empowerment in the process of psychiatric treatment. Therefore it is neither possible to mark potential reasons for a missing empowerment orientation nor can we precisely determine the importance of empowerment for the treatment outcome.

Aim: In this study we examined the meaning of the term empowerment for people with affective (ICD-10 F30-F39) and schizophrenic (ICD-10 F20-F29) disorders as the basis for the development of a standardized measure instrument.

Methods: We have chosen a qualitative approach for examining the meaning of the term empowerment for patients with severe mental disorder. We conducted eight focus groups with outpatients from rural and from urban living areas. Participants were given semi-structured enquiries about what empowerment means to them in their daily lives. Focus groups were taped, transcribed and then analyzed by means of qualitative content analysis.

Results: We obtained a broad range of conceptual facets and deduced the following dimensions of empowerment: "daily living" (finances, occupation, housekeeping/ housing situation, social relationships, spare time), "treatment" (treatment participation, knowledge of how to act, medication), "societal/ political" and "person" (hope, self-efficacy, self-esteem, acceptance). While the increase of control was mentioned as the common core of empowerment within these dimensions the definition of low and high levels of empowerment differed significantly between dimensions.

Conclusion: For people with affective and psychotic illness empowerment has a broad meaning closely related to increase the control over several dimensions of their daily life and their psychiatric treatment. For the development of a measurement instrument it is necessary to identify adequate definitions of high and low levels of empowerment for each dimension.

Toward a new media policy in the age of convergence

Communications in the age of media convergence tend to acquire the quality of ubiquity, wherein anybody is able to exchange any message anywhere anytime through a wide range of channels, tools or routes. The expansion of communication coverage not only promotes the opportunities of communications, but it breeds a new set of policy reactions by aggravating social conflict and unrest.

With broadcasting and telecommunications merged, the applicability and mobility of communication spaces being reinforced and the number of smart users who can deftly handle communication tools on the rise, such dysfunctions as social competition, conflict and feud are also being intensified. Thus, today's media-scape accompanying both development and confusion can be represented by this dictum: the transition from "a cool to hot state." That is because, unlike the age of mass media, the age of convergence media is being led by the Internet, which demands an active engagement of users.

In a industrial society, where the expansion of material productivity used to be a major task for national development, overcoming socio-economic crises through efficient mobilization and distribution of resources was the top policy priority. In a post-industrial society, where the reduction and control of social conflicts came to the fore as a prominent agenda, regulating legitimization crises through reconciliation of colliding collective interests was the urgent issue in public policy. In future society, where identity crises draw sharp attention, the emphasis of public policy has to be placed upon the development of visions and strategies that can enhance citizen's life competence to promote collective welfare. In particular, the media policy of future society, which shows a high probability of amplified social strain due to the Internet-based media convergence, should be focused on enhancing the meaning of life through improving the communicative rationality based upon a sense of autonomy and tolerance.

The great eastern Japan earthquake and prejudice toward foreigners

After the Great Eastern Japan Earthquake took place, the Japanese received a lot of encouraging words from abroad, which often expressed admiration for the Japanese both for their great patience and for keeping their dignity and order. CNN even called for opinion from its viewers on the following question: 'In Japan, why did not looting and other unlawful incidents take place, which usually come together with disaster?' The viewers' opinions in this regard tended to attribute it to Japanese culture and its national pride. It is for sure that no prominent looting did take place in the disaster-hit regions even after a few days had passed since the earthquake, the time when aid materials had not been delivered there. However, it does not mean that no injustice occurred in Japan after the earthquake, as it is widely pointed out that racist rumors had spread both inside and around the disaster-hit regions. Therefore, this presentation will highlight the basic data concerning this issue that are drawn from the survey conducted in the City of Sendai, a major disaster-hit region. This survey was conducted after a year had passed since the earthquake by a mailing method for residents with Japanese nationality. The questionnaire items included: recognition and attitude toward rumors spread at the time of the earthquake; exclusivist consciousness toward residents without Japanese nationality; and so on. The data is expected to bring into sharp relief a certain aspect of exclusivist consciousness toward foreigners in Japan after the earthquake.

Why are the citizens of Pusan so silent?

The shocking disasters caused by accidents in Fukushima nuclear power plant showed clearly the risky character of nuclear power. However, Pusan, the nearest foreign city to Japan has been surprisingly either insensitive or silent to lessons from the tragic accident, even though there are nuclear power plants just near to (less than 10 km from Haeundae, one of the city centers of) Pusan. Anti-nuclear movements in Pusan are as usual as ever. What's the problem with Pusan? In fact, Koreans or Korean society were notorious for its relative insensitivity to safety issues. After the critiques on dysfunctions of the compressive modernization of Korea, however, there are growing concerns with social quality, safety issue in particular. This study aims to explain, in three ways, the reasons for inactivated attitudes of citizens in Pusan. First, the organized power of the so-called nuclear mafia composed of electric company, media and pro-nuclear scientists is invisible but very influential. Second, the individual preference for material comforts rather than critical consciousness on nuclear dangers among citizens has been undoubtedly pervasive. Third, there is a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy made by both policy makers and ordinary people who are likely to judge that they would die of traffic accidents as usually as nuclear accidents. Interview data on experts and activists as well as survey data of small size will be collected to examine the proposed explanations.

Whither the migrant workforce in community (in-home) aged care in Australia?

In responding to the 'care crisis', aged care in Australia is undergoing a shift in direction. Historically split between informal care provided by families and institutional care provided by the market and not-for-profit sector; over the past decade community (formal, in-home) aged care provided by government and not-for-profits has grown. Community aged care is now the preferred policy direction. This shift will have a significant impact on the aged care workforce – in particular, the question of who will do this work.

In contrast to the community aged care workforce in other countries, migrants are not a core component of this workforce in Australia. Specifically, migrants whose first language is not English are less likely to be employed in community care than residential aged care. While Australia's migration system provides a partial explanation for migrant pathways into aged care work, it does not account for differences in the distribution of migrants across residential and community sectors. This paper uses the National Aged Care Workforce Census and Survey to examine these differences. The analysis focuses on migrants from Asia Pacific countries – the largest source countries for Australian migration. These migrants view working in community aged care to be less satisfying than residential aged care; and it does not seem to offer the hours, consistency or capacity for developing work portfolios, or the professional development, required by these workers. Overall, they do not appear to want to work in the community sector, either now or in the future. The Australian example provides an interesting contrast to how in-home care is conceptualised elsewhere. This is not a problem of the potential exploitation of low-wage immigrant communities: it is a problem of how to construct the work so that it attracts migrant workers in order to meet forecast growth in the sector.

Conceptual analysis of "dementia" among family caregivers in Japanese SHGs

In this presentation, I examine "dementia" as the concept, which indicates "who" and "how to" remedy troubles about care. I analyze data collected through participant observations and interviews in self-help groups (SHGs) that family caregivers of the demented elderly attended. I emphasize the following four points. First, if elderly are represented as "the demented," they are exempted from the responsibility of remedying troubles. Second, assigning such responsibilities to "family caregivers" implies that they must provide care by considering that people with dementia "cannot think logically, while their emotional abilities are preserved". Third, people with dementia are regarded as "innocent" or "harmless" as a result of this categorization. Fourth, by participating in SHGs, family caregivers can develop a new frame of interpretation for "troubles to remedy" in dementia.

Is promoting disability rights conducive to a stronger democracy in Brazil?

While organized advocacy among and on behalf of people with disabilities in Brazil began in the early 1980s, it was not until that nation's 2008 ratification of the 2006 United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities that the Brazilian state assumed responsibility to promote and guarantee the rights of its disabled citizens. The Convention holds the status of a Constitutional norm in Brazil, enabling disabled persons and interested civil society organizations to press to hold the state accountable for the protection and advancement of disability rights. This paper explores the tensions revealed by these ongoing efforts to empower a long-subjugated population through examining the online and printed materials of seven disability advocacy organizations and through interviews conducted in summer 2011 in Sao Paulo, Brazil with their leaders. In particular, the paper examines whether and how these organizations' liberal advocacy discourses stressing equal rights, dignity and respect are reconciled in practice with their calls for social inclusion and active citizen engagement. Drawing on Held(1996), Sandel(1996), Freire(1970;1973), and Taylor(1992), I argue that well-intended rhetoric notwithstanding, paradoxically, without a participatory political life it is difficult for the disabled to achieve a shared social aspiration. I draw on interview data and compare the disability rights literature with the claims of a sample of disability advocacy organizations to consider how advocacy strategies might be recast to help the otherwise heterogeneous disabled population attain both a common sense of identity and individual rights as they seek full citizenship.

Navigating back pain care: A sociological study of women's illness pathways within and between intersecting social worlds

Back pain represents a key public health problem for the Australian health system, and the significance of back pain for Australian primary care delivery is evident in the fact that it is the second most common complaint in general practice consultations. Back pain carries both high direct and indirect costs, including reduced capacity to work and participate in community life. For some back pain sufferers conventional treatments have limited therapeutic effect, leading often to the use of various 'alternatives'. Back pain care is delivered primarily by GPs, physiotherapists, chiropractors, osteopaths, acupuncturists, and massage therapists. Yet the actual usage and popularity of such modalities amongst Australians remains relatively unknown.

This paper focuses on an analysis of data from a national, representative cross-sectional survey on the practices and providers mid-age Australian women with back pain are utilising in their care. This sociological study examines such things as: use of providers and self-delivered care; the bases of decisions and trajectories; issues related to cost, risk and choice; and, ultimately these women's pathways through care. This represents a major sub-study of the Australian Longitudinal Study on Women's Health (n=40,000) of which around 1,800 mid-age women participated given their existing back pain. Here we report on the extent of plurality of available treatment options for mid-age Australian women with back pain, and assess their experiences of utilising multiple biomedical, allied health and complementary providers to address their pain and quality of life/wellbeing. A particular focus is on women's access and decision-making regarding practitioner choice and consultation, and perceptions of the value of a variety of biomedical and complementary providers.

Expertise in defining word "senses" as contested professional turf

How language materializes connections between individuals and groups is a fundamental sociological issue. White posits that talk constitutes the links in social networks and theorizes ambiguity as sparking creation of socio-cultural forms aiming toward ever-elusive shared meanings (not necessarily agreement). (White, 2003; Godart & White, 2010) Certain linguists (Bakhtin, Vygotsky cited in Emerson, 1983) also highlighted the unique variety of semiotic associations (i.e., meanings) individuals bring to words.

Therefore, "definitions" (assigned meanings) as constructed and caged in dictionaries, are necessarily hegemonic, to varying degrees (Kirchner, 2009). Dictionaries themselves can be viewed as negotiated cultural efforts to impose "definitions" (reduce ambiguity) on variant, always-changing usages. Indeed, for professionals whose work is writing dictionaries, i.e., Lexicographers, the core challenge concerns handling "senses" that shadow all words. Decisions abound: What is a "sense of a word" vs a separate word vs. an ignorable variant? How many senses should be specified? In what order? What if the senses of different words seem to overlap in meaning – i.e., when should they be considered "synonyms"? Are synonyms possible?

Abbott's theory of professions (1988) as competing ways of organizing expertise, and claiming mandates over tasks in that domain (turf), provides a useful frame for analyzing the influence of digital technologies on contested control over language. This paper extends prior work (Kirchner, 2011) on the turf of "Word-Sense Disambiguation," emerging as the site of competing claims by "Computational Linguistics" (CompLing) and traditional Lexicographers. In-between, the small specialty of "Computational Lexicography" (CompLex) mediates the differences. It is too soon to tell whether CompLex will help seal the demise of traditional lexicography, overwhelmed by CompLing; or will become the mechanism by which a modernized Lexicography constrains CompLing's turf-spread. Implications for participatory dictionary-making (e.g., Wiktionary and the wider "Wiki-World") are considered.

Making "human" exclusionary: Social forms and ableist language in the computing professions

Ableism – i.e., an analytic term for societal exclusion of people who "look different" (e.g., talk, move, communicate differently) from an "average" or "normal" person, is a latecomer to social justice attention. Critical analyses of racism and sexism preceded it, and have helped to stimulate significant, though incomplete, reforms via legal and other culture-change mechanisms (e.g., TV show casting.) Correlatively, sexism-(and racism)-in-language have been fertile, richly-harvested fields (e.g., Pascale, 2007), whereas ableism-in-language has barely achieved recognition by activists (e.g. the anti-"R.word" movement), or scholars (e.g., Ferri and Connor, 2005; Cherney, 2011). This paper plumbs the heritage of the former analyses, while highlighting differences in the societal context of ableism that affect how language marginalizes/excludes people with disabilities (PwDs).

Analysts, seminal and recent, have shown that "isms" in language operate variously on cognitive processes, but they often do not specify the social structural links (Kramer et al., 1978, Miller & James, 2009) The current paper identifies a large, culturally-influential globalized occupational sphere (broadly, Computer Design) to explore how social organization and linguistic practices interact to impact PwDs in the targeted professions and society-at-large. Using descriptive analysis of online professional discourse and organizational structure, I show how the term "Human" is used restrictively, a process buttressed by other terms ("assistive [technology]", "sufferer", "normal/average person") and is built into social structure via formation and naming of professional specialties (journals, conferences, etc.). Finally, I outline the socio-economic consequences of this marginalizing process. The focal site is the multinational professional society, Association for Computing Machinery, particularly its longstanding "Special Interest Group-SIG" on Computer-Human Interface, and its newer SIG on Accessibility (for PwDs).

My core theoretical concepts derive from Bourdieu's symbolic power (1991), Foucault's "normativity" (Comstock, 2008) and Bowker/Star's classification (2000).

Dementia stories: Representations of carers

Until recently the 'voices' of people with dementia have not been present in the representations about Alzheimer's Disease available publicly through the media. The story of the person with dementia has frequently been told through the 'voice' of their carer or through the 'voices' of experts such as those representing Alzheimer's Societies. This is changing and more first person accounts are emerging, partly as a result of the activism of the people with dementia movement. But what of the voices of the carers - have they changed? This paper focuses on the 'voices' of carers and explores the 'dominant narrative of sacrifice' that emerges in these stories. However there are other narratives as well and these have important consequences for both people with dementia, those who care for them, and those people who have yet to be touched by the impact of Alzheimer's Disease. Examples from a systematic analysis of New Zealand representations obtained from publicly available sources (print media, Internet, newsletters) from 2000 to 2011 are used to illustrate these different representations. I also seek to illustrate that these representations are not unique to New Zealand but apply to other similar societies. I conclude by highlighting the tension that still exists in representing both people with dementia and those who are carers in a way that recognises their rights as individuals and as citizens.

Leaving a trace: The politics of cemeteries

Scattered throughout many countries, in rural and urban areas, there are cemeteries. These are not just places for the disposal of bodies or ashes but also a place to remember the identity of the deceased. How these identities are portrayed has changed over time and depends also upon place. In this paper case studies of cemeteries are used to illustrate how the cemetery can be a site for teaching sociology and to highlight the relevance of visual methods in this. I have used the cemetery as a teaching and learning site in both sociology of death and dying and research methods undergraduate courses. Only visual representations can do justice to the stories cemeteries can tell us about those who are now dead and some of the social conditions of the communities they lived in. The paper explores the strengths and limitations of nonobtrusive observational methods in cemetery research and also examines the ethics of such research methods.

Keeping distance - Fragility of ties between ethnic minority and majority youth in Finland

This paper explores ties crossing ethnic boundaries in micro-level interaction of youth in Finland. The aim is to disentangle what types of ties are formed between ethnic minority and majority youth and how these ties build up intergroup bridging social capital. The study is based on translocal ethnography conducted in leisure fields of youth and on an interview data (n=38) of ethnic minority youth.

The assumption inherent in the notion of social capital is that interethnic weak ties benefit ethnic minority youth and enable them to 'get ahead' – to form bridges across ethnic niches. Strong ties, on other hand, would help ethnic minority youth only to 'get by' in a fixed peer circle. However, it has been claimed that theorizations of social capital have not sufficiently recognized group-based demarcations and material inequalities in stratified surroundings. Thus, bridging interethnic ties do not formulate automatically because of spatial and institutional segregation, cultural hierarchies, racist group relations and more micro-level mechanisms. The empirical focus of this paper is on latter types of mechanisms.

Strong ties in the form of close interethnic friendships are rare in the data. Instead, a lot of weak ties in the form of distant acquaintances are formulated. However, these weak ties seem to be too fragile in creating bridging social capital because of manifold hindrances in micro-level interaction: differing (youth) cultural competences, harness of racializing narratives, intergroup conflicts, 'considerate aloofness' and differing leisure habits. It seems that the strong interethnic ties have more bridging qualities. Moreover, many ethnic minority youth are not able to take part in costly middle-class sociability or are otherwise excluded from mainstream leisure surroundings.

Educational expansion, equality of opportunities and labour market outcomes from baby boomers to recent generations – the case of Finland

As a rule, educational expansion proceeds as a bottom-up process where widening access and increasing student flows at lower levels force next level educational organizations to change. Educational expansion means increasing educational opportunities and greater demand for education. Even though expansion widens the access, the education system maintains its inherent hierarchy to the top. From graduates' point of view, degrees are expected to work as credentials for favourable positions in the labour market. Expectations of the value of degrees are much generated by labour market outcomes of preceding generations. A topical question for most welfare states is how do the labour market outcomes (in terms of different levels of earnings of graduates) for successive generations change during the expansion from elite university to mass higher education – especially under "global auctions" of jobs?

By leaning on Finnish longitudinal census data, the paper will analyse expanding education system, for instance, in terms of mechanisms of 'maximally maintained inequality' and 'law of last entry'. Notwithstanding the levelling of playing field, the competition among the highly educated is tightening and the 'game of elimination' is fierce. Finnish school system has been praised for its high level of (average) academic performance of students together with low impact of socioeconomic background on student performance as indicated by OECD/PISA-assessments. Strikingly, however, in Finnish school system we can find a remarkably wide inverse gender gap (female students' performance exceeds male students' performance), while in the labour markets the gender gap is in a traditional way persistent (woman's euro is 80 cents). The paper will focus on to what extent equality of educational opportunity of women and men has improved in terms of parent-child odds ratios of participation in university education from baby boomers to recent generations.

Productivity of research in natural sciences, technology and clinical medicine of 48 east Asian and north european top 300 ranked universities: A comparison of 8 countries scoring high in science and mathematics PISA

The global university rankings are here to stay. The ranking positions tell the universities' recognized success in the reputation markets. Whether deliberate or not, the rankings tend to establish a 'single norm of excellence' and reduce complex global higher education landscape into an ordinal order from best to worst. (Hazelkorn, Kauppi & Erkkilä; EAU) If governments are to strive for evidence-based science policy, they have to know, how productive the research in a country is, especially in such costly and facility intensive fields like natural sciences, technology and clinical medicine. The more detailed question is, which institutions produce the best or worst results and at what price. The emergence of Asian universities and scientific research is actualising in increasing numbers of appearances in the global university rankings (ARWU, THES, QS and HEEACT) hitherto dominated by North American universities accompanied by some European universities.

The productivity analysis utilizes input (research man-years) and output (Web of Science articles and articles in Hi-impact journals) data of 48 Top 300 ranked East Asian and North European universities. Based on the results of the analyses the 48 universities are rated from A₀ (output falling short of input) to A⁺ (output exceeding input). The paper focuses on Korea, Taiwan, Singapore and Hong Kong from East Asia vis-à-vis Finland, Norway, Denmark and Sweden from North Europe, all of which belong to PISA elite (Programme for International Student Assessment) in science and mathematics. A high rank in science and mathematics PISA shows high level of learning outcomes which according to our understanding indicates that the "school culture" of the country has a specific "science ethos" and students' high academic potentiality. Finally, the paper shows how the "science ethos" indicated by PISA manifests in productivity of research in natural sciences, technology or clinical medicine.

This paper seeks to contribute to our understanding of the social psychology of migrants—both labor immigrants and refugees—by introducing the idea of ambivalence as a central feature of the migration experience. Building on recent work on ambivalence, particularly the contribution of Neil Smelser, we follow his lead in linking the idea of ambivalence to Albert Hirschman's treatment of exit, loyalty, and voice. The data utilized in this study derive from a larger study of Iraqi immigrants in Helsinki and Rome. We make use of 48 open-ended interviews, half conducted in each city. Our focus is on the ambivalence of immigrants toward their country of origin. We find evidence that ambivalence is common and the reactions to it vary along the lines suggested by Hirschman.

En el presente trabajo nos proponemos caracterizar la reciente migración de jóvenes senegaleses que han arribado a Buenos Aires a partir de los años '90, e intensificada a partir de 2004. Ello con el fin de establecer los puntos en los cuales se continúa estratificando este tipo de migración, pese a que tiene lugar en un contexto de relacionamiento Sur-sur.

Para estos propósitos realizaremos una breve descripción del contexto de emigración, siguiendo a Sayad (2000) quien entiende este fenómeno como un proceso global, donde cuentan tanto los factores de salida como los de llegada, sin perder de vista la incidencia de los procesos de globalización acelerada de los años '90 en la intensificación/complejización de los flujos (Sassen, 2007) y cómo éstos se han convertido en la nueva forma de estratificación social (Bauman, 2008).

Por último, teniendo en cuenta diversos dispositivos locales como son la actual legislación migratoria, las redes que los mismos migrantes establecen para integrarse, así como las narrativas históricas del país receptor, pretendemos revisar el complejo fenómeno de la integración/exclusión a partir de la actividad laboral que mayoritariamente realizan en la Capital Federal.

Two-faced democratization: The recent expansion of Brazil's vocational education

Among the most recent diversification policies in Brazil one should pay special attention to so called "Federal Institute of Education, Science and Technology", based upon an older institution of professional education, in 2008. In fact, this new establishment was inserted into a policy vision that proposed a "Federal Network of Professional and Technological Education". Among the most outstanding diversification policies one can point out the fact that the transformation of the prior existing type ("Federal Center of Technological Education") did not create a big number of new institutions, but indeed largely expanded the number of campuses allowing for a spatial decentralization and therefore providing opportunity to a population that lacked access to public higher education, which in Brazil does not charge tuition or fees. Furthermore it introduced a quota-system that reserves at least 50% of all places offered at this institution to pupils that attended public schools, aiming to democratize access to tertiary education, since these Institutes offer higher education as technological and teacher formation degrees.

The present work draws on and goes beyond other investigations priorly developed by myself to point out how indeed one can observe a certain degree of democratization, but tries to indicate barriers that persist in spite of this quota-system and further actions to be detailed during the presentation. The most important issue I would like to focus on concerns the clash between stated objectives in this aforementioned establishment and the effective existing conditions, starting from a qualitative study-case at the institute I currently work at and also elaborating on the contrasting mentalities of the older professors facing a new generation with a completely different academic background, that bring along divergent views of formative itineraries as well as concerning the scope of the diplomas offered at the institutes vis-à-vis universities.

Arts matter: Exploring an impact of arts on urban scenes in Poland

The paper aims at analysis of impact of art on social cohesion and urban development in Poland. It argues that arts and creativity favour community regeneration and empowerment, extend civic participation and political awareness, as well as help to counteract to social pathologies.

The paper employs the concept of urban scenes. Scene is a dynamic system of several components: (1) neighborhood (2) physical environment, (3) people (4) engaged in various activities, (5) representing different values (Silver, Clark, Rothfield 2002). Arts and artists are considered crucial factors, which significantly affect character of urban scenes and determine its dynamic.

The paper provides both quantitative data as well as some case studies of Polish urban scenes. It explores the ways in which the arts and artists impact on socio-cultural, political and economic dynamic of the scene.

"I come from a very interesting family!" Translating cultural capital

In my presentation I like to explore the process of translating, transforming and building social and cultural capital by Russian speaking migrants in Germany. My focus thereby is on the private sphere and the practices and ideas of home making, maintaining and constructing family and friendship relations, in a transnational context. The question I like to discuss with you occurred during my first field experiences and biographical interviews of my PhD project.

In Soviet society and state planned economy the possession and taste in consumer goods played a marginal role in the representation of social distinction. So institutionalised (educational degrees, professional and public certificates, decorations), objectified (books, china, access to cultural entertainment) as well as incorporated cultural capital was crucial to soviet social order. In Germany post-soviet migrants experience the devaluation of their educational degrees and professional experience, as well as loss of their incorporated cultural capital and social networks. Simultaneously cultural and social capital are important resources to contest those experiences of devaluation, to distinct one self from other migrant groups and create new social positions that help to redefine a certain identity, as well as open up occupational opportunities and secure the upwards mobility for the next generation. In this context private home is an arena of representing and transforming cultural capital that I like to explore in more depth.

Analyzing interviews of Russian speaking women that work in the educational and cultural sphere I like to discuss how exactly this transformation of cultural capital takes place, how it is manifested in the private home and family and friendship relations. What kind of cultural capital can be translated, what kind of recognition is organized, where is this translation successful, where not?

Developing apollonian and dionysian trust in environmental consumer schemes

This paper raises some fundamental issues about information and knowledge authorities as a basis for citizen-consumers to change their purchases, use, and (sub)-political involvement as implied in the notion of green, political citizen-consumers. By examining challenges to success of in reaching reduced, consumption-based harm to environment and health through (A) celebrities, (B) social marketing, and (C) community-based programmes, this paper develops the distinction between two types of trust of citizen-consumers, a distinction that need to be taken into account in consumer-oriented projects surrounding health and environment: The first type, which is arguably already taken into (extensive) account is what I label Apollonian trust, the trust in the validity, soundness, logic and cognitive quality of the schemes. Still, when informing the social sciences of consumption by evolutionary theory of human motivations it stands very clear that Apollonian trust is rarely sufficient in order to motivate citizen-consumers to modify their lifestyles. Influenced by evolutionary theory, I therefore coin the concept of Dionysian trust, to denote people's trust (subconscious or conscious) that their modified lifestyles will meet their social motivation, the motivation that changes in routines will somehow benefit their social position, which I argue is much more deeply rooted in us than both materialist and ecological values are or may ever become. In addition discussing implications for further consumer campaigns and schemes oriented towards reduced harm to health and environment through consumption, the paper tries to make sense of consumption by raising the wider scientific issue. This issue concerns the importance of allowing 'Darwin-free' but rich social scientific perspectives on consumption be thoroughly influenced by lessons from evolutionary theory on human nature, and vice versa, while at the same time avoiding deep contradictions and incommensurability of the perspectives.

La regulación urbanística tiene influencia en la producción de viviendas sociales?

La relación entre regulación urbanística y oferta de suelo para producción de vivienda social ha sido objeto de estudio y controversia desde la década del 70. La tesis de que normas de uso y ocupación excesivas del suelo inciden negativamente en la elasticidad de la oferta de viviendas, provocando un aumento de precios de inmuebles, tuvo gran influencia en la planificación urbana. En Brasil y América Latina, un argumento recurrente entre gestores públicos y promotores inmobiliarios es que para que el mercado privado pueda ofrecer productos habitacionales accesibles para los estratos de menor renta, es necesario "flexibilizar" normas y "disminuir" exigencias. Este trabajo pretende explorar la relación entre regulación y oferta del suelo para la producción de vivienda social. Su objetivo principal es evaluar de manera crítica y de forma comparativa, la aplicación de instrumentos de regulación urbanística y de política fundaría, así como su correlación con la adecuación urbanística de los domicilios en estos municipios. Los resultados encontrados en los municipios objeto de estudio de caso y pertenecientes al Estado de São Paulo, han permitido detectar tendencias: casi todos mantienen legislaciones de uso y ocupación del suelo que desconsideran la lógica de la producción de la vivienda social, no destinando para este mercado NINGUNA área de la ciudad. En casi todos los municipios estudiados estas características se transforman en objeto de "leyes excepcionales", específicas para la aprobación de conjuntos populares, inducidas, sobretodo, por compañías o empresas estatales, muchas veces asociadas a leyes de extensión del perímetro urbano, permitiendo su producción en áreas más distantes y/o desconectadas de la ciudad. Los resultados encontrados sugieren que las normas establecidas constituyen barreras, no por disminuir la oferta de suelo para vivienda social, sino por impedir la ocupación de áreas más atractivas de la ciudad por parte de la población con menor renta.

Las cosas se cambian desde adentro: Recambio generacional, pertenencia partidaria y diferencias internas en el radicalismo de una ciudad entre ríos (Argentina) entre 1996 y 1999

El trabajo que proponemos expresa la voluntad de discutir con aquellos postulados que sostuvieron, durante los noventa, el fin de las estructuras partidarias y de las formas tradicionales de acción política en Argentina. Para esto, presentaremos un estudio de caso desarrollado en la ciudad de Minuán, provincia de Entre Ríos, donde un grupo de personas que pertenecieron a la juventud política de la Unión Cívica Radical entre 1983 y 1995 desarrollaron, a partir de 1996, una disputa con los referentes más antiguos para definir la dirección del partido a nivel local y, luego, para determinar las candidaturas a cargos públicos.

Recorreremos los tres años que van desde la primer interna por autoridades partidarias (en las que estas personas de entre 26 y 38 años participaron) hasta la elección que los depositó al frente del municipio en 1999; observaremos que en un contexto donde algunos trabajos imaginaron la banalización de la política, un grupo de integrantes, de un partido tradicional, constituyó un espacio interno y disputó la conducción del partido con la generación política anterior. Nuestros actores, además, lo hicieron de la forma tradicionalmente fijada por carta orgánica; al mismo tiempo que establecieron criterios específicos de identificación y pertenencia con el partido, los cuales supusieron como propios.

Los integrantes del grupo naciente identificaron para sí una autenticidad de sus condiciones políticas: como "nueva generación" y como radicales, a la vez. Ligado a esto, demarcaron los valores sociales que asumían como partidarios radicales y aquellos singulares a su espacio interno; y procuraron que el resto del universo del radicalismo de Minuán reconozca la legitimidad de su pretensión.

Lo expuesto, además, nos deposita en una intención subsidiaria: Registrar la inconveniencia de generalizar aspectos de "la política nacional" o, mejor dicho, de los grandes centros urbanos como una continuidad invariable en todo un país.

Gender-role expectations and fertility rates in EU member states

This paper aims using data from the EVS2008 to investigate gender-role expectations and associations with fertility rates in EU member states. Countries with higher income and higher female employment rates tend to have higher fertility rates. Countries with higher fertility rates tended to have higher percentages of live births outside of marriage, suggesting a decline in traditional families. Gender gaps were smaller in countries with higher income and/or higher fertility rates. In wealthy Western societies, children are no longer produced primarily to extend family lines or valued as support for old age. For women, children and careers now go hand-in-hand.

Effects of social capital on romance and marriage

I investigate how social capital affects romance and marriage in the Japanese society. In Japan, the percent never married has increased to males 19.4% and females 9.8% (2010). This results in a serious decrease of the total fertility rate to 1.4 (2010). However, the transition from romance to marriage to childbirth is yet to be clarified.

Therefore, I focus on the effects of social capital on getting boyfriends and girlfriends and getting married. Social capital, such as friends, acquaintances, and colleagues, may play significant roles in such events. For this purpose, I conducted a survey with 1,221 respondents (the response rate 50.1%).

Based on regression analyses and event history analyses, I show (i) human capital (measured in education) has no effects on romance but has significant effects on marriage. (ii) Social capital has significant effects both on romance and marriage. (iii) Getting boyfriends and girlfriends, especially in their teens, significantly boosts probability of getting married. This means romance functions as social capital. So, romance and marriage are rational in the sense that they are promoted by social capital and human capital.

Constructions of gender stereotypes by the media in dealing with the 'right-wing terror cell' in Germany

In November 2011 the German public was caught off guard by a case of right wing terrorism. The case disclosed a hitherto unknown extent of right wing violence. On the basis of weapon findings, two men and a woman were matched with countless burglaries and the murder of at least ten persons carried out during the last twelve years. Most of the victims were migrants from Turkey. The case was disclosed after the two suspected men presumably committed suicide in order to avoid being arrested. Subsequently, the suspected woman blew up their joint home and turned herself over to the police. In custody she refused to make any statement.

During the first days after the disclosure of the case, the public expected to be informed about the background and the details of the case. At this time the authorities conducting the investigations had very little to report. The media was, therefore, compelled to generate extensive reports based on a very few facts. The focus of the reporting was on speculations about the circumstances of the crime and the personalities of the suspected persons.

Based on selected print media reports, my presentation will show how the media reports of the case worked with gender stereotypes in the published pictures and statements. They also constructed offender personalities, ignoring or reinterpreting the few facts that were known about the biographical backgrounds of the suspected perpetrators.

The 'real' alternative: Multiculturalism and community arts in Sydney

Two artistic productions - the photographic exhibition '52 Suburbs', and British dance company DV8's physical theatre production, 'Can we talk about this?' - premiered in Sydney in 2011, offering contrasting explorations of issues arising from contemporary policies and social imaginaries of multiculturalism. Both 'mainstream' productions interpellated a liberal, middle-class audience, and were received with considerable public and critical acclaim - the former for ostensibly celebrating Sydney's multicultural fabric by depicting locally rooted manifestations of cultural expression, identity, and community, the latter for exploring issues of human rights, equality, and freedom of speech in relation to multiculturalism. The counterpoints between these two productions and the ways in which they attempt to narrate and interrogate multiculturalism reflect the contemporary tensions, limitations and paradoxes inherent in 'managing diversity' in Australia through the model of liberal multiculturalism. This paper argues that, as an alternative to popular 'mainstream' narratives of multiculturalism, there exist emergent possibilities in localised, vernacular artistic productions, which represent the multiplicity of migrant voices and the 'multicultural real' in Australian society. In Sydney, Australia's largest and most culturally diverse city, the multiple identities of the city are given voice through the work of community arts organisations such as Information and Cultural Exchange (ICE) and Curiousworks. The forms of representation in the artistic works of such community organisations, while highly political in their own right, can serve to make the socio-political and historical realities of 'managing' and negotiating socio-cultural diversity in Australia more visible. In doing so, they create spaces for the telling of alternative tales that are central to enabling more radically democratic representations of Australian society, and to reinvigorating a cacophonous multicultural discourse in Australia.

The influence of the mass media on youth socialization in modern society: The case of Russia

The role of the mass media in shaping of youth socialization cannot be underestimated. The mass media reach large numbers of the public via radio, television, newspapers and the Internet. One of the most popular forms of media among the Russian youth is television due to lots of extraordinary ideas and themes on youth telecasts. Moreover television is free of charge and available to anyone. People with higher education prefer newspapers and magazines, as they think that the government prints won't give inadequate information. Besides reading requires more intellectual efforts and abilities in analysis. Elderly people rely on facts given over the wireless, because in the times of communism news given over the radio was considered to be the honest truth.

Spiritual development of the society is strongly linked to the moral control of telecasts' contents. 80 percent of respondents supported this concept, 59 percent of youth think that the Russian mass media don't promote citizenship and patriotism.

Nowadays e-books and webzines supplant printed editions. Electronic editions are getting more popular especially among youth. The Internet changes mode of life and turns into the main source of information. It is not merely a global data communications system but also a new form of social interaction including social networking websites.

Though the majority of youth reject the idea of strong influence of the mass media on their life, psychological investigations found play an important role of the mass media in shaping youth's mentality and world outlook.

The results show that events of twenty years' standing led to lack of more or less clear system of values, norms, orientations, cultural wealth of young people in modern society. They have obvious clash of opinions in their minds. Therefore, one of the principle measures to be taken is to shape a system of education in Russia.

A new image of old age: The case of third age societies

Europe's older population is shedding its traditional image, which is characterized by need and dependency. Instead, this population group is beginning to adopt an image that is characterized by capability. Corporations and policy-makers already react to this change, e.g. by strengthening older people's workforce participation. However, opinions still differ on what this new image entails.

This contribution explores the new image of old age, using the concept of the third age as a starting point. The third age describes the life years after retirement and prior to the onset of poor health. Those life years give people the opportunity to pursue activities of their choice, and they are therefore sometimes labeled 'the crown of life'. The emergence of the third age changes social structures - and it changes the image of old age. We, therefore, expect the new, capability-based image of old age to be particularly common in societies with many third-agers.

To better understand the new image of old age, we answer three questions. First, what is the image of old age across Europe? Second, how strongly pronounced is the third age across Europe? Third, can the emergence of the third age explain the change in the image of old age? To answer these questions, we conducted macro-level analyses with data from international organizations and with survey data. Findings show that there is no straightforward correlation between the emergence of the third age and the new image of old age. The correlation only becomes visible after we separate countries according to welfare regimes. We use this finding to describe different types of third age societies, which we characterize according to the prominent image of old age in them.

Empirical methods in ageing research: Recent developments and upcoming trends

Europe is graying. This development becomes visible in our everyday lives, be it when we look at the person sitting next to us in a café, when we read the stories presented in newspapers, or when we listen to discussions on the situation of pension schemes. Researchers from various disciplines, e.g. sociology, political science, and medical science, observed this trend for some time now. To study what ageing means for societies and individuals, those researchers developed and adapted a rich array of research methods. Knowing about these research methods helps us to pick the most useful and effective way to answer our questions about old age and population ageing.

Nowadays, it is hard to gain an overview of empirical methods in ageing research. The field of ageing research is well-developed and diverse, which makes it difficult for any one person to spontaneously list all the methods used and to explain their advantages and disadvantages. The few overview books that exist were mainly written in the 1990s, which means that they cannot provide a concise description of the current situation either. For example, they cannot sufficiently describe recent developments and upcoming trends, such as the use of Sequence Analysis, Bayesian Modeling, or Qualitative Comparative Analysis. This contribution strives to fill this lacuna.

Our contribution describes and analyzes the use of empirical methods in ageing research during the last 2 decades. It traces the upcoming of new empirical methods in ageing research and the adaptation of existing methods to the needs of ageing research. It, moreover, studies for which topics, scientific disciplines, and kinds of research questions each method is most useful. Finally, this research project identifies upcoming trends in empirical methods in ageing research and briefly discusses how those trends could develop in the future.

Frame convergence into social justice: The Korean engagement into transnational food sovereignty movements

This paper intends to explain why and how the Korean social movements engage in the Global Justice Movement (GJM) by focusing on food sovereignty movements. We believe that Korean social movements gradually developed consciousness of food sovereignty through engaging in the GJM. Especially Korean environmental and agrarian movements are increasingly engaging in south-to-south collaboration with respect to food sovereignty. Both movements try to seize the so-called master frame, 'food sovereignty' against neoliberalism through strengthening relationship with global NGOs such as Friends of the Earth and Via Campesina. Divergent movements in Korea after achieving procedural democracy are converging again into social justice with expanding their activism into transnational arena. Simultaneously Korean social movements are struggling with many obstacles to transnational activism. Korean social movements recognize a high necessity of overcoming tough challenges at various levels whiling forming alliances around, across, and even beyond the national border.

Choices, transformations and barriers

The study observe the correlation between youth' educational choices, barriers on the transition from secondary to tertiary education and changes in the Russian reality. The observations began long before the recent transformations in the life of the country and then continued till now. The data for the research projects is composition of state statistics and surveys.

The research studies indicate that:

- A changing situation led to visible relative levelling of chances of getting secondary education for representatives of various population groups;
- But great differentiation of schools and high barriers were observed; each type of school serves primarily for a certain social group; and children from the higher strata gain more quality secondary education;
- So the levelling of chances of getting secondary education turns out to be only apparent. It didn't lead to a decrease of social inequality or to a growth of access to higher education for youth of certain social groups.

Our research of school graduates' life careers over a ten years period indicates that these disparities remains in human destinies for many years, for decades of years, for all life.

Differentiation is noticeably seen at school, and then it becomes more distinctive in the sphere of occupational education. It continues in later life trajectories of a generation and is manifested in reproducing and aggravating social inequality. However it is pointless to cast reproaches upon the system of education and to hold it responsible for everything. Here we see the reflection of what is going on in the society on the whole. The institution of education is not to blame for what was so vividly manifested in it. The education sphere is a mirror to our society.

Winners and losers - From empirical date to model

Model takes into account not only achieved status but also resources for social mobility. Values, motivation and barriers are considered. The database is result of surveys those were provided in Russia from 1960-s till now.

Model includes several categories (we've given them relative names).

The "winners" are those who strive to achieve upward social mobility. They engage in active effort that will provide them with this potential mobility; for example, they acquire a high-level qualification that is demanded in the labor market. They have necessary resources because they are predominantly from the group occupying higher place in social hierarchy.

The "outsiders" would also like to attain to higher status or at least to keep or reproduce it; but they do not achieve their goals because they have not necessary resources for overcoming the barriers (social, economic, territorial etc.).

The "pessimists" would like to achieve upward mobility and know how to achieve this; but they have no hope of overcoming the barriers. It does not matter if they are not able to overcome these barriers or believe that they will not be able to (low motivation). They lower their expectations and refrain from necessary activity.

People in category "others" have specific values: social mobility or prosperity is desirable, but the way of achieving it is not conventional but by other means.

In the "hopeless" group are for example those who found themselves below the property line. They have no resources by which to rise above it. They have no hope or goal of rising up the social ladder and thus do not think about a way to achieve upward mobility, much less participate in competition.

Activismo judicial y reforma urbana en Brasil - Límites y posibilidades

El marco jurídico establecido en la Constitución Federal de 1988 y en el Estatuto de la Ciudad de 2001 para las políticas urbanas de las ciudades brasileñas es considerado uno de los más avanzados entre los países de Latinoamérica. El nuevo orden jurídico-urbanístico fue el resultado de décadas de lucha social. En un contexto de redemocratización política, los movimientos urbanos en Brasil hicieron una apuesta estratégica en la promoción de cambios en las normas jurídico-institucionales que regulan la producción del espacio urbano. Entre los cambios más significativos, están la creación de instrumentos de gestión democrática, de inducción del desarrollo urbano y de regularización de los asentamientos informales, además del refuerzo de las competencias de los municipios. Al nivel local, con respecto a la actuación legislativa del estado, estudios demuestran que el nuevo marco jurídico ha conducido a la revisión de la legislación municipal y de los planes directores urbanos. Con respecto a la actuación administrativa, hay evidencias de que el nuevo orden jurídico-urbanístico ha repercutido en el contenido de las políticas habitacionales y en la operación de los mecanismos de gestión urbana. Sin embargo, con respecto a la actuación jurisdiccional, las consecuencias de los cambios son aún materia de controversia. Argumentos sugiriendo que el nuevo orden jurídico-urbanístico supuestamente no ha tenido mayores impactos en las decisiones del Poder Judicial contrastan, todavía, con dos fenómenos que han crecientemente marcado la actuación de los jueces brasileños desde los años 90. Primero, el fenómeno del incremento de las demandas sometidas a la resolución judicial, acompañado de presiones respecto a mejorías en la eficiencia del sistema de justicia. Segundo, el fenómeno del activismo judicial con respecto a los derechos sociales, sobretodo salud y educación, lo cual está relacionado con la elaboración de nuevas doctrinas sobre la eficacia jurídica de las normas constitucionales.

Vocational education and the new generation of working class in China

Increasing number of vocational school students are found in factories in China. They work on non-stop standardized assembly lines as other formally employed labour in the name of taking 'internships'. Most of them are not protected by formal labour contract nor social insurance scheme. When the government encourages close cooperation between vocational training schools and enterprises in developing the quality of human resources in China, a stable supply of cheap and compliant young labour force is secured for the use of the capital. This paper looks at the development of vocational training education during the post-reform era and investigates the growing connections between vocational schools and private enterprises in recent years. Given the increasing scale and the growing importance of vocational training in the Chinese education system, this paper explore the ways that students, especially those in vocational track, are prepared as a new generation of working class in China.

The construction of family, gender and population issues in mosque sermons in Turkey

This research investigates how the Directorate General of Religious Affairs in Turkey conveys the gender role models, which cultivate femininity and masculinity through the means of sermons at Friday prayers. It is crucial to inspect the construction of these role models as well as issues such as family, sexuality and modernity, population issues in congregations composed of men meeting every week. In this effort, through the means of questions such as "what types of issues are mentioned in the Friday prayers", "how sermons convey gender roles", "how sermons construct femininity and masculinity as supportive roles of family" as well as "how the pious in attendance comprehend the message in Friday sermons", the project is seeking to portray the types of gender institutions built by discourses.

The methodology of this research follows discursive institutionalism in order to test the stages through which gender institutions are constructed. These are first, the written sermon appropriated by the religious authorities at the county level; second, how the message has been transmitted through the sermon at the mosque, and finally, how the attendants understand this message in order to show cognitive dissonance. In order to test how religious institutions are conceived through the means of discourses, this research uses dialogics and semantics.

The research proceeds under four chapters: (1) An analysis of sermons available to the public through the websites of representatives of the Directorate General of Religious Affairs at county levels; (2) field research in 10 Turkish counties; (3) in-person interviews with the congregation right after the sermon; (4) interviews with priests. The project is highly original in scope, methodology and first of its kind. It combines quantitative and qualitative analyses. It is funded for a two year period by the KOCKAM - Koc University Center for Gender Studies.

Tabúes sobre sexualidad y género en docentes de escuelas públicas Argentinas

La sanción de la Ley 26.150, de Educación Sexual Integral, se enmarca en el proceso de democratización de la escuela pública, en la medida en que propicia la equidad de género, el reconocimiento y la aceptación de las diversidades sexuales y generacionales. En el presente trabajo se analizan los datos relevados a través de una encuesta a docentes de escuelas primarias y secundarias públicas de Argentina que realizaron el curso virtual dictado por el Programa Educación Sexual Integral del Ministerio de Educación. El objetivo del trabajo fue analizar las opiniones, creencias y actitudes en temas relacionados a la sexualidad, el derecho al aborto, la diversidad sexual, la equidad de género y la sexualidad de los docentes que finalizaron el mencionado curso.

La muestra del estudio estuvo compuesta por 585 docentes. El cuestionario consistió en 40 preguntas con respuestas cerradas. Para el análisis de los datos se combinaron 3 métodos multivariantes en el siguiente orden: a) Análisis Factorial de Componentes Principales; b) Análisis de Cluster; c) Análisis de Correspondencias. Para aproximarse a los valores que permean los temas de la sexualidad los categorizamos en el continuo "liberal/conservador" y analizamos en qué medida las respuestas de los docentes frente a las cuestiones indagadas se ubican en relación con estos dos polos.

Los principales resultados muestran que los docentes al ser indagados acerca de la deconstrucción del sexismo y la diversidad sexual, se acercan al polo liberal del continuo. Sin embargo, al momento de responder por cuestiones de género, interpelados de forma personal, o cuando las indagaciones sobre la diversidad sexual dejan de ser generales y apelan a cuestiones familiares y/o personales, sus respuestas se acercan más al polo conservador del continuo. Asimismo, el mapa de las representaciones de los docentes según regiones geográficas de Argentina muestra una marcada heterogeneidad.

Contemporary patterns of migration in the world-system and the politics of citizenship

This paper argues that our understanding of migration changes fundamentally once the relevant unit of analysis is shifted from the nation-state to the world as a whole. Elsewhere, we have argued that ascriptive criteria centered on national identity and citizenship, and the relevant state policies emerging thereof, have served as a fundamental basis of stratification and inequality in the world since the nineteenth century. Moreover, we have indicated that the growth of between-country inequality through most of the last two centuries became a driving force for the migration of labor and capital: growing income disparities between nations over time generated strong incentives (e.g., drastically lower wages in poor countries) for both the migration of workers to higher-wage markets and the "outsourcing" of skilled and unskilled jobs to peripheral countries. Both trends exercised a "market bypass" that over the last two decades have been overcoming the twentieth century institutional constraints on labor flows that characterized the development of the world-economy. In the proposed paper, we further specify and expand our arguments by developing a new model that seeks to identify the main forces driving migration across the world-economy. We test this model by drawing on an original cross-national dataset on population flows: this exercise allows us to more precisely identify country- and region-specific patterns of outgoing and incoming migration, and to assess the relative weight of specific variables (e.g., wage differentials between countries, the extent of income inequality and social mobility in sending and receiving countries, civil war, famine, geopolitical location and migration policy regimes) in explaining these patterns. Finally, we consider the social and political tensions that have accompanied recent changes in these migration patterns, and discuss how these tensions are shaping the politics of citizenship across the world and the future direction of population flows.

Surveillance and responsabilization

Surveillance is expanding and spreading to new directions, and is accompanied by new practices which resemble surveillance. Consequently, the concept of surveillance is evading solid definition and turning into a power race between the authorities and the public. In the presentation, I will discuss new tendencies which support, extend, undermine and replace old forms of surveillance. As since the origins of surveillance, the authorities aim to gain power over the citizens by controlling them with technical equipment. Traditional surveillance is accompanied by counter-surveillance practices in which the public is turning the gaze against the authorities. The public is able to play with surveillance turning it into performance, social watching and amateur monitoring. People have been 'hijacking' surveillance. However, the main focus of mine is on how the authorities 'hit back'. There is an increasing tendency for responsabilization of the public and the authorities encouraging the public to participate in 'controlwork'. They endeavour to harness of private observers to serve the purposes of the powerful, to take part in crime prevention and control. This has become apparent in the proliferation of interactive Internet sites with surveillance functions. Thus far there is no clear picture of the directions to which this responsabilization expands, but location of the first sites range from international borders, such as the border between the US and Mexico (blueservo.net), to the interiors of local shops (interneteyes.co.uk). Neoliberalism has adjusted people to this mode in many other fields – it is easy to accept the call for responsabilization.

Children of prisoners: A case-study of social vulnerable children in Sao Paulo, Brazil

This qualitative research project is based on interviews with and drawings by children with parents in prison, who lived under vulnerable conditions in a poor neighborhood in the city of Marília, Sao Paulo State in the years 2000-2002. The children belong to socially excluded groups of the Brazilian population due to their poverty and their being stigmatized as the children of prison inmates. Two university students Rute Bernardo Pinto and Sandra Regina Galdino Miyashiro, recipients of CNPq/UNESP grants, conducted the interviews with the children and their public school teachers. This research questions whether 7 to 10-year-old children, whose parents are in prison, have difficulty when interacting with other children and teachers, and difficulty learning compared to children whose parents are not prisoners. The research was held in a school because it is an institution outside the family and it was possible to reach the children's vision of their own families at school. Our results show that children act differently, depending on which relative is imprisoned and the causes of imprisonment. However, all the children in these circumstances suffered emotionally and financially. Teachers have different attitudes toward children of prisoners. Sometimes they demonstrate prejudice, other times they try to help them. However, in general, they are not concerned about the children's problems outside of school. The teachers' speech about crime and legal punishment in the classroom conflicts with the children's lives. The research did not find any differences between children of prisoners and other children regarding their capacity of learning.

Formas identitarias de la precariedad: El trabajo de los jóvenes de clases populares

La comunicación analiza las formas identitarias de los jóvenes de clases populares insertos en trabajos precarios.

Distinguiendo la identidad del trabajo y la identidad en el trabajo, se problematiza la noción de precariedad analizando las trayectorias subjetivas de los jóvenes e inscribiendo los relatos acerca del trabajo en el conjunto de prácticas sociales.

Se analizan diferentes formas identitarias tomando dimensiones tales como la estabilidad/inestabilidad, la inscripción subjetiva en proyectos de formación (fuerte/debil) la regularidad de la actividad del trabajo (permanente/ocasional) así como las dimensiones de género.

La investigación de base corresponde a una tesis de doctorado defendida en Francia en diciembre de 2011. Se adopta un enfoque cualitativo y mediante un seguimiento longitudinal se realizaron entrevistas a 35 jóvenes durante tres años, (2 a 3 entrevistas a cada uno) así como una encuesta a alrededor de 200 jóvenes

Identidad social de jóvenes suburbanos de clases populares en Argentina

La comunicación analiza la construcción de la identidad social de jóvenes de clases populares a principios del siglo XXI que habitan en una localidad en el conurbano de Buenos Aires.

Partiendo de una deconstrucción de la noción de "jóvenes pobres" se analiza la construcción fenomenológica de la identidad social, explorando el juego de tensiones entre tres elementos: los condicionamientos sociales (capital cultural social y económica de las familias de origen), la identidad atribuida a los jóvenes en las instituciones donde se socializan y las identidades deseadas. Para ello se relacionan las "trayectorias subjetivas" y las "transacciones relacionales" y las "transacciones biográficas" que relatan los jóvenes en las entrevistas.

Se adoptó un enfoque cualitativo y mediante un seguimiento longitudinal se realizaron entrevistas a 35 jóvenes durante tres años, (2 a 3 entrevistas a cada uno) así como una encuesta a alrededor de 200 jóvenes.

Japanese student movements in the global 1960s: Encounter of the local context and the transnational context

In the late 60s, the United States, West Germany, France, Mexico, Poland, and several other countries experienced the student movements. The 1960s is called the decade of world upheaval partly because of large-scale student movements occurring simultaneously in various regions and countries. As to its background, recent scholarships focus on transnational context: the legacy of the Second World War, the Cold War, the Vietnam War, decolonization in Africa, students' interaction across the seas, and diffusion of counterculture thanks to improvements in transportation and communication technologies. Due to these, many of the student movements in the 1960s shared issues, strategies and ideas in common, but they also appeared only in specific regions and countries, not evenly around the globe.

Japan also witnessed campus uprisings led by the radical or New Left students in the late 1960s. Out of all the universities in Japan, 127 (33.7%) experienced student strikes and building occupations in 1968, and 153 (40.6%) experienced the same in 1969 (Ono 1990: 28). The students protested against their authoritarian university faculty and administration, the government's cooperation with the American Vietnam War, and the capitalistic Japanese society. Their movements had four characteristics that distinguished them from the movements in other countries: much stronger influence of communism and Marxism, the proliferation of the New Left sects, violent tendency in the protests, and the students' existential inclination, as the most popular slogan "Self Negation" indicates.

This presentation examines a case study of the University of Tokyo Struggle from 1968 to 1968 to show that these four distinct characteristics resulted from the interaction of the transnational context and the local context of Japan in the 1960s. In addition, this presentation demonstrates how the 1960s can provide sociological research on today's transnational social movement with some insights on connections between localism and globalism.

Global challenges and local needs – How European mobility of medical doctors affects on health inequalities, findings of health prometheus

Background: The extent of mobility within Europe has increased markedly over the last decade after the EU Accession. As regards of free movement of persons, relevant EU Treaty provisions include the principle of freedom of movement for 'workers'. On the other hand and given that equity is also a core principle in Europe, there is a concern that mobility of health labor force might create inequity in access to care in certain countries.

Objectives: Health PROMeTHEUS project undertook mapping of health professionals' mobility between the EU countries and the other relevant OECD countries. The aim was drawing the magnitude of professional mobility and identify critical issues on health systems.

Methods: Interactive data collection form was used to collect data from 35 countries on the exact numbers of professionals, specialization area and educational information in the recent years, moreover on citizenship and experiences overseas.

Results: Data was collected regarding the years 1988, 2003 and 2007, thus the significant impact of the EU Accession on mobility flows can be observed. The most important finding is the identification of the source/donor and target/recipient countries in the mobility flow. The analysis pointed out that the top target countries are the United Kingdom and Sweden. Further, several European countries play mixed role, namely these countries operate source and target countries simultaneously. It can be seen that African and Asian countries and Australia also provides an important source for medical doctors who are working in the EU.

Conclusions: It is highly prioritized to monitor the sustainability of health systems, especially in source countries. Health professionals' mobility modifies the numbers of professionals in different countries. The challenges are distinguished: target countries should integrate their inflow and provide equal rights, and source countries should compensate their lack in order to avoid patients' inequalities in accessing health care.

Medical profession and medical error prevention in Hungary

Reducing medical errors has become an international concern. The EU Accession changed the scope of mobility of health professionals and patients and is getting wider significance on international level. This calls the attention of cross-border health care and the focus on quality issues of medical profession and patient safety, particularly in newly accessed countries.

The aim of the present study is to reveal important issues of medical profession, such as professional standards, training, licensing, revalidation and accountability that can play a preventive role against medical errors, thus increase patient safety.

The European Care Collaboration – Cross-border Health Care project is an EU founded project which concentrates on different aspects of health profession and the consequences of patient mobility. This paper summarizes the mapping exercise about current situation of health care professionals and policy related decisions in Hungary by conducting interviews with leaders of medical professional bodies.

The findings show that the comprehensive and widespread health reform „Revived health care, recovering Hungary – Semmelweis Plan to save health care” provides guidelines in order to harmonize Hungarian health system with European health recommendations and directives. In terms of professional guidelines and quality improvement responsibilities were shared by new institutions and organizations, further, new strategies were established. Medical training is high quality in Hungary, however new initiatives were introduced to develop the education system due to the European standards. Fitness to practice is ensured by the strict licensing and revalidation process. Preventing medical errors patient safety has become a highly prioritized topic and learning from failures of health care system is underlined.

Current interventions can significantly facilitate strengthening and developing quality in medical field and promote patient safety. Understanding different approaches in member states can help maintaining compatible legislation.

Critical theories in Latin America

Critical Theory (with a capital 'C' and a capital 'T') emerged at a specific place and a specific time. It was the expression of a group of young German academics who reacted to the dehumanizing experiences provoked by the crisis that Europe went through during the first decades of the 20th century.

Critical Theorists believed that their experiences and critique of modern societies were representative for all modern societies regardless of the experiences that people in other societies may have gone through. Adorno even thought that nobody who had not made the same experiences that he and his European colleagues have made were qualified to get involved in the important enterprise of Kritik. He was especially concerned about the "non-occidental people", because he did not trust their critical faculties. Critical Theory was reserved for a selected group of Europeans.[1]

Today, however, we are realizing that beyond many affinities experiences in and within global modernity vary. For instance: post-colonial critique has not only argued convincingly that colonialism has been a constitutive element in the formation of global modernity, but it has also shown that in formerly colonized societies problématiques emerged that critical theories from the 'North' were simply not aware of.

Since Latin American societies gained official independence some 200 years ago, post-colonial experiences accumulated and reflected about in this part of the world are particularly rich. In this paper I will try to show what kind of critical theories emerged in this part of the world.

Self-determination, deliberative democracy, networks and positive ecology via community initiatives in Tasmania, Australia

One significance of self-determination is that it can reduce reliance on the market and the state as an organizing mechanism. The benefits in essence derive from intrinsic motivation, that is, autonomy, versus external motivation, that is heteronomy. This paper builds on self-determination using networks as a broader organizing mechanism, where horizontal linkages connect emerging movements for change. Positive ecology is proposed as underpinning both these concepts, in terms of socio-ecological synergies, where satisfying our own needs for psychological health serendipitously coincide with the needs of others and the environment. Building systems involving positive ecology, and that directly address self-determination, based on people forming quality social relationships with others via networks of many loose and strong ties, allows less reliance on political-economic systems that tend to reduce opportunities for self-determination, and replace intrinsic motivation with external controls. The testing and tempering of ideas through deliberative democracy is an additional concept important to this vision. This paper links the micro (in terms of self-determination theory), the meso (in terms of social development) and the macro (in terms of deliberative democracy and sustainable society). It contends that alongside self-determination, inequality is the main issue to be addressed in building sustainable systems, for which participation is important first step. Finally this paper will investigate community initiatives in North-West Tasmania for their potential to further self-determination, deliberative democracy and ideas of positive ecology.

Climate change concern versus scepticism: The Norwegian case

To what extent are people's attitudes towards climate change part of broader cultural, class and power distribution patterns?

There is a widespread and increasing literature on the demographics, attitudes, knowledge and perceptions of climate change. This field of study reveal that variations in climate change concern follows well known empirical patterns on social variables like age, gender, class and education, position on the left/right scale in elections and so on.

Climate change, like many environmental threats facing modern societies, may only be perceived through science, or rather as scientifically based warnings transmitted through various media. We depend on external knowledge to define our own attitudes. Compared to situations where the dangers that surround us are concrete and tangible it becomes vital if we trust or distrust scientifically produced knowledge.

Following Bourdieu's analytical approach this paper examines the relationship between social class (fractions), trust in science and climate change attitudes. We hypothesize that climate change concern in Norway is affiliated with the upper left strata of Bourdieu's scheme – that is class fractions with more cultural than economic capital. In the Norwegian context (as in many other countries) these are highly educated people, who often hold positions in public sector, working in governmental offices that also provide them with a basis for power.

The study will be based on a national representative survey of approximately 4000 Norwegians. Data collection will take place in January 2012. The survey is designed to study how environmental attitudes, lifestyles and consumption are woven into the fabric of society's social and cultural structure. It will enable us to study how approval of or resistance to climate change concern is connected to cultural and economic resources and access to power.

Building schools and futures with utopian social movements in Buenos Aires

In December 2001, after more than a decade of neoliberal governance, Argentina was in a severe political, economic and social crisis. The extreme levels of poverty and unemployment led some desperately frustrated Argentines to organize themselves into "movements of unemployed workers" (MTDs) while others "recovered" their former workplaces. Buenos Aires has continued to be the site of intense theorizing, debate, and experimentation in forms of radical democracy that are fundamentally utopian in origin. These movements are "utopian" in the sense that they bring their radical vision of the future into the present through attempted immediate transformation of both material conditions and social relationships. The key aspects of this utopian future/present are consensus-based decision making and leaderless institutional structures. This paper examines the experience of one such experiment, an MTD-run adult education program known as a bachillerato popular (people's high school). The school—part of a larger trend among MTDs—is run collectively by teachers and students working together to construct popular, socially-conscious education that is more responsive to the needs of the community it serves. This paper draws on 11 months of participant observation and interviews to examine how the school's utopian goals are defined and practiced on the ground. I use my vantage point as a teacher-militante in the school to analyze how this particular bachillerato popular re-invents educational and political practices. The bachillerato popular demonstrates the potential for utopian social change projects to not only imagine but create alternative futures, as well as some of their limitations.

Clientelist practices, political identities and social movements: The configuration of the political scene in La Matanza (Buenos Aires)

As we are aware today, forms of participation and political identities are the result of an expansion and mutation of the democratic political system, which is not only exclusive of Argentine; the political crisis of 2001 was a point of inflexion in political parties, in the relations between citizens and politicians, and meant the implosion of new social actors (social movements, piqueteros organizations, etc.), with new links and political identities. In this sense, the present paper is intended to put in discussion the different forms of participation in the district of La Matanza (the greatest of Buenos Aires), taking into account the following aspects: the link between clientelism and social movements, regarding how these networks operate in action protest, demonstrations, etc., in function of encouraging or not such practices; the modes of implementation of social policies at the local level, promote or discourage clientelism; the links between the local leaderships (mayor, leading politicians, leaders, etc), and clientelist practices. The complexities of the global socium: The need for a non-linear humanistic sociological imagination

I. Prigogine has worked out the theory "The Arrow of the time", according to which all the matter (this concerns as material as social worlds) is being developed increasingly quicker. So the dynamic of the global socium becomes more and more complex, including points of bifurcation and the development in the direction from complexity to hypercomplexity – to the socium in which people are losing their ability to control their own processes.

The non-linear social and cultural dynamics has influenced the essence of the sociological imagination that has its roots in the works of C.W. Mills. Recently P. Sztompka, U. Beck, S. Fuller, G. Delanty have made the attempts to update the sociological imagination. But today in my opinion even the newer theoretical approaches to the sociological imagination should be elaborated. We need a new type - that is a non-linear humanistic sociological imagination. Its main features are: it should recognize the validity of different types of sociological thinking and theorizing taking into consideration that sociologists work in different tempo-worlds; focus on what I have called the riskological turn - pay special attention to interplays between analyses of physical and social worlds, to risk traps, manufactured uncertainties, ambivalent consequences of the appearance of posthuman realities; deal with discontinuities and paradoxes of modern socium, different types of rationality as well as irrationality, with the global and local; take into account the increasing influence of the cultural coding; regard human's health as the main value, taking into consideration the complex health of the body, mind and soul.

Participation in financing system and in monetary relations in the past, present and future – Can participation in financingsystems bring solutions for the global financial and banking crisis and lead to more social justice?

Volkmar Kreissig, IEB Chemnitz

For answering this question and giving some outview it is necessary to go back to the history of this system and to classical explanations. Today there is much confusion in the definition of the role of global money, of world wide financial crisis and in general of capitalism. It is necessary to study or to use Marx, Schumpeter's and Hilferding's analyses again as well as to go back to the classic economists in 19. century.

Why not to use the terms "financial capital" and "Monopolcapitalism" (Hilferding) again to make clear the social relationship in the financial relations. Why not to make clear again that is speculation which drives the capitalist economies in crises? When today is used the term "greed" as an positive value in the public discussion, its necessary to explain that this so called "value" destroys normal relationship between people in the capitalist society?

Under such conditions of world economy there is for researchers a need to regard, which legal possibilities of participation have had stakeholders in history and have today to control financial activities of banking and money system and in the speculation activities. How can participation be used and what are its possibilities today and the realities of public, state and stakeholders control and how they are used in reality to limit speculation and misuse of financial systems and monetary flows and indebtedness of states?

Summarising will be described existing opportunities of public, state and stakeholders control and participation in financing systems, will be discussed opportunities of regulations in the future and possibilities of the fight against crises and citizen losses within capitalist global organised speculation oriented financing systems.

participation and democratisation can be a crucial step into a new area without collapses in banking and finance system

Gender equality politics and age relations in workplaces

In light of rising average ages, it has been argued in the political debate, that the working population has to increase, and that people will have to continue working into older ages. It has also, however, frequently been shown, that elderly people are excluded from working life, and it has been argued that discrimination against older people in recruitment processes is the strongest discrimination in the workplace.

At the same time, current aging takes place in a political context where the achievement of gender equality is in many cases a key political goal. This is the case, not the least in work places. Questions of how gender equality and age relations relate to one another have been scarcely studied. However, it has been shown that even if gender equality is high on the political agenda, there is no guarantee that also equal age relations are regarded as an important goal. Further it has been shown that one has attempted to increase female representation in decision-making bodies with the help of ageist measures. Hence, there are grounds for empirically analyzing gender equality policy as a context for age relations and exclusions in workplaces.

In this paper will I provide such a discussion by using qualitative data and through investigating, firstly, how workplaces are organized by gender equality politics and discrimination laws, and secondly, the implication this have for constructions of age relations. I will limit my discussions to issues raised in the Swedish context.

Inclusión en la escuela secundaria y justicia educativa

Durante las últimas décadas participamos en América Latina de un nuevo escenario social y político, con cambios en el papel del Estado, la primacía del mercado y los modelos neoliberales y con dinámicas sociales atravesadas por la desigualdad socio económica y educativa, y por lo tanto, procesos de exclusión social que marcan las experiencias de adolescentes y jóvenes de la región.

En la Argentina este contexto afectó especialmente, durante la década de los noventa, a los sectores más pobres de la sociedad, configurando durante la crisis del 2001, mayores niveles de exclusión social y una significativa pérdida de soportes sociales y materiales para la participación social, aunque con un desarrollo significativo de redes de sobrevivencia constituidas en la sociedad civil.

Este trabajo hace foco en la situación socioeducativa de adolescentes y jóvenes, y cambios experimentados durante estos últimos diez años considerando el contexto social y educativo, el papel del Estado y las políticas públicas, y las trayectorias educativas de adolescentes y jóvenes. Religious conversion, social inclusion and community under pressure: The South African Jewish experience

Ethnic minority groups face many pressures to adapt their unique identities, values and practices to those of their broader societies especially in circumstances of dramatic change. A range of options exist including assimilation, intermarriage, immigration, insulation or even suicide. Can religious conversion be considered as an adaptation strategy? Does conversion assist a community under pressure or in decline to expand its numbers and/or embrace diversity? Is conversion helpful to a community under threat? This paper looks at the South African Jewish community which has declined over the years due to immigration and age. The community today is described as highly ethnocentric and although it has benefited from the transition to democracy and post-apartheid discourses of reconciliation and diversity, it has at the same time become more insular and inward-looking. The community is dominated by Ultra-Orthodox institutions and endogamy is strongly encouraged. Judaism is not a proselytising religion and therefore has always discouraged conversion. Nonetheless conversion to Judaism in post-apartheid South Africa has remained steady and the majority of conversions to Judaism are undertaken by women for marital reasons. Is this form of endogamy 'successful'? How do the conversion authorities respond to these converts during the process and after? Converts directly contribute to the future of the Jewish community, but do they feel socially included and accepted? How does the process contribute to the survival of a community that perceives itself to be under threat? This study is based on a number of qualitative, in-depth interviews with converts and rabbinical authorities. It argues that although the current process has the opportunity to contribute positively to the community's development and growth it can be, in many cases, self-defeating with a number of negative outcomes for the community that appear to extend beyond the current generation.

Esta ponencia presenta hallazgos parciales de una investigación empírica más amplia sobre jóvenes, nación y política, realizada en Buenos Aires y alrededores, en el año 2010 y 2011. Se expone un análisis que relaciona dos instancias de este estudio: a) los resultados del cuestionario escrito aplicado a estudiantes del último año del secundario (N=275), particularmente el ítem en que se solicita a los alumnos ponderar acciones que representan diferentes relatos sobre la ciudadanía, y b) los hallazgos de una indagación cualitativa en la cual se trabajó con un grupo reducido de la misma muestra (N=25), generando deliberaciones y propuestas en torno a una problemática de vivienda presente en su espacio social. Se analizan las respuestas desde la perspectiva de la psicología cultural, tomando especialmente los conceptos de Wertsch (1994) de "acción mediada" y "herramienta cultural". Se discuten qué acciones y relatos de ciudadanía generan dinámicas de inclusión y cuáles de exclusión, intentando brindar aportes que contribuyan a la formación de una ciudadanía activa, con una dimensión social y política significativa. Se comparan los resultados obtenidos en la muestra total y los hallazgos que se extraen de las respuestas y soluciones propuestas por los alumnos en el trabajo grupal reducido, observando de qué manera las primeras respuestas son proyectadas hacia la acción concreta. Se examinan los marcos de posibilidad o restricción psicológica que ofrecen para la transformación del ambiente socio-cultural, entendiendo por tal a los espacios donde se "juegan" múltiples significados semánticos para la acción y el pensamiento de los jóvenes.

Modelos de ciudadanía y su rol en la construcción política de la nación, como proyecto común: Un análisis de las representaciones de jóvenes egresantes del sistema escolar (Ciudad de Buenos Aires y Conurbano Bonarense, 2010-11)

Esta ponencia presenta avances de una investigación (2010-11) sobre los significados y valoraciones atribuidos a la política y la ciudadanía y las relaciones entre ellos por parte de jóvenes argentinos. El estudio se realiza entre 275 alumnos de 17 a 19 años, en siete escuelas de CABA y alrededores, de diversos niveles socio-económicos. El abordaje combina técnicas cuantitativas y cualitativas, presentando hallazgos referidos a la primera, consistente en un cuestionario escrito autoadministrable diseñado ad hoc para esta investigación. Se analizan dos ítems: uno apunta a conocer qué concepciones de ciudadanía y política concurren en el ideal de los jóvenes sobre el "buen ciudadano"; y otro indaga su experiencia y disposición a participar social y políticamente. Se toma como punto de partida una hipótesis surgida de estudios previos (Kriger, 2010) que señala un antagonismo entre las representaciones de estos términos en el contexto post-crítico argentino, signado por el divorcio entre ciudadanía y política expresado en diciembre 2001, planteando el problema del ejercicio ciudadano activo de los jóvenes prescindiendo de la política. Actualmente, en un contexto de reencantamiento de lo público y de revalorización de la política en la sociedad argentina en general y en los estudiantes en particular, se propone abordar los procesos de articulación de la ciudadanía y la política, conociendo los modos en que se organizan en las representaciones vigentes de los jóvenes para detectar sentidos propios y singulares. Se analizan las concepciones previas y paradigmas presentes en los modelos de ciudadanía reconocidos por los entrevistados, y su relación con la nación como comunidad imaginada-imaginándose, dotada de densidad histórica y proyección política. Finalmente, se discute la doble potencia de estas configuraciones representacionales y su función como restricciones psicológicas, que pueden limitar y posibilitar los modos específicos de acceso a la política por parte de una nueva generación de ciudadanos.

Art and legitimacy: Rojas cultural center gallery

At present the papers about the Rojas Cultural Center Gallery refer to a group of young artists with common interests and a distinctive body of work. It is argued that it was a cohesive social circle, with a coherent worldview and defined aesthetics. Not only was the Rojas Gallery interpreted as a social identity and aesthetic, but also discursively constituted in the canon of an era, "in art of the decade" in the "mirror of his time" in "the aesthetics of the '90s" (Dávila, 2011). However, this reading was a speech that, accumulating layers of meaning, was established a posteriori as emblematic. During the early years (1989-1992), speeches on the Rojas Cultural Center Gallery were rare, brief and marginal. Since 1992, through journalistic criticism, a substantive identity began to be established with the formulation of the concept of "art light" and "Rojas Gallery artists." A short time later, in 1993, that which had been stated by critics became a battlefield for artists with distinct characteristics to take different positions, a field of struggle for legitimization and consecration.

Avatar politics

The aim of this paper is to examine political leaders' use of visual images in social media. More specifically, what rhetorical work do politicians' profile pictures on Facebook perform? And how are these visual performances and projected qualities of political leaders commented upon? Firstly, the profile pictures of Jens Stoltenberg, Prime Minister of Norway, are analyzed in light of what I have coined "avatar politics." This is synthesized politics in visualized form, made possible by photographs' special ways of creating immediacy, proximity and realism. Secondly, some common rhetorical features of avatar politics are explored by comparing the profile pictures of Stoltenberg with those of Nicolas Sarkozy, David Cameron and Barack Obama. Thirdly, the textual comments to the mentioned politicians' profile pictures are examined both quantitatively and qualitatively. Do commentators find politicians in these profile pictures alive and "present?" It is argued that avatar politics create new platforms for contact between politicians and their voters, however weak and unstable these may be.

Measuring well-being - Consequences for political stakeholders and parties

An intense debate is currently going on in many countries concerning how societal well-being should be measured. Countries such as the UK, for instance, now gauge subjective well-being through official statistics and are designing broader indicators of national well-being as a basis for public policy. This paper outlines the consequences of such initiatives for political stakeholders. The development of sets of indicators of national well-being are bringing to light six far-reaching developments for political stakeholders: (i) a new culture of accountability can make its way into politics; (ii) political debates are once again being put on a more factual basis; and (iii) evidence-based policy measures can result from the more prominent role of well-being indicators. For political parties in particular, well-being measurement has a number of implications: (iv) they are being given a new opportunity to develop an overarching narrative; (v) what really separates the different parties is becoming more evident; and (vi) the issues of the current debate can counteract widespread disenchantment with politics and inspire people once more to take an interest in the issues about how we want to live together as a society. As an illustration of the abovementioned developments, this paper introduces a set of »social democratic indicators«. By this means, it can be made clearer what the political ideology of social democracy stands for: social mobility, equality, access to quality jobs and a decent level of living. In sum, measurement of well-being will hold both opportunities and challenges for the public policy process.

The telling of disaster, from monologue to dialogue

Monologue is a fitting description of much of what passes for the social study of disaster. Students of calamity rarely include the voices of victims in their reasoned accounts, leaving a trail of important, if somewhat barren, work behind them. If it is true that immense swaths of human experience are routinely hidden behind the abstractions of academic disciplines, our intent is to assemble a mass of testimony not easily talked down by general propositions. One way to re-enchant the study of disaster, we argue, is to stick to the concrete. Our paper brings to first intensity the lived experiences of Hurricane Katrina narrated in a series of in-depth conversations with residents of two New Orleans' neighborhoods. It is a story of the micro-confusion of disaster. Each person we spoke with was faced with cobbling together a biographical solution to the seemingly endless array of contradictions forced on them by the confluence of an all encompassing catastrophe and a woefully inadequate state and federal response. From escaping the water, to life in exile, to returning and rebuilding, "Miss Katrina" opened a lingering moment in which life was lived on a scheme of uncertified possibilities. Their stories challenge several of the working assumptions of the normal social science model of disaster. By way of a conclusion, we make the case that the words of those who lived disaster pry open new and challenging questions in the study of people and calamity.

Crucial case study of case studies

Compared to experiments, case studies have a low reputation in social sciences. Having a dual meaning which allows them to be misconceptualized as a type of research strategy that suggests necessarily a logic of qualitative inquiry and/or a sampling technique that assumes the sample equal to one, the case study is widely misunderstood and faces a situation where the research approach as such is undervalued and discredited – symbolizing a research endeavor with low validity and, hence, of little academic merit. To show that this development, although unfortunate, is not totally unfounded, a critical sample of case studies that have been published in the leading social science journals in the past 20 years will be analyzed in detail. As the argument of the paper develops, it will be demonstrated that despite the methodological solutions that have been proposed, even these authors contribute to the misconceptualization of the approach by disseminating papers in psychology, sociology and political science that lack clarity about what the method stands for, hardly ever refer to any of its methodologists and in few cases that they do, are so unspecific that it is impossible to understand what exactly is implied. However, contrary to Campbell's propagated image of case study as having just "one shot" (treatment followed by observation), these publications apply much more complicated research designs (including laboratory, field, natural and thought experiments), use sample sizes much larger than one and make large number of observations which are analyzed with statistical and non-statistical data analysis tools. Altogether, this shows a systematic, yet paradoxical development – ignorance towards methodological developments of the research tradition by scholars publishing case studies in the leading social science journals on the one hand, and use of almost any kind of methodological techniques that the researcher(s) see(s) as applicable, on the other.

Gendering health human resource policy and management: A scoping exercise of Canada, Australia and Germany Across countries, shortages and many cases of inefficient use of qualified staff together with changes in the composition of the professional workforce by age, gender and citizenship have created an urgent call for more efficient health workforce governance and substantive organizational reform. In this paper we bring a gender lens to the health human resource (HHR) policy, planning and management. We apply a context-sensitive comparative approach using case studies drawn from Australia, Canada and Germany. In terms of method we draw on a literature review and document analysis and other research carried out by the authors. Our findings highlight different things. First, an emergent field of HHR does not fully ignore gender issues, but creates new forms of 'limited inclusion' of gender as sex category that sits more easily with the technocratic nature of HHR and the wider public sector management. This revival of the sex category in HHR as a substitute of complex gendered dynamics is reinforced by an overall disconnection between gender research and HHR debates. Second, changes in the institutional governance arrangements, in the health professions and the organizations together with the educational system intersect and shape the specific outcome of gendered workforce dynamics. In summary, the international perspective brings the intersecting dynamics of a gendered health workforce into view that need to be addressed more systematically in health human resource policy and management.

Medicine and management as twin forces: Comparing new modes of control in European hospitals

Across countries, management has brought tighter controls into all areas of clinical practice, responding mainly to financial shortages coupled with increasing public demand for quality and safety of care. Management is not simply expanding and creating new roles for non-clinical managers, but doctors, too, are charged with managerial responsibilities. In this paper we seek to explore how the transformations in medicine and management matter in the control of clinical practice and whether they create opportunities for more integrated, less hierarchical relationships in healthcare. We apply a context-sensitive comparative approach drawing on case study material from seven European countries, namely Denmark, Netherlands, Germany, Poland, Portugal, Spain and Greece; research was carried out by the authors and includes analyses of policy documents, primary and secondary sources and additional expert information. The findings highlight that the transformation in the relationship between medicine and management can take the form of 'hybridisation', 'integration' or more separated 'co-existence' of managerialism and professional self-governing capacities. Interestingly, these patterns may not only vary between countries but also within one organisation depending on both the level of governance (hospital or department) and the area of control (funding or quality and safety issues). The effects of new modes of control are therefore highly complex, diverse and context-depend, including opportunities for remaking professional power. 'Global' models of control are not only shaped by institutions when transferred to 'local' contexts, but organisational settings and actors also matter, and this, in turn, puts new challenges on comparative health policy mainly concerned with institutional settings.

Human security and emancipation: Measurements and issues

The concept of human security, which has undergone a radical change in traditional security research through the change of the referent object to the individual from the State, has three dimensions: freedom from fear, freedom from want, and freedom to make their own decisions, signifying emancipation. Broadening this thinking, the idea of freeing people of fear and giving them freedom to want are prerequisites to achieve autonomy, this is not necessarily so, because in some situations emancipation comes before deprivation. The lack of consensus regarding the threats which cause Human Insecurity allows for growth in criticism, such as the debate surrounding the instrumental use of the term to justify 'humanitarian' intervention; on the one hand, strengthening the concept or weakening it, whilst on the other hand, acknowledging that the term has an extremely broad and adaptable meaning, transforming the academic and political discourse regarding Human Security into an innocuous analysis on that scenario. This work aims at verifying the existing methods of measuring Human Security, such as the index used by James Michel and King & Murray, who consider data related to underdevelopment; GECHS Index of Human Insecurity (The Global Environmental Change and Human Security Project) Index of Human Insecurity (IHI), which measures security in social, environmental, economic and institutional domains, and the Human Security Report Index, which attempts to analyze Security through the number of death caused by crimes and conflicts, the similarities and differences, weakness and disabilities of the methodologies, try to contribute to the academic debate about Human Security, in search of a better understanding of emancipation and empowerment of people, and as such aims to transform victimized individuals into empowered people.

Building an ivory tower in the age of globalization? The process of construction hierarchical academic order in contemporary education through international university rankings University rankings during last decade became extremely popular and "fashionable" topic for general discussions and also for academic researches. As Hazelkorn mentioned in her recently published book (2011), "there is a growing obsession with university rankings around the world. What started as an academic exercise in the early 20th century in the US became a commercial 'information' service for students in the 1980s and the progenitor of a 'reputation race' with geo-political implications today". Also there is strong critique of the general idea of ranking regarding educational institutions and the existing methodologies of evaluation of the quality of university performance - "many of institutional leaders set rankings as their benchmark in their vision or master plan for the university. Nevertheless, academics are quite skeptical of rankings because they believe that they mislead higher education institutions as well as have enormous methodological limitations"(Shin, Toutkoushian, Teichler, 2011).

Our idea is to look at rankings as a certain innovative technology, which enforces dramatic changes of university education in the context of globalization and helps to create global hierarchy of academic institutions. The creation of global educational space, started in the last decades of the 20th century, provoked numerous challenges for national universities as the centre of producing of the certain type of cultural identity (Readings, 1996). In situation of these changes, rankings become driving tools for university managers how to reform the university. They also shape the concept of "world class university"(Salmi, 2009) as the ideal model (in Weberian sense) of university in contemporary situation. Our idea is to analyze and to compare 3 variants of such academic hierarchies, based in 2011 on the most influential university rankings: 1) Academic ranking of world universities (ARWU); 2) Times higher education world university rankings and 3) QS World University Rankings.

'Fuck middle class... burning and looting tonight!': Forging the activist's body in contemporary Germany

Contemporary radical activists in 'postdemocratic' Europe are mostly recruited from the social milieu of middle class. The middle classness is deeply inscribed in their bodies, corporeal dispositions, or better, habituses during the time of socialization. We argue that the process of becoming an activist challenges middle class dispositions and opens possibilities for the neverending transformation of the middle class habitus into an activist habitus. In our paper, we will describe this transformation using the example of the process of forging the activist's body in contemporary radical youths in Germany. The focus of the paper will be twofold in this context. First, we describe the long term transformation dynamics from the pacifist middle class body into the ready-to-fight body of activists. The tendency towards the not-only-symbolic but as well action-oriented body of activists will be grasped. Second, we scrutinize the 'corporeality' and micro-politics of the active body of protesters during direct actions and riots. The examples from our long-term ethnographical research among activists from Germany and their political activities in the Czech Republic, France, Denmark, Mexico, Germany and Greece will be used.

Legalization of functional food in late-modern Japan: A sociological analysis of the state legitimization of "health food" and "health drug" and some considerations of its implications for the risk-society thesis and the medicalization of life thesis

In Japan, as in other so-called developed countries, rules and regulations concerning drugs and foods have been elaborated. According to these rules and regulations, drugs, on the one hand, had to take approved shapes such as powder, pellet, tablet and so on, and they were not permitted to be advertised to be effective in disease prevention or health maintenance. On the other hand, foods were prohibited to be sold in a drug-like shape, or with any hint of effect of disease cure/prevention or health maintenance. In 1991, in this thitherto illicit space between drug and food based on the legally rigid distinction between them, a new type of food was legalized. This type of food was allowed to advertised to be effective in prevention of a particular lifestyle-related disease, and in 2001, it became legal to sell food in a drug-like shape. This legalization of "health food" and "health drug" in the late-modern period in Japan will be analyzed from the sociological perspective, especially with reference to the interests and relative power/authority of groups and social sectors which were for or against this legalization such as state, academia, industry, and their sub-groups/sectors, and their interactions. The results will be considered in respect to their implications for sociological theories on late/post-modernity such as the risk society thesis and the medicalization of life thesis.

New models of housing supply and unjust spatial distribution of social classes in Istanbul

The most striking and radical consequences of neo liberal economic policies in terms of urban space that implemented in Turkey after the military coup in 1980, have taken place in Istanbul. Realisation of legal and administrative reforms in parallel to the structural changes in economic policies during the first half of the 1980s laid the foundations for the legitimisation and implementation of urban transformation processes and spatial consequences of these processes became increasingly salient in the second half of the 1990s and it reached in the 2000s to the extent of changing the type of urban representation that has characterised Istanbul since the 1970s. The new urban representation of Istanbul is mainly characterised by urban segregation led by large scale capital investment projects in the shape of mass housing sites constructed on the fringes of the metropolitan area, large shopping centres, large infrastructural investments as well as spaces for recreational activities and gentrification in the inner city areas that has changed the built environment of the 1960s and 1970s. As a result whole urban form has been changed including historical urban sites. This kind of urbanisation being an intensive struggle process among the social classes, has eroded significantly housing rights of majority of the population, gained through the struggles that started in the 19th century and crystallised in the rapid urbanisation process of the 1950s in Istanbul and has re-designed property ownership. In this paper we will discuss the unjust distribution of social classes in Istanbul as a result of the new housing supply models that base on property ownership in the light of comprehensive field research, implemented in Istanbul in the summer, 2011 and in the framework of right to the city conception.

Expectations and meaning: Politics between policy orientation and clientelism

According to Luhmann, social systems operate based on meaning as a medium for all communications. Each communicative event points to a surplus of potentialities, only some of which can be actualized by further communications. In this sense, meaning guarantees the indeterminacy and continuation of social systems. Semantic structures, i.e. expectations with varying degrees of abstraction, orient the selection of communications and reduce their contingency. The paper demonstrates the role of expectations for meaning determination with regard to political semantics. It contrasts the conventional systems-theoretical description of modern politics as based on party programs and policy choice with an alternative understanding, present in various political systems. This understanding conceives politics as based on clientelism, i.e. the promise of particularistic benefits in exchange for votes. Political clientelism was long regarded as a feature of developing countries only. However, research on political clientelism has demonstrated that it is not a traditional structure but a reaction to the introduction of democratic elections, and that even present-day European countries contain elements of it. The paper focuses on the way expectations about the role of politicians and expectations about public expectations in this regard form different understandings of politics in the political system and affect its operation.

Democracy surveillance through international multilateral structures

Till the end of XX century democracy existed as multiple forms of national models. In our time the global political model of democracy is creating by the new and old political actors.

The main goal of this paper is to clarify from the point of view of the sociological approach why and how International Multilateral Structures (IMs) are playing a crucial role to the consolidation of this new form of supranational democracy.

IMs can be considered as the result of liberal theoretical and ideological paradigms, but the most influence of them were created at the time of the hegemony of realism.

As organizations, IMs are separated from the environment and carry out social exchange with it on a permanent basis. In combination with the external conditions, they cause changes in the external social environment and IMs themselves. On the basis of the sociological understanding of IMs, it is proposed to categorize their main functions in the global promoting democracy process as multilateral democracy surveillance.

A specific feature of IMs as a class of organizations is their dual nature. On the one hand, IMs are established as unions of sovereign states in the form of a standing conference. On the other hand, they are formed as a complex system of societal relations between the people who have created and maintain them.

Taking in consideration of this dual nature of IMs can be a starting point for evaluation of new approach to reforming this kind of international actors.

Screening of the cognitive state as an important precondition of empirical research among older populations

The occurrence of cognitive impairments is a relevant aspect when conducting quantitative surveys on older people in nursing homes. In Germany about 60% of residents are suffering from dementia. Therefore, regarding self-report methods, the reliability of responsiveness can be questioned for cognitive impaired people. Thus, specific sampling strategies and methods like proxy assessments or non-reactive measures are needed.

Pain is a common phenomenon among people of advanced age. The project "Action Alliance Pain-free City Münster" was analysing this phenomenon in various health care facilities in one city. In this presentation – using the example of our study of 436 residents in 13 nursing homes – challenges in conducting research in older populations will be discussed and the projects' research design to cope with the complicity including populations with cognitive impairments will be presented.

Because pain is of great subjective perception among affected people, methods which rely on patients self-reports should be given priority. The reliable usage of such methods for patients with severe cognitive impairments is limited. In our study, one specific strategy regarding this challenge was conducted: the Mini-Mental-State-Examination (MMSE) was used to assess the grade of cognitive impairment. According to this screening, three patient groups were distinguished and specific methods to explore their pain suffering were adopted. Patients with no or mild impairments were interviewed with questionnaires, patients with severe impairments were observed using proxy assessments. The group with moderate impairments was examined using both, questionnaires as well as proxy assessments.

It is argued that the screening of the cognitive state should be seen as a necessity in empirical studies among people of advanced age. As one possible practical screening tool the MMSE is recommended. Depending on the cognitive state, a mix of self- and proxy-research methods might be an adequate strategy to achieve reliable results.

The embedding of ethnic and religious communities in a polycultural region of Russia: Trust, social justice and identification

The hypotheses of the research where the paper based on is taken from the theses of Robert Putnam who discovered that the increasing ethnic and religious diversity challenges social solidarity and inhibit social capital. Based on the example of Republic Tatarstan in Russia (qualitative and quantitative studies) where the half of population are Muslims, the paper shows which values and norms of social justice influence to embedding and localization of groups supported ethnic and religious identification, how do people radicalize their views of social justice in that groups and what how its corresponds with a level of trust to official and informal social institutes, which values of traditional society are taken to justify the opposition and localization of some ethnic and religious groups, how the new identification processes and forming social capital are influenced by media, everyday and official interactions.

I follow both the particularists and pluralistic approaches to social justice. Thus I believe that the concept of justice, there are only just "inside" of a particular culture (Walzer, Young, Fraser) and there is a huge differentiation among concepts of justice among communities (A. Sen). At the same time trust in particular social groups is based on mutual understandings of what constitutes "fair" and "unfair" acts, in addition, of course, and understanding of the rules of entry into certain relationships.

The new forms of social care which creates communities based on religious aspects are established in a Republic in recent 10-15 years. At the same time there are no permanent volunteer projects in Republic and there is no such perception of necessity of help as most of the population support individualistic neo-liberal concept of social justice, but these make small communities even more significant and attractive for marginalized groups of people.

Whether to remain in Japan or not: Inner conflict of foreigners after the occurrence of the great east Japan earthquake

When the Great East Japan Earthquake happened, many foreigners living in the stricken area experienced a sort of inner conflict between returning to their home country and remaining in Japan. Fear for another earthquake and Tsunami, anxiety about the influence of the nuclear accident upon themselves and their family members, especially their children, and loss of their means of living were the main causes for their returning home. On the other hand, the following were the main reasons for their decisions to remain in Japan: a sense of "responsibility" for their community, the "necessity" for taking care of their parents-in-law (especially in case of international brides), a strong insistence on remaining by Japanese family members and also a lack of money or information for returning home. In whichever case, however, they must have been put in a complicated situation between deciding whether to stay in Japan or to return home, within themselves as well as within their family. In this report, based on the interviews and questionnaire surveys with foreigners living in the coastal area of Miyagi Prefecture, I will (1) describe the reality of their inner conflict between deciding whether to stay in Japan or not, (2) examine the correlation between their decisions and their social variables. Moreover, I will (3) clarify ethical viewpoints or social standpoints underlying the assumption that remaining in Japan is a responsible act, while returning home is an excursion of their right to freedom. I will also (4) examine the process of their decision-making (conversation among family members or friends) from the viewpoints of "communicative rationality." Finally, I will (5) suggest necessary measures for foreigners to take in order to make a better decision concerning a return home in case of emergency, depending on each particular situation.

Social Policy and Mixed Governance: Lessons from South Korea

Huck-ju Kwon (Seoul National University), Taekyoon Kim (Ewha University), Jooha Lee (Dongguk University), Ilcheong Yi (UNRISD)

South Korea's developmental successes has been widely praised as one of the remarkable cases, emerging from the ashes of the Korean War and the following dictatorship to a democracy with growing economy. The transition is particularly significant because South Korea was able to reduce poverty and keep social inequality in check during the rapid economic development. It is a combination, which other emerging economies such as China or Brazil, recent Asian and Latin American success stories, have not been able to match so far.

How then did South Korea lift itself from utter destruction and destitution to affluence? How could a ruthlessly authoritarian regime metamorphose with relative ease into a stable democratic polity? What institutions and mechanisms enabled the authoritarian and democratic governments to reduce poverty and inequality? In tackling these questions, this paper deals with social policy through the lens of mixed governance. Based on the analysis, this paper calls for reinterpretation of South Korean developmental trajectories, in which social policy contributed to Korea's successful development.

Empirical reference will be made mainly to current institutional arrangements in southern African states.

The non-handling of climate change uncertainties in strategic environmental assessment of urban planning

Strategic Environmental Assessment (SEA), which in the European context is governed by the EU Directive "on the assessment of the effects of certain plans and programmes on the environment" from 2001, has been pointed out as a relevant area of focus when dealing with climate change, hereunder within urban planning.

In the European context integration of climate change in SEA is also legally required. Further comes that potential uncertainty, not just in relation to climate change but for the SEA as such is demanded explained in the environmental report. However, an analysis of Danish environmental reports with a focus on the mandatory explicit consideration of uncertainties encountered in the assessment shows that SEA practice in urban planning to a large extent does not explicitly communicate uncertainties.

Against this backdrop, this paper aims to contribute to our understanding of how actors cope with climate change uncertainty, and seeks to discuss the following question:

What are the mechanisms behind coping with uncertainty in decision-making?

For the discussion on mechanisms behind the non-handling of climate change uncertainties, coping mechanisms were developed from decision-making literature. The decision-makers handling of uncertainties are distinguished into the following coping strategies: Denying uncertainty, ignoring uncertainty and finally postponing consideration of uncertainty. Further five possible reasons behind avoiding uncertainty are proposed: Uncertainty itself, cognitive limitations, conflict avoidance, instilling trust and reliance on quantification.

Can happiness be measured? Empirical findings from latin American countries

The intention of this paper is to examine and stimulate the discussion about alternatives and sensible ways of measuring human development and show some data on this. Moreover, the aim is to explore more deeply exactly what society values, reevaluate our notion of progress and transform the way we plan, deliver and evaluate public policies that aim to improve people's life. Therefore, we start with the philosophical basis of Classical Utilitarianism, which discusses the idea that the highest function the government holds is to increase the happiness of the population. We explore the objective dimensions of happiness, a phenomenon which can possibly be measured in our concept, thanks to the latest attempts to discover what creates happiness and how to cultivate it, using the optics of new psychology, economics, neuroscience, sociology and philosophy. Faced with the possibility of aligning better public practices with happiness, we evaluate this change of priority by reflecting them on new indicators. Finally, we created the Index of Well-being (IWB) based on the discussions of Layard (2003), the Personal Security Index and the National Accounts of Well-being (NAW), modeled by the latter. It was divided into two sub-indices and their respective dimensions: the Index of Personal Well-being (IPWB - "life satisfaction", "financial situation", "health", "personal freedom", "personal values") and the Index of Social Well-being (ISWB - "community", "family relationships and friends"). We also calculate a satellite indicator – Well-being at work – as NAW. The database is the World Values Survey from 2005 and 2006 for nine Latin American countries. In the end, we evaluated the results by age, gender, country, scale of incomes, their dispersion, as well as comparing the IPWB with the ISWB and the IWB with the GDP per capita. Singular scores are also emphasized and questioned freely.

Cibercultura, ciberciudadanías y acción política

La ponencia propuesta se orienta hacia el análisis de las transformaciones en los procesos sociales y políticos donde la participación democrática se caracteriza por una intervención política innovadora soportada en la apropiación de las tecnologías digitales. Estas favorecen la movilización para la acción política, proveen entornos para la coordinación de acciones en red y potencian tendencias de uso e innovación social.

En éste marco abordamos la noción de cibercultura como la imbricación de las tecnologías digitales en los procesos culturales de las sociedades contemporáneas. De ésta forma el concepto de ciudadanía se traslada al campo de la cibercultura, se matiza la centralidad del espacio público y surge una nueva provista por la inmaterialidad de las redes electrónicas.

Las preguntas iniciales de investigación sobre las que se intentará dar cuenta a lo largo de la presentación son ¿cómo se reconfiguran las relaciones de poder, las identidades colectivas y las estrategias de intervención y confrontación política en una cultura crecientemente digital?; ¿es posible pensar en la emergencia de ciberciudadanías?; ¿la ciberpolítica es una nueva forma de política?; ¿cómo se caracteriza el uso político de colectivos contraculturales de las redes electrónicas?

Con esta finalidad se consideran los avances producidos en investigaciones propias que toman como objeto de estudio a sujetos colectivos que desarrollan una actividad sostenida en el terreno audiovisual y comunicacional durante la última década en Buenos Aires. Se reseñan las peculiaridades de la acción colectiva en la última década, la determinación del/los antagonistas, la reformulación de una nueva esfera entre lo público y lo privado, las estrategias de intervención política y activista en la lucha por otra hegemonía y el salto tecnológico en la apropiación de las tecnologías digitales y recursos de comunicación online, con énfasis en la utilización de redes sociales (Twitter, Facebook, y YouTube).

Entre la chica buena y la mala: Discursos en torno a la sexualidad de chicas ecuatorianas en Italia

En esta ponencia queremos enfocarnos sobre los discursos en torno a la sexualidad de las jóvenes latinoamericanas migrantes. Nuestro trabajo se enfoca en algunas investigaciones llevadas a cabo en Genova, (Italia), con grupos de jóvenes ecuatorianos, hijos de migrantes reagrupados en los últimos años por parte de madres, llegadas como primer eslabón de la cadena migratoria. Italia, como España, es un típico ejemplo de la feminización de los flujos migratorio a nivel mundial (Sassen, 2003; Kofman 2003, Morokvasic, 1984). En nuestra ponencia queremos analizar solo el caso de las chicas que como subraya McRobbie (2000) muchas veces están invisibilizadas en los estudios culturales sobre jóvenes.

En los últimos años en la opinión pública, sobre el discurso de los médicos y de los trabajadores sociales se ha difundido una imagen estereotipada que describe a las chicas latinas de forma dicotómica:

o como hipersexualizadas y libertinas en total oposición a la imagen de las chicas italianas

o al revés como chicas que reproducen la imagen de mujeres sumisas y tradicionales, que no tienen poder dentro de la pareja.

Nuestras investigaciones ponen en discusión estas interpretaciones y nos hacen ver que más allá de los estereotipos, las chicas latinas están reconstruyendo una forma autónoma de actuar e interpretar su comportamiento sexual que está cuestionando sea los modelos más tradicionales de sus padres sea los modelos de los italianos con los cual se relacionan. Por ejemplo, el caso de los embarazos precoces es un buen punto de análisis para cuestionar si y como la forma de actuar de las chicas es una señal de sumisión o al revés una forma particular de autoafirmación que va en contra sea de los deseos de sus padres sea de la opinión que los italianos tienen acerca de la edad "justa" para ser madre

Normalización y estandarización de los idiomas indígenas en Bolivia

Palabras claves: Lenguas indígenas, normalización, estandarización, plurilingüismo.

En Bolivia se ha declarado 36 lenguas indígenas como idiomas oficiales del Estado Plurinacional a la par del castellano. Esta oficialización de lenguas indígenas aparece en el artículo 5 de la nueva Constitución Política del Estado (CPE), con la que la política lingüística de este país se orienta hacia el plurilingüismo.

Entonces, el plurilingüismo es el reconocimiento de las lenguas como derechos colectivos, donde cada lengua indígena está ligada a su comunidad lingüística o grupo lingüístico, asimismo el artículo 5 de la CPE reconoce el multilingüismo, plasmado en el bilingüismo de los individuos hablantes de lenguas indígenas más castellano o viceversa.

La nueva Ley de Educación boliviana, promulgada en 2010 reconoce el aprendizaje de la lengua extranjera, con lo cual el plurilingüismo y el multilingüismo se concretizan en el trilingüismo transversal entre una lengua indígena, el castellano como lengua estatal y la lengua extranjera. A su vez, el proyecto de Ley de Derechos y Políticas Lingüísticas entre sus principios toma en cuenta la personalidad (individualidad) y la territorialidad (colectividad).

Estos procesos de reconocimiento y revalorización lingüística contribuyen a la normalización de las lenguas indígenas de Bolivia y del mundo. Por otro lado, la estandarización según Swann & otros (2004) y Trudgill & Hernández (2007) es el proceso de construcción de la lengua estándar, de modo que el aymara y el quechua principalmente van siguiendo los estadios de selección y aceptación de su variedad estándar.

Social class and happiness: A cross-country comparison

Many have argued that 'social classes are dead' because they do no longer explain important life outcomes. However, when one compares average subjective well-being (SWB) levels across social classes, it becomes evident that in almost every country, individuals in the upper classes are, on average, happier than individuals in the lower classes. However, the size of the happiness gap varies significantly across countries; in other words, class determines SWB to a greater extent in some places than others (e.g. Russia or Bulgaria versus Nordic countries). This paper hopes to understand why it is so. This is important because SWB is an important life outcome and a relevant component of the quality of life that is unequally distributed in the population. This is inevitable to some extent since SWB depends on biology and other things that are within the individual realm, however and important part of this inequality is class based. To the extent that it is so, public policy may be able to do something about it. Hence understanding where the gap comes from is crucial. This paper will shed light on this. Several multi country datasets will be used. A parallel analysis with the ESS and the WVS will be carried out that will allow a greater and more varied sample as well as replication for some cases. A multilevel framework is applied so that happiness at the individual level is explained by individual level variables (class among them) and contextual or country level variables. Various happiness theories such as livability (Veenhoven and Ehrhardt 1995; Grinde 2005) and comparison theories (Michalos 1985, Easterlin 1974) guide the selection of individual and country level covariates.

*The "Japanese war orphans" who remain in China \n comparison with those who returned to Japan *

The term "Japanese War Orphans" refers to the Japanese children left behind in China as orphans by their parents who repatriated to Japan, and were later adopted and raised by Chinese foster parents. According to Chinese government figures, roughly 2,800 Japanese children were left behind in China after the war, 90% of which were in Inner Mongolia and northeast China.

The "Japanese War Orphans" lost the chance to re-contact their biological families because of the discontinuation of diplomatic relations between China and Japan. Even though the relationship between the two countries normalized in 1972, the search for Japanese orphans left behind in China was not official nor active until 1981. Starting in 1981, the Japanese and Chinese governments reached an agreement that they would work together to help the Japanese left in China to visit Japan and search for their biological families. As a result, many of these Japanese orphans, accompanied by their Chinese spouses and children, have returned and settled in Japan. As of August 2008, 2,529 orphans had settled in Japan.

Until now, there has been much research about Japanese war orphans who went back to Japan. However, as few people have recognized, there are some orphans who are still living in China because of various reasons. There is little research on these orphans and most of their actual life conditions are unknown.

In this paper, I shed light on these orphans who remain in China and compared them with those who have returned back to Japan. The framework of the "Life-Story" methodology is employed in the present investigation and the interviews were held both in Japanese and Chinese. This paper analyzes their narratives, focusing on the linguistic forms including deixis, and scrutinizes how the Chinese interviewer and the Japanese orphan interviewees interacted and negotiated their identities.

How firms manage the age? A comparison between France and Japan in the electric sector

This article makes a comparative study of the current state of the employment of older people in major electrical manufacturers in France and Japan. In both countries, the aging population has made balancing the public pension scheme budget an important policy concern. In response, both countries have raised the pension eligibility age, and implemented policies aimed at promoting employment of older people. However, the state of older people's employment in the two countries differs greatly.

In France, workforce reduction in recession periods has historically been achieved by early retirement of older workers. Although the retirement of older workers causes problems for skill succession, age-based workforce management remains deeply rooted.

In Japan, too, there remain many cases of older workers being encouraged to take early retirement for purposes of employment adjustment, but in manufacturing settings, continued employment of older workers for purposes of skill succession is increasing rapidly. Skill succession became a particular problem in manufacturing settings due to the baby boomer generation reaching the retirement age (of 60) in 2007. Major players in the electrical industry have, since the early 2000s, implemented reemployment systems to effect the continued employment of older people. In the major electrical manufacturers surveyed, half of those retiring were reengaged, with the number increasing yearly.

However, reemployment systems employ older workers who have already retired in a different format and at a greatly reduced level of pay. For the older workers, this means accepting a decline in working conditions, while being responsible for nearly the same duties as they had before retirement. For this reason, there are still many obstacles to the maintaining of older people's desire for work.

Civil organizations and urban outskirts: Cartographies

This paper results from ongoing research into the associative organizations and social mobilization that are building up in response to "urban violence" in Rio de Janeiro. The dynamics of territories of poverty provide constitutive components and references for these processes.

We assume that, in the last 20 years, changes in the phenomena and representations relating to criminal urban violence have resulted in changes also in the cartography of civil organizations and collective action in the city and at its margins. Not only are the positions and meanings of existing associative organizations shifting, but new groups and figures are emerging in the public space.

Over time, this research has been systematically following dramatic occurrences (prominent among them chacinas) and events surrounding these situations. In these processes certain organizations and personages are observed to recur in interaction, and one purpose of this study is to identify them sociologically. The snowball method is used to identify events and agents. Some of these situations are the object of ethnographic work.

The situations mentioned include the presence of established organizations active on other issues (NGOs, trade unions, neighbourhood associations), which have now come to introduce the issue of violence and public security in their repertoire. Moreover, new emerging organizations and agents are being created on justifications related to the reaction to urban violence. Many are territorial in nature and located at the periphery; others, their domain offices "abroad", construct access to, and relationships of intimacy with, these locations and transit their conflicts and dramas through specific activists, functioning as multi-mediators among a diversity of institutional spaces. New actors – the "victims", for instance – come to play sui generis roles in bringing new conflicts, political grammars, and forms of legitimacy for action on violence and public security into the public space.

Homosexuality, discrimination and sexual exploitation

Sexual exploitation of adolescents is a serious problem in contemporary societies. Having as background previous researches conducted by myself, it is possible to say that many teenagers who "turn a trick" do not realize that they are being sexually exploited by adults. Instead, paid sexual programs are seen as natural, as part of their sexuality. The aim of this presentation will be to talk about the meaning that sexual programs ("turn a trick") have for some teenagers and the configuration that makes this understanding possible. The method used in the research was life stories. Previous researches have shown that there are many different forms of involvement. Among them are boys who "turn a trick" in order to have homosexual sexual relationships without being bullied or discriminated by others and girls that are looking for a loving relationship. The discussion in this presentation will be on the relationship between homosexuality, discrimination and search for partners who pay for sexual relationships.

Higher education and the attainment of equity and social justice: Restructuring the funding model in Mozambique

This paper is concerned with the restructuring of the higher education funding system in Mozambique for the attainment of equity and social justice, specifically the establishment of cost-sharing mechanisms and scholarship vouchers to needy students. Particularly, the paper examines three questions: (a) How does public funding of higher education encourage (or discourage) the attainment of equity and social justice goals in Mozambique? (b) What challenges do indiscriminate allocation of public funding to higher education institutions and subsidised tuition fee increases pose to the sustainability of higher education system? (c) How can Mozambique's higher education be made affordable for indigent but intelligent students? The paper concludes that although Mozambique's higher education new funding formula is generally geared towards attaining the goals of equity and social justice, several of its aspects are adverse to the achievement of these goals. The context of the austerity measures announced by the government to tackle the financial crisis, hence the Mozambican government has decided to cut funding in public higher education institutions. The refusal and reluctance of certain social groups to paying increased tuition fees. This is exasperated by existing high levels of poverty and inequality mostly affecting the majority of the Mozambican families.

Agency, empowerment and utopian visions

Throughout the world we have seen proliferations of progressive, democratic social movements in which vast numbers of people have challenged neo liberal globalization and the legitimacy of its elites whose self interested policies have ill served the majorities. From the Zapatistas to the Global justice movements, and more recently Arab Spring, Israeli Summer, the Spanish Indignados and now the Occupy movements, counter hegemonic mobilizations have proliferated. We would argue that to understand these mobilizations requires considerations of both objective/structural conditions and contradictions, eg legitimation crises (Habermas) and the subjective/microsocial aspects of self, identity and emotions-those that sustain hegemony and those that challenge and contest.

Recent thinking has fallen into 2 broad camps, resource mobilization and new social movement theory. RM has stressed how rational actors seeking self advantages through mobilizations, enabled by adequate resources and social movement entrepreneurs, often skilled in framing and taking advantage of political openings, mobilize and secure some kind of "advantageous" change through political pressure. NSM however has placed more emphasis on creating, negotiating identities and meanings and in turn, they are more likely to use the public spheres of civil society as sites for articulating alternative subjectivities. But that said, we think that both perspectives fail to address the relationships of emotion to social mobilizations and to visions of the economically, politically and culturally possible. More specifically, we suggest that that structural conditions, inequality, oppression and crises of legitimacy, have led us to rethink the nature of citizenship-especially as it has changed from passive support of the nation and obedience to its leaders, to more active critiques challenges to nations and their leaders. More specifically, across a variety of social movements, we note certain common factors-common emotions and desire and visions for new kind of democratic, inclusive subjectivities and citizenship

Alienation in the 21st century

The classical formulations of Marx concerning alienation (objectification/estrangement) described in the 1844 Manuscripts moved the concept from Hegelian idealism to material conditions, the consequences of wage labor and private property. For Marx, when people worked for wages, they alienated their labor power, selling their labor as a commodity that was embedded in the commodities they produced while they themselves became commodities. They were rendered powerless, dehumanized and estranged from their species being, their communities were rent asunder, and their lives were meaningless. Although the 1844 Manuscripts were not available for 80 years, they would have a major influence in social and political theory. This was evident in classical critiques as those of Mezaros, Israel, and Ollman. But since the 1970s we have seen major transformations of capitalism, now a de-territorialized globalized system dependent on mass consumerism, branded identities, mass media and computer mediated communication. Does alienation remain a useful concept when most people in post industrialized society do not work in factories? We now see a vast proliferation of commodification into a plurality of life worlds and realms. Today, people are more likely to provide services and sell their feelings and emotions as commodities. Apart from the alienation and dehumanization of the workplaces, the many realms of mass media and consumer society colonize consciousness, identity and desire. For almost 2 decades, we have attempted to rethink and revitalize the concept of alienation as a useful paradigm for understanding many aspects of current life ranging from immigration to education, from everyday life and language. But further, we argue that there are many ways in which people attempt to overcome alienation ranging from popular cultures of resistance to social justice movements. This session will attempt to rethink and reformulate alienation for the 21st century.

Popular movements and patronage politics: Understanding demobilization processes in contemporary Argentina

Based on in-depth interviews and ethnographic fieldwork, this paper examines the dynamics of demobilization of poor people's movements in a context of patronage politics. Processes by which social movement organizations (SMOs) are demobilized are usually seen as resulting from "cooptation" or "oligarchization." I show that demobilization of poor people's movements in a context dominated by patronage politics can also result from relational mechanisms creating a "double pressure." In a setting where patronage is prevalent, participants in a social movement see their involvement in the organization as a way to voice rights but also to obtain concrete material benefits. Thus, leaders need to obtain resources and address the pressures created by constituents "from below." While alliances with national political actors and the national state provide access to necessary resources, these alliances also create a pressure "from above" that poses obstacles for mobilization. Drawing on data culled from eleven months of fieldwork on an Argentine peasant movement, this paper inspects a scantily analyzed but crucial dimension of poor people's movements in Latin America, namely, their interpenetrations with patronage politics. By scrutinizing this zone of interface we can better understand processes of demobilization, the effects of state pressures on SMOs, and the relational aspects of brokerage mechanisms.

Capital lingüístico, desigualdad e inmigración en Cataluña (España)

Bajo el paradigma teórico de la adquisición de la lengua legítima como forma de capital lingüístico así como sus consecuencias a nivel de desigualdad social, desarrollada por Bourdieu, el objetivo de la presente comunicación es analizar la competencia lingüística en español de los jóvenes migrados de diferentes orígenes escolarizados en la Educación Secundaria Obligatoria en Cataluña (España), así como el efecto del tiempo de estancia en la sociedad receptora en dicha adquisición. Los datos son fruto de la pasación de una prueba de competencia lingüística de español a un total de 1206 sujetos. Para el análisis de los mismos han sido utilizados estadísticos descriptivos, pruebas de análisis de varianza para concretar el efecto de las variables independientes -Área de Origen y Tiempo de Estancia en Cataluña- y un Modelo Lineal Factorial con la finalidad de concretar el efecto conjunto de ambas. Los principales resultados evidencian diferentes aspectos: a/ que los jóvenes migrados considerados en su conjunto alcanzan una menor competencia en español que los no migrados; b/ que entre los hijos de las migraciones existen diferencias significativas en el nivel de competencia en español en función de las dos variables consideradas y; c/ que si se incluyen ambas en un mismo modelo se revela que el efecto del Área de Procedencia se encuentra modulado por el Tiempo de Estancia en todos los colectivos, demostrando la importancia de los primeros 3-6 años.

Students mobilities from "Aurel Vlaicu" University, Arad and Oradea University. Intra-European highly-skilled migration. A comparative case study

From the perspective of high education system, the year of 2011 meant for Romania, a recast, a resetting of all system. The mechanisms staged by the Bucharest government, in this case Minister of Education, were on one hand, the new Educational Law, and on the other side, in the same time, the ranking of universities and subordinate colleges.

The new Education Law, focuses on student-centered learning, aims to acquire knowledge, establishes flexibility and modernization of curricula and in the same is looking to approach the educational system to the labor market, national and international, in high-skilled levels and in common levels of labor.

The ranking of universities in three classes (categories), has determined a resetting of all educational system, including the young people seeking higher education option. The ranking of universities by the quality of study programs (A, B, C, D, etc.) opened new perspectives in the field of development and competitiveness. This major change in the high educational field creates the perfect frame for student mobility and also opens the road of migration for the most qualified youth looking for safer, better paid, more advantageous labor market on medium and long term.

This paper work research proposal is to study student mobility from both active university centers, which hold rating faculties, authorized and accredited. The hypothesis or the beginning point is given by the question: "Do all this transformations influence or not abroad student mobility"? In other words, can we see changes in the numbers of student applications form for specified Intra-European highly skilled programs or there are no changes toward last year? This study considers the number of allowed applications for each university and involves every appliance form, not only the once that effectively succeed to obtain an international mobility.

Alliances et stratégies des acteurs communautaires face aux méga-projets urbains : Étude de cas montréalais

Les mégaprojets constituent une composante de la métropolisation et de son corollaire la mondialisation, dans la mesure où cette stratégie de développement contribue à renforcer la centralité des métropoles aux échelles nationale et internationale. Leur implantation entraîne des impacts tant sur les plans urbanistique que socio-économique. On est alors en droit de souligner les enjeux de justice sociospatiale, et ceux liés aux impacts et bénéfices des mégaprojets sur les citoyens et les quartiers qu'ils habitent.

Par ailleurs, les méga projets deviennent synonymes de conflits potentiels opposant aux promoteurs (privés ou publics), les mouvements urbains, défenseurs du Droit à la ville, et des citoyens et citoyennes menacés par cette stratégie. Sources de conflictualité, ils peuvent devenir l'objet d'autres modalités relationnelles (négociation, compromis, partenariat...) entre acteurs. On peut donc se demander dans quelle mesure la nature des mégaprojets a un effet sur son acceptabilité sociale, et les rapports entre les acteurs qui l'entourent? Les méga projets sont-ils susceptibles d'être instrumentalisés par les mouvements urbains en vue d'atteindre leurs propres objectifs? Ne risquent-ils pas d'être cooptés par les promoteurs qui voient ainsi la légitimité du projet s'accroître?

Cette communication porte sur deux cas montréalais. Elle s'arrête au Centre universitaire de santé l'université McGill de Montréal et au Centre hospitalier universitaire de Montréal, et aux stratégies du mouvement urbain relatif à leur implantation. Des organismes du mouvement urbain montréalais ont choisi de s'allier aux promoteurs dans le cadre d'une structure de concertation, espérant que cette stratégie serait plus susceptible de faire valoir les intérêts des citoyens. Or, les alliances se transforment et se reconfigurent au cours de la réalisation du mega projet. Quel est l'état des rapports actuels des acteurs liés aux mégaprojets et quels sont les impacts sur les modalités de déploiement des grands projets hospitaliers?

How far higher education expansion in Argentina is it contributing to greater social equality?

This paper analysis the dynamics of expansion of higher education in Argentina in the last decade. Firstly, it examines the enrollment and institutional growth both in the private and public sector, distinguishing between universities and tertiary institutions. On the second place, it looks into the latest diversification of graduate studies in the country, as well as its knowledge-base orientations. Last, it inquires about the relationship between higher education expansion and income distribution, considering the higher education enrollment and graduation of different social groups, based on quantitative data from the Argentine Permanent Household Survey. The paper suggests that under certain conditions the current mass expansion of higher education can contribute to greater inequality and differentiation. Finally, it discusses the role that public higher education policies can play in contributing to changes in knowledge social distribution as well as in reducing the income distribution gap.

Banksy on the israel-palestine wall seen by the people: new worlds or world news?

Among Banksy's and JR's international works, the Israel-Palestine wall ones may be one of the most controversial. Actually many more street artists have been coming to this "best featured street artists holiday destination" (Banksy's own words). Largely broadcasted, overrepresented on the web it also achieved quite a good level of audience locally but for unexpected reasons: Banksy's painting have become a touristic attraction and every Bethlehem business beginner taxi man should at least be able to show you some of his works if not give you a whole "Banksy tour". But, what is the true impact of these paintings on the Bethlehem people?

This study will both present the paintings content and realization context as well as socio-political context and give first ideas on the potential social change potential it may have thanks to extensive qualitative survey performed on the field with neighbors of the wall. This way it will contribute to the questioning on whether street art and street artists act as true social changers or creates food for media diffusion with no further impact on the social life they work in. Also it will compare these works with the flourishing Palestinian art scene and study the perception these artists have of it.

As a PhD candidate in urban anthropology currently resident in Jerusalem and working in the French Cultural Center that aims at promoting Palestinian art, my research interest is on politics and art and I have both direct and easy access to the location, the neighbors direct testimony as I speak Arabic and of course the Palestinian art scene.

This study will shade light to the panel problematic from a different perspective: an everyday-life street art exposition medium: the Israel-Palestine wall.

Leisure, social justice and democratization

Late 20th and early 21st century ravenous consumption and its attendant identity practices on the back of imagined productivity has confronted the 'piper' demanding to be paid. As attention shifts from stabilizing crises of overconsumption, themes of social justice redolent of the emergence of the welfare state are slamming back onto the table. How should the relation between productivity and re/distribution be articulated? What level of responsibility should the state take for producing wholistic wellness typical of advanced welfare state regimes? What value will 'play' have sufficient to be included in re-distributive calculus? While we may be witnessing the front end of a wholesale shift to the market as provider of all on the platform of the state's 'ability to borrow, tax and pay', old questions about democratic participation are emerging in actions such as the 'occupy' movement as 'citizens' re-acquire 'voice' in outrage... then there's the fear. 'Sustainability' as a discursive form may help or hinder re-establish balance in life domains as a social goal with the economy as servant not master. Leisure sociological scholarship has an urgent role to play in promoting its emancipatory message, framing counter-argumentation where necessary and developing positive policy contributions where available.

Social deprivation and victimization of elderly people: A study

Very often elderly life is considered as a burdened life, predominantly, of struggle, illness, depression, exploitation and abuse etc. Changes in population structure will have several implications for health, economic security, family life and well-being of the elderly people. The needs and problems of the elderly vary significantly according to their age, socio-economic status, health, living status and other characteristics. So from these determinants make the elderly people deprived in which leads victimization. Victimization is process of several social determinants and a result of social structural imbalances and changes in developing nations. The focus of victimization is on elderly people in India. The target includes both elderly men and women.

Dependency level is high among the elderly population they depend on their children for their happy later life. Due to break in family structure more number of nuclear families has emerged. The reason for transition into nuclear family from joint family system is complex and diverse. Hence provision of care and support to the elderly people in the family becomes a burden for the today's young generation. So the state of alienation, isolation and deprivation are felt by the elderly. A qualitative understanding of the elderly's problem and prospects is undertaken in which case study methods as the tool for data collection is used. This study conducted in Madurai district of Tamilnadu, India reveals denial, neglect, alienation, isolation and deprivation are the vulnerable factors that lead to victimization, denial of basic needs and rights of the elderly people, rights of elderly are violated at all forms in all ways. Neglect leads to abuse and abuse leads to deprivation and further lead to alienation and homelessness. Hence the old people are moved to a secured institutional care centers like old age homes.

Remote communication of emotions through a tactile device

In our emotional research context, our method consists in using a special device to conduct psychological experiments. Our goal is to design interfaces for remote emotional communication; it requires taking a look at the way emotions are transmitted. We decided to explore the tactile channel, since the sense of touch is very specific and plays an important role in the emotion transmission on a daily basis. We designed a minimalist system, called Tactos, which allows a form of distal touch. Tactos consists of an effector (a mouse or a graphic tablet) and of a MITT module (composed of 16 piezo-electric pins that can independently get on two positions: up or down) that provides tactile stimulations. Users share a same virtual space they can explore through Tactos. We want to understand how people can interact through this device (by recording everything happening within it) when they have no other way to communicate. They move a cursor in this space and they get a tactile stimulation when it encounters the cursor of the other person. It's what we call distal perceptual crossing; it's a mutual recognition of perception, that happens in Tactos' case when the two users' cursors touch (because then the two users get a tactile stimulation). To explore the emotional dimension associated with this situation, we conducted two experiments in minimalist conditions and showed that human beings are able to identify when they interact with another human being or with a robot, and that they are more likely to succeed in finding an object that they can both perceive, when they interact than when they don't. To understand emotions, we opted for psychological experiments; the data analysis consists partly in observing subjects' actions and perceptions. Collected data are very rich, and permit to explore emotions' transmission in a new way.

What is governed? Comparing governance modes in large metropolis

Our starting point is to challenge the often-made assumption that large cities are so complex that they have become ungovernable or that globalisation pressures make political and policy choices irrelevant. By going beyond rational or positivist views of governance, it argues that the process of governing a city is never fully complete, nor linear. The paper refers to a systematic review of the academic literature. Urban societies are more or less governed and that may change from one city to the next, from one period to the next. Processes of government and governance are always work in progress, but make crucial differences over time. Case studies show that modes of governance have long term consequences for their inhabitants and governing failures may have severe negative effects (e.g. housing shortages, low levels of educational attainment, crime, low productivity, health). The review shows also a lack of comparative studies.

The paper highlights questions that lie at the heart of contemporary research on large metropolises. It articulates the main achievements of the literature, in terms of cumulative knowledge about the delivery of urban policies, development and infrastructure projects. It explores broader questions over how contemporary forms of governance operate including democratic systems of accountability and decision-making functions. Large metropolises are characterized by a myriad of actors, powerful interest groups, diverse inhabitants, networks and assemblages of public sector institutions and global investors, developers, and others involved in the development industry. The systematic analysis of the literature shows the need to describe and document at the same time (1) how processes of governance operate in relation to major urban development projects, the implementation of public policies and (2) the implications of such practices for urban politics, inequalities, sustainable development and growth; so to say articulating an analysis of the governance processes and their outcomes.

Moral-aesthetic regulation and class formation: The case of "chavs" in the UK

This paper addresses recent developments in the research on moral panics, moral regulation and social class, through an analysis of the public discourse on 'chavs' in the media, on websites and in popular culture. The term recently emerged in Britain as a derogatory way of labelling white working-class youths dressed in streetwear clothing and jewellery. Drawing on a 'culturalist' conception of class influenced by Bourdieu and Geertz, the paper argues that 'chavs' are constructed around moral and aesthetic boundaries as a 'rough' fraction of the white British working-class – a 'folk devil' against whom middle-class and 'respectable' working-class people distinguish and define themselves. Chavs are frequently associated with vulgar taste, loutish and anti-social behaviour, teenage pregnancy and welfare dependency. The paper also shows that the 'chav' phenomenon incorporates two historically familiar folk devils, distinguished along gender lines: young violent working-class males and single, welfare dependent young working-class mothers. In conclusion, it is argued that, while the 'chav' phenomenon displays some elements of a classic moral panic, it is not a fully-fledged one. It is better understood as a strong form of moral-aesthetic regulation of white British working-class people, which has a longstanding history. In this way, the paper demonstrates how the heuristic tools of moral panic and moral regulation can be used to understand the formation of symbolic class boundaries.

The symbolic power of class: Individualisation and young working-class identities

This paper critically engages with recent arguments that individualisation processes are breaking down traditional class structures, which leads to increased reflexivity among people to choose and to construct their identities. Drawing on multi-method ethnographic research conducted in a marginalised area on the outskirts of South London, the paper explores processes of identity formation among the white working-class youths in the area. The study shows that most respondents, and particularly the local style or fashion adopted among residents in the area, are positioned in the stigmatising discourse on 'chavs', which is a recent widespread term that has been used to pathologise white British working-class youths adopting certain markers of taste. Moreover, it is demonstrated that respondents strongly disidentify with the term and apply it on others, although this is sometimes bound up with tensions and ambiguities. In this way, it is much easier for the respondents to distance themselves from the chav label on a discursive level, than on the level of social practices, including their tastes and lifestyles. Even while disidentifying with chavs, they might still be positioned in the codes and narratives constructed around the term. This shows that the respondents cannot simply choose their identities since they are structured by class and constructed in relation to the categorizations made by others. It is also shown that the appropriation of local taste reflects an individualised rather than collective form of consumption. This points to a more general pattern of class formation in the contemporary moment, namely that individualisation is a fundamentally classed process. In conclusion, the paper demonstrates the symbolic power of class in shaping identity formation.

Prefiguring the future or repeating the past?: Collectivist democracy and the struggle against oligarchy in the German left Prefigurative social movements try to bring about their vision of the future by implementing it in their current practice: in their organizational forms, decision-making processes, and tactical choices, they try to live according to the values and principles they think should govern society as a whole. While the prefigurative impulse dates back at least to the French Revolution, it has been experiencing a resurgence in recent decades, as many activists in advanced capitalist societies have lost faith in both parliamentary and paramilitary strategies for radical change. Influenced by anarchist philosophy and well aware of the usual tendency toward oligarchy, these movements try to put their egalitarian ideals into practice through the use of non-hierarchical, collectivist-democratic forms of organization and consensus decisionmaking.

While scattered case studies shed light on some of their common dilemmas and practices, almost no systematic research has been done to evaluate the ability of such groups to resist hierarchical authority and prevent the development of oligarchic control. In this paper I present findings from a cross-sectional comparison of 12 collectivist-democratic social movement groups, drawn from two leftist movement countercultures in Germany: the nonviolence movement and the "autonomous" movement (known as the Autonomen). Over the last 30 years, these two countercultures have developed distinct forms of collectivist democracy, marked by different ways of dividing labor and running meetings, different decision-making processes, and different tactical orientations.

On the basis of two years of participant observation and 63 semi-structured interviews with a matched sample of activists from each counterculture, this paper first describes their contrasting styles of collectivist democracy and then discusses the perhaps counterintuitive finding that the more militant Autonomen were less prone to oligarchy than the nonviolence groups.

Solidarity and tactical coordination in the German anti-nuclear movement: An event history analysis

The rift between militant and nonviolent movement factions can severely diminish its capacity for effective action and lead to deep and lasting animosities among activists. Typically the use of violent tactics leads others to publicly distance themselves from the perpetrators, sparking fierce internal debate over what constitutes violence, whether its tactical use is ever justified, and the proper way to address it in the press. In short, moderate and nonviolent civil disobedience groups often engage in a variety of "taming" rituals designed to discourage, de-escalate, and/or punish the use of violence as they define it. Yet these efforts rarely succeed in preventing the use of violent tactics, and in the last decade or so, some movements have begun taking a different approach: rather than the one side trying to "tame" the other, rituals and frames of tolerance and solidarity have been constructed that allow them to work together more effectively, despite their differences. To determine the conditions that facilitate this kind of cooperation, we examine the relationship between militant and nonviolent factions in the German anti-nuclear movement, focusing on their interactions have developed over the course of a 14-year period in a series of protests against nuclear waste transports in the "Wendland" region of northern Germany. By examining both internal and external framing and mobilization processes surrounding blockade actions in 1997, 2001, 2010, and 2011, we show how the relationship between the two factions has changed from one of severe conflict and distrust to one of relative tolerance and solidarity. In tracing this development, we discuss the ways in which bi-directional social learning has taken place, highlighting continuing challenges and specific practical innovations that have allowed for more effective cooperation, even in the face of adverse political opportunities.

Social interaction in urban public spaces: When residential social mixing doesn't bring social cohesion

This paper tries to establish some patterns for the urban design and managing of open public spaces in order to improve social interaction between different social groups related to the age, gender, social class and culture or ethnic composition. It is founded in a research carried in some public spaces (places and streets) with different social environments and spatial typologies in Madrid, Spain. It is a particular considering of functions and activities located in public space in relation with social practices of different groups, analyzing them according with the social composition, cultural differences, age and gender and the characteristics of the urban area where the public space is located.

The conclusion shows a high segregation inside these spaces with poor or non existing interaction between different social groups who built virtual or even real internal frontiers difficult to be trespassed by others. These divisions bring often some appropriation of public spaces, especially for social minorities, with the result some times of conflicts between costumers.

This result questions that residential social mixing, could bring only by itself social cohesion, because interaction practices are made in public spaces out of home. But it shows also that sometimes the development of some common activities overcome these constraints and get some interrelation between different types of public space costumers, it is the case of sport activities, kid's care or not so often, commerce activities. That shows the existence of possible patterns to design these public spaces.

The interface between digital democracy and public policy: The challenges of digital inclusion in Brazil

This paper discusses the relationship among public policies, digital democracy and digital inclusion in Brazil as part of the political project against social inequalities during the Lula government. Internet access, instructional formation for the socio-cognitive network use, appropriation of ICTs and broadband are important pieces of achieving a social justice in line with digital democracy. This refers to the possibilities of providing the conditions that an open technology in regard with its purposes is made available to different people. Our object of analysis is to discuss the interface between distributive policies and actions of recognition of social and cultural differences, as pillars of the battle against the digital divide in the context of GESAC's Digital Inclusion Project integrated to the Policy for Science and Technology in Brazil. It discusses the advances and limitations of the process of digital inclusion in the country from three key variables: Brazilian citizens' access to instructional training; to computers and broadband and to appropriation of technologies. Minority communities are the target of public policy of digital inclusion and are the most exposed to the «fracture numérique» as polarization phenomenon with respect to the universal dimension called "information society." In Brazil we are faced with populations exposed to social injustices due to social or/and ethnic-racial origins, which is reflected in their access to material and symbolic goods. Such injustices transform differences in inequalities, which results in the stratification of access and appropriation of ICTs. The basis for the consolidation of a Science and Technology Policy in the country that not only relates to access of material resources but also to capacity-building of the telecenter user in dealing with new tools and specific ICTs languages. The following methodological resources are used: document analysis, questionnaires, semi-structured interviews and focus groups with residents from five regions of Brazil.

The normative field, and popular participation: Notes on the process of preparation and implementation of municipal master plans in Brazil

From 2001 to 2011, more than 1,500 Brazilian cities made their master plans in order to obey a federal law that reasserts, in the middle of city strategic planning and urban competitiveness era, principles related to democratic urban management, housing access for low-income people, and redistribution of wealth produced by collective effort. According to a recent national research about participatory master plans in Brazil, which comprises 526 municipal plans, the results were disappointing: the plans presented little or no progress towards promoting access to urbanized land, although gains have been observed regarding the creation of institutional channels toward popular participation in city management.

This paper analyzes 26 case studies included in the national survey and, in particular, the case of Duque de Caxias city in Rio de Janeiro metropolitan area, in order to understand how social movements demands have been incorporated in master plans laws, how the process of drawing up plans involved different social actors, and how apparent or actual political and institutional developments are manifested in the everyday process of municipal management.

Based on the analysis of the implementing process of popular movement sectors demands included in the Urban Master Plan of Duque de Caxias, we discuss the relationship between the political and institutional contexts and the selective application of municipal regulations, in a framework where social actors allegedly benefited from the legislation do not recognize the legal field as strategic for their goals achievement.

How do Brazilians perceive the role of the state, the market, and civil society in the execution of social policies?

During the last two decades, the patterns of interaction between states, markets and civil society have changed greatly. Activities that were formerly exclusive responsibility of the state, as the definition and execution of social policies, are currently being partnered with civil society organizations (CSOs) and private firms. Although the existing literature has already explored some of the consequences of this new societal arrangement, including some objective measures related to efficiency and policy impacts, it is still not clear how the populations affected by these new policies react to these changes. This measure is extremely relevant since the way individuals perceive policies' results is related to their conceptions of democracy and of how social justice is to be achieved.

Our work intends to analyze how Brazilians perceive the role of the state, the market and CSOs in the implementation of public services. Particularly, we investigate how different groups in the population differentiate the quality, reach and responsibility of these actors in activities such as health, education, reduction of inequality, protection of the environment and others.

Our analysis is based on a national-wide survey conducted in 2008 and is part of a greater research about the changes in the role of the state, market and CSOs in the reduction of inequality, conducted at the Center for Studies of Inequality (Nied-UFRJ) coordinated by Professor Elisa P. Reis (Federal University of Rio de Janeiro). Using data from this survey, the preliminary conclusion of our investigation is that although the market and CSOs are recognized as relevant players in the execution of social policies and it is perceived that they can offer better services, the state is still perceived as the main responsible and apt actor to perform these activities.

Studying long-term social processes: Intersections between macro-historical sociology and path-dependence

Every historical analysis is ex post by definition. That is, historical studies depart from past events to look for an artificial logic that allows for the interpretation of a succession of events that would otherwise make no sense. Macro-historical sociology and path-dependence theory both give analytical explanations for long-term social processes that allow for the incorporation of change and continuity without disturbing our understanding of the historical process. Even so, there is still a lot of uncertainty on the ways that the two methodologies can be adopted together.

The objective of this paper is to highlight the gains to be had by using concepts derived from the path-dependence theory, like learning effects, coordination effects and adaptive expectations, to complement macro-historical analysis. In regards to the latter, the main inspiration is the work of Reinhard Bendix, whose proposal of studying social change based on the analytical division between authority and solidarity, and his reformulation of the concepts of tradition and modernity are especially relevant to understand long-term social processes. According to this tradition, historical processes cannot be understood as simple before-and-after models, which imply that we should expect to identify traditional and modern aspects i.e. changes and continuities interacting simultaneously in any changing societal arrangement.

Moreover, social processes are seen as dynamic processes rather than historically limited events, which makes the timing and sequence of historical events central to understanding the development of any social process. I argue that this is where the insights brought by the literature based on path dependency can complement the macro-sociological interpretation of social processes, looking specifically at the high level of contingency ex ante and different options available at initial events.

Changing time experience, changing memory: An inter-generational perspective

Our age is undergoing a major change in the experience of time. This is a far-reaching phenomenon which affects the lives of institutions just as much as those of individuals and social groups. Young people and adults are equally involved in this process, but it is especially the latter who emphasise its potential social risks. For instance, adults tend to stigmatize the inability of young people to construct a historical representation of the past: a representation endowed with breadth and depth and able to foster a meaningful relation with the present and the future. They also complain about the poverty of the younger generation's memory. It is important to be aware, however, that neither are adults extraneous to the process currently changing the ways in which the past, present and future are represented. Adults, too, experience the distinctive temporal contradictions of late modernity, including the difficulty of transmitting experience and memory between generations. The findings of two surveys conducted in Italy, the first on the relationship between memory and the teaching of history, the second on the redefinition of memory (and project) by young people, directly testify to this major transformation of the relationship with time, and to the potential conflicts accompanying it.

La spécialisation des modes de prise en charge de la maladie d'alzheimer en France : Entre levier d'évolution des carrières professionnelles, désinsertion sociale des patients et renforcement de la stigmatisation

Depuis le début des années 2000, les politiques publiques françaises en direction des personnes âgées ont entériné une approche médicalisée des modes de prise en charge, qui avaient été tournés depuis les années 1960 vers une préoccupation sociale liée aux modes de vie. Ce mouvement de médicalisation se traduit par exemple par des plans gouvernementaux de santé publique visant la maladie d'Alzheimer. Le troisième « Plan Alzheimer » (2008-2012) encourage la création de structures spécialisées d'accueil des « malades d'Alzheimer ». Nous proposons de réfléchir aux diverses implications de cette spécialisation et de l'absence de mixité des populations qu'elle induit, à trois niveaux :

- Du côté des professionnels : elle pose la double question du développement de compétences nouvelles, qui peuvent servir de support à des évolutions de carrières pour des soignants qui sont physiquement usés, et en contrepoint, du fardeau de la spécialisation dans des structures qui développent une approche sécuritaire que les soignants peuvent percevoir comme dissonante par rapport au mandat de soin structurant leurs identités professionnelles

- Du point de vue des patients : la concentration dans des structures spécialisées de personnes présentant toutes des « troubles du comportement » suppose la création d'espaces où les normes sociales ordinaires ne s'appliquent plus. La suppression de la mixité va donc dans le sens inverse des politiques de maintien des personnes âgées dans leur environnement social, censé favoriser leur maintien en santé. On voit apparaître deux vieillesse : celle qui a droit à l'intégration sociale et celle qui en est définitivement exclue de par la réduction à un statut biologique pathologique.
- Du point de vue des représentations sociales : la spécialisation des structures d'accueil renforce la performativité de la catégorie « maladie d'Alzheimer », stigmatisante et excluante, alors même que l'élaboration du diagnostic fait encore l'objet de nombreuses controverses scientifiques.

Un acercamiento crítico a los significados de los conceptos de nación y desarrollo en los años '60

En esta ponencia, el objetivo es analizar qué significados del concepto de nación se utilizaron en las teorías de la dependencia y el desarrollismo y cómo estos se relacionan con las ideas de desarrollo imperantes en la época. Asimismo, intentaremos presentar una visión crítica de lo anterior a partir de los planteos de Immanuel Wallerstein sobre el desarrollo. Wallerstein critica el concepto de desarrollo de la sociedad como evolución, es decir, la noción de que una sociedad es algo que se desarrolla desde un germen, desde algo inferior a algo más complejo. Y propone la idea del desarrollo del sistema mundo, no de una sociedad en particular. Intentaremos vislumbrar cuáles son los significados del concepto nación en el pensamiento social de América Latina y cómo pueden vincularse con la propuesta de sistema mundo de Wallerstein.

Entonces, nos basaremos en algunas de las ideas y teorías más importantes que se desplegaron durante los años '60, las teorías de la dependencia y, especialmente, las propuestas desarrollistas. Principalmente, lo haremos a partir de la lectura del libro Dependencia y Desarrollo en América Latina, de Fernando Henrique Cardoso y Enzo Faletto, sumando algunos otros textos, como por ejemplo, de Theotônio dos Santos, entre otros.

Es así que este trabajo se propone realizar un análisis descriptivo, a través de un recorrido bibliográfico, de la relación entre los conceptos de nación y desarrollo en los años '60 latinoamericanos y vincularlo con algunas teorías globales, como la de Wallerstein para resaltar aspectos muy originales, pero no siempre muy atendidos, del pensamiento social de América Latina.

Este análisis, además, será relevante para una investigación, actualmente en sus inicios, que en parte trata sobre la idea de nación en las dictaduras institucionales de las Fuerzas Armadas en América Latina.

"But this is a park!" the paradox of public space in a Buenos Aires "no man's land"

Drawing upon qualitative fieldwork, this paper analyzes the occupation of an abandoned park in the south of Buenos Aires by the city's urban poor, delineating the implications of this incident for notions of citizenship in the context of deeply fragmented social rights. While public space has historically been understood as an expression of the universality of rights bearing membership in a political community, I show how this universalism became the object of struggle during a conflict over the park between the local middle class and squatters of mostly immigrant descent. The discourses mobilized by various social groups blurred the distinction between citizenship as a set of legal-formal rights versus a project of normative inclusion. While public space is juridically constructed as universal, particularistic claims to these spaces are imbued with increased legitimacy in a context in which social rights – conceived as a set of provisions guaranteed by the state under a regime of liberal citizenship – are unrealizable. By claiming this space for particularistic uses, squatters drew attention to the contradictions embedded in public space's democratic pretensions in a setting in which putatively universal rights are ignored by the state.

World factory without workers? The new facet of Chinese workers' strikes

Currently nicknamed the 'world factory' China has been notorious in allowing investors (both foreign and domestic ones) to exploit her labour force at extremely cheap price. Previous rich literature in relation to Chinese workers mostly indicated that Chinese workers were obedient and silent to take unconditional exploitation. It has also been argued that most of Chinese workers' strikes were sporadic and workers merely demanded to have 'a bowl of rice' rather than any structural change.

First part of this paper is to review structural level of Chinese production in the global economic chain. It has been debated rigorously that although China accumulated huge amount of foreign direct investment (FDI), those transnational companies invested in China only took advantages from Chinese cheap labour but did not transferred research and design (R&D) skills to China. This paper aims to review whether this situation has any possibility of change, and whether China is on the way to provide goods which entail R&D.

The second part of this paper focuses domestically on the new trend of migrant labours in China. This paper argues that those silent and obedient workers are the first generation of migrant workers, people who left their hometowns to coastal cities after 1978 economic reform. Nevertheless, when the second generation of migrant workers (people who were born after 1980s or even 1990s) emerged in the market, their demands are different. Second generation of migrant workers are more active, with more courage to strike out. Both Honda strike in 2008 and Tai-Hsing Strike in 2004 are good examples of this.

Taking into account the anchoring of Chinese production in the global economic chain and the new emerging spirit of the Chinese labour movement, this paper will also try to uncover the role that Chinese workers might play in transnational labour movement.

Rethinking the nature of 'national basic education' reform in Taiwan: The promotion of social justice?

'National Education' has always been one of the most important aspects of education in Taiwan, as it is a part of the process of building a genuine foundation for the future hopes of the nation. Public education has been compulsory from primary school to junior high school since 1968. At the New Year of 2011, the president Mr. Ma Ying-jeou officially announced the inauguration of the so-called 'promotion of twelve-year national basic education', which policy had been controversially argued for and against since 1983. This education reform aims to extend compulsory education to cover senior secondary education and is rather complicated and takes nearly 30 years to be completed. This reform policy which claims to promote social justice for those disadvantaged students must seriously take into accounts the more complex problems like adaption of school district layouts, quality promotion of senior high schools and vocational senior high schools, bridging the learning gap between rural and urban high schools, financial support for underprivileged students, priorities setting of education budgets, and so on.

In this paper, the author will first of all clarify the concepts and aims of 'national basic education'. Secondly, this analysis is carried on from a historical approach which traces the backgrounds of Taiwan's cultural, economical, social and most importantly political, that is, democratic development, regarding with the policy of 'promotion of twelve-year national basic education'. Thirdly, the author will present the historical development of this promotion of national education policy itself. Finally, the author tries to re-fix this policy's position and ascertain its falseness and truthfulness for the struggle for social justice.

'Sexting' and young people: Risk, anxiety and law

Over the past few years, news media in Australia, North America and other Western countries have reported with concern on cases of 'sexting' where minors have used digital cameras to manufacture and distribute sexual images of themselves and/or other minors, in some cases falling foul of child pornography laws. Populist responses to this behaviour have ranged from commentators who have called for the decriminalization of 'sexting' to others who insist that 'sexting' should be considered a form of child pornography – a position that connects to broader social concerns and anxieties about childhood sexual behaviours and exploitation. Legal scholars have argued that there should be exceptions in child pornography laws for minors who 'sext', although there is a general consensus that teen-aged 'sexting' is inappropriate and harmful. Risk is central to understanding social concerns about 'sexting' where adolescent behaviours become subject to risk logics and childhood sexuality becomes a problem to be managed and controlled. This paper explores the phenomenon of 'sexting' from a socio-legal perspective arguing that law in this field is lagging socio-cultural change and has the capacity to have damaging effects on the lives of young people.

Finding a place for promoting sustainability under Korea's green growth agenda: An assessment of governmental strategies for consumer education in a growth oriented approach

This research paper attempts to investigate the questions of how the governmental capacity enacts to promote Sustainable Consumption under the Low Carbon Green Growth slogan in the Republic of Korea. It exams the current strategies of the national government towards sustainability based on its Green Growth focus. The findings demonstrate that the rise of Green Growth caused an overall de-prioritisation of sustainable development and has led to confusion over the roles that leading agencies are expected to play. The interview analysis proves that civil society organisations and NGOs in Korea have a strong capacity in promoting sustainable consumption, which could be greatly supported through better government-civil society partnerships. Recommendations from interviewees are also made for supporting public participation through lateral partnerships, and a need to overcome human resource limitations on sustainable consumption at the level of national government is also identified.

Nuclear waste management and the politics of expertise in South Korea

The politics of management and control of science and technology in modern societies is closely related to the conflicts between technocracy and democracy. STS has explained these conflicts around technocracy and democracy through the lens of "politics of expertise". Nuclear waste management system is a good example showing the politics of technology, and the politics of expertise.

The purpose of this paper is to analyze the evolution of nuclear waste management system and the politics of nuclear waste management in South Korea from the viewpoint of STS. South Korea had experienced a lot of difficulties in finding nuclear waste disposal sites until 2004. South Korea barely succeeded in securing low and intermediate Level nuclear waste disposal site in 2005 after tremendous conflicts around the siting problem. Currently Korean society is confronting with much more difficult task of high level nuclear waste (mainly composed of spent fuel) management which has been accumulated from 21 nuclear power plants for the past 30 years.

Korea's nuclear waste management paradigm can be characterized as technocratic. Korean government has pursued elitist approach so far relying exclusively on a handful of experts and technical bureaucrats with regard to nuclear waste management. No significant participation of civil society has been allowed until recently. However, as far as high level nuclear waste management is concerned, it seems to me that civil society organizations including environmental movement organizations would not accept that kind of technocratic approach by the government anymore. Therefore it can be predicted that the politics of expertise around the issue of high level nuclear waste management will be intensified in the near future.

Contested spaces for democratic citizenship education

In the Netherlands a law on citizenship education was launched in 2006. It is the task of all schools to provide education that will facilitate integration of immigrants and will promote a stronger sense of social and cultural cohesion in society. The nature of this citizenship education is a key issue in achieving socially just and democratic schooling in an increasingly diverse society like the Netherlands.

From a national political perspective schooling is important for the enhancement of social and cultural integration and for producing a qualified workforce for enhancing the nation's economy. Social theorists like Habermas and Biesta point to the growing influence of the economic and the political on the understanding of the aims of education, the work of teachers and the teaching and learning process inside the classroom. They see openings in a focus on the active development of emancipatory knowledge through processes of mutual communication, participation and personal identity formation.

However the ideal ethnically and socio-cultural mixed site to meet and communicate with each other is only available in a minority of the students' schools. At the very top end of the schooling system there are the gymnasias where 'native' Dutch can live as if in an enclave and at the very bottom end are the schools for lower vocational training of which some have hardly any 'indigenous' students. In this state of segregation it is difficult for all students to escape the assimilation forces in society and the limitations of an exclusive elite culture or anti-school street culture to engage themselves in a more egalitarian youth culture.

In these contexts, do teachers envision themselves as change agents? If so, what spaces do they find in their daily practices in citizenship education to confront the political and economic forces that work as closings to democratic ideals?

Accreditation in the United States is a process based on program self study and peer review. Programs seeking accreditation must be well-grounded in sociological theory, method, and practical experience such as an internship. The Commission accredits programs at the Baccalaureate, Master's, and Doctoral Level. My presentation will include the following topics: 1) history of the Commission; 2) benefits of accreditation; and, 3) an overview of Commission Standards. The crucial part of this presentation will be a focus on the Standards. These Standards are the culmination of a collaborative effort on the part of academics and sociological practitioners. As a consequence, meeting these standards ensures a quality program for students who are the future for action oriented sociology. Job search outcomes for migrants and natives in urban China: A case study

This paper uses data from a 2008 survey in Shanghai to examine the impact of job search strategies on employment outcomes for rural migrants and urban locals in urban China. While China's rural migrants typically rely on social networks to locate better jobs and urban locals traditionally find jobs through formal channels such as state job assignment, this research shows that the historical patterns of job search strategies for migrants and non-migrants have changed and public job channels such as advertisements and job agencies have become more important. However, our results indicate that there are only mild differences on the impact of different job strategies on employment outcomes. For Shanghai locals, finding a job through public channels is positively associated with higher pay, but not with landing a permanent job. By contrast, different job search channels did not make a significant difference in personal income for rural migrants. The results also show that for both migrants and non-migrants, using personal contacts in job searches makes little difference in individuals' personal income and ability to locate a permanent job. These findings provide critical information in understanding the current labor market in urban China, and they have important implications for previous research on China's rural-to-urban migration and urban development.

„If they do not want to listen“ – A research-documentary project on young people's experiences and views of (racist) discrimination

The subject matter of the presentation is a research-documentary project which deals with discrimination experiences of young people in Germany and the reaction of various groups to the screening of the film. The discrimination experiences are deployed in the context of social inequality and the subject positions are marked by intersecting categories of social positioning (race, ethnicity, class, gender, generation, etc.).

The research is characterized by a specific design: The data collection took place in two phases: first, interviews and group discussions were conducted with 15 young people, followed by an interim analysis on the basis of which a documentary was produced (25 min, English subtitles). The film is both, an intermediate in the research process and a means for further research. In the second research phase the film is used as a focus for group discussions and interviews with other young people in schools and youth centres, and with educational professionals (teachers, youth workers).

The presentation shows how with the help of a documentary the voices of young people can be made audible. In the production process of the documentary questions need to be asked concerning the following keywords: self-determination, data compression, 'authenticity' and the ability to endure the public impact of the screening. It is clear that the motives of the young people who participate in the film, and the reactions of teachers and youth workers about this film are quite different. While for the young participants this contrast is often a disappointment, for the researcher it is a gain on the basis of which new data are generated and the analysis leads to interesting results; here, however, new questions concerning research ethics arise.

Towards an economic sociology of the investment and religious practices in Brazil

A brief socioeconomic literature review that approaches the economic, political and social analyses reveals that Brazilian society has distinctive characteristics related to the Latin American countries, in which the emergence of new economic and religious agents is responsible for the dissemination of financial practices and activities that were not morally valued in the country. As a first step, this communication aims to present the rise of financial advisers, who preach that real investments are those made in financial markets. These consultants have been infiltrated through different sectors of society, forming a particular dynamic, for example, they are called to give lectures in neopentecostal churches, in this sense, the priests also have transmitted financial thoughts 'religiously' to their believers. It constitutes a kind of "sermon" that addresses a moral topic, supporting the idea of personal and financial success. Education as protection: An experience of human rights education in the corners of Brazil

Despite the ostensible positivation normative demands for human rights after World War II, Western society still bitter the difficulty of realization of these rights, which creates a wide gulf between what is said and what is done about human rights. Traditionally, there is a constant search for a remedial and punitive approach when there is concrete violation of these rights, while not common to see public policies for the prevention of the violation. Especially in contexts of inequality and injustice brutally real, as is the case throughout Latin America and Brazil, the lack of preventive policies and the pursuit of models imported from the wealthy north end to intrude further realization of human rights. Thus, it is urgent to search for a pre-violation protection these rights, in order to avoid the penalty as the only post violation protective perspective. In this sense, an effective protection would be in the prevention of human rights, which necessarily passes through a human rights education, since the formation of more fundamental. From this perspective, the Center for the Study of Law Enforcement of Human Rights (NETPDH), a research group tied to UNESP, Franca-SP, Brazil, and registered with the CAPES, chose to conduct a groundbreaking work. In two municipalities in the interior of São Paulo, which are Ribeirão Corrente and Franca, is a project developed human rights education, with students and teachers in public schools statewide and local. Through a pedagogy of autonomy, undergraduate students, postgraduate students, researchers and professors connected to the NETPDH conduct workshops in two schools, one each in the cities mentioned, in which human rights issues are addressed in a dialogic and playful work. The intention to participate in this thematic group is sharing experiences in order to enhance our way of working.

The regularization policy between the formalization and the tenure security

This work proposes a reflection on the modernizing dimension of land regularization in Brazil, that includes, on the one hand, the disjudicialization of socio-territorial disputes and, on the other hand, the growing mediation of socio-spatial relations by the State - administrative control and juridicization. The construction of regularization of urban land as an urban policy in Brazil is deeply connected to social movements and to the recognition of the right to remain on the land of communities that live in a constant situation of tenure insecurity with a record of violent eviction. This concept has been changing over the past years. The new approach that was formally established by a federal law in 2009 defines the process based on a legal, urban and social triad. It is observed emphasis on legal and notarial aspects and to the incorporation of the urbanistic aspects to the land property and tenure concerns. This emphasis has led the concept of land regularization in Brazil beyond the problem of tenure insecurity, what reinforces a question about the meaning of this concept and its outcome. Many times the restructuring of the urban environment happens, and many times there is not ensure the right of to remain on the land, neither the realization of the social right to adequate housing, nor social justice, that would be the ultimate goals of these urban policies. Taking into consideration the incomplete (or, at least, complex) insertion of Brazil into Modernity, that is also characterized by informality of a series of procedures and social relations, these policies would be strongly associated to the attempt of modernizing the socio-territorial dynamics, through its formalization.

'Private transnationality' within the realm of mixed marriages in Soviet and independent Estonia

Independent Estonia was incorporated into the USSR in 1940; the ensuing political and social processes increased the number of Russian-speaking inhabitants in Estonia from the post-WWII ~3%, in 1945, to ~35%, in 1980. My PhD research is on the negotiations between the rather distinct and yet inter-mingled life-worlds of 'Estonian-speaking locals' and 'Russian-speaking newcomers' at the more private everyday encounters. My primary focus is on the life-story interviews with inter-ethnic (inter-cultural) families that consist of spouses from the abovementioned two 'constellations'. I have conducted 90 interviews with representatives of several generations within such families.

In my presentation, I focus on the life-stories of the older generation inter-ethnic spouses (b. 1930-1960) and of their children. The time-scope of biographies therefore ranges from the authoritarian USSR to the post-1991 independent Estonia. First, I look at the symbolic and physical connections and borders that such marriages create(d). I pay attention to the spouses and generations differences in relating to surrounding physical space. How have the 'Eastern' connections shaped families' lives and identities before and after 1991? Second, I look at the dynamics of family decisions, especially in inter-generational relations. What has influenced the choices for children' educational language and 'passport nationality'? How important are gender and family-role divisions here? How have such decisions influenced next generations' border making and crossing strategies? Third, in consideration to temporal dynamics, I discuss my idea of 'private transnationality' - hopefully not an oxymoron - that emerged within the 'space' of inter-ethnic marriages in the Soviet frames and that carried over to the post-1991 conditions of Estonia with relative stability; especially, in the face of the radical changes in the political sphere.

Intercultural education and current rural education in Brazil: Political and pedagogical approaches

This article is part of the Masters course of research in Postgraduate Education, Education Center, Federal University of Pernambuco (BRAZIL). The study was based on two arguments: on one hand, the current Rural Education in the Brazilian context of the 80's, comes as a result of mobilization of peasant peoples in the struggle to overcome their historical context, in the fight to overcome their historical condition of silenced and subalternized people. On the other hand, an Intercultural Education is weaved in the scenery of the fights of Amerindian people aiming to demystify and disnaturalize the racialization and the rationalization of the modern society, that had as one of its devilish effects the silencing and subalternization of the colonized people. Before this context, we aimed to weave the political and pedagogical approaches between the Intercultural Education and current Rural Education. This work has as theoretical approach the Latin-American post-colonial studies (GROSFOGUEL, 2007; QUIJANO, 2005), that explain the social reality from the relations of power structured in the racialization and rationalization of society, questioning the cultural and ideological processes that favor the subalternization of the capitalist world-system. In order to do this work we carried out a bibliographical study based on Content Analysis (BARDIN, 2008) of two analytical categories: Intercultural Education (SARTORELO, 2009; CANDAU, 2009) and current Rural Education (ARROYO, 2004; CALDART, 2004; SOUZA, 2008; ANTUNES-ROCHA, 2009). The political and pedagogical approaches between the Intercultural Education and current Rural Education, occur at the origin and constitute the educational proposal that presents the different sociocultural contexts, raising questions about the many certainties and assumptions of a dominant theoretical whole. And they, characterize when they take the education as a tool of fight in the construction of knowledge in society.

'Where are you from' in the domestic labour market. The employment of immigrants in Italy through life course analysis

This paper analyses how nationality and ethnic origin in hiring impact on immigrant women employment in the domestic labour sector. Referring to a life course analysis, we ask how immigrant job seekers use ethnic categories and social networks to find a job, to change their administrative status, to manage family and transnational ties.

Based on three case studies in Italy and on deep-interviews, we propose an original framework to analyse public policies and their power of creating boundaries between Europeans and "Extra-communitarian" foreigners (non EU), and to understand the strategies that immigrants can use to overcome difficulties and/or administrative deadlocks.

Reconfiguración de la clase obrera y respuesta sindical en Argentina y Brasil frente a los actuales procesos de renovación política (2003-2011)

Desmintiendo las visiones fatalistas del devenir sindical, propias de la debacle política que sufrió el movimiento obrero a partir de la pasada crisis de los años setenta, en el artículo abordaremos el creciente protagonismo que está adquiriendo el sindicalismo en Argentina y Brasil, porque muestra un escenario de renovación para los estudios centrados en la lucha obrera internacional.

En ambas experiencias observamos una recuperación de la negociación colectiva y un aumento de la presencia política de los dirigentes gremiales. En general, ambos cambios van acompañados de una modificación del ordenamiento político y económico de los gobiernos nacionales, un paralelismo que debe ser analizado de manera diferenciada: tanto a nivel de los ciclos de conflictividad laboral, como a nivel de los cambios en las estructuras institucionales de los gremios y los fenómenos de variación ideológica en las tradiciones obreras que los contienen, particularidades que pueden enmarcar el carácter de esa mayor participación política del sindicalismo bajo criterios diferenciados.

Por consiguiente, y sobre la base de investigaciones desarrolladas en ambos países, avanzaremos en una comparación que distinga las estrategias políticas conseguidas por el sindicalismo en cada país, en un período que abarca el cambio en la política de Estado iniciado en el 2003 y continuado hasta la actualidad. De tal manera, proponemos una reflexión que permita establecer nuevos interrogantes al fenómeno de acumulación de poder sindical, tomando en cuenta dos experiencias latinoamericanas cuyas variaciones estratégicas son significativas para enriquecer el debate comparativo.

Retirement preparation plans and implementation of the rights of the elderly in Brazil: Dialogs on the paradoxes of the non-working retiree

In the contemporary societies the importance and exaltation still given to labor assure the role of the "worker" a prominent place among the social roles representatives of the self, and conditioning the cognitive, affective and axiological aspects of the historical subject. The changeover to non-working condition, usually followed by natural changes regarding the process of ageing, represents a moment of loss of social-professional identity, incurring processes of subjective emptying and expropriation of autonomy. Such phenomena worsens before social dynamics of old age denial, which see the elderly as "the obsolete", "the undesirable", "that which you can no longer use", particularly, in east countries of late industrialization which have not lived the reality of the Welfare State, such as Brazil. For these and other factors, the time of retirement is characterized by tension and distress, by change of identity and paradigms which, normally, also come along with changes in one's perception of oneself (self-esteem and self-image). In this context, the Retirement Preparation Programs (PPA) becomes more important, whether for the informative/formative need to deal with gains and losses resulting from the process of breaking with the work, or because we are experiencing the phenomena of increasing life expectancy and quality of Brazilian elderly people. For legal reasons (Article 28 of Act 10.741/2003), PPA's shall be adopted as public policies for the implementation of the rights of the elderly having as action guidelines the active concepts of ageing and retirement which defend the optimization of opportunities of health, participation, safety, and professional and personal success of elderly people. Based on three core pillars – the psychological, the financial, and of future activities – PPA's try to humanize the changeover to non-working, seeing the man as a complex, social and cultural being who may not be reduced to the condition of homo economicus.

Self-interest, reciprocity and public support for the redistributive role of the state

The aim of this paper is to test whether motivations characteristic of homo reciprocans, as described in experimental economics, can account for the support for the redistributive role of the State. Using data from the 2008 European Social Survey, we show how this picture of human motivations provides a fertile framework to interpret support for redistribution amongst the general public. We test this claim through two OLS regression models. The evidence clearly shows that variables associated with "reciprocity" are better predictors of support for the redistributive role of the State than those associated with "self-interest", including the traditional socioeconomic variables, although both types of variables offer useful insights in the question why people support for redistribution.

Rationality, frames, and social influence. An on-line experimental test of the informative effects of law

This paper empirically tests whether law can have effects on the perception of risk associated to a specific behaviour. With this purpose we have carried out an on-line experiment in order to test two mechanisms through which law could exert this influence. According to the theory of the expressive function of law, compliance can be generated expressively, independently of deterrence and legitimacy. A particular case of the expressive effect of law is the informative effect. In this case, law can provide information about the damages (or benefits) of a particular behaviour. This information leads citizens to update their prior beliefs and thereby changes their behaviour. Under this view, the psychological mechanism which operates this change is rationality.

In previous work we have showed that law can effectively change individuals' beliefs, but that the mechanism operating this change is more likely to be framing rather than rationality. In this paper we argue, first, that banning (or legalizing) a particular behaviour may activate a frame that favours conformism and social influence, thus leading individuals to adapt their beliefs to those which are dominant among their peers, and to raise (or lower) their perception of risk associated to that behaviour. Second, we carry out an on-line experiment with two control groups and four treatments to test our hypothesis. In the control groups we simply observe the perception of risk associated to some particular behaviour. In the treatments, the same perception is observed after giving the subjects information about the result of a vote to decide whether to ban or legalize the behaviour under consideration; the information about the result of the vote is altered in a controlled way. Finally, we discuss in detail the results and their possible implications for social sciences and for institutional design.

Children's perspectives on disorder and violence in public housing neighbourhoods in Portugal

This paper is based on a PhD in Sociology concerning childhood, violence and delinquency in Portugal. Rooted in social ecology theoretical approaches, and in childhood studies that recognize children as social actors, the research carried out with the support of the Fundação para a Ciência e Tecnologia (FCT) aimed to a better understanding of children's socialization processes in communities looked as multi-problematic, especially about children's involvement in violence and delinquency. Within this framework, between 2005 and early 2009, a case study based on ethnographic research has been carried out on six public housing neighbourhoods in the Lisbon Metropolitan Area. Involving a combination of qualitative methodologies, it was sustained in a comprehensive analytical logic that has considered the voice of children as its starting point. Since the option was to look at children as a key source for understanding social dynamics, child-centred research methods were at the core of the project, such as visual techniques (drawings and photography), conversations and interviews. This presentation focuses on the findings obtained in the research's first stage, which was centred on the question: how do children represent living in their neighbourhoods? The objective, at this stage, was to identify the main contours of children's socialization in the field, through children's own accounts of their lives. In general, when expressing about this matter, the negative aspects pointed out by the 312 participants strongly overlap the positive ones. Children turned out to be powerfully aware of what they consider to be the main social problems over there, which can be distributed around four dimensions: poverty and unemployment, physical and social disorders, crime, and (in)security. Not surprisingly, part of the childhood cultures generated here is underpinned by a street culture of violence, and some of the children emerge not only as victims, but also as agents of violence.

The portuguese juvenile justice system: Current dynamics, challenges and risks

In Portugal, delinquency has emerged as a public concern in the last years, especially considering the challenges and constraints arising in the administration of juvenile justice. Ten years after the Children and Juvenile Justice Reform, started in 1999, with the approval of two new laws that came into force in January 2001, it is essential to identify and discuss how social selectivity remains at the basis of the sentencing process. Once the Portuguese system differs from the majority of other EU countries, giving less importance to the offence than to the need of the young offender's education on the fundamental community values, which are protected by the penal code, the scarcity of Portuguese academic and scientific production on this subject is a major limitation, and as in many other countries, this situation is aggravated by the lack of consistent official statistics concerning reported delinquency and the sentencing process. Moreover, currently the logic of budgetary cutbacks is central in the Portuguese state's administration, and probably it will be accentuated in the following years, due to the country's financial and economic crisis, which could be directly reflected in the implementation of international standards based on a 'child rights perspective' in all the public policies related to childhood and youth. In short, in this presentation, the Portuguese juvenile justice system is briefly characterized, and afterwards we summarize, discuss and analyze the available data on reported delinquency and educational measures for young offenders. The paper ends with a summary of the current dynamics, challenges and risks the juvenile justice faces in the country, where it is included the problems of social selectivity, and we finish pointing out some of the most important conclusions and recommendations made by judicial, supervision and other independent entities in the last years regarding the judicial measures for young offenders.

Exploring intimate economies: An alternative framework for activists?

This session opens space to explore the rubric, "intimate economies" for revisioning and reworking strategies to achieve a more just and equitable distribution of economic and social power. Intimate economies are both naturalized (caring work) and stigmatized (erotic labour). This session examines alternative possibilities for reconceptualizing intimate labor beyond traditional economic constructs and moral ascriptions in order to rethink practices for transformation and resistance.

The disconnection of sexual, familial, community and economic realms of social life, the relegation of intimate work, stigmatized and non-stigmatized, to private spheres, and the allocation of physical and emotional caring work mainly to racialized and Indigenous women and girls in North America, has resulted in the devaluation and marginalization of those who perform this work. Consequently, women and girls are often unprotected, precariously employed, and easily exploited and oppressed. The value of their labour is discounted and taken for granted. As economic actors, their ingenuity, their life sustaining contributions are rendered invisible and dismissed.

Intimate caring work is widely perceived as non-productive, or a naturally female gendered form of labor. Is it possible to counter these dominant assumptions that make mobilizing resources and community support challenging for social and economic justice activists? Can intimate economies offer alternatives to activists who tend to be siloed and separated into sectoral struggles that mirror state and market logics? How can women's alternative economic strategies be valued against hegemonic understandings of what constitutes "productive" labor? Can the idea of intimate economies open up linkages across sectorally divided activisms and social movements? The three presentations will draw on activist and engaged research with diverse affected communities (e.g. Indigenous and racialized girls and women; migrant and domestic sex workers; childcare workers).

Contra-hegemonic social movements and the international cooperation for development in latin america

One of the persistent challenges to the advancements of globalization studies in the social sciences is the need of more in-depth studies on the organization and action of civil society actors in supranational, national and subnational levels based on the interaction with global players. I discuss the relationships between Latin-American organizations and social movements and international cooperation agencies with global governance roles that have a strategic presence in the region regarding development and governance models and flows. Based on a historical perspective of some experiences in several countries in Latin America, I highlight the importance of understanding potentials, limites and dilemmas faced by organizations e social movements, through national and transnational networks, in their initiatives of interlocutions and resistance against strategies, policies, programs and projects supported by different international cooperation agencies in the region. I focus mainly issues related to the organizations and social movements' proposals of alternative models of development and governance, which are integrated to wider mobilizations for other modernities and other globalizations, and constructing their own nexus between micro/local and macro/global contexts that directly or indirectly influence their lives, forms of organization and perspectives of change and future. A transversal argument is related to the emergence of new dimensions of conflicts and hegemony disputes, their structures and dynamics, in the present scenario in the region influenced by attempts of international political integration oriented by the idea of global governance.

From retirement to active ageing: Changing images of "old age" in the late twentieth century

In the context of the ongoing and anticipated changes in the age structure of European societies, the social category of the "young old" has been discovered in recent political and scientific discourse as a possible resource in the public fight against the (alleged) problems of population ageing. The rise of the "active ageing" paradigm suggests that mobilizing the increasingly healthy and well-educated elderly, be they employed or retired, will eventually result in a win-win-game for individuals, institutions and society at large. The contribution presents findings of an empirical study on the changing images of "old age" in Germany which combines discourse analysis and qualitative interviews with elderly people in order to identify the dynamics and mechanisms of the ongoing social construction of age and ageing. While the story line of the "restless age" dominant in public discourse since the late 1980s is today being widely adopted and reproduced by people aged 60 to 70, the more recent "productive ageing" story line shows to be accepted only reluctantly (or at best partially) by the elderly themselves. It seems that the identity construction of a "young old" person proposed and propagated by politics and the media is lacking – at least for the time being – broad resonance on the part of people who consistently reject being addressed as "old" by any means, and who conceive and depict themselves rather as older (or "mature") adults. This may be an important finding with regard to the prospects – and limits – of "activating" the big cohorts of "baby boomers" who will move, in Germany and elsewhere, into retirement in the years to come.

Politics and population policy in the Philippines: A Gramscian analysis

This study explains why the Philippine Catholic Church has successfully established and maintained ideological and political dominance, most notably after democratization. Tracing the history of the reproductive health-family planning (RH-FP) policy process from Ferdinand Marcos to Gloria Macapagal Arroyo, it argues that the Church has successfully built and nurtured organic links with state elites and segments of civil society to promote a Catholic dogma-informed FP agenda, and preserve its hegemonic sway despite regime change. The Church has endured as an institution of power owing to its ability to deploy and nurture a network of intellectuals in key policy making and implementing institutions of government, and civil society organizations, an opportunity that had been further enhanced (albeit paradoxically) under a post-authoritarian political environment. It has incorporated heads of state, and influential members of the national legislature into its ambit at different historical instances, and managed to influence the RH-FP policy debate and advocacy process. By the same token, the Catholic Church has stymied efforts by state and non-state advocates of population policy reform to institutionalize a coherent and sustainable FP program predicated upon RH and reproductive rights.

The absence of a definitive government stand on RH and FP significantly points to the preeminence of the Catholic Church. Yet to suggest that it exercises its authority uncontested is to neglect its embedment within a relatively vibrant political context. Hence, this study also examines how a counter-ideological and political movement of state and non-state RH and FP proponents has emerged. From non-government policy advisory bodies to women's groups, the proliferation of an alternative mindset or framework of action vis-à-vis the issue of population control and FP has gradually taken root. Whether such a development would eventually engender a complete reversal of Catholic Church hegemony has yet to be ascertained.

Este paper busca contribuir con los estudios sobre los procesos de constitución y reconstitución de las elites políticas argentinas desde del estudio de la selección de candidatos en la Argentina contemporánea. A partir de la reconstrucción prosopográfica de las trayectorias de los senadores nacionales argentinos entre 2001 y 2011 nos preguntamos por los modos de acceso a la política y los mecanismos intra-partidarios puestos en juego, partiendo de las continuidades y rupturas con períodos anteriores.

El estudio de los senadores nacionales supone efectuar un acercamiento a los grupos políticos de más alta posición dentro de la jerarquía de las instituciones estatales y, al mismo tiempo, detenerse en un conjunto de actores que ocupan posiciones de poder altamente privilegiadas tanto en el Estado como en los partidos políticos. De allí nuestra pregunta por los elementos partidarios y extra-partidarios que intervienen en las carreras políticas de los senadores.

A la luz del trabajo empírico realizado y de la bibliografía existente sobre la cuestión constatamos una pluralidad de tipos de trayectoria política junto con una diversidad de características sociales básicas (sexo, lugar de nacimiento, profesión, etc.). Estas diferencias pueden agruparse en tipologías que evidencian formas distintas de ingresar a la política y de llegar al Senado. Así, a los factores políticos y partidarios debemos agregar otras dimensiones como las sociabilidades educativas y laborales y la vida asociativa en general.

Political society, social movements and the workers' party in Brazil

Brazilian social movements are fully recognized political actors at all levels of governance (municipal, state and federal) and present distributive social claims that favor the working classes through their involvement in participative democratic processes and in party politics. Many have cultivated a symbiotic relation with the Workers' Party (PT).

Since its founding, the PT created a new type of social movement – political party relation that broke with the traditional transmission belt model. Since then, the PT has gained significant power at all levels of government and this has consequently transformed its relation with social movements. PT governments have integrated many of the movements' demands into their government programs especially where these programs strengthen their electoral chances and where they do not conflict with neoliberal macro-economic policy. Consequently, some social movements have come to depend on PT governments to express and achieve their existential and program claims thus abandoning their goals of social transformation and forms of transgressive contention for what they call the "struggle for the possible" being specific social programs obtained through negotiations and more restrained forms of collective action. The result is that social movements in their relationship to the ruling national party, contribute to reproducing the structure of power, but concurrently open a political space for excluded populations.

This paper proposes to study the changes that have taken place in this relationship through the specific cases of the housing movement, the MST and the women's movement and their relationship with the PT as a governing party. It will especially look to the concept of political society as a way of understanding how this sphere mediates the social movement - state relation and how the structure and dynamics of political society can condition the way social movements are organized and their choice of claims and meaning.

Jóvenes, consumo de realidades y aprendizajes éticos: La recepción de big brother en adolescentes mujeres y varones de distintos sectores sociales

La programación televisiva está sufriendo una transformación en su discursividad que se expresa especialmente en la estabilización de la llamada reality TV. Big Brother (Gran Hermano) es uno de los ejemplos más claros de este fenómeno, dadas las temáticas incluidas, su configuración y enunciación, la penetración que ha logrado en audiencias de distintos sectores sociales y edades, la rapidez con que se convirtió en un hecho tematizado por otros programas, medios y también actores sociales extramediáticos.

Este fenómeno parece concomitante con determinados cambios culturales de época -que enfocaremos-, naturalizados más fácilmente por los jóvenes, más permeables a la novedad por el carácter corto de su memoria social y por ser nativos del presente.

Nuestra hipótesis es que, a partir de los ejemplos de vidas que media-tiza, el reality se convierte en una posible fuente de aprendizajes éticos para las audiencias, sobre todo en una época de fuerte cambio cultural orientado a configurar "sociedades del riesgo" (Beck).

No obstante las mencionadas transformaciones comunes al conjunto social, el segmento adolescente reproduce en su interior las diferencias socioculturales que atraviesan a la sociedad. Junto a esto, el género también construye diferencias. En ese marco y en línea con la tradición compuesta por los estudios culturales sajones y los estudios de recepción latinoamericanos, se pondrá a prueba la hipótesis analizando la recepción de la cuarta edición del Gran Hermano argentino, por parte de adolescentes mujeres y varones de distintos sectores sociales. Las diferentes lecturas obtenidas sobre Gran Hermano serán explicadas vinculándolas con distintos aspectos de las culturas juveniles, como la sexualidad, la afectividad, la moratoria vital y social. Se destacarán especialmente aquellas lecturas que, en línea con lo hipotetizado, toman a Gran Hermano como un tipo de documento de la realidad capaz de proveer material para combatir la inseguridad ontológica contemporánea.

Unruly politics and methodological mashups: How can participatory visual methods contribute to citizen engagement?

This paper will examine the use of a 'mashup' of participatory visual methods to support social activism in five municipalities of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It will reflect critically on the use of digital storytelling and participatory video to create public dialogue around the role of citizen participation. Visual participatory processes link participatory methods of reflection, inquiry and analysis with digital video/photography and other creative methods. This approach involves opening a space for reflection on a particular issue or question, and then linking these reflections into processes of dialogue between different groups, while simultaneously documenting the content of these sessions and developing ways to visually communicate. The paper will argue that this iteration between different perspectives is key to how participatory visual methods help to distil and clearly articulate messages that can be used for social action. The potential contribution to citizen action will be examined.

Current analysis of social exclusion in Bosnian society indicates that there are numerous structural limitations on citizen participation. At the same time, citizens are increasingly defined and ordered through their ethnic and religious identities. Media sources are progressively streamlined into this political landscape, and informal spaces of participation are restricted. Yet the events of the past year also point to the importance of citizen-led moments of rupture from dominant power structures: Tahrir Square, the 2011 riots in UK cities, the Occupy movement, los indignados. Within a context, such as Bosnia, where there is extreme fragmentation of political community, in which histories of violence are inscribed on citizen identities, and in a contemporary culture where visual knowledges and representations are ubiquitous - can citizens use visual methods to positively disrupt the status quo? Can we, as researchers, create spaces for engagement that are both critical and 'safe' and have potential to create rupture which is transformational?

Expansion of high education and equalization of educational attainment in China

Educational expansion provides people with more opportunities for education. However, there is a debate about its impact on inequality of educational attainment. A comparative study of 13 countries directed by Shavit and Blossfeld (1993) concludes that inequalities persist even though education expands. But the results of recent researches questioned this conclusion. They find decreasing inequalities during educational expansion in some countries. During 1999-2002, the Chinese government adopted a policy to increase enrolment in higher education. This resulted in a five fold increase in the number of college students and the expansion of opportunity for higher education doubled in five years. What is the impact of such sharp expansion of higher education on educational inequality? Has it brought about a decrease in inequality of educational attainment? The paper, based on sub-data drawing from 1% population sample survey data of 2005 and using logit models, examines the impact of higher educational expansion during this period on inequalities of classes, Hukou status, ethnic and gender in China. The author tests the validity of the MMI hypothesis (maximally maintained inequality) and EMI hypothesis (effectively maintained inequality) in the Chinese context and proposes a further hypothesis, CII hypothesis (continuously increased inequality), based on rational action models of educational decisions. The results show that inequalities of higher education among classes, ethnic groups and sexes have not declined during the sharp expansion of higher education but inequality of high education between people born in urban and rural areas has increased during this period. In addition, regular colleges (Benke) experience more inequality than specialized colleges (Dazhuan). These results strongly support the MMI and EMI hypotheses and partly support rational action models of educational decisions.

"Subtle" violence: Young people's interactions in peer groups at school

The present paper aims at discussing the findings of the first author's dissertation whose theme was the "subtle" expressions of violence that occur among young people in peer groups within the school. A field research was carried out to identify these small acts of violence, their relationship with the rules of the peer group and with the rules established by the school. As the focus of this research concerns "subtle" violence, the present work regards it as episodes of violence which are not related to physical aggression, but ones that can emerge as insulting nicknames or bad jokes. The fieldwork involved a total of twenty-four students, among boys and girls, from fifteen to seventeen years old. They studied in two schools, one private and one state, in the northern side of the city of Rio de Janeiro. The analysis of the results discusses the process of naturalization of "subtle" violence and presents the way by which these episodes pass unnoticed by educators and are trivialized within peer groups, especially among friends. It has been noticed that acts of revenge between groups are closely related to their own rules for grouping, such as rules for inclusion or permanence in the group. Moreover, young people demonstrated discredit towards actions taken by school staff to prevent such violence. It has also been noticed that the attitude of teachers varied from neglecting to criminalizing these conflicts and tensions among students. This point brings up issues relating to the role of adults nowadays in helping young people build an ethical code that is not limited to their small group's interaction.

Syndicats, partis, États en europe : Entre action de classe et conciliation sociale L'histoire du mouvement syndical européen du siècle dernier est notamment marqué par un déplacement, plus ou moins lent suivant les pays, d'un mode d'activité dominant basé sur l'action collective de classe, vers une position d'intervention et d'implication dans les institutions sociales et politiques de l'État, via l'expansion de la négociation collective de travail, du « dialogue social » et des pactes sociaux.

Au fil des commotions politiques et sociales en Europe durant le XXe, la forme des relations entre syndicats et partis « amis » (chrétiens-démocrates, socialistes ou communistes) a toujours eu un effet significatif dans les processus de médiation capital-travail et l'adoption de certains modèles de stratégies et de tactiques par le mouvement ouvrier organisé.

Ce papier se base sur une analyse socio-historique comparative du syndicalisme belge et espagnol, de leur degré d'autonomie actuel et de leur positionnement au sein du régime. Malgré les différences historiques et structurelles fondamentales entre les syndicalismes du Nord (dit « néo-corporatistes ») et du Sud (dit « politiques ») de l'Europe, il tâchera de saisir les tendances d'attitude communes face aux États nationaux des syndicalismes européens, soumis simultanément aux pressions de la centralisation internationale du capital, de l'europanisation des relations industrielles et des contradictions internes – au niveau de la représentation des intérêts des travailleurs – qui s'accroissent et apparaissent dans la guerre sociale déclenchée aujourd'hui suite à la crise des dettes souveraines, surtout lorsque celle-ci est menée par les partis « alliés » au pouvoir.

Enfin, il s'agira de faire une proposition de bilan quant aux leçons socio-politiques que l'évolution du mouvement ouvrier de ces deux pays peuvent apporter pour l'analyse et les perspectives de transformations du syndicalisme en Amérique Latine, face aux défis conjugués posés par les gouvernements de fronts populaires et l'irruption de la crise économique mondiale sur le continent.

La "comunidad" como categoría de interpretación de las luchas por el territorio en la Argentina contemporánea

El concepto de "comunidad" es portador de largas resonancias en la sociología y la política europea. Su reconocida ambigüedad ha facilitado su apropiación por las más variadas corrientes ideológicas (conservadurismo, socialismo utópico, nazismo, fundamentalismos varios). En América Latina, mientras tanto, se asiste en los últimos años a cierta rehabilitación política de este concepto, sobre todo en el campo de los movimientos sociales con presencia en zonas rurales. De este modo, suele contraponerse a los procesos de modernización agraria actualmente en curso, conocimientos, costumbres y valores que se adscriben a "comunidades" campesinas e indígenas. Esta ponencia se propone realizar un abordaje crítico de este concepto a partir de autores clásicos de la sociología europea (Tönnies, Durkheim, Weber) y de autores latinoamericanos contemporáneos (por ejemplo, Silvia Rivera Cusicanqui, Juan José Bautista y Franz Hinkelammert). El objetivo es identificar elementos comunes, diferencias y relaciones entre dichos autores, que permitan reflexionar acerca de una posible rehabilitación teórica de dicha categoría, en el análisis e interpretación de las luchas por el territorio en la Argentina contemporánea. Asimismo, se intenta determinar algunas de las coordenadas principales de la categoría de "comunidad", con el propósito de facilitar la interpretación de los diversos discursos que, en el marco de dichas luchas, encuentran en aquel concepto una referencia fundamental.

Internet advice on disclosure of HIV status to sexual partners in an era of criminalization

Purpose: HIV-specific statutes are increasingly popular in the United States and often impose harsh penalties for failure to disclose an HIV di-agnosis to sexual partners. The purpose of this study was to examine HIV-related websites for information about non-disclosure as a crime and the relevance of this advice for U.S. audiences. Methods: Internet searches were conducted for HIV-related websites with advice on disclosure to sexual partners. Once identified, these sites were analyzed for content, quality, and type of approach to disclosure and the law. Each site was given a page ranking (P. Score) according to Google's priority listing algorithm, and a value ranking (V. Score) for textual content and quality of advice. Results: Internet advice on disclosure and the law was highly variable. With few exceptions, highly ranked U.S. sites offered less advice than sites in Britain, Canada and Australia. All U.S. sites followed the law by placing the onus of responsibility for disclosure on the HIV-infected individual, but few offered advice on how to disclose or how to obtain proof of disclosure in order to avoid prosecution. None addressed the special risks of African Americans who are most likely to be prosecuted for non-disclosure. Conclusions: HIV advice websites should offer strategies on how to disclose to sexual partners and to document proof in case of prosecution. The mental health implications of HIV criminalization will be discussed.

Trauma responses to disaster: A tale of two cities

On September 7, 2010, the first of several devastating earthquakes hit Christchurch, New Zealand, causing widespread damage to the city. Two large aftershocks on February 22, 2011 and June 13, 2011 caused numerous deaths and almost complete destruction of the central business district. On April 27, 2011, an EF4 tornado hit Tuscaloosa, Alabama, USA, killing dozens of people. Both of these disasters involved disruption to everyday life, required substantial aid from outside sources, caused people to flee the cities, and required a lengthy rebuilding process that is currently underway.

As a resident of Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and a native of Christchurch, New Zealand, I found these disasters to be profoundly affecting on a personal basis. I was surprised at how much more affected I was in the aftermath of the Christchurch earthquakes than the Tuscaloosa tornado, even though I do not presently live in New Zealand. In submitting this abstract to the RC49 session on disaster and mental health, I propose to compare the mental health effects of the two disasters, and offer an autoethnographic account of why one disaster was personally more traumatizing than the other.

The presentation will also offer a sociological analysis of community responses to the two disasters: that is, how each society manages social disaster according to preexisting models of social engagement. In New Zealand's case, the response followed the government-intervention model in which mental health needs and rebuilding are managed by the public sector. In Tuscaloosa's case, mental health needs were managed by church and community groups, while rebuilding involves a fractious private-public partnership. I will finalize the presentation by evaluating the progress toward recovery in the two cities, including in terms of the mental health and coping of affected residents.

Does science matter? The dynamics of science, policy and citizens in international environmental governance

There is today an urgent need to better understand how transboundary environmental problems are and can be regulated. Despite that international environmental governance has received increased attention by social scientists, it is still a field that is characterised by diverging approaches to a large extent developing in isolation from each other. Approaches within International Relations (IR) and Science and Technology Studies (STS) give different answers on how international environmental regulation is shaped; important factors and causal relations that explain the configuring of this regulation. Although convergence between them is neither possible nor desirable, cross-fertilization is necessary to improve the theoretical understanding of international environmental governance.

This paper takes a first step in this, by evaluating perspectives and findings from three different approaches; that of regime theory (Oran Young), that of epistemic communities (Peter M Haas) and that of science and technology studies (Sheila Jasanoff). We find that important social-scientific findings on the interrelations and dynamics between science, policy and citizens have not yet been included in a sufficient way, not least in terms of how they mutually influence each other. In particular, we will explore how state interests to expert knowledge can be related in the formation of trusted and legitimate international cooperation and shaping of international environmental governance.

Intensive forestry in Sweden. Risk governance in practice?

In 2008, the Swedish government commissioned an investigation concerning the possibilities of more intensive silvicultural practices, such as increased use of fertilizers, improved genetic material, introduction of exotic tree species, and use of fast-growing deciduous species. The commission concluded that intensive forestry was associated by substantial environmental risks, but that these risks could be traded against its effects on mitigating climate change. The commission's report received very different responses; not only environmental organizations, but also the Swedish Forest Agency were critical to the proposal, whereas forest industry, forest owners and the Swedish environmental protection agency were positive to it.

This paper investigates how risks and uncertainties are used in the actors' strategy for promoting or opposing the proposal for intensive forestry. It takes recent trends within risk governance as point of departure, where both the importance of actors and context are emphasized. This means that what is seen as trusted and effective regulation is not only dependent on actors strategies but of political culture, national regulatory style and policy area. Risk governance also includes an awareness of the need to include how stakeholders understand and evaluate the issue at stake, with the aim to thereby develop a social robust regulation, that is, regulation that is scientific informed, political viable and public trusted.

The empirical analysis shows that central difference in evaluation of the proposal concerns the size of positive benefits (climate change) and to what extent it was seen possible to handle risks and uncertainties associated with intensive forestry. However, on a general level this process also opens up a space for strategic as well as deliberative action, where the government before its decision got informed on how actors' understood and evaluate the issue at stake.

Local understandings of juvenile delinquency

In recent years, criminality among young people in disadvantaged neighbourhoods has been highlighted in Sweden, like in several other countries. The media frequently report on criminal gangs actively recruiting young, unemployed men, often with an immigrant background, and on violent confrontations between young people and representatives of the police force and the emergency services. This has put a great pressure on decision makers and involved authorities to "do something", and to involve residents in joint efforts to overcome the situation.

In an on-going Ph.D. project, various ideas about proper ways to intervene, based on different definitions and understandings of juvenile delinquency and hostile confrontations between local youth and legal authorities, are being identified and analysed from a social constructionist perspective. A substantial amount of qualitative data has been gathered, primarily interviews with professionals, residents and youths as well as field notes from informal meetings and discussions in the troubled neighbourhoods. This empirical material is being subjected to a narrative analysis.

The aim of this paper is to present local ways of explaining what causes juvenile crime and the aggressive confrontations mentioned above. Questions such as 'what is the problem?', 'who or what is at danger?', 'who is threatening whom or what?' and 'who is to blame?' have been posed to the local accounts of neighbourhood problems and youth crime found in transcribed interviews with police officers, social workers, and adult as well as adolescent residents. Another aspect of the study is about how local explanations are influenced by larger societal discourses and various sociological theories and how these different conceptions are woven together and in the translation process are given a new meaning.

Estatuto de la ciudad y derecho a la ciudad: Posibilidades y límites en Salvador (Brasil)

Los tipos de ocupación del espacio urbano contemporáneo en las grandes ciudades brasileñas se caracterizan por una producción a gran escala de "ilegalidad" de la tierra y el urbano, con la intervención del gobierno a través del proceso legislativo, un factor importante en la formación de este universo. En estos espacios se construyen además de la pluralidad de las formas arquitectónicas, el rango de relaciones sociales que revelan las redes de derechos insurgentes que germinan y viven uno al lado del otro, o hasta cierto punto, en legitimación a menudo sobre las normas legales del derecho estatal. Con la publicación del Estatuto de la Ciudad, la Ley Federal n. 10257/2001, se abren nuevas perspectivas para el reconocimiento de la pluralidad de normas insurgentes en estos espacios. Esta ley fortalece los principios de la función social de la propiedad y la ciudad consagrados en la Constitución Federal de 1988, proporcionando las herramientas y directrices que deben guiar las acciones del Gobierno en la ejecución de la política urbana y en el reconocimiento de estos derechos. Este trabajo tiene como objetivo contribuir a la reflexión sobre las posibilidades y límites del diálogo entre los acuerdos de regulación sobre el acceso, uso y ocupación del suelo que se aplican en "favelas" (pluralismo jurídico) y las normas regulatorias propuestas por el Estado para la realización del Derecho a la Ciudad, con las consideraciones sobre los límites del Estatuto de la Ciudad, en el reconocimiento de diversas formas y derechos que se construyen fuera del sistema legal oficial. Con este fin, fue elegida la ciudad de Salvador de Bahía como opción para realización del trabajo de campo.

The right of giving birth in Brazil: Civil society participation in national policy for humanization of childbirth

This is exploratory research, it is proposed to discuss which places and how occurs the participation of civil society in national policy for the humanization of prenatal, childbirth and postpartum care. For this purpose, we worked with the following methodological procedures: bibliographic review, documental analysis and historical review. The article is divided into three parts. The first brings the discussion of the health system in Brazil, seeking to answer how it was formulated, what are its principles and how the participation of civil society occurs. The second indicates how the theme of humanization was inserted in the Unified Health System ("SUS") and, specifically, the national policy for childbirth care. The third describes how civil society has participated in formulation and implementation of policy for humanization of childbirth care.

Art in a 'violent neighborhood': Pedagogical practices in a human rights policy

Bom Jardim, together with its bordering neighborhoods, has acquired the reputation of a 'violent neighborhood'. Since the early 1990s, this area of the Brazilian city of Fortaleza has been known by its high rates of crime and homicide. Narratives elaborated by residents and journalists reaffirm the violent context, but they also highlight moral counterbalances, such as the local activity of community associations and specially of groups of artistic practices. Local institutions mobilize pedagogical practices using art as medium with men and women, children and teenagers, in order to tackle the stigma of 'violent neighborhood'. In 2009, the Ministry of Justice launched the National Program of Public Security with Citizenship (Pro-nasci), which aims to set forth policies that combine police-related security and approaches to human rights. Due to its violence rates, Bom Jardim was the only area selected in the state of Ceará to integrate the framework of Território de Paz ('Territory of Peace'), a program that develops projects related to human rights and to the stimulation of social capital within the 'territories', reaching citizens, youngsters facing juvenile proceedings and police officers. Furthermore, the program offered funding to projects created by members of civil society that would carry out discussions on human rights and citizenship for teenagers through pedagogical artistic practices. Instead of being perceived as a constraint because of its specificity, this initiative has found a fertile ground in Bom Jardim, as those practices and the moral values embedded are shared by a number of residents. What do such practices have to say about human rights and the quest for social justice in Brazil? Through interviews with coordinators, residents and teenagers, as well as based on newspaper articles, this research aims to give meaning to the uses of art as a political process in a violent neighborhood.

Economies of waste: Work with recyclable materials and the natives logics of value (re)creation

Recycling is no longer an environmentalist's exclusive subject of interest, and it has been progressively incorporated into the national and international political agendas. In 2010, in Brazil, a regulatory framework for waste management was created with the approval of the law that establishes the National Solid Waste Policy. In the Brazilian context of recycling is remarkable the presence of "catadores", a category covering those who derive their income source from collecting recyclable materials, work classified as "informal" by analysts. The category of catador is being changed – it's status has been progressively identified as a "professional category" – mainly due to the catadores' political organization as a social movement. The doctoral research I have been developing takes place in Jardim Gramacho, located on the outskirts of Rio de Janeiro. This neighborhood receives since the 70's most part of Metropolitan Region waste production, where exists one of the largest Latin America's landfills, which is not only a strategic piece of waste management but also of Rio's recycling industry. Recycling is primarily an economy, and an ethnographic approach of its economic life proves essential for understanding the dynamics and the various actors and practices that shape these processes. Throughout the year 2011, I conducted ethnographic work in a local "catadores" association, closely following the activities that constitute this recycling economy's intermediate step, between the landfill output and the big recycling industries input. Focusing on the intersection between economy and culture I try to highlight the relations, fluxes and native logics that permeates the work with "recyclable materials", especially considering the multiple roles that these heterogeneous materialities - as the instruments they required in everyday practices - play in the construction of units of account and ordinary forms of calculation, which enables to reflect on the (re)creation of value and the social construction of markets.

Políticas públicas de Turismo en los gobiernos de Vargas (Brasil) y Perón (Argentina): Un análisis comparado El objetivo de este trabajo es analizar la relación entre el turismo y los proyectos nacionalistas de los regímenes de Vargas y Perón, destacando también los esfuerzos de aproximación política entre ambos países por medio del turismo. Más que un creciente sector de la economía - especialmente en el período post Segunda Guerra Mundial, con el advenimiento del turismo de masas - el turismo fue percibido por estos Estados, guardadas sus debidas proporciones, como un eficiente instrumento de la modernidad para la formación pedagógica del hombre nuevo, para la construcción de la Nación y divulgación de sus imágenes simbólicas en el país y en el exterior.

Considerando las diferencias entre los dos regímenes políticos, el turismo fue apropiado como mecanismo de control del tiempo libre de los trabajadores, con el incentivo al llamado turismo operario o turismo justicialista, en el caso de Argentina, destacándose las colonias de vacaciones. Los diversos segmentos de la sociedad civil, a su vez, manejaban el turismo de diferentes formas y su acción colectiva colaboró con el desarrollo del turismo en ambos países en el período y para el desarrollo de políticas nacionalistas de ambos gobiernos.

El trabajo promueve el diálogo entre el conocimiento histórico y el conocimiento turístico. La metodología utilizada se basó en la investigación bibliográfica y documental, cuyas fuentes principales fueron los documentos elaborados en el sector estatal, especialmente la correspondencia diplomática entre el Itamaraty y la Cancillería argentina, periódicos brasileños y argentinos especializados en turismo y periódicos de gran circulación.

Mapping worldwide efforts to combat human trafficking

Worldwide efforts to combat human trafficking have emerged in the last 20 years with advocates working to address the trade of people under conditions of force, fraud or deception. How has contemporary anti-trafficking advocacy spread around the world and what accounts for its rapid development? Competing perspectives in global and transnational sociology offer very different explanations. One perspective, world polity theory, emphasizes the development of global norms disseminated by international nongovernmental organizations around the world and adopted by states. A second perspective calls attention to powerful states in the world system that dominate transnational advocacy efforts due to their control of funding and their political and ideological hegemony in international governmental organizations. Neither perspective adequately addresses the agency of actors in the global south, whether governmental or nongovernmental. This paper will report the preliminary findings of an ongoing research study that is collecting and analyzing data about anti-trafficking advocacy globally through a census of anti-trafficking organizations, networks and programs. Aside from documenting a new phenomenon, the choice of anti-trafficking efforts provides a unique case that it may well complicate both theoretical perspectives that can be used to explain its development. Contemporary anti-trafficking advocacy may show a strong tendency toward regionalization rather than a pattern of general diffusion or a top-down process imposed by governments in the global north. The collection of empirical data will help us to better understand the dynamics of anti-trafficking advocacy worldwide.

A multi-legal system or conflicts of different legal traditions: Case of Taiwanese legal reform in communication law

The legal culture on Taiwan Island has not only ancient Chinese influences but also stout foreign colors, as a result of the Western imperialism in the 16th century and from the late 19th to mid-20th centuries. In 1945, the Nationalist government brought the new Chinese legal system from Mainland China to Taiwan, a landmark event in Taiwanese legal development. The resulting legal system is based on both the distinctive Chinese legal traditions and the Western European legal regime. From then on, the Taiwanese legal system, with substantial European traits, can be considered as a member of the family of "civil law" systems. In the following three decades, the people and the Nationalist government endeavored to create a freer market as well as democracy on this small island. Because of the rapid creation of new technology and the growth of economic development, the government has adopted a series of steps to restructure its legislation to fit international requirements such as the liberalization of communications market. Reviewing the development of legal history and the formation of its economic market, one may conclude that Taiwan in general has been strongly touched by foreign influences and has tended toward internationalization. Does Taiwan's communications legislative development still follow this model, or has the government already found a particular way to structure its own communications legal system? If the legislature follows a particular pre-existing model to establish the communications legal system, which model of legislation will it adopt and why? In addition, how did international agreements influence Taiwan's communications development? And how did the government adopt those agreements into its communications regulations? This essay aims to describe and examine the communications legal adjustments on Taiwan Island. Efforts will also be made to evaluate these developments in light of the current international environment in this regard.

Different impacts of global climate changes on energy policies and industrial structures on developing nations? An Asian perspective

To solve the global warming effects and to prevent the climate changes, the United Nations had designed to control the enlarging problem of emissions of anthropogenic greenhouse gases. Because the reduction of the use of greenhouse gases will definitely impact the subsistence and future development of global trade system, this issue was widely debated and emphasize in the whole world. Through a long discussion and negotiation, western countries had started to reduce the emission of major greenhouse gases such as CO₂ etc. Except western countries, the reduction timetable for developing countries especially Asian booming economies had been focused for recent rounds. It is believed that the effect of global climate change and Kyoto Protocol would play a vital role and become an important factor in the development of human history. It is because the reduced timetable will bring wide and deep influences on industrial structures, energy policies, and economic growth. To avoid foreseeable international trade sanctions and make a suitable position in the practice of UNFCCC, Asia countries' emission of anthropogenic greenhouse gases had been discussed and managed abruptly. Many Asian governments also had taken adaptable measures including protection of forestry, waste disposal control, efficient energy use, industrial structure modification, etc. In the aspect of industrial policies, to decrease the portions of energy-consuming industries such as Petroleum-chemical and steel industries will be the first task taken in those measures. In addition, since western countries had brought heavy burdens on greenhouse gases emission through industrialization revolution, would those arrangements bring a better living standard or environmental justice for developing nations in Asian? Aimed for this purpose, the paper will debate the legal ideas between energy policies and industrial structure and hope to provide concrete suggestions concerning the issue of global warming effects based on Asian countries experiences.

Talent management of knowledge workers and global migration in the new economy: Opportunities, challenges, and trends

Changes in terms of an ageing population, the informal nature of the workplace, outsourcing, and globalization influence the need for a contingent workforce. Many of these changes have had important ramifications for employees' careers, work tasks, and quality of life. Ongoing economic globalization forces organizations to use the newest technology and knowledge available. Shifting global employment trends have gone hand-in-hand with liberalization, featuring an easing of restrictions on deregulation of labour protection. In order to survive in the increasingly global and competitive business environment, firms must seek greater expertise, skills, flexibility, and adjustment. A substantial increase in non-traditional employment means that firms are forced to adjust their human resources strategies in order to attract and retain the knowledge of non-traditional employees. People can see the professional workers moving across borders easily with their attained economic and cultural capital. They expand their domains of social control, demonstrated by their knowledge of the dynamics of global market forces. It might be necessary to formulate different strategies that focus on the specific needs and work motivation patterns of the non-traditional workers in order to attract and retain staff.

Global mobilities shape new forms of economic transnationalism. A key dimension of such global cosmopolitan processes is the tendency for migrants to construct multiple ties linking people or institutions across the borders of nation states. The new occupations and their organizational patterns were identified as doing knowledge work and as undertaking expert labour. The emergence of new forms of knowledge is at the root of fundamental changes in the social organisation of skilled labour. With the attainment of certain levels of education and work experience, professional migrants have been able to gain formal work.

La Amazonia boliviana: Migración humana y producción de alimentos

La Amazonía, con cerca de 6.700 Km², que comprende 8 países de América del Sur y por su diversidad, vegetación espesa y, por ende, capacidad para capturar CO₂, ha sido denominada el pulmón vivo por excelencia del planeta. Sin embargo, en las últimas décadas, distintas agencias, organizaciones internacionales y personalidades interesadas en la protección de la biodiversidad se han percatado y denunciado que la Amazonía está en peligro, debido, esencialmente, a la tala indiscriminada y a la destrucción, en general, del ambiente. Para complejizar aun más la situación, en Bolivia, la Amazonía está siendo objeto de una incesante colonización humana y en los últimos lustros el departamento de Pando ha experimentado flujos de migración interna que, de una u otra forma, incrementan la demanda de servicios, trabajo y alimentos; esto se constituye en un reto que obliga a pensar cómo puede mantenerse el equilibrio de los ecosistemas ante la "necesidad", entre otras, de expandir la frontera agrícola. En efecto, el departamento de Pando se caracteriza por su escasa producción agrícola y su economía, en términos generales, gira en torno a la extracción de madera, asaí y castaña.

En consecuencia, la necesidad de responder al creciente flujo migratorio se constituye en un reto para el departamento de Pando y para la Amazonia en su conjunto. Durante los dos últimos años, la Organización Internacional Para Las Migraciones (OIM) en cooperación con los Estados de Bolivia y Brasil, ha venido desarrollando un Programa con migrantes brasileros que valdría la pena analizar, en tanto podría dar luces para que, en el mediano plazo, pueda responderse de forma exitosa al reto de producir alimentos en la Amazonía y abastecer a la población sin que ello vaya en detrimento del equilibrio de los ecosistemas.

Conducting international fieldwork: Methodological and ethical issues and their significance in conceptualizing feminist research

I have conducted fieldwork in various countries for more than a decade, and continue to do so. In this paper I reflect on the methodological and ethical issues I have encountered in the process and how I have dealt with them.

I draw on my experience over more than a decade on conducting fieldwork in the Philippines, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Vancouver (British Columbia, Canada), Rome, Chicago to study the experiences of Filipino migrant domestic workers, and recently in Germany and Denmark studying the experiences of migrant/immigrant nurses and doctors there. In my fieldwork I networked with non-governmental organizations who are working with or providing support services for migrant workers to gain entry into the field.

In my reflection and making sociological sense of my experience as an international fieldworker in these sites, I also touch on its significance in feminist research.

Economic restructuring and urban fragmentation by functional specialization in Santiago de Chile

The article discusses the reconfiguration of production and work in Santiago de Chile, in terms of their dispersion in the metropolitan area and their functional specialization. This process leave many areas of the city out of play. The consequences of fragmentation, linked to economic processes, characterize the contemporary Latin American city and needed to be studied academically, to better understand the idea of metropolitan urban justice.

Specifically, we analyze the distribution and evolution of the production units in the last 15 years, with data from the guilds of production and trade.

The discussion continues the debate about fragmentation and urban segregation in the city and its consequences for social integration and the right to the city.

Personal networks in a context of risk and vulnerability. Building the right to the city in Santiago, Chile

The paper characterizes the relationship between structural processes of urban development, associated to the reconfiguration of production, employment and housing, with particular dynamics of social integration, based on the analysis of personal networks of residents in the city.

Specifically, it analyzes the processes of urban fragmentation, segregation and its impact on the possibilities of integration and social capital building.

The personal network analysis has been used in the Latin American context, in relation to forms of reproduction of poverty in the city (Espinoza, 1995; Marques, 2008), and internationally, through attempts to link the study of the city, issues of space, territory, social structure and personal relationships (Blokland and Savage, 2001; Brenner, 2008). However, there is no updated information on its importance in the spatial configuration of everyday life and its relation to the different dimensions of social stratification and urban structure.

We study a neighborhood in the metropolitan area of Santiago, that is part of the government program to recover metropolitan quarters.

The discussion continues the debate on the ideas of spatial justice, urban justice and right to the city.

Treatment as prevention: A strategy for eliminating the HIV/AIDS epidemic or a potential misallocation of scarce resources?

Well into its third decade, the HIV/AIDS pandemic remains a global public health challenge. An estimated 33 million people are infected and approximately 2.6 million deaths are caused yearly by the virus (UNAIDS, 2010). Reducing the number of new cases continues to be an enormous problem. It is believed that about 4-6 new people are infected for every individual treated (Cohen, 2009). Prevention programs have become more effective and yielded some positive outcomes, but historically, it has been difficult to precisely measure their impact. Although there have been some promising recent discoveries in the search for a vaccine (IAVI, 2011), none will be available in the short-term. Currently, the uses of antiretrovirals (ARVs) for prevention has gained wide acceptance among AIDS researchers. Enthusiasm for ARVs for prevention was ignited by the findings of three recent studies. Two of the trials reported that providing ARVs to persons who did not have the virus (pre-exposure prophylaxis [PREP]) was 62%-73% effective in blocking the transmission of HIV. A third trial showed that earlier treatment with ARVs for persons who were infected produced a 96% reduction in virus transmission. The fervor for Treatment as Prevention has grown in a time of austerity. Funding for treatment and prevention has been flat or declined. Debates among policy makers have focused on spending countries' HIV prevention budgets on Treatment as Prevention. This paper explores ethical and clinical implications of implementing national programs of Treatment as Prevention in developing and industrialized countries.

Usos de las netbooks estatales en jóvenes adolescentes de sectores populares

En este trabajo nos proponemos investigar los cambios que se han producido en los modos de socialización y estudio en jóvenes de sectores populares de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires a partir del Plan Conectar Igualdad [1] y el Plan Sarmiento [2].

Nuestra metodología consistirá en entrevistas en profundidad y observaciones a alumnos de sectores populares de colegios secundarios públicos de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires.

Este trabajo evalúa el impacto de estos programas pero no a partir del rendimiento escolar sino a partir del uso cotidiano de las computadoras en la vida de los jóvenes adolescentes. El objetivo no es evaluar el rendimiento de los alumnos y docentes o los logros educativos sino comprender cómo se inserta la computadora móvil en el entramado socio-cultural en el que están inmersos estos jóvenes. Para esto, indagaremos en las formas en que los adolescentes se apropian de los equipos y cómo utilizan los mismos en su vida diaria, en relación al estudio, al tiempo libre y las actividades recreativas, al uso compartido familiar y con el grupo de pares.

[1] El plan Conectar Igualdad consiste básicamente en entregar una netbook en comodato a cada alumno y docente de escuelas públicas secundarias del país y depende del Gobierno de la Nación.

[2] El plan Sarmiento consiste básicamente en entregar una netbook en comodato a cada alumno y docente de escuelas públicas primarias de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires y depende del Gobierno de la misma Ciudad.

Why (post)colonialism and (de)coloniality are not enough. A post-imperialist perspective

Subject position is a most important element in the politics of knowledge. Postcolonialism and the Latin American approach "decolonialidad del poder" have made great contributions to the construction of critical theories which are sensitive to many of the quandaries of the late 20th and early 21st centuries. But, although they cannot be reduced to locations and settings, like other formulations, postcolonialism and decoloniality express certain sociological and historical circumstances, grosso modo, the diasporas associated with the end of the British Empire and an Andean problematique, respectively. While I value the strength of both theoretical contributions, I want to advance the idea that, in the early 21st century, there is a need to go beyond colonialism as a heuristical device as well as to search for new utopian horizons. I am not arguing that we need to forget history and that ideological struggles are unimportant. What I want to stress is that, currently, utopian struggles have a strategic role in face of the dearth of utopias that might galvanize the progressive imagination after the end of really existing socialism. I will argue that the postcolonial period in Brazil ended in 1960 with the opening of the modernist federal city. In this regard, critiques that are solely or almost solely based on the power of structuration of the colonial period are not enough to understand the current ideologies and projects of the Brazilian elite. In order to do that, we need to think in terms of the different articulations of the indigeneity of power with the coloniality of power, the nationality of power and the globality of power, as well as in postimperialist terms.

Representations of Childhood and Children in Television Commercials in Israel

The present study focuses on representations of childhood and children in Israeli society in commercials aired on commercial television from 2006 to 2011 against the backdrop of changes taking place in children's status and family structure (e.g., James, Jenks, & Prout, 1998; Corsaro, 1997). We would note that as early as the 1980s, Postman commented on the effects of television and commercials on the 'disappearance of childhood'.

Commercials are popular texts that represent cultural and ideological perceptions in a given society. Conspicuous in existing research on commercials is the paucity of studies engaging in representations of childhood and children.

We shall present an extensive study with a corpus comprising four hundred commercials featuring children aged 4-12.

The findings indicate that changes that have taken place in Israeli society, in family structure, and in the child's place are not accorded significant expression in commercials. There is no representation of alternative families or the diverse ethnic groups comprising Israeli society. The study also found that in terms of physical and verbal interaction, adults speak more than children do, and there is minimal physical contact between parents and children (contrary to expectations). The children's touch focuses on the product, a finding that supports the primary objective of the commercial as a text designed to preserve the capitalist ideology currently being challenged in a global wave of social protest.

These findings support the perception of commercials as selling dreams, a desired and aspired-to model of childhood and family, rather than reflecting an existing reality. The child positioned at the center of the commercial symbolizes happiness identified with purchasing the advertised product, and casts an aura of achievement and the 'good life' over the adults around him.

Misinformed participation: The role of greenwash in excluding consumers from environmental decision-making

With the growing importance of environmental issues in policy debates, access to complete, reliable and appropriately-designed information about environmental impacts is essential for social participation. Even strategies seeking to avoid the need for explicit political deliberation (e.g., market-based) have high informational needs. Policy instruments such as pollution charges or carbon trading schemes, for example, require universal perfect information to operate efficiently.

This need is even more pressing given the difficulties faced by the public in interpreting complex, probabilistic and highly technical environmental information. Supporting informed participation requires processes that integrate information with the prior knowledge and skills of the various participants. However, the disclosure of environmental information is still barely regulated. Unlike other social domains, where instruments have been designed to guarantee the public's right-to-know ---e.g., patient information leaflets, or financial reports--- the selection, design and distribution of information about the environmental impact of business activities and consumer goods is largely discretionary. Green marketing claims, for example, are unregulated in most countries, as well as the content of environmental and sustainability reports.

This has led to an acute concern about greenwash, the deceptive use of environmental information to promote a company or its products. Various NGOs have sought to devise tools and metrics to help the public identify such misleading claims, but, despite the academic interest in environmental communication, no systematic effort has been made to turn discourse- and communication-analytic methods to this purpose, and a scientific approach to greenwash is still in its infancy.

This paper seeks to provide a blueprint for this project. Drawing on popular and scholarly literature about greenwash, it discusses the difficulties in operationalising the concept; reviews techniques useful for this purpose, such as the analysis of categorisation, labelling, agency mystification and framing; and outlines the interdisciplinary partnerships that would be required to attain this goal.

Criterios utilizados por los jueces al cuantificar el tiempo de condena. El delito de robo calificado por uso de armas

Este trabajo indaga sobre el proceso de "individualización judicial de la pena", regulado en los artículos 40 y 41 del Código Penal Argentino, a través del cual el juez concreta y personaliza la sanción legal fijando el quantum de la misma. Aun cuando los magistrados están limitados por la legislación que enuncia los aspectos a tener en cuenta en tal proceso (relativos a la persona condenada y al hecho delictivo), también utilizan criterios referidos al hecho o al sujeto que, si bien no están previstos en tales artículos, su consideración surge de los textos de las sentencias penales. Esto nos permite investigar sobre el grado de discrecionalidad observable en materia de aplicación judicial de la pena. Presentamos datos de una investigación realizada en el año 2009 en la que analizamos todas las sentencias judiciales condenatorias de robo calificado por uso de armas, dictadas en el fuero penal de la primera circunscripción judicial de la Provincia de Córdoba, Argentina, durante el año 2008.

Social and political lawyering: The quest for social justice and democratisation

In Argentina, under the rule of the constitutional reform of 1994, an increasing process of politisation and judicialisation of social conflicts for the defence and promotion of human rights has developed. Such a process involves different social and political actors, such as underprivileged social groups, the state, non-governmental organisations, social movements, political parties and religious groups. Among them, activist lawyers carry out a relevant role in the transformation of social demands into legal claims, as well as in the articulation of the state and disadvantaged individuals and social groups fighting for a more inclusive and full citizenship.

This paper focuses on the discourse and practices of activist lawyers particularly on the "strategic use of law" they make for the defence and promotion of social rights addressing some sort of social transformation.

The work is framed in the theoretical discussion and tension between the hegemonic formal conception of the rule of law, which permeates the legal education and profession in the country and substantial conceptions of law and justice emerging from social and political conflicts. In this context ¿how activist lawyers differ from traditional lawyers inspired in the dominant legal paradigm which split up law and justice from politics and social conflicts?, ¿do the professional discourse of politically committed lawyers constitute an alternative discourse to the dominant one?, ¿how do they define law and justice, the professional relationship with their clients and the expected outcomes of their professional work?

A qualitative methodological approach is used for gathering data from a sample of activist lawyers linked or associated to NGOs and SMs of Córdoba, through in depth interviews. Additional data has been produced transcribing public meetings related to social conflicts and mobilisations.

Racialized Swedish cities. flags, tags and veils

While scholarship in social science on violence is broad, explanations of the phenomena varies highly between different disciplines, from sociological understandings that tend to stress structures on identifying the causes of violence, to psychology models that focus on interpersonal relations, to anthropological ones that underline meaning and representation. In this article we argue for that urban violence must be understood as multiple and cannot be explained by theoretical models focusing on one determinant alone. Drawing on critical urban theory "to expose the marginalizations, exclusions, and injustices (whether of class, ethnicity, "race", gender, sexuality, nationality, or otherwise) that are inscribed and naturalized within existing urban configurations" (Brenner et al. 2012:5), the aim of the article is explore discourses of urban violence as spatial struggles.

Based on three case studies from Sweden, political violence, spatial struggles and political agency are discussed through nationalism, racist practices and resistance. The three examples illustrate racist violence through the uses of the flag, violent encounters between Muslim women wearing the veil and self identified "Swedes", and the struggles of anti racist movements and their experiences of the police. The national historical narrative of Sweden is highly based upon the ability to develop peaceful forms of coexistence and not engaging in the European colonial past. However, the research illustrates the global violent relations as well as historically drawn inherent conflicts within a nationalist discourse. These three expressions of violence are interlinked through systemic, symbolic and physical violence.

La construcción social de la exclusión: Un análisis desde la perspectiva de las trayectorias de jóvenes de sectores populares

Se pretende en esta ponencia presentar algunos de los avances de investigación de la tesis de doctorado en curso La construcción social de la exclusión. Desde la escuela a las instituciones de la minoridad. Una mirada sobre las trayectorias de los jóvenes de sectores populares[1]. El análisis se basa en la reconstrucción de las trayectorias institucionales de jóvenes de sectores populares que hayan pasado por experiencias de institucionalización por causas asistenciales. A partir del análisis de legajos, contruidos por las instituciones que se encargan de atenderlos, se procura conocer cuál es la red de instituciones que los atienden, qué discursos construyen respecto de la infancia y cuáles son las trayectorias posibles en este marco. Se parte de algunos datos centrales como: motivo de institucionalización, motivo de pasaje de una institución a otra y escolaridad (qué tipo de escuelas asisten y cuáles son los niveles de estudio alcanzado).

El análisis de trayectorias como forma de conocer la construcción social de la exclusión, permite analizar de qué modo las estructuras sociales determinan la experiencia de vida de los sujetos al tiempo que dan cuenta de sus adaptaciones y estrategias. Asimismo, se pretende indagar, a partir de este análisis en las características centrales de este tipo de instituciones, sus lógicas, libretos (Tilly, 2002) y discursos sobre la infancia.

Se retoman los desarrollos teóricos elaborados por Donzelot (1998) tanto desde la perspectiva de la normalización como de la tutela y la construcción de un discurso sobre la infancia por parte de determinadas profesiones y disciplinas.

Las definiciones sobre los sujetos y sus necesidades en el espacio de las políticas sociales destinadas a la infancia y la adolescencia

La construcción social de la infancia, es analizada en esta ponencia a partir de las definiciones que realizan los programas sociales de atención a niños/as y adolescentes. Se toman datos obtenidos en la investigación en curso: La participación de los/as adolescentes en los programas de inclusión social y las identidades de género [1]. Se pretende describir las concepciones acerca de la infancia y adolescencia, sus necesidades y los modos de resolverlos.

La estrategia metodológica utilizada consiste en la sistematización de la información relevada a través de las publicaciones oficiales que describen los programas, comprendidos en dos jurisdicciones: ciudad de Buenos Aires y Provincia de Buenos Aires. Se pretende graficar qué entienden los programas como necesidades sociales de la infancia y adolescencia que viven en condiciones de pobreza material y cuáles son las categorizaciones presentes. Se propone dar cuenta del lugar que ocupan las diferentes definiciones, tanto de los sujetos como de sus necesidades, en el espacio de las políticas sociales.

Los resultados preliminares muestran una fuerte presencia de programas destinados a niño/as y adolescentes que se encuentran en situación de vulnerabilidad social. Algunas de las explicaciones son la falta de institucionalización, ya sea escolar o pertenencia a algún programa social, los contextos en los que viven los niños y adolescentes o las condiciones de pobreza en las que se desarrollan. Las necesidades se vinculan a la permanencia en instituciones, la capacitación, el desarrollo personal y las necesidades materiales concretas.

Esta ponencia se inscribe en discusiones teóricas en relación a: necesidades (Haney, Fraser) desigualdad y exclusión social (Tilly, Castel, Rosanvallon, Waquant, Bauman) y finalmente sobre la categorización de los sujetos (Goffman, Becker).

Materiality and biography

Argentine Tango is investigated by scholars of various disciplinary backgrounds: cultural studies, sociology, gender studies, medicine, (historical) musicology etc. From a methodological point of view a broad range of empirical methods is used in this research, from quantitative experiments to qualitative interviews to participant observation and multi-methodological ethnographic approaches. But little attention is paid to the artifacts which are used in the life-world of Argentine Tango. Following the programmatic claims of the "practical turn", that has been announced in the social sciences and in cultural studies recently, practices are always linked with the materiality of the practicing bodies and of the artifacts participating in practices. Thus materiality is indispensable for the analysis of any practice. How materiality can be included into the generating of data and the analysis is little discussed in practice theories. From a methodological point of view participant observation and ethnography is proclaimed to be the king's way. The view of the observer is the external view, the gaze to observable and reconstruct-able practices. From this perspective the process of the incorporation of (corporeal) practices is not accessible. As Loic Wacquant showed in his investigation of boxing auto-ethnographical self-observation, the application of the researcher's body as a research instrument can deliver useful insights.

Based on these considerations the presentation will demonstrate the necessary application of various qualitative research instruments to investigate the role (effects, participation) of high-heels in the practice of Argentine Tango. Biographic narratives of how women became "tangueras" (tango dancers) include manifold episodes of getting used to high heels. They are an important topic in talks at the dancing events and of course, high-heels are highly visible in the tango life-world. Nearly all dancing women are wearing them. Their performative, symbolic and socio-economic effects will be in the center of the talk.

Women and labour division in China's rural society

While the concept of social economy may be new in mainland China, its practice in variety of forms has existed for long leaving its most honourable imprint in Mao's era. However, due to the abrupt neoliberal turn in 1980s of the state and the dominating political discourse of marketization ever since, the social economy practices during that period of time have been stigmatized especially in terms of inefficiency. Today social economy, in its new garment, is proposed and practiced as a response to the new round of eco-socio-economic crisis in the world again, to which China is not immune, and this move in the novel political and economic conditions of necessity requires serious assessment of its previous performance in history. This current ethnographic research examines a village which has persisted on collective farming since Mao in the form of co-operative. It aims to discuss the new configuration of gender and labour in the development of the co-operative. By means of exploring the dynamics within the economic organization through identifying various forces in the village and the ways they interplay, this study hopes to document the challenges the agricultural workers are faced with and their efforts when they attempt to react to the globalization. With an emphatic focus on gender and labour division within the village as a result of the increasingly deepened privatization and commodification, this study also hopes to find out the possible way-out for the rural working class.

Economizing insurance solidarity - The practices of insurance industry in Finland

During the past two centuries, insurance technology has increasingly contributed to the transformation of traditional forms of self-help and joint responsibility into more standardized and calculable forms of risk sharing. In doing so, insurance has acted as a major tool for economizing responsibility and solidarity. At the same time, there have been various efforts to 'socialize' the economy of insurance. This is obvious in the case of statutory social insurance, where redistribution of income and equalization of risks have been focal elements. However, to some extent, this kind of 'socialization' or 'solidarization' of insurance economy has been an essential feature in commercial private insurance as well.

This paper examines the management of private insurance economy and the ambivalence between 'social' and 'commercial' dimensions of insurance. The paper analyzes the issue by exploring five different techno-institutional practices of insurance. These are, first, pricing of the coverage (equal distribution of risks vs. risk classification), secondly, investment practices (social investment policy vs. market-based investment policy), thirdly, the form of the product (risk insurance vs. savings insurance), fourthly, the purpose of the organization (insurance company vs. bank), and finally the company form (mutual company vs. stock corporation). The main question of the paper is: in what ways is insurance solidarity enacted and economized within insurance industry? The paper studies the question by exploring the changing insurantal imaginaries and practices in Finland from 1940s until 2000s. The study is based on the analysis of published talks, interviews and writings of the 'insiders' in the field, i.e. executives and officials of private insurance companies, their interest groups and supervisory authorities. The paper aims to provide an in-depth analysis of the entanglement of economic, political and scientific rationalities in the management of insurance economy.

Action systems and organizational operation from local reality

In the scenario we are living in Chile and Latin America in general, where people and organizations are increasingly demanding, greater participation, and therefore better access to certain levels of relationship between the different classes (organizations) and the general public, local government figure, Town or City Hall, becomes the center of action and agent channel for these actions from the base, and even the size of the country demand.

The current situation gives account of a reality that can not incorporate all the organizations in this process, management is understood as an external factor and not as a sustained, organized and designed according to the requirements thereof, the idea with which we are (process operation) does not represent the dynamics and needs of actors and their relations systems. Therefore, the demonstration of transparency and operational processes, often confused or simply, are often avoided to maintain the traditional processes of action and reaction to complete and open the reality of the times.

As we argue, there is no single model that meets all needs, nor is there a way of doing things in a universal and representative as social systems and the reality in which they are immersed is usually complex and well-defined from each other. Thus, we might note that, if you can not change the reality of action and relationship between citizens and the organization as part of this process of integration, it is necessary to consider and this relationship is made from different realities; thinking that the effort and investment that are established as such, are not repeated and repeated unfinished programs and projects so far have seen and known so monotonous in different realities of Latin America, but on the contrary, give systemic contingency account of each of them.

The impact of participatory and public communication on citizen's agency and democracy. A case study of the Colombian social movement in defence of water

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, Latin America witnessed a crisis of neoliberalism. The water management privatization policies promoted by the World Bank during the 1990s led to serious social and economic conflicts in the region. Starting in 2000 with the 'water war' in Cochabamba, a 'new cycle' of collective action, emerged in the continent against the dominant neoliberal political regimes. In Colombia, the consequences of water privatization gave way to a civil society campaign advocating for the defence of water as a human right and public good.

Public and participatory communication strategies were implemented by the Colombian water movement to gain citizens' support, and raise their awareness about the water crisis locally and globally. This paper focuses on the impact of these strategies on citizens' democratic participation by analysing the extent to which participatory and public approaches in communication have influenced the exercise of democracy and the way of doing politics in Colombia. In spite of the 'traditional' political competition in the country and the historical apathy toward political participation, the strength of the unifying message of water as a matter of public concern connected different social groups in the country. The communication strategy pushed many people to engage directly in political and mobilisation actions; the global objective of the defence of water was locally adapted by citizens according to the relevance of the topic to their regional problems. The struggle for water in Colombia also raised wider questions about the ownership of other natural resources, common goods, and human rights that are now central political issues in Colombia. Colombia is a particular case study because it is one of the few Latin American countries where the neoliberal hegemony was not severely affected by the 'crisis of neoliberalism' that changed the politics of the continent.

Leisure happiness and development: A contemporary Australian perspective

The term quality of life has been used to evaluate the general wellbeing of individuals and societies. It is used in contexts such as development, freedom, life satisfaction and happiness. Evidence shows that as incomes of individuals and societies have risen, so have standards of living. However, indices of happiness and life satisfaction in societies have remained constant. For the poor, rising incomes have led to greater happiness. For the rich, getting richer, happiness has not increased. In general this paper examines data from representative national surveys and then focuses on Australian society. It shows that happiness indices have risen in a majority of nations and Australia is no exception. The extent to which leisure and happiness is affected in a turbulent world is examined. Data suggest that increased free choice in countries has a major impact on happiness. Over recent years however, economic downturns have impacted on Gross National Productivity (GNP). Whether these economic downward slides have affected Australian leisure participation is examined and analysed.

Climate justice and the temporalities of social-ecological change

The proposition that intra- and inter-generational equity are fundamental to ecological and economic wellbeing was central to the concept of sustainability as popularised by the 1987 Brundtland Report. In contrast with the watering down of this proposition by notions such as 'the triple bottom line', discourses of climate justice have been mobilized to refocus attention on more fundamental equity issues implicated both in climate change and in attempts to mitigate it. This paper argues that this refocussing has, however, for the most part been spatial; that is, it has focussed on intra-generational equity issues associated with the distribution of climate and policy-related impacts among populations and territories. It goes on to argue that avoiding and/or adapting to dangerous socio-environmental transformation requires us to engage more reflexively with the conceptual frameworks, technologies and projects through which we attempt to comprehend and influence the temporal dynamics of climate and other earth-system processes. Climate modelling and scenario building, for example, has proven a powerful means through which to comprehend the temporality of climate change; to bring the future into the present in order to calculate responsibilities and plan responses. The focus of IPCC assessments on scenario building has generated a sense of urgency around mitigating greenhouse gas emissions that has tended, however, to crowd out serious attention to adaptation, other disruptions to earth-system processes such as biodiversity loss, and the possibility that climate will change in ways that undermine predominantly market-based policy responses. Scenario-dependence contributes to a disjuncture between discourses of future climate change and peoples' experience of adapting to an already variable climate. The challenge is to bring these temporalities together in meaningful ways and thus to avoid false choices between adaptation and mitigation.

Practices of time and space in hairdressers in Frankfurt, Birmingham, Dortmund and Glasgow

This paper presents results of the research project Local Conventions of Hairdressers: The Intrinsic Logic of Cities in Economic Practices funded by the German Research Foundation.

Our project combines a Mixed Methodology with a theoretical frame from Urban Sociology and Economic Sociology to explore differences in the practices of hairdressers in Frankfurt, Birmingham, Dortmund and Glasgow. In each city we conducted ethnographic research and did interviews in two types of hairdressers: One salon serves mainly customers from the upper middle class, whereas the second salon mainly has customers with a working class background from the local neighbourhood.

Hairdressers have a low economic and symbolic position in the social structure. The majority of the employees are women. Maybe the low symbolic position and the gender aspect are the reasons why there has been few research on hairdressers in Sociology yet.

Our paper focuses on the question how spatial practices and the use of time are connected to maintain the organization of hairdresser. Through the combined research of space and time we aim to discover important aspects which an one-dimensional analysis could not find.

The theoretical background of the paper is a Sociology of Space (Löv 2008) and Time which considers both dimensions as relational practices and structures and not as absolute entities. By adapting concepts of Bourdieu and Giddens the project considers time and space as results of certain social conditions and actions.

So differences in the spatial and time related practices can give new insights in the impacts of a specific city on the hairdressers as an example for other economic branches. Second the ethnographic research contributes to the understanding of socioeconomic practices of hairdressers in different types of salons. Third the analysis can even show the relation of time and space with the symbolic positions of the hairdressers.

School segregation and school inequality in the U.S.

Persistent school segregation does not mean just that children of different racial and ethnic backgrounds attend different schools, but that their schools are also unequal in their students' performance. This study of public schools in the United States documents nationally the extent of disparities in student performance between schools attended by whites and Asians compared to blacks, Hispanics, and Native Americans. It also shows how these disparities are rooted in the segregation pattern, in which students of different racial/ethnic backgrounds go to schools with very racial and social class different profiles.

Cooperativismo, asistencia y democracia

Las políticas de asistencia aplicadas en Latinoamérica durante la década de los noventa en el apogeo de las políticas neoliberales se caracterizaron por la delegación en organizaciones de la sociedad civil de responsabilidades inherentes a la atención de la población pobre y desocupada. La creciente participación de organizaciones no gubernamentales en la intermediación de los recursos públicos se enmarcó en intervenciones públicas concebidas como promotoras del capital social, al que se consideraba necesario fortalecer para enfrentar los riesgos y alcanzar el desarrollo humano de las comunidades.

La crisis argentina de principios de siglo motivó un giro en las políticas de asistencia social, las que se volvieron masivas y redefinieron el rol de las organizaciones comunitarias, que cobijaron entonces a los movimientos sociales emergentes. Paralelamente, las políticas públicas buscaron favorecer los crecientes emprendimientos de carácter asociativo que se venían gestando. De este modo, se multiplicaron los impulsos al cooperativismo, lo que a la postre incrementó la participación estatal en materia social. No obstante, las transformaciones aludidas incorporaron nuevas tensiones a la gestión de políticas públicas derivadas de las implicancias de la acción de promover el asociativismo desde el estado. A ello se sumaron otras, derivadas de la coexistencia de los enfoques cooperativistas y del capital social. Recientemente, la puesta en marcha de programas de reinserción tutelada en mercado de trabajo bajo formato cooperativo acentuó tales tensiones, interpelando directamente el carácter democrático tradicionalmente asociado a las prácticas cooperativas.

El objetivo del presente trabajo consiste en analizar las nuevas formas experimentadas por las políticas destinadas a la población pobre, ancladas en el fomento del asociativismo y el cooperativismo, a partir del examen de un conjunto de programas, teniendo en cuenta sus aspectos presupuestarios, normativos y prestacionales, con el objeto de establecer el alcance de las transformaciones en curso.

Critical sociology of the police: Towards an abolitionist perspective

Images of police violence during the worldwide "occupy"-protests, but also during the London riots in 2011 have raised questions about the role of the police as a social institution in democratic societies. With increasing intensity of social conflicts comes very often an increase of symbolic confrontations with the police, for example when peaceful protestors directly face police water canons or tear gas. However, besides such rare cases of genuine confrontations, police violence for most people does not play an essential role in everyday life; it can even be said that the general need for this institution is commonly seen as more or less self-evident.

During the 60ies and 70ies in many countries critical approaches to criminal justice, the prison complex and police emerged. In Germany, the so-called "critical criminology" started exploring possible alternatives to criminal justice. Around the same time in the US, intellectuals and activists mostly from the black civil rights movement demanded a fundamental restructuring of the social penal institutions toward a more just legal system. Cultural studies intellectuals in England and the post-structuralist accounts influenced by Foucault in France have addressed similar issues. But while for example prisons have been subject to a radical criticism, with activists arguing to overcome the prison as a penal institution altogether, there is still no visible account in favor of a general abolition of the police.

In my paper I will argue for such an abolitionist account. In the first part I shall demonstrate some of the problems with state coercion and why it is not without alternatives. In the second part I will focus on these possible alternative ways of conflict resolution and try to back up my argument with findings from contemporary empirical research on counseling and mediation.

Governing second housing: Three case studies in Brazil, Spain and Switzerland

More than a growing tourism modality, second housing has become a common way of accumulating capital. In a context of financial uncertainty, bricks represent a supposedly safe value. "Safe as a house" is the kind of belief that allowed the occurrence of real estate bubbles all around the world until the Crash of 2007-2008. We are all aware of the subprime crisis which grew upon the American popular housing sector, but we know very little about the holiday home investments made during the same period. Yet, it is not exclude that they participated of the same speculative mechanisms. The type of investors involved, their connection with financial spheres, and the current underutilization these estates indicate that this business was more based upon exchange valued rather than use values.

In this paper, we study the effects of such a second housing spread in three touristic cities: Tibau do Sul (Brazil), Torre Vieja (Spain) and Crans-Montana-Aminona (Switzerland). Although they belong to radically different regions (Torre Vieja and Tibau are seaside resorts, Crans is a ski resort), all three destinations have experimented a spectacular urban growth due to second housing during the last decade. Presented to local deciders as an opportunity to rapidly increase tax incomes (through construction permits mostly) and employment, the social, economic and environmental costs of tourism urbanization on the long run are rarely addressed. By comparing three case studies (through qualitative and quantitative data), we aim to understand the underlying logics of such "urban regimes" (Stone, 1989) and discuss some solutions to govern second housing in a more sustainable and equitable way.

Precariedad y resistencias en grandes empresas multinacionales: Un estudio de caso en supermercados e hipermercados de Argentina

A partir del año 2003, en Argentina, se produjo un proceso de recuperación económica que dio lugar a importantes cambios en las características del mercado de trabajo. En primer lugar, el exponencial crecimiento económico revirtió la tendencia a la desocupación estructural de una fracción importante de los trabajadores; y de la mano de esta recomposición del movimiento obrero ocupado, las organizaciones sindicales recuperaron su poder. Pero por características intrínsecas del modelo actual, se tiende a conformar y consolidar una estructura del mercado laboral altamente heterogénea y fragmentada.

En este contexto en el artículo se analiza la relación entre la precariedad laboral y las formas que asume la conflictividad en empresas supermercadistas, sector profundamente afectado por las políticas de flexibilización y precarización laboral. El análisis se realizó a partir de un estudio de caso de carácter cualitativo en tres sucursales de grandes empresas multinacionales del sector.

El artículo comprende dos partes. En la primera nos preguntamos por las formas en que se materializa la precariedad en estos espacios de trabajo. Planteamos que los trabajadores se encuentran en una situación de triple precariedad (en relación al trabajo, al empleo y a las relaciones laborales), pero señalamos también que existen distintos grados de precariedad en los tres ámbitos laborales, diferencias que tienen que ver tanto con el tipo de organización sindical que existe en cada sucursal como con las formas de gestión empresarial.

En la segunda parte del artículo, nos preguntamos por la relación entre la precariedad y las formas que asumen las resistencias en los espacios de trabajo. Luego del análisis de los conflictos y de las formas de organización, señalamos que las resistencias son heterogéneas en los tres casos de estudio y que las formas que adquieren dependen en gran medida de las formas de organización colectiva locales.

Singularización, heterogeneización y desigualdad: El peso de las disposiciones laborales en la diferenciación de las trayectorias de jóvenes

A partir de los años ochenta numerosos estudios pusieron en evidencia la diferenciación de las trayectorias laborales de los jóvenes. La misma puede comprenderse a la luz de la heterogeneidad del mercado de trabajo y/o a partir de factores asociados al origen social y educativo de los jóvenes. Sin embargo, la diferenciación está lejos de reducirse a un mero efecto del contexto o a variables arqueológicas. Las trayectorias laborales se singularizan también en función de factores simbólicos, prácticos por sus efectos sobre los recorridos juveniles.

Esta comunicación presenta los resultados de una investigación cualitativa y longitudinal de seguimiento de un panel de jóvenes varones y mujeres argentinos/as a lo largo de seis años a partir del final de sus formaciones (media o profesional), y muestra que las "disposiciones laborales" orientan las trayectorias de los jóvenes.

En primer lugar, las "disposiciones laborales" sintetizan sentidos específicos de los jóvenes respecto a la actividad, al trabajo, al empleo y al mundo laboral. A través de la descomposición y recomposición de estas dimensiones es posible analizar qué aspecto opera en la evolución de cada trayectoria. Además, esas disposiciones permiten confrontar las representaciones sociales y juveniles, y discuten algunas tesis como la pérdida de centralidad de la actividad laboral en los jóvenes, la disminución de las funciones expresivas e identitarias del trabajo en un contexto de precarización, la supuesta sobrevaloración del empleo asalariado clásico como referente de acción y una visión aparentemente homogénea del mundo del trabajo de parte de los jóvenes. Por último, dichas disposiciones constituyen un factor explicativo clave de las trayectorias laborales de los jóvenes, permitiendo la comprensión de qué parte de la dinámica de la inserción y los cambios de orientación son voluntarios en un contexto de degradación del mundo laboral.

Sociability patterns in closed residential condominiums: The emergence of a lenient culture toward crime in Brazil

Abstract: Closed residential spaces, gated communities or residential condominiums are nowadays an expanding type of housing throughout the world. In Brazil, especially in large cities, the search for quality of life is usually associated with the search for safety through the control of people in places. However, the life in residential condominiums has been correlated with the appearance of new forms of antisocial behaviors and attitudes for transgression. This study presents the experience of living in residential condominiums and the emergence of unsociable behaviors by part of the dwellers. The central argument is that infractions practiced on a daily basis inside condominiums acquire relevance since they consolidate a culture of both transgression and lenience regarding social rules. This study interviewed dwellers of different types of condominiums throughout Brazil with the utilization of on-line questionnaires. The data was analyzed with the use of multidimensional analysis. The results revealed a belief that the social rules applied to the city are not necessarily valid to private spaces such as the closed condominiums. Accordingly, a great number of condo dwellers believe that they have the rights to make noisy at any time of the day, let children drive cars on the internal streets of the condo, allow pets to run free, and most important, do not pay condo taxes. These practices, contrary to the social norms are seen as mild transgressions. The minimization of transgressions as banal or inconsequential actions feeds a culture of transgression in which deviant behaviors are seen as accepted actions with no consequences. Therefore, this research discusses the effect of residential condominiums sheltering inhabitants which choose social and spatial segregation and the relevance of the experienced conflicts in a consolidation of urban culture of transgression.

Key words: Residential Condominiums, Sociability, Anti-social behavior, Habitation in Brazil.

The autonomization of American art

Pierre Bourdieu has been one of the most influential theorists on art and society in contemporary sociology. One of his most important studies was on the autonomization of art fields – the development of subfields of art production based on criteria of judgment independent from the demands of art institutions and commercial art markets. His classic study of the historical genesis of artistic autonomy in the literary and visual arts in nineteenth century France was the foundation for his more general argument on autonomization. He presented a model of autonomy and consecration in modern art fields that explained both the historical genesis of autonomous art and the subsequent dynamics of orthodoxy and heresy that drove innovation in art. Bourdieu acknowledged that the potential and timing of autonomization in a national art field was dependent on the socio-historical context of specific countries. Bourdieu, however, never presented a comparative national case study of autonomization in art. While his general model of art fields has been applied to other national contexts, there remains a significant need for scholarship that applies his analysis of the genesis of autonomization to other national art fields. The present paper argues that a far-reaching transformation occurred in mid-twentieth century American art comparable to the autonomization of French art in the late nineteenth century. It demonstrates through the case studies of music and film that Bourdieu's analysis of autonomization in French art applies equally well to twentieth century American art. The paper shows, however, a significant difference in the autonomization of the national art fields in France and the United States. This difference forces us to reconsider the role of culture industries and popular art in struggles over autonomy, innovation, and legitimacy in modern art.

El rol del profesional de educación física y las políticas públicas del deporte y ocio en el contexto Brasileño

Este trabajo tiene como objetivo analizar el rol del profesional de Educación Física y las políticas públicas del deporte y ocio en el contexto brasileño. En 1988, el deporte y el ocio fueran reconocidos como derechos sociales por la Constitución Federal de Brasil, sin embargo, la inversión del gobierno en ese país en el deporte recreativo ha sido insignificante en los últimos años. En los años 2003 y 2007, por ejemplo, Brasil ha invertido un 79,8% en el deporte de alto rendimiento y el deporte participativo sólo un 9,2%. Teniendo en cuenta estos datos, hacemos la siguiente pregunta: ¿cuál es el rol del profesional de educación física como activo en el ámbito de las políticas públicas para el deporte y el ocio en Brasil? Como procedimientos metodológicos se realizó revisión de la literatura, con base en autores de la educación física, ocio y políticas públicas. A partir de las reflexiones desarrolladas, se llegó a los siguientes resultados: 1) es fundamental el profesional de educación física participar activamente en las políticas públicas a nivel municipal, estatal y federal, a fin de proponer una acción del Estado dirigida al deporte recreativo y 2) tener una visión de deporte que puede ser asequible a todas las personas, para eso los estudios de ocio son de gran aporte. El profesional de Educación Física puede trabajar junto con la gente a partir del deporte, teniendo en cuenta los tres tipos de géneros del ocio: la asistencia, la práctica y el conocimiento. Además, podrá contribuir para que las personas alcancen los niveles crítico y creativo, superando un primer nivel de comprensión - el conformista. Finalmente, se podrá viabilizar a los sujetos la comprensión del deporte como un contenido del ocio (físico-deportivo), pero sin dejar de lado otros contenidos (artísticos, manuales, sociales, intelectuales, turístico).

Churches and violence in Brazilian cities: The case of Felipe Camarão Neighborhood, natal-RN

Since 1970's a tendency in Brazilian sub-urban and slum areas has been perceived in relation with evangelical churches: as much as violence and urban degradation grow, more the number of churches multiplies. That's the typical case of Felipe Camarão neighborhood, in the capital city of Rio Grande do Norte, one of the nine states of Northeast Brazil. In this neighborhood, considered for years the most violent of Natal, the number of evangelical churches jumped from 40 to 80 in ten years (2001-2011). Why does it happen? We raised this question to the evangelical leaders of the neighborhood, and it started a process of self-criticism. They decided to organize themselves to perform actions in order to change this reality. Not without a strong tension between members of churches, ecclesiastical institutions, and in the church-society relation. All those tensions express tendencies and difficulties of theological nature, as well as ideological and strategic. At long range, the result of the conflict between those who defend integration of church in society and those who don't will determinate if evangelical religiosity will take a relevant role in the transformation of violent communities, or if they will be just a refuge for scared and passive individuals. That's what we have been researching during these last five years.

Dualistic vs. monistic perspective of Christian faith in a Brazilian violent neighborhood

New evangelical churches in Brazil have a tendency of faster multiplication in urban areas featured with high levels of violence. In spite of this remarkable presence, the violent community profile of Felipe Camarão, a neighborhood in the city of Natal-RN, Brazil, remains unchangeable. Most part of churches in this area reflects a gnostic-dualistic vision of reality. This tension between an intra vs. extra world posture expresses a Christian theological debate through the centuries. While some Christians tried to bring the church back to a more integrated perspective of faith and society, others defended a solipsistic way of living their faith. It's possible that this tension can be expressed through Julian Jaynes theory of the Bicameral Mind and its breakdown. So, in conflictive backgrounds like this urban area studied for five years, this tension is present with acute consequences, because most part of the churches opts for withdrawal and an extra-worldly attitude. In what way this theological fight of 2000 years is still present in a neighborhood like that, where churches multiplies themselves, and where social reality demands each time more urgent transformation?

The problem of equality in everyday life

The aim of our paper is to examine the notion of equality in Alfred Schutz's phenomenological perspective paying special attention to the emergence of the problem of equality in everyday life. We will develop Schutz's position concerning equality and inequality in everyday life. We will maintain that the problem of equality in everyday life emerges through the experience of inequality. As a way to find out the emergence of that problem, we will try to find the origin and the way in which inequality is experienced in everyday life. In doing so, it will be argued that problems related to the subjective and objective implications of equality arise with the concepts of imposed group membership and imposed systems of relevances specifically when the Other's subjectivity is not recognized as such.

Deliberative democracy and sustainability: Barriers and opportunity to their interaction

Deliberative Democracy and Sustainability: barriers and opportunity to their interaction.

The interaction between environmental problems and democracy has been a relevant research issue in the last decades, particularly regarding international, national or local environmental conflicts (Lafferty et al., 1996:1), and specifically how contemporary democracies and its institutions are facing the severe environmental crisis. Within that context, special attention is been paid to the role of both public participation and deliberation processes (Maldonado, 2004) and also to how the environmental crisis is making an impact on the processes, structures, and sense of democracy.

In the transition to sustainable societies (O'Riordan, 1996), the concept of 'ecological democratization' synthesizes at least two goals: to achieve democratic values without sacrificing ecological ones, and on the other hand to develop economic values without sacrificing democratic ones (Dryzek, 1996).

Hence, democracy and sustainability share both political aims in addition to socially desirable goals (Dobson, 2002). This opens a reflexive space about the necessity of social change and, specifically, the need of deeper democratization processes in a deliberative way. This paper will identify and discuss some of the key barriers and opportunities in the interaction of democracy and the sustainability challenge (Lafferty et al., 1996:4).

Inmigrantes, trabajadores, comerciantes y un conde: Análisis de los relatos sobre los orígenes de un barrio de clase media de la ciudad de Buenos Aires a partir de un abordaje pragmatista-pragmático del espacio público

Se presentan las características principales otorgadas a un barrio en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, a través del análisis de los relatos contemporáneos sobre su origen elaborados por historiadores amateurs y miembros de asociaciones vecinales. Específicamente, se exploran los argumentos que vinculan el nacimiento de Villa Devoto con las Sociedades de fomento y su relación con el Estado. Transitando este camino intentaremos entender algunos de los elementos que en la actualidad permiten identificar este territorio como un "barrio de clase media".

Se exploran las actividades y relatos en torno al reclamo vecinal de dos Sociedades de fomento, aun existentes, que corresponden a distintas zonas dentro del mismo barrio, dos asociaciones que se constituyen como representantes y símbolos de ese espacio.

La proclamación del ascenso social a través del trabajo individual y familiar, los recuerdos de la autogestión vecinal de servicios públicos y de los reclamos recurrentes al Municipio, la identificación con la inmigración europea entre fines del siglo XIX y mediados del XX, y la fuerte presencia de la iglesia católica y la escuela en la memoria del barrio son algunos de los caracteres identitarios que aquí se indagan.

Estudiando estos elementos y las similitudes y diferencias entre las asociaciones, nos aproximamos a la sociabilidad política territorial para identificar algunas propiedades de las culturas políticas en Buenos Aires. Se desarrolla un abordaje que combina nociones de un análisis pragmático (más bien praxeológico) del espacio público y de la sociología pragmática francesa para explorar las formas sociales de intervención pública de personas y grupos para resolver problemas cotidianos, sin relegar las categorías histórico-sociales que permiten la identificación común de los actores sociales.

Democracia en Paraguay (1989-2008): Un análisis sociológico y político sobre el triunfo electoral de fernando lugo méndez dentro de la transición a la democracia

En 1989, tras 35 años de dictadura, el general Stroessner —perteneciente al Partido Colorado (Asociación Nacional Republicana-ANR)— es derrocado por un Golpe, comandado por su correligionario, también general de las Fuerzas Armadas y consuegro del dictador, Rodríguez Pedotti. Con este Golpe se clausura una de las dictaduras más largas de América Latina y comienza a esbozarse una endeble transición a la democracia. La transición en Paraguay fue un proceso complejo y contradictorio, puesto que estuvo dirigida por el mismo partido que sostuvo legislativamente a la dictadura anterior y se vio reiteradas veces jaqueado por intenciones de Golpes, represiones fuertes a las movilizaciones sociales, proliferación de mecanismos autoritarios heredados de la dictadura, entre otros.

La dinámica partidaria paraguaya estuvo determinada hasta el año 2008 por la existencia de dos partidos tradicionales que convivieron en la arena política alternándose —mediante golpes de Estado o estrategias no democráticas— los períodos en el poder. El Partido Colorado y el Partido Liberal (actualmente Partido Liberal Radical Auténtico, PRLA) nunca se habían sucedido en el gobierno bajo un mecanismo limpio de elecciones transparentes. Con el triunfo de la Alianza Patriótica para el Cambio (liderada por Fernando Lugo Méndez, acompañado por el PRLA, el PDP y por partidos y movimientos de izquierda) se quiebra dicho proceso y se avanza en el camino del fortalecimiento democrático.

El período de análisis comienza en 1989, con la caída del stronato y finaliza en 2008, con el triunfo presidencial del outsider a los partidos, ex obispo de la Iglesia Católica, Fernando Lugo.

A lo largo de este artículo se analizarán las condiciones o modificaciones socio-históricas, legislativas, electorales, políticas y económicas que confluyeron para posibilitar que el Lugo Méndez haya ganado las elecciones presidenciales.

La internacionalización de los grupos de investigación en las universidades: Una propuesta de análisis con especial énfasis en el caso argentino. Por una parte, se considera que si bien la dimensión internacional es intrínseca a la actividad científica y tecnológica, en tiempos recientes su peso es cada vez mayor (Manual de Santiago, 2007). Por otra parte, se advierte que los conceptos más utilizados para dar cuenta de las dimensiones internacionales en el campo científico-tecnológico son los de "colaboración" o "cooperación" científica internacional. Los mismos implican un conjunto de actividades realizadas mediante la asociación de dos o más actores de diferentes países, ya sea para co-publicar, participar en proyectos conjuntos, compartir equipamiento, intercambiar recursos, entre otros.

En este marco, el trabajo se propone profundizar el concepto de "internacionalización" en tanto es más amplio que los mencionados, incluyendo actividades internacionales desarrolladas desde planteamientos unidireccionales que no requieren la colaboración explícita (Sebastián, 2004). Asimismo, propone una serie de factores explicativos de la internacionalización de los grupos de investigación a partir de la consideración de las "capacidades de internacionalización" y las "condiciones institucionales de internacionalización". Así, se considera que las "capacidades de internacionalización" se relacionan con la trayectoria, las temáticas de investigación, los recursos humanos, estructurales y relacionales con que cuenta un grupo de investigación para participar en el ámbito internacional así como con la actitud hacia la internacionalización de sus actividades. Por su parte, las "condiciones institucionales" se refieren al conjunto de pautas implícitas y explícitas en las cuales se enmarcan los grupos de investigación y que alientan la internacionalización de los mismos.

Consistent modernization yet persistent inequality: Elite's reactions to poverty in Brazil, Uruguay and India

In this paper we aim to capture the political implications of inequality in three cases of late modernization: Brazil, Uruguay and India. We focus on elites' public statements on poverty by sampling opinion articles on the subject in the main newspapers in those countries in the past decade. Our findings are then compared to previous survey data among strategic elites. Although these cases present classical characteristics of late modernization, such as urbanization, industrialization and democratization, social inequality persists as a major source of political and social problems. Survey data shows that Latin American elites see inequality as an obstacle to democracy, but not always to development. We test if that is the case for Brazil and Uruguay and compare them to the Indian case, where democratic stability has a longer tradition, despite social inequality. Did the risks of inequality contributed in the direction of making elites more open to redistributive policies? Following the theoretical approach suggested by de Swaan (1988) and Reis (2000), we seek to understand the moral basis of elites' reaction over inequality in these developing societies. We argue that political engagement depends also on the cultural tools mobilized to relate with the poor and that the ideological frame can either reinforce the boundaries between elite and non-elite actors or help internalize perceptions of social interdependence that can lead to more equality and, therefore, to social development.

Ideologies of equality? Public representations of poverty in unequal democracies

In this paper we aim to capture the implications of elites' perception of social inequality in three southern democracies: Brazil, Uruguay and India. We focus on elites' public statements on poverty by sampling opinion articles on the subject in the main newspapers in those countries. Recent studies show that Latin American elites see inequality as a threat to democracy and as a practical and moral harm. We confront speech analysis with previous elite survey data to test if that is the case for Brazil and Uruguay. We then compare them to the Indian case, where democratic stability has a longer tradition, despite social inequality. Did the risks of inequality contribute in the direction of making elites more open to redistributive policies? We assume that elites are pressured by perceived negative externalities of poverty, following the theoretical approach suggested by de Swaan (1988) and Reis (2000). Meanwhile we argue that political engagement depends also on the cultural tools mobilized to relate with the poor. That ideological frame can either reinforce the boundaries between elite and non-elite actors or help internalize perceptions of social interdependence that can lead to more equality. Therefore, we discuss the implications of cultural as well as structural constraints of elite action when dealing with the political challenges of inequality.

La estigmatización de los vecinos de villa corina: Zcambios o continuidades en la representación social de los habitantes de barrios pobres?

El presente trabajo forma parte de mi tesis de grado -la cual estimo finalizar a mediados del año 2012- de la Licenciatura en Ciencias Sociales por la Universidad Nacional de Quilmes, y para la cual estoy realizando un estudio etnográfico (mediante entrevistas, observación participante, observación no participante, atención flotante y asociación libre) con el objetivo de poder identificar y describir cómo funcionan los mecanismos de estigmatización que se ejercen hacia y entre los vecinos de un barrio pobre de la Provincia de Buenos Aires.

Para realizar este estudio he decidido tomar como punto de partida la tesis de maestría que realizó María Eugenia Crovara (UBA/FLACSO) en el año 2001, la cual se denomina El estigma en las identidades sociales: el caso de Villa Corina, y a partir del cual se puede argumentar que los vecinos de ese barrio pobre son fuertemente estigmatizados.

Por ende, al trabajar en el mismo lugar que trabajó Crovara, con el mismo marco teórico que ella utilizó (Goffman, Bourdieu) y teniendo en cuenta que han transcurrido 11 años desde que esta investigadora realizó su estudio, y que en ese lapso de tiempo, la Argentina ha cambiado considerablemente debido a los diversos programas de inclusión social que se impulsaron desde los gobiernos "kirchneristas" desde el año 2003, el desafío que me planteo tiene que ver con identificar si los mecanismos de estigmatización que existían en aquel entonces, se mantienen -o no- en la actualidad. Así como también pretendo descubrir si existen nuevos procesos de estigmatización.

Los avances de mi trabajo, así como también algunas conclusiones parciales serán expuestos en este foro.

Regulaciones a una devoción estigmatizada: Culto a San la Muerte en Buenos Aires

En este trabajo pretendemos abordar el culto a San la Muerte, surgido en las provincias del litoral argentino con influencia guaraníca, y de gran expansión en la actualidad a pesar de ser un santo no reconocido por la Iglesia Católica. Esta devoción en su formato tradicional se caracterizó por el ocultamiento, fuese debido al control social o al cumplimiento de los rituales que así lo reclamaban. Actualmente se expande por todo el territorio nacional y acrecienta su visibilidad en un contexto de mayor desregulación del mercado religioso. Ejemplo de esto lo encontramos en distintos altares erigidos en espacios públicos, así como santuarios, páginas WEB o en medios de comunicación. Esta devoción continúa siendo estigmatizada socialmente y supone costos sociales para aquellos que le rinden culto. Por lo tanto, nos interesaría abordar las estrategias de legitimación que despliegan los encargados de santuarios a San La Muerte en Buenos Aires y las múltiples regulaciones sociales y estatales hacia este culto. Haremos hincapié en la presentación que realizan los medios de comunicación (en el período 2010-2011) sobre esta devoción, la cual consideramos refuerza una imagen negativa y vinculada con el crimen en el imaginario colectivo, limitando la libertad de expresión de los devotos, así como la difusión de la devoción.

La representación de la protesta en la prensa escrita como construcción discursiva de exclusión política

El objetivo de esta ponencia es analizar representaciones de la protesta social—específicamente la realización de marchas en la ciudad de México—en el discurso de la prensa escrita, a través del uso de ciertas herramientas del análisis de discurso, específicamente la representación de actores, de acciones y la utilización de elementos evaluativos en los reportes noticiosos. El objetivo es indicar de qué manera estas representaciones sobre la protesta social tienden a crear diversas formas de exclusión política. Desde formas extremas de "criminalización de la protesta", hasta formas sutiles que evalúan el carácter trivial e innecesario de las formas callejeras de protesta.

Desde un punto de vista teórico-analítico, el objetivo de la ponencia es ilustrar la forma en que los medios de comunicación contribuyen a la formación de discursos de exclusión política, dentro de un contexto discursivo aparentemente plural y proclive a aceptar las formas de participación política de la ciudadanía. El punto a abordar es cómo los medios de comunicación contribuyen a construir modelos aceptables de participación ciudadana, produciendo sutil o abiertamente, formas de exclusión de actores que no parecen adherir a esos modelos aceptables de participación.

La ponencia basa su argumento en los materiales recopilados dentro de un proyecto de investigación sobre participación ciudadana y manifestaciones públicas en la Ciudad de México, el cual contempló la observación de diferentes marchas, realizadas por diferentes tipos de actores colectivos, entre 2008 y 2010. Esto nos permite introducir un enfoque comparativo, en la medida en que nuestras observaciones pueden hacer referencia a diferentes tipos de actores colectivos manifestantes y diferentes tipos de demandas levantadas.

Labour market needs or international political agenda? Designing temporary migrant worker programmes in spanish migration policy (2000-2010)

For the past ten years the management and promotion of temporary and circular migration flows has been a pivotal element of migration management policy in Spain, particularly of low-skilled workers in sectors such as seasonal agriculture and hospitality. This type of international mobility is commonly considered to allow migrants to adapt to the labour market needs of receiving countries without incurring in the social costs of permanent settlement. Additionally, temporary migration is regarded as a beneficial form of international mobility for both migrants and countries of origin. Paradoxically, recruitment of temporary migrant workers in origin during this period only represents a small proportion (approximately 5%) of the total migratory flows to Spain. In this context, questions about the real purposes of temporary recruitment in origin arise.

The aim of this paper is to analyse Spanish policies developed in relation to temporary migrant workers. We examine two key issues: (a) how Spanish policies regarding temporary workers have been designed and (b) what their true objectives were. We take into account three dimensions of policy making: (a) national labour market demands (b) international relations framework (c) and the legitimisation and meaning of these policies in the domestic political arena. This paper assesses Spanish legislation on migration, particularly the measures designed to manage the recruitment of foreign workers in the framework of the bilateral agreements signed by successive governments during the first decade of the XXI century.

Our analysis suggests that labour market needs were a secondary goal in the design and implementation of these policies. Instead, we highlight the idea that the temporary worker recruitment programs based on bilateral agreements have been shaped by other national interests such as: migration control, domestic public opinion and EU and international politics.

Migrant associations and access to public resources: The case of the municipality of Madrid

Abstract: This paper explores the organizational conditionals that explain why immigrant associations in Spain have access to two basic resources required to develop transnational interventions in the field of co-development, namely access to public funding in the country of residence and contacts with authorities in countries of origin. Using a quantitative dataset obtained from a survey study of Peruvian, Moroccan, Ecuadorian, Colombian and Dominican associations' leaders conducted in the municipality of Madrid, we are able to analyze the systematic features of associations that correlate with their access to public money and contact with authorities. Spain represents an interesting case study for this analysis because all levels of public administration in this country have systematically used migrant associations as the key actor in defining or implementing integration policies and have cited co-development as an important objective of their policies, linked to immigration control and regulation.

Our analysis indicates that there are certain organizational features in our sample of associations that are systematically linked with an easier access to public funding in destination and contact with authorities in the country of origin. Our conclusions are in line with the expectations generated by the specialized Spanish literature on integration policies since across levels, the Spanish administrations have largely prioritized contacts with immigrant associations to give content to integration objectives and strategies. Although this applies to all migrant organizations (large and small), seniority seems to be relevant to understand why some have benefitted more from this institutional support over longer periods of time. That is, a sort of clientelism may exist between longstanding and well-funded migrant organizations and different levels of government.

Social commitment of higher education. A professional ethics analysis

Public universities of the northeast of Mexico have in their institutional discourse, ideological and political elements that are identified with fundamental ethical principles in professional education. However, a critical gaze at what takes place inside of the institutions reveals that the necessary social and pedagogical elements are not present in the environment of university education, of which main expressions of this fact are, the emphasized need for individual and exclusive success and explicit weak commitment to connect the profession with actions that benefit their social group and, in general, society. Universities propose to form professionals that are "...sensitive to community problems....placing their academic education at society's service....promoting justice from their professional field" Nevertheless, these features of the university discourse that recuperate the best democratic and humanistic traditions, the signals sent by students and professionals that are being educated, show a noticeable lack of coherence with the principles formally expressed in the legislation and political proposal in higher education institutions. The hermeneutical glance permits the observation of encounters and disencounters that are occurring between structured discourses and the results of the process in higher education. This reflects the social commitment of higher education is a pending quality in the construction of the professional ethos.

Key words: professional ethic, social commitment, institutional discourse, ethos

Ethical questions about professions: A strategy for the ethical education of college students towards social commitment

Professional ethics is founded like every other branch of ethics, according to Morin (2005), in different religation duties: with the same subject, with others, with society and also with the human race.

The application of the concept of social religation to the definition and characterization of professional ethics (Morin, 2005) can contribute very relevant elements to comprehend the phenomenon that professionals live these days in a complex context. To understand professional ethics fundamentally as social religation has profound curricular implications that allow to articulate the ethical formation of college students with the construction of social conscience for the transformation of the reality in which they will exercise their profession.

With this foundation, the Universidad Iberoamericana Puebla built the project of: "Ethical questions about professions" that was developed as participative investigation with the academic departments in order to build the moral questions that will orient the new syllabi. These syllabi will begin to operate in the Fall Semester of 2012.

The questions that oriented the investigation are:

What is the ethical question that can give significance to each of the professions to orient the curricular intents and the processes of formation in the classroom in Ibero Puebla?

Which curricular and teaching formation strategies can make the ethical questions formulated for each profession operative?

The general aim of the project was:

To construct in a collaborative manner with the teacher associations of the different departments of the UIAP, the ethical question that would give significance to each of the professions in order to orient the curricular intents and processes of formation in the classroom.

This presentation presents the theoretical foundations of the project and their most relevant results that will be fulfilled in curricular transversal strategies and teachers education programs.

Transformation of Latin American welfare regimes: Early childhood education and care (ECEC) policies and the new investment strategy in Argentina and Mexico

This paper investigates new directions in the evolution of Latin American welfare regimes by focusing on the extension of early childhood education and care (ECEC) policies in Argentina and Mexico. Unlike recent literature on countries in the Global North which discusses the expansion of social policy to include early childhood education and care, the literature on Latin America pays little attention to these dimensions of social policy. This absence is partly because of the lack of attention by most Latin American states to childcare and to education under the age of five or six, particularly during the years of the ascendance of neo-liberalism and the cutbacks in social services during the 1980s and 1990s. In recent years, however, high rates of growth and the shift away from neo-liberalism in some countries of the region has coincided with a shift toward a "social investment" paradigm that emphasizes the importance of human capital formation in social development. Both of these overlapping phenomena, along with increased emphasis on the importance of the early years in the policies of international organizations, has led to greater attention to ECEC policies among Latin American states. We argue that both Argentina and Mexico have increased their attention to ECEC policies in recent years for several reasons: the "rediscovery" of poverty; the new investment social paradigm, and the increased entry of women into the paid labour force (partly as a result of the structural adjustment policies promoted under neoliberalism). Divergence in policy adoption, however, is explained by the ideological differences between neo-liberal Mexico and post-neoliberal Argentina, the historical-institutional legacies of their welfare regimes and the different levels of influence of international organizations.

Images of justice: Contributions to rethinking the curriculum and legal pedagogy

This paper aims to discuss data from an ongoing research which seeks to analyze the images of Justice among freshmen and senior students from two Law courses of two public universities, one in Angola and the other in Brazil, as database for further investigations on the curriculum and Legal Pedagogy. The teaching of Law in these two countries, which share common features, such as the Portuguese roots of their respective legal systems and similarities as to the crisis identified in the pedagogical field connected to the teaching of law. In this respect, the development of studies which can provide the necessary conditions for legal education to shorten the distance from social reality and qualified professional education, as well as contribute to a fairer social order by expanding justice access, are a challenge to research work. The use and recognition of the relevance of image analysis in qualitative research methods in the social sciences area are relatively recent. The text is based mainly on theoretical contributions of Ralf Bohnsack, who proposes a documentary method of interpretation, originally inspired by Karl Mannheim's sociology of knowledge, so as to allow the analysis of the particularity of images as opposed to the text. The comparative analysis of the images of justice between freshmen and senior students contributes to rethinking course curriculum and legal pedagogy.

Producing and organizing markets in private security. The modification of surveillance and protection in Argentina

This paper presents a systematic analysis of the private security market in Argentina. Specialized firms, companies and individual entrepreneurs offer protection, monitoring, escort, access control, and surveillance for sale. These services and devices are classified under the category of "private security" which serves to organize the operations of companies and give them an unified social visibility. These agents compete with each other and the exchange between them and their clients is organized as a market, introducing different structuring principles: price, loyalty, niches. In order to address these problems, I first analyze the ties and power relations that structure the private security industry, considering the diversity of agents, services and symbols involved in this field. I discuss then the rhetoric of prevention that accompanies the marketing of private security services, how they adapt to customer demands and the needs groups and organizations meet with the consumption of such products.

There and back again. Careers, professional knowledge and "re-integration in civil life" among the Argentine military officers

Given the structure of the professional careers in Argentine military institutions, commissioned officers get their retirement relatively early, in average when they are less than 50 years old. To many of them the alternative is to completely retire and live calmly on their pension, or finding a new activity in which they can obtain a supplementary income and canalize their personal and professional interests. Based on in-depth biographical interviews with retired officers of the Army, the Air Force and the Navy, this paper explores the way in which these agents move from the public service towards the private sector and, more generally, how they accomplish what they themselves call "reintegration in civil life". My research shows that the forms of reconversion are strongly embedded in social networks: at the time of retiring, these officers are invited by – or they look for the support of – old comrades, relatives and friends that help them to get into new fields of activity. They are assumed to have managing, organizational, directive skills – that they call "capacity to lead men" – ready to be valorized in sectors such as private security, real estate administration and other service activities involving large numbers of personnel. Specific skills of some military specialties are particularly appreciated in civil aviation, shipping companies or engineering. These alternatives seem to be the most frequent since the access to the public administration is vetoed to them because of legal and mainly political reasons, and labor market is reluctant to these overskilled and overaged people. As a result, these agents initially trained in State institutions transfer a part of their professional know-how to the private sector, contributing to a silent and subtle but permanent process of diffusion of military norms and competencies in civil life.

Enseñar a matar. Aprender a morir

En el capítulo anterior de esta tesis realizamos una revisión de la legislación que regula el accionar policial relacionado con el uso del arma. La normativa consiste en una parte importante de los contenidos transmitidos durante el periodo inicial de formación de los aspirantes. En este apartado analizaremos el proceso de instrucción policial relacionado con el uso del arma.

En primer lugar, detallaremos las diversas instancias que componen la instrucción policial. No se trata de un elemento menor ya que consideramos que básicamente esta se divide en dos etapas que deben ser consideradas como parte de un mismo proceso global: una primera que denominaremos formación, la educación inicial impartida a través de los institutos; y una segunda que llamaremos capacitación que el policía atravesará a lo largo de su carrera profesional y que será parte constitutiva de esta. Más adelante, trataremos de determinar qué papel juega la vocación de servicio en la decisión de incorporarse a la carrera policial. Luego, daremos cuenta del valor fundamental que posee la experiencia en el trabajo cotidiano para los miembros de la institución. Para continuar, daremos cuenta de cuáles son los contenidos prácticos y teóricos que componen la capacitación específica en el área de armas y tiro analizando cuales son los criterios que la orientan.

Para dar cuenta de los elementos anteriormente mencionados nos apoyaremos en una amplia diversidad de fuentes. Contamos con entrevistas a diversos actores de la institución; publicaciones producidas por la Policía Federal Argentina como la revista Mundo Policial, un Manual de Metodología de Instrucción de Tiro y un Manual de Instrucción para Personal Subalterno; y, por último, repondremos algunos argumentos esgrimidos en diversos estudios de las ciencias sociales sobre la temática que nos convoca.

The body at school

Traditionally, childhood has been understood from an adult-centered perspective (James & Prout, 1990), defining children in the negative, by what they lack (Sarmento, 2003), but this idea has been deconstructed by several authors (e.g., Corsaro, 1997; James, Jenks & Prout, 1998), who see children as complete social beings, as actors and not only as passive receivers in social construction (Mead, 1970).

However, at school, it is demanded of children (Sarmento, 2004) a homogeneous knowledge (of normal science), an ethic (of effort) and a discipline of body and mind (Foucault, 1993), which Foucault defends is an expansion of the symbolic processes of social control and the exercise of power. These disciplinary exigencies demanded by the school ignore the possibility of creation (inherent to humans), the children's power to intervene, and the role of playing and games, the potentiality of imagination.

Children are social actors, capable of cultural creation, essentially in peer cultures, in which the game and playing are a condition for learning (Sarmento, 2004), and the imagination is inherent to the process of forming and developing the personality and rationality of each child (Sarmento, 2003).

The body at school, of the student and the teacher, has been a source for investigation. However, there is a clear lack of reflection regarding other approaches (Gaya, 2006) connecting learning and corporeity, recognising art as a form of knowledge, and movement and corporeity as potential forms for accessing and integrating information, allowing children to transform information into knowledge.

We tried to fill this gap by conducting a multidisciplinary case study, researching, with 3rd graders, how school and society construct a passive studying-body, opposed to the children's active playing-body. Furthermore, we investigate the way movement influences learning, by proposing classes in which the curricular contents will be studied from an active perspective of the children.

Urban agriculture (UA) stimulating the participative management in the construction of social politics

The debate about UA contributes with the democratization in the use of the urban spaces approximating public power and civil society. With the aim of coming up with a study about the institutional relations in the making process of the UA politics, this research has analyzed the methodological strategy Multi-stakeholder Policy formulation and Action Planning on Urban Agriculture (MPAP) from the program Cities Farming for the Future (CFF) in the city of Belo Horizonte/MG, the unique experience of its kind in Brazil. The research methodology has integrated the participative observation and pre-structured interviews. By having as study references Foucault (2010), McAdam et al. (2008) and Long (2007), it was possible to see, through the actors interface relations, the differences towards interests and agency power among the actors for the effectiveness of the cooperative actions. The capacity of the UA was very well emphasized presenting itself as a useful structure for politic opportunity, considering the possibilities for planning and implementing intersectorial actions between actors and socio-economic, environmental and urban politics. The originality of the results is in the exercise of participative management during the creation process and implementation of the UA. All this process has increased the discussion of the UA to the actors involved in the fight movement for housing and urban reform; the UA was included as one economic activity defined as category of use of land allowed in the city, that has been approved by the law 9.959/2010 that updates the law of use and urban land occupation. It has also been approved the law 10.255/2011 that institutes the UA city policy. From zoomers to geezerade: Representations of the body in ageist and classist society

This paper is based on an analysis of representations of the seniors in the media. In particular I examine images of the bodies of seniors in the advertising campaign promoting a product called Geezerade sold in Circle K convenience stores in the Atlantic provinces of Canada in the summer of 2011. I contrast these with images of seniors in the Canadian magazine Zoomers, formally CARP magazine, a magazine published by the Canadian Association of Retired People, a seniors advocacy organization. According to Moses Znaimer (Canadian broadcaster and media entrepreneur and responsible for popularizing the term, a Zoomer refers to "a Baby Boomer with Zip" and represents the 14.5 million Canadians who are 45" and over. Following Goffman's arguments in his seminal presidential address to the American Sociological Association, "the Interaction Order," I take the position in this analysis that the body does not determine social practices but none-the-less the body is the sign vesicle that enables interaction. I argue that the images in the Geezerade campaign and Zoomers magazine represents a binary models of images of seniors that reflects ageist and classist assumptions about the bodies of seniors. Such a model limits the categories through which we understand the aging body and fails to account for the diversity of senior's bodies in society.

Towards a sensory history of Asia: A sociocultural perspective

Sociocultural meanings of the senses in society have recently received scholarly attention in disciplines such as sociology, anthropology, and history. However, extant works have focused mainly on Euro-American contexts, or on non-industrial societies, where sensory research in Asian settings is in a largely nascent stage. Forming part of a larger book project, this paper aims to document and analyse how the senses in everyday life take place in historical contexts within Asian communities. Building upon Mark M. Smith's work on Sensing the Past (2007), I explore four main dimensions of social life in connection with everyday sensorialities. They comprise religion and religiosity, body and embodiment, food/foodways, and health/medicine. An investigation into these four domains of social life cumulatively demonstrates the manner in which senses act as a social conduit that both shape and are shaped by culture. By focusing on these four interrelated areas, the project deliberates upon how social actors and institutions employ and accord meanings to the senses which can be located in the fabric of everyday life experiences, spanning different social arrangements and encounters. How would an identification of moral economies of diverse sensescapes throw light upon the socialities of self and community? How are the structures and norms of various cultures then further illuminated? Broadly, the research aims to locate the meaningfulness of sensory experiences by bridging selves, community, social institutions, and varied cultural forms.

The (Argentine) state response to the problem of assistance to victims of human trafficking

This project investigates the successfulness of the Argentine government in adhering to the laws, protocols and international doctrines in place concerning the criminalization of human trafficking. To narrow the scope of my research, the study analyzes this success specifically from the standpoint of the assistance offered to the victims of human trafficking. Through the use of primary sources as well as secondary sources, this report attempts to investigate the means by which victims of human trafficking can receive assistance, and then to compare these results with the responsibilities of the Argentine government outlined in the aforementioned laws and doctrines to which the government is obligated to adhere. The paper first offers a brief history of the economic and political history of Argentina that led to the situation of human trafficking that can be seen today. To continue, the study outlines the internationally recognized definitions of 'human trafficking,' creating an image of what the average case of human trafficking in Argentina would contain, followed by a statistical analysis of the problem in the present day. Afterwards the governmental perspective of the programs offering assistance that are in place is discussed. To then provide a more comparative perspective, the roles of two specific government agencies offering assistance, that of a non-governmental organization and finally that of a former victim are examined. To conclude, a look at the governmental inadequacies that still exist is given before closing remarks are made.

La idea de nación en el presente latinoamericano: Un recorrido por tres países de la región

La idea de nación ha permanecido como eje de debates y discusiones intelectuales y políticos durante siglos. La pregunta por los fundamentos que originan y sostienen a la nación se refuerza a pesar de la anunciada desaparición de la nación, y otras ideas comunitarias, en tiempos de Globalización comunicativa. Sin embargo, a pesar de los cuestionamientos, la nación ha demostrado continuar siendo una categoría de identificación de los sujetos, donde las imágenes y representaciones contenidas en esa idea permean las relaciones que entre ellos se establecen. En esta ponencia nos proponemos recorrer los principales aportes teóricos al concepto de nación, para preguntarnos especialmente por los actores que intervienen en la construcción y diseminación de una idea de la nación. Esta es una pregunta que ha sido escasamente visitada desde el ámbito académico, que ha demostrado mayores preocupaciones por buscar los fundamentos últimos de la nación que por comprender los mecanismos de su construcción y reproducción cotidiana. Desde este trabajo, pretendemos retornar a un debate fundamental, acerca de la intervención de discursos y prácticas diversas en la contemporaneidad de las comunidades imaginadas, especialmente latinoamericanas. A partir de un trabajo de investigación en sectores populares latinoamericanos, de Argentina, Uruguay y México, volveremos sobre las propuestas teóricas que buscaron definir la participación del Estado y los sectores subalternos en la construcción de las ideas de nación de América Latina.

De la movilización a la institucionalización. La experiencia de organizaciones sociales de matriz nacional popular en el gobierno de la provincia de Buenos Aires durante el periodo 2002 - 2010

titulo de ponencia "De la movilización a la institucionalización. La experiencia de organizaciones sociales de matriz nacional popular en el gobierno de la provincia de Buenos Aires durante el periodo 2002 - 2010"

El tema principal de la ponencia es el análisis de una trayectoria que contempla el pasaje de un momento de movilización a otro de institucionalización, por parte de organizaciones sociales de matriz nacional – popular, participando en distintos estamentos gubernamentales en la provincia de Buenos Aires, ocurrido entre los años 2002 y 2010. Desde una perspectiva sociopolítica, exploraremos las transformaciones en las relaciones entre organizaciones sociales de esta matriz movimientista con el régimen político de gobierno, atendiendo a tres dimensiones principales: las formas de participación, las modalidades de representación y los procesos de legitimación de la decisión y la autoridad política.

La propuesta es centralizar la mirada sobre las relaciones que establece con el régimen político en este doble contexto de descentralización y territorialización anteriormente descrito.

En el caso argentino, ya con Kirchner en el poder, se constata como una de las principales novedades institucionales del periodo de gobierno con la participación de algunas organizaciones sociales en el gobierno y, por lo tanto, la participación de un conjunto de demandas producidas en la acción colectiva no institucional en el interior del Estado.

Interesa aquí detenernos con el objetivo de describir una trayectoria de politización de movimientos sociales específicos, pudiendo establecerse una serie de momentos, dilemas y reflexiones en torno a esa experiencia y el debate académico que promovieron las mismas.

The "wealthy-gentry politics" for capitalists in China

Choosing individual private entrepreneurs to be a member of the People's Congress (PC) or the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), which are usually roughly compared as the Chinese "House of Lords" and "House of Commons" respectively, is one of the most important mechanisms for practicing "cooperative capitalism" in China. By using the "Chinese Private Entrepreneur Survey 2008", this paper aims to answer two questions: first, what are the differences between factors for winning a seat at the PC and the CPPCC systems, respectively; second, for factors that have significant impact on winning a seat in the "county-township level" and the "prefecture-above level" PC/CPPCC is there any difference. Based on empirical findings, a term "wealthy-gentry politic" (cai-shen zhengzhi) is coined to conceptualize the fact that behaving as a socially responsible "gentry" is playing an increasingly significant role on the higher level and in the PC vis-à-vis the lower level and the CPPCC, while economic wealth is just a threshold and party membership is not a guarantee. The paper also discusses the impact of wealthy politics on democratization in China.

Communication as a basic element of organizations: Contributions and perspectives from digital social networks

From the overview of the communication as a requirement to support the organizational activity, related aspects of the digital mediated communication are proposed. Mediations supported in the new technologies appear as the most common way in which communication processes take place in the organizations of advanced societies. The organization cannot exist without the dynamic and complexity that communication provides. It is a fundamental cohesion factor.

Digital social networks introduce new concerns and problems to the mediated communication, particularly since its participatory and collaborative possibilities. In a wide sense, this requires a deepening approach from theory and practice. However, the real contributions of social networks to the organization at the internal level are not clear enough because it is considered that the commercial issues tend to prevail. From here, there are some questions to solve: Is this a merely external communication issue? Is there a meaningful contribution that the comprehension of social networks brings to the organization?

In the other hand, far from the importance of implementing social media as a resource in the internal communication it is also important to point out on the challenges that a "brand new" type of communication demands to the organizations. Introducing new technologies could be adopted very fast but the social comprehension of subtle changes, like those in communication, requires extra analysis.

Teatralidad y espacio urbano: Las "escenas comando" de la organización negra en los años de la posdictadura Argentina

El trabajo se refiere a las intervenciones teatrales realizadas por el colectivo "La Organización Negra" en el espacio público urbano, durante los años de la posdictadura militar argentina. Se trata de un grupo de jóvenes actores que, habiendo abandonado sus estudios en el Conservatorio de Arte Dramático, decide conformar un colectivo de investigación y experimentación estética que incluyó "escenas comando" (también llamadas "acciones artísticas guerrilleras") es espacios no convencionales, como por ejemplo las calles de Buenos Aires o las discotecas de la Ciudad. Inspirados en el grupo catalán "La Fura dels Baus", los integrantes de la "Organización Negra" se proponían interpelar, provocar y movilizar a los espectadores a partir de acciones directas que descolaban los modos tradicionales del vínculo actor-espacio-espectador. El objetivo central se vinculaba con la posibilidad de sublimar artísticamente la violencia generada por el Terrorismo de Estado en un lenguaje multisensorial capaz de liberar los cuerpos y replantear las reglas creativas y expresivas utilizadas hasta el momento. En el presente texto se reconstruyen y analizan las acciones callejeras desplegadas por el grupo entre los años 1983-86. La hipótesis que guía el estudio es que estas acciones pueden ser leídas como parte de un entramado de nuevas experiencias estético-políticas que constituyeron una respuesta política de resistencia y confrontación que apuntó a restituir el lazo social quebrado por el terror a partir de la instauración de otras formas de sociabilidad y valores alternativos a los planteados por el gobierno militar, transformando de un modo radical y decisivo las formas y los alcances de la acción cultural y política contrahegemónica.

Transparency in Portuguese: Corruption and poverty in Portuguese-speaking Africa

This communication aims to discuss the relation between corruption and poverty in Portuguese-speaking Africa. How do these indicators behave in the Portuguese-speaking African countries (PALOP)? Is there something special to these cases? In spite of the abundance of literature that indicate the complex relation between these two variables, it seems appropriate to use the comparative method to deepen our understanding of this question. We argue that the process of decolonization and independence, associated to colonial heritage (both cultural and institutional), perform a decisive role on the explanation of corruption and of poverty.

Thus, this investigation will, through the confrontation of the Portuguese-speaking, the French-speaking and, the English-speaking African countries, test the following hypotheses: the evolution of each paths of decolonization; the role of foreign aid for development; the importance of colonial heritage; the dynamics of political and economical relations with the former colonizers; the urban structure and network; natural resources; the specific characteristics of the elites; ethnic fragmentation of civil society. We wish to explore the impact of these variables in relation with transparency and poverty, wanting to grasp a better understanding of these two phenomena.

Rethinking "non planned" urban areas: The role of urban agriculture in migrant communities

The presentation follows an on going phd research about urban allotment gardens in the Lisbon Metropolitan region which are cultivated by cape verdean communities – one of the most emblematic Portuguese case of non legal urbanization sprawl. It intends to focus on two main points: (1) clarifying the existing conflicts among a wide diversity of urban rationalities related to forms and opportunities of access to resources like water, seeds, land, knowledge and infrastructures; (2) reviewing the social and political context related to the regulation drafting process on urban land use and occupation. The issue of urban agriculture has grown in different social contexts. It has grown in Lisbon region too, despite the marginal role of public policies in assessing and fostering its development. Today, only in the city of Lisbon there are almost 78 hectares which have been cultivated in public and private vacant land, by different social groups, for at least 40 years. The majority of those who have promoted this re-use of vacant land belong to (im)migrant communities from Cape Verde, or came from rural areas of Portugal, and they are cultivating urban areas out of the rules provided by official urban planning. In recent years, the phenomenon started to be monitored by the Public Administrations: initially as part of a misapplication of planning and building guidelines and regulations, later on as an opportunity to renovate the same development policies. The recent emergency of urban gardens policies set by local governments mainly tried to answer to an existing informal phenomenon. Considering this context, the aim is to rethink the access to the city through these spaces that goes beyond the paradigm of the informal.

Between participatory research and standardized measurement process. Methodological challenges in researching discrimination

There is a dilemma concerning the goal of research in social sciences. Conducting democratising and action research stresses the importance of educating the society giving the defavorised groups certain level of empowerment. Nonetheless, some researchers believe that a research process should be free from any other goals than cognitive ones in order to obtain an objective knowledge about the world we live in. Therefore a component of "action" should be separated from a research process. A goal of our presentation is to discuss strategies toward democratisation of research process on the one hand and application of standardised measurement procedures on the other. The issue is presented in the light of developing quantitative questionnaire for national research study of discrimination of various minorities and ethnic groups. The study was conducted among a representative population of Poles. In order to introduce democratic procedures and empower discriminated minorities we engaged defavorised groups in the process of developing the research tool. The aspect that we put the strongest emphasis on was the language. The greatest challenge was to balance inclusive and sensitive expressions with the language commonly used in the society. Moreover we avoided categories particularly influenced by power relations. All of those aspects shall be presented in detail during our speech.

Knowledge based economy? Barriers towards transfer of knowledge in Poland

The most developed and competing world economies are knowledge-based. Poland attempts to introduce such an economy on a national and a local level. Despite rising expenditures on research and development and a growing number of persons employed in research and development sectors of market, transfer of knowledge is still very low. Research results on cooperation between corporations, universities and administration prove high potential for the knowledge transfer on the one hand and on the other hand an existence of obstacles to its development. The obstacles are particularly administrative and organisational. Scientists producing the knowledge and corporations interested in its commercialisation manage with the obstacles through establishing informal cooperation. Therefore in their cooperation they omit institutions which introduce administrative and organisational barriers, i.e. universities. Nevertheless, informal cooperation restricts a scale of knowledge transfer and profits for potential partners. Our presentation aims at discussing barriers in introducing knowledge-based economy in Poland. We will analyse a model of transfer of knowledge implemented in Poland. We will analyse its strengths and weaknesses. Our presentation is based on research results including different partners in networks of knowledge transfer, i.e. universities, corporations and local and national authorities. We have conducted in-depth interviews and quantitative studies in order to define a model of knowledge transfer and obstacles to implementing knowledge-based economy.

Disrupted modernities: The dissipation of the present as a utopian future of the industrial past

This study will focus on the precarious nature of contemporary modernity in its liquid and illiquid forms. Hence, should one reevaluate the present in search of the signs that indicate what is developing or devolving into either some conditions of failed modernization or even actual demodernization? Utopia is a "nowhere," but how has it perhaps become an embedded and material everyday working reality in so many more places for larger numbers of people with the synchronicity of excessive sovereign debt, peak oil, tapped out natural resources, rapid climate change, civic collapse, deeply entrenched economic immobility during the past decade?

Achievements, challenges, and prospects in the application of institutional ethnography research

What we now call institutional ethnography (IE) emerged from Dorothy Smith's sociology for women, an alternative sociology intended to supplement women's knowledge of their everyday world rather than replace their knowledge with explanations dependent upon frameworks organized by others whose experiences, interests, and social circumstances differed remarkably from women. As this alternative sociology developed into a sociology for people, it maintained this orientation and commitment to the development of knowledge that would expand people's grasp of their everyday world. Furthermore, this new knowledge would have the potential to assist in the remaking of ongoing social relations in a manner that would meet people's needs and desires. With IE the ethnographer could also be the activist. This paper briefly reviews and analyzes the work of several social activists-researchers who have used and who are using institutional ethnography to make changes in institutional arrangements at the local level or in the realm of widespread social practices and public policy. Data come from published work, web sites, and interviews with IE activists-researchers.

University teachers: A comparative study between Mexico and Spain about the components of professional teaching ethics

The objective of this study is to contrast the expressions of two groups of teachers on the main components of ethics teaching. The work corresponds to a descriptive study, with the participation of 135 teacher-researcher mexicans and five spanish. The techniques used were questionnaires and interviews. The responses were analyzed through content analysis and statistical calculation. In their responses of the five most significant features of being a good teacher, it can be seen a coincidence in the traits:

teaching skills; knowledge of the subject and sense of responsibility. In the answers about the five most important values of the exercise of teaching, both groups of teachers agree on the values: respect and solidarity.

With regard to the strategies for training and development of teaching ethics, the comparative displays equal percentages of answers in favor, where Mexican teachers-researchers propose preferably conventional strategies such as: courses, workshops, conferences, forums, seminars proposal moderately different from the Spanish teachers who, in addition to these, suggest strategies such as collaborative work, discussion groups and study cases.

The study concludes on the importance of thinking in the practice of the teaching profession in its dimensions: cognitive didactic-pedagogical, valoral and attitudinal, which can be achieved through the formation and development of ethics teaching

The dismantling of family policy Keynesianism

Scandinavian welfare states have been characterised by the combination of universal access to tax-financed social services and income-based social insurances, with strong redistributive effects. This welfare model has been interpreted as a sign of the political strength of egalitarian values as well as of political stability where electoral shifts do not translate into whole-sale policy change. Noted by its long history of active family and gender equality policies, enabling (virtually) all women and men to combine gainful employment and family responsibilities, the Scandinavian countries has gained worldwide reputation for its gender equal ideals (a dual-earner/dual-carer family model). However, in the wake of mass unemployment with the economic crisis of the early 1990s, and ensuing restructurings of welfare service provision and funding (stressing ideals of 'freedom of choice' for families), there has been an increase in poverty gaps and inequalities. This has resulted in a de facto (if not politically embraced) departure from former egalitarian policy ambitions.

It is therefore important to ask why and in what political contexts such changes emerge and how welfare models are transformed. The purpose of this paper is to critically engage in debates on how inequalities are (re) produced in Scandinavian welfare states by further analysing transformations of the normative foundation of welfare policies with special emphasis on family and gender equality policies in Sweden. This illustrates the impact of economic crisis also on purportedly egalitarian welfare models.

The main argument is that the economic crisis of the 1990s, in conjunction with emerging discourses on freedom of choice, is challenging the notion of inclusive family policies for productive purposes - family policy Keynesianism. Thus, increasing inequalities and the dismantling of egalitarian values must be understood as a result of an amalgamation of profound ideological shifts in how to redistribute welfare services and economic crises.

Processes of stigmatization of religions of African origin in the city of Campina Grande

The purpose of this project is to study the dynamics of the affirmation of black identity mediated by the house of African-Brazilian cults in the city of Campina Grande, in the interface with the stigmatization process of ethnic and religious.

Choosing as reference point for theoretical interpretive anthropology, which understands society as a network of constantly producing symbols and meanings, we propose to search the yard of Father Walter order to analyze how religion appears as a space for construction and affirmation of black identities in reference to processes of stigmatization related to ethnic and religious field.

We can say that this construction and affirmation of ethnic identity can also be thought of as a form of political power struggle in order to tell the difference, going beyond a "rescue" the black tradition. This construction reflects the likely creation of a "collective us" (cf. Novaes, 1993), the formation of a group that is mainly interested in claiming a greater social visibility over the erasure that was submitted. This construction of black identity from African-Brazilian religions can be seen as a significant milestone for the construction of identity, appearing in the preface of "Grandma and Grandpa

White Nago" (Dantas, 1988), in which Peter Fry presents Candomblé as a form of "cultural resistance" that blacks keep their own identity, always in a constant process of construction and affirmation. Thus, this identity can be understood in a collective corpus, given that it can be seen as "cultural resistance", ie the way black people affirm their own identity as opposed to the dominant culture. It is an identity, a collective body that contrasts with the others. Our study aims to examine to what extent we can say that Candomblé still remains a significant form of construction / affirmation of a certain black identity.

O golpe de 1964 já ensejou a elaboração de inúmeras, teses, livros e artigos científicos. Poucos desses estudos se concentram no papel do Congresso Nacional nas articulações, negociações e manifestações dos dois campos que se opunham – apoiadores e opositores do governo Goulart. Este trabalho se concentra nas posições dos representantes do PCB na Câmara dos Deputados, às vésperas do golpe de 1964. Pretende oferecer uma análise desse importante período da nossa história política, através do exame das estratégias e práticas desses atores sociais empenhados em evitar a deposição do Governo Goulart.

O objetivo é estudar as atitudes, comportamentos e posições dos parlamentares pecebistas que se refugiavam em outras legendas, nos meses que antecederam a queda de João Goulart. Na verdade, trata-se de conhecer as representações sociais dos integrantes do PCB através de suas falas e discursos num momento tão crucial da vida política brasileira e conhecer para o conhecimento de peculiaridades de nossa cultura política.

Para tanto, foram localizados e examinados todos os discursos desse parlamentares pronunciados, no período que antecede o golpe, sobretudo depois do famoso comício da Central do Brasil, em 13 de março de 1964, quando o presidente Goulart discorre longamente sobre as reformas de base, entre as quais a reforma agrária. Também foram entrevistados dois ex-deputados que representavam o PCB nesse período – Fernando Sant'anna e Marco Antonio Coelho, o permitiu cotejar a pretendida a objetividade refletida na obediência aos ditames do partido e as diferenças de atitudes que refletem as subjetividades advindas de vivências distintas.

University completion by children of immigrants in western countries

We use probit analysis of national datasets in the United States, Canada, England and Wales, Netherlands, Belgium, and France to examine gross university completion by children of immigrants relative to native majorities and completion net of social origins. This allows us to examine the extent to which children of immigrants and natives face penalties or benefits associated with their ethnic origin in their host countries. Some second-generation groups are more likely to complete tertiary education relative to the native majorities including Chinese, Indians, Black Caribbeans and Black Africans in England and Wales, Chinese and South Asians in Canada, and East Asians and whites in the United States. Children of immigrants in Canada particularly stand out in terms of positive higher education outcomes relative to the majority population. Groups that fare significantly worse than the native majority include Mexicans and Puerto Ricans in the United States, and Moroccans and Turks in Belgium and the Netherlands. Only in a few cases, including Mexicans and Puerto Ricans in the United States and North Africans in France, do social class origins explain second-generation disadvantage in university completion. In the case of second-generation Pakistani, Bangladeshi, and whites in England and Portuguese in France we see a net advantage emerge when controlling for social origins indicating that those with similar circumstances to native majorities are more likely to complete university degrees. However, the higher education disadvantage of some ethnic groups cannot be explained by social origins suggesting that these groups face ethnic penalties in the higher education process. This appears to be the case for second-generation Turks and Moroccans in the Netherlands, Italians in Belgium, and Sub-Saharan Africans in France. The authors discuss the implications of these findings in terms of social justice in immigrant receiving societies.

The European divide: Care politics in Europe

In my paper I will investigate the European situation of migrant care work - in particular care for the elderly - as an expression of a new geopolitical pattern characterized by care-drain in the East and care-gain in the West. I will analyze care politics in Europe, where the majority of migrant care workers are female and not from the Global South but from Eastern Europe. East to West care migration is explored as a de facto solution to the care deficit in receiving countries (Western, Southern and Northern Europe) where care-importing countries either open the labor market to migrant workers or are compliant with a growing undocumented care market. While the EU promotes equal opportunities policies and an 'adult-worker' model for men and women alike, neither debates about nor measures to ensure an equal division of family and work obligations are on its agenda. In addition, the EU has so far ignored the socio-economic European care gaining/losing split, which produces inequalities between families and states inside the EU and at its margins. On the sending side of the European division, the care replacement for non-migrating family members (children and the elderly) is a matter of individual arrangements without any aid granted by employers or state institutions.

My analysis will be based on the examination of EU and member states' policy documents concerning work-life balance politics and on results of our case study (Landscapes of Care-Drain. Care provision and care drain from the Ukraine to Poland and from Poland to Germany, 2007-2010) which focuses on the perspective of female migrant care-workers and their families left behind.

Immigrants in their homeland

Food is a highly semiotic device; it can signal a cornucopia of social signs (Appadurai, 1994). In this paper I argue that in the age of globalization and within the confinement of national cultural industries ethnic groups and individuals often experience various "immigration" corollaries in their historical homelands without the actual translocation when food practices and food images are concerned. Scholars have already drawn a distinction between the habitual, daily, lived practices shared among group of people, as one form of a shared identity and those explicit self-conscious symbolic and performative displays that are often given the public label 'national culture' (Bourdieu, 1984, Wilk 2002). In the case at hand I look at the changing images of Humus, a local ethnic Palestinian food in the general public as a way to explore how an indigenous ethnic group is stripped of its cultural gastronomic asset within the larger national culture. In the case at hand Humus is being appropriated by agencies of the dominant culture and integrated into the national diet and through this process its "heritage" is appropriated and obscured for the 'common national good'. I argue that the consumption of this food and its origin by the Jewish dominant group does not only expropriate local Palestinians of their gastronomic history but rather transforms them for all practical purposes into exiles in their homeland. This mélange of images regarding one specific nationalized and de-ethnicized (Belasco, 1987) food item facilitates further understanding into the cultural exclusion of a local minority group from the national culinary scene. It tells a story of a forced migration, indeed immigration, from the local landscape simply by the latter cultural appropriation by the dominant national majority.

Entre la caja fuerte y la "timba": Tensiones en torno de las instituciones financieras en las sociedades contemporáneas

Las violentas protestas contra los bancos registradas en Grecia, España e Italia durante la crisis europea de 2011 contribuyeron a llamar la atención sobre el vínculo - aún poco explorado por las ciencias sociales - existente entre las instituciones financieras y sus clientes particulares.

Como en la crisis argentina de 2001, miles de manifestantes marcharon por las calles de las grandes ciudades descargando su furia contra sucursales bancarias, incendiando cajeros automáticos, bloqueando el paso de camiones de caudales. ¿Qué es lo que reclamaban esos manifestantes? ¿Cuáles son los puntos en común y las diferencias entre esas protestas que, en América Latina y en Europa, ubicaron a los bancos como blanco privilegiado de sus ataques? ¿Cuáles son los sentidos que confluyen y son disputados en esas acciones directas, acerca del lugar de las instituciones financieras en las sociedades contemporáneas, del rol del Estado, del dinero, de las identidades sociales?

Partiendo de un estudio sobre la protesta de los "ahorristas" argentinos durante la crisis de 2001-2002, esta ponencia busca proponer algunas claves de interpretación para el estudio de las relaciones que se establecen, en el capitalismo contemporáneo, entre los bancos y sus clientes.

Reparar lo irreparable. Los debates en torno de las indemnizaciones a las víctimas del terrorismo de estado en la Argentina

A comienzos de la década de 1990, en un contexto dominado por la clausura de los procesos judiciales contra los responsables de los crímenes cometidos durante la dictadura de 1976-1983, el Estado argentino dispuso el establecimiento de reparaciones en dinero para las víctimas del terrorismo de Estado. El tratamiento legislativo y la implementación de dichas políticas estuvieron acompañados por intensos debates en el interior de los organismos de derechos humanos acerca de la pertinencia de esas indemnizaciones y de las razones para aceptarlas o no.

En este trabajo nos proponemos examinar el proceso de formulación de la política de reparaciones y las discusiones que su aplicación suscitó entre sus destinatarios principales (ex presos políticos, ex desaparecidos o familiares de desaparecidos). La comparación con políticas similares implementadas en otros contextos y casos nacionales constituirá una parte importante de nuestro análisis.

Blogging as participatory media practices and new public sphere constructors in Ukrainian society

New and social media are changing the relationships of individuals to society. First of all, media in the era of democratization have produced new ideas of what it means to participate in social, political and institutional life. It, really, deals with possibilities of new media technologies, especially, Internet, in processes of democratization and expansion of personal freedom. Secondly, new media have changed the design of social space, a sphere of publicness. The traditional media reflect the sphere of public, as far as social media, such as blogging, microblogging, and social networking structuralize the public sphere, produce different types of public identities: publics, mass audience, interests groups, and virtual communities.

Blogs (and social networking sites in general) illustrate the fusion of key elements of human desire: to express one's identity, to create community, to structure one's past and to present experiences. Blogging also expresses the moment when users got some sort of control over the information age, and a decision to share private information—to blur the line between the private and the public spheres. Blogging is the event of "rewriting oneself" through interaction with the audience. Unlike writing a traditional diary, blogging is a process of linking two or more individuals. The character of blogs as simultaneously private and public enables the formation of both individual and group identities.

The specific character of blogging development in contemporary Ukraine is following. The main senses of blogs creators: contacts, self-presentations, creation of a political image, relaxation, making and maintaining of social relations, individual reflection, psychotherapy. The main goals of blogs readers: keeping in touch with relatives and friends, information receiving, gaiety and diversion, socialization, public opinion monitoring. To conclude we can characterize blogs as an instrument of individual and political communication, but also as one of self-organizational form of civil society.

Las políticas de igualdad de género en la reforma de la policía de la provincia de Buenos Aires, Argentina

La reforma de la policía de Buenos Aires, emprendida en 2004, se enmarcó conceptual, política y doctrinariamente en los nuevos enfoques internacionales del delito, de la seguridad ciudadana y de las políticas públicas inspiradas en ellos. Dada la necesidad de construir una institución profesional, eficiente, cohesionada y comprometida con la promoción y defensa de los derechos humanos, la reforma incorporó como eje estratégico de la nueva normativa policial el enfoque de género, con el propósito de superar la manifiesta desigualdad y las prácticas discriminatorias existentes al interior de la institución.

En este contexto, realizamos dos encuestas (una en 2005, otra en 2007) a dos cohortes de aspirantes a la policía de la provincia de Buenos Aires, en dos sedes descentralizadas de formación. El propósito era describir las concepciones que los y las ingresantes tenían acerca de las características y la función del trabajo policial y de la institución, así como también sus ideas acerca de la percepción que la sociedad tenía sobre la policía.

Nuestra investigación mostró que, a la "segregación vertical de género" (diferencias de oportunidades entre mujeres y hombres para acceder a los niveles más altos de la estructura jerárquica) institucionalizada normativamente, se le agregaba una aceptada y temprana concepción de "segregación horizontal de género" (tipo de trabajo que se le asigna a mujeres y hombres), apenas oculta detrás de una noción de "falsa igualdad", fundamentada en la aseveración de que todo el personal recibe la "misma formación policial".

Los datos aportaron evidencia, así mismo, sobre la permanencia de la imagen tradicional del policía como "policía hombre", y expusieron, también, profundas divergencias entre los varones y las mujeres respecto de las percepciones referidas a la institución policial y sus funciones y sobre las concepciones que la sociedad tiene sobre la fuerza.

Surveillance cultures and everyday life

New cultures of surveillance have been emerging since the mid C20th. Now, digitally-mediated relationships mean that subjects are increasingly involved, not merely as the "bearers" of surveillance but as active participants, through social media, interaction with public street cameras and in everyday adoption of surveillance mentalities and practices. A much more complex cultural landscape is emerging than can be captured with simple conceptual binaries such as power/participation, in/visibility, privacy/publicness and so on. The ethics and politics of such complex situations present new challenges. The need for both disclosive and normative ethics is if anything greater. Democracy acquires different meanings in a mediated, information-infused world. Surveillance situations vary widely in the countries of the global north and south. And the kinds of accountability that might be demanded of corporations and government departments may have to be scaled for other levels of surveillance activity. Thus both the analytical and the ethical seem ready for overhaul as Surveillance Studies moves beyond its initial frames.

Analyzing global social disorder: On relevance of classical theories of anomie and alienation

The proposed paper reanalyzes the problem of social disorder which has become a crucial issue in the global context. With the "occupy Wall Street" demonstrations some groups within the society have been struggling against the commonly apprehended goals of the existing culture, dominant in the society, which R. Merton viewed as a culture of success where money have become a commonly apprehended value, an aim or a means of prestige gaining.

Still the classical terms of sociology seem to have become irrelevant in describing this new reality. For example, is the rebellion against the culture in terms of Merton to be seen as a deviant or anomic behavior where intervention of the institute of normalization is needed? Are such demonstrations to be viewed as a sign of system crisis or are they to be viewed as certain permanent fluctuations?

The aim of the paper is to examine one of the classical concepts of social disorder, anomie and alienation. It is proposed to take certain cases of social disorder worldwide that will on the one hand meet the classical theoretical assumptions (as, for example the world economic crisis in the relation to the concept of anomie of E. Durkheim) and on the other hand will characterize the contemporary society (as the occupy Wall Street demonstrations). Thus such cases will enable the researcher to conclude whether the concept is still relevant in describing the contemporary social reality.

Anomie and alienation: Necessity of discrimination between the concepts

The proposed paper attempts to reanalyze the relation between two classical sociological concepts, anomie and alienation. The two theories appeared and developed separately, but with the institutionalization of psychological anomie the theory of anomie became not only close but even mixed with alienation. The separation between a "progressive" or chronic anomie and a sharp anomie was firstly made by Durkheim in "The Suicide". The chronic anomie is characterized by a wide spectrum of possibilities and leads to increasing and unappeasable desires and aspirations. It became unavoidable for the industrial society. The sharp anomie is characterized by crises, social changes unbalancing social mechanisms. The separation between the psychological and social anomie was suggested by Srole followed later by Merton. The social anomie is thus a social situation, characterized by lack of norms and regulations (Durkheim), and or the gap between the culturally supported goals and institutional means of fulfilling them (Merton). Anomie characterizes the condition of social surround. Anomia is an individual psychological condition (as a consequence of anomie), characterized by social malintegration (feelings of alienation, feebleness, helplessness, loneliness, etc.). It is a condition of particular people (Merton). It is anomia that is often being mixed with alienation. Crucial is to separate the two terms for a better possibility of applying these concepts.

Culture study as a symbolic dimension of society and a social complex system

Culture is the symbolic dimension of society. Culture is not limited to a sector or a specific area. Its character crosscutting affects all aspects of daily life that metabolize through articulated language with many complex metalanguages, such as religion, law, morality, art, education, philosophy and common sense. Thus, culture is a huge, complex and multidimensional framework of methods and models defining, representing and modeling the world and all the experiences that we have. Therefore, we can say that this symbolic dimension is, at the same time, a big social complex system.

We have in Mexico a cultural diversity and, in and of itself, a huge social inequality and injustice that are part of our usual scenario. We could not reflect the strong possibility of self-appointed, self-defined, self-determined to win stages of development from our own reality. There is still no comprehensive cultural policy structured as a central pillar. Despite these great efforts, made by the state, the issue of "development" seems not to go on, or not progressing quickly enough. We have not clear actions of state. There is not continuity and prospective of long-term development. So then, there is a general malaise in terms of incidence on human and social development in our country. This paper analyzes the relationship between culture and development as a complex issue with multiple determinations. Culture will be reviewed from a systems perspective, as an empirical complex that affects this studied reality (Garcia, 2006).

Una aproximación psicosocial al estudio de las trayectorias laborales y la dimensión subjetiva del trabajo

En Colombia, durante la década de 1990 se introducen cambios en el modelo de Estado y el modelo económico que implican transformaciones en los elementos del sistema ocupacional: la relación, la localización y el tiempo de trabajo, cambios operados a nivel del contexto estructural que se impone a los sujetos, lo que ha generado cambios en la construcción de las trayectorias laborales. El sistema ocupacional, fundamentalmente la relación de trabajo, impone cierto ordenamiento temporal para la vida de los sujetos y trae consigo diferentes formas de posicionarse frente al futuro. El sistema ocupacional con características de pleno empleo favorece la construcción de trayectorias laborales lineales, mientras que el sistema ocupacional con características de subempleo flexible y plural favorece la construcción de trayectorias laborales intermitentes, fragmentadas y discontinuas. No obstante, el sujeto acepta o rechaza las posibilidades que el contexto brinda y toma decisiones en relación con las limitaciones que impone a partir de la forma como valora y significa el trabajo (hobbie; ocupación de la mente; conjunto de valores; reto; bendición; dificultad, esfuerzo y esclavitud) lo cual hace parte de su capital cultural como reconversión de un ethos del trabajo que fue transmitido por instituciones como la familia y la escuela. Es así como en la construcción de las trayectorias laborales se conjugan elementos pertenecientes a dos niveles de comprensión de los fenómenos sociales: las características del sistema ocupacional, como elemento del contexto estructural, que ejerce coacción sobre los sujetos; y el capital simbólico (económico, social, cultural) con el que éstos cuentan, del cual la dimensión subjetiva del trabajo hace parte. Una investigación etnográfica sobre las trayectorias laborales de profesionales en Cali, Colombia, aporta elementos para comprender los cambios operados en el mundo del trabajo y su incidencia en la vida de quienes trabajan.

Multicultural societies: The formation of sociability territories in the city of Rio de Janeiro

This paper is an extension of a former work in Cultural Identity done at the Manguera Favela territory in Rio de Janeiro- Brazil, since 2004, now expanded to the Cinelândia territory. The objective is to depict how the multicultural character of a contemporary society may enrich the sociability of the city territories. Cinelândia focus of this work, was chosen because it was the scenario of most significant cultural and social moments of the city of Rio de Janeiro since in the First Republic. The contemporary society is inevitably multicultural and demands the recognition of cultural differences that may permit the dialog and the comprehension of one another. This work depicts the multicultural character as an influence that enriches the construction of the sociability in the city territories. The conclusion is that plural and heterogenic territories, where the differences are permanent, are fundamental to build the sociability. For instance, we focus on Cinelândia, a melting pot at Rio's city center, where almost everything fits and where difference is a vector of integration.

Violence against children – What do they have to say?

This project discusses the physical violence against children in its several daily manifestations. This kind of violence occurs inside many societies and has some specificities that characterize each one of them. This violence is analyzed in its several representations throughout the time in Brazil. The frame of reference is the promulgation of the Estatuto da Criança e do Adolescente ("status of children and adolescents") (1990) up to the Law Project 7672/10 elaborated by the Secretaria Geral Dos Direitos Humanos ("General Secretary of Human Rights"), of the Republic Presidency, known as the Lei da Palmada ("The Spank Law"). This project provides the prohibition of physical punishment and cruel or degrading treatment for children and teenagers. It is observed that several countries have already embraced laws that aim to restrain the violence against children and teenagers.

From the studies of Ariès, we found a change in family organization e the part assigned to children inside societies, throughout the history. According to this author, since the XVII century, adults (parents) assume the position of guardians of the bodies and souls of the infants. From this point, is established a hierarchy of powers that did not exist in previous periods. Therefore, we are able to say that children are, historically, subject and represented.

The physical violence, traditionally, legitimized by the church and the state, is on control device, subjection and infantilization of the bodies. Treating the child as an "absent" from the scene of social life. The introduction of the violence against children theme in the public agenda promotes a change in the paradigm referred above. Thus, in this project it is aimed to rebuild the representation children make of the violence which they are submitted to. Accordingly, it is used a methodological resource that prioritizes the graphical representation (drawings), games and focal groups.

Migrantship and old age: Intersecting social positions

While the concept of intersectionality has increasingly established itself in the social sciences over the past two decades, the intersections of some social positions have received more attention than others. One intersection that has received less attention thus far is that between old age and migrantship (i.e. 'ethnic otherness' resulting from migration). This presentation addresses this intersection with a particular focus on identity and identification pertaining to these two positions (and, where relevant, other positions such as gender and class as well). The base for this discussion is empirical data in the form of 24 interviews with individuals aged between 55 and 79 who were born in 12 different countries and have lived in Sweden between 18 and 61 years. Informed by a social constructionist perspective, the analysis explores the hows and whens of identifications with various social positions, with a particular interest in the interplay between migrantship and old age. The aim of the presentation is hence to contribute to our theoretical understanding of how different social positions intersect and mediate constructions of identities.

Still an Other after forty years? Negotiating identifications with migrantship and old age

Research on identity and identifications pertaining to ethnicity and migration has had a tendency to explore ethnicity rather than ethnic otherness, and has, if so, paid little attention to the intersection with (old) age. This presentation explores the intersection between migrantship (i.e. 'ethnic otherness' resulting from migration) and old age, with particular focus on identifications – where the question of 'where are you from' is a recurring theme. The discussion is based on empirical data in the form of 24 interviews with individuals aged between 55 and 79 who were born in 12 different countries and have lived in Sweden between 18 and 61 years. Informed by a social constructionist perspective, the analysis explores the hows and whens of identifications with various social positions, with a particular interest in the interplay between migrantship and old age. The aim of the presentation is hence to contribute to our (theoretical) understanding of how different social positions intersect and mediate experiences as well as constructions of identities.

Cities under stress: Cumulative and cascading effects of disaster on urban governance in Tokyo, 2011

On March 11, 2011, devastating earthquake and Tsunami hit East Japan. In addition, serious accidents of crippled nuclear power plant caused a crisis in Japan. Tokyo is located relatively far from epicenter and nuclear power plant, yet, it experienced serious stress under multiple influences of a series of events. The disaster had a multifaceted character. It brought about unexpected chain of effects in not only physical and economic but also political, social, and cultural spheres of urban life. More importantly, various additional effects of disasters were often produced, controlled, mediated, or interpreted in Tokyo as a political, economic, and cultural center of the nation. This paper considers about the nature of such cumulative and cascading effects of disaster on urban settings, by focusing on Tokyo. Each event under crisis has a different place of occurrence. It also has a different place of origin. In addition, each event has a different geographical scale of influence. Yet actually those are intermingled at the same time in each place, often finally leading to restructuring and rescaling of current urban settings. This paper focuses on emerging political regime of the city through crisis and recovery processes since March 2011. The mixture of neo-liberalism and new interventionism will be discussed.

Concepts of gender and masculinity between primary healthcare professionals in Brazil

The presentation will focus how men's health is constructed by the analyses of concepts of gender and masculinity among Primary Healthcare Professionals. It is based on two perspectives: the meanings associated with being a man and the relations between masculinity and healthcare comparing the context of men's health and the development of women's health. This qualitative study is part of a multicentric investigation in four Brazilian States (Pernambuco, Rio de Janeiro, Rio Grande do Norte, Sao Paulo), which used triangulation methods as a benchmark. Sixty-nine in depth interviews carried out among health professionals with higher education were analysed. The discourses (re)produce the notion that health facilities are "feminized spaces". Within the daily routine, this notion is translated as reinforcing the idea that the male body is not a locus of this care, as opposed to the female body which is considered a locus of care. The presence of a hegemonic pattern of masculinity is prominent among professionals' representations of men and seems to influence the latter, in their lack of commitment with healthcare. The existence of a stereotyped gender model (re)produces disparities between men and women in healthcare and compromises the visibility of other meanings and expressions of gender identities.

Productive restructuring and labor organization in the pottery pole of Iranduba

The current article examines the productive restructuring process and its relation to labor organization in three companies in the Pottery Pole of Iranduba, town which holds the largest production of bricks and tiles in the State of Amazonas and also in this part of the Brazilian Amazon. In recent years, major changes have been taking place within the productive process and also in the types of labor organization in that economic sector, which contain new production paradigm features, based upon principles of flexibility and productivity. The introduction of organization techniques, such as Quality Control Circle, 5S Program, and the pursuit of international certifications such as ISO 9000 and 14000 point out new corporate strategies that are being used in Iranduba's pottery. To understand and to explain the features of productive rearrangement in a sector that, until just recently, was characterized by low technology used in the manufacture of their products, used native wood as raw material in the burning of tiles and bricks, and, yet, the strategies employed by the potteries' owners upon the implementation of organizational and technological innovations, and also the pottery workers' action facing these changes, are the purposes of this work.

Family judges in England and Wales: The adversarial myth

The Family Justice system in England and Wales is widely held to differ from civil law systems not only in the lack of codification, but in the use of an adversarial process. The recent Family Justice Review chaired by David Norgrove, published for the review by the Ministry of Justice in November 2011 makes many helpful proposals for change, but still subscribes to the view that the adversarial process in the English family courts contributes to exacerbation of conflict and poor outcomes in family matters. This paper draws on findings from an observational study by OXFALP of the work of 20 judges in the English lower courts in 2009-2010 and questions this view. We observed the judges teaching, promoting good quality work by other welfare agencies, enforcing the current law (Children Act England and Wales 1989) which requires the court to have as its paramount consideration the best interests of the child, and managing cases while working towards settlement, avoiding trial and adjudication wherever possible. We saw a settlement culture prevailing. This kind of approach may take more time and resources than a quick trial of the issues in dispute. But we suggest that the outcomes are more acceptable to the parties, and more enduring. It would be helpful in planning future change if this information was more widely available and appreciated.

Participatory art practices in urban space

In societies there exist certain systems established to ensure social, economic and cultural equality among its constituents. However, as described by Henri Lefebvre there are instances where failures in these systems - through weakness, through intentional destruction, through neglect - have resulted in holes, creating what David Harvey calls uneven geography, a complex condition caused by both seen and unseen forces. Although many of these inequities manifest themselves through the built environment, the professional fields of architecture, urban planning and design have failed to adequately respond to them. In some of these locations where urban design and planning have failed, new relational, performative, and sculptural art practices have been able to reveal and actively address unseen forces in the city, in part by circumventing or instrumentalizing what are seen as limitations to the design fields. Through their practices - which range in scale and medium - these artists have filled the voids Lefebvre described as "the places of the possible" which "can only be realized in the course of a radical metamorphoses." The paramount methodological approach which enables these practices to accomplish radical urban metamorphoses is the incorporation of different forms of public participation, providing the multiplicity of viewpoints and knowledge needed to inform site specific interventions.

I begin this paper by establishing a context for understanding the place of art in contemporary urbanization. Within this framework I will examine case studies of artists WochenKlausur, Jeanne van Heeswijk, REPOHistory and Krzysztof Wodiczko with the goal of understanding how each incorporated participation into their practices in order to reveal conditions of uneven geography, in turn proposing alternatives to these existing social and political structures. Finally, I will suggest from these case studies how participatory art practices can work with architects, urban planner and urban designers to create more just cities.

The local management of security and the implementation of the national security and citizenship program in Brazil: From the falls in crime indexes to gain of citizenship and accountability

The research investigates the recent model of the Brazilian public security, parting from the analysis of the National Security with Citizenship/ Pronasci. With the return of democracy in Brazil, problems such as high crime rates and violence increased because of a history of exclusion and social inequality from the lower layers of the population. The research investigates the process of implementing a new paradigm when it comes to public safety, using the model of a decentralization process that makes the municipalities become key players in the process, acting in cooperation with other federal entities such as states and the Union. There is a focus on security management in the municipalities and the effectiveness of actions concerning the reduction of crime and violence. Pronasci is based on the combination of qualified repression and social programs, developing from the coordination between the three federal entities. The program assumes that crime is a multifactorial phenomenon, with a territorial base, so the experience and local knowledge are valued. The program is being implemented in the municipalities of metropolitan areas with high levels of vulnerability and exposure to violence, especially homicides. In methodological terms, interviews, focus groups and analysis of social indicators are showing a drop in crime rates and greater popular participation and engagement of vulnerable groups in public spaces, resulting in a gain in citizenship and accountability.

Beyond the giddens's paradox: The social construction of nature and the environment

Reports of the IPCC (Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change) point to a variety of possible scenarios of global climate change if the emission levels of gases causing the greenhouse effect maintain the current pace. This network of scientists, environmentalists and political actors, alert to the possibility of widespread water resources shortages, the reduction in agricultural income and food production, the Amazon system collapse, the tropical forests definitive extinction, the large glaciers melting, the biodiversity crisis, the rising temperatures and the spread of extreme weather events and, consequently, the transformation of considerable human contingent on environmental refugees. Why do not we do anything? One of the explanations for the absence of concrete actions of individuals in relation to the environmental crisis is precisely Giddens's Paradox, which postulates that by a series of explanatory factors characteristic of post-traditional societies, political and usual actions will only be carried out when there is no possibility of significant anthropogenic influence on climate change events. The perspective of this research seeks to critically examine this explanatory category through an empirical research in the city of Brotas (São Paulo, Brazil) which works with an approach where the conceptions of nature and environment are social constructions locally sited and originated by social distinction process performed by agents in specific contexts. The existence of the environmental ethos, of the concern about the crisis of ecosystems, and of the lack of practical action in relation to discussions of climate change should be linked to territorial dynamics, to political, economic and social arrangements of certain localities, to the differentiation processes between social classes, and to the an interactional complex of identities construction.

Social entrepreneurship as an inclusive youth development strategy in South Africa

Throughout the world and particularly in Africa, youth represent a source of innovation and dynamism that is seldom acknowledged and much less nurtured. Innovative development practices which create synergies between the capitalist centered growth and the social development of many communities in Africa need to be developed. Youth development discourse therefore should focus on creating platforms which capture the processes of youth engagement and inclusion at the same time constantly formulating and reformulating youth development approaches in an iterative search for best practice. This presentation will seek to answer one core question: How can social entrepreneurship reduce youth poverty in South Africa? Utilizing a theoretical and literature analysis of the socio-political and economic landscape of South Africa and other transitioning economies, I intend to show how social entrepreneurship, as an alternative vehicle to facilitate positive youth development can tap into the social capacities of young people. In an increasingly interconnected world, a youth centered development agenda has the potential to enhance growth, reduce exclusion and increase the capacity of communities to solve social problems. This paper will therefore present the concept of social entrepreneurship as a critical and necessary development opportunity for South Africa's young people. I will highlight how social entrepreneurship is an important youth programming approach to enhance community resilience, reduce youth poverty and create an inclusive growth strategy.

Expresiones creativas colectivas, estructuración social y disfrute

El presente trabajo se inscribe en el marco del proyecto de investigación "Las manifestaciones expresivas creativas colectivas y disfrute" en la Universidad Nacional de Villa María. La indagación, se orienta a comprender las formas de sensibilidad, implicación afectiva y apropiación subjetivas de las experiencias creativas colectivas que se instancian en la ciudad de Villa María y Villa Nueva.

Se trata de una investigación en curso que se inscribe en el campo de los estudios sobre acción colectiva, teoría social (contemporánea) y la sociología de los cuerpos y las emociones. Particularmente, hay un interés por examinar las manifestaciones expresivas creativas colectivas y su relación con las prácticas intersticiales. A tal fin, se indaga el disfrute y el "más allá del disfrute" en los procesos que van por "dentro" y por "fuera" de los mecanismos de soportabilidad social y los dispositivos de regulación de las sensaciones.

El trabajo tiene la siguiente estructura argumentativa: en una primera instancia se establecen relaciones entre sensibilidad y experiencia creativa; a continuación se caracterizan algunas configuraciones teórico-metodológicas respecto a la trama colectiva de la manifestación expresiva y su relación con la estructuración social. Finalmente se presentan algunas dimensiones de los flujos del disfrute puestos en juego.

En los procesos antes mencionados, los disfrutes se relacionan con el carácter lúdico y festivo de la vida de las expresiones creativas. Los conflictos en esas interacciones dislocan y traman los modos como se visualiza el colectivo en su relación con el proceso de estructuración social.

Nanotechnology: Sociotechnical interactions and social impacts

This communication discusses the partial results in the field of sociological research to: Nanotechnologies applied to foods and biofuels, recognizing the essential elements for the development of indicators of risk and regulatory marks that protect health and the environment. Notice o4/CII - 2008 - Nanobiotechnology - CAPES. The analysis focuses on the study of social and cultural impacts resulting from new interactions arising from the socio-technical advances and promises of nanotechnology. The publicity of these advances and, especially, those promises has resulted in the development of expectations and beliefs even within the scope of the multifaceted social imaginary. The new steps of nanotechnology are introduced in the dimension of the fantastic and lead to continuous interpenetration between the findings and predictions in this field techno and the so-called science fiction. The same way that the promises of nanotechnology spark the creativity of fiction, many of the marvels envisioned by these are already part of our daily lives or are part of the promises taken for granted. The risks involved in nanotechnology range, then, among those assigned to the current developments, the promises given to the industry, those what can be apprehended through laboratory tests and the risks that agents attribute to it.

Diversité, justice et parité de participation

En France, les politiques concernant la diversité se développent, mais montrent leurs limites. En effet, la redistribution occupe une place dominante dans la conception de la justice sociale. Le débat sur la diversité a alors tendance à se polariser autour de deux conceptions. La première promeut la diversité, soit en gommant les différences au nom d'une notion neutre de compétence, soit en faisant de la différence un facteur de compétitivité dans une économie ouverte au monde. La seconde tend à ne voir la diversité que sous l'angle des inégalités qu'elle masque.

Nancy Fraser nous propose une conception de la justice sociale fondée sur deux dimensions complémentaires, la redistribution et la reconnaissance, associées à deux types d'injustices qui se combinent, l'injustice économique (marginalisation ou exclusion) et l'injustice de type symbolique (domination culturelle par imposition de stéréotypes sociaux). Elle nous permet de réinterpréter la reconnaissance en remplaçant l'identité par le statut de partenaire à part entière de l'interaction sociale. En quoi les initiatives prises au nom des politiques de diversité, contribuent-elles à diffuser une « norme de parité de participation ».

L'approche par cette norme renforce la compréhension des transformations du travail dans ses dimensions expressive, publique et politique ainsi qu'au travers des registres politiques de l'égalité et du « juste ». Elle répond aux questions de responsabilité et d'éthicité au cœur des organisations, de la participation à la discussion, de l'appartenance à la communauté de délibération et de la construction de capacités à l'argumentation. Enfin, elle contribue à une nouvelle problématisation de la notion d'espace public et de démocratie délibérative qui polarise les enjeux de justice sociale au sein de cet espace.

C'est sous ces différents aspects que les initiatives prises au titre des politiques de diversité peuvent alors être examinées.

Gendered exclusion from an unstable state: Guatemala's domestic worker movement

Women in Guatemala occupy precarious positions, navigating various institutions of civil society, the state, and the economy, all situated within a context of underlying political violence. Women navigate these public and private spheres differently, and indigenous women who perform labor in the homes of Ladinas for their livelihood face their own set of obstacles, such as verbal, emotional, and sexual abuse, lack of benefits, isolation, and discrimination. However, in the last five years, an "upsurge" in the labor movement is taking place in Guatemala as domestic workers organize for defined benefits, higher wages, a political voice, and economic justice.

Based on ethnography and interviews, I investigate the nature of this struggle for political legitimacy and claims to state-granted contractual rights as workers and women. Guatemala has suffered massive state violence throughout its history of colonization, bleeding into the recent civil wars of the late twentieth century, which disproportionately affected poor, indigenous populations. While acts of torture, terror, and assassinations of the desaparecidos were ubiquitous, military violence utilized a gendered component against indigenous women. Yet now Mayan domestic workers are organizing for democratic inclusion positing a new paradigm of rights recognition as women workers. However, violence continues in the contemporary Guatemalan context in a very public and chaotic way, targeting the general populace rather than those identified as espousing left-leaning ideologies or as guerilla sympathizers.

So then, how do Guatemalan domestic workers engage in the struggle for state recognition, and what does this struggle bring to light about relations between gender, politics, and the state in Latin America? My research aims to further understand this gendered context of chronic instability and violence and the ways in which [unstable] states and social movements negotiate with each other, and with what varied outcomes and consequences.

Ambiguous agreement around the "regulatory state": How the resolution of an academic controversy impacted on state-building in Chile

In Chile and elsewhere, economists are famous for how they acted as creators and later guardians of a neoliberal market economy. But if you flip that coin, their role in the kind of state-building that post-dictatorship governments have undertaken is also very important.

Our study analyzes a process that begins when economists from different generations and backgrounds gathered together around the concept of "regulatory state" in Chile. In the specific context of political transition, this concept becomes a political tool that can be envisioned as an "ambiguous agreement". In this sense, it first permitted the coexistence among policy-involved economists of different understandings of state intervention, until the most liberal side prevailed, with huge consequences on policy-making.

When the Concertation became government, the coalition faced very little state capacities in the markets that Chicago boys earlier created. As a consequence, their first move was to restore some of this power, trying to fill the vacuum of the ghost institutions the dictatorship had created. This process was led by economists who usually have already been politically active under Allende's UP government. Eventhough they had undergone a process of intellectual renewal after the democratic breakdown, they still shared an academic background favorable to some state intervention, as neo-structuralism would prescribe.

At the same time, new generations of economists, usually trained in the US, made their first step in Chilean politics and policy-making. Fed with the critic of rent-seeking bureaucrats, they were much less prone to state intervention, eventhough they shared the idea that it might sometimes be needed, in cases of clear market failures. This situation gave rise to an "ambiguous agreement" that would last until the symbolic victory of the more liberal ones, which would have a massive impact on the policies undertaken during the 2000s.

To be (or not to be) a market-organizer: Unpacking the Chilean neoliberal state

Numerous studies have explored how markets are created, allowing us to accumulate knowledge about how this process, a product of interaction between firms, state regulations and consumer choices, takes place. However, much less is known about why state interventions can vary from one market to another. Some would assume that it is inherent to the goods and services that circulate in specific markets. That would be the case in "natural monopoly", for example. However, as social scientists we know that the borders of these markets are unstable, as the subjects and objects of exchange are recast in new processes of enactment.

From a political science perspective, but inside the broader context of the sociology of markets, we look at the variation of state intervention – on quality and scope – in six "created" markets in Chile during the Concertation governments (1990-2010). In these markets "born" during the dictatorship, we observe strategies that are very different, in a range that goes from an almost complete "laissez faire" to a more complex "faire faire" (make do) or "faire avec" (do with). Even the most classical "faire" (do), that one would expect to disappear in an almost paradigmatic neoliberal case such as Chile, remains an option, and sometimes prevails.

Through a sectorial comparison, we will analyze the complex interactions of these strategies in the markets of telecoms, public transportation, electricity, health insurance, superior education and pensions. We will also advance some hypotheses about the causal mechanisms that might explain the combination of instruments and strategies that make up for different policy mixes. Eventhough macro comparison has some drawbacks in terms of depth of the study, it proves itself to be a powerful approach to emphasize the diversity in ties and connections that can link state institutions with the other actors in the market.

Social discrimination of religious minorities in Argentina. An exploratory study of religious discrimination applied on Jehovah's Witnesses

Institutionalized religious discrimination forms a matrix of meanings from which it is interpreted and re-signified all social practice. This horizon of meaning, almost invisible at the level of the formation and use of common sense, makes religious discrimination in a persistent and complex social phenomenon. The impairment in the enjoyment of certain fundamental freedoms, which is necessary to place religious freedom, it is particularly significant for religious minorities, who are more likely to be subjected to discriminatory social practices under their subordination against the existence of a confession or dominant religion.

For some religious communities is easier to be accepted by the social environment, at least in appearance. In the case of Jehovah's Witnesses, although it has legal recognition by the state, it is also true that the mass media convey a distorted view of their purposes and ways of life. On the other hand, discrimination of which are the subject of Jehovah's Witnesses need to be analyzed in political terms, in the broader context of the tension between the forms of linkage between the state and the various minorities who join the social tissue. Thus, the homogenization of the different identities and the formation of a "national being" to focus the diversity in unity, has been the strategy that the Argentine government has deployed since the time of its formation, assuming the trend of the French model of laïcité.

This document purposes to show some important aspects of religious discrimination applied to Jehovah's Witnesses into Argentine institutional order, so as to highlight the most important sociological aspects of this social fact.

Women imagining the ideal birth: Discourses of risk, femininity, and morality

In modernity, women make childbirth choices in a contested discourse of natural versus surgical birth, maternal selfishness versus increasingly intensive and idealized mothering, and the juxtaposition of fetal versus maternal risks. A component of this contested discourse is to be found in the research itself; at one end of this continuum are medical concerns that women are driving the machine of childbirth choices, and are moving perhaps too quickly into consumer/patient-driven 'choices', particularly befitting elective C-sections. At the other end, some feminists and critical social scientists and most alternative health providers argue that women are being oppressed by the overmedicalization of childbirth and must reassert their role as natural mothers whose non-surgical choices are best for mother, and more stridently, for baby.

This paper takes a critical feminist perspective to examine how women's choices unfold within existing discourses about modern, western femininity and womanhood. I examine the narratives of young women and pregnant women about their expectations and understanding of what is, to them, an ideal childbirth so as to expose the tensions women who are choosing may encounter between various discourses of femininity, responsibility, and moral motherhood. I argue that the tensions women navigate are polarized between ideas about sexualized youth and nurturant adulthood, purity and fecundity, innocence and the messiness of birth/sex, and responsibility and selfishness. Thus, women's 'choices' are more complicated than simple questions of managing risk or danger.

The impact of social assistance transfers on chronic and transitory poverty in Chile: 2001-2006

While the studies generally measure the impact of government programs on poverty by comparing pre-transfer and post-transfer poverty, most previous studies of social policy and poverty in developing countries have neglected the indirect effects of government programs on poverty persistence over time that may operate through the labor supply or productive investment. A domain of the welfare state that is particularly inclined to produce this type of impacts is social assistance. In this study, I attempt to fill in this gap and examine the indirect impacts of benefits in cash provided by social assistance on chronic and transitory poverty in Chile. In spite of low generosity of benefits, I argue that Chilean social assistance transfers have a positive impact on chronic poverty, insofar as this type of benefits is associated with incentives to work in the informal sector. In contrast with this poverty status over time, I expect that social assistance transfers do not affect transitory poverty. The hypothesis for chronic poverty finds support in an empirical test carried out on a sample of working-age individuals taken from the Chilean Household Panel (Encuesta Panel CASEN) for 2001 and 2006. However, the expected effect for transitory poverty is rejected. Overall, the findings of this study indicate the emergence of undesired consequences of government programs and provide information that would likely improve the design of social assistance benefits in Chile and in other developing countries.

Migraciones y religión. Entre lo transnacional y lo local

Las articulaciones posibles entre el amplio mundo de lo religioso y los fenómenos sociales vinculados a las migraciones son extensas y tan variadas como casos posibles. Sin embargo, en esta presentación plantearemos la existencia de algunas características estructurales que hacen del discurso religioso una dimensión propicia para operar como elemento clave de tácticas identitarias entre quienes se "movilizan". Específicamente, el discurso católico propone para los migrantes latinoamericanos en Argentina, una matriz desde la cual reterritorializarse sin grandes tensiones.

En un nivel institucional, las organizaciones religiosas constituyen un elemento central del entramado de actores involucrados en la lucha por el reconocimiento de los y las migrantes como sujetos/as de derechos más allá de su membresía a un Estado nacional. Las Iglesias se definen como representantes de los/as sujetos móviles, cuya presencia y necesidad desafía los límites de las ciudadanías ofrecidas por las sociedades nacionales. En la primer parte de esta ponencia se explorará el rol de las organizaciones religiosas en la persecución de los derechos de los y las migrantes en la Argentina.

Asimismo, son los/as propios/as migrantes quienes a partir de sus prácticas utilizan / expresan el potencial transnacional del discurso religioso en, por lo menos, dos direcciones: como elemento central en la constitución de sociabilidades migrantes desterritorializadas (por ejemplo, las festividades de santos y vírgenes) pero también como prácticas orientadas a las sociedades locales: una forma de anclar su presencia en el territorio, de visibilizar su presencia por fuera del mercado de trabajo y, para el caso de Argentina, de demostrar semejanzas con los/as nativos/as. En la segunda parte de esta presentación serán analizadas estas dinámicas a partir de los resultados de una investigación desarrollada entre los/as bolivianos/as residentes en la ciudad de Ushuaia que celebran anualmente la festividad de la Virgen de Urkupiña.

Cultural models of bodily images of women teachers

Bodily images of teachers reflect what is socially acceptable according to cultural models, which are "images or storylines or descriptions" based on a sociocultural group's "taken-for-granted assumptions about what is 'typical' or 'normal'" (Gee 1999: 59). Cultural models associated with schools, as institutions that uphold social values, are particularly useful in examining a society's standards.

Two participants, Erin and Gabbie (pseudonyms), shared stories about their tattoos that reflected their personal lives. In a society where women might feel a level of social control over their bodies, tattoos can be personal expressions that highlight "power relations that surround the body" (Pitts 2003: 57). The cultural model of teacher image in the U.S. (i.e., a conservatively dressed and coiffed female) does not include tattoos, because culturally and historically in the U.S., tattoos are a mode of resistance (Pitts 2003); therefore, Erin and Gabbie deviated from the cultural model. According to discourse analysis of the participants' stories, each teacher's students did not interpret these deviations in the same ways.

Erin's students from a conservative community saw her tattoos as evidence she was not the type of "teacher that they shove in the closet every night and take the battery out of." Erin resisted the cultural model to be a different kind of teacher. Periodically though, she met backlash from the school community. Gabbie's tattoo was also a break from the iconic image of teacher, but students did not interpret it as a sign that she was less than ideal but a different kind of quality teacher. Within the context of her boarding school campus where personal mixed with professional, Gabbie's departure from the cultural model was acceptable. With both participants, the combination of setting, community expectations, and cultural model affected how the teachers' tattoos were socially regarded.

The travelling adventures of urban theory. A view from outside the core

The paper summarizes arguments, developed in two forthcoming publications, about the importance of context in making sense of urban social processes like segregation and gentrification. It focuses especially on tensions arising from the fact that concepts and theories used in most empirical research around the world are generated in different contexts and are bundled with their own contextual attachments, in ways that are usually implicit, allowing for their –often unwarranted– claim to universal validity. It also stresses the non-randomness in the geographical patterning of concept and theory generation, which follows and reproduces the hierarchies in the academic division of labour. The main part of the paper is a rather autobiographic illustration of working with borrowed concepts and theories and of the ways their contradictory input (at the same time enabling and mystifying the understanding of local processes) can be handled in a productive way.

Modificaciones en la gobernanza internacional del sistema financiero internacional

La Gran Recesión (GR) y las políticas para enfrentarla no resultaron, contra lo esperado por muchos, en el aumento del proteccionismo comercial y financiero, ni en el retroceso de la coordinación internacional, ni en la adopción de políticas de empobrecimiento del vecino. Se impuso en la comunidad internacional la idea de enfrentar la GR fortaleciendo la gobernanza internacional de la economía mundial, lo que distingue la GR de la Gran Depresión en la que la cooperación internacional colapsó.

El G20 se impuso como la institución de coordinación de políticas en los ámbitos macroeconómicos, financiero y comercial, sin desplazar a las organizaciones internacionales formales competentes. Por el contrario, impulsó acciones para fortalecerlas, con éxito diverso. En materia comercial, la GR paralizó las negociaciones de la Ronda Doha de la OMC. En materia de política macroeconómica se afirmaron compromisos de compatibilización y se fortalecieron el FMI y el BM. Donde más parece haberse desarrollado la gobernanza internacional ha sido en materia financiera. El Consejo de Estabilidad Financiera (CEF) pasó a desempeñar un papel clave en la coordinación de la regulación y supervisión de los sistemas financieros nacionales, y en la coordinación de los cuerpos de definición de estándares con el objetivo de formular estándares de alto nivel como instrumento de prevención de las imperfecciones de los mercados, agentes y productos financieros, bancarios y no bancarios. Aumentó la cooperación del CEF y el Banco de Pagos Internacionales y el FMI en el ámbito financiero.

Primero expondré la transformación de la gobernanza internacional, en particular en materia financiera. Después haré una evaluación de los criterios de política y reformas definidos internacionalmente y de los calendarios de metas establecidos. Finalmente examinaré los límites de estas propuestas para resolver los problemas del ámbito financiero en los que radica parte de la explicación de la GR.

Different styles in managing risks in the world of work: A comparative study of occupational careers in Latin America

Introduction:

The comparison of risk perceptions and responses to labor insecurity is central to contemporary debates on social risk, taking into account different institutional and cultural influences shaping answers. In this context, the main interest is to analyse labour markets' insecurities and its ramifications for social uncertainty from the study of cumulative labor risks over the life course.

Objectives:

The presentation aims to link contemporary debates in sociology of risk and contingency with experiences from Latin America labor markets. The purpose is to examine how domestic institutions filter job insecurities.

Central hypothesis is that the impact of labor insecurity on life course is experimented differently in Mexico and Argentina, due to institutional and path dependence culture differences. Welfare regimes, works organizations, families systems and workers trajectories modulated the force of labor insecurity on life course and on the kind of responses to risk in everyday life.

Methods:

The paper takes a national comparative perspective, comparing how similar hazards (eg. Unemployment) are responded to in different societies (Mexico and Argentina). The principal method of analysis is life course perspective and qualitative cohort analysis to find differences over the time in each selected context.

Since a methodological point of view we also ask how we might compare responses and establish whether we can identify a national type of response to risks (due to the enormous internal heterogeneity).

Results:

Job insecurity and everyday risk management in work's world are experienced in particular ways and have a specific meaning in different socio-cultural and institutional contexts, also depending on life course stage and others social determinants (gender, social class, etc.) of workers biography.

Conclusion:

Social resilience and individualization processes to response to risks at local labor markets have different and particular significance in Latin America, which could make further contributions to advance theorizing.

The United States and European Union democracy promotion: From Euro-Mediterranean partnership to uprisings in north of Africa and Middle East (2011)

The spread of democratic values in the international system (IS) is a constituent of the foreign policies of both US and the European Union (EU). The US promotion of democracy has a greater historical existence (early twentieth century) while held by the EU starting in the year 1990. However, the promotion of democracy by the US cannot be disassociated from its hegemony, especially after the Second World War landmark that reflects their position as the leading capitalist bloc. Remember that international organizations created in the post-1945 - as the United Nations and the Bretton Woods - are institutionalization of a power structure in which the US held a prominent role, culminating in its hegemonic status. In neogramscian perspective, the hegemony of state in the international system is based on three elements: material power (economic), the creation of international organizations in the IS and the promotion of ideas (ideology). The literature, however, lacks a consensus on the US hegemonic position in post-Cold War world. At the same time, Europe is in the final moment of his integrative process of its transformation into the EU through the Treaty of Maastricht in 1992. However, the promotion of democracy the EU starts within its enlargement policy for candidate countries joining the bloc. In 1995, the EU creates the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership (EMP) that was configured as promoting democracy in countries of North Africa and the Middle East (MENA). Therefore a comparative analysis of democracy promotion by the EU since the creation of the EMP (1995) until 2011 with the US promotion, in that same historical period would allow the characterization of the power polarization in the IS, since democracy is political idea and can be defined as one of the vital elements for the status of a hegemonic state, according to the theoretical framework used.

Polifonías urbanas. Complejización de las formas ejercicio de la política territorial en el marco de la instalación de los movimientos de trabajadores desocupados (GBA- Argentina)

Este trabajo se propone describir las modalidades de representación de la política territorial a partir de un estudio de caso realizado en un municipio del Gran Buenos Aires.

Los objetivos principales de esta ponencia son: 1. Interpelados por un contexto que fuera definido por diversos analistas como un proceso de "repolitización extendida" nos proponemos explorar los sentidos que asume la acción política para los habitantes de las periferias populares del GBA. 2. Insertos en un estudio sobre el legado de los procesos contenciosos que caracterizaron la última década en nuestro país queremos rastrear las modalidades de participación política realizadas por los vecinos, enfocando especialmente el sentido que promovió tales acciones y las evaluaciones que emergen en torno a la participación en procesos de la acción colectiva. 3. Por último, atentos a una complejización de las modalidades de "mediación" política, se esperan describir las formas en que los habitantes de este territorio se representan la acción política en el barrio, enfocando tanto los nudos de continuidad como las divergencias que estos sujetos manifiestan entre las modalidades de ejercicio político de las instituciones clásicas y los movimientos sociales insertos en el barrio. Este trabajo tiene asiento en el municipio de Esteban Echeverría, éste se encuentra situado en el sudoeste del conurbano bonaerense. Las fuentes en que se basa son, por un lado, un conjunto de registros observacionales y de notas de campo realizadas en el barrio, como así también, una serie de entrevistas a miembros de movimientos de trabajadores desocupados y una sucesión de entrevistas realizadas a habitantes de ese territorio.

Back to the future: Murals and conflict transformation in Northern Ireland

Murals not only can present imagined futures to reference publics, they also can embody transformative social change by reframing collective identities. The paper provides both quantitative and qualitative analyses of the recent, rapid changes in murals in West Belfast, Northern Ireland. The study highlights several ways that murals can promote imagined futures by reshaping the visual symbolic landscape, including amplification and suppression of different facets of existing symbolic repertoires, appropriation of elements of external repertoires, innovation, alteration of territorial and/or identity boundaries, articulation, historicization, and mobilization. In many instances, mural makers sought to improve community relations by linking the future with an imagined past, including an imagined shared past. Mural making involves collective processes of envisioning, collaboration, resistance, consultation, negotiation, and the channeling of resources. In this sense, these efforts provide a microcosm of the peace process in Northern Ireland—dynamic, contested, multifaceted, and constantly re-imagined.

The relation of unhappiness and life-dissatisfaction to poverty and hunger in the Philippines over time

In the Philippines, the non-stock, non-profit institute Social Weather Stations (www.sws.org.ph) has conducted and publicly reported many statistically-representative national surveys of social, economic and political well-being. Each survey includes economic deprivation, as measured by self-rated poverty (quarterly since 1992) and involuntary hunger (quarterly since 1998), since eradicating poverty and hunger are universally recognized as national goals. Since 1985, families that self-rate as poor have ranged between 74 percent and 43 percent. The self-rating scale includes "not poor", "border-line" and "poor". Since 1998, those that experienced involuntary hunger (at least once in the past three months) have ranged between 23.7 percent and 5.1 percent. Involuntary hunger may be either "moderate" (occurring only once or a few times) or "severe" (occurring often or always).

The SWS surveys also have data on suffering, derivable from items on (a) happiness with life, in 20 rounds over 1991-2011, and (b) life-satisfaction, in 16 rounds over 2002-2011, both items using four-point answer scales. These are irregular items, since not specifically targeted by government. In the data-series, those not very or not at all happy have ranged between 8 and 24 percent, and those not very or not at all satisfied with life have ranged between 16 percent and 40 percent. Cross-sectional examination of recent surveys indicates a close relation of the incidence of suffering to hunger, and a lesser yet significant relation of the same to self-rated poverty, thus implying social accountability for some part of suffering. For this paper, the authors will examine the Philippine time-series on suffering and economic deprivation, and report the findings.

Social mobilization in the Arab world and democratization

The so called Arab Spring produced a new political scenario where traditional parties mixed with new associations that fought together to expel the ancient regimes governing Arab countries. The use of new technologies in most Arab countries meant that youth managed to break through well established hierarchies that used to block any attempt from civil society to claim rights such as freedom of expression, citizen rights and basic economic demands. However, the irony behind the Arab mobilization is that although civil society burst out at first with enthusiasm and anger, trying through collective action, to get rid of presidents that had long before lost legitimacy, the aftermath of protests faced them with a dilemma. Democratically celebrated elections in Tunis and Egypt ended up with victory on the side of conservative Islamic groups that still hesitate between announcing their true ideology, at times very distant from democratic values from a Western perspective- and manipulating the press as not to appear too radical and intolerant. The Islamist trend sweeping across the MENA region is rising doubts, especially in the West. Sunni Orthodox groups, whether in Morocco or Tunis, have to prove their readiness to accept modernity and adjust not just their rhetoric but also their political policies, to issues perceived as controversial in Western countries. Mainly; respect of human rights, including those of religious minorities, gender issues and more specifically women rights. Hence, the current wave of new parties and politicians with a Hanbali background points to a progressive process of "saudization" of politics in the Arab world where Wahabbi ideals are gaining momentum and followers. There is growing concern about how parties clinging to Sharia law will achieve justice and economic progress without sacrificing individual freedom and rights in the name of God.

Fiscal imbalances, electoral competition and popular contention: The politics of subnational workfare spending in Argentina, 2003-2009

This paper examines the determinants of workfare programs spending among the twenty-four Argentine provinces from 2003 to 2009. After the 2001 economic crisis, unemployment became the major political challenge for both national and subnational policy-makers in the country. In the following years, the Argentine federal government rapidly increased public expenditures in cash transfers targeted to the unemployed and informal workers, in order to provide temporary social protection to labor-market outsiders. Spending in workfare programs at the subnational level, however, varied widely: while some provinces considerably increased social funds in these programs, some others did it in a more nuanced or limited way.

By taking advantage of the literature on federalism and social policy, on the one hand, and conditional cash transfers in Latin America, on the other hand, this article aims to explore variables at the subnational level that have been useful in explaining varying spending patterns across national cases. In accordance with these literatures, this paper demonstrates that larger fiscal transfers from the federal government, greater electoral competition, and higher levels of protest and social movements' activity lead to increasing spending in provincial workfare programs. In contrast, higher redistribution of national employment programs to the provinces disincentivizes spending efforts in subnational social policies, leading to decreasing workfare expenditures.

In short, in a decade marked by a sharp spread of conditional cash transfers throughout the Latin American region, this study attempts to demonstrate how the institutional, political and socioeconomic attributes of a federation's subnational units might shape social policy outcomes in periods of welfare expansion.

Altruism as a professional ideology of Russian medical practitioners

Professional altruism, taken as a social good at which the professional expertise is directed, was seen as an important characteristic of professionals by social researchers writing from various theoretical perspectives. Functionalist and trait writers saw professions as ethically positive embodiments of the 'central values' of the society. Critics felt that this approach reflected too closely the ideological image which professionals tried to convey of their own work. In our research, in accordance with neo-Weberian critiques, we have not denied the importance of the professional ideology of altruism, arguing that some of medical practitioners' actions may be self-enhancement, but the reverse side of the coin is still a service for their patients or clients. In the recent desk and qualitative research of Russian orthodox practitioners, the professional ideology was interpreted as a significant professional characteristic. The research picked up the discrepancy between the sense of reduced circumstances of medical practitioners and their rather positive estimations of the professional side of things. Medical practitioners proclaimed a greater commitment to 'doing good work' than to economic gain, and to quality rather than efficiency. Although a proclaimed ideology should not be mistaken for reality, it is worth noting that Russian doctors wish to be seen as supporting a professional ideology of altruism. The status of medicine as a career choice was also still significant to the respondents. Members of the profession were not willing to leave an occupation, and were likely to assert that they would choose the same work if they were to begin again.

La moda por la civilización en Argentina y contra los Argentinos

Nobert Elias establece la distinción conflictiva entre "civilización" y "cultura". Este debate ocurrió, con mucho ahínco y conflicto, en Argentina durante el siglo XIX. Alberdi oscila básicamente entre escritos en que, tal cual a los liberales, pensaba la necesidad de excluir a los nativos de la tierra y en otros escritos en que aceptaba la posibilidad de mantenerlos en el proyecto de nación argentina. La conversión de las malas costumbres en buenas es la posibilidad de conversión de la tiranía en democracia. La moda, proyecto de Alberdi, fue la primera publicación de la Asociación de Mayo. Hay cierta dificultad de la historiografía en entender el significado de esta revista: parece demasiado superficial para ser llevada en serio por historiadores como Antonio Zinny, Vicente Quesada y Nicolás Shumway. En tanto, la revista fue una cruzada civilizatoria sobre la cultura local; ésta, usada como instrumento de legitimación de federales caudillos. Se trata de dos tipos de construcción nacionalista que, en la Argentina del siglo XIX, van a enfrentarse siempre con el objetivo de eliminar el otro del proyecto y todos sus signos del territorio argentino. La investidura en las buenas costumbres fue un intento de civilizar la Argentina (a la manera descrita por Elias) en nombre de un estilo de nacionalismo que suprimía determinados actores sociales. Opuestamente a eso, había otro nacionalismo, que acusaba a los liberales civilizatorios de "poco nacionalista". Hubo una lucha en la cual todos se pretendían el portavoz legítimo del nacionalismo. Falta todavía entender el papel de La moda en el complejo pensamiento de Alberdi como herramienta del proyecto nacionalista civilizatorio que asoció la cultura a la idea de barbarie, pues fue la herramienta de la tiranía.

Desentrañando las características de un emergente estado post-neoliberal en Argentina: Representaciones del gobierno nacional de los ajustes estructurales solicitados por el FMI en el canje de la deuda externa 2003-2005

Resumen: (285 palabras) desde la crisis financiera global de los años 80, el Fondo Monetario Internacional (FMI) adquirió el carácter de "coordinador" de los procesos de negociación de la deuda externa entre los acreedores y los gobiernos fuertemente endeudados. A estos últimos, se les exigía como requisito sine qua nom para recibir el soporte técnico-financiero de los agentes del mercado internacional de capitales la firma de un acuerdo previo con esta institución. Estos acuerdos se convirtieron en la principal puerta de entrada del neoliberalismo a Latinoamérica desde el momento en que en ellos se delineaban un set de políticas que las autoridades nacionales debían cumplir para escapar del default. Si bien el contenido de estos acuerdos varió a través del tiempo, todos ellos giraron -y aún hoy lo hacen- en torno a un elemento común: "el ajuste del gasto público".

Argentina se convirtió en el 2005, y luego de dos años de intensas tratativas, en el primer país del planeta en lograr un canje relativamente exitoso de su deuda externa en default sin el soporte del FMI y en oposición a muchas de sus prescripciones de política económica.

Este artículo tiene como objetivo presentar e interpretar las representaciones discursivas que el gobierno del presidente Kirchner efectuó durante el canje de los ajustes del gasto público exigidos al país por el FMI. A estos efectos selecciona del corpus de datos recabado -compuesto por aproximadamente 400 artículos del diario Clarín referidos al canje- una muestra pertinente que es estudiada a partir de herramientas teóricas-metodológicas propias del análisis del discurso; en particular de aquellas propuestas por Eliseo Verón. El artículo parte de presuponer que a partir de este análisis se pueden inferir características distintivas de un emergente Estado post-neoliberal en Argentina.

The gentrification of sensibilities: Politics and aesthetics in a NYC changing neighborhood

Park Slope's historic character accounts for a strong measure of its lasting appeal. Replete with row houses and brownstones, the neighborhood is distinguished for being the largest landmark district in Brooklyn, and enjoys quiet, tree-lined streets with wide architectural variety. Progressive yuppies and establishment lesbians have long ruled the classy section of the Slope, in particular the "name" streets between 7th Ave and Prospect Park. These days the action is happening all along 5th Ave. and in the so-called "South End" of the Slope, where young people are fleeing Manhattan rents and setting up shop along the F train. Fifth Ave. rivals Williamsburg as the hottest section of Brooklyn, with great spots like rock club Southpaw and incredible restaurants like Al di La and Cucina. With its obvious local charm and intimate feel, this close-knit neighborhood has become an enclave for families and is rich in resources for children of all ages.

Given this background, this paper aims to address the issue of neighborhood changes and renewal through a specific interpretation key: the nature of the gentrification aesthetics in relation to economic and cultural capital. The interrelations between taste and design sensibilities in a gentrifying neighborhood "has always been symptomatic of a new middle class that is so aesthetically self-reflexive" (Bridge G. 2005:117).

I will examine how the very nature of gentrification practices, in these accounts, remains irredeemably bourgeois both in the structure and sensibilities (codes of legitimacy, eating out at restaurants and other aesthetics displays of cultured consumption in housing and leisure). Most importantly, this case demonstrates that discourses about aesthetics in gentrifying neighborhoods are related to forms of re-presentation and perception, which are essentially political.

Participación y justicia social en la política agroalimentaria y agro-industrial de Argentina

Esta ponencia analiza la incidencia y la participación de los agentes económicos y actores sociales involucrados en el Plan Estratégico Agroalimentario en Argentina. Este plan estratégico presenta la ventaja de permitirnos identificar los grupos de interés que pretenden, mediante la instrumentalización de diversas políticas públicas sectoriales pasadas y recientes, aumentar su peso y rentabilidad económica en detrimento del interés general. Reflexionamos sobre las razones e intereses que están detrás de los posicionamientos frente a los modelos existentes, que siguen una secuencia en la que en un extremo se encuentra el modelo de primarización de la economía basado en la renta sojera, la exportación de commodities y la implantación de monocultivos de especies transgénicas, o con tecnologías de insumos, capital-intensivas. En el otro extremo, se encuentra el modelo de agricultura familiar, basado en producciones diversificadas, con mayor predominio de tecnologías de procesos, vinculado a mercados de proximidad y con predominio de mano de obra familiar. Nos preguntamos por la razón y el sentido del Plan Estratégico Agroalimentario, es decir, en qué teoría de desarrollo se inscribe y, por ende, para qué o para quiénes está diseñado. También planteamos si este nuevo plan agroalimentario producirá un cambio significativo no sólo en factores técnico-productivos, sino también en términos de justicia social y democratización del sector. El problema de fondo no es otro que el de la soberanía alimentaria, que alude al derecho de los pueblos a decidir qué se produce y cómo y, en definitiva, quiénes producen y para quién.

The heroin scenes in Paris and Amsterdam in the 1980s: Instinctive emotions and sensory geography of the city

In the 1980's, many Western cities were confronted by the apparition of heroin scenes that is, gatherings of drug addicts in public spaces such as streets or indoors spaces like squats in abandoned buildings, used as transactions places or shooting galleries. It caused directly crime issues (illegal economy of drugs dealing, violence around the place) and health issues (hygiene problems, overdoses, spread of contagious diseases such as AIDS), in the frame of virulent public debates. Drug places were exposed in the media as true "spreading urban cancers" in downtowns in Amsterdam (the Zeedijk street) or in Paris (the famous Ilot Châlon squat).

Urban heroin scenes bring to light several historical and sociological issues. First, designated as "areas of vice" by citizens or local authorities, they contributed to create stigmatized spaces of social exclusion. These feelings of disgust or fear, coupled with the vision of degradation (slums, used needles), highlight the role of instinctive emotions in a sensory approach of the contemporary urban crisis. Secondly, the urban sensitive geography is also redefined from the junkies point of view, experiencing the city as an area of suffering in his search for drugs and heroin scenes as sorts of refuges separated from the ordinary urban life. Finally, heroin scenes were also the sources of new underground subcultures and memories which sometimes survived in the collective memory after the closure of drug scenes.

In both French and Dutch study cases, the paper is based on archival data extracted from newspapers, associative grass-root movements of care and help, municipal or national health policies agencies as these heroin scenes were targeted by a series of local policies, to restore public order by police task forces interventions and to provide with health care at a street corner level through methadone programs for example.

El uso social del derecho y la garantía de protección a los pueblos indígenas en Brasil

El presente artículo tiene como objetivo demostrar que la protección de los derechos humanos, en especial de los pueblos indígenas, en Brasil, independiente de su naturaleza interna o internacional, sigue una lógica de relativa aplicabilidad definida por la contingencia del caso particular y según un patrón determinado por la cultura dominante del Estado. Siguiendo el abordaje de Pierre Bourdieu, ese sentido de mundo se encuentra reflejado en instrumentos jurídicos normativos y en decisiones judiciales, como en los casos de las licencias ambientales de las Usinas Hidroeléctricas de Santo Antonio/Jirau y Belo Monte, que insisten en alejarse de la aplicación inmediata de norma benéfica, contenida en la Constitución Federal y en la Convención de la OIT n169, sobre el derecho a la "consulta previa" de los pueblos indígenas afectados.

Neo-organicismo y dispositivos inmunitarios en las dinámicas empresariales contemporáneas

Los estudios realizados por los autores en torno a las prácticas del new management señalan cierta revitalización del paradigma organicista en los escenarios y discursos empresariales contemporáneos. La presente ponencia se propone profundizar esta línea de indagación mediante un análisis de las apropiaciones que específicos discursos manageriales realizan de la metáfora organicista.

La metodología propuesta identifica y desmonta los tópicos y modelos explicativos provenientes de las ciencias biológicas que se actualizan en las intertextualidades del new management y las tensa con las prácticas discursivas de los altos cuadros empresariales.

El análisis revela que la emergencia del giro neo-organicista en el marco de las prácticas discursivas del new management se presenta como una tecnología de gestión/racionalización que las organizaciones empresariales contemporáneas implementan para desempeñarse en escenarios económicos signados por la incertidumbre.

En esta renovación terminológica (riesgo, enfermedad, homeostasis, patología) el concepto de inmunización cobra relevancia, el cual delimita específicos parámetros de funcionalidad y disfuncionalidad en la gestión de la vida económica.

En consecuencia, también nos proponemos mediante esta comunicación establecer relaciones y categorías que posibiliten asir las reconfiguraciones económicas del poder en torno a la consolidación del paradigma inmunitario y las lógicas emergentes de gubernamentalidad biopolítica.

Implementation of cash transfer programs: The role of street-level bureaucrats

Conditional cash transfer programs entered the Brazilian political agenda in the 1990s and since then have propagated in the three spheres of government. With the creation of the national program Bolsa Família (BF), in 2003, concerned states and municipalities that already had similar initiatives could be connected to the federal program in at least two ways: integration of programs with the increase of benefit and coverage and/or offering complementary activities to beneficiary families.

The objective of this paper is to analyze how programs of different levels of government are articulated at the local level, that is, to identify in practice if there are and what are the possibilities of interaction between local cash transfer programs and BF and how they may affect the way these policies reach the citizen. Besides BF, other two family directed programs that exist in São Paulo city and are implemented by the local government are analyzed: Renda Mínima, municipal, established in 2001, and Renda Cidadã, from the state government, in force since 2002. Despite sharing goals and strategies, these three policies have variations, especially in per capita income cut-offs and the value of benefits. In addition, today, opposing parties are the decision makers of each one of them.

Because the street-level bureaucrats are the agents responsible for ensuring that these three essentially competitive policies reach the citizen and, regardless of institutional partnerships, can articulate them in their own way, it is essential to examine carefully the moment of the implementation of these programs. The field research found that these bureaucrats take advantage of the small space of decision that remain available to them and use not only institutional rules but their local and private expertise to implement the programs, providing them with a very reasonable "integrated" format unforeseen by policymakers and local managers.

Modernismo hidráulico y conciencia práctica en las tierras bajas tabasqueñas

Este trabajo es un análisis de la instrumentación de las políticas de desarrollo que se emprendieron desde mediados del siglo XX sobre las tierras bajas de Tabasco, México. Nuestro estudio explora las diversas coyunturas que crearon las condiciones de posibilidad para la emergencia del "modernismo hidráulico", entedido aquí como el conjunto de saberes, técnicas y estructuras de pensamiento que fueron incorporados por el Estado mexicano para cumplir con los principios básicos de bienestar y seguridad. Para ello, hacemos uso de material inédito como los informes técnicos de los ingenieros que planearon los proyectos hidráulicos, correspondencia oficial con el gobierno y levantamientos de campo de las brigadas técnicas.

Una segunda parte del estudio, documenta los "efectos inesperados" de este modelo de desarrollo basado en el modernismo hidráulico, poniendo énfasis en las estrategias adaptativas de la gente que habita las tierras bajas, su capacidad de agencia y conciencia práctica dentro de estos esquemas de simplificación territorial y modelos de ingeniería social del espacio.

Defying the Saudi state: Women's tactics

The Gulf area and particularly Saudi Arabia represents the resilience of authoritarian monarchies. Despite the continuous debates, petitions, and even demonstrations, the governments seem to resist the Arab spring contagion. During the last decade some women in Saudi Arabia have become more public in their demands, interacting with some other oppositionist groups, but at the same time, keeping themselves autonomous and with a public presence in the national debate on the relationship between the ruler and the ruled. Through their actions, voice and presence some Saudi women challenged the homogenous representation of women held by government and society, obtaining some "concessions". With the demonstrations occurring in the wider arena of the Middle East, Saudi society was not immune to the contagion and particularly women. Regardless the lack of tradition on public demonstrations in the kingdom and tight security control some women defied the order to continue to ask for changes. This paper aims to elucidate if there are some new elements either in the demands and tactics used by some women in Saudi Arabia, and at the same time, to think in terms of the possibilities and limitations of changing Saudi women's role in society. Therefore, the first part of the paper will look at the structural elements that shape men and women's role in the kingdom, and at that same time, partly explain the endurance of Saudi monarchy. The second part will analyse the features of the agency on women, assessing their tactics and contents to see if there are some changes in their society role and as political members and finally.

La production des frontières symboliques entre les « pauvres » à partir d'un programme de transfert de revenu au Brésil

La grande majorité de la littérature en sciences sociales sur les politiques sociales suit une analyse d'impact-objectif du programme sur la population d'allocation de référence. Cette analyse sous-entend que ces travaux ont pour but de mesurer le degré de proximité ou de distance entre les résultats obtenus et les objectifs initiaux du programme. Par conséquent, la problématique est que ces travaux n'évaluent pas le décalage entre les normes institutionnelles et les pratiques sociales. Notre recherche souhaite porter un autre regard, ce qui nous intéresse est d'analyser comment (et à partir de quels registres) les politiques pour combattre la pauvreté peuvent créer des frontières symboliques et morales, reconfigurant différents statuts (notamment par genre) entre individus et groupes. En particulier, nous aborderons le « Programme Bourse Famille », mis en oeuvre au Brésil en 2003, en le comparant (à travers des données secondaires) avec l'ancien programme du Revenu Minimum d'Insertion, actuellement renommé Revenu de Solidarité Actives français. Dans un premier temps, nous montrerons comment la politique de distribution de revenu peut produire certains paramètres de différenciation sociale entre les « pauvres ». Ensuite, nous analyserons comment se construit (formellement et informellement) un stigma autour de la figure de l'allocataire en produisant en ultime instance un processus de déclassification sociale. Dans un dernier temps, nous chercherons à déterminer les valeurs auxquelles les allocataires adhèrent pour justifier de leur insertion dans le Programme. Est-il basé sur les notions de justice? Du droit social? D'aide humanitaire? Du mérite? Du paternalisme? Pour cela, nous avons réalisé une observation participante pendant deux mois puis, nous avons mené 60 entretiens approfondis avec les «pauvres»: allocataires et les non-allocataires (et aussi avec les enseignants et professionnels de la santé et de la assistance sociale) dans une périphérie de Rio de Janeiro au Brésil.

Dilemmas of environmental NGOs in Cameroon

This paper examines challenges facing Cameroonian environmental NGOs in meeting their objectives. Based on theories of civil society, open systems models of organizations, and existing literature about Cameroon and its NGOs, we identified five key challenges facing these organizations: raising adequate funds to sustain programming, employing and retaining technically qualified staff, attracting volunteers, developing mutually supportive relationships with government, and cooperating with other environmental NGOs. Interviews with leaders of 52 NGOs in five ecologically, politically, and economically diverse regions revealed that the first two challenges were the most serious. Focusing on them, we identify three main types of environmental NGOs: a) relatively well funded international NGOs with operations in Cameroon and highly professionalized staffs and models of operation; b) Cameroonian NGOs that are successful in obtaining substantial funding from international sources and able to employ the experts required to maintain required budget records and undertake elaborate, scientifically-based projects; c) Cameroonian NGOs that lack sufficient funding and expertise to write proposals and conduct projects that attract international funding and are therefore forced to rely on very small amounts of funds raised locally and conduct operations on a limited scale. This situation results both from the operating procedures of international funders and from structural characteristics of Cameroonian society that make domestic fundraising difficult. The latter include a government with relatively scant resources and a history of corruption, a relatively small upper middle class, and technical obstacles to raising funds by mail or telephone. Under these circumstances NGOs in the third category must rely on small projects, especially in the area of public education, funded by small donations from supporters or small subcontracts from the first two types of organizations. Increasing the competitiveness of Cameroonian NGOs for foreign funds and developing more effective models of domestic fundraising are thus key challenges facing the sector.

Little research has been conducted on trends in disability among older people in developing countries. Because many developing countries have recently reached the stage in their epidemiological transition where western countries were in the 1970's and early 1980's, it has been suggested that they are currently experiencing increases in old age disability accompanying rapidly aging populations as did many western countries at that time. Support for this hypothesis was found in four of five Asian settings (Beijing, Indonesia, Philippines, and Taiwan) but not in Singapore, which is a developed country by most indicators (Ofstedal et al, 2007). Two other studies on Taiwan (Zimmer et al, 2002; Martin et al, 2011) found increases in the prevalence of physical function difficulties in the 1990's with the latter of these studies finding no changes since 1999, which is relatively good news given increased survival. China may be an exception to the general trends in that improvements in overall health and disability were found from 1992 to 2002 (Gu, 2009) but questions on the quality of the data have been raised. Data from Latin America are virtually non-existent with the majority perspective being that the rapid aging of the population has been accompanied by increases in poor health and disability in old age (Palloni et al, 2006). Some recent evidence suggests increases in disability in Mexico as well as among Mexican Americans in the Southwestern United States (Markides and Gerst, 2011). Evidence of increases in old age disability in developing countries is mixed and may very well reflect the absence of high quality data on trends. Nevertheless both demographic and epidemiological forces will challenge the infrastructure of developing countries in the years to come. Implications for more research and theory development are discussed.

From noise to soundscape composition: Artistic and social scientific dimensions of acoustic ecology

This paper examines research on sound in public spaces based on a case study of a project that has been underway for over forty years. The paper analyses the transformation of the attitudes of participants (community activists, researchers and musicians) from a preoccupation with documenting (and resisting) noise pollution at the origins of the movement, to the development of new ways of characterizing 'sonic environments', and creative uses of soundscape recordings as a community resource for documenting intangible cultural heritage and promoting new ways of listening. The paper draws on interviews with participants in the World Soundscape Project (WSP), written documentation and a collection of recordings that has been maintained by the Sonic Research Laboratory (in British Columbia, Canada) since 1971. The WSP grew out of concerns about noise but rapidly evolved into a study of disappearing sonic memories of the world and a resource for creative projects in sound design and electro-acoustic music composition.

The paper examines changing value systems of participants about what constitutes a sound worth documenting as well as their work on theories of acoustic ecology. The Sonic Research Lab researchers recognized that 'authentic' recordings of the audible dimensions of community life could not all be documented by 'naturalistic' recording of 'found sounds'. They sought new ways of representing changing sonic environments and worked to heighten public awareness of sound as a dimension of the lived experience of community life (with outdoor performances, sonic art installations and guided 'soundwalks'). In the process soundscape composition emerged as a hybrid musical genre, combining social scientific and artistic goals.

The paper will conclude with a critical analysis of the authenticity of soundscape recordings as affordances for apprehending the lived experience of sound and for accessing memories of the 'audible past' and the acoustic ecology of community life more generally.

La relación entre el campo profesional y las prácticas de estudio en propuestas de educación virtual de posgrado. Un análisis de caso

La ponencia se centra en las prácticas asociadas a las tecnologías educativas. Tiene como eje explorar las formas de estudio que se generan en espacios virtuales de formación superior de posgrado. Para ello, toma dos campos de saber y propone su comparación: las ciencias sociales y la medicina. Para su abordaje se eligieron dos campus virtuales: el de la Facultad Latinoamericana de Ciencias Sociales, sede Argentina (FLACSO), y el del Hospital Italiano de Buenos Aires (HIBA), por tratarse de instituciones de alto prestigio académico y que presentan un desarrollo importante de la educación virtual de posgrado. Por otra parte, ambos campus utilizan la misma plataforma tecnológica: Moodle.

Las prácticas de estudio suponen organización, uso de materiales, comunicación, aprendizaje, socialización y subjetivación, procesos que tienen lugar tanto en el mismo campus virtual como en el ámbito exterior a él y que, generados a partir del uso de las tecnologías digitales, alientan diversos tipos de consumo y de producción de bienes intelectuales a través de Internet.

En este marco, las culturas profesionales que median entre la tecnología y los sujetos promueven diferentes disposiciones y movilizan diversas prácticas. El interés de esta ponencia es profundizar en las distintas prácticas de interacción dentro de las plataformas virtuales así como analizar la configuración de diversos procesos vinculados a estos entornos, contrastando la mediación de la cultura profesional de los médicos y de los científicos sociales.

Se parte de la proposición general de que las especificidades de cada campo profesional condicionan las formas de estudio de los alumnos de educación superior virtual, relacionadas con los nuevos usos del tiempo y del espacio, con la no presencialidad, con la convergencia de profesionales de diferentes partes del mundo, con la centralidad de la lectura y la escritura y con nuevas y variadas formas de acceder y producir información y conocimiento.

You work for another: Study on the working conditions of workers in customer service for mobile emergency care in Ceará

The relevance of the theme of this research can be proven by the need to understand the conditions and work organization of health human resources specifically for teams of mobile emergency care. The aim was to investigate those who work in the mobile units of emergency care in Ceará in USB drives and ICU. The challenges are made, especially when it comes to managing people. Merhy (2006) states that lack connection between the user and worker health, medical procedures that are incompatible with a market policy and therefore must be guided by a specific ethical. I mean, there's no thinking without regard to the management philosophy of the entire health system and the existing public health policies and how they are experienced and perceived by the worker population. Another question refers to a denial or distancing of the professional (be) facing each other (be patient), to try to become indifferent to the pain situation that assists in the process of care, in a move to distance up and defend themselves from the suffering there and experience which may identify yourself or share: is it? You can ignore the suffering of another? In this sense, raised over two issues: the invisibility of which are put on the possible dilemmas experienced by health workers in line with the conditions not only of a possible lack of job, but the structure itself of its work. Tell these professionals with the necessary follow-up? Or if enforcement officials reduce the number of tasks? These were the problems worked out in this research.

Patterns of governance and government in São Paulo, Brazil

The paper departs from existing studies to discuss the main governance patterns present in urban and social policies in São Paulo. The article highlights the configuration of actors involved, the institutional settings in which governance occurs and the political grammars that regulate the processes, taking into account the various policy heritages involved, as well as different government levels, considering Brazilian federalism. At least five governance patterns are present:

1. Social policies (education, health and social assistance) – These policies have been under intense reform in the last decades. The resulting policy systems involve institutionalized social participation and local implementation, but under federal regulation, resulting in high standardization between municipalities.

2. Large infra-structure policies (sanitation, energy, subway) – These policies are formulated inside large state companies in a close decision process. Interest intermediation occurs through contacts within the thematic networks that bind technicians, appointed politicians and private contractors. Corruption is targeted to influence public bids and is connected to the financing of electoral campaigns.

3. Public infra-structure construction and urban services (bus transportation and garbage collection) – policy formulation and implementation also occurs within public agencies, but in this case with lower insulation. The community networks bind contractors, technicians and politicians together. Corruption is also more common.

4. Large urban investments and large urban projects – These cases involve mainly local government actors, but with very close decision processes within a network of actors including construction companies, large scale developers, municipal technical bureaucracies and local politicians.

5. Small daily decisions in zoning, building regulations and construction approval – by historical heritage, this is completely under control of the municipal governments in a strongly decentralized way. The issue involves strong negotiations and a great deal of corruption involving street level bureaucrats, small building constructors, developers and local politicians.

Solidarity economy and counter-hegemony in the world-system: Insights from Brazil and Portugal

The paper proposes a reflection on solidarity economy as a field of counter-hegemonic projects. It is the result of ongoing PhD research on the positioning of solidarity economy organizations within a global restructuring context. Based on a comparative study (Portugal and Brazil), the goal is to analyze the dynamics that characterize these organizations in articulation with wider changes in the world-system, while questioning their role in the social transformation or reproduction.

In spite of the differences related to each social context, solidarity economy is embodied by a set of organizations where a collective patrimony is privileged against the individual return, and where solidarity is integrated in the core of economic activities as a means to achieve other goals, namely related to citizenship, environment, education, or culture. In the North, solidarity economy mostly emerges in articulation with the Welfare State; while in the South, where historically the State has been more fragile, it is developed from bottom-up approaches, based on the solidarity among different social groups in an attempt to solve their own problems.

One hypothesizes that solidarity economy in Brazil has emerged from a periphery setting, occupying a counter-hegemonic space, in resistance against the dominant political, economic and cultural powers, while in Portugal, in its semi-periphery, it is complementary to such powers. One questions how, on the one hand, the rise of Brazil and its new geo-political-economic centrality and, on the other, the economic recession of Portugal, and the consequent implementation of severe spending cuts, will transform such positions. What is the margin for social and economic criticism within these new dynamics?

The paper presents a theoretical reflection, as well as preliminary evidence from statistical data and document analysis, in the sense of revealing, from a macro viewpoint, the trends under analysis.

Governance in the Amazon region of Brazil: State, market, civil society and international donors in the making of sustainable development projects

This is a piece of research on the relations among civil society, market interests, the State and international donors in the negotiations of new areas of sustainable use under the Amazon Region Protected Area Program (ARPA) funded by the World Bank, PPG7, WWF-Brazil and the Brazilian government. I am particularly interested in articulating theoretical and empirical discussions in order to account for 1. the shaping of local-global interactions and its impact on domestic politics and 2. the scope of citizenship in Brazil today.

Brazil is the largest conservatory of biodiversity in the world. Despite the country's low environmental performance, it has become an activist on environmental governance. Business and Industries, Rural Elites, Indigenous People, Politicians, International Donors, NGOs and the Scientific Community have different prospects of sustainable development. My main research questions are: how actors involved in the establishment of conservation units (CUs) carry out their agendas? Does the evolution of an international environmental regime affect actor's behavior?

ARPA is a ten year program comprised of three phases that proved itself to be a strategy tool of the Federal Government to inhibit the advance of deforestation and assist regularization in critical regions rather than privileging the creation of CUs in remote areas, which marks a contrast with the creation of protected areas in previous years. The program first phase (2003-2009) established 63 CUs, of which 30 are of sustainable use.

CUs for sustainable use usually have more success in forming local councils but more difficulties approving Management Plans when compared to strict protection areas. This is so because this kind of protected area opens the possibility of exploitation of forest resources. Market-oriented groups (logging and mining business), socially engaged groups, donors and technicians hurry to discuss the proposed areas and strive for legitimacy and political influence along the way.

Health care personnel facing the new abortion law in Mexico city

Since 2007, Legal Interruption of a Pregnancy (ILE) is possible until the third month of pregnancy, if the woman so wants, in Mexico City's public hospitals without needing to give any public justification.

This huge change in the abortion law, the only one of this kind in the whole country, has placed the city's health system, namely, the doctors, nurses and social workers in the public hospitals, in the front line facing the law system. For example, the health law of Mexico City (2009) which regulates "conscientious objection" establishes that a doctor can be a conscientious objector but s/he is obligated to refer the woman to another doctor that will carry out the service (ILE); the law also states "It is an obligation of the governmental public health institutions to guarantee the timely availability of services".

I think that the changes in the law are showing that two types of principles, that before coexisted but in a parallel way, are now obliged to interact.

Taking these considerations into account, my paper will propose that this reality is creating a new interaction between law and medical discourse, that can be considered within the context of "normative plurality".

This is based on a research of the health care personnel in some of Mexico City's hospitals that are practicing ILE's; a research that has a pragmatic perspective. In the paper, I want to discuss how the health staff are challenged by the legality of this practice and what kind of arguments they are using to accept or refuse to provide the practice; also, how they are justifying their attitudes towards the woman asking for a legal interruption of pregnancy, whether they have a positive, a negative or a neutral position towards them.

Self-help reading : A social ritual of coping with risk in everyday life

Self-help books have for some decades raised interest (and often criticism) in social sciences. Yet, most authors deduced theoretical implications from analyses based on the texts of these books only. In doing so, they completely overlooked the problematic of the reception and the social uses of the messages imbedded in the books. Drawing on the recent works of Eva Illouz and Alain Ehrenberg, as well as on a large empirical field based on interviews of and letters to authors of self-help books, this communication will attempt to provide new insights into the reason why self-help books are such a successful commodity and why self-help readers endorse their discourse so willingly and playfully.

The thesis that I will develop is that self-help reading should be understood as a way of dealing with risk, uncertainties and unpredictable events, an attitude which is particularly adapted to social environments where autonomy and personal responsibility have been erected as key values. Self-help books provide their readers with new ways of dealing with all kinds of problems in everyday life. Moreover, the particular translation of these problems offered by the discourse of such books, adapted to the norm of autonomy and responsibility, allows the reader to claim social benefits from his/her new attitude by being considered as a "responsible person" rather than as an "inactive victim".

In order to sustain this argument, I will sketch a comparison between self-help reading and witchcraft practices analysed by Edward Evans-Pritchard and Jeanne Favret-Saada within other societies. I will follow Peter Winch's plea to understand such practices as "attitudes towards contingencies". Finally, understanding this practice as a "competence", I will address the question of the potential social stratification it may induce.

From the trenches: Pluralism, estructureation and identity construction in Uruguayan highschool students

Interaction and conflict between adults and youngsters inside the institutions of education, mostly during the secondary, has been a usual object of study on behalf of Psychologists and Sociologists around the world. One of the most relevant and influential productions in this field is Paul Willis' Learning to Labor, which was followed by an important number of studies of the same kind. The article takes Willis' approach as the point of departure of a discuss that takes also into consideration two of the main concepts of today's Sociology, as the ideas of structure and action (Giddens) and, more recently, Margaret Archer's idea of the "internal conversation". From there, the article analyses the forms in which Uruguayan high school students interact with the adults in the context of the weakening of the educative rules inside schools. From the methodological point of view, the article is based on several series of interviews to secondary teachers and studentes, and on the direct observation of the life and social relations in Montevideo's high schools during the period 1991-2003.

Las paradojas de los mecanismos de inclusión social: Un estudio de casos sobre nueve universidades del mercosur

El siglo XXI encuentra a los países del Mercosur en una situación muy diferente al siglo anterior en materia de Educación Superior. Las Universidades son hoy sólo una parte de un sistema de Educación post-secundaria complejo, diverso y diversificado, que incluye todo tipo de instituciones y centros, a veces alejados de los modelos humboldtianos de universidad que sirven de referencia a las universidades más tradicionales. A partir del estudio de nueve casos de universidades de Argentina, Brasil, Paraguay y Uruguay, y en el marco del Proyecto RIAIPE 3 ALFA III, se construye una tipología de instituciones que, generadas dentro de un tipo de lógica histórica característica, han devenido en realidades que contradicen –al menos en parte– las lógicas de sus mecanismos de inclusión y también de funcionamiento. A partir de acá, se espera poder generar una reflexión crítica sobre los modos de desarticular los obstáculos a veces invisibles para que las universidades logren incrementar sus niveles de inclusión social, de acuerdo a los objetivos del Proyecto RIAIPE.

"Subgenrification" as a cultural strategy

Based on interviews made in 2009 with French and Quebecois teenagers, this communication attempts to explore the fragmentation that we can observe on musical genres in youth cultures as a reflexive strategy of social identity construction. Our approach of this phenomenon leads us to focus on two processes: the self-legitimization of practices and tastes through the creation of a specific knowledge and the social conditions of musical discoveries experienced by the teenagers. Willis (1990) showed that young people are always involved in creation and recreation of their own cultural life. Their identities comes from the creative ways in which they discover, exchange and assume their tastes, practices and representations. Through their daily interactions with each other, their families and the medias, teenagers are involved in a process of symbolic exchange that defines continually who they are (France, 2007). This process of rearranging cultural elements explains partly the phenomenon of cultural eclecticism that most of teenagers experiment (Coulangeon, 2011). In the same time, we can observe a multiplication of styles, genres and trends. The strict definition of a cultural group by its appearance can lead some researchers to see youth cultures as many little independent subcultures but in our opinion we are more in front of a complex system of fragmented culture. We claim that the process of "subgenrification" in itself is part of the identity construction of teenagers' individuality and that this particular process is symptomatic of the cultural global mood. As Bennett (2000) wrote, the construction of the self is heavily linked to the construction of the collective culture in which it'll evolve. Music is more than a part of everyday environment; it's a tool of identity construction. By exploring the way teenagers are building a map of their own tastes, we can graze the global culture in its dynamics.

Getting the picture: Understanding the harms done to children made subjects of sexual abuse images on the internet

The purpose of this paper is to present the findings of a research study that explored the ways in which clinical therapists and child welfare workers in Ontario, Canada understand the harms done to children in abuse images distributed in cyberspace and the ways in which this understanding is integrated into investigation, assessment and treatment practices. Children who are made the subjects of sexual abuse images online have not only endured sexual abuse offline, their lives have been transformed by the permanent images of their abuse online; images that cannot be retrieved or controlled and that continue to circulate in cyberspace forever. The harms done to children in abuse images online are exacerbated by the impact of being photographed during the abuse. To add to this complexity is the potential non-resolution of the sexual abuse experience for those children who must live with the knowledge that images of their abuse are in perpetual circulation in cyberspace forever and may be accessed online for anyone to see at any given time. The implications for the child victims in online abuse images can be devastating, yet understanding of the phenomenon is limited. This paper examines the intersection of child sexual abuse and cyberspace and the ways in which current policies and practices in children's mental health and child welfare inform response to children whose abuse images appear online. Little research has examined the implications for children made the subjects of sexual abuse images distributed on the Internet. This paper addresses this gap by exploring new assessment and treatment targets that the phenomenon demands be added to existing child sexual abuse treatment programs and child protection investigations. A contemporary ecological model for conceptualizing the issues is presented. A children's rights perspective provides an overarching framework within which these ideas are explored.

Urban transformations in post-socialist Sarajevo

El proceso de transformación político-económico en países post-socialistas ha tenido muy diferentes evoluciones y resultados en las dos últimas décadas, como se puede observar de las disparidades aparecidas entre los países de la antigua Yugoslavia. Así, la reciente confirmación de Croacia como segundo estado en integrarse en la Unión Europea, después de Eslovenia, se contraponen a la situación permanente de bloqueo político que vive Bosnia y Herzegovina. A pesar de ser un país fuertemente intervenido por agentes y organizaciones internacionales desde la firma de los Acuerdos de Paz de Dayton en diciembre de 1995, la incapacidad de avanzar en campos como la reforma institucional de las estructuras de posguerra, debido a la falta de entendimiento entre los representantes políticos de las tres comunidades que constituyen el país –bosniacos, bosniocroatas y serbobosnios– pone de relieve tanto los enfoques erróneos como los efectos perversos de las políticas desarrolladas por la Comunidad Internacional a lo largo de los últimos 15 años.

Este artículo, fruto de los sucesivos trabajos de campo cualitativos desarrollados desde 2006, pretende exponer las estrategias no visibles de la Comunidad Internacional en el proceso de renovación física y de reconciliación étnica en Bosnia. Inicialmente se centrará en las transformaciones socio-espaciales llevadas a cabo en su capital, Sarajevo. Dichos análisis mostrarán como en Bosnia algunas ciudades se han erigido en las arenas más eficaces para implementar la agenda neoliberal, soslayando la ausencia de profundas reformas institucionales. De este modo, aquellas ciudades étnicamente homogéneas surgidas del conflicto militar, como la islamizada Sarajevo, son las más exitosas en el planeamiento urbano de posguerra, albergando los principales proyectos urbanísticos neoliberales. Finalmente, el artículo abrirá un debate más amplio sobre las consecuencias sociales y espaciales derivadas de la gestión internacional en aquellos países intervenidos tras la caída del bloque soviético.

Participación y emancipación en Venezuela

Son diversos los procesos de participación que se han configurado en la última década en Venezuela cuyas apuestas parecen inscribirse desde posibles horizontes de transformación. Sin embargo, pareciera que los nuevos procesos, mecanismos e instancias de participación, se quedarán cortos tanto en las posibilidades de construcción de una democracia más protagónica y radical, como en las posibilidades de desarticular las distintas formas de opresión existentes en la sociedad (capitalismo, colonialismo, patriarcado). Este texto intenta aproximarse a estos procesos, mecanismos e instancias de participación desde distintas organizaciones sociales, en lo que se ha denominado "proceso bolivariano".

Como apuesta fundamental, las principales organizaciones sociales del país vienen construyendo no sólo agendas reivindicativas, sino también aportes a la construcción de instancias de decisión colectivas; estas apuestas se tejen desde la autonomía, pero también desde el debate, tensión y contradicción con políticas estatales.

Así, se plantea abordar desde una mirada crítica, en primer lugar ¿cuáles han sido las instancias permanentes para la participación de las organizaciones sociales en la última década del proceso bolivariano? ¿Cuáles son las limitaciones que enuncian las organizaciones para la radicalización de la democracia? Y ¿hasta dónde los recientes procesos de participación social y política que se han dado en Venezuela podrían leerse en clave de horizontes emancipatorios?

Esta lectura, nos permite profundizar y complejizar las miradas sobre la participación ciudadana, sus aportes fundamentales en la construcción de procesos democráticos, pero también sus permanentes tensiones, contradicciones y límites en su relación con el Estado.

Squat the squares, occupy the buildings

The M15 movement in Spain has responded to the financial crisis and the neoliberal policies with a sudden and profound social mobilisation along 7 months (May-December 2011). While it is based on previous movements, this is the first time that a precarious multitude takes the squares, the streets and the neighbourhoods for such a long lasting period, through an innovative autonomous organisation and with a transnational scope. This paper focuses on the convergence experienced by the squatters' movement and the M15 movement. We will describe first how and why squatters joined the M15 movement. Then we will provide evidence about the utilitarian role that already existed squatted social centres played in the M15 movement. Finally, after the camps were evicted, a explosion of new squats took place due to the initiatives of new activists of the M15 movement. Our explanation of this process of convergence rests mainly in the 'cumulative chains of activist exchanges' since the three mentioned aspects of the process reinforced each other. The structural equivalence of the occupied camps and the squatted social centres (in terms of assemblies, self-management and social disobedience), sparked the mutual collaboration. Camps also turned into strategic ends of the M15 movement beyond its original function as a powerful repertoire of protest, in a similar mood as squatted social centres tend to be performed. Squatting gained legitimacy within the M15 movement due to the initial collaboration as well as to the increasing success of the campaign Stop Foreclosures. On the one hand, this mixture slightly reduced the radical and anti-systemic discourse of squatting. On the other, the anti-speculation discourse was incorporated into an anti-crisis one where squatting was justified by the extreme needs of people. This research is based on participant observation, 21 semi-structured interviews and the analysis of secondary sources.

Public institutions and the accommodation of religious diversity: The case of hospitals and prisons in Spain

The management of religious diversity is becoming a crucial element to ensure social cohesion and good governance in contemporary societies. The rise of migration flows has led to a context of greater religious diversity and new and urgent challenges have emerged in this area in recent years. This phenomenon has highlighted the need to rethink the models of accommodation of religious minorities in public institutions.

The overall objective of this research is to analyze the challenges that the growth of religious diversity raises for hospitals and prisons and to examine the main strategies developed to accommodate religious minorities in these two types of confinement institutions. Our hypothesis are: 1) The model of accommodation of religious diversity in public institutions in Spain is tending to a pluralistic one. Public institutions are not eliminating/erasing religion, but they are taking into account and giving possibilities of practice to religious minorities which are nowadays gaining public presence. 2) The presence of religious diversity in hospitals and prisons puts into question the historical monopoly of the Catholic Church in Spain. In this sense, we state that the Catholic Church is resisting to lose its privileges in such institutions. The research, based on interviews to staff (directors, social workers...) of the institutions and religious leaders, compares two Spanish regions: Catalonia and Andalusia. The analytical dimensions considered are: a) religious assistance that patients and prisoners received; b) places of worship inside the centres; and c) possibilities to carry out daily religious practices.

La mezcla social en las áreas metropolitanas de Madrid y Barcelona

La investigación que se presenta realiza una aproximación a la relación entre la segregación residencial de los grupos socioeconómicos de las áreas metropolitanas de Madrid y de Barcelona y las estructuras sociales, políticas y residenciales de ambas regiones.

Mediante la clasificación de su territorio en diferentes tipos espaciales se han analizado las pautas de localización de los grupos socioeconómicos, así como su los niveles e mezcla social/segregación en cada uno de los mencionados espacios. Una vez analizadas las diferentes pautas de asentamiento de los grupos sociales objeto de estudio, se trata de comprender su relación con las distintas estructuras urbanas.

A continuación, se ha realizado un análisis de las intervenciones políticas llevadas a cabo en dichos espacios y de los discursos de los principales responsables políticos de tales áreas metropolitanas en torno a la mezcla social. El objetivo consiste en hallar la lógica de redistribución social y revalorización/devaluación de ciertos espacios que está implícita en las intervenciones de los actores políticos.

Así, a partir de las variables que se vinculan en mayor medida a los procesos segregativos; del análisis de las estructuras de ambas regiones y sus distintos espacios; así como de la relación que estas variables guardan con las intervenciones y los discursos políticos, se pretende arrojar cierta luz sobre el significado sociopolítico de la segregación y la mezcla socioreidencial.

La perspectiva narrativa en la investigación social sobre identidad

Los diversos y heterogéneos abordajes narrativos en las ciencias sociales han contribuido a visibilizar la centralidad de las narrativas en la configuración del mundo social y de las identidades personales y colectivas. Esta comunicación aborda algunos puntos referentes al abordaje narrativo en el ámbito de la investigación social sobre la identidad. La atención es puesta, por un lado, en buscar delimitar la particularidad de este abordaje con respecto a otras formas de investigación cualitativa en este campo de investigación psicología social y, por el otro, en sugerir alcances y ventajas de la perspectiva narrativa. Argumentamos que abordaje narrativo representa una vía metodológica alternativa que mantiene una sensibilidad especial con respecto al papel de la subjetividad y el sujeto, sin por ello renunciar a las herramientas de análisis que nos ofrecen el análisis del discurso y el análisis de contenido.

Para ilustrar esta discusión utilizamos dos estudios empíricos. El primero de ellos abordó el tema la construcción de la identidad colectiva en un grupo de activistas del movimiento de transgénero en la ciudad de Barcelona. El segundo de ellos tuvo como objetivo estudiar las identidades personales y laborales de un conjunto de trabajadores empleados en cadenas de supermercado en Santiago de Chile. Sugerimos a continuación tres ejes generales y provisionales que pueden ser útiles para caracterizar la singularidad una aproximación narrativa en el plano metodológico: a) el tipo de material empírico: el material que se produce en la investigación y que es objeto de análisis es alguna forma de narrativa; b) el tipo de análisis metodológico: el análisis está dirigido a identificar y rastrear los aspectos narrativos del material; c) la presentación de los resultados: el conocimiento producido adquiere cierta inteligibilidad de tipo narrativo y da cuenta del relato como unidad global.

Transiting genders: Psychosocial contributions and questions about transgender identity

Transgender identities have recently become a relevant and controversial topic in diverse social sciences interested in gender and power relations, including social psychology. The traditional perspective that considers transgender identities as a deviant form of gender and sexuality has been contested and new psychosocial approaches to these gender trajectories are required. This presentation focuses on two aspects regarding psychosocial approaches to transgender identities. In the first place, we present a qualitative study carried out in Mexico exploring some psychosocial factors playing an important role in the construction of transgender identity and in the social experience of transgender people. The study is conducted with transgender subjects and uses interviews and narrative methodologies to inquire into the participants' views and perspectives. Results of the study allow discussing three particular aspects: a) the 'social actors' significantly involved in the construction of transgender experience in this particular context; b) the conceptions of 'masculinity' and 'femininity' mobilized by the participants; and c) the forms of violence to which this population is subject to and its relation to psychosocial conceptions and practices. Secondly, we conclude by proposing different ways in which transgender identities and transgender studies can question and transform traditional preconceptions that inform the psychosocial perspective in gender research.

Neo-liberal structural powers within the workplace: Workers or slaves?

Neo-liberalism and economic globalisation affect different geographical and social areas in very heterogeneous way. In the third world countries and in particular in South Africa the implementation of neoliberal social policies and the emergent processes of flexibilisation in the workplace implied over-exploitation and cultural and psychological domination of the labour force; which day by day are living in threat and fear to lose the only way of subsistence due to the increase number of unemployment and exclusion from the formal labour market.

Extreme ways of execution of power and domination over the worker's mind and body are everyday more often and creates a sense of dehumanisation and a clear control of the labour force, affecting the ways in which they approach and perform their work and live their lives, showing a clear asymmetrical power relation between the bourgeoisie and the proletarians. This led us to the assumption that slavery could represent a new way to understand 'working relations' in some areas of the third world economies. In this paper, I will discuss theoretically the concept of power and domination and the repercussion on the very flexible labour force.

South African leisure in turbulent economic times

This paper will explore the very vulnerable economic situation of South African population after 1994 due to the ANC (first democratic government) negotiation with global agents such as the WB, WTO, IMF, and the concomitant acceptance of neo-liberalism in the country. Public policies in the framework of neo-liberal agreements such as NEDLAC, deeply affected the impoverished and already excluded population from the formal labour market.

Millions of people in the current South Africa do not have access to housing, service delivery, education, jobs, etc. More and more people become part of the informal economy trying to earn the means of subsistence day by day. The struggle for survival brings suffering and starvation for many living in informal settlements. It is in this framework that the concept of leisure activities and leisure time can be observed as a very expensive and unreachable commodity, leaving only the household or the community space as a free or very cheap place to expend its time out of work.

Capturando tendencias: La herramienta bibliométrica para la detección de desigualdades en el espacio de educación superior

En el presente artículo pretendemos explorar el proceso por el cual se instala en el Espacio de Educación Superior un modo de "conocimiento innovador" producto de las concepciones economicistas Schumpeterianas. Con este objetivo utilizaremos la herramienta bibliométrica para realizar una genealogía de la concepción innovadora a partir del historial de publicaciones incluidas en la ISI Web of Knowledge. De esta forma visibilizaremos el origen y el incremento de la concepción innovadora así como su dispersión en las distintas disciplinas académicas: de la economía y la ingeniería a otras disciplinas, sociales y de humanidades. Del mismo modo esta herramienta nos permitirá comprobar la substantivación del concepto, esto es su instalación como conocimiento tácito.

Pero además la descripción de esta evolución conceptual en la "producción científica" refleja una tendencia conflictiva de vital importancia: la transferencia de los marcos culturales empresariales a contextos sociales en los cuales se configura "el espacio de conocimiento de la educación superior".

Los resultados obtenidos son producto del trabajo realizado en el ámbito de la Red RIAIPE 3, dentro del Proyecto Alfa III, de la Comisión Europea: Programa Marco Interuniversitario para la Equidad y la Cohesión Social en Educación Superior.

Las desigualdades del conocimiento innovador: Una aproximación espacio temporal en el marco de la educación superior

En este artículo analizaremos la influencia del conocimiento innovador en el tipo de conocimiento relacionado con la Educación Superior Europea. A partir de los *a priori*s Kantianos del espacio y el tiempo describiremos algunas de las características de este mapa de conocimiento que pese a venderse como objetivo hunde sus raíces en específicos concepciones económicas Schumpeterianas. Con respecto al espacio veremos como la noción de Espacio Europeo de Educación Superior es homólogo del espacio europeo de conocimiento: una construcción espacial propia de la percepción empresarial de los "sistemas de innovación" en los cuales el conocimiento en sus cualidades homogéneas y sólidas puede transferirse

o gestionarse a modo de objetos. Con respecto al tiempo veremos como la definición de la sociedad como "sociedad del conocimiento y la innovación" implica la asunción por los miembros de la comunidad académica de la necesidad de lidiar con la inestabilidad moderna y la precarización mediante un estar en el "novum continuum" de la acreditación.

Estas metáforas espacios temporales se traducen también en metáforas de la desigualdad. El espacio innovador que concibe "el conocimiento como objeto" corre el riesgo de convertir a las personas "en objetos del conocimiento", "recursos humanos" disponibles para el sistema empresarial y caracterizados por desigualdades en torno a la celeridad con la que acceden a la meritocracia.

Los resultados obtenidos son producto del trabajo realizado en el ámbito de la Red RIAIPE 3, Programa Marco Interuniversitario para la Equidad y la Cohesión Social en Educación Superior.

Professionalizing across borders: The dilemma of social work as a democratic occupation

Social work as a public service occupation, separate from beneficence began in the United States at the turn of the 19th Century. The "democratic experiment" of the U.S sought to distance itself from the constraints of the church-based charities that had offered moral control as a condition for material aid. The principle of egalitarian help was disseminated through the efforts of the Settlement Houses, which, by the way, the U.S. had imported from Britain. Social Workers, led by Jane Adams and other "not professionally trained figures" devoted themselves to addressing poverty and operationalizing principles of self-help, particularly in relation to immigrant populations. But soon, such democratic efforts were left behind by the professionalizing ethos of the Charity Organization Society, which sought to develop discerning skills for service through "professional "schools" of social work. The old volunteers, who reigned with empathy and "friendly visiting", rapidly disappeared to become "caseworkers", who ruled with "scientific principles" engrained in a developing bureaucracy.

This paper will address the distancing of social work from its original egalitarian commitments to social justice to secure a monopoly of knowledge, prestige within the universities, recognition by the bureaucracy and other professions. Finally and quite recently, social work sought to expand its professional hegemony beyond the borders of the U.S. Seizing the globalizing currents, it often denies the local and culturally based roots of helping, believing that the standardization offered by professional principles is appropriate throughout the world. While this paper does not propose the eradication of professional efforts for such things as quality control and accountability, it does suggest that the principles of professionalization must be cautiously applied to avoid devaluing vernacular and culturally rooted wisdom. The implied standardization of global efforts can become dangerously undemocratic.

Migración, identidad y lengua zapoteca: Rechazo y aceptación en los hijos de migrantes

Este artículo intenta explicar qué factores influyen en el rechazo o la aceptación de la identidad zapoteca en los hijos de migrantes a la ciudad de Oaxaca. Se presta especial atención al aprendizaje y al uso de la lengua porque en México es el factor clave, más que el fenotipo, de adscripción a un grupo étnico.

De acuerdo con algunas investigaciones (Perez (2009)Gladwin (2004), Luz (1995) y Peñalosa (1986)), los inmigrantes de las comunidades, no transmiten a sus descendencia la lengua de origen e inculcan el castellano entendido como una lengua de prestigio que puede proteger a sus hijos de la discriminación, y ayudarles a una movilidad social ascendente. Sin embargo, se han detectado un grupo de personas que reivindican la identidad familiar de origen y se ha estudiado qué factores facilitan esta opción.

El trabajo de campo se realizó de forma paralela al proyecto BI WEYA 'A diseñado por personas de la comunidad para poner en contacto a la gente más joven nacida en la migración con la cultura de origen. Se entrevistó a niños y personas jóvenes preguntándoles sobre diferentes aspectos, incluidos los emocionales (vergüenza, orgullo, indiferencia...), relacionados con la comunidad y su elección lingüística.

Se concluye que para comprender las diferentes elecciones hay que tener en cuenta algunos factores estructurales, tanto de permanencia como de cambio (por ejemplo, la influencia de los movimientos sociales o la fundación de universidades indígenas), que han suavizado la desvalorización que sufren las lenguas en el contexto mexicano asociadas, generalmente, a un estrato social muy bajo. Pero también hay que tener en cuenta variables individuales como las diferencias educativas, de trayectoria laboral, procesos de empoderamiento personal o estrategias migratorias de permanencia en la ciudad o de regreso a la comunidad.

Popular arts in migration and post-migration cities: A research framework

The paper presents a framework to research the relevance of popular arts in the theoretical and policy debates about diversity in migration and post-migration cities. It does so by relating to the five domains: local culture, social relations, local cultural and integration policies, local politics and the local economy.

At the cultural level, the aim is to examine how artistic productions of immigrant and ethno-racial minorities change the mainstream local culture or in other words the local configuration of diversity (Vertovec, 2009).

At the social level, we explore the idea that they can help to build bridges, to facilitate the encounters (Vertovec, 2009) between different populations sharing the same neighbourhood. In other words, popular arts can become a means of communication and dialogue between different groups to build some form of local shared citizenship

The paper then explores the policy relevance of popular arts immigration and post-migration cities. Are immigrant and ethnic artists and productions supported by official cultural institutions? Are local cultural policies becoming multicultural? It also seems important to examine to what extent popular arts are used and could be a useful tool in local integration and social cohesion policies.

At the political level, the paper studies the relations between popular arts, collective identities and the forms of the social and political mobilisation in multicultural cities (Martiniello and Lalfuer, 2008). The paper also proposes to research the importance of immigrant and ethnic artistic mobilisation in local elections (Lafleur and Martiniello, 2010).

Finally, the paper ambitions to examine the economic impact of immigrant and ethnic artistic expressions on the local economy through ethnic tourism (Rath, 2006), festivals but also the development of a local immigrant and ethnic artistic life.

The Manhattan-Rochester coalition and tests on vulnerable populations without consent

During the Cold War, the United States military engaged in a series of secret tests on civilian populations in various North American cities, to test new types of weapons that were being developed by a network of scientists involved in a secret spin-off group from the Manhattan Project. In at least one series of tests between 1953 and 1965, officials sprayed an aerosolized compound in an urban area where low-income persons of color resided, in St. Louis, Missouri. Their task was an ultra-secret project that involved in part, human subject testing related to weaponized radiation. This vast project transcended national boundaries, and ultimately targeted tens of thousands of unwitting, disempowered, and dehumanized civilians, who were purposely tested for, and exposed to deadly compounds without their knowledge or consent, in a blatant violation of civil and human rights.

Such a vast project required the effort of thousands of internal participants over roughly five decades. Under the direction of the network leaders, lower-level participants' ethical lapses and willing participation in harm, might be explained by the use of organizational tactics that purposely disabled critical analysis and internal dissent by those inside the organization. Large numbers of people outside the secret network, even victims of the network's actions, were unable to determine that illegal or harmful activity was being conducted by the military and its contractors, because of the same organizational tactics that additionally, disabled external dissent and critical analysis.

Through understanding the specific elements and mechanisms of complex institutional deviance that disengage critical analysis, and pave the path towards victimization of populations, we can develop public policies that prioritize the public's right to know, and construct checks and methods to minimize the chance of covert projects that are contrary to societal norms, human dignity, and human rights.

The ethical turn: Communication as a manifestation of the ethical

This paper calls for an ethical turn in communication. It offers a re-evaluation of Weaver's metaphor on communication as exchange of information and develops Buber's and Peters' ideas on communication as manifestation of the ethical, where the ethical is described as openness to otherness and communication is viewed as a tension between reproduction of Self and reconciliation with alterity. It argues that mutuality is not a necessary condition for the ethical because it involves intimacy that can only be discretely and that end of theodicy is not the end of the ethical because the ethical is a space of profound intimacy, beyond preachment. Extreme cases of annihilation of otherness such as genocides in all their stages and variations, can't be described as rational in some cases than others and have deeper roots than modernity. The ethical turn within socio-political conflicts and genocidal process meets challenges such as the patriarchal order, implantations and involvement of the Third, dehumanization, isolation for larger contexts, traumatic disorders, and states of denial. However, the potential of communication as reconciliation is enhanced by insights in intercultural communication, nurturing of hybrid cultures, and distance taking techniques such as time distance, attention/topic shift, emotions such as feelings of awe, and art.

Urban development and modernity unfinished: A reading of the phenomenon of lynching in Brazilian society, based on the work of José de Souza Martins

The present work analyzes the phenomenon of lynching in Brazil, using, mainly, the data supplied for the empirical research that lasts about 20 years, of José de Souza Martins. The cases of lynching are characterized by a sudden reunion of individuals, in an unexpected and unplanned way, violently attacking another subject who committed some kind of antisocial action. From the analysis of the Brazilian cases, it was noticed that, although they are also the result of a failed State system, they have significant differences compared to those occurrences in other countries. The predominance of occurrence of the phenomenon in urban areas, especially in marginal neighborhoods of great metropolis, and the character of ritual and sacrifice that happens with these facts, isn't found in other societies. The development model utilized to reach the Brazilian modernity and its consequent "unfinished modernity", unequal, imposed from privileged classes, much of modernity's "appear to be" than "being", is shown as largely responsible for this return of irrational manifestations of violence, deriving of fear and uncertainty arising from the social changes which affects everyone, but that not everyone take benefits.

Planning and the limits of urban policies

In Latin America, in the last two decades of last century, a number of experiences involving municipal-level public policies aiming to improve the quality of living and social inclusion were developed.

Local development was seen as an opportunity to give more room to popular movements around a democratic socialism. The struggle for hegemony was seen as possible once based on community participation, cultural shifts in politics – starting from municipalities – and on the fostering of a new model for the State.

This path was seen as an opportunity for conceiving new ways of carrying out public management, opposing the prevailing neoliberalism across national governments in Latin America at the time.

The twenty-first century was inaugurated with the election of left-wing national governments proposing a reframing of the agenda.

Today, taking a closer look at the countries in the region, one could ask what happened that those local sparks faded away and the national level doesn't arrive to give resonance to those pioneering experiments.

To foster this reflection, this paper discusses what happened in the sphere of urban planning as well as in the sphere of the city itself as a socially produced space. It addresses a framework of aspects concerning ways of thinking the city, the region and the territory in urbanistic terms and in terms of the culture of planning. The aspects addressed are:

- The scope of the question: city, region and territory;
- The foundation paradigm of planning: the notion of Public Interest and its nowadays crisis;
- The culture of planning, which attaches economic planning to the regional, national and macro spheres, whereas physical and territorial planning is mostly attached to the local level;
- The formalization of a new generation of rights: Economic, Social, Cultural, and Environmental Rights.

Financial elites make room for the emergence of new elites in Brazil

In order to find answers to the that are changes currently happening in the work organization within companies, the changes on the professional role of allocated agents for the organizational field and to understand the processes and dynamics that occur between social workers and this new logic organization is that we will open space for the study of the elitists life trajectories of Production Engineers in the State of São Paulo.

In other words, based on the study of educational and professional trajectories of production engineers we intend to understand how works the organizational dynamics in the XXI century and what is their relation, influence, or mechanisms of reciprocity established with the social agents studied.

It is worth mentioning that the positions and career choices of these engineers will be quite significant, as they open space to our reflections on the actions and the performances that occur inside the organizational process in the business sectors.

Which means that the allocation of those engineers in business positions or extra business, will open doors for us to understand some new dynamics used in many companies that now consider a new moment and a new dynamic: the financialization.

The purpose is to analyze the new forms of organization, their characters and their action mechanisms when facing internationalization and if it's possible also with the "new" company concept created by the financialization in a international scope.

Sociology, colonialism and social practices in Latin America

With the decline of Eurocentrism, sociology finds a special time to increase a profound criticism of its nature and importance in Latin America. This is the challenge we seek to answer with this paper, that the progress of post-colonial criticism is contributing to a reassessment of the stages of development of Sociology in Latin America and, consequently, for further information on the social movements and community practices. In this context, the review of sociology and social sciences enable us to witness the revaluation of urbans movements, the indigenous and feminist struggles or religious pluralism. Since the new questions put by the deconstruction criticism of Eurocentrism, it's seems that the development of sociology took place under the historical tension between colonialism and anti-colonialism. Consequently, the sociological studies have known three distinct stages: one, the post-independence, another, the criticism of postcoloniality and third, still uncertain, which moves the sociology today between, on one hand, the attempts to recolonialize, from utilitarian and neo-liberal pressures of consumer society, and secondly, the anti-utilitarian struggles for decolonialization of knowledge and power and for a new collective praxis. At moment of post-independence, social thinking is more motivated by the idea of forming the national society. The second moment we call post-colonial criticism. Here, the advance of democratic struggles contributed to new intellectual meanings about the nature of Eurocentrism. Thus, the ideas of center and periphery open the discussions on coloniality not only of each national society but of the whole region. The third moment of sociology in Latin America is still vague and hesitates between the denial of the center-periphery relationship, as does neo-liberalism or, conversely, for recognition of its relevance in a new system of domination/liberation and more complex changes between center and margins.

Media discourses, policies and social resonance on the example of the Roma issue in Eastern Europe

After the collapse of totalitarian regimes in Eastern Europe and the accession of most countries from the region to the European Union gradually Roma issue became topical for Europe. This was a logical consequence of surge of anti-Gypsy attitudes in public space and media. In frames of the European Union accessions process for most countries in the region a pre-requisite became an active national policy for solving the problems of Roma and for democratisation of the media environment, and adapting of anti-racist discourse. The democratisation process flows unevenly across the countries, but today it can largely be considered complete and in the state policies and the media environment in regard of Roma dominates today (at least formally) anti-racist discourse. In the proposed presentation we will analyse the resonance of these prerequisite on the public perception of the Roma communities. We will show that it doesn't led to reduction of the existing since centuries anti-Gypsy stereotypes, but led to their development, strengthening and enriching with new aspects. Dominant throughout the region becomes a new stereotype about the unfair 'privileged Roma'. This new stereotype largely influences the emergence and development of numerous overtly nationalistic and pro-nationalistic parties in whole region of Eastern Europe and attributed the strengthening of anti-European attitudes and in result the anti-Gypsy rhetoric in the media and political messages was changed, but continues to carry concealed but strong racist messages. From this perspective, anti-Gypsy pogroms and ethnic tensions as we are witnessing during the last years in Hungary, the Czech Republic and Bulgaria are not surprise, but rather a logical consequence of the social development processes in the region. In conclusion it will be argued that policies of 'affirmative actions', regardless of precious goals may lead to results contrary to expectations, if not implemented carefully.

Migratory "miracles" and mobility among pentecostal pastors in Brussels

Taking into account space and identity in the movements of transnational religious actors, this paper is engaged in reframing and reinterpreting experience by investigating the articulation of migratory and religious experiences as expressed by the pastors of four different Brussels-based Pentecostal congregations. The analysis of pastors' narratives, as they reassess the circumstances that brought them from Sub-Saharan Africa or Latin America to Belgium, reveals an interwoven process of geographical shifts and "divine" actions: this offers us an opportunity to consider an implied double process of mobility and religion. On one hand, we can see how Pentecostalism transforms and subverts their immigrant experience by allowing for an alternate narrative of this experience. On the other hand, we can analyse the effect of the migratory experience on the discourse and religious practices in the new social context, more particularly through the identification of such "Children of God" with missionary duties towards their fellow immigrants. An analysis of the pastors' narratives also offers a particularly relevant opportunity to question the tensions between processes of endogenous identification (missionaries elected by God and working towards the extension of his "kingdom") and exogenous assignment, repeated associations of otherness and strangeness, and the stigma coupled with pejorative characterizations of the "migrant".

Pension in Brazil: Outcomes and the pending agenda

Brazil's social protection policies have recently received a great deal of international attention, and are upheld by some as an international model. The most noted achievements include the creation of special budget for social security (known as "Seguridade"), the extension of benefits to rural workers, and the creation of a benefit floor set at the minimum wage. With these measures, Brazil has achieved 97% coverage of individuals 65 years or older. The creation of the well-known Bolsa Familia program was also an important milestone in targeting the basic needs of the poorest families while promoting education and fighting child labor.

This system has distinct costs, which rose between 1980 and 2000 when per capita income grew at reduced rates. This generated a public debate between those who defended "Seguridade" and those that saw its rising costs as an obstacle to generating sustainable economic growth.

In recent years, income transfers from "seguridade" guaranteed the activation of internal demand during moments of crisis and helped Brazil overcome the challenges of the international economic crisis. Furthermore, these transfers helped to reduce poverty and inequality, which is essential to reducing regional inequalities. Expenditures on "seguridade" account for the largest share of public spending in Brazil.

But, the challenges of removing the mechanisms of ineffective spending, high administrative costs, and anachronistic regulations complicate efforts toward modernization and improved equity. In this paper, we will present both an assessment of the achievements thus far with respect to reductions in poverty and inequality, as well as an analysis of the remaining policy challenges that need to be overcome in order to generate conditions for sustainable development.

The emergence of the figure of the victim and its political impact

In this paper we intend to reflect about the process of emergence of the figure of "victim contemporary" in the West and the centrality of his discourses on the regional (Latin America) and internationally political scene. Referring, initially, to sacrificial contexts (Girard, 2008) and the meanings that death it incorporates in this arrangement, we aim at contributing to the debate about the historical processes that made possible the inversion anthropological (Wieviorka, 2009) the figure of the victim in our societies. Reversing this, which marks, the one hand, a significant institutional change, to move the demarcation lines that divide the public space and private space; and secondly, the transformation of a category that was invisible, or almost, in public spaces, in one of the great figures of contemporary modernity, subject to a "new voice". The deaths already do not exist more only in their contributions to social order or for the restoration of equilibrium threatened for wars or natural disasters that reflected the will of the gods. In this sense, we focus on our work historical considerations about the impacts of the deaths of "opponents" of the Brazilian military regime (1964-1985) for the conditions of possibilities of democracy in the country, and then we will observe its scopes and results in the light the recent political experiences of a group of mothers who were mobilized after the death of their husbands and sons in 2006 in the city of São Paulo / Brazil (Association of Mothers and Family Victims of Violence - Mothers of May).

Attempts to popularize pure land Buddhism in Brazil

Studies have indicated that the traditional Japanese Buddhist groups in Brazil are in a decline in terms of followers. In general, Pure Land and Nichiren Buddhist groups are facing difficult times. Traditionally the images of these groups are attached to the ritual and services to the dead and ancestors, which kept their scope activities to the limits of Japanese community. Soto Zen Buddhism is an exception in this métier. In the 1960's the group created in São Paulo the first source for a small circle of non-Japanese pioneers interested in the practice of meditation (zazen). Since then, the group reached relatively popularity in the Brazilian society. This study focuses on the Pure Land Buddhist and examines the efforts and attempts of a Pure Land congregation in Brasilia city to overcome the Japanese community barrier and disseminate its activities among non-Japanese Brazilians. Pure Land Buddhism is the largest traditional Buddhist organization in Brazil; it established its temples and facilities mainly in São Paulo and Parana states. However, the temple that was established in Brasilia by the Japanese community is the only one which managed to overcome the community barrier and reached relative success among non-Japanese Brazilians.

Scholars have pointed out three major reasons for an ineffective diffusion; very strong and traditional ecclesiastic hierarchy structure, language barrier and the absence of meditation practices. We will discuss how the Pure Land congregation in Brasilia are adapting and innovating their activities in order to reach a larger audience. Is this innovative movement of Pure Land Buddhism restricted to Brasilia or it is something that can happen to other temples located in different regions of the country? Are the followers or sympathizers in a search for a new spirituality or to consume an Asian experience?

Career building in the process of migration: Contemporary Japanese youth emigrants to China

The developed countries' long recession and the increasing presence of NIEs, BRICS and ASEAN countries created a new form of temporary labor migrants who are willing to work in active and aggressive labor market in these countries despite of severe conditions. This paper focuses on reversely-oriented labor migration and aims at revealing how young migrants from the developed country organize their attempts and plan at career building with a special reference to the Japanese young semi-skilled labor migrants working in Shanghai. This type of migration was at first created as cheap labor needed by Japanese companies based on Asian countries, and recently is established as a survival strategy to counter the labor market in Japan, which marginalize the youth including both male and female. Based on a series of interview surveys in Shanghai since 2009, I show 3 findings. Firstly, their motivation: they are willing to get into the competitive global labor market although for the time being their living standard gets low with lower income and less social security, in order to avoid to be fixed to the exploited position in Japan. Secondly, their plan: they regard their working experience abroad as temporary training to obtain some capitals. After short-term staying, they have some options in terms of their location to work and of working status. Thirdly, their strategy: under the severe condition after migration, they intentionally migrate to another place and change jobs repeatedly as if collecting and keeping options to get a better chance. Referring to these points, I reveal how they try to control their uncertain conditions in the global labor market.

Knowledge mobilization in multiple contexts - A framework for sociological contribution

This analysis, grounded in two empirical studies, examines the concept and the practice of Knowledge Mobilization (KM) through an examination of different empirical contexts. We argue that the potential contribution of the social scientist (and the focus of the study of KM) changes according to the knowledge context, and explore how sociologists are positioned to play a role in the process of KM both in the context of innovation and in interdisciplinary analysis.

The first of these studies centres upon a 'production science' setting, where the KM research focus is on how discoveries in a laboratory setting take place, are negotiated through various processes, and may ultimately become implemented as a pharmaceutical product. We argue that, in such a context, the role of the social scientist is limited to an analysis of 'knowledge networks' and different kinds of capital, including social capital and what we term 'knowledge capital'. The social scientist's role is as observer or outsider, and the contribution is limited to an assessment of current practices as well as an exploration of possible future outcomes.

The second study is an 'evaluation science' context where the social scientist is directly integrated into a team of natural scientists examining the impact of climate change on ecosystems and local communities. In this case, social science knowledge is a part of the KM process. We argue that here that the social scientist plays an integral role in not only an examination of KM, but also as a direct participant in KM processes. This results in potential contributions that are more complex, requiring the social scientist to: (a) establish the validity of social science knowledge (amongst other types of scientific knowledge); (b) integrate local 'knowledges' with both scientific and social scientific knowledge; and, (c) incorporate this KM process into broader public policy responses.

Meanings of freedom for young people: Tensions between individual and collective life

This paper discusses the meanings of freedom shared by young adults from Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Beginning with a theoretical review on the concept of freedom in liberal theory, the work highlights the main contemporary conceptions of freedom. The concept of negative freedom and its individualizing consequences, especially related to intersubjective convivence, are examined in depth. This work proposes the proximity of the experience of freedom to the political field and suggests that politics must be defined by its dimensions of disagreement and struggle, and not as the permanent search for consensus, as liberal theory states. This analysis is based on Rancière's and Mouffe's scholarship and joins a larger discussion on the empirical material obtained through fieldwork. These results were originated in four focus groups with a total of 35 young adults, using the "groups of reflection" methodology. The young adults in the groups discussed freedom mainly in its negative sense, wherein one gains more freedom the less obstacles s/he faces. This understanding privileges the private dimension of action, and sets individuals in relations of competition and hostility among each other when they are being free. However, the research subjects pointed out problems and questions related to this meaning of freedom, such as the unending combative relationship with the other and the importance of obstacles so that free action ultimately makes sense for the acting subject. Young people's economic and juridical dependence on adults, functioning as social practices of de-authorization of young adults' participation in society, were also emphasized by the subjects and likewise revealed the tensions that exist in relationships of youth with freedom. The results raise important points about the orientations of psychology and child and youth studies and offers fresh insights on the notion of freedom, an idea so strongly valued in contemporary society.

State of exception and bare life : A brief analysis of the processes of social inclusion and exclusion in modernity

The philosophy of Giorgio Agamben and Carl Schmitt invites us to re-view the concept of sovereignty, from the crisis of the existing political-judicial models and the failure of liberal normativism. According to Agamben, the current system, based on a pre-oriented administration of fear, aims at eliminating those somehow non-adapted, as well as to join a defence towards a new political ontology beyond the tradition of sovereignty and law. In this context, emerges the protagonist of Agamben's work, the bare life, permanently subject to death and founded on an inclusive exclusion relation. The state of exception links life and law, violence and norm: the force-of law exercised in the state of exception conserves the law through its suspension and posits it through the exception. According to Agamben, the exception produces a zone of indistinction, a place where factum and ius are brought into conjunction, in a space where traditional political categories loses clearness and intelligibility. It is worth noting that in the schmittian conception, the liberal argument, which seeks "pure decisions" [derived logically from the law] as the foundation for any and all legal and judicial acts demonstrate the failure of liberal normativism, because, in the author's view, the "enigma" of legal indeterminacy [the fact that general legal norms are unable to reveal a precise sense at the time of its incidence in a concrete case] would provide the arguments capable of recognizing the illusionary nature of the liberal state, which is based only on the criterion of "compliance with the law" as grounds for a judicial decision. From these considerations, it is proposed to discuss the existence of a continuous state of emergency, according to Agamben's argument, as well as the guidelines proposed by Carl Schmitt in the critique of liberal legal discourse and its legal / judicial formalism.

Segregation, violence and urban expansion in Grande Terra Vermelha (Vila Velha, Espírito Santo, Brasil)

This article examines the process in which Grande Terra Vermelha's Region was shaped, embodied in historical and social elements that reveal the process of urban expansion and socio-spatial segregation that was established in the Region, located in Vila Velha - Espírito Santo, Brazil, along with the state's project of economic modernization, since the 1960s.

It's from this perspective that this paper approaches the historical conditions in which Grande Terra Vermelha was formed; identifying the extent to which uncontrolled urban expansion and deepening of socio-spatial inequalities could lead to social fragmentation and, contribute to the violence escalation in the area.

Keywords: Urban expansion, segregation and urban violence.

Human enhancement and social justice: Is there a right to not enhance?

Human enhancement (HE) might be defined as any activity which, through medical technology, increase one or more of the following dimension: psychological wellness; cognitive and physical performance, life-extension. While medicalization is concerned with (new) pathologies and therapy, HE is based on the optimization of normal conditions. The main debates on HE and social justice are focused on the permissibility to enhance and the fairness in the distribution of HE. That is: If HE would be legal how could society grant access to the biomedical devices in an era of rationing? Will human enhancement increase social inequalities? (as according to the innovation theory the better off will always have a social advantage)

Very few studies on HE deals with the enhancement of mood, perhaps because mood-brighter and cosmetic psychopharmacology need a certain degree of pathologization of a certain condition in order to be used. In the case of emotional wellbeing it seems that HE, in some respects, could take the place of social policy. A bright mood allows us to cope with difficult situations on job, college and in the family. In this context, how can people resist HE? Is there a right to not enhance?

I argue that that in order to be enhanced, human conditions will be increasingly medically framed as pathological. Human emotions are increasingly transformed (by ads) in illnesses (subjective perception of pain) and then in diseases (by science). By this bio-strategy people will increasingly be stimulated to take pharmaceuticals in order to be more functional at the job market or more integrated in the classroom. Therefore, people have the right to not enhance, but the duty to restore their health. The problem is that under two different labels (enhancement and treatment), in different periods of time, we could have the same pharmaceutical action.

The logic of therapeutic action in the construction of artificial nature

The logic of the therapeutic action is not internally coherent because "normal" and "natural" do not coincide. In fact, the essence of human beings is the attitude to contrast what is natural by their culture. For instance, if many individuals had not worn a dental brace they would not now have a nice smile. Nowadays, in an affluent society, having uniform teeth is normal, even if not natural. Culture, considered as a set of social expectations as well as biomedical technology, intervenes to modify nature. Yet, the whole process of healing, considered from a wider perspective, show a logical paradox.

Illness is something abnormal. Being normal means being healthy. If a person has a job in which s/he has to work in different hours, a job in which s/he experiences shift turns of working (a hostess, for instance) then it is natural and normal that s/he has problems with the rhythm of sleeping. However, if this condition becomes "scientifically" branded with a high-sounded label like shift work sleep disorder, these persons become sick and "abnormal" people. They are in a pathological condition: they are "hit" by a disease. Therefore in order to go back to normality they have to take a pill. To summarize: a normal reaction to an innatural lifestyle is labelled as a pathological condition (that is, an abnormal situation). Thanks to an artificial device (the pill) the subject can get used to an innatural lifestyle and be considered as (socially) healthy. S/he can return back to her/his productive role.

Drawing from the concept of indefinite medicalization (Foucault), molecular enhancement (Rose) and immunitas (Esposito) I will analyse the logical structure by which humans through technology become more biological and more natural, but not more artificial.

The role of housing in capitalism and the unequal distribution of wealth and privilege in American cities

Since 2007, the United States and much of the world have been in a financial and economic crisis of unparalleled proportions. Housing values in the country fell at a rate not seen since the Great Depression, credit markets have seized up and a sharp perception of high risk and uncertainty has emerged. Over the past few years, the housing sector has maintained exponential growth, but now is in decline due to the large losses suffered by investors in the subprime housing market. Thousands of people, especially minorities and the elderly, have lost their homes due to these lending practices that, in fact, replaced discriminatory rejection with discriminatory lending. The subprime mortgage sector in these communities is directly linked to predatory exploitation. However, the so-called Great Recession must be understood not only as a real estate crisis, but in the financial system itself. Mortgages helped to link the urban to global financial market and put the city in center of the new economy. In this sense, mortgages could be considered the representative product of the post-industrial economy and the commodification of the space illustrates the overcoming of the use value by the exchange value within the city. In this article, I will explore the role of housing in capitalism and the role of State in the reproducibility of capital by making possible the expansion of the market activity, while little or no benefit goes to the masses of people. This article argued that policies of exception have produced and intensified a geography of exclusion within the American cities.

Governance from the Alto da serra: Transgenic and technology on the highland plateau of Santa Catarina/Brazil

The expected increase of Earth population between 2 and 3 billion inhabitants until the year of 2050 makes a more intensive and productive agriculture a solution for alimentation. This same intensiveness of land and pesticides use opens the dilemma of environmental threat to the planet. Reducing impacts of agriculture without reducing the production is a matter of urgency. Brazil presents itself as a featured and controversial actor on the stage of "global storehouse" of impasses. The only one signatory from the Cartagena Protocol to hold the one of the biggest volumes of transgenic soybean production. Researchers point out the alternatives of agricultural zoning as a possible reducer of environmental damage from agriculture. In this article we present the case of the highland region of Santa Catarina/Brazil – transgenic soyfarmer small and medium-sized which mobilize high-technology - as a support for the reflection about environmental governance of the transgenic as well as how to think about limit and challenges.

Australian Aborigines, the developmental story, and powers of freedom

Late-18th century conventions of conquest and rule were in evidence when the singular, awesome power of 'The Crown' was wielded over colonial subjects of the British Empire, including settlers occupying new lands and also those populations whose territories were invaded and occupied on behalf of the Crown. Well after white settlement, forms of governance of the kind implemented in the colonising period may still be deciphered. The Northern Territory Emergency Response in 2007, for example, shows evidence of similar kinds of power implemented soon after European settlement, such as establishing controls over occupation of territory, basic life conditions and sustenance, and disciplinary forms of power over Indigenous communities, including children. This paper focuses on one aspect of the sociology and politics of liberal modes of governing: the function of specialist knowledges underpinning shifting modes of governing Aboriginal peoples.

Global unions, local power: Labor transnationalism from North America to the global south

This paper assesses the ways that workers cooperate across borders in transnational campaigns. The central findings reveal a paradox. Though global unionism is typically concerned with creating parity and universal standards across borders, I show that the local context can either undermine or empower the intentions of global actors, creating varied and uneven results. The question posed here is simple: How can global unions build local power?

This research compares three international framework agreements (IFAs) in different national-industrial contexts: private security in South Africa, contract cleaning in India, and telecommunications in Brazil. Although IFAs are regularly viewed as static contracts with universal applicability, this study views them as instruments that local workers and unions can use in different ways depending on the local circumstances. In so doing, unlike the recent surge of interest in IFAs as a transnational mechanism, I focus here on the local as a bellwether for evaluating global unionism. It compares outcomes of implementation among the different unions to understand how different local contexts effect the ability of global union federations to implement IFAs.

The process of implementation promotes grassroots mobilization in South Africa; legal changes in India; socio-cultural transformations within the union in Brazil. The point is to re-direct our attention to the local arena of transnational unionism, still the place it matters most.

Race, re-spatialization and the struggle over the iconography of the global city

Drawing on the insights of Walter Benjamin, David Harvey and Aihwa Ong, I examine contemporary Chicago as a global city propelled by powerful logics of gentrification that are consequential to race, space and the struggle over the iconography of the present and the future. This struggle has a powerful material neoliberal dimension deeply imbricated in the new terms of race and society in the twenty-first century, an era of globalization. Analyzing key policy documents, I assess the city not as a fixed or bounded settlement or geographical location but as a powerful discursive field and mobilizing project of will formation integrating and disintegrating new resources, populations and identities in the contradictory and radically volatile environment of flexible and predatory capitalism. In this dynamic environment, race is deployed as a strategic multiculturalism for managing the rough edges of the transformation of the city from a localized, industrialized and administrative complex to a global formation foregrounding finance capital, tourism, gentrified construction and commercialized residential development. This mobilization of the city as a rejuvenated and revived complex of desires and will formation—appropriating multiculturalism as a strategy of negotiating the powerful contradictions of its globalizing economies—is not only articulated to the bounded settlement of the city but is applied to the context of education in the reorganization of knowledge and the institutional restructuring of the urban university as it transforms itself into the new international "knowledge city." The new knowledge city has its birthing in a time of fiscal woes and the rise of a narrow-minded, administrative instrumentalism that champions the universalization of the enterprise ethic as the salve to financial woes precipitated by state disinvestment in public education.

Disparities among migrant farmworkers in access to primary care

Background: Among migrant farmworkers who use alcohol and other drugs in the U.S., the prevalence rate of HIV infection, possibly as high as 13.5%, is estimated to be 10 times the national rate. Migrant workers are disproportionately affected by HIV due to lack of access to health care services. The purpose of this report is to examine the distribution and characteristics of those having a primary physician in a sample of migrant farmworkers.

Methods: Baseline data were utilized from an ongoing HIV risk reduction study in Immokalee, Florida. The sample for this study consisted of 431 substance using migrant farmworkers, 29% of whom were newcomers. Eight percent were HIV-positive. Twenty-six percent reported having a primary doctor in Florida. Variables found to be significant at the bivariate level were entered into a logistic regression model with having a primary doctor as the dependent variable.

Results: One-quarter (26%) of participants had a primary doctor, as did the majority (58%) of HIV-positive participants. However, 34% of participants stated that during the preceding three months, they had considered visiting a doctor but had not. In the logistic regression analysis, having a primary doctor was significantly ($p < .05$) and positively associated with being female (Wald statistic = 7.42), having medical insurance (Wald = 39.44), and having children (Wald = 3.96), and inversely associated with being a newcomer (Wald = 5.61). The model accounted for 29% of the variance in having a doctor. The model correctly classified 90% of participants who did not have a doctor, 53% of those who did, and 81% overall.

Conclusions: This study found disparities in having a doctor among migrant farmworkers. Further study should identify the sources of care for those without a primary doctor and identify the barriers to and means to increase their access to primary care.

Moral discourse and institutional work processes in the settlement sector in Canada

This paper takes a close look at a moral discourse that collects around the category of "survival jobs" in the settlement sector, an institutional complex of community-based agencies and government funders/policymakers engaged in work processes intended to help new immigrants settle in Canada and find employment. The moral discourse – which provides an interpretive schema for reading the character of immigrants from their participation in "survival jobs"– is tracked across a series of utterances: interview excerpts, instructional texts, and encounters between immigrants and frontline settlement staff. The analytic focus combines close attention to rhetorical and knowledge practices with a consideration of the work processes and relations of accountability in which this discourse arises and is put to work. In this way, the examination of one category in action opens a window onto the broader institutional field.

Generationing relations in challenging times: Americans and Canadians in mid-life in the great recession

Generation has been argued to be a crossroads phenomenon, where multiple socio-economic influences intersect (Biggs, 2007). It has also been conceptualized as a process, something done or performed dynamically and relationally, rather than a category into which one falls (McDaniel, 2004). As a relational process, generationing builds our self-identities and our concepts of how the social order is expected to move forward. Here, we pose the question of how the multi-layered processes of generationing are affected by the shock of the 2008 + economic crisis in the United States and in Canada, two countries very differently touched by the crisis. The U.S. has suffered greatly with home foreclosures, bankruptcies, very high unemployment and poverty. Canada, by contrast, has had normal low levels of home foreclosures, few bankruptcies, and a lower level of unemployment. Our data are qualitative interviews conducted among those aged 45-64 in two classes (working class and middle class) in comparable medium-sized cities in the two countries, from fall 2008 when the economic crisis was beginning, to spring 2010. Our findings suggest that the shock of the economic crisis has deeply transformed generation, intergenerational relations and the processes and concepts of generationing, particularly in the United States.

Avoiding the tensions of professional fragmentation: The co-existence of competition, collaboration and multiple collective identities in English hospitals

Policies which link financial rewards to compliance with guidelines and the attainment of targets are on the increase globally. These have been described as changing traditional clinical identities and forms of collegiality and introducing new hierarchical structures, which fragment professions. This paper presents findings from the first three years of a 5 year empirical study examining the introduction of a 'Pay for Performance' (P4P) initiative in 24 English hospitals. It draws on interviews, observations and quantitative performance data. The P4P initiative rewards top performing hospitals and encourages competition between hospitals for bonus payments.

Sociologist of professions emphasise professional socialisation and the social reproduction of a collective identity within a professional group, but professionals are also socialised in terms of loyalty to one's organisation. The introduction of a competitive system has the potential to create divisions both between professionals in different hospitals and within hospitals between clinicians responsible for ensuring that targets are met and those who are disinclined to pursue targets and follow guidelines.

An unanticipated impact of this initiative, however, was the creation of a new collective identity amongst those charged with implementing the programme at local level. Meeting with other professionals from participating hospitals created opportunities to recount stories of failure and provide mutual support, as well as sharing learning which helped some clinicians resolve or at least reduce problems they faced. As part of this process, clinicians appeared to juggle professional and organisational loyalties, in a way which enabled them to compete and collaborate at the same time. Whilst the negotiation of these identities was not without its stresses, the new collective identity, underpinned by shared values and experiences, appeared to mitigate the potential for fragmentation which the incentive policy created.

Paying for performance in theory and practice: What can we learn from the England and the USA?

There is a growing trend amongst policy makers internationally to link payment to health care providers (as individuals and/or organisations) to the achievement of quality goals. This is despite the fact that evidence for the efficacy of such initiatives is at best, weak. Much of the literature on changes to incentive structures is informed by economic theory, which tends to focus on individuals and often ignores important contextual factors. This paper reports findings from a number of mixed method studies undertaken by the author, examining changes to incentive structures in English hospitals, community providers and primary medical care settings. The paper describes these various initiatives (the Quality and Outcomes Framework, Advancing Quality, Commissioning for Quality and Innovation and Best Practice Tariffs) highlighting differences in their design and implementation, as well as comparing these with findings from the study of US initiatives (Integrated Healthcare Association P4P, Hospital Quality Incentive Demonstration). It then goes on to illustrate the importance of adopting a more sociologically informed approach to the analysis of such initiatives. This paper describes the impact of these various initiatives on practice and performance, drawing on institutional theory. It is suggested that 'pay for performance' initiatives should be interpreted in the context of shared beliefs and taken for granted assumptions, with recent reforms potentially disrupting dominant institutional logics. From this perspective, the failure of some initiatives to make an impact is understandable. Furthermore, this highlights that increasing the impact of these reforms is not simply a matter of increasing the size of performance incentives. Perhaps more worrying still is the fact that even where performance does appear to have improved the failure to disrupt dominant institutional logics means that this improvement is unlikely to be sustained.

The value in using the extended case method for researching religion

Michael Burawoy and his colleagues at Berkeley developed and demonstrated the value of the extended case method in Sociological research. The method is an attempt at increasing the efficacy of participant observation for Sociological theory. The work of Burawoy and his colleagues did however not focus on issues involving religion to a great extent. This paper describes a study conducted at an Islamic education institute for adolescent women in Johannesburg. The paper illustrates how, using the extended case method, it was possible to comment on broad processes related to the rationalisation of religion, even though only one institute constituted the site for data collection. At the same time the extended case method mitigated certain insider/outsider dynamics, making it, the paper argues, an ideal methodology to follow when qualitative methods, in particular participant observation is employed as a tool for data collection with respect to religion.

Devising consumption: The question of "private fact"

This paper starts from the proposition that devising consumption involves getting into the mess, or dirt, of private fact. What all consumer marketing devices share is an attempt to reach into and connect with the private mixtures of beliefs, facts and ideas which shape consumer calculation. Despite more than a decade of research in the sociology of markets rejuvenated by Callon et al.'s (1998) reappraisals of calculation and subsequent analyses of the role of market devices (Callon, Muniesa & Millo, 2007) there remains a thick, and quite understandable, haze around private consumer calculation. Muniesa, Millo and Callon (2007) insisted that devices viz objects should not be split from, but taken together with, dispositions viz humans as the compound 'agencements' of economic action and yet, as much as marketing objects, tools, devices come into focus, the private business of calculation sketches only a very faint outline. There are good reasons why the sociology of markets has disdained private fact. For the rationalists, this is territory irrelevant to the formalist logic underpinning markets until converted into the action (or wisdom) of crowds, while for empiricists this is territory inaccessible to a tradition dedicated to externally observable evidence. The sociology of consumption meanwhile has had plenty to say about how consumption has been devised through the harnessing, manipulation and transformation of private beliefs, needs, longings and desires but comparatively little to say on the formal structure or empirical functioning of markets. The paper suggests that despite the application of the badge 'pragmatic' to recent work pragmatism means more than technical or empirical description. It also means loosening the boundaries of research projects to allow the full significance of connections to come to the fore; as in the connections between devices and private dispositions or between the study of markets and the study of consumption.

Competing obligations and the maintenance of physical co-presence – The impact of migration and structural constraints on post accession Polish families in the UK

The focus of the paper is on individual case studies selected for the purpose of illuminating the experiences of post-accession Polish migrant 'family lives' in the UK, including: lone fathers living in the UK, entire families who have relocated to the UK and families split between Poland and the UK. These case studies demonstrate what Morgan (1996) calls the movement of individuals through households and family relationships, simultaneous with the examination of the enlargement of the spaces in which family lives are conducted as a consequence of movement across the 'open borders' between the UK and Poland (Ryan 2010). Our focus is on how our interviewees articulate what they present to us as the impact of particular structural constraints (in terms of education, pensions, childcare and employment) on their future plans to settle in the UK or return to Poland. However, the central focus of the paper is the relationship between these structural constraints and the tensions associated with fulfilling competing familial obligations – a central aspect of the latter is our interviewees' concerns about the impact of migration (and return migration) on their ability to maintain physical co-presence with family members in the UK and Poland in the future (despite their abilities to maintain virtual intimacies through various tele-communication media). This paper examines the emotional responses of individuals at particular stages of the life course who are 'torn' between two different countries and often two sets of family members (and associated obligations), that is, those 'left behind' and those who have migrated with them, but also in the context of the open borders between the UK and Poland, some of our interviewees' fears of being left behind in the UK by their grown up children who could return to Poland.

Dignity, happiness and being able to live a 'normal life' – An examination of post-accession Polish migrants' autobiographical transnational fields

This paper examines data from a qualitative study of post-accession Polish migrants living in the UK. We examine the articulation and implications of our interviewees' comparisons between their lives in the UK and their recollections of what their lives were like in Poland. These comparisons are animated by 'paired', autobiographical comparisons between 'material deprivations' in Poland relative to their experiences of 'material gratification' in the UK. In the paper we examine themes from our interviews such as 'dignity', 'normality', 'happiness' and the 'affordability' and 'ease' of life in the UK (compared to Poland). By so doing we examine what Robin Cohen (following Soysal) calls the new typography of practices that we suggest have emerged as a result of post-accession Polish migration to the UK. We focus on the discursive practices that define what Habib calls migrants' continuing relationship with their 'homeland'. We conceptualize this, following Levitt and Schiller, as a transnational autobiographical field. We suggest that the discursive practices in this field and the contradictory emotions evoked in and by them are performative devices that sustain their 'home-making' practices in the UK but also and make problematic their return to Poland.

Everyday religion and embodied practice

Sociology of religion has uncritically accepted, for its conception of "religion," definitional boundaries that were the historical results of centuries-long political struggles in both the Catholic and Protestant churches over profoundly contested meanings. Notions of sacred space and sacred time, miracle, magic, and religious power were hotly contested, yet many of those notions still hold some salience for religious individuals, long after authorities have denounced them as error. One of the key definitional changes distinguishing "official religion" (in Western Christianity) was giving primacy to belief (over practice). A concomitant change was to make sacred and profane dichotomous, privileging the spiritual realm (as sacred) over the material (denigrated as profane), and treating the human body as profane and an obstacle to the spiritual. Sociology should find ways to understand religion without adopting such a culturally and historical narrow (indeed theologically biased) definitional starting point.

If we want to understand the full range of religion as practiced and experienced by ordinary people in the context of their everyday lives, we need to be aware of how people's religious and spiritual expressions engage their material bodies and address their material concerns. We need to take seriously not merely the packages of religious narratives supplied by institutions but –more important—the myriad individual ways by which people remember, share, enact, adapt, create and combine the "stories" out of which they live. I use the concept of "embodied practices" to emphasize those ritual and expressive activities through which spiritual meanings and understandings are embedded in and accomplished through the body (e.g., bodily senses, postures, gestures, and movements). I illustrate using two sets of examples of embodied religious/spiritual practices: practices around growing, preparing, and eating food, and practices of dancing and singing together.

"La Cámpora" en la última campaña presidencial para entender las relaciones entre movimientos sociales y kirchnerismo

Argentina has a rich history of protests and social movements that have been the catalyst for many changes. In 2003, when Néstor Kirchner assumed the presidency, social movements began to function in accordance with the State, and some members were able to assume government positions. In addition, movements started to form from within the state.

An example of this type of movement is the "La Cámpora", a youth social and political movement that identifies with kirchnerism and peronsim and holds the belief that the two political ideologies function together. "La Cámpora" is unique because it always functioned within the State.

This paper seeks to explore the relationship between social movements and the state, especially movements that form within the government, through a case study of "La Cámpora" during the presidential and national elections in 2011 by reconstructing and analyzing their activities during the campaign, the participation of members in electoral lists, and their response to the outcomes of the election.

This paper outlines a brief history of social movements in Argentina and social movement theories to aid in the analysis of the various ways the relationship between the government and "La Cámpora" manifested itself during the election. It analyzes the values of "La Cámpora", their involvement in "el Frente Para la Victoria", their daily activities, the ways that "La Cámpora" showed their support for Cristina Fernández de Kirchner during the election, the activities carried out specifically by "La Cámpora Quijotero" (in Caballito, City of Buenos Aires), participation of members of "La Cámpora" in electoral lists, reactions to results of the election, and reflections on the tensions that this type of relationship can form. Ultimately, it seeks to prove how the activities during the campaign demonstrate a symbiotic relationship between "La Campora" and the government.

Knowledge transfer, academic capital and public intellectuals: A comparative study of social sciences, 1950-1990

Contemporary debates about the public intellectuals and public sociologists have been dominated by historical narratives of decline and renewal as well as polemics for or against academic forms of knowledge production (Buroway 1994; Collini 2006; Jacoby 1987; McLaughlin and Townsley 2011). While there is a substantial empirically oriented as well critical literature on scholarly reputations and citation analysis (Clemens, Powell and McIlwaine 1995), scholarship on the relationship between academic and "public" forms of reputation has lacked the empirical focus pioneered in the Bourdieu (1988) tradition. This paper will take a historical entry point into research on the complex relationship between academic and "public" forms of reputation and reputational trajectories by looking at the academic and public reception of a systematically selected sample of high-status academics from the 1950s in American sociology, political science, anthropology and economics over a span of four decades. We selected a cohort of highly cited scholars in these fields based on citation counts in the period 1956-65 in the Social Science Citation Index. Our research design allows us to compare the citation patterns and popular reception of scholars who write to largely restricted peer-reviewed audiences (both disciplinary and cross-disciplinary) with those who engage broad public audiences. We will examine the patterns in the reception of these academics within and across disciplines, as well as in the public sphere. We will present data on citation counts, trace patterns of influence across disciplines, and look at the relationship between status within the respective academic fields and efforts to bridge social scientific knowledge into the public sphere through elite intellectual journals, popular media, and commercial press books. We will make the case for a systematic use of social science measurements and the comparative method when thinking about knowledge transfer, and forms of capital in scholarly and public intellectual work.

Social economy, the state, and alternative energy: The privatization of energy work through environmentalism

For "Western" countries, the state has traditionally been the major developer, provider, and regulator of energy. This is a result of both economic reality (the high costs of the production of power such as hydro as well as the construction of an energy grid) and political imperative (as affordable energy is central to both a comfortable standard of living as well as business development). Part of the unwritten bargain of state development in energy (and elsewhere) has also been that the jobs created in the process would be well paying, long-term, and usually unionized work. The energy sector then was important was part of the post-war compromise.

Fast forward to 2012 and we find states in serious retreat as providers of services as well as employers, with only the iconic or strategic sectors of its economic activity still in its hands. Into this context, we can locate the increasingly popular conception of the Social Economy as one that allows dismantling of various state programs through the promise (and sometimes reality) of community control.

This paper will in its first section examine the strong Social Economy alternative energy sectors in four countries - Canada, the UK, Denmark and Germany - to compare and contrast the policy tools used to "privatize" the energy sector and which of these actually achieve some degree of community control. In its second section, the paper will examine the promise of the Social Economy to preserve the quality and location of energy sector jobs, and the reasons behind the failure of the Social Economy and the state to realize this promise in their practice. In conclusion, the paper argues that it is important for any "privatization" of a state economic activity to "lock" good jobs into the community.

Young women democratizing the workplace: Gendered union organizing in the feminized US service sector

In this study, I examine young women's experiences as workers and active organizers of a unionization drive at an upscale retail grocery store that was part of a large national chain in the feminized US service sector. Despite management's efforts to elicit worker consent—by using seemingly democratic team-based work systems and by crafting an image of environmental responsibility and "diversity and individuality" acceptance—workers at these two stores sought to unionize. Based on in-depth interviews with twenty former worker-organizers, I show how consent broke down when workers experienced contradictions between the company's image and managerial behavior. Dissatisfaction stemming in part from policy changes in dress code, led to organizing campaigns in which workers invoked the company's same democratic and green rhetoric to legitimize their efforts. I examine how perceived limits to freedom of gender expression sparked the organizing drive, how transgendered and women workers negotiated the traditional masculine model of organizing, and their experiences with paternalism both inside the union and with the company. Both organizing drives failed, however, because of managerial recalcitrance, high turnover, and weak support from established unions as is characteristic of feminized service work.

Conditional cash transfer and the monitoring of conditionalities: Aspects of implementation of Brazil's Bolsa Familia program in varied municipal contexts

This article aims to analyze the strategies developed by municipal managers of Brazil's conditional cash transfer program "Bolsa Familia", in monitoring families that fail to comply with the program's conditionalities. The focus is on the uses and meanings of conditionalities within the context of local implementation of this national social policy. The argument developed here intends to question some key aspects present in the official view about the role of conditionalities in poverty alleviation strategies, such as: the role of conditionalities in breaking inter-generational poverty cycle; flagging for vulnerability and the need of extra care; and political legitimization of cash transfers to the poor. The article draws upon data collected in a research project conducted in seven municipalities in the state of Paraíba, Northeast Brazil. The research utilizes a combination of archival research methods, interviews and surveys, as well as a broad literature review. Preliminary research results suggest that although conditionalities play an important role in the national managing of the program, locally they have been used with the purpose of coping with municipalities' own political instability and institutional fragilities, which may be playing against some key objectives of the program.

Revisiting autonomy: Historical turning points in NGOs-state relations in contemporary Brazil

This article aims to identify changes in the patterns of relationship between Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) and the State in Brazil, by focusing on how the notion of 'autonomy', as a key element to the formation of NGOs' identities, has been reframed over time as a response to the changes occurred in the organizations' broader political-institutional environment. The argument developed here emphasizes some historical landmarks that are considered as turning points in the relationship that NGOs have historically established with the Brazilian state. The article draws upon data collected through two research projects conducted with leaders of Brazilian NGOs. The first research was carried out in 2005 with a group of ten organizations located in two Brazilian cities, Recife (capital of the Northeastern state of Pernambuco) and São Paulo (capital of the Southeastern state of São Paulo); the second is still in progress and represents an update of the first research project. Both research projects utilize a combination of archival research methods, interviews and surveys, as well as a broad literature review. Preliminary results indicate that in the last few years there has been occurring a change in NGOs-State relationships mainly as a result of an increased participation of NGOs in both the implementation of governments social policies and the recently established participatory institutional channels, such as public policy councils, participatory budget committees, and public hearings.

Contesting neoliberalism from below. Models of social policy at sub-national level

Comparative analyses of welfare systems have largely proceeded on the basis that coherent nation states exist. This assumption was always problematic, as many theorists have acknowledged, because of the potential variance within the national context in terms of social policy. In the case of Mexico, this is particular true. Though residing in national context which acute constitutional limitation vis-à-vis the Mexican federal government, Mexico City has a special status flowing from their central role in the national economy, political and cultural life and, most relevant, in social policy innovation. Mexico City has implemented a rights-based approach of social policy, which has been explicitly positioned as an alternative to the neoliberal model imposed by the national government. Furthermore, Mexico City's social policy has been emulated by other states and—to lesser extent—by the federal government. The aim of this paper is twofold. First, it will discuss the relevance of taking into consideration sub-national variance in terms of social policy in Mexico and Latin American contexts. Second, by examining the case of Mexico City, this paper tries to explain the potential role of sub-national entities in promoting social policy changes at national level.

The elusive pursuit of social justice for Dalits in Uttar Pradesh, India

Caste has historically been one of the principal axes of social injustice in India, and numerous movements have emerged over the years to challenge it. Although belatedly, in the north-Indian state of Uttar Pradesh too, various political and non-political Dalit organizations have been trying since the 1940s to mobilize Dalits (ex-untouchables / scheduled castes) and bring about self-respect and social justice to them. This paper will analyse the achievement of social justice among Dalits in the north-Indian state of Uttar Pradesh since the formation of Dalit-led Bahujan Samaj Party in 1984, from the perspective of Amartya Sen's capability approach and idea of justice. Section 1 will discuss the theoretical as well as empirical appropriateness of 'capability' as the central focal variable in the assessment of social justice. And since capability to avoid premature mortality is the most fundamental and vital of human capabilities (we need to be alive to be capable of pursuing anything), and on whose value a universal consensus is possible, section 2 will use the under-five mortality rate as a proxy to assess the progress of Dalits in Uttar Pradesh on the scale of capability / justice by comparing their performance with that of the so-called upper castes in Uttar Pradesh, as well as with that of Dalits in five Indian states with the highest percentage of Dalit population. Section 3 will outline the capability-achievements / -deprivations of Dalits in Uttar Pradesh (based on qualitative fieldwork in ten villages of the state during 2009-10) in educational and economic spheres, which account for their most basic capability-deprivations. Finally, as a matter of conclusion, the paper will try to highlight what Dalits in Uttar Pradesh – and this paper – have or have not been able to achieve.

Normative and rational forces driving corrupt decisions among students within social networks: A vignette study

Beside the benefits of social capital for individuals and the society as a whole (such as weak ties for obtaining information or generalized trust) there is also a dark side of social capital, for instance, corruption. Corrupt actors try to veil their illegal actions which points to the fact that most corrupt actions do not occur between strangers, but rather between actors who are embedded in long-term social networks. Corruption can be considered as a result of a deliberation process including the evaluation of the trustworthiness of the partner in crime, benefits from the deal, potential cost, and the probability of being detected.

Corrupt relationships are usually considered within a principal-agent-client model. This model presumes an agent (here: a teaching assistant) to pursue his/her opportunistic interests and the interests of the client (a student) also, while both actors violate the principal's (university) guidelines. Although the principal promotes legal/regulative principles (universalistic code of conduct), the agent takes advantage of his/her position and follows a particularistic norm which benefits the client.

A vignette was presented to 2.262 students describing a typical principal-agent-client corruption situation at university. We varied the situational conditions (trustworthiness of the client, benefits, costs, probability of detection). The students were asked whether or not they would commit corruption if they were the agent in that particular situation.

Our findings support both a decision perspective and the assumption of conflicting norms where norm divergence is a stronger explanation factor than deliberation. For the largest subgroup of the sample universalistic norms prescribe (non-corrupt) behavior ceteris paribus while in another subgroup universalistic norms are debased in favor of particularistic motives. Finally in a smaller group we find evidence for the dominance of hard instrumental incentives.

Our study implies that policy and organizational measures against corruption could be improved when norm-conflicts are regarded.

In order to realize this study we used the approach of multi-situated ethnography, the constants inserts in the research field in the three mentioned cities, where we realized interviews with people linked to different religious expressions and political tendencies. Nevertheless, it was important to understand what are the commons contributions existing in the three cities, and how they facilitate the transnational religious process. Dynamic carpooling : A chance for a social equity in urban renovation areas?

In current societies, abilities to travel and to commute constitute a capital (Kaufmann, 2004). Mobility behaviors and especially modal choices are often obvious choices. Everyday routines avoid to query them daily (Verplanken, 1999). But people who move house have to compare several travel options.

In France, urban renovations policies often lead to destroy buildings and to rebuild new ones. That's why households who live in poorest areas of Tourcoing, North (where case study takes place) are required to rehouse. Our study aimed to understand deeply people's everyday mobility behaviors before relocation and changes after this ordeal in a qualitative point of view.

Owning a car in such a poor area means being normal. As most people need to apply for the driving license exam 3 or 4 times before passing it, car ownership sounds like a revenge on society. Then people often completely switch from public transports to cars even if they can't afford it.

Therefore informal carpooling doesn't look strange in such a context. It allows to face unexpected events (breakdowns) or to share/delay unexpected spending (fueling price, insurance fees) in order to keep a temporary job or to reach a store.

Our paper examine in which extend Dynamic Carpooling (forthcoming real-time means to match and share rides using GPS on smart-phones) could be useful for Tourcoing poor inhabitants (especially those who have to change their commuting habits due to relocation). If DC works theoretically (several experiments proved it) it currently fails to reach the critical mass number of users. Would it be relevant to lean on poor areas inhabitants (instead of rich ones according to top-down model of innovation scattering) to enhance DC? In which extend DC could both contribute to a healthy environment and reduce social inequality? Our paper will list positive and negative arguments.

Web-based visual communication for social criticism: Powerful design

The Internet is a social place that allows multiple forms of communication and interaction. Social media has extended the capacity of low-investment campaigns, which has been more effective when non-corporate, political, pro-social aims are in play. High quality visual communication (VC) has emerged with potential persuasive power, in part because it wisely uses rhetorical appeals. It depicts and criticizes social issues trying to persuade their audiences to act according to desired social behaviors. This paper analyzes the influence of this web-based visually rich communication objects in the awareness of complex global issues and the attitudes and behaviors of people in society.

Four VC pieces are analyzed in this paper: the Story of Stuff video series, the Though Bubble video series, some of the RSA Animate online lectures; and Everything is a Remix video series. These VC pieces show that a combination of new media strategy with design qualities such as the rhetorical appeals creates ability to reach broad audiences. Even though they seem to boost the social impact of information, evidence of actual attitudes and social behavior change is unclear. Even if the VC transforms attitudes, a "value-action gap" (Blake, 1999) may remain large, which result in a low actual impact. This paper uses three analyses to identify the level of influence of this VC in social intentions, attitudes, and behavior change. First, a rhetorical analysis focuses on understanding rational, emotional and character appeals. Second, a secondary source search of news and online popularity reports level of diffusion. Third, experts are interviewed including producers and designers of the VC pieces and communication researchers.

Flexicurity indicators for monitoring European employment strategy

Flexicurity is a European labour market policy adopted in 2007 within the European Employment Strategy. The policy aims at combining the ongoing flexibilization of employment relations (easing firing and hiring, adjustable working hours, variable pay, etc.) with the traditions of the European welfare state.

The paper summarizes empirical studies from about 30 research reports and articles written from 2004 to 2010, in an attempt to operationalize the concept from eight different viewpoints: (1) neo-liberal, (2) trade-unionist, (3) of the European welfare state, (4) of working time, (5) of precarious employment, (6) of job quality and lifelong learning, (7) of trends in collective agreements, and (8) of macroeconomic development with regard to the current crisis.

The summary provides empirical evidence of increasing labour flexibility accompanied by a decline of social security. It also shows that the countries with higher flexibility are more affected by the crisis. This is a serious warning against improper implementation of flexicurity and its one-sided use in favour of employers.

Reform proposals to tackle labour market segmentation

Six policy measures to improve labour market performance, particularly to tackle its segmentation, and to enhance social dialogue are discussed: (1) flexinsurance which assumes that the employer's contribution to social security should be proportional to the flexibility of the contract, (2) work-place tax which considers bad working conditions as "social pollution" and operates by analogy with the environment-protection tax, (3) basic income independent of employment status to stimulate unemployment-to-work transitions by excluding losses of out-of-work benefits, (4) politicization of trade-unions to enhance their presence in political debates after the loss of influence of left parties, (5) structural reallocation of trade-unions, corresponding to multi-nationals (e.g. "Coca-Cola union"), as opposed to national unions which can hardly negotiate with multinationals, and (6) constraining financial markets, since export of jobs in form of foreign investments gives employers a legal instrument of pressure on national governments: "deregulate labour markets, otherwise we move jobs abroad". Some reforms can be based on composite indicators of working conditions developed as prototypes by the Hans-Böckler Foundation. For instance, the work-place tax can be determined with regard to the individual index of working conditions. It should be noted that such a policy measure should not be regarded only as a burden for employers to stimulate improving working conditions. It is also a measur to improve the production quality due to better jobs, which is vital for the competitiveness of the European economy in the long run.

Being the change: Performative acts in social movements

Among the strategies used by social movement activists are protests, demonstrations, and other collective actions that symbolically call attention to injustices, create sufficient interference with the status quo that change becomes preferable to ongoing disruption, or otherwise demonstrate the unity and commitment of large numbers to a cause. These collective actions historically include vigils, marches, boycotts, and occupations, among others.

However, some social movement performances, such as Gandhi's march to the sea to make salt, sit-ins at "whites only" lunch counters by African Americans in the 1960s, and the more recent efforts by Saudi Arabian women to drive cars, are more than acts of resistance; they are embodiments of the changes being sought. Each of these performances not only called attention to injustice, but courageously demonstrated that the power necessary for change was embodied in those seeking such change. Indeed, the use of force to suppress such performances and intimidate their repetition suggests an awareness, however unconscious, on the part of the dominant culture or authorities, of the power of performance to create change. Thus, Gandhi's admonition to be the change we seek in the world can be interpreted not only as a call for inspirational behavior, but as an understanding of this power.

This paper uses performance theory to analyze and interpret social movement activities. It will distinguish between collective performances that are primarily symbolic or disruptive and those that create, however momentarily, the change being sought. In doing so, it will apply to collective social movement performances the work of feminist philosopher Judith Butler that held that performative acts do not simply express gender, but constitute it through their repetition. Furthermore, this paper will suggest that individuals outside of organized social movements sometimes perform acts that mimic collective performances, adding to the ability of performance to constitute change.

"Trayectorias en movimiento. Itinerario de dos dirigentes políticos entre dictadura y democracia. Argentina 1966-1989"

El estudio tiene como objetivo principal analizar el recorrido de dos trayectorias biográficas de dirigentes políticos periféricos que integraron los partidos mayoritarios de la Argentina, el justicialismo y el radicalismo, y que lograron ser líderes regionales de sus respectivos partidos en la década del 80. Se busca a través de estas biografías observar y comprender los cambios y continuidades que generaron las interrupciones institucionales que atravesó el país durante el periodo 1966-1989. Se ha escogido la aproximación biográfica porque no sólo resulta iluminadora para dar cuenta del contexto de producción de estos liderazgos sino también para percibir las estrategias y la manera en que las decisiones individuales modifican/reorientan las mismas carreras políticas en contextos adversos y favorables. Las sucesivas alternancias entre gobiernos de corte autoritario y democrático hicieron que estos dos individuos utilizaran distintas destrezas y habilidades –recursos relacionales y económicos- para poder alcanzar/ conservar/ recuperar las posiciones de poder que lograron en sus respectivas organizaciones. A través de estas experiencias vitales se busca advertir la diversidad de voces, ambiciones y recorridos que complejizan la mirada sobre el proceso dictadura-democracia a la vez que las mismas colaboran en especificar la configuración de poder regional-nacional y la movilidad social que genera la actividad política. El rescate de la acción individual resulta fructífero para dar cuenta de las diferentes lógicas que atraviesan los espacios de socialización y participación en los que participaron y se formaron estos líderes políticos. La metodología privilegiada para la reconstrucción de estas biografías ha sido primordialmente la perspectiva cualitativa. Las fuentes utilizadas han sido principalmente entrevistas en profundidad como así también se ha recurrido a la prensa, a las memorias de gobierno y de los partidos políticos, entre otras.

The parliamentarization of presidentialism

The non-anticipated democratic sustainability of coalition-based presidentialism begs the question about what makes it function. In this paper we argue that political scientists are ill equipped to answer this puzzle with analytical tools provided by the received wisdom about constitutional design. This recent development is welcome given that multiparty presidentialism has become the modal form of presidential democracy, especially in Latin America. Until the 1980s, the received wisdom about constitutional design had it that two party parliamentary systems were superior to its alternatives, namely, presidentialism and multi-party parliamentary systems. Comparativists over half a century seemed to have shared this view of coalitions. Strong presidents in multiparty systems were the black beasts of constitutional design experts. Research on presidentialism followed a similar path from open criticism to a mixed view of the "perils of presidentialism." While a more nuanced view of presidentialism appeared in Shugart and Carey's seminal work, recent scholarship has argued that government formation under presidentialism and parliamentarism shares the same underlying institutional logic. Recent developments in Latin America has given support not only to the general argument that coalition government is both viable and functional but also to the more controversial claim that strong presidents under multipartism may be a precondition for effective government. What explains the unanticipated success of multiparty presidentialism, or parliamentarization of presidentialism? We argue that three factors help explain why this constitutional arrangement is both feasible and functional: the powers of presidents, the existence of tradable coalition goods (pork, ministerial portfolios, among others) and the strength of institutional checks on the executive's discretion. Good governance is conditional on the delegation of extensive powers to both presidents and autonomous institutions that checks on the executives.

Migrants' pursuit of happiness: The impacts of adaptation, social comparison, and relative deprivation on subjective well-being using German panel data

Abstract: Combining two lines of research showing contrasting evidence, we examine the relationship between migration and subjective well-being (SWB). The main goal of the research is to understand the impacts of adaptation, social comparison and relative deprivation on the change in SWB associated with moving from Eastern to Western Germany after the German reunification in 1989. We suspect that the gains or losses in subjective well-being after migration are affected by the group with whom migrants choose to compare themselves (that is, their reference group), their former peers in the East or their new peers in the West, the way they adapt to their new conditions and how well they integrate into the new society. To date, there is little research concerning changes in well-being associated with migration. Most research has been based on cross-sectional data because migrants usually drop out of these datasets when relocating to a new country. We use the unique long-running German Socio-Economic Panel (SOEP) Study to follow migrants after their relocation and to examine any changes in subjective well-being while netting out the impact of personality traits that are known to be important correlates of SWB. We estimate fixed- and random-effects Generalized Least Square panel regression models. Our results indicate a positive and lasting effect of migration on SWB, although it is strongly suppressed by dissatisfaction resulting from the comparison of migrants' income with the incomes of their former peers in East and their new peers in West Germany.

Representing the "voice": A critical perspective on participatory video practice

The slogan "giving voice to those who often come unheard" has expanded largely in different fields of video production such as campaigns for social awareness, visual activism projects, as well as in ethnographic film research and documentary movies. An implicit assumption of this slogan is that video practices could be useful both for research or decision-making processes and for social change in itself. Its main aim is generally stated as "making visible the point of view of the other"; or at least, some aspects or interpretations of it. This perspective should be considered the core of many visual disciplines and concrete visual research projects; and, most certainly, of video participatory practices. Very often, all of the steps of a participatory video production -from its fieldwork to the end product- have as their main goal to allow the participants to express themselves, hence resulting in the overall goal of representing their "voice". In these cases very often the camera is considered as a mere instrument to reach these goals. My contention here would be that some of such instrumental uses of the camera run the risk of reifying particular "models of representation", which are not generally discussed in the process of such participatory practices. But if it is true that "the medium is the message", the modes of representation are as important as content in order to subvert "the institutional way of seeing". The proposal of this paper would be to problematize and to reflect on the use of the camera in the "mise-en-scène" of participants' "voice" by themselves, as well as the proposal of a possible categorization -deriving from film studies- ranging from participant camera, participatory camera, dialogic camera and reflexive camera. In order to illustrate my argument, I will present some examples from an ongoing participatory project with migrants in Tuscany.

Participatory planning at a metropolitan level: Can it work?

The most common experiences on social participation are in local level – see, for example, participatory planning and participatory budget practices in Brazil after the 1988 Federal Constitution. Some authors present the idea that in the local level people are pushed to get together and participate in government decisions in a more feasible way. The paper intends to discuss the perspectives of participatory planning in a wider level, that is, the metropolitan governance.

The discussion is to be built around the analysis of Belo Horizonte Metropolitan Area governance structure, which has been changed since 2004. One of the main shifts was the presence of two council members representing the civil society in the Metropolitan Deliberative Board. Also there is an informal Social Meeting consisted of various social sectors leaders, from popular to entrepreneurs, which supports those council members. This Social Meeting has been responsible for important decisions at the Board, and it has been working since 2007. Particularly in the recent Metropolitan Master Plan process it had an important role. Besides, during the Master Plan participatory process, a Metropolitan Citizen Forum was created by some of the participants, including those who were from the Social Meeting. This experience is to be analyzed, in order to contribute to the debate about possibilities and perspectives of participation at metropolitan level. Some questions will be raised concerning the Social Meeting organization and its actions regarding to the Metropolitan Deliberative Board, to discuss conflicts and limits. At what extent can it really push for an autonomous organization and make some difference in metropolitan governance? Considering the Metropolitan Citizen Forum experience, can we say that it is really representative? At what extent can State Govern control participation? Can autonomy be constructed at a wider territorial level?

Dissolving interviews into conversations: Participating in the everyday life of international migrants Connectivity between source and destination points is an inherent aspect of international migrations, and in the contemporary age, the use of the Computer Mediated Communication (CMC) links "here" and "there" in a daily basis. This paper explores the strategies for data collection in interactions with and between international migrants and their descendants in synchronous CMC systems, such as webchat and instant messenger. An important aspect of these systems is the interest of people to talk rather than being interviewed, and another is that as communication through these systems differs from that face-to-face, a different etiquette is required of the researcher, that should avoid that the act of posing questions during the written communication resembles an interview. Thus, the interview and its features must be dissolved into conversation. However, this method requires the establishment of contact with many people over a period of time and the ability of the researcher to talk and to ask open-ended questions in order to obtain spontaneous responses, unexpected revelations and stories. The advantage of this method is the maintenance of contact with people, which enables the grounded theorist to participate in the everyday life of international migrants or their descendants, combining data collection and data analysis.

Cinema and society: The construction of a "fictional reality"

This paper deals with the special construction of reality made by films which acquire significant epistemological interest when we are dealing with documental cinema, where the confusion and the merge between the reality of images and the exterior "reality" that the camera faces are more fragrant and undeniable. So, it discusses the appearance of the documental cinema by means of analyzing its original variations – the documentary, the social documentary, and the ethnographic movie – in their relationships with the knowledge possibilities they offer, or the access to knowledge of the social reality they allude. This analysis criticizes the positivist foundations that organizes the first documental films and the positivist watch that audience gives to them, and to documental films in general until nowadays, fundamental for the misperception of a film as the "real" itself, inquiring their epistemological potentialities about what kind of information those images suggest. So, if we can think that these films bring information about what is shown by its images and sounds, we can also think that they bring a lot of more information about the values and valuations that institute the filmic narrative made by the film maker or director.

Inmigración y fronteras urbanas: Los Paraguayos en la ciudad de Buenos Aires

Este trabajo se enmarca en una línea de investigación de larga presencia y renovada actualidad en las ciencias sociales del último siglo: la problemática de la distribución y segregación espacial de los grupos sociales en las ciudades.

El objetivo de la ponencia es analizar cómo se distribuyen espacialmente los inmigrantes paraguayos en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, indagando en cómo se articula la existencia de concentración residencial de este colectivo en determinadas zonas del espacio urbano con las interacciones cotidianas que desarrollan. Partiendo de una mirada crítica respecto a la noción de segregación espacial entendida en términos de distancias físicas entre los grupos, y considerando que el territorio se encuentra atravesado por múltiples divisiones que conforman un trazado de fronteras socialmente constituido, se busca problematizar la relación entre distancias físicas y distancias sociales, es decir, entre la concentración espacial de los paraguayos en la ciudad y la construcción de fronteras sociales/simbólicas entre los grupos, en cuyo marco las diferencias y distancias se construyen como tales.

Metodológicamente, se plantea una triangulación de métodos cuantitativos y cualitativos, que permita abordar el fenómeno de una manera integral: un análisis macrosocial cuantitativo que posibilite dar cuenta de la distribución espacial de los migrantes paraguayos, en términos de distancias físicas, a nivel de la ciudad en su conjunto; y un estudio macrosocial cualitativo —a través de un estudio de caso— de las experiencias e interrelaciones cotidianas de estos individuos, a partir del cual reconstruir el entramado de relaciones, prácticas y dinámicas sociales a través de las cuales el espacio urbano se construye y reconstruye constantemente en su carácter diferencial.

Improving access to educational materials in sub Saharan health professions schools

The World Health Organization estimates that Sub-Saharan Africa alone needs an additional 1.5 million health workers in order to deliver essential health services for its populations. One critical area for technical assistance and investment is in creating an affordable supply of quality textbooks, educational materials and equipment to effectively educate and train the health workforce. Recognizing the important need for more materials for health sciences education and training in the African Region a feasibility study has been conducted in 9 (one Lusophone, five Anglophone and three Francophone) and Sub Saharan countries, under the WHO guidance. The study, conducted in 2011, surveyed 48 key stakeholders, 456 educators and 830 students from 21 medical and 18 nursing schools.

The objective of the study was to review current conditions with respect to market supply and demand; legal and regulatory conditions; and administrative and operational capacity in order to predict the feasibility of establishing and maintaining a textbooks, instructional materials and diagnostic equipment programme and fund in selected countries of the WHO African Region. The information obtained from the study contributes to the stewardship capacity of the national governments.

The results of the study showed that the current supply of textbooks for medical and nursing students in the selected countries is poor. The access to textbooks is being done mainly through photocopies or lending mechanisms among students. According to the students opinions the schools libraries are well stocked but the educators are unsatisfied with the libraries conditions. The reactions towards a programme that will facilitate access to educational materials were studied and a high level of acceptance was found.

Currently the results of the study are being instrumental to the development of a regional fund that will contribute to improve the quality of the educational process.

Les défis de la question migratoire face à un travail globalisé

Faire à façon ou s'affranchir ? C'est au travers de ce prisme réduit, qui renvoie à deux formats productifs et aussi à deux postures possibles de la dynamique du capitalisme dans un contexte de mondialisation que nous allons focaliser cette communication. Et c'est notamment sur l'étude des pays « Suds » que nous allons pouvoir observer les formes les plus émergentes et contemporaines de mondialisation économique et sociale. On observe notamment dans ces espaces frontaliers au Sud un double processus : le premier est une transnationalisation des territoires productifs et le second est une informalisation des secteurs industriels notamment avec la connexion au secteur marchand.

La soberanía alimentaria en disputa: El rol de Argentina en el contexto crítico contemporáneo

Desde diversos ángulos se destaca el rol de la Argentina como productor agropecuario y como uno de los escasos países que gozan del privilegio de tener un importante superávit alimentario. En tanto que su población apenas supera los 40 millones de personas, sus campos producen comida para 400 millones. A este argumento se pliegan los discursos que ponen al aumento de la producción agropecuaria como la solución al problema del hambre en el mundo. Sin embargo, los datos disponibles de FAO destacan un rotundo fracaso en las metas de reducción del hambre fijadas a mediados de los 90's. Paradójicamente, en un momento donde la producción agraria mercantil se expandió notablemente, la cantidad de personas que pasan hambre en el mundo subió casi un 30%.

En los últimos 30 años el modelo agrícola intensivo, competitivo y orientado al mercado ha producido profundas transformaciones. En todo el mundo se detecta la erosión de estrategias de autoconsumo, la creciente mercantilización del acceso a la alimentación, la profundización de formas de producción que tienen serios efectos sobre el medio ambiente y que, por su enorme dependencia a los combustibles fósiles, incrementa los efectos del cambio climático.

De ahí que surge la necesidad de desplazarse desde un eje argumentativo que privilegia la producción hacia una mirada centrada en la distribución y el acceso a los alimentos y a una producción autónoma conceptualizada a partir de la noción de soberanía alimentaria. En este sentido, la ponencia busca problematizar el modelo de desarrollo agropecuario argentino y sus consecuencias socio-ambientales. Para ello nos centraremos en la estrecha conexión que tienen las transformaciones en el sistema productivo, los desastres naturales y conflictos sociales producto del avance de la frontera agropecuaria, y la problemática del acceso a la alimentación y la desnutrición en sectores populares urbanos y rurales.

La práctica testimonial sobre la experiencia concentracionaria en Argentina

En este trabajo me propongo reflexionar en torno a las modalidades del testimonio sobre la experiencia concentracionaria argentina a partir de reconstruir y analizar el recorrido testimonial de un sobreviviente de un centro clandestino de detención de la última dictadura militar (1976-1983). Parto del supuesto de que la posición de testigo no se deriva directa ni necesariamente de haber vivido un determinado acontecimiento, sino que aquella requiere que el sujeto ejerza una práctica testimonial en relación a esa experiencia. Asumir dicha posición, sin embargo, no recae únicamente en la voluntad o elección subjetiva de contar la propia experiencia sino, también, en la existencia de un otro dispuesto a escucharla; es decir, en la configuración de una demanda social que cree las condiciones para que esa experiencia pueda ser objeto de indagación.

El material primordial sobre el cual reflexionaré en este trabajo fue producido a partir de dos entrevistas en profundidad que le realicé a Miguel, un sobreviviente del centro clandestino de detención "Club Atlético". Me concentraré en recuperar su experiencia testimonial en tres momentos diferentes del país: durante la dictadura militar, durante la transición democrática y en la actualidad, luego de la reapertura de las causas judiciales que juzgan a los represores. En cada uno de estos contextos intentaré reconocer las condiciones de la producción testimonial, es decir, las formas en las que le fue solicitado (o no) su testimonio, los ámbitos en los que lo brindó y los actores sociales involucrados en él. Asimismo, indagaré en torno su concepción sobre la práctica de testificar; concepción en la que se entrelazan el por qué, el para qué y el para quién testificar. Trabajaré, entonces, con y a partir de la palabra de Miguel, entendiendo que se trata de una palabra situada en ciertas coordenadas históricas y políticas.

Tenemos la intención de llamar la comparación de estos dos momentos cruciales de la constitución de la sociología en la escuela: en la década de 1930, un período en el que la disciplina se ha convertido en obligatoria por primera vez a nivel nacional en la enseñanza secundaria en Brasil; y el final de la primera década de este siglo, cuando después de más de 50 años fuera de la escuela, volvió en lo plan de estudios. Estos dos momentos se caracterizan por la aparición de libros dedicados a satisfacer las demandas de la institucionalización de la disciplina escolar. Estos libros son fuentes que revelan las diferentes expectativas de la sociología en las escuelas brasileñas en estas dos temporadas.

Campaign against sexual harassment in Egypt

The process of mobilizing and sustaining protest in authoritarian regimes is risky, particularly when it focuses on women's issues in neo-patriarchal governments in the Middle East. However, sustained protest about women's rights occurs and carries with it the potential for change in norms and laws.

Even prior to the Arab Spring, the campaign against sexual harassment in Egypt, which was mobilized by the Egyptian Center for Women's Rights (ECWR) and its collaborators, sought to promote change in a high-risk, neo-patriarchal environment.

In this paper, we analyze data gathered from 2005 to 2009 on the ECWR campaign. Data came from interviews, participant observation, newspapers and media accounts, and documentary materials. Analysis was attentive to ECWR's mobilization strategies, organizational processes and legal and normative efforts at institutional change.

We found that central to ECWR's progress were strong networks, especially local ones; flexible strategies; and the utilization of effective frames in communicating with national and international groups. The Center's leaders and members were key elements in guiding the organization toward promising outcomes despite opposition from government and other groups.

Women's political action in the Middle East: Engagement and norms

This study examines the willingness of men and women to engage in political action in five Middle East nations (Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Morocco, and Turkey). It utilizes cross national data from the World Values Surveys from 2005 - 2008. Middle East residents were more reluctant to participate in political activities than individuals in any other region of the world. Moreover, the willingness of individuals to engage in political action varied substantially in each of the five countries. Overall, women were less willing to engage in signing petitions, joining boycotts and participating in peaceful demonstrations than men in all five countries.

We examined the structures of the five states to understand why. We developed explanatory models for men and women separately, based on their personal characteristics and their cultural and geo-political attitudes. Findings demonstrated that geopolitical attitudes were the most important variables in explaining individuals' reluctance to engage in political action. We did not find that personal characteristics, patriarchal norms, or high levels of religiosity were so important in predicting attitudes as prior research suggested.

Dependence, trust and agency? Exploring contingency within the lay-professional interface

Recent shifts in roles within the doctor and patient has rendered the concept of trust less clear and increasingly difficult for sociologists to measure, conceptualise and operationalise in medical encounters. Although it is well acknowledged within social theory that patient (dis)trust is shaped by both structure and agency, the latter remains a moot point due to links between trust, vulnerability and dependence. This paper develops social theory around trust in the light of data from research investigating the dualistic nature of patient trust in medical professionals and the medical system. Data from two PhD theses are presented; one investigating the experiences of cervical cancer patients and the nature of their trust in their healthcare in the UK (20 qualitative interviews), and the second investigating coronary heart disease patients' trust in medical professionals in Australia (37 qualitative interviews). The findings of these PhDs are discussed in relation to the dualistic nature of trust. Firstly, our findings identify the notions of dependence, vulnerability and reflexivity as prominent features shaping individuals' capacities to act with regards to (dis)trusting medical professionals and the medical system. Secondly, our findings identify how the structure of the healthcare system (the UK NHS and the Australian Medicare and private practice) influence or limit patients' choices or opportunities to (dis)trust medical professionals and the medical system. Our findings and discussions are salient for the development of a more comprehensive social theory of trust – one that is more amenable to robust conceptualisations and operationalisations of trust in empirical medical-sociological research.

Constructing uncertainty. Technological innovation in the semiconductor industry

We study how and why uncertainty is induced in collaborative processes of technological development. An instructive case for this endeavor is the development of future microprocessors in the semiconductor industry.

Based on permanent renewal, the semiconductor industry is well known for its ability to deal with the economic as well as technological uncertainty inherent to innovation. Despite the industry's high innovation rate, the development of future technologies appeared relatively predictable for a long time. In recent years, however, taken-for-granted assumptions about the very nature of semiconductors and even the industry's business model seem to be seriously jeopardized. Currently, there is a consensus within the industry that increasing technological and economic challenges will put a stop to the existing technological path in the next one to two decades. In the search for alternatives, the industry strategically constructs uncertainty. This process addresses all central technological and organizational levels. Not only different levels of technological design and manufacturing are tackled, but even the very foundation of every semiconductor – silicon – has lost its taken-for-granted status. Likewise all existing organizational forms of coordination and cooperation (e.g. within consortia and meta organizations) are questioned. The result of this search is a substantial increase in uncertainty within the industry.

Such uncertainty-inducing practices seem to have two main objectives. First, even if some level of abstract consensus as to the limits of the current path exists, the industry is strongly locked in. The discussion of alternative options aims to unlock these structures. Second, the intentional inducement of uncertainty targets the creation of future development options. The inducement of uncertainty is considered a critical first step to creating a new path.

In sum, the strategic construction of uncertainty is considered to be a crucial step in the creation of a new, and once again certain technological path.

Housing struggles and social innovation. the community workers movement experience in Luján (Buenos Aires Metropolitan Region)

During the last three decades, the urban sprawl in Buenos Aires Metropolitan Region (RMBA-Región Metropolitana de Buenos Aires) has been characterized by an increasing territorial fragmentation and socio-spatial segregation which is clearly visible in the urban habitat.

The growth of slums and informal settlements, along with the spread of gated communities reflect the structural limitations of the market and weaknesses of the State in providing housing for deprived urban citizens in the context of neoliberal urbanization. Since the early 1990s, grassroots social movements have played a key role in the struggle for basic needs of excluded groups through community mobilization and organization, along with the opening of new -conflictive- arenas of articulation with the State. However, little attention has been paid to the role of these players from the point of view of the access to housing of disadvantaged social groups, especially those in the periphery of the RMBA.

The city of Luján -67,000 inhabitants, 60 kilometres from Buenos Aires- has experienced significant growth of gated communities along with an important deficit of affordable housing, and an increase in informal settlements. The aim of this paper is to analyze the struggle for access to housing as deployed since 2004 by families in Villa del Parque, a peripheral neighbourhood of Luján, mobilized, organized and supported by the Community Workers Movement (MTC – Movimiento de Trabajadores Comunitarios).

The research draws on 20 in-depth interviews with different players involved in the process, both citizens and public officials; as well as the assessment of local and provincial legislation, government and local press reports.

Our analysis suggests that beyond overcoming social exclusion by satisfaction of basic needs, these grassroots initiatives promote changes in social relations and governance structures (social innovation) that increase the socio-political capacity for subaltern groups to build their right to the city.

Design, housing and public space in the intensification of downtown Toronto: Good intentions and neo-liberal realities

The history of downtown Toronto is one of cycles of intensification framed by governmental efforts to counterbalance neo-liberal processes with more widely distributed social objectives. The paper discusses two instances in the past 50 years when unfettered development was successfully counterbalanced by governmental intervention on behalf of the perceived needs of the public at large. The first was a city government reaction to the development of dense, high office building construction by name designers, in favor of stronger environmental quality controls and the stimulation of new downtown housing for all segments of the population. The second was a federal government project to open up access by the public at large to formerly industrial land along the lakeshore, just south of the Central Business District. In both instances, a measure of accomplishment of the stated goals was accomplished, while, over time, the continuing pressures of neo-liberalism dwarfed these good intentions with unprecedentedly intensive residential and commercial construction unencumbered by considerations for the public good. The extent of this disparity is clearly illustrated.

On the economic-cultural exchanges between "global north" and "global south" in the world market of fashion: The globalization of the "Brazilian fashion"

Drawing on a field research conducted in São Paulo, Rio de Janeiro and Paris between the years of 2008 and 2011, this thesis aims to comprehend the new economic and symbolic exchanges established in the world market of fashion. The analysis of "partnerships" set up by so-called "Franco-Brazilian" fashion brands allows us to elucidate current relationships between two types of actors, which have been built as "ideal types" of Weberian inspiration. We try to understand some reciprocal and hierarchical borrowings of legitimacy between, on the one hand, "mobile actors", related to the "Global North" and which operate in the market with their "capital of globality" and, on the other hand, "fixed actors", bounded to the "Global South" and whose condition of insertion in the global scene is sustained by their "capital of diversity". In a social situation where both mobility and diversity become values in the global market of symbolic goods, the mobile actors search for the fixed actors' diversity, while these need the mobile actors' mobility to echo at a global level. However, although these exchanges meet mutual interests, they tend to be hierarchical and unequal in the sense that the later can manage the diversity of the former, which are prone to become restricted to their geo-symbolic belongings.

Myth of the stigmatized and unhappy overweight? Overweight and life satisfaction of Polish adults

- Obesity and overweight in most countries of Europe, and in Poland, show rising trends, and became of the most important issues of contemporary social policy. The prevalence of obesity and overweight and associated illnesses are commonly evaluated from states' perspective with focus on the costs of health services, economic productivity etc. At the level of society obese or overweight individuals face stigmatization and discrimination. The consequences of obesity for health, appearance or self-esteem are well established and it has been assumed that individuals well-being will be compromised as a result. However the impact on psychological well-being is not clear. The paper examines the link between obesity and well-being among Polish adults. It is commonly assumed that obese people, experience poor psychological well-being. Individuals are expected to experience undesired physical or social consequences of their weight that diminish their quality of life in one or more areas.
- The objective of the paper is to clarify the associations between obesity/ overweight and happiness, life satisfaction, and eudemonia in Poland.
- The data were collected for the nation-representative sample survey "Diagnoza Społeczna 2011" (24 453 respondents). The main measure of weight was body mass index (BMI).
- The main questions to be answered: Are obese and overweight individuals less happy, (satisfied with their life) than underweight or normal weight people? Do overweight/obese individuals suffer more from depression? What is the association between BMI level and satisfaction with: health, appearance, job, income, family, social relations, sexual life, achievements, education?

La integración social y el olvido de los sectores sociales medios

Las reformas en materia social llevadas adelante en América Latina durante las últimas décadas del Siglo pasado, tendieron a configurar o fortalecer esquemas duales de provisión, incluso en aquellos Estados con matrices de protección más extendidas como Uruguay. Estos esquemas consistieron básicamente en un subsistema destinado a la población pobre o vulnerable (de carácter público) y otro subsistema diferenciado en calidad respecto al primero, estructurado en torno a una combinación de Estado, mercado y en algunos casos con organizaciones de la sociedad civil sin fines de lucro. Las tradicionales estrategias de distribución de bienes para aquellos grupos que se caracterizaban por su informalidad laboral se sustituyeron por parámetros tecnocráticos en nombre de una mejor eficiencia del gasto.

La llegada al gobierno de diferentes partidos de orientación ideológica "progresista" o de izquierda en la región, abrió la posibilidad para intentar revertir estos patrones de provisión social, en muchos casos a partir de iniciativas que se calificaron en términos de Universalismo Básico.

En esta presentación, se intentará mostrar a partir del análisis de la experiencia del Frente Amplio en Uruguay que estas iniciativas no han logrado romper con la tendencia a la dualización observada, e incluso en algunas áreas públicas se han reforzado, desamparando a los estratos medios-bajos que se han ubicado como los potenciales "perdedores" desde los ochenta hasta el presente. Como contrapartida, partiendo del escenario contemporáneo de nuevo riesgos sociales y fragmentación y diversificación de demandas sociales, se sugiere la necesidad de pasar de un enfoque de mínimos o toques homogéneos, a un abordaje basado en "rutas de atención" diferenciadas en las que se garantice que el interior de cada una de ellas oficie como espacio de integración y cohesión social.

Youth and political alienation in post-communist countries

After the proclamation of independence or overthrow of communist-led regimes in many post-communist countries much hope was placed on the new generation. „Cultural theories” assumed that youth whose basic political socialization took place in an already free, democratic country will be less politically alienated and more politically competent than the oldest generations. This study tests this assumption, building on the ISSP 1996 and 2006 “The role of government” data. The analysis is performed using an original cohort analysis technique based on non-parametric local linear regression.

Results show that different age groups do not differ with respect to most dimensions of political alienation: confidence in political authorities and their responsiveness, as well as the sense of personal political efficacy. Moreover, contrary to what was expected, the perceived political competence of the cohort born after 1960 is very low – it is at a similar level as that of the cohort born before 1940. With the exception of Czech Republic, there is no young, more politically competent generation in sight.

This conclusion can be interpreted in several ways. First, the so-called “transitional generation” born in the last decades of the communist regime, was raised and educated under the Communist rule, and they were adolescents or young adults, with their political competence still in the process of formation, when the system collapsed. Even though this generation did experience the popular opposition and the fall of the Communist regime during their most impressionable years, their political socialisation took place under difficult economic conditions, during time characterised by dramatic social and political change. An other seemingly plausible explanation is that our data simply reveal that in post-communist countries, same as in Western democracies, a new generation of “Dot-Nets” or Generation X has developed. Due to various reasons, it shows little interest in conventional politics.

Le microcrédit au Brésil: L'inclusion sociale par le marché de la microfinance

Cette analyse s'inscrit dans le cadre d'une enquête de la politique nationale pour le microcrédit dans le gouvernement Luís Inácio Lula da Silva (2003 - 2010), à travers lequel on peut lire le microcrédit comme une politique publique visant à générer des emplois et de revenus. En ce sens, le microcrédit est abordé non pas comme question purement économique, mais comme un programme du gouvernement qui a constitué un projet d'inclusion sociale mis en œuvre par marché de la microfinance dans l'allocation des crédits aux personnes à faible revenu - les travailleurs informels et les petits entrepreneurs - en particulier ceux qui sont exclus du système financier traditionnel. L'analyse a inspiré théorique des approches institutionnelles sur les marchés et des études de sociologie économique sur le crédit et la finance. Ainsi, nous soulignons que les mesures prises par le gouvernement fédéral afin de faciliter l'accès au microcrédit, contribuent également à l'établissement d'un marché de la microfinance, démontrant ainsi comment l'État a contribué à l'expansion de l'accès aux services offerts par ce secteur au Brésil, en tenant compte des programmes, la délimitation du cadre réglementaire, l'allocation des ressources financières et technologiques. Par conséquent, les actions de l'Etat visant à ce secteur durant le gouvernement Lula peuvent être interprétées comme des aspects d'une politique de développement qui a caractérisé le but d'harmoniser la croissance économique et la réduction des inégalités sociales.

Patrón de reproducción e injusticia socioambiental

El patrón de reproducción de capital en América Latina: una aproximación a las dinámicas de devastación e injusticia socioambientales

El presente texto forma parte del capítulo teórico-metodológico de la investigación doctoral en curso sobre el Patrón de Reproducción de Capital en el Ecuador contemporáneo. A partir de la categoría de alcance intermedio “patrón de reproducción” y de una propuesta de periodización del desarrollo del capitalismo en América Latina, el documento reflexiona sobre las articulaciones que existen entre el patrón de reproducción dependiente y rentista que atraviesa la historia latinoamericana, con la igualmente persistente devastación ambiental e injusticia social y ambiental de nuestra región.

Tomando como punto de partida los aportes de la crítica de la economía política, y particular en su vertiente latinoamericana desarrollada por Ruy Mauro Marini, el ensayo propone incorporar al debate clásico sobre la dependencia, aspectos teóricos y metodológicos de otras corrientes de la crítica de la economía política y enfoques cercanos a ésta, como el ecomarxismo, la economía ecológica, la historia ambiental, así como la economía del flujo de materiales. A partir de estas consideraciones se postula la necesidad de emprender un tránsito hacia nuevos patrones de acumulación que no se sustenten en la devastación ambiental ni en la injusticia social que han caracterizado a las variantes del capitalismo en América Latina.

California's paid family leave program: Low-wage workers and family leave insurance

The USA is notoriously lacking in public policies that support workers who need time off to attend to family needs. Less well-known is the fact that, while many managerial and professional workers have access to employer-provided benefits that help support their family-related needs, the nation's low-wage workers – a disproportionately female group – often lack even such basic benefits as paid sick days and paid vacations, much less paid parental or family leave, and thus have virtually no access to income support when they need to take time off from work to attend to family needs.

Against this background, the nation's first comprehensive Paid Family Leave (PFL) program, which began operating in 2004, was an historic breakthrough. Unlike the 1993 federal FMLA, which excludes vast sectors of the workforce from the unpaid leaves it provides, the California PFL program covers the entire private sector, regardless of employer size. This paper will evaluate the program's effectiveness as a social leveler, examining the extent to which it has benefitted low-wage workers in the state as well as the reasons its benefits have not been more extensive. It examines in details the extent to which the program has served the state's growing numbers of low-wage workers, including immigrants and other workers of color.

This paper draws on unique data collected in 2009 and 2010 on California's PFL program, including surveys of California employers and employees. On the basis of these data for California, the potential benefits of paid leave program for the nation's low-wage workers will be evaluated more broadly. New Jersey has a program similar to California's that began operating in 2009, and many other states are considering such programs. Federal legislation has also been proposed. Thus the lessons of California's experience with PFL are relevant for the USA as a whole.

Geografía de oportunidades, movilidad residencial y regeneración urbana. evidencias del proyecto LAHN-santiago de Chile

Durante 2009-2010 se desarrolló esta investigación cualitativa dentro de áreas pericentrales de Santiago, que analizó la movilidad residencial en áreas populares consolidadas. Evaluando el impacto de la geografía de oportunidades metropolitana, se buscó comprender sus efectos sobre motivaciones, expectativas y disposiciones de los habitantes de la antigua periferia a dejar sus barrios, hoy integrados a la ciudad consolidada.

Seleccionando dos barrios populares ubicados en el área consolidada de Santiago, cuyas diferencias radican en la localización respecto a la geografía metropolitana de oportunidades, se analizaron -más allá de explicaciones que enfatizan en las dinámicas de precios de los mercados de suelo y vivienda-, los comportamientos no financieros de los propietarios en las decisiones económicas que configuran su movilidad residencial. Considerando un set de fuerzas que actúan sobre estos asentamientos y sus entornos cercanos (propietarios, desarrolladores inmobiliarios, gobiernos locales y regionales, empresarios, organizaciones vecinales), se discute el modo en que éstos espacios son configurados. Hoy día estas urbanizaciones están marcadas por una doble condición: una proporción importante de ellas se encuentran integradas geográficamente a redes de transporte y comunicaciones, servicios básicos, y consumo. Simultáneamente, presentan grados de deterioro físico de viviendas y espacios públicos, así como una creciente disociación entre espacios construidos y necesidades contemporáneas de los núcleos familiares. Los resultados evidenciaron visiones y expectativas de ciudad divergentes, configuradas por la geografía de oportunidades de cada barrio, las cuales determinaron dispares motivaciones, expectativas y disposiciones a dejar los barrios de residencia por parte de sus residentes. En términos de regeneración urbana e integración residencial, ¿Bajo qué forma la geografía de oportunidades promueve, radicaliza o estanca procesos de movilidad residencial? ¿Qué implicancias tiene la distribución de activos y oportunidades sobre el funcionamiento de mercados inmobiliarios? ¿Qué perspectivas existen para la regeneración de áreas residenciales, sin que ello signifique la expulsión de sus habitantes?

Operación sitio a cuatro décadas de su constitución. Programas y políticas de mejoramiento urbano en áreas pericentrales del Gran Santiago

Durante el gobierno de Frei Montalva (1964-1970) surge en Chile el programa habitacional Operación Sitio, el cual, intentando hacer frente a la proliferación de tomas de terreno, promueve la autoconstrucción por parte de los pobladores. A través de él se accede a créditos para la adquisición de lotes urbanos unifamiliares, dotados de servicios básicos de urbanización y equipamiento comunitario. La lógica del programa era, previo ahorro de los beneficiarios, entregarle loteos semi-urbanizados (en algunos casos solamente el suelo rayado) de 9m x 18m, en los cuales desarrollarían planes de auto-construcción. Este sistema, si bien continuaba con la segregación espacial urbana de las clases populares promovida por los planes de erradicación precedentes, permitía que éstas se convirtieran en propietarias del suelo a través de su entrada a los sistemas financieros existentes.

Desde hace cuatro décadas estas urbanizaciones de la ciudad han recibido planes y programas de mejoramiento urbano de los más distintos enfoques e ideologías, simultáneamente al desarrollo de soluciones habitacionales que buscaban homologar y completar lo que Operación Sitio había desplegado. La radicalización de las luchas por el suelo y la vivienda durante la Unidad Popular, la reforma al sector de vivienda y la liberalización de los mercados de suelo durante la dictadura, la aparición de los Programas de Mejoramiento de Barrios financiados por BID desde 1982 y la aceleración de la dinámica inmobiliaria ocurrida desde 1990 en adelante, han dado nueva forma al pericentro metropolitano. El mercado, pero también los gobiernos locales y regionales, han venido configurando las áreas residenciales pericentrales. La presente investigación mostrará los cursos, procesos y resultados de distintas acciones que han definido la forma urbana de esta particular porción del Gran Santiago.

Profesionalización, orientación o acercamiento al trabajo? Incidencias de la formación profesional en las trayectorias laborales de mujeres jóvenes de bajos recursos

En el actual escenario de recuperación del empleo en la Argentina, la formación profesional parece haber adquirido relevancia entre los jóvenes. Tanto para aquellos que finalizan y obtienen el título secundario, como para los que interrumpen el nivel medio tempranamente, la formación profesional parece resultar una oportunidad, ya sea para adquirir nuevos saberes que puedan ponerse rápidamente en práctica en la trayectoria laboral, como así también para acceder a mejores puestos de trabajo a partir de la obtención de un título que puede sumarse al de la escuela secundaria.

En este marco, surge un interrogante en torno a los efectos que producen los dispositivos de formación profesional específicamente en las mujeres. Como se ha mostrado en muchas ocasiones, las mujeres jóvenes presentan las peores condiciones laborales de todo el conjunto de la fuerza laboral. Asimismo, muchas de ellas se encuentran alejadas de la experiencia de trabajo y priorizan otros proyectos como el maternal. ¿De qué modo incide la formación profesional en las trayectorias de mujeres jóvenes que cuentan con distintos capitales educativos, pero también con diferentes perfiles subjetivos?

La presente ponencia sintetizará algunos hallazgos de mi tesis de maestría que se ha propuesto explorar las incidencias de la capacitación laboral en las trayectorias de mujeres jóvenes de bajos recursos. A partir de entrevistas realizadas a egresadas de distintos cursos, mostraremos que las incidencias de los dispositivos son diversas -aunque no siempre reconocibles en la modificación de las condiciones laborales- vinculadas a los modos particulares que tienen las jóvenes de construir sentidos en torno al trabajo. Se analizarán tres grupos de trayectorias de jóvenes que comparten distintos perfiles subjetivos y se señalará el modo particular en el que inciden las experiencias de formación en cada uno de ellos: la profesionalización, la activación orientada y el acercamiento al trabajo como proyecto autónomo.

Sharing stories to activate dialogue with refugee youth in Montreal

The goal of Mapping Memories, a collaborative multi-media project for refugee youth, was to explore how media tools like digital cartography, soundscapes, and digital storytelling could be used to solicit powerful stories while empowering participants in the process. The first stage was to hold media workshops to help youth participants develop their stories, while at the same time developing new networks and friends. Participants were able to compare and reflect on their experiences as newcomers in a safe and supportive environment.

For many participatory media projects, a meaningful process is a powerful but single objective. Beyond developing methods for constructing stories, we worked to develop innovative methods to share the stories with the general public. We explored virtual (on-line) and physical (on-ground) venues with the objective of using personal stories to challenge stereotypes and foster dialogue. We wanted to explore how these stories might affect the youth involved by having them witness the impact of their stories on diverse audiences. We also wanted the youth involved to develop presentation and leadership skills. We developed a refugee youth speaking tour so that our youth participants could meet with students in classrooms around Montreal.

In coordination with the youth tour, we have developed a teacher training initiative for teachers interested in using visual tools and digital stories to address complex issues such as genocide and human rights abuses in the classroom. In this presentation we will discuss our challenges and insights from our four-year project of helping youth refugees use their stories towards dialogue and activism regarding refugee rights, human rights violations, belonging, tolerance, cultural identity, and personal resilience.

Anticipating and 'experiencing' birth: Men, essentialisms and reproductive discourses

Reproductive realms, discourses and practices are being reconfigured in Western worlds as shifts in late modernity make possible new 'choices' and ways of imagining and doing motherhood and fatherhood. In this paper data from a qualitative longitudinal study on transition to first-time fatherhood will be used to examine men's experiences of anticipating and witnessing the birth of their first child. As relatively new actors in what traditionally have been configured as maternal spaces, men can be seen to embark on uncertain personal journeys which are characterised by less clear reproductive trajectories than those assumed for women. Examining men's unfolding expectations and experiences as they move through this novel terrain - the antenatal period, preparation classes and the hospital birth - provides important insights into discursive possibilities, masculine practices of gender and men's 'choices' and presentation of selves as prospective fathers. The men engage a range of discourses to narrate their transition experiences which include elements of essentialist language - 'bonding' and 'instincts' - challenging dominant ideas of maternal primacy to the child. In contrast attributes of hegemonic masculinities, for example power and autonomy are not associated with preparations for the birth of a baby and the men navigate the antenatal period and the process of birth in sometimes ambivalent and uncertain ways. This paper will illuminate and theorize men's gendered practices of agency as new paternal identities are contemplated and realised.

Challenges in the conduct of censuses and surveys in the Virgin Islands of the United States

A federal Census of Population and Housing in the US Virgin Islands has been financed by the United States Bureau of the Census since 1930 and managed under the auspices of the local government. The obligation of the US government to conduct a decennial census in the Virgin Islands suggests that census metadata and all other statistical data would be readily forthcoming, but despite the length of time that the Census Bureau has been involved in this exercise, there are formidable issues that derive from the current arrangements.

US censuses are conducted under US Code Title XIII which places severe conditions on confidentiality and restrictions in the collection, processing and dissemination of census data. Because the decennial census in the VI is conducted simultaneously with that in the continental states, the VI must wait an inordinately long time, after states' data are released, before its census data are published. The preparation of field manuals receives no input from the VI, and anomalous situations impact adversely on data collection processes. The seventy-one item census questionnaire is burdensome, and the total absence of obligatory federal surveys in the VI during intercensal years is egregious.

Despite the challenges attendant on the preparation of the federal census, the data collection and their timely processing, the VI has instituted a series of innovative steps, including the use of GIS and GPS technology, not only to collect demographic intercensal survey data for local government planning and programmatic reporting, but also to produce data that help to inform the preparation of the decennial census operations.

Social justice, visual activism: Young people creating 'home' across public and domestic spaces

Visual activism and social justice research with young people often focuses (exclusively) on their experience and activities in 'public' rather than 'private' spaces, exploring both (barriers to) their involvement in social activism and the often negative response of state authorities to this or to behaviours characterised as anti-social (Milne 2009). In research into such issues, domestic spaces are often constructed, at least tacitly, as warm and tranquil havens from the noise and trouble outside (Adams et al. 2007). Such an approach draws on/ maintains somewhat traditional notions of the public/ private distinction in which the family is seen as somehow protected, isolated from changes in social structure (Smart 1997). Further it constructs the domestic experience of young people as less central to concerns of social justice than their involvement in the 'public' sphere. Sociology of childhood research has examined key spatial themes of children's relative power, autonomy and agency inside and outside the home, and the inter-relationships between the two (Holloway and Valentine 2000, Skelton 2000, Matthews et al. 2000). It has also questioned a policy approach (at least in many minority world countries) that focuses more attention on children's democratic rather than their social and welfare rights (Wells 2010). This paper will discuss these issues through the lens of an on-going research project that employs complementary visual and aural methods. The research explores visual constructions of feeling 'at home', belonging (however ambivalently) or non-belonging across multiple spaces with young people in Scotland who are unable, for various reasons, to live with their biological parents. The paper will discuss how visual research in domestic spaces can point to concerns of justice, how domestic practices may affect involvement in the public sphere and the way 'domestic' or 'family' practice may not be located in one place or exclusively in domestic spaces.

Movimientos alterglobalización: Un análisis crítico de las propuestas de la Asociación para la Fijación de Impuestos en las Transacciones Financieras para Ayudar a los Ciudadanos (ATTAC)

El trabajo centra su análisis en la Asociación para la Fijación de Impuestos en las Transacciones Financieras para Ayudar a los Ciudadanos (ATTAC). Este movimiento se opone desde su origen al actual modelo económico imperante, como base del llamado "desarrollo". Aunque no sólo formula cuestionamientos a éste, sino que se caracteriza también por proponer alternativas. Por esta razón, se constituye en un integrante de importancia dentro del gran movimiento llamado alterglobalización.

El objetivo es analizar -desde un punto de vista histórico- el trabajo realizado por ATTAC (constitución, principales ideas, actividades, organización, propuestas y estado actual). Especialmente, haciendo énfasis en la implementación de la Tasa Tobin y la aplicación de sus fondos para programas de desarrollo.

El manifiesto de ATTAC constituye una alternativa frente al modelo capitalista neoliberal. La ideología de este movimiento es simple, coherente y está bien desarrollada y difundida. Por esta razón ejercen una gran influencia dentro del movimiento alterglobalización. Aunque no proponen introducir cambios radicales en el sistema actual, sino sólo implementar algunas modificaciones en materia económica, las mismas harían que el capitalismo de hoy esté más regulado por los Estados nacionales. Para lograr sus objetivos, ATTAC apela a la intervención de los gobiernos más poderosos y de los organismos internacionales más influyentes.

Al momento de su creación las propuestas de ATTAC eran vistas como revolucionarias e inaplicables en el marco de la globalización neoliberal. Hoy en el contexto de crisis actual, se ha mencionado a la tasa Tobin como una de las posibilidades de solucionar una crisis que tiene como uno de sus grandes culpables a la especulación financiera.

Mobility, a new paradigm for prison ?

In its classical conception, imprisonment is the confinement in jail, for a determined stretch of time, without (almost) anything to do or to hope. So it seems that imprisonment can be considered as a paradigmatic immobility. But this classical immobility-based conception appears to be challenged by a mobility-based vision. This one is at the centre of my current reflection, trying to integrate it in a broader study of our discursive relationships with mobility (in collaboration with Bertrand Montulet). In this broader scope, my hypothesis is that we face the emergence of a «mobilitarian ideology» in which mobility is prized for itself and is used to value institutions, persons, behaviours.... This is the consequence of a modification of social representations of time and space, from borders and periodicity, to inter-penetration and continuum. Mobility is not only physical, but also social, axiological, affective, normative,... In all these spaces, a perpetual movement is becoming obligatory through mobility imperatives: activity, activation, participation and adaptation, in a relational perspective of society. But how can imprisonment and inmates be considered in such an axiological context? I try to answer this question by studying the parliamentary documents relative to the new Belgian penitentiary law. Are there signs of intrusions of a mobilitarian ideology to be found in this field? Can we consider that mobility is becoming a penitentiary value and imperative? In my contribution, I'm showing how space and time in prison are reconsidered with, as a result, the rise of a mobility-based discourse aiming at legitimating prison through the imperatives of activation and adaptation. « Good prisoners » are thus mobile ones, matching the mobilitarian ideology, and prison is seen as a mean to make the immobile, mobile, as paradoxical as it can be.

Peripheral tactics, materialization and the politics of the 'future city' in Rosario

The urban peripheries of the global south stand as a testing ground where contrasting modalities of building and occupying urban space define a new arena for social and political contestation. In marginal settlements, often clustered around terrains deemed non-suitable for urbanization, deprived urban dwellers struggle to defend their right to the city from expansive public-private developments and the multiplication of closed neighbourhoods. In these settlements, different organizations and social movements are using construction and the instance of materialization as a way of questioning the procedures and socio-economic conventions that organize the social forms of appearing in the city. Around and through construction practices and the material modification of local settlements, social movements entangle communities in the projection of alternative urban futures. The need to adapt and transform the infrastructural and spatial conditions of deprived and irregular settlements, serves to delimit a field for activism and the actualization of new forms of sociability. Through the invention of novel material and constructive practices, different social organizations consolidate a multi-scalar regime of associations and solidarities, challenging the terms of urban political debate and establishing new parameters for the production of alternative urban peripheries. Relying on the experience and interventions of Giros, a social movement acting on the peripheries of Rosario, in Argentina, this presentation explores construction and the instance of materialization as political categories. It illustrates how material and constructive tactics initially developed to defend and protect a community from eviction, turned into mechanisms for questioning the norms regulating the process of territorialisation. Through the examination of the group's project for a 'Future City', the paper highlights the role of material and architectural typologies in the assembling of alternative urban peripheries.

Clash of rationalities? Economic science and legal reasoning in the production of competition policy in Brazil

The research discusses the interaction of economic science and legal reasoning in the production of competition law in Brazil by analysing the decisions and the professional and academic trajectories of economists and lawyers recruited as commissioners of the Brazilian competition authority, the Conselho Administrativo de Defesa Econômica (CADE), between 1994 and 2011. The objective is to assess if different professional rationalities imply substantial clashes in decision-making. The analytical potentials of considering economists and lawyers as conflicting groups of experts in transforming the State's roles in governing the economy, as well as the complementarity of economic and legal forms of knowledge are discussed. Competition policy is understood as a technology imported in Brazil in the context of State reform and economic internationalization. Economics consolidated as the legitimate expertise for producing antitrust regulations within the Brazilian competition authority, and as a specific form of rationality to be adopted in decision-making: the economic analysis of law. Based on empirical data, the research evaluates the hypothesis that the use of economic concepts and methods produce conflicts between economists and lawyers, given that the latter do not generally possess this expertise. First, the academic and professional profiles and trajectories of the 46 agents recruited to CADE in the period 1994-2011 are analyzed. The objective is to identify which regulators possess the expertise defined as legitimate, and map the diffusion of economic analysis of law in this social space. Second, based on a sample of merger reviews decisions, the use of economic theories and legal doctrines, the substantive orientation of the decisions and the level of agreement between lawyers and economists are described. The two empirical sets are cross-checked in order to test the correlation between professional backgrounds, the use of economic and legal expertise and the content of the decision.

Psychotropic drugs: An encapsulated solution?

Through a brief sociological analysis of Western modes of subjectivity, we can see that health care has always been linked to the modes of subjectivity that reflect the cultural setting, social policy and different times. Regarding the strategies used in this regard, we find that the consumption of substances capable of altering states of consciousness and mood until the advent of modern psychopharmacology was largely limited to the power of sedation. With the discovery of chemical agents capable of assisting in the treatment of schizophrenia and the analysis of dreams in the 50s of last century, the administration of therapeutic drugs with the class of psychiatric drugs - antipsychotics, antidepressants, mood stabilizers, anxiolytics, hypnotics and centrally acting analgesics, another possible way to deal with symptoms psychoaffective free of biological markers. In a context in which we saw presenteeism rather than prioritizing of existence as an art for life, in so far as contemporary demands daily work, shop and stay within a desired aesthetic standard can not be achieved, psychotropic drugs is disguised solution legitimized by science for the restoration of human potential to interact and fit body, emotionally and cognitively to their environment. The widespread consumption of psychotropic drugs has been converted into an object of interest, speculation and analysis disciplines such as psychiatry, psychology, anthropology and economics. Nevertheless, given its nature as a medical device, the vast majority of available studies does not perform many questions about the elements of cultural, social and political mobilized by contemporary subjects in the decision to adhere to therapy with this type of medicine, and this is what we have investigated in the last year and propose to discuss.

Eric Fromm and religion

We may think that the process of defining is a simple act of semantic significance but the truth of the matter indicates otherwise. In other words, to define a concept is as important a scientific act as any other aspects of epistemological endeavours due to the fact that if one is able to define an object correctly it surely indicates that s/he has been able to conceive the 'studied subject' in a rounded fashion. To put it otherwise; it indicates that one has been able to delimit the boundaries of the object in a conceptual fashion within the mental parameters by turning the unknown dimensions into known aspects. Having said this, we need to turn to the question of religion and social theory as it has been conceptualized within a Frommian point of departure. While being conscious about the indefinability nature of religion, Fromm has attempted to define the social character of religiosity both historically and contemporaneously. In this paper, we shall look at Fromm's view on religion and the modalities it may have taken in the course of history and in the bosom of modern society.

Social entrepreneurship and alienation

Social entrepreneurship is a mass social phenomenon that today is being realized on a global scale. Almost all definitions of entrepreneurship, including social entrepreneurship, emphasize the element of innovation as the main identifier of entrepreneurial activity. Innovation involves introducing a change through seeing new possibilities for solutions that were not perceived previously. In this vein, social entrepreneurship, on the micro-level of individual action, is here identified with innovative action. To analyze social entrepreneurship is to analyze the conditions under which innovative action can emerge. The current efforts to explain entrepreneurial action in psychological terms, or by psychologizing the concept of action, are unconvincing. The theoretical framework put forward in the present discussion for interpreting the concept of social entrepreneurship is grounded in Merton's contribution to the theory of alienation, particularly in his conception of innovation as a type of alienation or anomie.

Merton argues that innovative action is associated with "imperfect socialization," whereby individuals disapprove of the available means for attaining culturally approved goals even though they have fully internalized the cultural goals and aspirations in question. To explain the transformation of social entrepreneurship into a mass social phenomenon is to explain how unsuccessful socialization has become a condition of mass socialization. The reasons for the growth of social entrepreneurship during the last decade of the twentieth and the beginning of the twenty-first century are connected with the extensive process of migration and the resulting multicultural societies in which both cultural goals and institutional means for attaining these goals are constantly challenged.

Mass higher education, employment opportunities and youth

The success of a Democracy like India is halved if the issue of marginalized sections of society, equity and inclusive growth is not addressed by governments with sensitivity. This is a problem that crops up whenever the State tends to relocate and redistribute equitably its resources. With the increasing population / aspirations of people and limited resources available the government has to look at the Public sector for growth. Experiences of the most populous state of India, Uttar Pradesh in Higher Education presents an interesting study. Higher Education has witnessed a strong entry of private sector. The figures tell the story better than words. As against 12 State run universities established over the last 25 years 6 private universities, against 500 state run and supported degree colleges 3000 new private colleges, against 10 State run engineering colleges 200 private engineering colleges, against 15 State run management colleges 400 management colleges have been established in just ten years. This accelerated growth has thrown up greater challenges in terms of upgraded infrastructure, quality assurance, availability of trained / qualified faculty, generation of employment, access to job market, regulation of the fee structure to enable inclusion of the marginalized etc. The government faces a monumental task of putting regulatory mechanisms in place, providing liberal grants/ subsidy, capacity building of faculty, setting up networks for e- learning and satellite based learning for the youth in the remotest and backward areas of the State. Despite this the government's resolve for creating newer / greater job opportunities and better access to existing job markets for the youth of the State remains an unfinished task. The paper presents a case study of the mass Higher Education and employment generation efforts in the State of Uttar Pradesh. (299)

Effects of socio-demographic factors on health of girl –child in India

Health is a multidimensional phenomenon. Ideal health will always remain a mirage, because everything in our life is subject to change. Health in this context may be described as an individual's ability to adapt and modify according to the changing conditions of life, an individual's need to have a healthy life-style. Several factors play an important role in determining the health of an individual.

"Health for All" is a Millennium Development Goal and is also imbibed in National Health Policy 2002. Medical science has been developing by leaps and bounds. In India it has brought in more awareness, longevity and a number of other advantages. At the same time availability of health care in India is uneven and unequal for women and children. In this regard the present study focuses on health of girls in Mumbai. There are several specific health problems that women face and hence there is a need for a gender focused understanding of their health issue. In general her health is determined by dietary habits and attitudinal factors. Both these factors are further affected by a host of factors which include biological, socio-cultural, economic and demographical factors.

Socio-demographic factors are factors associated with the patriarchal structure of society and the hierarchical position of gender. The roots of poor health status of women are often neglected in the society. India is characterized by male domination which essentially gives an inferior status to women. As a consequences of their lower status overall, women experience discrimination in the allocation of household resources including food and access to health services.

The present paper based on empirical study will highlight the poor state of health of the girls in Mumbai who slowly accept the negligence and injustice in the society.

Leisure and medical tourism development in India

Societies throughout the world are experiencing profound social and economic transformation, which produce significant changes in the time available to an individual over the course of his life.

Tourism is making tremendous headways in many countries including India. Growth of tourism brings benefits to an economy in a number of ways like income generation, employability, social and cultural exchange, mobilization of foreign currency as well as development of commerce. Due to its phenomenal growth, the Government of India has identified the potential of tourism as a large income generating source.

The innate desire to experience different places and cultures is the core of the tourism sector. Medical or health tourism in recent years has created a new avenue for growth of this sector in India. It is the fastest growing segment in "Destination India" today. This segment has tremendous potential for future growth in a vast and varied country like India.

Medical or health tourism has become a common form of vacationing, and covers a broad spectrum of medical services. It mixes leisure, fun and relaxation together with healthcare. Many people from the developed world come to India for rejuvenation promised by yoga and Ayurvedic massages, but few consider it destination for hip replacement and brain surgery. However, a nice blend of top class practices and attractive prices is helping Indian Corporate hospitals lure foreign patients, including those from developed nation such as UK and US.

This paper intends to highlight the key parameters in leisure and healthcare tourism and showcase some of the premier locations where leisure and medical tourism is growing .i.e. Kerala (India). A combination of many factors has led to a recent increase in popularity of leisure and medical travel which are to be highlighted in the paper.

Beyond the closet? Male homoerotic relations created online and the new regime of visibility in contemporary Brazilian society

Since the end of 1990's people started using the internet and other digital media in the search for love or sexual partners. Men interested in other men have used it in Brazil to create secret relationships, so they can keep their public heterosexual status. This paper discusses how the use of digital media by these men is connected and also differ itself from previous ways of maintaining secret homosexual relations. In other words, it focus in the recent transformation of the homosexual "closet" into a new sexual regime of visibility. Its bibliographical resources are queer studies, recent bibliography about personal connections via digital media, and Brazilian sexuality studies. Following Foucault's perspective that sees sexuality as a power apparatus, the investigation tries to understand the social grammar in which this particular use of contemporary media develops. Based on a long ethnography in the city of São Paulo, it unifies online observation with (authorized) face to face contact with few of these men during the last 3 years. The research is sponsored by the Brazilian "National Council for Scientific and Technological Development" (CNPq).

Large urban projects – The study-case of Porto Alegre, Brazil

During the last few decades, a scenario of competition between cities for investments and prestige has emerged. An important marketing strategy used by cities to attract attention in the international scenario is to conduct innovation, renewal and regeneration projects. Large Urban Projects play an important role on this image change. Hosting mega events is considered by the local governments and the private sector as an opportunity of accomplishing Large Urban Projects in a short time, as the event has a fixed date.

The objective of this article is to map the several Large Urban Projects that are taking place in Porto Alegre, located in the south of Brazil, and their relation with mega-events, since Porto Alegre will be one of the host cities of the FIFA World Cup in 2014, and to identify the actors involved on this process.

In Porto Alegre, there are at least twelve Large Urban Projects in different stages. Stadia are being built, changes in urban legislation have been already accomplished by pressure of the real estate companies, public land has been donated to the private sector, and beautification projects of the city water front and main canal were recently signed by the mayor.

In the 1990s, the urban legislation of Porto Alegre was changed to allow the so-called "Special Projects" to be built with few – if any – red tape constraints. At that time, local authorities argued that this would benefit the city and its population. Today, the benefits of the current transformations in city, including the changes in the legislation that allow it, are being acclaimed by the local authorities and the media as "the dream of modernization come true". However, the complexity and wide range of these changes will give to many conflicts. This article is part of a dissertation research project.

Movement breeds movement: Interlinks of issues, organizations and ideologies

This paper attempts to explore the impending continuities in people's mobilization by identifying the inter-linkages in three contemporary movements in a northern province (Uttara Khand) of India. In an empirical study of the three movements; the movement against felling trees (Chipko i.e. hugging trees), the movement against alcoholism (Sharab-bandi), and the movement for a separate hill state, it has been found that these movements are interlinked in terms of issues, leadership, organizations and ideologies. The present paper highlights the nature, continuity and dynamics of issues, organizations and ideologies in the three movements. Firstly, it analyzes as to how the issue/demand for the protection of a customary right of the local populace evolves into a demand for political autonomy and the right to self-development of a regional community. Secondly, the paper focuses on pathways of the growth of specialized (in people's mobilization) organizations from a spontaneous surfacing of people's groupings. Lastly, the paper explains the course of eruption and dissemination of partial and total ideologies and debates which provoke the conditions of mass awakening and thereby enlarging the public sphere and motivating people to react and agitate. The assiduous mass mobilizations by way of intensifying issues/demands, strengthening organized efforts and upgrading ideological inputs have produced conditions for civil society to collectively engage with state in one type of struggle to another type. This has resulted in the deepening of democracy and the enlargement of people's space. It is argued that interconnections among movements/mobilizations can provide insight to the potential relationship between civil society and the state.

Language proficiency and achievements of immigrants in Spain

The hypothesis according to which knowing the language of the host society has a positive influence on the integration of immigrants has a strong theoretical support and a large research literature. From the theoretical point of view that considers language as a component of human capital, research has confirmed that, other things being equal, the language proficiency –native or acquired–, of the destination country grants the immigrant a potential advantage that should be reflected in her social integration and her success in the labor market. Spain has been during most of the past decade the main destination of migration into Europe. Almost half of this immigration comes from Spanish America and thus belongs to the community of Spanish language. The recency of migration in Spain and the lack of data on linguistic proficiency have led research on this matter to be very limited so far. Two recent available statistical sources can repair some of these limitations: The National Immigrant Survey 2007 and the special module of the 2008 Labor Force Survey on the situation of immigrants and their children in the labor market. In this paper we study, first, what are the different linguistic profiles of immigrants and how the process of knowledge of Spanish in the main groups who have another mother tongue. In the second section the influence of Spanish skills on labor market integration is discussed looking at two dimensions: the achievement of employment and mobility to skilled jobs. Finally, the relationship between language proficiency and educational attainment of second generation immigrants is explored.

No longer able or willing to be dependent: The marginalization and exclusion of street children in Accra, Ghana

This paper draws upon research with children who have migrated to live and work on the streets of Accra, Ghana. As part of the 'paradigm shift' in thinking about street children identified by Ennew and Swart-Kruger (2003), children's presence on the streets and urban centres is no longer seen solely in terms of abandonment, orphaning or pathology (eg. Hecht 1998). Rather, debate now stresses children's active decisions to leave home expressed in their response to the push factors of poverty, unemployment and family violence, alongside an appreciation of the pull factors of the advantages of city living. The analysis here develops this child-centred account of children's migration, but its emphasis is somewhat different. Drawing upon an emergent literature on destitution (Devereux 2003), the contention is that children's active decisions to migrate must be understood as culmination of their progressive and active exclusion from homes and communities. These children, it is argued, are destitute because they are no longer able to be dependent (Harris-White 2010). Seen in terms of events leading to their eventual disenfranchisement and disempowerment, their exclusion is characterised by the progressive failure to provide emotional and material support and/or the consequences of family disputes, violence and neglect. However, it is also argued that children are not simply the passive recipients of these exclusionary forces. Rather, their migration must also be seen as an erosion of their willingness to be dependent and how they look to life and work on the street as the basis for the construction of new social relations.

Party response to membership decline: What member functions do membership parties seek to preserve?

The paper studies how SPD and CDU have responded to membership decline, and what membership functions they seek to preserve. Since the early 1990s, both parties have established a number of internal commissions to stop membership decline and reinvigorate the membership organization. The paper summarizes the commission reports' conclusions and investigates what membership functions the parties stress as important to maintain by the reports' suggestions. The tentative finding is that the two parties seek to preserve membership for the democratic linkage it provides, rather than emphasizing any function explicitly related to electoral competition.

Youth in India: Aspirations and Challenges

Youth, the population aged 15-24, constitute some 222 million and represent 20 percent of the Indian population (as per census of 2001). What is most important at this stage is that a large percentage of rural youth is migrating from rural areas to the urban. The reasons are not only economic but also socio-cultural. The lure and sheen of the cities more so of the metropolises is a big factor. They move out not only for education but also to create a new identity for themselves. Exposure to fast expanding ICTs have provided them new wings to aspire for anything and everything. However, on the whole, there is a great divide between the rural and the urban youth. While the rural youth belongs to Bharat, the urban youth is said to belong to India. While Bharat is identified with illiteracy, ill-health, poverty and conservatism, India is identified with education, growth, development, abundance and forward looking mindset and world view. This divide gets reflected in all walks of life, whether it be the patterns of consumption or that of getting married and raising families. It also gets reflected in terms of informed sexual and reproductive choices and of course in levels of education, consumption, housing, medical facilities, job opportunities and the overall quality of life. As such, the youth both rural and urban may be aspiring for the sky from their respective perspectives but there are various kinds of challenges which both these groups of youth are facing in contemporary India. However, the challenges before them are different both in nature and character as well as in magnitude, and as such deserve the attention and research of the social scientists, particularly that of sociologists.

Youth and culture in late modern Europe

The understanding of European ethnic minority or migrant young people's individualisation process points to a double challenge. In everyday life young people with ethnic minority background, or "the new youth" in Europe, faces both a social and cultural integration challenge. At the one hand they are placed as other young people in an individualisation and identity process of late modern individualised youth life which is demanding and important for future social success. At the other hand, they are challenged by a new cultural lifestyle which may be different from values and traditions of parents and therefore also makes it difficult to engage and become successful in late modern life. Therefore their cultural identity is in a change.

This way of contrasting two different perspectives in young peoples lives only seem possible because of the different theoretical views embedded in these perspectives. What both approaches seem to overlook is, that ethnic minority integration is a process which has in its centre the individual and individualised agent. Therefore the social integration process mostly is about the agent as an engaged player in his or her life. An agent, who finds and uses energy in a process of becoming integrated in some kind of social life.

In our paper we use experiences from Danish research and our European research project UP2YOUTH to draw some lines in understanding the situation of this group of "new youth" and their situation as caught in-between processes of inclusion and exclusion. Especially we will focus young peoples' activities as their solution to the process of developing late modern agency as individualised social responsibility.

Power resources theory: A reconstruction micro-macro

The power resources theory (PRT) has become one of the dominant theories to explain economic redistribution processes and, specially, the origin of welfare states in industrialized capitalist democracies. Nevertheless, the PRT approaches appear in several articles and books emphasizing different aspects of the theory. This prevents us from having a complete overview of the connections between the assumptions and the main assertions of the theory. The present article argues that PRT can be reconstructed in terms of micro-macro links in order to consider two things: first, the micro-macro social elements encompassing PRT and, second, the specific relationships where these phenomena lie. On the one side, PRT asserts that the macro-social phenomenon of a welfare state depends upon two related macro-phenomena: social structure of classes and collective action. According to PRT, the distribution of capital and labor resources will group individuals in two large social classes: employees and employers. This would allow employees to group and commit themselves in collective action, pressing the state for larger social expenditure which benefits the disadvantaged sector of society. On the other side, the relationship among these three macro social phenomena requires incorporating the rational action of individuals as a core element, which allows us to explain the emergence of phenomena at macro level. This means PRT supposes a micro-social theory that permits to comprehend the motivational and cognitive aspects of rational action of employees participating in collective action. None of this is sufficiently specified by PRT. Thus, inasmuch as the PRT links at the micro- and macro-level can be elucidated, it will become possible to present more precisely those elements that explain in general the emergence of social institutions.

Los "indignados" toman las plazas. Del 19 y 20 de Diciembre en los barrios porteños al 15-m español: Similitudes y diferencias entre movimientos

Los días 19 y 20 diciembre de 2011 se produce en Argentina un estallido social que provoca la caída del gobierno de Fernando de la Rúa. Tras varias semanas de incertidumbre política, ante un vacío de poder y para que el pueblo determinara democráticamente el rumbo que quería imprimirle a la nación, se organizan las primeras Asambleas Populares en los barrios, espacios en los que se plantean y definen de manera democrática intereses que son incompatibles con el orden social y político existente y donde los ciudadanos defienden esos intereses por vías no institucionalizadas.

Ante las elecciones locales y municipales del 22 de mayo de 2011 en España, un grupo heterogéneo de ciudadanos ("indignados") ocupan los espacios emblemáticos de las principales ciudades del país poniendo de manifiesto su rechazo a un sistema político en el que no se ven representados. Las marchas que se iniciaron el 15 de mayo (fecha que da nombre al fenómeno 15-M) generaron un movimiento social con presencia en los barrios a través de asambleas.

Ambos fenómenos son compuestos por grupos heterogéneos de ciudadanos. Ambos entienden las asambleas como un proceso abierto y colaborativo. Ambos toman las plazas y las resignifican como espacio social. Las asambleas populares en Argentina se diluyeron tras la legitimación electoral del gobierno de Néstor Kirchner. El 15-M se ha erigido como un mecanismo de denuncia con escasa influencia en los resultados electorales del 20 de noviembre, y que reproduce muchos elementos del movimiento argentino.

Fenómenos similares que concurren de manera paralela con una década de distancia.

Federalism and new political models

Globalization and the support of the subsidiarity principle by EU and the local bodies' increasing participation to the European policies, has strengthened those bodies' autonomy and their demand for a larger decentralization.

Because of the importance of local bodies, since the 90's, big city Mayors and region Governors have taken active part to the national political debates, to the mass communication activities and to the international relationships.

The issues of the political debate, were not reproducing the traditional cleavage left/right wings, but proposing a new pattern of local based representation and democracy. Facing with the matter of fact that the national political system is no longer able to cope with the challenges coming from the changed international scenario, a wider demand for autonomy and federalism, based on the possibility for the citizens to participate to the decision making processes and deliberate, and above all the political turn over, -which, according to Lega, is easier on a local level, rather than national.

Besides the birth of new collective identities - like the "Padania" for Lega Nord - with all the related behavioral models and founding myths, a demand for new participative models and political legitimacy is increasing. They try through a wide range of models of governance - participative balances, citizens juries and deliberative polls - to put the basis for a "participative and deliberative democracy". All these instruments are supposed to limit the crisis of political representativeness, and grant the political institutions of responsiveness to the citizens' expectations.

Challenges, uncertainties and violence prevention: The case of Batan neighborhood in the city Rio de Janeiro

This article is result of ethnographic research with residents of borough of Batan, located in the west of the City of Rio de Janeiro. Currently, this neighborhood has a Peacemaker Police Unit (UPP), part of public security policy of state Government of Rio de Janeiro that returned basic civil rights to this community. However, for more than 20 years, residents have lived with armed traffickers and subsequently militiamen.

Batan has 40,000 inhabitants, distributed in 15,000 households. In a recent survey of FIRJAN-IETS in communities with UPPs, socioeconomic data revealed that the Batan has the lowest household income per capita among all the nine communities studied: R$ 406.10.

It is also the highest percentage of poor (36.6%) and indigent population (12.3%). So it is not surprising that there is the highest unemployment rate (19.7%) among the nine communities investigated.

About 5% of the population of Batan did not have basic official documents. 36.5% of young people between 15 and 24 years of age do not study or work.

Despite the restoration of basic civil rights by expulsion of militia, residents expressed doubts, anxieties, and tensions about the permanence of policing project and revealed political conflicts involving Association of Residents, still seen as linked to the militias and acting as an intermediary in real estate transactions.

Tensions, dilemmas, conflicts and insecurities arising from uncertainty about the rules to be followed in the new type of policing, more uncertainty about the continuity of occupation in future governments will be analyzed, as well as the multiplicity of perceptions of the residents interviewed on the current experience with the UPP.

Finally, the social projects that are developing in this new environment full of uncertainties and tensions will be evaluated.

Agua potable y saneamiento en la metrópolis de buenos aires (1993-2011). Zhacia una superación de las políticas neoliberales?

Las empresas proveedoras de agua potable y alcantarillado son productoras privilegiadas del espacio urbano. En Buenos Aires, esta función estuvo en manos del Estado nacional hasta principios de la década del '90 cuando, producto de las reformas neoliberales, la empresa Aguas Argentinas S.A. tomó a su cargo la provisión del servicio en 14 jurisdicciones de la región metropolitana.

En términos de gestión urbana, la privatización produjo la aparición de nuevos agentes, la transformación del rol estatal y, sobre todo, la subsunción de la expansión de las redes a criterios de eficiencia y rentabilidad económica. Las consecuencias más visibles fueron el abandono de las metas de universalidad, la acentuación del proceso de concentración económica y exclusión social, el deterioro de la calidad de vida de amplios sectores y la mercantilización de las relaciones entre empresa, Estado y sociedad. Este modelo llegó a su fin con la crisis macroeconómica y la devaluación del dólar a principios del siglo XXI. En el año 2006, el gobierno nacional retomó la prestación del servicio mediante la anulación del contrato de concesión y la creación de la empresa Agua y Saneamientos Argentinos S.A.

Esta situación invita a reflexionar sobre los cambios y continuidades en las formas de producción urbana. En otras palabras, ¿qué implicancias tiene la recuperación estatal de la provisión de agua potable y desagües cloacales? ¿Aparecen nuevos criterios de gestión? ¿Es reemplazada la lógica mercantil por principios de justicia social? ¿Surgen nuevas estrategias para asegurar la cobertura de los sectores más vulnerables? A través del análisis de datos secundarios y de entrevistas en profundidad a funcionarios públicos, técnicos, investigadores y miembros de organizaciones sociales, el presente trabajo busca responder dichos interrogantes y, con ello, contribuir al análisis de los mecanismos de integración/exclusión presentes en nuestra metrópolis.

"Desde niños hasta muertos" the transnational back and forth of emotions: A multi-sided ethnographic case study of Mexican transnational communities

The core of my dissertation project compares two transnational Mexican communities residing in the United States. While the two sending communities belong to the state of Guerrero, Mexico, the receiving communities are located in two different regions in the US: California and Delaware. By employing a multi-sited, ethnographic approach, I examine the practices by which migrants maintain their emotional bonds with their relatives, as well as their physical and emotional connection with their homeland. To address this complex socio-economic process, I conducted 50 open-ended interviews in both the sending and receiving communities along with participant observation. For the purpose of this panel, in this paper I will examine what I refer to as the transnational back and forth of emotions. To illustrate this process, I examine two case studies: a carrier service and a cell phone retailer service both located in Wilmington, DE. In the case of the former, Mercedes, the owner of the carrier service, reports that "niños y muertos" are part of the items migrants regularly send over to their relatives in Mexico. In the case of children, many migrants send their children, particularly during summer, as result of the high cost of child care in the US, which in comparison to the cost of sending their children to Mexico it seems to be a more affordable option. On the other hand, Mexican migrants seem to be changing their cultural practices, and therefore their emotions, in regards to funeral rituals. Rather than sending the actual body, migrants incinerate their dead relatives and send the ashes over to Mexico to be buried in their community of origin. By using these case studies, I examine how emotions such as nostalgia, loss, and love become part of a transnational back and forth exchange of emotions in both sending and receiving communities.

Trabajo, prácticas sindicales, participación de los jóvenes

Desde el año 2003 se observa una recuperación del protagonismo sindical registrado en la conflictividad laboral, la negociación colectiva y la afiliación, de la mano de la mejora de algunos indicadores sensibles del mercado de trabajo como el descenso de la desocupación y el crecimiento del empleo industrial. En este cuadro de situación nuevas generaciones de trabajadores se incorporaron como fuerza de trabajo portando experiencias de lucha, referencias simbólicas y encuadramientos ideológicos que renuevan las prácticas sindicales de base. Estos jóvenes militantes y delegados vienen asimilando la nueva realidad laboral al calor de la recuperación de prácticas históricas que marcaron el movimiento obrero argentino: la disputa de las condiciones laborales en los propios locales de trabajo y la apelación a formas horizontales de organización sindical. Esto contrasta con las estrategias sindicales prevalecientes durante los noventa y con la programática de muchos sindicatos en la actualidad que ven como esa participación ampliada de nuevos trabajadores desafía las formas de estructurar el poder sindical hacia su interior. En esta intervención pretendemos problematizar las tensiones a las que está sometida la práctica sindical a partir de la referencia de diversos casos que iluminan el modo en que los jóvenes militantes sindicales ponen en cuestión las formas tradicionales de construcción política en los espacios de trabajo.

Salud, envejecimiento y migración Mexico-estados unidos: Una aproximación desde el curso de vida

The international migration in Mexico is an old phenomenon with great implications in the rural and urban families. Additionally the aging process is a concern given the large amounts of population entering this life stage, specially for the health and care issues these represent to the individuals and cares givers, being those families, communities or the public and private institutions dedicated to these matters. These issues complicate even further when the elder belong to transnational families then the concerns are for both nations. This is a widespread matter among the migrant families that transit between Mexico and the United States. The aim of this paper is to identify the strategies and mechanisms that the families of Mexican origin, develop in both sides of the border to tend the needs of their seniors. We focus especially on the physical and mental health issues. The methodology used in this paper is a mixed one, which uses: qualitative and quantitative techniques based upon data basis and interviews to the members of the transnational families. Some findings show a combination between local and transnational strategies in the members of families in México and United States. Some children characteristics determine the strategies for healthcare in the older parents: gender, age, place of residence, migration condition, and socioeconomic status. Other characteristics very important are the functionality, type of disease, treatment and health status of the older parents.

Obesidad y nivel socio económico de la población adulta de Argentina

According to WHO estimates (2011), since 1980 obesity has more than doubled worldwide. Cross-country data for 2010 show that the male population of Argentina would be second in the ranking of the group with the highest prevalence of obesity in America (only after the United States) with 47.8% of men over 30 years old and BMI ≥ 30 more kg / m² (WHO Global Infobase, 2011). For its part, the female population of same age group would also present a very high prevalence of obesity (47%), which would place Argentina 12th in the regional ranking. Therefore, the problem has ceased to be unique in some developed countries and in Argentina studying the causes and consequences of obesity, and the study of the actions needed to prevent it, should be a priority item on the agenda of this country. In turn, several studies show that obesity prevalence distributions skewed towards individuals belonging to the lower socio-economic groups. This paper seeks to characterize the prevalence of obesity according to socio-economic strata and gender among the adult population of Argentina. Also, we estimate the probability of suffering from chronic diseases highly associated with obesity (such as diabetes, high cholesterol, etc..) according to the strata in order to assess to what extent there is an interaction effect between obesity and socioeconomic status of the person. We use the microdata from the National Survey of Risk Factors in Argentina, conducted in 2009 among urban populations of the country, collecting information for population 18 years and older.

Origin and water quality in the greater Buenos Aires

Rapid demographic growth and informal and unplanned urban growth in the Greater Buenos Aires is associated with high levels of deficits in basic sanitation services and the existence of numerous environmental risk factors to which are exposed its inhabitants. The aim of this study is to analyze the origin and quality of water used for consumption in a sample of households in the Greater Buenos Aires in which were detected individuals that had suffered from some water-borne disease during the last year. We performed a physical-chemical and bacteriological analysis of samples of water used for consumption in these homes. The total water samples taken and analyzed were 117 which come from 90 homes. The distribution of samples according to the water source is as follows: 18% of bottled water, well water 35% and 47% water supply (from mains). Preliminary results indicate that 40% of the samples show "not to be safe" due to excess fecal coliform, total and / or E. coli. If we consider the excess of nitrates (which was analyzed only for one third of the sample), the percentage that exceeds acceptable levels is 35%. Taken together coliforms, E. coli and nitrate the percentage of water samples that qualify as "no drinking" to reach 44%. The results of drinking water by source indicate that 9% of water samples from mains was not safe, while this percentage was 45% for samples of bottled water and 80% for water samples from well. We will analyze the characteristics of households with poor water quality and we will seek to model the probability of "bad water quality," according to the origin of the water and controlling for socio-economic conditions of the household.

The limits of multi-stakeholder governance: The crisis of the Forest Stewardship Council (FSC)

The FSC is a transnational non-profit organisation that runs a globally recognized timber and forest products certification and eco-labelling scheme. Governed by a broadly representative multi-sectoral General Assembly, the FSC has frequently been cited as an exemplary institution, illustrating, 1) the promise of multi-stakeholder regulatory institutions as new forms of global environmental governance, and, 2) the collaboration of NGOs and progressive corporations in multi-sectoral, solutions-oriented political processes. However, the FSC has been fraught with problems in recent years. It has faced serious challenges in terms of its ongoing capacity to serve as an inclusive arena for dialogue and regulatory innovation.

Our paper highlights the inherent limitations of multi-stakeholder governance within the context of contemporary, post-Rio "liberal environmentalism" (Bernstein 2001; Park et al., 2008). The FSC, we argue, has found it exceedingly difficult to achieve its original founding mandate: to set a global benchmark for sustainable management, especially in crucial biodiversity hotspots in the tropics. Tracing the evolution of the scheme, we show that, from the moment the FSC was launched as a new standard-setting and labelling regime, it found itself in a race for recognition and credibility. Business groups from the forestry, wood products and paper and pulp industry in various countries were quick to respond to what they perceived as a real threat to their independence and operating procedures by setting up their own competing independent labelling schemes. The competitive pressures that this unleashed for the FSC have limited possibilities for strict sustainability standards, and the scope for debate within the organisations' General Assembly. As a result, many NGOs have begun to withdraw their support from the scheme, and some of the FSC's staunchest NGO supporters now find themselves engaged in intense public debate and extensive defence of their own continued participation.

El campesinado en la revolución mexicana y la formación del sujeto, 1910-1920

Desde una perspectiva psichistórica, apoyada en el teoría del interaccionismo simbólico, la investigación se propuso explorar al sujeto o los sujetos que entre 1910-1920 fueron actores de la revolución mexicana, rescatando los principios de organización y los modos de relación a partir de los cuales se constituyeron. La pertinencia de este objetivo se fundamentó en el hecho de que, a la fecha, no se encontró en la literatura revisada información historiográfica que diera cuenta de forma suficiente de la dimensión psicológica del sujeto de la revolución, ya que la mayoría de los estudios han revisado la temática desde un enfoque histórico-estructural.

Se trató de una investigación de tipo exploratorio. El método indicado fue el historiográfico con enfoque psichistórico. Las fuentes estuvieron compuestas por 5 relatos de Cartucho, novela de la revolución mexicana escrita por Nellie Campobello, a los cuales se aplicó la técnica de análisis multimodal del discurso.

Los principales resultados muestran que entre los principios base de la constitución del sujeto de la revolución se encuentra su organización alrededor de la marca del poder y la violencia. En efecto, el poder y la violencia son principios organizadores fundamentales de la acción del sujeto, siendo los hechos de este carácter parte de su iniciación como sujeto político; esto, a pesar de los efectos devastadores que conllevan.

Finalmente, se explicita que la relevancia de este estudio radica en que constituye por sí mismo una aproximación a la dimensión psicológica de los sujetos que en la lucha armada sentaron las bases del modelo de ciudadanía en México, el cual fue hegemónico hasta al menos la década de los ochenta del siglo XX.

La medición de la precariedad laboral: Problemas metodológicos y alternativas de solución

En este artículo se analizan algunos de los principales problemas metodológicos derivados de la construcción de un índice sintético y multidimensional para la medición de la precariedad laboral. Se argumenta que, por lo general, estos problemas suelen ser omitidos en los estudios sobre precariedad laboral, dando lugar a indicadores sintéticos que presentan algunas falencias metodológicas. Se compara adicionalmente, tres estrategias empleadas en la construcción de índices y se muestra que ellas no difieren, en cuanto a los resultados que producen, de manera sustantiva. En consecuencia, se argumenta a favor de la solución que presenta mayores ventajas desde el punto de vista conceptual tanto como el práctico

Bridging or bonding? The nature of the social capital of Latin American immigrants in Spain and the U.S.

Latin American immigrants to Spain are, in many ways, in a privileged position among all non EU immigrants. They share the language of the country of reception, in most cases they are of the same religious background, and they have a privileged access to Spanish nationality. All these aspects would lead us to expect that they will very rapidly 'mingle' with autochthonous Spaniards and their process of social integration should be relatively smooth. Yet, results from the comparative European project LOCALMULTIDEM indicate that this is not quite the case, as Latin American immigrants (of Bolivian, Colombian, Ecuadorian and Peruvian background) in Barcelona and Madrid show comparatively high levels of 'bonding' social capital along various indicators. This paper seeks to describe the nature of Latin American immigrants' social capital in Spain, and to examine the factors that account for the prevalence of bridging and bonding patterns of social interaction, by comparing it to the other country where they are a large immigrant population: the United States. For this purpose, we primarily draw the data on Spanish Latinos from a study of Bolivian, Colombian, Ecuadorian and Peruvian immigrants in Barcelona and Madrid conducted in 2007-2008 within the LOCALMULTIDEM project. We complement this information with data from the Spanish Immigration National Survey (Encuesta Nacional de Inmigración, ENI) conducted shortly before in 2006-2007. The US data are obtained from the 2006 US Latino National Survey.

Residential concentration, ethnicity, political opportunities and the representation of immigrant-origin minorities in Spain

European societies have seen a gradual and constant increase of immigration in the last few decades. The settlement of immigrant populations and the incorporation of their descent into European societies raises the issue of the need to ensure equal opportunities in their capacity to gain elected office and be represented by democratic institutions. Yet, the little we know about the political representation of immigrant-background minorities in Europe suggests that they are seriously under-represented all across Europe. This paper examines the various factors that impinge on these gaps in representation.

Is a high concentration of immigrant-origin minorities enough for immigrant-origin minorities to gain political representation? Or are certain migrant groups more likely to benefit from certain political opportunities that facilitate their access to elected office when their number is large? This paper analyses how these three factors — residential concentration, ethnicity, and political opportunities — interact to help to account for the different levels of representation of immigrant-origin minorities at the local level, and it illustrates the theoretical underpinnings with an examination of the Spanish case.

The paper studies over time — for the 2003, 2007 and 2011 local elections — the Spanish municipalities with the largest concentration of immigrant-origin residents of different ethnic backgrounds — Romanians, Moroccans, Bulgarians and Latin Americans — and examines how residential concentration, ethnicity and party competition interact to lead to better or worse outcomes of descriptive political representation of these groups. Spain is an ideal case study to test these theoretical propositions regarding migrants' political representation, particularly since the rapid increase of the foreign-born population has resulted in a diverse intake of multiple origin groups with different patterns of residential concentration, yielding a sufficient number of places where a single group of different national origins dominates among the foreign-born.

Gender equality in the teaching profession: A cross-national comparison

Gender inequality in the teaching profession has attracted limited concern from researchers and policy-makers alike. In England and France, the two countries where the fieldwork was conducted, the view that teaching is a relatively egalitarian profession, which offers broadly similar career opportunities to men and women, is widespread.

Drawing on a social constructivist and feminist framework and on a multi-level approach which closely articulates the societal, professional and individual levels, we question such a view of the teaching profession (Moreau, 2011). This approach, combined with the analysis of sixty semi-structured interviews with secondary school teachers, highlights that, despite the statistical feminisation of teaching, women tend to concentrate in the less prestigious and rewarded segments of the profession. Women teachers are also more likely than men teachers to take career breaks and to go part-time.

While these patterns apply to France and England, there are also some significant cross-national variations. In particular, French women teachers are more likely than their British counterparts to adopt 'male' patterns of employment, even when they have children. We argue that this is due to the more extensive family-friendly provision in place in France, as well as to the higher level of autonomy of French teachers in relation to time management. However, the higher level of gender equality in the workplace noted in the French case is not reflected in the domestic and private arrangements of the teachers we interviewed in this country. We suggest that this is related to the gendered use of non-teaching time among French teachers, with women more likely than men to use it for domestic and care purposes. This, in turn, highlights the importance of a multi-faceted policy intervention to tackle gender inequality.

Socially just academia? An exploration of the experiences of student parents in English higher education

For some time now, widening participation policies have been a key feature of English higher education institutions. Such policies have aimed to diversify the student body and, in particular, to increase the access and retention of so called non traditional students. Yet, student parents, most of them women, have been widely ignored by policy-makers and researchers alike, despite representing an increasing proportion of the HE student population in the UK and elsewhere.

This paper draws on a research project investigating the role of higher education institution (HEI) policies in supporting student parents in England, funded by the Nuffield Foundation. A social constructivist and feminist theoretical framework was used and sixty semi-structured interviews with student parents and staff were conducted in ten universities. This paper focuses on the interviews conducted with student parents. We argue that student parents remain predominantly invisible in academia as the default construction of the university student as carefree and careless (as well as white, male, single and middle-class) persists. As a result, student parents often struggle to fit in academia, as evidenced in this paper. However, this paper also highlights the diversity of student parents' experiences. In particular, it shows that, despite the domination of a neo-liberal rhetoric and of a discourse of individualization (Beck, 1992), student parents' experiences continue to be shaped to a great extent by gender, social class, ethnicity and other identity markers. This in turn raises the issue of how policy intervention can effectively address the needs of a highly diverse group of students, particularly in relation to retention, attainment and to the overall quality of their student experience.

In fact, the right to the city encompasses a large range of rights in order to ensure the well living for all people.

"Loteamento Todos os Santos" is an irregular community housing located in Paço do Lumiar, which is one of the four cities that makes part of the island of São Luis. There are 350 people living there, of which 170 are children. The community is threatened by builders of luxury houses – the area suffers a high speculation process both because of the proximity to the beach area, as the building "boom" in the island of São Luis do Maranhão.

Presentation of the sociological research project on tourism and its progress of results; "Study on the opinions, perceptions, valuations and attitudes of the residents of Gran Canaria - Spain on the effects of tourism and tourists on the island". Institute of Tourism and Sustainable Economic Development (TiDES) of the University of Las Palmas de Gran Canaria (ULGPC). Tourism in the Canary Islands means nearly the 30% of GDP and generates a similar percentage of jobs. These few general data illustrate clearly the importance of tourism in the society and in the economy of the Canary Islands and in Gran Canaria. Nearly 2 million and a half of foreign tourists visited the island of Gran Canaria in 2010; this means one of the highest tourist per capita percentages in the world. The impact on the residents of this great tourist flow is at least quite considerable. So the opinions and perceptions of residents about the positive and negative effects of tourism and tourists on the island, are essential. We analyze the perceptions and opinions about the degree and type of social, cultural, economic and environmental impacts, also impacts on infrastructure, customs, and on the daily lives of many local residents influenced by the tourist flow. Also the degree of contact and integration among tourists and residents and the interest for tourism management and tourism, as well the positive and negative effects generated on the local populations. The used research methodology is through the use of quantitative techniques of social research (survey) and qualitative techniques of social research (interviews semi-structured, participant- observation, focus groups, ethnographic, photographic and georeferencing resources). Samples are representative according to type of zone (specifically tourist or not), sex and age groups.

Secularization after all. Varieties in Argentine Catholicism

Relevant scholarly literature on secularization highlights three dimensions that allows an operational definition of this process: the separation between a political and a religious system, the pluralization of the public sphere and the growing autonomy of the believer's conscience. Those dimensions are observed in the secularization process of Latin America Catholicism

In the case of Argentine Catholicism, the breaking moment was the conflict between social modernization and religious secularization in the Sixties and Seventies. While Modern Social Catholicism made their arrival to the country (after Second Vatican Council), Argentine political actors could not articulate a Republican project to neutralize political violence. State terrorism solve the political conflict disappearing people. Massive killing not only broke with former social and political system, it also affected religion.

As a result, Catholicism changed, leading to several modes of being Catholic. However, secularization transformed all religious variants, from the most reactionary to the most progressive.

Double face of insecurity problem: Crime and victimization. analyzing its impact on individuals quality of life

It is indispensable for a society to recognize certain fundamental social rights. Both "human necessities" and "human rights" theories recognize the necessity of respect and observation of these rights and that the democratic regime it's the most efficient for doing this.

Between these theories, Doyal and Gough human necessity theory establishes physical survival and personal autonomy as basic needs of any culture at any time. As well they consider social participation and liberty development as both basic needs important aims. It is necessary the development of certain forms of organized production and of communication and authority to finally accomplish them.

This investigation looks forwards to demonstrate the relation between human and institutional development and the negative effects of institutional weakness over insecurity problem. We study the double face of the insecurity problem – objective criminal facts and subjective insecurity feeling – and its negative consequences over human life quality, social integration and psychological capacities.

Recognizing a straight relation between human development and institutional strength, and noticing that liberty, protection and subsistence are basic human necessities, this work looks forward to analyze how the different levels of institutional weakness or citizen distrust in Argentina have a negative influence over the double aspect of insecurity problem.

Based on the results of the Social Argentine Debt Survey of Catholic University Social Argentine Debt Observatory this investigation seeks to answer the following questions: Is there any relation between the different levels of political distrust and insecurity feeling? And between different levels of victimization and lack of trust in police authorities? Do high levels of victimization reflect a lack of adequate protection? What is the difference between insecurity perception for those who were crime victims and those who were not? Does policing reduce crime? Global, national and state-based pressures for teachers in Australian schools: The toll on teacher wellbeing, the capacity to innovate and opportunities for democratic and socially just education

As in many nations in both the developed and developing world, Australia has moved increasingly towards standardisation and so-called 'accountability' measures of benchmark testing and reporting, nation-wide curriculum, comparisons of schools and ways in which teachers work. Teacher wellbeing and autonomy is affected by these measures, as teachers attempt to comply with policy, programs and directives from state and national authorities, administered at the school level. The constraints experienced by teachers working within these boundaries limit – but, arguably, don't obliterate – opportunities for democratic workplaces for teachers, and for engaging in democratic classroom-practice with student input into learning choices and styles. This paper reports on the changing nature and composition of learners in Australian schools, the range of standardising and benchmarking measures that Australian teachers must currently engage with, how these affect teachers' capacity to innovate or work in context and learning community-specific ways, and on a survey of teacher wellbeing conducted by the author in collaboration with the teachers' union. Some brief examples of innovative teaching practice that works both with and within these boundaries are offered as suggestions of ways forward in improving both increasing democratic processes and providing context-specific engaging and meaningful learning opportunities for students.

Shaping individual choice for public benefit: Promoting deceased organ donation in a system of informed consent

The limited availability of organs is a major constraint on transplantation surgery. Many countries, including Argentina, have therefore introduced 'presumed consent' with the aim of increasing deceased donation. This circumscribes the autonomy of potential donors and their kin, with consent presumed unless actively revoked. Other countries (including USA and UK) retain 'informed consent' ('opt in'), with individuals voluntarily joining the organ donation register and kin making the final consent decision at the time of bereavement, generally following the deceased's wishes where known.

Deceased donation, unlike most health choices, requires individuals and families to give organs as an act of civic behaviour oriented towards improving or saving the lives of stranger(s). We consider approaches to changing choices and actions in the context of the public discourse of organ donation in the UK. This currently emphasises a deficit model and 'nudging' actions to encourage the 'right' choices for society (public benefit), with legislation as a last resort or only when there is a societal consensus. We discuss the assumptions and limitations of this approach, including the varying constraints on the choice and actions of different 'publics', particularly minority ethnic groups with high needs for transplantation but low donation rates. This draws on questionnaire surveys and 22 focus groups conducted with five minority ethnic groups in London (UK). A major limitation on choice and actions was participants' lack of knowledge of needs and organisational processes. However personal choices were also shaped by social and cultural contexts; many people of Indian, Bangladeshi and Pakistani origin experienced uncertainties regarding religious and cultural values, whereas the discourses of Black Nigerian and Caribbean participants often emphasised lack of trust in professionals and the organ allocation system. The implications of the perceptions and experiences of different publics are considered for donation policy and practice.

Risk and dementia

The effects of dementia on people's ability to make decisions mean that risk plays an important part in the everyday lives of people with dementia, family carers, and practitioners yet there is little research evidence on how all these groups negotiate decisions about risk. This presentation discusses the scoping review and consultation the presenters undertook in preparing a guidance document on risk for the Department of Health in the context of dominant ideas about risk and the rights of people to take decisions others regard as risky. It highlights how little research evidence there is on how older people with dementia, family carers, and practitioners negotiate decisions about risk and how little the wider risk literature considers the impact of cognitive impairment when looking at how individuals make decisions about risk. This discussion is set within the current policy context of risk empowerment and personalisation in health and social care policy in the UK. The presentation concludes that debates in the wider risk literature about personal approaches to risk fail to acknowledge how personal approaches to risk are mediated by circumstances in which a person's capacity to take risks are affected by illness or disability. While biographical or narrative approaches to risk management take account of a person's existing approaches to risk, we know very little about how the experiences of illness and disability might mediate approaches to risk. Discussions about risk and dementia are broadly atheoretical and are largely located in concerns about litigation and complaint procedures.

Heterosexual men and parenthood decision-making in South Africa: Attending to the invisible norm

Despite the increased focus on men in reproductive research, little is known about male involvement in the initial undertaking toward parenthood and the subsequent decision-making that ensues. Likewise, the process of decision-making—including the accompanying gender dynamics and politics—has not been explored. In particular, the parenthood decision-making of White, heterosexual men from the middle-class has been understudied. This silence in the literature is a result of the taken for granted nature of parenthood in the "normal" heterosexual life course. As a result, both professional and lay people fail to question the parenthood motivations of healthy, married heterosexual people, and men in particular. Instead researchers have focused on women and/or 'abnormal' groups (e.g., those who have health issues, utilise new reproductive technologies, are young, homosexual people, or choose to remain childfree). In this paper, I shall discuss the findings from a qualitative South African study on heterosexual men's involvement in parenthood decisions that aimed to address this oversight by turning the spotlight onto those who have previously been overlooked. The study focused on heterosexual men's involvement in parenthood decision-making at the couple level. The narratives of both women and men were explored based on the premise that parenthood decisions are collaborative and involve peculiar couple level dynamics as well as the larger power disparities of heterosexual relationships. The study's findings show that the participants had little to say on, and even skirted, the topic of male involvement in parenthood decision-making. As I shall show, this was not related to male resistance or indifference, but rather their difficulty in discussing such a take-for-granted issue. I shall highlight how the silence around the central problematic reiterates the silence in the literature as I shall discuss the ways that this silence was discursively managed as well as its broader implications for gender power relations.

Experimenting images : Disclosing a social housing area through 3D virtual model

HTP3D is a three-dimensional virtual model of the housing area of Hautepierre, in Strasbourg (France), fruit of a collaborative work of artists, anthropologists and inhabitants. It shows trans-disciplinary actions and researches within the context of the project « Hautepierre is 40 years old », which aims to introduce different images and the complexity in this area suffering from many stereotypes. Since one year, HTP3D is accessible via internet as well.

Through HTP3D Hautepierre moves outside its physical borders and gives a complex image of itself : continually fed by artists, researchers, social science and architecture students with texts, videos, sound montages, virtual and imaginative architectures, drawings..., it often recalls the mobilities within the area, mobilities which are denied by the urban renovation. The project's aim is to make Hautepierre accessible to exterior view, but also to give the inhabitants access to experimentation and participation to a new plastic image of their place of living. Different social groups are concerned, but mainly the youths (the most stigmatized group) are interested in these virtual spaces. Also, HTP3D helps to the re-appropriation of the public space of Hautepierre.

Everyone can take part in the virtual construction of HTP3D, participating to different projects or, through a system of chatting, by living traces in the space and taking part to this common writing of memories and images of Hautepierre. This work questions the relation between virtual universe and physical places as well as their possible mutual impacts. Could the virtual space HTP3D, artistic and virtual model of a social housing area, populated by numeric images, influence our perceptions of physical places ? Or our idea of these places ? Or even future constructions within this neighbourhood? HTP3D aims also to assert that each urban project cannot be built without a strong knowledge of the context.

Représentation graphique des parcours de vie : Ethnographie et engagement transdisciplinaire

Comment mener une enquête ethnographique et recueillir des parcours de vie dans un grand ensemble, lieu de la stigmatisation ? Comment le chercheur pourrait échapper, à son tour, à une stigmatisation possible de son travail, perçu en lien avec la « sociologie de la galère » ? L'engagement associatif comme cadre global de l'action et, en son sein, une production graphique et transdisciplinaire de « parcours de vie » comme dispositif partagé et négocié, peuvent constituer une réponse. Les « parcours graphiques » réintroduisent la notion de complexité et individualisent des personnes souvent « parlés » comme étant des « groupes » ; ils peuvent ainsi aider à combler les fractures symboliques qui séparent la banlieue de la ville car ils se destinent à la communication externe, à travers notamment des expositions.

La représentation graphique permet de saisir des événements biographiques « comme autant de placements et de déplacements dans l'espace social » (Bourdieu, 1986), et implique également la construction d'un espace physique qui nie le postulat de l'enclavement, souvent posé comme « excuse » à des intervention de rénovation urbaine. Cette manière de représenter des parcours de vie née d'une démarche transdisciplinaire engagée (entre art, anthropologie et urbanisme) s'adresse à plusieurs destinataires, car l'objet - visuel - se situe à plusieurs niveaux : pour les habitants c'est une manière d'être reconnu comme des « individus » et échapper ainsi à la stigmatisation ; pour les décideurs, ces parcours pourraient être un vecteur de meilleure compréhension du quartier et ses habitants ; pour les chercheurs en sciences sociales ils peuvent représenter une méthode innovante de « résumée » de trajectoires de vie ; pour le monde de la création artistique ils sont vus comme des « objets » graphiquement denses car porteurs de valeurs croisées.

Advanced urban marginality in Australia: The case of public housing

Since the 1990s a shift in government policy in Australia has resulted in a marked decline in the number of public housing dwellings and demand far exceeding supply. The limited availability means that in order to be eligible for public housing, new entrants usually have to be in 'greatest need'. This paper argues that the shift in the eligibility criteria for accessing public housing, means that public housing estates increasingly reflect what Loic Wacquant calls 'advanced urban marginality'. The paper draws on existing quantitative data and in-depth interviews with 33 older (65 plus) public housing tenants in Sydney, Australia to analyse the residualisation of public housing using the features of advanced marginality identified by Wacquant - 'wage labour as a vector of social instability and life insecurity'; 'functional disconnection from macroeconomic trends'; 'territorial fixation and stigmatization'; 'spatial alienation and the dissolution of place'; 'loss of hinterland' and 'social fragmentation and symbolic splintering'. The study concludes that although Wacquant's analysis captures much of what has occurred in public housing estates in Sydney, in many instances public housing remains a source of pride for its tenants and provides them with the basis for a 'good' life.

Gender differences and inequalities in the Brazilian academic careers

Even though PhDs are being largely awarded to women, recent international research has shown that women academics do not get as high in their careers as fast as their male counterparts. While sociologists in the United States and in Europe have examined this issue, in Brazil very few data is available about it. With two recent waves of expansion of higher education (in the 70's and in the 90's), there are more women than ever among students and professors of universities and colleges in the country. However, when we look at the biggest research universities, women represent only a little more than 35% of professors, unequally distributed in different areas. This research investigates what kind of inequalities, if any, women academics in Brazil go through and how would these be the result of gendered family responsibilities. Through a calculation of chances men and women professors have of being Full Professors in the research university taken as this research's case, I found no significant systematic disadvantage for women, nor any relationship between their chances to be Full Professors and the fact that they are more or less surrounded by other women in their work environment. I took, then, 4 areas of knowledge with different gender patterns for chances of being Full Professors and ran a Multiple Correspondence Analysis on their professors careers' data. I checked if there was any significant differences between male and female career types. At the end I interviewed male and female professors in order to get more specific information about their family lives. Crossing methods and kinds of data allowed me to develop a more complex idea of what goes on in the Brazilian academic career concerning gender differences and inequalities and which aspects of it are different or similar to the cases of developed countries.

Procesos de construcción de subjetividades juveniles en comunidades evangélico-pentecostales en el Área metropolitana de Buenos Aires

Llegar a ser (o seguir siendo) un/a joven cristiano/a supone un proceso, denso y extenso, de transmisión y apropiación práctica (por cuerpos) de una serie de esquemas de percepción, acción y apreciación. Proceso intersubjetivo y atravesado por relaciones de poder, donde la dimensión sensible (emocional-corporal) se configura como punto de inflexión central. En este trabajo presentaré algunas reflexiones, a partir de mi registro etnográfico, sobre los procesos de conformación y transformación de subjetividades juveniles en comunidades evangélico-pentecostales en el Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires. En particular, identificaré y caracterizaré los discursos y espacios de socialización que las instituciones pentecostales dirigen a la feligresía juvenil y también, daré cuenta de los usos y de las atribuciones significativas que los/as jóvenes producen respecto de los discursos y espacios de socialización que las instituciones pentecostales les destinan.

Rock, demandas globales y movilidades religiosas

Históricamente las religiones han sido un soporte para la movilidad de personas, bienes y símbolos. Sin embargo, los formatos de dicha circulación han adoptado diversos carices según los contextos sociales, culturales e históricos en los que se han insertado. Centrándonos en la coyuntura actual se observan múltiples y particulares modalidades de movimiento activadas desde lo religioso. Estos circuitos se encuentran atravesados por procesos de globalización entendidos, en términos generales, como procesos dinámicos de intercambio tecnológico, cultural, político y económico que han reconfigurado las categorías de tiempo y de espacio propias de las sociedades modernas. En este nuevo orden territorial, los estados nacionales aparecen retraídos dentro de esta lógica global que los fraccionaliza y que tiene como polos dinamizadores a diversas organizaciones o corporaciones de tipo intermediario, entre las que encontramos a las agencias religiosas. A partir de mi registro etnográfico y documental (aún en curso), en este trabajo me centraré en los procesos de circulación contemporáneos de bienes, símbolos y sujetos impulsados desde agencias evangélicas argentinas. En particular me enfocaré en la génesis y la morfología de un dispositivo transnacional emergente de la feligresía y dirigencia juvenil de una mega-iglesia pentecostal de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. Este dispositivo, tiene el formato de un recital de rock que se realiza en el espacio público en Argentina y diversos países de América Latina y Europa, cuyo lema es la "acción contra el VIH Sida".

The IT managers' voluntary risk taking and the new capitalism's justificatory system

This presentation aims to analyze the perception of voluntary risk taking of IT managers faced to a new capitalism's justificatory system. Boltanski and Chiapello (1999) call this new justificatory system cité par projets, where actors are impelled to engage to an ensemble of values such as employability, versatility, mobility, flexibility and instability, which entails to the individuals responsibility to manage their own professional lives through the search for new challenges. Researches driven in Porto Alegre, a south brazilian city, show that IT managers find a positive way of dealing with the social requirement of risk taking putted by the managerial discourse by which the cité par projets' values are transmitted. They experience a self-centered professional identity that allows them to perceive the risk taking as a form of liberty. However, be willing to take risks becomes imperative since it means the possibility of exploring networks, a way to avoid the threat of network's exclusion – death's synonym in a reticular universe as the cité par projets. Thus, although the IT managers can manage the risk taking as positive and voluntary due to their self-centered identity, the risk develops into a recognition principle, because the risk taking is a precondition to professional success. In this way, it's very important to question the limits between a perception of voluntary risk taking as an expression of freedom and the social imperative that rises from the cité par projets.

Women between caring for the elderly and for the youngsters

The great transformations found today in the structure of families, expressed even in new domestic arrangements, are due, in great part, to important changes at work in the sphere of gender relations – but not only directly from them. Further up past the productive structure, the process of increasing longevity, which is implicating new patterns of relations between generations, has contributed to the extension or amplification of the scope and duration of these relations, reconfiguring them around the simultaneous co-existence of three, four or even more generations, living, not rarely, in one single household or in those spatially near by. This means, among other new possibilities, the presence of the aged and even of those very old, supervised or cared for people of a mature generation, referred in its present definition as intermediary or pivot, being the same one that also supports or cares for the youngsters in the family, due to unemployment or their very young age. The 'mature' are generally women who experience minor rebellions, clear or masked conflicts and ambiguous renouncing. These are difficult relations to negotiate given that, for these women, they constitute, at the same time, a reinforcement of traditional gender roles, such as that of caretakers, but also of generational roles in the founding social contract, now duplicated.

Prácticas sociales, diseño arquitectónico-urbano y espacio público. el caso de la exAU3 en la ciudad autónoma de Buenos Aires desde una mirada proyectual Partiendo de un posicionamiento complejo en torno al diseño de lo urbano, entendemos que la apropiación intensiva del espacio público a partir de prácticas sociales que promuevan la inclusión e integración social permite el desarrollo de procesos de sustentabilidad urbana (física-social-económica-cultural). Para el diseño urbano es necesario identificar esos espacios de apropiación para generar dispositivos proyectuales que, sin caer en sobredeterminaciones del habitar, permitan potenciar espacios públicos que a su vez funcionen como catalizadores de nuevas prácticas sociales inclusivas y como vínculos integradores entre la ciudad y sus fragmentos heterotópicos.

Los espacios públicos con estas características promueven el acontecimiento de distintas prácticas y modos de apropiación colectiva que potencian procesos de integración socio-espacial.

Entonces, buscaremos analizar la mirada sobre los modos de proyectar, gestionar y producir el espacio público por parte de múltiples actores que intervienen en el caso de la traza de la exAU3 en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. Nos guiarán distintas preguntas acerca de los espacios públicos y su diseño: sobre qué y cómo se construyen, con qué criterios se proyectan, qué imaginarios proyectan, qué formas de convivencia configuran, qué modos de vincularse habilitan, quiénes se ven incluidos y quiénes no a partir de tomas de decisiones, así como el ineludible interrogante acerca de los alcances y los límites del rol del arquitecto-urbanista en un contexto actual que nos interpela a la búsqueda de alternativos modos de proyectar que propicien prácticas de libertad.

Indagaremos sobre los modos de apropiación, usos y modos de habitar que se dan por parte de los habitantes efectivos del fragmento urbano de la exAU3 y veremos qué noción alternativa de espacio público podemos extraer de dichas prácticas. Pondremos énfasis en el proceso sinérgico de traducción entre lo discursivo del análisis teórico y lo proyectual que motoriza alternativas configuraciones y/o componentes espaciales.

Framing risk: Contention or legitimation?

This paper is about how different types of actors try to shape public discourse in the contentious politics over genetically modified crops (GMOs) by using „risk“ frames. Given the existence of an international legal framework that applies to food trade, all decisions regarding GMOs must be based on a risk analysis to health and environment. Notwithstanding the global character of food trade - in what concerns the flux of products, the transnationalization of actors and the international framework for risk analysis -, the competence to decide on the commercialization of transgenic crops rests at the State. Thus, this study compares the public debates in Argentina, Brazil and Mexico and examines how risk frames are used in each case. Theoretically, the aim of this study is to understand the emancipatory potential of „risk“ frames versus its functional property as a technology of government used to legitimize State intervention in the economy. This will be done based on an empirical research in which risk is treated as an element of political claim, namely, as a frame, used by actors - inclusive the media - trying to shape public discourse about GM food. Based on the assumption of the fundamental role of mass media in the public sphere of contemporary societies, the research draws on media analysis and the frame analysis of news articles from three different types of news media in each country. The sample is composed of 326 articles from which 233 were submitted to content analysis. The paper will describe the results by focusing on the different types of framing risk comparing countries as well as media sources.

Inequalities and risk: Public debates about GMOs in Argentina, Brazil and Mexico

This study involves the public discourse on genetically modified crops (GMOs) in Argentina, Brazil and Mexico. The choice of Latin American countries aims at shedding light on the relationships between social inequalities, rights claiming and risk debates based on empirical evidence.

I will present three main findings of a frame analysis from news media articles from 2009-2010. 1) The controversies about biodiversity (Mexico), coexistence (Brazil) and pesticide use (Argentina) refer to risks related to the cultivation of GMOs, not its consumption; thus, concepts such as "Frankenfoods" are limited to consumer rights and overlook injustice claims related to biodiversity, small-scale farming, workers' health and pesticide contamination. 2) The conflicts about the distribution of economic benefits and costs among transnational and national actors (ex. debates on intellectual property rights in Argentina and Brazil) become even more pressing in a context of strong international market competition that challenges the relative autonomy of governments vis-a-vis global corporations. 3) Synchronically comparing these countries brought together three time orientations regarding agrobiotechnology: in Argentina, interpretations about the consequences of a long-term use of GM seeds resistant to glyphosate; in Brazil, the focus on present decisions regarding coexistence; in Mexico, the threat to biodiversity, framed mostly in a future-oriented fashion. Such results of a synchronous comparative analysis will be interpreted taking into account the history of contention in each country but also the role of contingent events.

On a theoretical level, I argue that assuming that the fight against poverty and inequality excludes health and environmental issues from the normative horizon of "developing" countries actually obfuscates what is at stake in conflicts that are commonly interpreted as risk issues. My claim is that distributive questions are at the heart of the conflict and inequality is reflected in all subtopics in the GMOs debate, including health and environmental risks.

Gentrification and resistance in Salvador, Brazil

The historic center of Salvador was gradually abandoned by the elites, beginning as far back as the 19th century. In the 1970s and 1980s, the government's administrative activities moved to a new location and without the economic elite and the middle class, only the poor remained. But since 1980, a discourse in support of revitalization of the historic center became stronger. The interventions that took place based on this logic provoked a decrease in the low income population. In 1970, the resident population represented 12% of all residents of the city, or 120,800 people. Thirty years later, only 2.8% of the city's population is left, most of them (64%) poor and black.

This paper analyzes the renovation of Salvador's historic center and a bit of the city's memory. It is divided in three parts. In the first we conduct a brief review of theoretical references about historic heritage preservation and the concepts found in the pertinent legislation. In the second part we look at the renewal of Salvador's historic center. We then analyze the denial of the local population in the renewal process, highlighting the changes that took place in the 7th step of the intervention that sought to include the resident population in the region. We also look at the components that are responsible for these changes.

Finally, we offer some considerations about the renewal process presented through a discourse that promoted improved urban conditions for residents and users of the historic center, to stimulate the diversity of occupation and the complementarity of uses and functions, to encourage and promote renewal of the historic heritage and the repopulation of the central area, among others. Nevertheless, in practice, the proposals presented are not in keeping with the federal City Law.

Perceptions and strategies of safety in public places in Europe

Safety of Public Places is a crescent matter of concern, moreover when it concerns the safety of more vulnerable populations as school aged children. Antisocial behavior and repeated violence and unbalanced power relations over school children from peers outside the school environment is a matter of public concerns, as these types of offences, most of the time are not reported to the police.

To ascertain the perceptions of safety of school aged children from 11 to 16 years old of Cyprus, England, Hungary, Italy, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal and Spain, and the different strategies to cope with insecurity in public places, was applied a mixed method approach balanced a European survey to 4085 students, and in-depth interviews and focus groups with nearly 400 students interviewed.

Data shows that 22, 4% of the respondents have ever felt worried on their way to and from school; there are significative differences in the grade of fear between the respondents from the countries in study, being UK and Portuguese school children, the most worried (34,5%). The ways to travel to and from school have different patterns in countries that were studied. School Bus is UK mode of transport used by 32,6%, where as public transport is used in Hungary (53,1%), Italy (42,1%) and Netherlands (26,5%). Walking is common in Netherlands and in Poland. In Portugal (22%) and in Spain (10,7%) of school aged children travel by car to and from school.

We have learned that the land between from home as private sphere and school as protected sphere is seen by European as a threat. Different countries have tried to overcome this with different strategies: community resources in UK and Netherlands and privatization of risk in South Cyprus, Spain and Portugal with parents travelling by car with youngsters.

Risk and uncertainty in Portuguese long-term care: An exploratory study

The breakdown of funding in the health sector becomes a central issue, focusing on reducing costs and maintaining quality of services to address the needs of Portuguese population. With the economic crisis and demographic phenomenon, the national network of Long-term Care crosses a time of uncertainty, where the options of the supply, according with existing funding, can determine the level of the network coverage.

This exploratory study sets evaluation of the continuing care, in light of risks and uncertainties of the national policy of Long-term Care, due to the unpredictability of the current context in Portuguese society. There were conducted eleven in-depth interviews, with a set of interlocutors in health, with national and international experience in the field.

The data analysis shows the risk and uncertainty in the National Network of Long-term Care policy, where the ageing population causes a rise in the level of dependency and family burden, what reveals the importance to invest in differentiate care and disease management. The sustainability of Long-term Care may be subject to the diversity of funding and the appropriate combination of services by formal and informal caregivers. The unpredictability of demand and supply reveals the importance of studies and projections, supported by external evaluations to redirect existing responses or answers to create more adjusted.

The Long-term Care emerges as an attenuation instrument that responds to the demographic phenomenon, confirming the importance of investment in the differentiation care and chronic disease management. The sustainability of long-term care has been a prime topic on the political agenda and may be subject to the diversity of funding and the appropriate combination of services by all caregivers. The dominant discourse on Long-term Care expresses the challenge and costs of change, in a time when this level of care assumes a prominent place in health sector.

Governing the unknowns by action-space analyses

This paper focuses on the lack of knowledge often encountered, when attempting to explain the decisions of social actors. Rational choice assumptions often fail to give explanations due to unknown irrational motives behind the decisions of the studied actors. Similarly, incomplete information about the actors' situation may hinder social scientists to predict their decisions, even if they are completely rational.

Consequently, this paper proposes to accept the mentioned unpredictability and to focus on the explanation of the non-usage of other forms of behavior. Thus the behavior space is assumed to have „white“ spots, which are empty because actors do not stay there for a long time, and „black“ areas representing stable forms of behavior, which are thus occupied by many actors. The latter are in the following called „action-spaces“. An important task of sociology is to formulate hypotheses about the location of action-space-boundaries, which separate stable and unstable forms of behavior and are generally determined by the power and the interests of the concerned actors.

Boundaries of action-spaces can be estimated from empirical data by regression based statistical methods, which will briefly be presented in this paper. On the one hand, the mentioned hypotheses about the shape of action-spaces become this way testable. On the other hand, estimates of boundaries are also of practical use for feasibility studies.

The proposed handling of unavailable knowledge is illustrated in this paper by a two-party competition for a scarce good, i.e. the gross domestic product of a country, which is distributed among different interest groups. The action-space analysis of the appropriate data yields upper and lower boundaries for income inequalities under different assumptions about the power distribution between employers and employees.

The Arab Spring: A re-synchronization of socio-political clocks?

Until very recently, many Arab countries encountered two contradictory socio-political trends: on the one hand they were ruled by paternalistic, authoritarian regimes, which imposed more and more restrictions on civil liberties and political rights. On the other hand, many of them made tremendous progress with regard to educational and other forms of social modernization. As a result, in 2010 the citizens of these countries were often living in different social times.

This paper tries to measure the deviance of the afore mentioned social time from conventional calendar time. For this purpose, the article compares the trajectories of a country with regard to civil liberties, political rights, and educational attainments with the corresponding reference trajectories, which represent standards of the world system. The results obviously depend on whether international mean values, best practice, or some kind of self-reference are taken as the standard of measurement. In any case, the empirical results corroborate the hypothesis that social time is multi-dimensional and can be represented by clocks progressing at different speeds. Empirical results also suggest that social time may be stagnant or even relapse to an earlier stage in national history. Consequently, most Arab countries finally had huge asynchronies between political development and educational modernization.

Asynchronies between politics and education are insofar a problem, as mass education endows young citizens with the technical and cognitive capabilities to read and write also „politically deviant“ texts, which are however often denied by the paternalistic, authoritarian regimes still in power. A solution to this contradiction is a re-synchronization of clocks by accelerating the pace of political time. The Arab Spring 2011 can probably be understood this way. Whether this re-synchronization-hypothesis really holds, can be investigated in early 2012, when the latest available data about civil liberties and political rights will be released by Freedom House.

Racism and discrimination in the Czech Republic 2009-2011

Roma and foreigners are the most vulnerable groups in the Czech Republic. The economic crisis together with a repressive and inadequate integration policy contributed to the increase in job losses amongst migrant workers. Many migrants' immigration status is tied to a particular job and if they are let go, they can fall very quickly into illegality. In addition, there is still lack of an efficient state response to mediation job agencies which often abuse migrant workers when they are trying to obtain an entry visa or when they are in the country. In the Czech Republic (CR) they often control migrants through debts they had to take in order to be able to live and work in the CR. In the field of racial violence in the given period we saw a stronger and a more efficient response of the state to neo-Nazi movements both in regard to their criminal and political activities including the dismissal of the neo-Nazi Workers Party. A re-codified Penal Code came into force containing stronger provisions to combat hate crimes. In practice the most serious problem remains the weak position of victims of crime, including of hate crime, both in legislation and in practice. Furthermore, inadequate statistics on hate crimes is problematic. The situation of migrant workers in the given period was marked by the introduction of a controversial voluntary returns programme as well as problems of increasing number of migrants falling into illegality, unemployment and the worsening of the working conditions. The Supreme Administrative Court in Brno passed a decision to dissolve the Workers Party for, according to the statement of the court, defining itself in opposition to the Jewish, Roma and Vietnamese ethnicities/nationalities, as well as in opposition to homosexuals, immigrants, and people of other skin colours in general.

Sociocultural conditions and popular knowledge about the process of "disappearing" people during the last dictatorship (1976-1983) in Argentina

In the emergence of new forms of political consciousness, as part of the process of substantive democratization in Latin American politics, we analyze how state policies of justice carried out in Argentina since Nestor Kirchner and Cristina Fernandez' governments (2003/2007; 2007/2011) - such as the derogation of "Obediencia Debida" and "Punto Final" Laws, and the consequent penal judgement of the responsible of genocide crimes perpetrated by the last dictatorship - have affected working classes' knowledge of the Argentinian history in the last four decades. How a change of political and social context impacts in the advance of knowledge of recent history in the popular sectors? Which are the propitious facts to transform the political consciousness of working classes? Which are the necessary facts to observe social and political processes dominantly unobserved, allowing the passage of a situation of smaller knowledge to one of greater knowledge? We intend to approach to these questions, exploring the theoretical suggestions of Norbert Elías and Jean Piaget, and displaying empirical evidence collected in the present stage of an exploratory investigation, carried out in 2010, whose central goal is to study the structural factors of social representations of power and justice in popular sectors. We study the representations of power and justice in catholic workers: the devotee of San Cayetano.

Women in cultural racist parties

During the last 20 years there has been an upsurge in research on xenophobic populist parties mirroring their political successes. However, these studies have rarely touched upon the role of women and immigrants within these parties. While women are often invisible in research, located in a marginal role as girl-friends and sisters, migrants support to these parties is often defined as a contradiction in terms and remains un-theorised. The aim of the article is to analyze the double edged relationship between on the one side women and migrants approaching the Swedish xenophobic populist party – Sweden Democrats, and on the other side the specific discourse the party embodies emphasizing on the one hand anti Islam, anti Arabic and anti Muslim racism and on the other creating and producing notions of Swedish and European values. Theoretically the research is framed within feminist and postcolonial studies, Methodologically the study is based on in depth interviews and life-stories with women and migrants representing SD in municipal councils and text analysis of policy document, political parties and media.

Regulating drug information in Europe: A pyrrhic victory for countervailing forces?

Informed by recent sociological debates on pharmaceuticalisation, this work examines the evolution of the current EU legal proposal on prescription drug information to patients, as well as the controversies that have surrounded it. In 2008, the European Commission proposed relaxation of the existing rules that govern drug information provision to patients by the pharmaceutical industry. Critics of the industry's influence over health policy and markets, including consumer organisation, industry-independent patient organisations and healthcare professionals, rejected the Commission's position claiming that industry can not be regarded as a reliable source of information to patients because of inherent economic conflicts of interest. It is proposed that since these critics were at least partly successful in rallying against the Commission's proposal, they functioned as countervailing forces to promotion-driven pharmaceuticalisation. Even so, as a watered-down version of the proposal moved through the European Parliament, it was further modified so as to ultimately resemble the Swedish system that was taken as a high-quality example of industry-based information provision. Yet I will argue that the Swedish system displays evidence of a corporate bias and that it should therefore not be taken uncritically as a prototype for a future European system for drug information provision.

Changes in the world of work and the process of flexibilization in Brazil: A case study

The article discusses aspects of the changes taking place in the world of labour among Brazilian social relations – in particular the phenomena known as "flexibilization" and/or "deregulation" – and their connection with employment relations and existing legal safeguards. It is based on a case study carried out between June 2007 and June 2009, in the Distribution Centre (DC) of the big corporation Lojas Renner (Renner Stores), located in Palhoça, in the state of Santa Catarina (SC), Brazil. For this purpose, ex-employees of the company were interviewed and we have also analysed legal proceedings relating to employment, in particular, a Public Civil Action started as a result of complaints made by employees and the local community about the working conditions of all sub-contracted employees. Our interest in this subject arose from the contradiction between, on the one hand, the constant court cases involving employment relations, and on the other, the various discourses in favour of the "flexibilization" of Brazilian labour legislation, working conditions and employment relations. On the whole, these discourses, found in social relations, are associated to modern forms of management which create new types of jobs. The discourse on flexibilization sees current labour legislation as an element which sustains a kind of backwardness. To what extent are measures relating to the flexibilization of labour rights' legislation necessary to maintain and expand the number of work places within the current market? Would these measures be solely in the interest of capital, putting at risk historical achievements of workers? Considering the contradictions within the political and judicial spheres of the State, would it be possible for the State to impose regulatory norms on employment relations or could they be freely negotiated? These are the issues guiding this research.

Intercensal life tables consistent with population projections

Intercensal methods have been broadly used to estimate mortality in developed and less developed countries with deficient or incomplete data. These methods have several advantages over indirect methods because they do not require the use of model life tables and provide sufficiently accurate results even in the presence of age distortions and death under-registration. The drawback of these methods, however, is that generated life tables do not provide projections of the initial population that are consistent with the subsequent enumeration. This article demonstrates these inconsistencies using three different methods and introduces a simple procedure to solve this inconsistency and to provide life tables that are accurate and compatible with projected populations. The empirical illustration demonstrating its efficacy draws on data from Vietnam, but the method can be extended to any context and time period.

Intergenerational religious mobility in Brazil

According to the Brazilian Census, the proportion of self-declared Catholics decreased by 22 percent, while the share of Protestants increased six times and the share of people without religion increased 37 times between 1940 and 2000. From a generational point of view, however, there is little evidence in Brazil about the patterns of reproduction, maintenance and change in religious affiliation. This article uses original data from the Pesquisa Valores e Religião no Brasil (PVRB), conducted in 2002, to investigate the patterns of intergenerational religious mobility of Catholics, Pentecostal Protestants, non-Pentecostal Protestants, and people without religion. We estimate confidence intervals for the probabilities of belonging to each of those categories using Monte Carlo simulations and taking into account parents' religion, their frequency of religious practice, their attendance to religious ceremonies and other relevant individual demographic characteristics such as sex, age, race and geographic location. Our findings show that even though the share of Catholics has declined over time, this group still has the highest rate of intergenerational transmission since 82 percent of the Catholics have the same religion of their parents. We also show that Pentecostals have a rate of intergenerational religious transmission of 66 percent, while the probability of not having any religion is statistically independent of the parents' religion.

Una nueva cultura del trabajo: Transformaciones en la carrera laboral de una generación de trabajadores petroleros

Los cambios acontecidos en Argentina a nivel macroeconómico durante la década del 90 trajeron consigo profundas transformaciones en el mundo del trabajo. Las grandes empresas implementaron nuevas estrategias productivas modificando sustancialmente la organización de las firmas y las carreras laborales de sus trabajadores.

En esta ponencia analizamos este proceso centrandolo específicamente la mirada en las carreras laborales de los trabajadores petroleros que continuaron trabajando en la empresa petrolera Repsol YPF luego de la privatización.

En particular estudiamos la transformación de la carrera ocupacional de un grupo de trabajadores de la refinería La Plata de Repsol YPF que siguió trabajando en la firma a pesar de su desestatización. Los trabajadores escogidos pertenecen a una misma generación, es decir forman parte de un grupo de empleados petroleros que nacieron en un mismo período y que en consecuencia vivenciaron los mismos acontecimientos empresariales e históricos a lo largo de sus carreras laborales.

Nuestra mirada analítica se focalizará en los diferentes itinerarios laborales recorridos por los trabajadores para desentrañar sus particularidades y la influencia que en ellas tienen las generaciones a las que los trabajadores pertenecen.

Divorce, family changes and public policies

The family is a place of care, but also is a space of gender relations, relations between generations and finally is one of the places of citizenship construction. In recent years there have been changes in the social definition of the definition and legal legitimacy of the family. They are changing power relations within families and also changing gender roles. These changes have put into crisis the family care model, especially in European Mediterranean countries that have a familist welfare regime (where there is a family resources overexploitation, especially among the women). But, on the other hand, can also be an opportunity to change the traditional model in which women assume the bulk of care within the home. It is obvious the interaction between family and welfare regimes. Divorce is one of the processes that introduce more changes in family structures. The intensity with which the divorce is extending to all social classes arises as a challenge for family public policies: it is a new social risk source.

This paper shows a qualitative study based on in-depth interviews with men and women living in Spain who have experienced a divorce with at least one child. We relate perceptions and facts from the family trajectories, focusing in the transformation of families after the disruption and also the care into the families to identify sources of informal support and institutional impact. Then, we compare the findings with family public policies. The results provide information on family processes and their relationship with the processes of social vulnerability and the potential impact of policies.

Squatters houses, eviction and the struggle to stay in the city

In recent years, activists, scholars, planners and officials from government and international organizations have begun to employ the concept of the right to the city in their research and work. This has led to many different appropriations of its meaning and diverse objectives. Yet, despite its broad application and multiple meanings, the right to the city remains part of a radical, transformative ideology, one that challenges the organizing power of capitalism and its effects on historically marginalized urban spaces and communities.

This research examines the right to the city movement in Buenos Aires, through an analysis of squatter households awaiting eviction from five informal hotels and the social organization that represents them through legal and social forms of resistance. Access to decent and stable housing conditions is a basic need, yet current urban economic and demographic transformations are pushing the poor and lower middle classes to resort to informal housing and precarious alternatives in order to stay in the city. Many social organizations that espouse the right to the city slogan promote community access to housing, city resources and space through a rights based discourse that resists the marginalizing logic of urban neoliberal regimes. Based primarily on participant observation and informal interviews, my research explores the difficulties of developing a resistance movement based on the radical and transformative tenets of a right to the city discourse, while attempting to address the immediate needs and daily struggles of communities living in precarious housing situations.

Migrant educational investment in Spain and its return on the labour market. Reducing the employment and occupational gap?

This article measures and explains how different is the labour market returns to education among immigrant and native-born in Spain. We test the assimilation thesis comparing the probability of being employed versus that of being unemployed taking into account the human capital origin and the economic context. The paper then moves on to investigate the quality of the occupation achieved. To do this, we distinguish different national groups, specifically, Latin Americans, Africans, Eastern Europeans and Europeans from EU+15 and natives. We test our hypothesis by using a rich data set from the Spanish Labour Force Survey (LFS) with quarterly observations spanning over 2002-2010. Results from logistic regression models show that Spaniards have higher probability of being employed in comparison to immigrants. Moreover, foreigners who finished their studies in the host country have lower likelihood of being employed with respect to the rest of immigrants. As expected, focussing on the occupational attainment, we find that educational investment in country of destination increases the chances of being occupied in the skilled occupations. On the other hand, we can confirm that schooling in origin and destination has a differential impact in terms of labour returns and that this varies depending on the degree obtained. All these preliminary findings suggest two main conclusions. Firstly, that the human capital acquired in origin is only partially devaluated and that it still helps to understand the performance of immigrants in destination country. Secondly, that immigrants are unequally able to benefit from their educational investment in destination. The paper also considers several explanations to this unequal ethnic ability.

El contexto sistémico y el factor generacional en los agravios y la política del movimiento universitario Chileno

En cada conflicto socio político, al tiempo que se enfrentan proyectos de sociedad, se debate una "moral" y una "normatividad" que opera como legitimación de la acción. Para Barrington Moore, operaría allí un "agravio moral" o sentimiento colectivo construido histórica y relacionalmente que nombra lo "justo" y lo "injusto", lo aceptable y lo inaceptable, un posicionamiento ético, un sentido de legitimidad que cuestiona los límites establecidos o reclama lo que, se estima, debiera ser el real cumplimiento de estos (Moore 1989). Lejos de ser una esencialidad, ello se construye en conexión con las mutaciones de los Estados, los mercados y los sistemas culturales, asumiendo o proyectando límites de un orden social.

Así como los agravios que fundamentan la acción colectiva son contextuales y culturales, también lo es el campo de la política y la condición juvenil mediada por la condición estudiantil. Es decir, tanto las conexiones entre politicidad social y política institucional que definen de modo complejo el campo de la política, así como los significados sociales de ser joven y de ser joven universitario, se conectan directamente con el modo en que se reproduce la vinculación entre Estado, Mercado y Sociedad. Es justamente esta relación la que ha cambiado radicalmente en Chile durante los últimos 40 años, razón por la cual, se ha producido una fuerte mutación de los tres aspectos mencionados: los agravios de los movimientos sociales universitarios, el campo de la política y la politicidad de los mencionados movimientos; y la condición de juventud y de ser joven estudiante universitario. La presente ponencia hace un recorrido por esta mutaciones a fin de explicar las recientes movilizaciones universitarias del año 2011, incorporando para ello, una perspectiva generacional para el abordaje de la construcción de identidad histórica en los sujetos.

Creating the information architecture of state surveillance: Comparative perspectives from Brazil and Japan

In an age in which the digital relationships between states and citizens are of increasingly vital importance, the informational architectures which facilitate such relationships become correspondingly critical. Such informational architectures and the related reorganization of state institutions are key to the nature of such relationships. As surveillance becomes one of the major modes of ordering in societies north and south, the differences in the ways in which states develop such architectures need greater attention. This paper considers the ways in which two very different states, Japan and Brazil, are developing their state digital surveillance capacities. It examines the kinds of informational architectures that are being created at the national level in each state, and whether and how this is transforming the organization of state bodies more widely. In each case, it is argued, particular organizations have pushed forward contested visions of new informational architecture that differ in the ways in which they are able to enrol other state bodies and interact with globalizing surveillance trajectories. Some of these visions fail or produce far more limited results than had been intended, but this is rarely to do with formal processes of democratic accountability, instead particular cultural contexts provide a better explanatory framework to the extent and effectiveness of receptivity, reaction and resistance.

From planning to action: Actors involvement in urban space planning – Vale da amoreira at moita (Portugal)

Due the diversity of material and immaterial elements composing the urban space, the consolidation of space takes place not only as a result of the answers given by its planning needs, but also by the major forces at stake in a specific urban context. The lack of balance between those forces generates impacts in the urban structure of cities, shaping discontinuous spaces and marginalized areas, the so called "critical urban areas".

Considering the multiplicity of actors in the urban space, the identification of their roles and interests may come as a tool that can promote social and spatial equality, as a way to avoid the urban space to be a reflection of the game of interests and powers. Collaborative planning is the theory that is based on communicative action and seeks to develop methods for participatory action at different levels. This theory implies the redistribution of the State's roles to the various formally organized agencies, laying the foundations for a joint urban governance.

Through the study of an experimental portuguese public policy application named "Critical Urban Areas Initiative" at Vale da Amoreira (Moita), the presented work, as a result of a master thesis, intends to analyze the practice of collaborative planning and to evaluate if the involvement of the several actors from that urban context facilitates the implementation of urban regeneration projects and the construction of more equitable cities.

Critical public scholarship? Race and ethnic studies in the public sphere

My contribution to the debate on the contemporary challenges of race and ethnic studies is concentrated with exploring some of the links between knowledge and politics. Some of the concerns of race and ethnic studies have their roots in social movements and social justice struggles. The question of what the relationship of sociology as a social science is or should be in relation to such movements remains divided between critical and more detached visions of scholarship. Drawing on various examples of contested debates about race and racism in the public sphere – such as debates about institutional racism and multicultural/multiculturalism – I seek to tackle questions of what scholars can contribute to the formulation and communication of such ideas and debates. I aim to show that while terminological debates are important, they run the risk of becoming a blind alley if they fail to engage beyond scholarly communities; and that progress in a more than scholarly vein depends upon building coalitions and taking a pragmatic approach to issues and politics. While my analysis cannot produce any simple answers as to 'how to' proceed, it aims to provide the basis for a more nuanced approach for considering how academic research on race and ethnic studies can advance public debates.

Gay men, surrogacy and parenthood

Gay men are increasingly becoming involved in reproduction despite significant barriers that limit their access to reproductive technologies or legal parentage in many jurisdictions. This paper explores how gay men from the United States and Australia understand and narrate their desire to become parents. In addition, it also examines how (commercial) surrogacy works to produce particular understandings of parenthood/reproduction by its intended users.

In depth interviews were conducted with 30 gay men in the United States and Australia who had recently had children—or were planning to have children—through surrogacy. The interviews explored understandings of surrogacy, kinship, parenthood and sexuality. In addition, an analysis was also conducted of the promotional material aimed at potential clients on the websites of US-based surrogacy agencies.

Unlike heterosexual men, the gay men in this study did not have access to a default parenthood 'script'. Participants drew instead on narratives of 'choice' and 'nature' to account for their involvement in reproduction, although these were not mutually exclusive. Narratives of choice were consistent with the entrepreneurial, responsabilized subject of advanced liberalism and this corresponded with the marketing strategies of surrogacy agencies. Men in the study also invoked a notion of innate or 'natural' desires to parent which were—prior to their experience of surrogacy—understood as incompatible with their identity as gay men.

In the context of a resurgent movement in support of the social justice rights of non-heterosexual citizens, this research offers a unique and timely set of insights into the ways in which gay men narrate their right to and experiences of becoming parents. By examining the complex ways in which kinship, technology and sexuality are constructed and negotiated, we can see that surrogacy is understood as more than just another means of having children.

Renaturing or creating brownfields in the sky: Confronting the unforeseeable and the inconveniently foreseeable

Gross has argued convincingly that, when faced with brownfields, ignorance and surprises should be welcomed rather than feared so that knowledge can be developed and action taken to renature the brownfields. When in a cesspool, risk-averse approaches lead to stagnation therein. Hence he proposes real-world experimentation prompted by non-knowledge that expects surprises as a third-way alternative to the precautionary principle and to business as usual. His provocative analysis raises many intriguing questions. What possibilities and limitations does this perspective have for the broader problem of the creation of brownfields? This paper argues that hyper-carbon societies are emerging and a hyper-carbon world, thereby brownfielding the atmosphere and the oceans. Carbon hitherto locked in deep ocean water, shale, tar sands, permafrost, and the Arctic Ocean is being transferred into the atmosphere and subsequently into water on the surface of the planet. Moreover as knowledge increases, ignorance does not decrease as commonly assumed. This is because of the emergence through technological innovation of novel social and biophysical dynamics, particularly the unleashing of hazardous new constructions of nature by social constructions. When generalized beyond the social problem of cleaning up existing brownfields, does real-world experimentation hold potential to analyze and deal with the creation of brownfields, or is it likely to become a gloss legitimating current trial-and-error approaches of emerging hyper-carbon societies? Are claims of unforeseeability a refuge for those who do not want to foresee and seek to evade responsibility? Does the difference between genuine surprises and what was known but denied or pushed to the back of the mind have to be central in social theory? To explore such issues empirically, this paper will compare North America and Northern Europe in the ways they are dealing with the creation of brownfields in the sky.

La siguiente ponencia abordará la problemática de la informalidad laboral en interacción con el despliegue de estrategias de supervivencia por parte de hogares residentes en el segundo cordón del Conurbano Bonaerense durante un período de recuperación económica (2003-2008).

Específicamente indagaremos sobre la articulación de recursos laborales como la incorporación de nuevos miembros al mercado laboral y la realización de un segundo trabajo por parte del jefe así como de recursos no laborales como la percepción de transferencias monetarias del Estado.

La estrategia metodológica se basó en la realización de un estudio de caso, donde se aplicó una encuesta sobre historia laboral, diseñada para reconstruir información retrospectiva a lo largo de 14 años. Para el análisis se construyeron variables agregadas a lo largo de cada período y se realizaron procesamientos bivariados y multivariados.

Segregación residencial y acceso a bienes y servicios urbanos en la Argentina 2007-2010

La ponencia aborda la problemática de la segregación socioresidencial en las principales áreas urbanas argentinas durante el periodo 2007-2011. En este marco, se propone evaluar el nivel de acceso por parte de los hogares urbanos argentinos a una serie de bienes y servicios públicos domiciliarios clasificados en las siguientes cuatro dimensiones: vivienda, servicios públicos domiciliarios, equipamiento colectivo e infraestructura. En este sentido, el trabajo intenta dar respuesta al interrogante de si el acceso a éstos ha sido equitativo entre los hogares de los distintos estratos socioeconómicos o si, por el contrario, la distribución diferencial ha abonado a la profundización de la segregación socioresidencial. La ponencia tiene un anclaje metodológico cuantitativo y utiliza como fuente de información primaria los datos de la Encuesta de la Deuda Social Argentina, estudio longitudinal de tipo panel de hogares y personas que, mediante un muestreo probabilístico, se realiza de forma anual en los grandes centros urbanos del país.

Sleeping and texting with my phone: Implications for mental health and sexual health promotion among black and Latino young men who have sex with men

Young adults report frequent use of texting to communicate with their friends; yet, relatively little research has explored the use of text messaging as a tool for sexual communication, particularly among Black and Latino young men who have sex with men (YMSM). It is important to understand how the development of new technologies such as text messaging affects mental and sexual health especially since Black and Latino YMSM are at the forefront of the U.S. HIV epidemic, and sexual communication regarding condom use is related to sexual risk behaviors among YMSM. Therefore, as part of an ongoing project exploring what we call "Gay-Boy Talk" between YMSM and their friends, we examined how Black and Latino YMSM use texting to communicate about sexual health topics such as sex, HIV, relationships, and social support. We report on the results of 10 semi-structured focus groups lasting approximately 2 hours each with 50 Black and Latino YMSM between the ages of 18-24. We investigated the use and acceptability of text messaging for sexual communication among the YMSM. Using Nvivo software and a grounded theory method of analysis, we found that Black and Latino YMSM view such communication as personal extensions of their selves, carefully monitoring and managing the boundaries around who, what, when, and how they send and receive messages, especially those pertaining to sexual health topics. We also identified four main themes around their texting behaviors, texting preferences, perceptions of advantages and disadvantages of texting, and what they consider as texting etiquette as well as their suggestions on how to craft text messages for health promotion. We consider implications of these findings for further research on mental health and specifically for the development of texting-based sexual health promotion interventions, particularly in conjunction with other existing HIV prevention interventions.

The world social forum and the struggle for new political paradigms

The purpose of this work is to discuss the ideological approaches interlinking the global justice movements, particularly in the boundaries of the World Social Forum (WSF). We identify three major conceptual frames: human rights and multiculturalism, as positive references; and neoliberalism, as a negative reference. Our hypothesis is that the discourse underlying these concepts represents an adaptation of Cold War left wing tradition, put in motion by the decline of Eastern Europe Socialism, globalization and the political crisis of the working class as the subject of change. Each of the aforementioned concepts try to deal with a particular facet of the new historical period. Human rights supply an alternative to socialism as political reference. Multiculturalism aims to broaden the understanding of oppression, seeing every marginalized social group – working class as well as peasants, women, ethnic minorities and indigenous people – as subject of change. The opposition to neoliberalism, on its turn, is a response to the new economic and political order emerging from globalization and the soviet bloc debacle. Our work is based on the contributions of critical theory and the concept of cosmopolitanism as discussed by Ulrich Beck, Jürgen Habermas and Boaventura Santos. Our argument is that all three conceptual references fall short of their attempt to provide an alternative to Cold War left wing discourse and organization. Organizationally, although intended to be horizontal, the WSF reproduces, both actively and passively, hierarchical modes, that we define as a "new model vanguard". Politically, they do not represent a coherent program in the same sense of socialism. Human rights and multiculturalism are, actually, ideas appropriated from liberal and right wing tendencies, whereas the opposition to neoliberalism is based on a very limited critical view of capitalism seen as a means to build a broad alliance between radicals and reformers.

The views of children living in care concerning their biological families in Brazil

Brazilian public homes are intended for children of up to 18 years of age who have been abused, neglected, placed at risk, or abandoned by their parents. These homes are normally of two types: for babies and young children, or for adolescents. This study considered as participants eight children from public children's homes located in deprived areas of the city of Sao Paulo, Brazil, who still maintain contact with their biological parents, and it investigates their views of the latter. An ethnographic approach was utilised in conjunction with photographs, video recordings, drawings and conversations. The collection of data took place in care homes over a period of 12 months. It is hoped that this research will help to shed light on an area which has received little attention to date, whilst countering negative ideas concerning general attitudes to the care of deprived children. The study also aims to contribute to the consolidation of studies of children's welfare in Brazil as a whole. It sets out results which aim to inform Brazilian public policies in order to guarantee improved standards in care homes, as well as increased support for families. The research carried out demonstrates that deprived children develop alternative family dynamics, which are different from generally accepted practice. Although these dynamics are considered as risky by the public authorities, the children are nevertheless hopeful of returning to their family homes at some point in the future. While it is obviously not acceptable for children to live in precarious and dangerous conditions, it is clear that current social policies in this area have failed, since the blame for these problems has simply been attributed to the parents.

Contesting counter-terrorism regulation: Identity, resilience and resistance amongst young British Pakistanis

Over the last decade the issue of identity has been prevalent in discussions about British Muslims, with the events of 9/11 serving as a touchstone for media debates about religious, national and cultural affiliations. The 7/7 terrorist attacks in the UK led to young British Pakistanis being subjected to intense public and institutional scrutiny and wider political concerns being expressed about the failure of multiculturalism. Young British Pakistanis have thus had to negotiate and maintain their identities in an environment in which they have simultaneously been defined as a threat to national security whilst being pressurized to align with 'core British values'. Within this context, we convey the findings of a qualitative study into identity construction amongst a group of young British Pakistanis living in the North-West of England. In presenting the narratives of participants, the processes involved in the maintenance of solid, elastic and resistant identities are elucidated. Drawing upon Bhabha's third space thesis we go on to explore the political potentiality of and the limits to hybrid identities.

Des programmes de lutte contre la pauvreté au Pérou et en Bolivie : Du référentiel néolibéral à inflexions sociales à un droit universel à l'assistance ?

Alors que le gouvernement d'Alan García, au Pérou, demeure l'un des pays les plus 'néolibéraux' de la région, la Bolivie d'Evo Morales s'oriente vers un régime 'national-populaire-indigéniste'. Cependant, tous deux adoptent, depuis 2005, le même type de politiques de lutte contre la pauvreté : des programmes de transferts conditionnés. Après avoir éclairé les contextes d'émergence de ces politiques, cette communication s'attèlera à mettre en exergue leurs différences et ressemblances en les reliant à des référentiels de politiques sociales.

Au Pérou, JUNTOS conditionne un transfert mensuel aux mères d'enfants scolarisés qui se rendent à une série de contrôles sanitaires. Les destinataires finaux sont sélectionnés par un ciblage sur les plus pauvres et le contrôle des conditions est sévère. En Bolivie, le Bono Juancito Pinto (BJP) et le Bono Juana Azurduy (BJA) visent à rendre 'palpables' les changements initiés par le nouvel Etat plurinational. Le premier verse une allocation annuelle à tous les enfants scolarisés dans l'enseignement public et le deuxième octroie un subside monétaire, lors de contrôles sanitaires prénataux et postnataux, à toutes les mères d'enfants de moins de deux ans sans assurance maladie. Si le contrôle du suivi des conditions est quasi inexistant pour le BJP celui pour le BJA est plus important.

L'objectif poursuivi vise à comparer ces programmes par rapport aux référentiels de politiques sociales auxquels ils renvoient. Le Pérou et la Bolivie divergent quant à leur critère de sélection des destinataires finaux et sur le contrôle des conditions. L'hypothèse est la suivante : alors qu'au Pérou le référentiel 'néolibéral à inflexion sociale' est fondamental, la Bolivie tente de s'en distancier et pose les jalons d'un droit universel à l'assistance. Cependant, malgré ces différences palpables, tous deux mobilisent la figure maternelle de manière centrale et tout compte fait peu différenciée.

Elegir una escuela para un estudiante sordo o hipoacúsico: La desigualdad de oportunidades educativas desde la perspectiva de las familias

El presente paper se inscribe en el problema de las desiguales oportunidades que la sociedad ofrece a personas que categoriza como discapacitadas. En Argentina en las últimas décadas el sistema educativo (al menos en educación común) se ha caracterizado por la existencia de circuitos educativos diferenciados según el nivel socioeconómico de los estudiantes. Esta situación ha llevado a diversos autores a definirlo como un sistema "segmentado", "fragmentado" o "segregatorio". Existirían diferencias entre las escuelas en cuanto al equipamiento que poseen, las prácticas pedagógicas que implementan y el conocimiento que imparten. Así a los estudiantes se les enseña y aprenden desigualmente según la escuela a la que asisten. A su vez no todas las familias tienen la misma capacidad de acceder a las escuelas de su preferencia. Intervienen la estructura del sistema educativo y determinadas características de los estudiantes y sus familias para interpretar y apropiarse de la oferta escolar. Considero que si bien, la escolarización es mucho más que elegir una escuela y obtener una vacante, son el primer paso. En tal sentido en este paper me propongo conocer cómo se articula la pertenencia a clase con tener un hijo con discapacidad en la instancia de elección de escuelas comunes y obtención de vacantes. Indagaré cualitativamente en el AMBA el caso de familias oyentes de clase media, con un hijo pre-adolescente sordo o hipoacúsico que se comunica de manera oral-auditiva. Narratives of Japanese Peruvian internment experiences during World WarII

Life story research, which focuses on an individual life, serves to interpret narratives through interactions between interviewees and interviewers during interviews. In other words, in analyzing the narrative of an individual who experienced an event, it places importance on paying attention not only to what the interviewee told but also to how the narrative was produced, which makes it possible to describe various experiences of the interviewee and produce richer story about life.

In this paper we examine how life story research is employed in understanding Japanese Peruvian internment experiences. During World WarII, approximately 1,800 Japanese Peruvians were interned in the United States as hostages in exchange for Americans held by Japan. After the war ended, most of them were not permitted to re-enter Peru and had no choice but to either "return" to Japan or "remain" in the United States. Regarding two Nisei (second generation, born in Peru) who experienced internment in a concentration camp in this paper, one has resettled in Japan and the other one in the United States.

Comparison between two interview data revealed that the historic experience of internment is implicated by postwar life experiences. In other words, recognition and assessment of internment are formed during their lives in each settled land after war and they can be understood only from the life story perspective which comprehensively examines the past from the perspective of present. As the result, it will be possible to provide more various aspects to the public history which objectively records the actual condition of internment.

Finally, based on the report above, we discuss the possibility of the life story research.

Jeunes travailleurs universitaires : D'une génération à l'autre, changements et continuités

Cette recherche quantitative porte sur un échantillon d'étudiants du Centro Universitário Fundação Santo André, situé dans la région symbolique du Grand ABC ; soit un territoire industriel, devenu majoritairement tertiaire, et qui fût celui de la naissance politique du premier président du Brésil d'origine ouvrière : Lula.

L'objectif de la recherche est de décrire le profil socio-économique et culturel des étudiants actuels de cette institution, afin de le comparer à ceux des années 1990, grâce aux données issues du recensement. Cette comparaison permet de comprendre les changements et les continuités d'une génération à l'autre : la plupart des étudiants de ces deux générations, qui sont nés et habitent dans cette région, dévoilent comment certaines caractéristiques de leurs profils sont attachées simultanément aux échelles locale et mondiale se condensent dans ce territoire.

Ainsi, les étudiants des années 90 étaient travailleurs et sont nés à l'intérieur de familles où les mères étaient femmes au foyer, signalant par là une organisation plutôt traditionnelle. Ils ont été marqués par l'héritage ouvrier de leurs parents, par les luttes démocratiques issues des mouvements ouvrier et populaire, mais aussi par la télévision et la presse écrite.

En revanche, les caractéristiques des étudiants actuels révèlent les mutations socio-économiques, même qu'ils soient aussi travailleurs, tels que la désindustrialisation, mais aussi du point de vue de la famille avec l'accès au marché du travail de la plupart de leurs mères... De plus, l'internet joue un rôle central dans la vie de ces étudiants et, par rapport au choix de la tranche d'étude, ils cherchent un équilibre entre le marché et leurs désirs personnels. Enfin, à l'inverse de la génération passé, ces étudiants n'ont plus de mouvements pour exprimer leurs revendications et prennent leur distance par rapport aux idéaux dont Lula fût le porte-parole.

The role of human and social capital to gain the upper hand in migrant's labor market: The case of Japanese-Argentina workers in Japan

We study necessary conditions for migrants to get out of precarious jobs imposed on them examining the case of Argentina migrants in Japan. Japan's Latin American migrants are known as enjoying privileged status as descendants of Japanese nationals, but nearly ninety percent of them have been concentrated to highly unstable part-time jobs often fired by labor contractors. We examine the difference between such agency workers and those gained better jobs, focusing on the role of human and social capital. Data collected through 369 interviews with Japanese-Argentina workers in Japan indicate that proficiency in Japanese is the most important factor to find better jobs in terms of human capital. But Japanese proficiency is not the sufficient condition for gaining the upper hand in the labor market. Regardless of competence in Japanese, reliance on co-ethnic social ties usually results in part-time jobs. These networks serve as group-based resources because they are useful for those with poor fluency in Japanese to find jobs. Yet reliance on these ties is most common for moves into the most precarious jobs prepared for Latin American migrants. By contrast, those who seek jobs from Japanese are much more likely to become full-time employees or self-employed. These results show a certain combination of human and social capital, fluency in Japanese and reliance on ties with Japanese, is necessary to get out of part-time jobs. Migrant co-ethnic networks are crucial for job seeking and unemployment minimization strategies, but they have led to migrant's concentration in the most disadvantaged segment of the labor market.

Sociology of childhood and early childhood education studies: Some data about this interface in Brazil

In Brazil, the perspective of children as social actors expanded empirical studies about children in different contexts, bringing out the sociology of childhood as research field. To know more about the strengthening of sociology of childhood, we investigated research groups that claim the field as theoretical or/and methodological framework of their research.

We identified 25 groups of research, of which 16 located in educational area, mainly related to early childhood education. In this sense, our interest now is to know how is constituted this interface between sociology of childhood and early childhood education, and, more, how could be the consequences of this interdisciplinary studies both for sociology of childhood and early childhood education studies.

The present study is funded by the National Council for Scientific and Technological Development (CNPq).

Ethos and logos in Israeli citizenship: Discourse analysis of civic studies textbooks

Abstract: This study examines the notion of citizenship as a form of political identity in a multi-national and multi-ethnic state such as Israel. In an effort to understand the strategies by which citizenship of Palestinians and Jews in Israel is defined, this research analyzes civic studies textbooks currently used in Israeli public schools. The study analyzes the strategies by which the conflict between citizenship and nationality is bridged, and the arguments the textbooks use to justify the continued exclusion of the Palestinian minority from the social, economic, political, and civil society in Israel. It focuses on the analysis of the ethos of citizenship and the internal logos that sustain it as a coherent discourse in civic studies textbooks, making it appear sustainable and legitimate in the eyes of Jewish majority students.

Theoretically, the study examines the conflict arising from certain ways of conceptualizations of nationhood and citizenship. It reexamines ethnic groups' right to self-determination against individual rights based on universal principles. This case adds to the understanding of the complex relationship between the particularistic and the universal forms of political identity, nationalism and citizenship.

First the mixture and then what? Community participation and neighbourhood integration in mixed neighbourhoods in Rotterdam, the Netherlands, and New Haven, USA

Two mixed neighbourhoods in ordinary cities are used as examples in this paper to, first, show what as the outline for the session argues is confirmed empirically by others as well, namely that the social networks of the residents are not living up to the ideal of policy makers of residential mixture producing mixed social networks. While hence mixture may not bring about the individual access to new resources that many have wished for, this paper asks whether on the level of the neighbourhood, indicators can be found that mixture brings about resource access to the community that would not be available otherwise. It analyzes, first, to what extent community and political participation depends on network ties mixed in race, ethnicity and class: are those who have such mixed ties more likely to participate, and do they more often participate through these ties? Showing that this effect is not very strong, the paper then turns to the question of possible explanations, referring to qualitative, ethnographic data. Refuting the homophily thesis as a description of what is there, not an explanation, the paper suggests, using Feld's concept of foci and Small's idea of unanticipated gains, that for anything productive to happen when neighbourhoods are, and remain, mixed, policy makers may want to rethink their notion of integration.

An alternative way to inquire into social justice

One of the most influential works on "social justice" is, needless to say, "A Theory of Justice" (1971) by John Rawls. His arguments about "justice" as the most important virtue, which social institutions must demonstrate, are founded on the so-called "rational choice theory," which reflects on his key concepts, e.g., the "original position" as a "reasonable initial status quo," and the "veil of ignorance." This also imposes limitations on his "two principles of justice," that is, the first principle as "the principle of equal liberty," and the second principle which consists of "the difference principle" and "the principle of fair of opportunity."

The aim of this presentation is to make these limitations clear and to search for an alternative way to inquire into social justice under the framework of Alfred Schutz's phenomenologically based theory of "project of action."

Functional rural education: The path to social justice and true democracy in Nigeria

The paper views social justice and democracy as inseparable concepts. Social justice is conceived as the accessibility of all citizens to opportunities for a dignified life (adequate food, shelter, medical care, and political and economic participation among others). Focus is on the spread of these opportunities to a majority of the population who live in the rural areas and are effectively excluded. And the status quo is maintained by lack of access to quality education which is the main ladder to social mobility. It is noted that there is a widespread misconception of democracy due to ignorance and illiteracy, and by being interpreted through a wide diversity of cultures that constitute the Nigerian socio-political space. The paper further notes that what obtains in Nigeria today may be termed 'civilian dictatorship' and that without any political culture evolving at the grassroots, the ability of the majority to demand for social justice and accountability from the state would be severely compromised. It is concluded that only an urgent rural-focused educational reform programme would redress the situation. Suggestions are proffered as to the character of the reform.

Environmental activism and eco-global criminology: A visual approach

Criminologist Rob White (2011) defines eco-global criminology as that field of criminology concerned with eco-justice and ecological issues – such as those relating to climate change, biodiversity, waste and pollution. In this framework of analysis, environmental activism is very relevant and crucial to prompt environmental reforms and social change: in fact, in the same manner as eco-global criminology, environmental activism deals not only with acts and omissions that are already criminalized (such as illegal dumping of toxic waste), but also with events that have yet to be designed officially as harmful and that show evidence of exhibiting potentially negative consequences. From a different tradition, criminologists Jeff Ferrell, Keith Hayward and Jock Young (2008) remind us that the everyday experience of late modernity is certainly suffused with images, and, specifically, with images of crime. And they wonder: "How, today, can there be a viable criminology that is not also a visual criminology?". Following a broad definition of visual criminology, it is that branch of criminology which studies the use of visual materials, photography, videos and new media to explore the complex dimensions of crime and justice. Crossing the interdisciplinary fields sketched, in this contribution we'll explore the ways in which environmental activists respond to environmental crimes, build spaces of resistance to environmental destruction and use photography, video and new media to confront the harms of environmental injustice and inequality. Moreover we'll suggest that also in the field of eco-global criminology it is important to imagine new visual methods for engaging with the problems of crime and justice, moving towards approaches able to account for environmental crime, transgressions and victimization as they are lived under contemporary circumstances.

Lo social y lo político en el cambio de época. Notas a propósito de la experiencia Argentina (2003-2011)

En los últimos años se produjeron cambios significativos en la dinámica política que trastocaron la trayectoria de las organizaciones sociales, entre ellos la asunción de Néstor Kirchner en 2003 como presidente de Argentina y la consolidación del kirchnerismo como movimiento político. A raíz de estas transformaciones, las organizaciones cuya tradición nacional y popular les permitió adherir al gobierno, modificaron la estrategia de movilización y confrontación callejera que habían utilizado hasta entonces, poniendo entre paréntesis su estatuto destituyente para combinarlo con uno de tipo instituyente. Este desplazamiento abrió nuevos desafíos para las organizaciones, principalmente el problema de la institucionalización. Estudios recientes han interpretado dicho vínculo con el régimen político de gobierno como cooptación, dando por sentado una división entre lo social y lo político. Este enfoque ha contribuido a estigmatizar a las organizaciones antes que a comprender la contingencia de su dinámica. En este marco, el objetivo de esta ponencia se orienta a evaluar críticamente el modo en que se ha pensado la noción de institucionalización, y subsidiariamente la división entre lo social y lo político. Se propondrá una concepción pragmática de institucionalización: como mediación entre la sociedad civil y el régimen político, donde lo político no sea una actividad exclusiva del espacio estatal, sino también del social. Este tipo de noción supone una tensión entre ambos espacios, donde lejos de relegar la acción de las organizaciones a un solo ámbito, supone el reconocimiento de diferentes lógicas respecto de las formas de participación, los mecanismos de representación y los dispositivos de legitimación que conforman una comunidad política. En definitiva, se trata de dilucidar la potencialidad crítica de los movimientos sociales considerando sus contribuciones a la instalación de problemas públicos, al reclamo por derechos y al cuestionamiento del orden establecido.

The experience of production and production of experience: Film-making in a mixed neighborhood

Based on ethnographic research, this paper analyzes the process of producing a film in a mixed neighborhood in Haifa, the northern Israeli city, where Jews of different ethnic ancestry and Palestinians of different religions live together.

Since fall 2010, an Arab-Jewish group of local residents with various backgrounds in filmmaking and social activism has been invested in producing a film about their experience of living in the mixed neighborhood. What started as a film aimed at showing the potentials and opportunities of the mixed neighborhood, soon became a platform for interrogating relationships between communities, and State and Municipal practices of discrimination. Other events, such as the Arab Spring, and the Summer 2011 social protests in Israel, also influenced the group's work and shifted the course of production, creating rifts within the group.

Since the group's meetings were video-recorded for research purposes, this documentation eventually supplied the main footage for the group's film, documenting the vivid discussions not only on identity, rights, representation and political power, but also on the means by which these topics could be translated to cinematic language. Thus, from trying to produce a film describing their life in the neighborhood, the group ended up working on a reflexive film documenting the group's failure to make the film they had envisioned.

This paper analyzes this shift by regarding filmmaking as social action whereby the translation of lived experiences into cinematic language is imagined as having a potential force for social change. This analysis shows how visually-based critical-reflexive observation can shade new light on both the life in a mixed neighborhood as well as on the Arab-Israeli conflict, mainly by revealing the possibilities of transgression whereby the commonsensical congruence between identities (in a conflict) to positions (towards the conflict) is unraveled.

Las representaciones sociales que poseen los docentes jubilados sobre la violencia ejercida por la sociedad hacia los adultos mayores

Para conocer las representaciones sociales sobre la violencia ejercida por la sociedad hacia los adultos mayores, se ha realizado esta investigación con docentes jubilados de la Universidad Nacional Experimental "Francisco de Miranda", Coro, estado Falcón, Venezuela.

Se utilizó metodología cualitativa, y se aplicó la técnica de entrevista en profundidad, no estructurada. Es un estudio exploratorio y descriptivo-analítico. La muestra fue seleccionada por muestreo intencional, compuesta por once (11) docentes -5 varones y 6 mujeres-.

Para el análisis se tomaron dos elementos: uno relacionado con la condición de jubilado de estos sujetos y cómo esta condición influye en la construcción que hacen sobre la violencia hacia el adulto mayor; otro, vinculado con el análisis que los sujetos hacen de la dinámica social que se genera alrededor del adulto mayor y las maneras como la sociedad construye la imagen de ser viejo y cómo influye en la violencia social hacia el adulto mayor.

Se concluye que la construcción de las imágenes de la violencia que la sociedad ejerce sobre el adulto mayor se hace desde la representación que sobre la vejez circula en la sociedad, que destaca una visión negativa basada en un discurso discriminador y excluyente generando formas de violencia y da como resultado un problema social, cuyo origen está en las maneras como la sociedad establece las formas de relación con el adulto mayor y cuya consecuencia más palpable es la violación de sus derechos.

Palabras clave: Vejez, envejecimiento, jubilación, violencia, representaciones sociales.

Crecimiento con desigualdad en la periferia capitalista. El caso de San Juan, Argentina

A pesar de las alentadoras cifras oficiales sobre disminución de pobreza e indigencia, la sociedad argentina continúa siendo atravesada por profundas desigualdades. Esta ponencia propone discutir la persistencia de desigualdades sociales en escenarios de crecimiento económico y go-biernos democráticos, en la periferia capitalista y en el marco de la crisis global desatada en el capitalismo central.

Para ello se abordarán las propuestas de organismos internacionales en materia de política social y su relación con el Plan de gobierno (denominado II Reconstrucción de San Juan) aplicado por el gobierno que inicia en 2003 y que continuará hasta (al menos) 2015 en la provincia de San Juan, Argentina.

Aunque para algunos ha llegado "la hora de la igualdad" (CEPAL, 2011) creemos que las respuestas a la persistencia de pobreza y desigualdad se reducen a políticas compensatorias basadas en rimbombantes declaraciones de justicia social y que en la práctica, tímidamente logran sacar a sectores de la indigencia para que alcancen mínimos biológicos de supervivencia.

En San Juan mientras se garantizan condiciones ultra favorables a empresas transnacionales extractivas, se contiene a las mayorías con programas sociales. Muchos de estos programas fueron concebidos como medidas de excepción para tiempos extraordinarios de crisis y sin embargo se sostienen en etapas de importante crecimiento económico, lo que implicaría por un lado, que el crecimiento es impotente para eliminar (ni siquiera para disminuir significativamente) la pobreza y la desigualdad; y por otro que las políticas sociales "de emergencia" pueden convertirse en una importante estrategia (estructuralmente funcional) de disciplinamiento y control social, tanto en los ciclos expansivos como recesivos.

Se espera contribuir al debate sobre los caminos para alcanzar una mejor calidad de vida para las mayorías y no simplemente mejoras temporales en indicadores (muchas veces, dudosamente medidos).

The challenge of work and family 'conciliation' and the bipolarity of the female labor market in contemporary Brazil

In Brazil, as in much of the world, the reproductive responsibilities and activities of 'care' in general, remain as women, leaving them the challenge of combining productive and reproductive spheres. This would be the principal residence of the sexual division of labor in its most traditional and binary aspect, being a central aspect of gender inequality.

Without denying the achievements made by women in search of space and legitimacy in the labor market, but rather precisely because of these - coupled with the permanence of reproductive activities as women's responsibility - is emerging new binaries among women themselves.

Since only through the 'delegation' - for other women, generally poorer - the work and family 'conciliation' is possible, the intersection of social relations among women is well marked; fostering new phenomena, as the polarization of female labor market.

In one hand, is the growth of higher-level positions for women, giving them the necessity, but also the means, to delegate household and family tasks to other (poorer) women. In the other, as consequence, is the growth of the more precarious pole of the female labor, which means, as a rule, precarious labor relations, low wages and social isolation. This pole is represented by maids or nannies, and usually occupied by regional migrants - since the vast regional differences in Brazil make the country self-sufficient in this type of labor. With women of humble origin migrating from poorer regions to the most urbanized and developed regions of the country.

Without efficient organizational support, middle class women are delegating "their" home responsibilities for poorer (migrant) women. But, how can poor migrant women, who are involved in precarious labor relations and use to live with the absence of government, articulate work-family responsibilities? Delegating to whom? Another challenge to contemporary feminism.

Innovative workers' "capabilities" but less employment status and working conditions under pressure

Transformation of work is more and more characterised by a prevalent dimension of "being" more than of "doing". Trends in global capitalism, from transnational markets to accelerating technological innovation and restructuring, are pushing towards this change, above all in countries with higher labour cost. This transformation is also advantaged by a relevant development of human capital and social relationships.

This dimension of "being" in jobs is essentially related to increasing workers' "resources" or, better, workers' "capabilities" like: a) more knowledge and creativity; b) more capabilities to be in network, social cooperation, co-working or working teams; c) more autonomy and responsibility or more initiative at the workplace. Results of recent surveys and empirical researches are making available the most important data about this transformation and related indicators. Also theoretical contributions have been strongly influenced by these results in order to give more confirmation or to invite to new research fields.

But innovative workers' capabilities are not developing everywhere, in the same way and/or with the right social evaluation. New jobs are often characterised by less employment status: inequalities for women and young people; declining internal labour markets; more involuntary part time work; dependent self-employment; informal work. And also working conditions are under pressure: wage equality is in question; work and life are less on balance; health and safety are not better, but with more stress at the workplace, as indicated by the last survey of Dublin European Foundation. "Varieties of capitalism" still explain many kinds of dualism across countries, as for job quality and job satisfaction. In particular, labour law, collective action, and welfare regimes are very relevant elements. But there are some other important variables to be considered.

Resource potential of the Russian mentality: Adapting to global complexity

Modern society is undergoing significant changes and there is the challenge of adapting into the resulting complexity of systems and people included in them. The last 20 years of the Russian history have been marked by significant transformations under the influence, first of all, of external factors for the Soviet Union and have given the extensive factual material. The old ruined structure was transformed into a new one, appropriate to the spirit of the time. The author's vision of the Russian transformations is offered in line with global trend complexity, fluidity of society based on the analysis of Russian and foreign concepts, empirical data. The speaker proves the assumption that the mentality in its entirety contains all displayed mentalities and their development/deployment of social, causes/determines the development of society. The purpose of the research on the basis of the report is to look for the birth of new functionality from available assumptions in the Russian mentality, and analysis of the Russian mentality with a view to resources to promote adaptation of Russian society into the process of global complexity. Flowing from one state to another, the Russian mentality becomes more complicated with new meanings and gives impulses for a new social, and latent form gain explicit manifestation. The results of reconstruction of the image of the world of the Russian median class representatives, as people with the most typical of average characteristics of Russian society, are also presented in the report. Due to the fact that national picture of the world is fixed in the language, the analysis of deep semantic structures using content analysis has been used in the study. Adaptive models are identified and analyzed with discourse analysis and invent analysis of folklore (fairy tales, cartoons, movies, etc).

Construcciones raciales y étnicas de los inmigrantes Latino Americanos en Argentina a partir de las políticas migratorias

Se entiende que la migración es uno de los fenómenos que ha desafiado históricamente la supuesta homogeneidad en la que se basa el Estado Nación para redefinir su conformación social, estableciendo claras definiciones de los que están "afuera" y los que están "dentro" del orden nacional.

Para ello se propone centrar la mirada, en el tratamiento que desde el Estado Nación, se le da al fenómeno migratorio. De manera que nos interesa pensar, como a través de las políticas y discursos en torno a la migración, el Estado- Nación construye diferencia y desigualdad traduciendo su propia naturaleza "discriminatoria".

Se considera que la normativa cristaliza un conjunto de valores y un sistema simbólico que ayuda a la reproducción pues la autoridad jurídica es la forma por antonomasia del poder simbólico: el poder del nombramiento y de la institución, de la representación, el poder para construir socialmente y para otorgar importancia social.

En este sentido se entiende que las políticas migratorias construyen un sujeto ideal de nación excluyendo a aquellos considerados "diferentes" y atribuyéndoles a los inmigrantes un conjunto de determinadas "características": étnicas, raciales, de género y clase, entre otras

En este trabajo se pretenden analizar las políticas migratorias del Estado Argentino, desde principios del Siglo XX a la actualidad, atendiendo particularmente a las construcciones étnicas y raciales que, a partir de dichas políticas públicas, se producen en relación a la inmigración latino-americana.

Doing justice in an unjust world: The case of human trafficking

We live in a period of 'global prescriptions' which attempt to set 'universal' normative standards regarding a wide range of behaviours. The way such norms come to be spread involve a wide variety of forms of regulation and diffusion, and include both hard and soft law. Likewise, various processes of 'signaling conformity' are used by those to whom such norms are being communicated. I am interested in understanding the idea of the transnational 'socio-legal space' that these developments presuppose and bring into being. The extent and sense in which actors, institutions, practices and ideas travel across and constitute such a space provide important clues to what is and can be meant by the 'social' at a time of globalized trade and communication.

To illustrate my points I shall make reference to various studies of transnational legal processes. But I shall use as a specific example the efforts to ban the phenomenon of human trafficking and 'exploitation'. This is seen by many as an example of collective efforts to contest the dark side of globalisation but by some others as a way of legitimating nation state boundary-tightening. In seeking to document the 'social' I shall focus on the way norms are elaborated by the relevant 'social' units: international and national actors, intergovernmental organisations, pressure groups and networks involved in 'constructing' this problem and attempting to control it. I shall also examine the social technologies used to constitute and monitor 'the problem' as well as the way actors in different legal cultures use and resist such transnational norms- and the success with which they avoid challenges to their own economic and political orders.

Una moneda de confianza (a trustworthy currency): Dollarization, debt, and everyday economic organization in Ecuador

The official adoption of the U.S. dollar in Ecuador represented as profound a transformation in the everyday lives, shared social experience, and cultural memory of Ecuadorians as in national monetary and fiscal policy. Replacing the very yardstick by which Ecuadorians measured, stored, and transacted the value of the world around them with a foreign currency with unfamiliar dimensions and denominations, dollarization changed the way Ecuadorians live day to day, as well as how Ecuadorians were and are able to understand those changes. Ten years later, Ecuadorians widely support dollarization—primarily because the dollar is said to be "de confianza," a trustworthy currency. Some suggest, however, that the long-term sustainability of dollarization is threatened by the extensive public investments and expansionary fiscal policy, funded in large part by loans from the Chinese government and high oil prices, of President Rafael Correa's administration.

This paper will examine the discourse of confianza that surrounds the dollar and its uses among middle-class Ecuadorians who have organized informal, family-based savings and credit cooperatives. Specifically, this paper will investigate how "confidence" or "trust" plays into the everyday economic practices of these Ecuadorians and their co-ops, while reflecting on the diversity of practices of debt and indebtedness in public and private budgeting. It will suggest that one of dollarization's social effects includes the generation of a "popular monetarism," through which the dollar is widely understood to provide a stable store of value over time. It will also suggest a parallel between this "popular monetarism" in Ecuador and academic approaches to money-as-debt, which risk eliding the diverse functions and uses of both money and debt.

Health care determinants in comparative perspective: The role of partisan politics for health care provision

Health care systems differ substantially across countries in terms of service provision, which is of direct relevance for the quality and distribution of health care citizenship rights. Whereas the driving forces for the expansion and subsequent decline of social benefits have received great scholarly interest in comparative research, the determinants for health care provision are largely unexplored. In this paper we assess the role of partisan politics for health care provision in 18 OECD countries 1980-2005. Contrary to the development of other social citizenship rights over this period, the analysis of health care provision is one of expansion rather than decline. Based on OECD Health data we propose a new strategy for measuring social citizenship rights in the area of health care policy that is based on institutional organization rather than expenditure levels. The regression framework shows that left wing governments are positively related to the expansion of health care provision. Likewise, confessional parties generally have a stronger positive impact than secular right wing governments.

Public transfers and poverty: A global perspective

Several countries in Latin America and East Asia are on the verge of making a transition from middle-income to high-income societies. It is doubtful whether economic growth alone is sufficient for accomplishing the final steps of this transition. One obstacle might be the general absence of effective mechanisms to allocate and redistribute parts of the financial surpluses. In order to effectively combat extreme poverty it may suffice to use well designed cash benefits targeted to the poorest of the poor. However, in the new period of transition any ambitions to combat extreme poverty and raise income of the absolute poorest segments of the population should also be complemented by an emphasis on mitigating income inequalities in wider population segments, not least in terms of relative income poverty. The purpose of this study is to assess the link between public transfer programs and relative income poverty in a global perspective. The redistributive impact of income gradients and levels of public transfer programs are tested with Luxembourg Income Study (LIS) income survey data covering up to 36 middle- and high-income countries. The multilevel framework of the empirical analysis makes it possible to analyze the contribution of public transfers in reducing relative income poverty after controlling for confounding factors. Results indicate that redistributive government programs explain parts of the differences in poverty rates across countries. Public transfers with less targeted income gradients are most effective to reduce poverty, something that is related to the size rather than the gradient of redistribution. One interpretation is that policy makers in transitional economies need to widen the focus of social reform by complementing existing targeted low-income benefit programs and increasing the financial resources spent on universal and earnings-related entitlements. Thereby prospects for further social development in Latin America and East Asia could be substantially improved.

Extracurricular art practices: Developing emotional competence in adolescence

Here we present the consideration of the art leisure in its relation to identity by analyzing this connection from developmental science and emotion studies perspective. Organized leisure time such as extracurricular art practices conditions it to be valuable for gaining developmental experiences; in particular, facilitates identity shaping process which is especially intense in adolescence. Contemporary conceptions of identity and identification see these phenomena as considerably dependent on emotional life of individuals in social groups. Emotional ties among the members of the groups constitute a natural basis for "I" – "We" sensualization. Even basic emotional relationships of attachment and detachment in a group influence type of correlation and level of cohesion between members, charges their drive for joint action, shapes their satisfaction with the group as behavioral context and make up source of emotional energy for self-expression. Extracurricular art activities form fruitful contexts for adolescents to develop emotional foundations of self-image and in-group positioning. First, arts are the most expressive sphere, suitable for reaching outstanding emotional states and feeling others and oneself as a part of a coherent pattern. Second, organized artistic groups facilitate emotional involvement and provide drivers for constant self-group improvement. Third, engagement of adolescents in art practices enhances effective time-management and avoidance of risky behaviors because sophisticated art practices lead to specific understanding of how to express oneself and what kind of approval to expect from others. On the whole during extracurricular art practices adolescents form emotional competence needed for identity shaping: emotional regulation skills for building successful relationships with others and competence to live rich emotional life for developing a creative individuality.

Entre la lucha por la vida y un futuro incierto: Estudio comparativo sobre el mantenimiento-desplazamiento de la lengua mixe de tamazulapam, oaxaca y la lengua totonaca de mecapalapa, Puebla

Muchas lenguas indígenas mantenían un alto grado de vitalidad, que en muchos casos podía ser explicado por la situación geográfica de aislamiento que vivían estas comunidades, tal es el caso de las lenguas que se hablan en las diversas regiones serranas de México. Hoy día las situaciones de comunicación se han transformado y las presiones que experimentan los hablantes indígenas están conduciendo al paulatino desplazamiento de sus lenguas, y en algunos casos a una pérdida estrepitosa de las mismas. En esta ponencia presentaremos un cuadro comparativo con respecto a la situación del conocimiento de la lengua indígena, entre la comunidad de Mecapalapa de habla totonaca ubicada en la Sierra Norte de Puebla y la comunidad de Tamazulapam de habla mixe ubicada en la Sierra Norte de Oaxaca.

Ambas comunidades presentan condiciones geográficas similares, sin embargo, las presiones que han vivido los hablantes han generado una marcada diferenciación en cuanto al mantenimiento-desplazamiento de la lengua indígena, mientras que en Mecapalapa se observa un inminente desplazamiento de la lengua totonaca, en Tamazulapam se observa todavía un mantenimiento importante de la lengua mixe. En esta investigación mostraremos esta diferenciación y discutiremos en torno a las posibles causas que están generando un contraste importante en cuanto al futuro de las lenguas indígenas en estas comunidades.

Intergenerational support and quality of life in old age: Do welfare state regimes matter?

The idea of the welfare state as main provider of help and care for the old and needy is among the most important achievements in the history of European social politics. It was meant to improve people's quality of life by unburdening traditional support providers: the family.

The relation between family and state is discussed in light of the specialization hypothesis, which assumes strong welfare states to unburden providers of family support by crowding out burdensome care-work and crowding in voluntary less onerous help, leading to an overall improvement of family lives. Challenging this assumption of voluntariness implemented in the specialization hypothesis, our presentation focuses on the effects of intergenerational support on the quality of life of providers. Do welfare states shape the relation between providing intergenerational support and quality of life?

First, we describe the prevalence of intergenerational help and care to elderly parents in Europe. Second, we show the varying impact of support on self-reported quality of life of the providers, by means of hierarchical linear models including random effects. Third, we relate these differences to the welfare state using cross level interactions. Analyses are based on the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE) with respondents aged 50 and older from 14 European countries.

Results show that the idea of voluntariness and improvement of family life in strong welfare states needs to be revisited. Providing minor intergenerational support is related to lower quality of life in strong welfare states, whereas in weak welfare states, intergenerational solidarity is rarely questioned: It is a matter of course and hence not lowering perceived quality of life. Results suggest that the cultural context shapes the perception of welfare state policies. Perceptions as unintended side effects can eat up the beneficial effects of state support.

The rural woman's burden: Volunteer mothering and the contradictions of empowerment

Over the last two decades, non-governmental organizations (NGOs) have played an increasingly important role in community development processes and programs throughout the global South. While some practitioners and scholars have heralded these spaces as positive opportunities for women's participation and empowerment, others have critiqued this now-common approach to promoting gender equality for its inattention to important contextual differences among women in developing countries (Mohanty 2003; Eisenstein 2009). What does empowerment mean, for example, in a subsistence context where the gendered division of labor serves as a family survival strategy? In this article, I analyze this question by examining the case of a rural village in Nicaragua (Loma Verde) where women have been recruited both by NGOs and the government to be "volunteer mothers" – a role that encompasses numerous tasks as health promoters, educators, and social workers. Through a careful examination of these women's narratives, their daily lives and routines, and the local context in which they are embedded, I explore the complex implications of becoming a volunteer mother at the individual, familial, and community levels. Based on participant observation and in-depth interviews, I argue that while these opportunities for women's community participation are couched in a discourse of empowerment based on training, in practice, the increasing reliance of NGOs and the state on women's unpaid labor have generated significant new burdens in the everyday lives of poor women and their families. The lessons to be drawn from the case of Loma Verde, I suggest, are not unique, but can inform our understanding of the meanings and repercussions of women's community participation in other contexts of high social and economic vulnerability.

Los desafíos de la educación de jóvenes y adultos en la red federal de educación profesional y tecnológica brasileña

En Brasil, sólo el 23% de las personas tienen 11 o más años de estudio, lo que confirma que menos de un cuarto de la población tiene educación básica. No es de extrañar que casi el 80% de analfabetos recibir hasta 02 salarios mínimos. La necesidad de hacer frente al desempleo y el bajo nivel de educación de la juventud ha hecho con el Gobierno Federal brasileño movilice a un conjunto de acciones para elevar la educación, garantizando las oportunidades de capacitación y formación profesional. De acuerdo con el análisis del poder público, hay una escasez de mano de obra capaz de satisfacer la creciente demanda de trabajadores calificados en la fase de expansión económica. Incluso teniendo en cuenta la reducción del empleo, es importante acentuar que los más afectados son jóvenes de 18 a 24 años. Entre las acciones del gobierno para combatir este cuadro, se destacan las acciones de integración de la educación básica y la formación profesional, tales como el Programa Nacional de Integración de la Formación Profesional con la Educación Básica en la Modalidad de educación de Jóvenes y Adultos (PROEJA), desarrollado por la Red Federal de Educación Profesional y Tecnológica brasileña. Tratamos de entender los objetivos del PROEJA a partir de disertaciones y tesis que lo tiene como objeto de estudio. Al hacer esta revisión de la literatura, destacamos dos temas que nos llamó la atención: el primero se refiere a la imposibilidad de un programa educativo en sí mismo dar cuenta del desempleo; la segunda tiene que ver con las dificultades que enfrentan las instituciones en la promoción de la construcción del conocimiento técnico integrado a la formación general básica.

A truth commission in Brazil? Challenges and perspectives to integrate human rights and democracy

The paper to be presented aims to evaluate the creation of the National Truth Commission in Brazil and its effort to integrate human rights and democratic means to account past violations. First, it tries to establish a normative view according to which the Amnesty Law enacted in 1979 is not valid because it violates what Rainer Forst calls a "basic right to justification." In addition it reviews and challenges the normative foundations of the decisions of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, which recently condemned the Brazilian state. According to the Court's view, the only legitimate way a country has to make violations of human rights accountable is by means of criminal justice. This perspective, the article argues, is too narrow and must include truth commissions as well.

Pathways from school to work: Can service participation and social capital improve developmental outcomes of economically disadvantaged youth?

The transition from school to work is especially problematic for economically disadvantaged young people in a time of rapid social change and economic restructuring. Previous research has indicated that these young people encounter greater difficulties in education, employment and youth development in general than their more fortunate counterparts. The most notable problem is that of "NEET", in which young people are not engaged in education, employment, or training. This status, in turn, is a precursor to more serious problems, and thus finding ways to help these young people is a pressing concern for research. Given this consideration, the present study surveys 500 Hong Kong youths aged between 17 and 21 from low-income families to investigate their paths to development. Of particular concern is the exploration of the factors that are conducive to the success of these youths in school, work, and community life. A prominent factor is participation in vocational training and social work services, and another important factor is social capital embedded in their friendship networks. The way in which these factors interact with personal and family backgrounds to shape the development of young people is also an area of investigation. The research findings are of value in the development of policy and practices that will be beneficial to these young people, and will be of benefit to society as a whole.

This paper will be presented in English. It has direct relevance to the theme of "Youth and Work in a Globalized World" at the RC34 Sessions in the Second ISA Forum of Sociology to be held on August 1-4, 2012 in Buenos Aires, Argentina, as more and more young people worldwide are now living in economic disadvantaged circumstances and facing problems in their school-to-work transition.

Community policing in Brazil: Challenges and prospects

The focus of this study are the existing community policing programs in nine Brazilian states (Alagoas, Bahia, Distrito Federal, Goias, Mato Grosso, Mato Grosso do Sul, Rio de Janeiro, Rio Grande do Sul and São Paulo) which underwent training of public safety professionals guided by the philosophy and organizational strategy of community policing (Koban system) provided from a technical cooperation agreement established in 2008 between Brazil and Japan and involved the National Secretariat of Public Security, the Sao Paulo State Military Police and the Technical Cooperation Agencies of Brazil (ABC/SRM) and Japan (JICA). From mixed methods (consultation of documents, direct observation, interviews and focus groups), it was analyzed: a) the teaching material used in training courses, b) the involvement of actors responsible for state public security management in implementing community policing programs, c) the characteristics of the routines and processes of community safety stations, d) the methodology of work and the public served, e) the interaction of the actions of community policing with social programs and other actors involved in building security, both public safety professionals and representatives from local communities. This strategy allowed us to scale the difficulties, obstacles and challenges identified in the various selected experiences and to identify effects of community policing programs to implement policies to prevent violence.

Social position and social comparisons: Community versus society comparisons of subjective social status

This study examines whether or not subjective social status rankings differ according to social characteristics. A multinomial probit analysis was conducted on 10,099 participants to test whether social position predicts higher or lower subjective rankings relative to one's community or nation. Socially advantaged respondents ranked themselves higher in national comparisons, while disadvantaged respondents ranked themselves higher in community comparisons. Some social position characteristics predicted the magnitude of difference in rankings. These findings demonstrate meaningful differences in how individuals rank themselves on subjective scales according to objective measures of social standing. These differences should be considered in future research utilizing subjective social status scales.

Internet y política: Un balance de la producción académica Brasileña entre 2001 y 2011

El trabajo presenta los resultados de nuestra investigación sobre la apropiación de la temática "internet y política" en Brasil. Con este fin, analizamos 313 artículos presentados en 11 eventos de las áreas de Sociología, de Ciencia Política y de Comunicación Social realizados en el periodo de 2001 a 2011 en territorio brasileño. La metodología consistió en un análisis de contenido con el objetivo de examinar los principales autores, centros de investigación, objetos políticos y tecnológicos, abordajes teóricos, métodos, técnicas, áreas de alcance y conclusiones de los artículos presentados en cada uno de esos eventos. Entre los resultados apuntados por el análisis podemos destacar: (a) liderazgo de algunas universidades, tales como UFBA, UFMG, PUC-SP, UFPR E UFABC en la vanguardia con investigadores que invierten en artículos relacionados a la temática; (b) aumento significativo de la cantidad de investigaciones dedicadas a la temática; (c) incremento de artículos que tienen como objetivo el estudio de redes sociales, tales como Twitter e Facebook; (d) a pesar del aumento gradual de los estudios empíricos a lo largo del periodo analizado, se percibe que la mayor parte de los estudios hace uso de técnicas elementares, como análisis de contenido descriptivo y estadística básica con un excesivo uso de frecuencias simples. De esta manera, podemos concluir, inicialmente, que es un área de investigación en ascensión en Brasil. Sin embargo, todavía se desarrolla de manera heterogénea, con grandes centros productores líderes con niveles bastante dispares de cualidad de aplicación empírica.

Universalism at the subnational level in Argentina and Brazil

In highly decentralized countries, social protection that individuals receive comes from the interaction of national and subnational levels of government. Argentine provinces and Brazilian states receive nationally designed policies and design their own social programs to different degrees. This presentation will describe the extent to which the 24 provinces in Argentina and the 27 states in Brazil provide different levels of basic universal social protection to its residents. By coding the level of universalism in health, education, employment, family allowances, food, pension, and care, it will propose a classification of these different social policy choices at the subnational level from the 1990s to the present.

Voicing exclusion to implied audiences: Urban poverty in the North American press

In order to demonstrate how mainstream media help define the emotional, moral, and rational orientations of haves toward have-nots in the contemporary city, this paper develops a case study of how the voices of the poor and homeless find their way into public dialogue without being the implied audiences of the stories about them. The paper examines sources sited, modes of address, and judgements on their acceptance or rejection found in results from a dialogic analysis of a full year of reporting in 2010 on poverty or homelessness. The sample is drawn from keyword searches for a variety of mainstream newspapers taken from three paired cities: Vancouver-Los Angeles, Toronto-Miami, and Montreal-New York. Most reportage on the urban poor or homeless rarely address the subjects being talked about as addressee. They are not excluded in the sense that media in the main do not talk about them, quote their voices, show their faces, or explain their points of view. Both mainstream journalism and mainstream sociology construct meaning at a second level for their audience by observing first level observers who act in the world. In this sense neither discipline or craft are required to address the subjects they speak of as audiences. Critical sociology though does address the subjects it speaks of by pinpointing enduring forms of domination that confine them and, in our case, by undoing entanglements between the subjects of representation and the perceptions implied audiences are projected to have of them. Our research demonstrates how the voices of the socially excluded are often quoted as sources at the first level of observation and not addressed at the second level as if they themselves were the audience implied from the orientation or tone, mode of address, and judgement.

Local globalization, environment and archaic social relations

One of the striking evidence of local globalization is a sharp increase of crime and wide-spread corruption at a local level of rural communities in Russia. The bulk of shadow economy including its criminal and corrupted components is sized by Russian experts up to 40% GDP. At the beginning of 1990s the extortion racket (the systematic robbery of businessmen) was widely in use; over the last five years the corrupt practices are gaining the advantage. Many sociologists estimate the current situation in the Russian society as critical while using the term 'system corruption' to characterize it (the latter understood as corruption that have pervaded all the levels of social system and become an integral part of the system of government). In my paper I consider the economic banditry (racketeering) and system corruption as a form of parasitical (negative) economic relationship that lock out normal economic development through the deformation of the market relationship and systematic withdrawal of the considerable amount of social product. At the same time the specifics of my point of view would be making the parallel between the criminal-corruptive and some 'archaic' (primordial, pre-class, early class) economic relationships, which, in the situation of radical socio-economic transformation, are being brought back to life. Under the conditions of economic crisis the parasitical economic relationships characteristic of most developing countries as well as countries with transitional economies (countries of so-called 'peripheral capitalism') prove to block the effectiveness of struggle with emerged economic and social menaces; they are the phenomena worsening the economic crisis. All this raises a whole range of philosophical and methodological questions: what is the nature of post-Soviet societies? What conceptual apparatus has to be applied to the analysis of "transforming" societies? What is the proportion of "cultural-mental" and properly economic factors in the development of post-Soviet states?

Intergenerational family relations and career choice of young people in Indonesia

This paper takes up the key session theme of generations and inter-generational relationships to explore how career choices of young middle class Indonesians are largely developed within families, rather than being made by young people as isolated individuals. Not only do the majority of high school students intend to follow the career field of a parent, but young people intending to work on international cruise ships organise their decision-making in terms of future family prosperity. The examples illustrate that there are many cultures in the world where the process of individualisation is either not as far advanced as it is in western countries, or is taking a different form. In non-western cultures where collective values remain highly salient career choice represents not so much an individual aspiration, but the outcome of intergenerational negotiations between the young person and family/kin members. Autonomy and independence from family of origin are not necessarily key markers of adulthood in the developing world. In Indonesia, household sustainability, supporting the education of younger siblings, home renovations, and the health care of older family members, may all depend on the flow of income from younger family members, thus influencing them towards certain career choices. While this might be viewed by some as restrictive, if we accept Beck's argument that many of the risks, costs and responsibilities for a young person's journey through life have in principle been devolved to individuals, then, as Johanna Wyn argues, families and the resources they offer have never been so important for young people in making decisions about the future.

Emerging welfare states: Comparing East Asian and Scandinavian redistribution models in a global context

A major aim of the paper is to compare on a sectorial level Sweden with China and Vietnam, where we contrast parameters of the emerging welfare states in China and Vietnam with the paths of welfare development in Sweden. This opens the possibility of a comparative analysis between the Asian cases and a developed welfare state while at the same time providing the starting point for an analytical model which better informs the theoretical development of transitional welfare policies in post-communist countries.

This enables us to discuss social policy in relation to different development contexts, where characteristics and outcomes of social policies in different sectors (e.g., housing, care, education, social security) are compared.

The paper relates to the discussion on the causes and outcomes of welfare state management in different contexts. However, existing analytical models do not fit the mixtures of welfare provision with redistributive mechanisms at work in many countries.

Analytical models targeted to an overview of welfare and social policy in developing countries have so far been insufficient. There has been but few attempts at theorizing the diversity of welfare policies in formerly planned economies. Recent analyses, such as Wood & Gough (2006) are not easily applicable to transitional economies. In the case of Asia, there is a lack of a thorough account of transitional welfare policies in post-communist countries.

In addition, comparative studies have so far more or less ignored cross-comparisons on sectorial social policy. The mixed economy of welfare varies substantially between different welfare sectors within a specific country. Therefore, our paper focuses on welfare configurations using a sectorial approach.

Transnational hegemony, knowledge base and contestation

The phenomenon of so-called globalization is deemed to be a multiplicity of influences that should be more properly designated as neo-imperialism, or conceptually better still - it is to be dubbed as transnational hegemony. Salient dimensions or consequences of multi-lateral expressions of domination, that is, socio-cultural, political, socio-economic and military; for which computerized satellite information communication technology (SICT) is a key facilitator or catalyst, amount to moments of unequal exchange within and across dominant as well as subordinate societies. Arguably, both the realities and perceptions of multi-dimensional unequal exchange are, to a limited or greater extent, construed within the realm of knowledge repertoire (or base) in a given society. The knowledge base being understood not just as institutional or formal training, but it also entails ontologically accruable socio-political consciousness.

Consequently, moments of unequal exchange within the dynamics of transnational hegemony, more often than not, invoke crisis of legitimation or outright contestation. Therein lies the tripartite dialectical linkages of transnational hegemony with the knowledge base of a given society and contestation.

El análisis de datos cualitativos empleando software no privativo (Trama y Freemind) para el estudio de procesos organizacionales

Quizás de los componentes más discutibles del proceso de investigación cualitativa sea el análisis de los materiales. Si bien es cierto que se ha avanzado bastante en el uso de técnicas rigurosas al respecto, igualmente su naturaleza está en discusión y provoca polémica. Sin duda la Teoría Fundamentada (Glasser y Strauss, 1967) aporta criterios, pero su uso más corriente ha quedado atado al Atlas.ti (<http://www.atlasti.com/>) software privativo. Esta ponencia versa sobre el análisis de datos cualitativos en una investigación concreta explorando el empleo de versiones libres de software de análisis de datos cualitativos en particular el denominado Trama (<http://www.pressure.to/qda/>). Como primer paso se construye un sistema de categorías de análisis fundado en los conceptos teóricos que componen el objeto de estudio, para pasar luego a la observación en el texto de la presencia de atributos de cada una de ellas marcándolas y asignándoles expresiones o trozos de texto. Acto seguido se buscan las relaciones entre atributos de las categorías y entre las categorías, empleando para el composición otro software también libre llamado Freemind (http://freemind.sourceforge.net/wiki/index.php/Main_Page). El resultado facturado son diagramas que muestran las relaciones mencionadas y posible de generar un discurso interpretativo a partir de ellos.

Los materiales de análisis corresponden a un corpus compuesto por 20 entrevistas a participantes de los procesos de presupuestos participativos de Salto y Paysandú (Uruguay) donde se observan diferentes dimensiones a saber:

L'édition indépendante de critique sociale: Un exemple de résistance à la rationalisation économique dans le secteur culturel

Le domaine de la culture fournit de nombreux exemples de poches de résistance aux pressions économiques croissantes qui gagnent tous les secteurs. C'est notamment le cas de l'édition indépendante dans le domaine des sciences humaines et de la critique sociale, qui a connu un renouveau notable en France ces vingt dernières années. Ces nouveaux éditeurs « hétérodoxes » se caractérisent par la volonté de résister au mouvement de rationalisation et de globalisation croissante de l'édition au nom de la spécificité des livres. Affirmant leur autonomie face à la « marchandisation de la production éditoriale », ces petits et micro-éditeurs de dimension le plus souvent artisanale tentent de mettre en place des moyens alternatifs de développement et d'organisation, et d'échapper à « l'économicisation » du secteur. Ils s'inscrivent de ce fait dans une économie extrêmement précaire, mais à forte portée symbolique. Cette proposition se base sur une étude de cas d'une population de trente éditeurs indépendants apparus en France entre 1985 et 2005. Elle se base sur une analyse des discours de résistance développés par ces éditeurs, ainsi que sur l'étude des moyens alternatifs mis en œuvre dans leur pratique quotidienne.

Poverty, inequality and social exclusion and the impact of education in Brazil

Social inequality is an issue of great importance in Brazil since the Brazilian society is strongly marked by it. Research and official data have shown the relation between poverty and educational level as well as the inequality between the country poorest and richest regions. Thus, the so-called framework of social inequality in Brazil is made up of differences in education, income, regions and race, among others. Another issue which we focus on our studies and research refers to the subjective dimension of this reality of inequality expressed in the field of education. How do the subjects victims of inequality feel? How do these feelings interfere with or make up the educational process? Feelings, emotions, meanings are psychological aspects that build up during the process and characterize it. These questions are important because public policies in Brazil have been built without bearing in mind these aspects. The feelings of humiliation and social exclusion that accompany the processes of schooling, when evidenced, will surely design a new scenario. In this perspective, our thinking pleads for the urgency and importance of these studies in the field of Social Psychology. Based on official data supplied by surveys we characterized the expression at school of social inequality, i.e. what the main indicators in data of the effects of poverty, inequality and exclusion upon education in Brazil are. Secondly, we are presently conducting empirical research in order to reflect on the subjective reality of the students, trying to understand, through semi-structured interviews, the meanings and significations being constructed by young people who attended public schools, from their living inequality and social exclusion in their experiences from school to university. For this work, we will present and discuss some data related to the theoretical stage of this study, as well as preliminary data from the empirical research.

Organizing in the informal sector : A case study in Mumbai's ship-breaking yards

Since the 1980s, there is a qualitative leap and labour flexibility cannot be considered as a mere conjuncture. It is rather a hallmark of a new economic model marked by the rise of informal and precarious work in both "developed" and "developing countries". Given this structural transformation, "organized or die" should become a leitmotif of union action (Sherman and Voss, 2000). Other scholars have invited unions around the world to "organize the unorganized" (Kumar and Schenk, 2005) because "it is from this engagement that new forms of unionism will emerge" (Murray, 2004). India is no exception. The NCEUS have shown that the economic liberalization process of the 1990s have trigger a "jobs' centrifugation dynamic" that pushed employment towards peripheral labour markets. Indian scholars have here also stressed the importance for unions to refocus on the "organizing model" and invest these segments (Bhowmik, 2005; Ghose, 2010). It is in this spirit that the Mumbai Port Dock and General Employee Union (MPDGEU) have successfully launched an organizing campaign in the shipbreaking yards of Darukhana (Mumbai) in the early 2000s.

Building on empirical data collected through interviews with representatives of the MPDGEU, the International Metalworkers' Federation and workers, the paper will present the result of a case study conducted in 2011 using the analytical framework developed by Comeau (2005). It will first present elements of contextualization aiming specifically at the State's role in the development and regulation of the shipbreaking activities. It will then present the struggle's chronology and discuss practices, strategies and demands put forwards by the union. We will finally take a look at the issues raised in order to highlight the gap between discourses and practices and identify the difficulties facing traditionally organized labour when seeking to transform itself in order to meet the needs of the so-called "informal workers".

Migration, integration and quality of life in Germany

German Society has seen an enormous inflow of immigrants in recent decades, which has changed the social structure, but also economic and cultural life in Germany considerably. Currently one fifth of the population does have a migration background in one way or the other. Although issues of integration are thus of eminent importance, a thorough and evidence based debate addressing the problems, successes and failures concerning the integration of immigrants has emerged only recently.

Our paper aims to assess how well immigrants or people with some sort of migration background are currently integrated into the German society using selected social indicators for different life domains. The selection of indicators is based on two different notions and conceptualizations of integration. Based on the concept of structural integration, immigrants are supposed to be the better integrated, the less their living conditions and quality of life differ from the indigenous population. This notion of integration is supplemented by indicators addressing issues of cultural, social and identificative integration, which are used as measures of the identification with or distance towards the German society. The analysis systematically compares immigrants and their offspring with native Germans and differentiates within the immigrant population by countries of origin. The empirical analyses are based on data from the German Micro Census and the German Socio-economic Panel Study.

Transformation of the antinuclear drive in post-war Japan

This presentation attempts to identify the nature of today's antinuclear movement in Japan by placing it in comparison with its predecessor, anti-atomic bomb campaign in 1950s. In so doing it tries to identify the changing nature of the movement, as well as the sources of the change.

March 11, 2011, a great earthquake and the subsequent tsunami claimed the life of 20,000 people in Japan, the heaviest damage Japan has experienced in recent history. The worse came afterwards: nuclear plant explosions. The nuclear disaster triggered a series of demonstrations and civil activities protesting against the nuclear power plant policy in Japan and abroad. Today's anti-nuclear movement in Japan is not without its predecessor, however. In 1950s, Japan has experienced a huge protest action against the development of atomic and hydrogen bombs, culminating in a mega-scale signature collecting campaign led by the ordinary citizens.

These two campaigns, some sixty years apart, show a stark contrast in some important respects, ranging from organizational forms to mobilization strategies. One important source of the differences lies in the mental/cognitive aspect of participants and campaign organizers. While the cognized problem in the 1950s was the one pertaining to the war weapons, the conceived problem in today's movement is that of humankind and of the earth. Behind these differences may exist the changing form of the state; while Japan in the 1950s was still a developmental state, Japan in the present seems devoid of a developmental rigor, with mounting concerns over the environments and safety as well as human rights instead.

This paper employs a comparative design, in which two movement campaigns of a very similar category are illustrated to clarify the characteristics of each campaign, and asks why these differences have emerged over the course of the movement development.

Las celebraciones de nossa senhora do rosário en belo horizonte / Brasil

Este estudio sobre ocio destaca una fiesta considerada una práctica social, simbólica, por lo tanto, una práctica educativa. Su foco de análisis es Nossa Senhora do Rosario (el reinado de Nuestra Señora de Rosario) - también conocido como "Congado" (folk y danza religiosa), en Belo Horizonte / MG /Brasil - que es una demostración típica de las personas afro-brasileñas y es muy popular e importante en el Estado de Minas Gerais, no sólo en la capital y en otras ciudades del Estado. Su origen se basa en el relato mítico sobre la Santa y representa la concepción de sus devotos. Esto significa que los devotos de Nossa Senhora do Rosário (los hijos de Rosario) definen no sólo sus creencias y su modus vivendi a través de ese relato. Este estudio tiene como objetivo principal analizar las imágenes míticas de ese reinado, la investigación de las modulaciones se produjo en la concepción, el mito y la celebración en relación con sus procesos educativos. Para ello, el paradigma de la complejidad fue elegida como una base epistemológica y dentro de él, las teorías de la antropología imaginaria, la psicología profunda y la celebración. Estas referencias teóricas permiten analizar el arquetipo de la Grande-Mãe (Nuestra Señora Grande) y su influencia en la vida del "congadeiros". Entonces, los objetivos propuestos para este estudio fueron alcanzados. Se espera que los resultados contribuyan al conocimiento de las comunidades afro-descendientes, la ampliación de nuestra comprensión sobre la sociedad y la educación e incluso sobre nosotros mismos.

The debate on the new developmentalism in Brazil: A division within neoliberal ideas?

There is a very interesting debate in the field of economists in Brazil about new developmentalists ideas. And some sustain a real change. Was the crisis of 2008-2009 a critical juncture which would allow prevailing of a new kind of developmentalism? I disagree because the institutional design of the Brazilian state is still based on neoliberalism ideas. Since the 1964 Coup d'Etat, the decision-making process of macroeconomic policy was placed on a particular agency. The decision-making process of macroeconomic policy in Lula's government settles a significant change that had been made in the state apparatus during Cardoso's second term (1999-2002). For the first time, since 1964, it has two agencies - relatively independent of each other - that share the decisionmaking process of macroeconomic policy; on one hand, fiscal policy is conducted by the Ministry of Finance (MF); ii) and the other hand, monetary and exchange rate policies are under the responsibility of the Brazilian Central Bank (BCB). This is the main reason why I argue that Brazil is still attached to neoliberalism, obviously not to the fundamentalist neoliberalism (the extreme neoliberalism). As long the BCB is committed solely to price stability and having relative autonomy from the President, sustainable growth will always be threatened and interrupted by the fight against inflation with relative high interest rates and appreciated exchange rate (the "stability" convention). The success in combating the crisis of 2008-2009 was important to set the hegemony of moderate neoliberalism, but a new developmentalist project that aspires macroeconomic stability has not been able to make a economic and social alternative project to neoliberalism. Is Dilma administration following the same footsteps of Lula administration? Are the MF and BCB still relatively independent from each other? Which economic ideas are Dilma administration following? The paper will also try to present some hypothesis.

Local gender policies in Brazil

This paper is part of a research funded by the Brazilian National Research Council and Women's National Secretariat which has the purpose of providing a summary of local gender policies in Brazil. My source of data was the 2009 Profile of Brazilian Municipalities, conducted by the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics. This data was collected in each Brazilian municipality. Next, I will present the main findings of this analysis. In 4,522 (81.3%) out of the 5,564 Brazilian municipalities there weren't any gender policies being implemented. Only in 1,042 (18.7%) municipalities were there any kind of gender policies. Only 3.4% of them have developed a plan for women's policies and 6.8% have a budget to implement women's policies. Around 7% of the municipalities implemented policies that address violence against women. Among these initiatives were shelters and reference centers for violence-victimized women. Policies were also implemented in education, health, or work. Some programs are developed in cooperation with the government at the national or state level, NGOs, religious institutions and worker's organizations. Among these, NGOs and religious institutions stand out. Gender policies were significantly different across the population size categories of municipalities. The greater the municipality's population, the greater the likelihood of the existence of gender policies. Gender policies were different across the Brazilian states as well. For instance, in Roraima, a state in the Northern Region, there weren't any municipalities with policies addressing women. Socio-demographic characteristics of the mayors such as gender, schooling and group of age do not seem to influence the existence and the quality of gender policies. Approximately the same proportion of municipalities with female and male mayors implement gender policies. What influences the most is the political party.

The struggle against "stuttgart 21" old wine in new bottles or a novel form of civil protest?

Traditionally considered a rather conservative town, the southern German city of Stuttgart has presented itself in the more recent past as a trailblazer of citizen protest and mobilization. The city was over the past 18-24 months the site of one of the largest and most intense citizen protests in Germany's recent history as tens of thousands of citizens protested the construction of Stuttgart 21, a multi-billion urban and rail transport project in the city's core. The chances that the ongoing protests will stop the contested mega-project from being built are slim - the opposition recently suffered a decisive defeat at a referendum that was held in response to the protests - yet the political repercussions of the protests have been profound. Commentators contend that they are responsible for the historic victory of Germany's Green party in the 2011 elections in Baden-Württemberg, the state of which Stuttgart is the capital and the fundamental debate the project's opposition sparked about mega projects and the way they are implemented as well as citizen participation in public decision and policy making is unlikely to go away anytime soon. Moreover, the protests have been described as inaugurating a new era of citizen protest and holding important lessons for similar movements that are struggling against hegemonic projects. Drawing upon empirical research, this contribution describes and analyzes the opposition against Stuttgart 21 through the lens of urban social movement theory and sheds light on the continuities and discontinuities between the patterns and practices of resistance in Stuttgart and previous examples of citizen protest. While emphasizing the need not to overstate the "novelty" of recent events, special attention is given to the original combination of well-established and innovative "mobilizing frames" and "repertoires of contention" that combined have helped the movement to grow the way it did.

Mas mercado, menos estado? Neoliberal pressures and health sector reform in Argentina, Costa Rica and Peru

How do developing countries respond to, resist, contest and negotiate uniform neoliberal pressures to reform social services? This research examines how Peru, Costa Rica and Argentina were able to negotiate powerful neoliberal international financial institutions pressures towards increased privatization in and diminished state responsibility for health-care. International financial institutions, namely the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, have been central movers in diffusing neoliberal ideas via loan agreements and structural adjustment programs. Thus far, countries have responded differently to these pressures, and a comparative approach allows a focus on how states negotiate and what conditions allow countries to resist these pressures. Most studies about the role of the state in ensuring and regulating healthcare have been limited to advanced industrial democracies with established welfare states. Latin America is an ideal region in which to explore the dynamics of globalization, state building and welfare state development given its increased integration into the global economy, uneven democratic history, high levels of economic growth and inequality and the heavy presence of international financial institutions. I argue that homogenizing pressures for neoliberal health sector reforms were differentially resisted, contested and negotiated in Peru, Costa Rica and Argentina owing their distinctive political and economic histories and institutional arrangements. I use data from interviews with policy makers (ministry of health and social security personnel, international organization personnel, etc.) and analysis of policy documents (national health plans, international loan agreements, etc.) to examine the process of health sector reform in three countries: Peru, Costa Rica and Argentina.

Environmental pollution in Japan and today's problem of the compensation system for victims -Case study research of Minamata disease-

This presentation considers a future compensation system for victims by severe environmental pollution in Japan through a case study of Minamata Disease. Minamata Disease is the massive pollution problem that has struck Japan. This Disease was caused by wastewater from Chisso Corp., one of the large chemical industries at the time. Wastewater has been removed already. However the effects of this problem have not been solved yet. One issue is that, today, victims are facing aging. They need new compensation system that can relieve physical deterioration by the aging.

This research is mainly based on interviews with congenital Minamata Disease victims. They have severe symptoms by nature, because their mothers ate much fish and shellfishes during pregnancy. Many of them are around mid-50s. Their activities of daily lives have become worse rapidly than other victims. They have been received nursing care mainly from their parents until now, however parents are above 80 years old. So what sort of services they need? and who serve nursing care for them in the future? These are the main inquires.

Through the interview, it will be made clear that victims need not only compensation money but also social services in the damaged area. The existing system is financial compensation for each victim's damage. Today, it is not sufficient, so in addition to this system, it becomes more important for aging victims to be developed a system that leads their lives comfortably. The result of this research will submit a perspective that risk of damage by environmental pollution increase as victims grow older. They have many difficulties in their daily lives. Environmental pollution issues will not be solved with only compensation money. The important thing is that constructing a system that can support their daily life permanently in places they want to live.

Perception of singleness by highly educated and professional single women in Lagos, Nigeria

Increasing number of women in Nigeria are delaying marriage till age 30 when the likelihood of marriage is not only low but uncertain. Never married women age 30-34 for instance, increased from 5.2 percent in 1991 to 11.8 percent in 2006. In spite of the rising proportion of this category of single women, single womanhood continues to be seen as an aberration and a misfortune. This study examines the perception of singleness and womanhood by highly educated and professional always single women. Highly educated and professional women are trailblazers whose view on singleness is pertinent to the understanding of the current perception of singleness among women, and the likely future trend of single womanhood. Primary data were obtained from eighteen In-depth Interviews and two Focus Group Discussions with university-educated and professional single women age 30-48 in Lagos, Nigeria's prime city. Data analysis shows that all the subjects desire and value marriage, but would prefer permanent singlehood to a bad marriage. Three categories emerged on the subjects' concept of fulfilled womanhood. There are those who perceive fulfilled womanhood as equal to marriage and motherhood and are making effort to validate their womanhood through those means. The second group perceive fulfilled womanhood as not equal to marriage and motherhood, and are ready to remain permanently single, continue with their career, and adopt a child if necessary. The third group perceive fulfilled womanhood as not equal to marriage and motherhood, yet they do not view singleness as an alternative lifestyle. Validation of singleness as an alternative to marriage is vital in encouraging women to delay marriage and remain permanently single, two lifestyles that are fundamental in population control.

Trabajo musical y género: Identidad profesional y arreglos domésticos

El objetivo es analizar el trabajo en actividades musicales en Brasil, la identidad social de los trabajadores y los arreglos domésticos correlativos. El trabajo de músicos envuelve numerosas actividades y evidencia una ambigüedad entre reconocimiento subjetivo, responsabilidad por la formación de nuevos músicos y precarización en las condiciones laborales y formas de contratación. Considerase aquí la identidad profesional a partir de atributos institucionales y también por la incorporación subjetiva de esas características en la trayectoria biográfica.

La metodología empleó técnicas cuantitativas y cualitativas, recorriendo a bases de datos oficiales, surveys y encuestas en profundidad con músicos seleccionados a partir de los resultados del survey.

Los resultados evidenciaron dos procesos de socialización musical, ya presentes en la literatura: familiar y religiosa. La socialización escolar, principalmente en la formación musical, también es factor constitutivo del trabajo musical. Con todo, una análisis factorial corroborada por proposiciones presentes en las encuestas, indica que la red de sociabilidad, más que la red de contactos profesionales, influencia el reconocimiento subjetivo y la atribución institucional de la condición de músico, o sea, su identidad social. Esta comprende no solo competencia técnica y filiación a tendencias musicales, pero motivaciones simbólico-religiosas y estrategias de género.

Investigaciones realizadas sobre arreglos domésticos en diversos países indican un diferencial de género en relación al tiempo ocupado en quehaceres domésticos. La asimetría entre el tiempo ocupado por hombres y mujeres es aún más pronunciada en la familia ocupacional de los músicos. Además hay grande discrepancia entre hombres y mujeres en la influencia de los rendimientos o de la escolaridad más elevados para disminuir el tiempo en quehaceres domésticos. Las mujeres son mucho más susceptibles a esos factores. La situación se invierte, sin embargo, en trabajadores músicos en Brasil, aunque permanezca, de modo más acentuado, la tradicional sobrecarga de las mujeres en actividades domésticas.

Las percepciones de las personas jóvenes sobre la "justicia": Distribución de bienes escasos y resolución de conflictos en el espacio escolar

Este trabajo pretende indagar en los principios de justicia que las personas jóvenes "ponen en juego" en el momento de resolver situaciones conflictivas en el espacio escolar. De este modo, se busca comprender tanto qué decisiones los sujetos definen como justas y cuáles injustas así como la legitimidad de las resoluciones adoptadas. A partir del trabajo de campo desarrollado en escuelas secundarias de localidades de la Provincia de Buenos Aires, Argentina donde se aplicaron encuestas y se realizaron entrevistas en profundidad y observaciones del cotidiano escolar, la ponencia busca profundizar en el abordaje de las situaciones reales e hipotéticas en las cuales se toman decisiones que definen "qué dar a cada quién" y cómo resolver situaciones conflictivas.

En esta oportunidad se examinan dichas cuestiones a través del estudio de dos dimensiones. En un primer momento, se indaga en los principios de justicia distributiva utilizados por los actores educativos en relación a bienes escasos como son las becas escolares y las netbooks distribuidas en las escuelas por el Estado nacional. En una segunda instancia, se explora en las cuestiones que las personas jóvenes perciben como injustas en las interacciones escolares. En definitiva, buscamos interrogarnos por la forma que asume la socialización política juvenil en la escuela secundaria, particularmente por el modo en que experimentan las desigualdades sociales y escolares y sobre las ideas de democracia y justicia que plantean los estudiantes.

Going south, going local. Social and spatial inclusion of immigrants in the cities of south

Migrations to the global south are nearly half of the total amount of international migrations. If we take into account demographic trends and projections, together with the rapid economic growth in emerging countries and recession in western 'developed' nations, the number of people moving to the south is likely to increase in the next decades.

Since immigration impacts mainly on social, spatial and political structures in cities, the response to such a global issue is mainly local.

This phenomenon raises the issue of the "Right to the city", which has been recently incorporated into international organisation guidelines fostering the development of inclusive cities and the reduction of the 'urban divide' in global south cities. Furthermore civil society movements aim to provide a framework for greater inclusiveness, empowering urban dwellers to affect local governments, perhaps even offering the first step in the development of a transnational form of multicultural municipal citizenship.

International migrants move to cities where they lack national citizenship and are thus often alienated from means of democratic participation, particularly in global south cities. This disjuncture between the conventional forms and spaces of citizenship and being a citizen in daily life has led to a political devolution of citizenship claims-making from national to urban space. Many local governments in global south cities are improving the participatory system within decision-making, however they still do not always include migrant citizen rights in democratic participation. Social and spatial inclusiveness policies must address all city residents, bypassing conventional regimes of national citizenship. The once taken for granted correspondence between citizenship and nationality has been called into question as new forms of transnational and sub-national belonging are shaping up within the global city due to global migration. 'Inhabitation' has become a status allowing participation in policy-making.

Revolutionary agora: Space of protest in the Arab revolutions

Regardless the political results what is more evident is that the Arab revolts or revolutions are largely urban in character.

Protesters gathered around the main squares that represent the regimes, such as Bourguiba Avenue or Kasbah square in Tunis or Tahrir Square in Cairo, occupying and controlling public spaces with the aim to change political institutions. The occupation of these symbolic squares showed us powerful images of these capitals in which contestation and degradation of the icons of power took place, besides mass mobilization claiming for democratic rights and the end of oppression.

Cities are the main arenas for the shaping of identities, citizenship, rights and conflict, and cities yet are the center of the protest. The surrounding country areas seem far less involved, even if definitely very poor and subjected to unfair economic and social policies.

These struggles are urban even in their reasons as well as they spread as a consequence of a lack of basic city functions such as housing and public services.

If revolutions started, organized and empowered through the virtual agora of social media, spreading from facebook and twitter into society at large yet the real space of resistance is still the physical square. The revolution in Cairo has provided powerful evidence that the virtual is not enough: the occupation of physical urban space has been crucial to the success and continuity of the revolution. Although the ways of relating and communicating within the occupied public space are deeply influenced by social media, resistance took place by reshaping the meaning and the use of public space. Tahrir square became a real agora, a hub for social activity and despite the prohibition of public assembly. Thus the occupation of the main square is a symbolic action that involves the re-appropriation of democratic space.

Recognizing dispossession: Mobilization among Nicaraguan migrant domestic workers in Costa Rica

This paper will address the presence of Nicaraguan women migrant domestic workers in Costa Rica at the forefront of a transnational social movement making broad demands for social welfare, immigration and labor policy reform. I argue that the Costa Rican household-worksite is a space of heightened discrimination towards Nicaraguan migrants, producing organizing efforts.

Costa Rica is imagined as uniquely modern, democratic, white, prosperous and egalitarian within Latin America; the belief that Nicaraguan encroachment threatens the 'exceptionalism' of Costa Rica and its Central Valley is hegemonic. Yet, neoliberal restructuring in the 1980's brought Nicaraguan migrants into Central Valley businesses and homes by creating demand for inexpensive labor to compensate for declining income. Although ethnic and class segregation of Nicaraguan neighborhoods and employment increases their visibility, social distance is maintained. Lack of interaction allows the proliferation of discourses that Nicaraguans threaten the "cultural regime" of exceptionalism and are responsible for Costa Rica's declining prosperity.

I argue that the household is unique among sites of employment in that distinction between Costa Ricans and Nicaraguans is overtly and directly asserted. Ethnographies of South-South migrant domestic workers shows that employers actively and self-consciously construct markers of "distinction" that maintain social barriers between employer and employee within the "transcultural contact zone" of the household workplace. I propose that by entering the Central Valley, Costa Rican neighborhoods and homes, domestic workers have engaged in multiple "transborder" crossings. The decreased distance subjects them to more acute discrimination. Establishing markers of distinction within the household, employers, whether unconsciously or consciously, respond to the perceived threat of Nicaraguan encroachment. Addressing domestic workers, employers personalize discourse of Nicaraguans as the antithesis of exceptionalism. In this paper, I argue that organizations of Nicaraguan women migrants draw on lived transborder labor experience to link discrimination to structural violence and demand broad policy reform.

El uso de la fotografía en el proceso de (re) articulación étnica en comunidades rurales Argentina

El trabajo ofrece una reflexión metodológica y teórica sobre una experiencia de trabajo de campo en una comunidad indígena Argentina a partir de la introducción del uso de la fotografía como instrumento de recolección de información primaria para la investigación. El trabajo abordará dos dimensiones. Por un lado, se presentarán reflexiones metodológicas sobre la práctica de aplicación de esta técnica en la comunidad bajo estudio, realizando un análisis de la intervención en la comunidad, los procesos que dispara un dispositivo tecnológico como la cámara y las dinámicas de apropiación de esta actividad por parte de los participantes. La apropiación de este trabajo permitió a la comunidad repensar su papel en la construcción de su propia historia, en contraposición a los marcos clásicos de imposición de formatos étnicos. Estos elementos permitirán analizar a su vez cambios y continuidades en la relación entre el investigador y el sujeto investigado.

En segundo lugar, se presentarán resultados de la producción de imágenes por parte de la población local en relación sobre su vida cotidiana, lo que ha permitido trabajar la percepción de los pobladores sobre el papel de los recursos naturales en las estrategias de vida y sociabilidad comunitaria. En un contexto de disputa territorial y de reconocimiento de su identidad étnica, el proceso de construcción de las categorías de comunidad y territorio juegan un papel central, y dentro de ello el uso y apropiación del espacio. Las fotografías facilitan indagar en algunas dimensiones de las subjetividades en juego en la construcción colectiva identitaria la que busca lograr una distinción que legitime su alteridad como grupo étnico. Un elemento de esta distinción es presentado como una particular relación entre lo social y lo ambiental en la cual se conjugan funciones materiales y simbólicas de los recursos naturales y del territorio.

Los derechos territoriales indígenas en conflicto. Un análisis de la situación en la Argentina y en la provincia de Salta

El trabajo se enmarca en la problemática del reconocimiento de los derechos territoriales de los pueblos originarios, derechos reafirmados a partir del cambio de la Constitución Argentina en 1994. Los avances en la efectivización de la transferencia de tierras a las comunidades indígenas en estos últimos 20 años, han sido discontinuos, lentos y contradictorios. En este sentido, la pregunta central a la que se busca contribuir es de qué forma la ralentización de este proceso está relacionada con los intereses en juego por el control y uso de los recursos naturales, intereses protagonizados por grupos privados y estatales.

El trabajo presentará una caracterización y análisis de las fases potenciales por las que atraviesa el conflicto (legal, económico y ambiental) que retrasan o frenan los procesos de titulación a favor de las comunidades. Este análisis a nivel nacional se basará en la información secundaria existente y en información primaria generada a través de entrevistas en profundidad, delineando el escenario actual macro-político de la problemática de tierras indígenas en la Argentina.

En función de profundizar el análisis de los conflictos, se presentarán resultados de un estudio de caso de una comunidad en litigio por sus tierras en la Provincia de Salta. Allí se analizarán los agentes públicos y privados intervinientes, los discursos en relación con las demandas de tierras y se dimensionará el peso relativo de la variable económica en el conflicto. En un contexto de avance de la frontera agrícola, se evidencian diferentes lógicas de uso y control de las tierras, presentándose la lógica indígena como un modo resistencial a las hegemónicas presentes a nivel provincial y local.

Finalmente se aportarán reflexiones vinculando los dos niveles de análisis -nacional y provincial- que tenderán a clarificar el escenario de disputa de los pueblos originarios por el reconocimiento de sus derechos territoriales.

Age discrimination among older workers: The Australian experience

In 2004 the Australian government introduced The Age Discrimination Act; however age discrimination in the workplace remains a problem in Australia. In 2010 complaints to the Fair Work Ombudsmen increased dramatically. The Australian government is encouraging mature age workers to remain in the workforce and has introduced policies to support this, including superannuation tax incentives and extending pension age eligibility to 67 years. However, even if older workers are willing to work longer, their opportunities may be limited if employers are unwilling to hire or retain them. Data drawn from the Ageing Baby Boomers in Australia (ABBA) project's 2009 national survey (N=1009) of older workers aged 50-64 years found that 32% of workers experienced age discrimination. Results indicate that 17% of older workers reported age discrimination in the workplace and 25% reported discrimination when applying for a job. Logistic Regression analysis of older workers found that those who reported being treated less favourably both in the workplace and when applying for a job were more likely to be single females, those employed in private sector jobs, those who reported high job stress, felt dissatisfied with their current job, and/or thought that their job may be eliminated in the next year. This research highlights that although policies (mainly fiscal) have been implemented to encourage older workers to remain longer in work they do not address other barriers such as employer attitudes to employing and retaining older workers.

Diversity and ageing – The meaning of new intimate relationships in later life

Social gerontology and family sociology about intimacy in old age has almost exclusively focused on institutionalized life-long marriages and little research has focused on re-partnering and the forms and meaning of this diversity of new intimate relationships in later life. Framed by Giddens' transformation of intimacy and Laslett's theory of the third age, as well as changing social and demographical conditions, this paper will focus on how different forms of new intimate relationships are formative for the experience of ageing. The strategical sampel was diversified according to different forms of new intimate relationships: dating singles, married, cohabiting and living apart together. Qualitative interviews was used with 28 Swedes, 63–91 years, who have established a new intimate heterosexual relationship after 60 or who are dating singles. The results showed the significance of new intimate relations for social integration and for the experience of old age as the "crown of life". The meaning of new intimate relations in different intimacy forms are discussed in relation to everyday life in old age, the relational history and relational careers and future perspectives of informal support structures by the relation.

Promoting "social diversity", urban segregation and Inequalities: The case of Sciences Po in Paris

The strong historical process of social reproduction in many selective universities in France ("grandes écoles") is becoming a crucial issue and more and more reconsidered. In the last decade, many of these universities have implemented specific programs in order to "diversify" socially the student population.

The classic way of analysing the impact of these programs is measuring how the profile of students is changing, but with no attention to the area and the high school from which they are coming. However, because of urban segregation and political construction of priority-depressed areas, and also because of the high concentration of the most selective high schools in Paris Downtown and in few wealthy suburbs, the territorial approach reveals different patterns.

Studying the specific case of Sciences Po within the large Paris Metropolitan area, I will try to answer to several questions: Are Sciences Po working class students equally distributed in the urban space? Are they coming from a limited number of high schools, those concerned by Sciences Po agreement? What about the chances of pupils with lower middle class background to have access to a selective university? Are these programs changing urban, school and social hierarchy? To what extent residence, school and social background are intertwined and are affecting school opportunities in a big city like Paris?

This paper is a contribution to the debate on urban and school segregation, analysing how affirmative action programs deal with both urban and social inequalities. Some comparative elements with Chicago selective high schools system will be used to stress the opacity of the selection and the affirmative action in the French Educational system, and how each system deals with urban and ethnic segregation.

Identity on the border

The topic of the research focuses on how to live or not in a political-administrative border affects the identities of people, even though their lives are often divided between the spaces they live; depending on the needs they have and the opportunities offered to satisfy them.

For that reason, the intention of the research is to observe how the people live and how they identify each other in the border; with special emphasis on the way people build and maintain their identities, bearing in mind that this is closely connected to the places where they live. Likewise with the story, the imaginary and the different perceptions they have.

From above we think about the role played by the border in the daily life of villagers and we observe that this transcends administrative building into a new symbolic form.

In this specific case we will take a concerned village called San Ignacio, which is part of Guarne since 1999, as previously belonged to a corregimiento of the city of Medellín (Santa Elena). Both places located in the department of Antioquia, Colombia.

There is a close relationship between the vereda and Santa Elena since they share a rich tradition in the region, which consists on the construction of silletas. They also share the history as well as economic and social activities. This situation places San Ignacio not only in a geographical border, but also on a cultural and identity one.

Equity effects of private health insurance subsidies: Brazil in international comparison

In healthcare policy, tax subsidies may provoke public underfunding and privatization, encouraging households and employers to buy private health insurance. They may be justified under a plausible criterion recognized among health economists and health policy analysts. These subsidies function as tax relief for taxpayers who believe that there is a reduction in public health spending. They may, however, negatively affect equity principles. Regarding poverty and inequality, in Brazil this question is a national political issue since the elderly and chronically ill will be forced to surrender to public services due to high costs within the private schemes. Moreover, subsidies on healthcare with no limits determine that employers and employees (private agents), not the government, define the federal spending on health care, which raises concerns about the control of fiscal policy.

Between silent resistance and power of action: "I am... not I come from"

The intervention deals with the question of the change and continuity of stigmatization, as a form of "doing othering", in the process of migration of North African women. According to specific configuration and social context, the "doing othering" assumes different expressions: from discredit to marginalization to exclusion until racism. I am taking a biographical approach, analyzing and crossing life stories collected. The "biographical work" [Inwlocki & Lutz, 2000] allows me to analyze this phenomenon in its genesis, to reconstruct the process of development and transformation, as well as the logic of action of the actors.

Based on two case studies one from France and one from Italy, it will be demonstrated how the stigmatization towards a Moroccan migrant women - as well as the self perception - developed, how it changed, and how under some circumstances it exhibits a certain continuity. In doing so, the interplay between the past and the present as well as the intra-biographical and societal developments are considered. These cases present different typologies of "stigma", as "physical deformities", "blemishes of individual character" and the central one for this issue, "tribal stigma" [Goffmann, 1963]. These emerge in interaction, for this reason also the husband's, friends' and peer's voices are considered, in order not to take the categories of gender and the "rapports de racisation" [Pfefferkorn, 2010] isolated, but rather to articulate them in a intersectional complex perspective that considers age, gender, social class, "race" and ethnical relations.

I come to the conclusion that "the resources of biographical experience" [Delcroix, 2004] could strength the resistance and the "power of action" [Le Quentrec, 2009] of migrant women in reaching a full emancipation (realized here thanks to the family life - intermarriage - and to the work) to find their place between "being who they are" and "coming from".

Giving a three dimensional form to biography

The intervention deals with a broader approach to research using qualitative methods. The argumentation is based on examples from the experience of PhD field research on challenges in intermarriages with a partner coming from an Arab country. The PhD project was conceived of using a pure biographical approach: collecting life stories of family members. However, I realized just a few months after the very beginning of my field that I was doing ethnography too. So I have tried to sharpen my methodology using "reflexive ethnography" [Burawoy, 2003 & 1998] (taking the context and the situation as a starting point) and "multi-site ethnography" [Marcus, 1995] (participating in different spaces and domains of the social life).

To well understand the phenomena that we could generally define as a "total social fact", a more articulate method is profitable. Moreover, the "biographical work" [Inwlocki & Lutz, 2000] calls for competences in different disciplines. In addition to interdisciplinarity, this work demands that the researcher moves from "micro-sociological" level to "meso" and "macro" ones, passing through interactions and transitions. To achieve a complete comprehension of the interviewees' stories and to deepen the issue of research, it is necessary to better describe and to experience interviewees' life in time, space and movement. For this, the interviewer as a researcher, cannot be satisfied with the récit, he/she has to widen the observation, to "be part of the stories collected" and to participate in his/her field at different levels.

I come to the conclusion that ethnography, in particular the Burawoy and Marcus outlines, seem to be essential to give a three dimensional form to the biographical work. There is a strong alliance between these methods that empower the outcomes of biography analysis. Probably, the weakness is in term of time and engagement, considering the commitment in social research.

How "innovative" work practices are abandoned: A case of job involvement activities in Japan and France

A growing literature has been paying attention to the impact of "innovative" work practices on productivity and work conditions. "Innovative" work practices are often regarded as opposite concepts to "modern" principles of work organization, and the former are considered to replace or compete with the latter, whether the impact is opportunistic or pessimistic. Some of the critics have been describing "modern" work practices, such as Taylorism and Fordism, as origins of alienation from work and narrowing down humans' ability to work. "Innovative" work practices such as "Toyotism" and total quality management, the dissemination of which is stimulated by Japanese industrial competitiveness in the 1980s, was considered as a possible alternative to balance the productivity and quality of working life; on the other hand, some of the scholars criticized "innovative" practices for oppressing workers both physically and mentally. However, this line of literature tends to ignore the actual context of introduction and abandonment of the practices. This presentation aims to describe the rise and fall of an "innovative" practice, called "quality circles". The quality circle is a job involvement activity originated in Japan, and was in vogue in the 1980s. Quality circles are tried to be transplanted outside of Japan, including non-Japanese enterprises. The presentation compares two societies, Japan and France. France is one of the societies that paid attention to quality circles in the 1980s. The enterprises that implemented quality circles decreased in both societies in the 1990s. Few of the French companies continue the activities, while some of the Japanese companies are still implementing them. The presentation describes the different process and examines the context that led to this difference.

The mental health status of Indonesian candidates leaving for Japan after the great east Japan earthquake

The goal of this study was to find predictors of the mental health status of the 4th batch of Indonesian candidates coming to Japan under the Japan-Indonesia Economic Partnership Agreement, four months after the Great East Japan Earthquake.

A four-page-long questionnaire was developed and distributed to the 4th batch of Indonesian candidates, who wished to go to Japan under the above agreement, at the venue of intensive Japanese language course held in Depok, West Java, Indonesia, in July 2011.

Seventy-three percent of the respondents were females. The average age was 24.7 (SD2.8) years old. Forty-nine percent of the respondents answered that they were very worried about the aftermath of the Great East Japan Earthquake. The mean score of the Knowledge about Japan, including knowledge about the working and living environments in Japan was 53.3 and ranged from 20 to 80, (SD 7.3) points. The average score of the General Health Questionnaire, which was used as a marker of the mental health status in this study, was 36.1 (SD4.2) points.

The result of a multivariate analysis showed that the Score of Knowledge about Japan was significantly correlated to the GHQ score ($\beta = .234, p < 0.05$), but the degree of worry about the earthquake did not. The result indicated that knowledge about the actual living and working condition in Japan is a major indicator of the mental health of the candidates, but not their worry concerning the earthquake.

Old and new media in local societies in times of catastrophe: The role of local papers during the great East Japan earthquake

On March 11, 2011, Japan suffered great damage from a M9.0 earthquake. In the early hours of the disaster, the Japanese national and global media broadcasted live what was happening on the east coast of Japan. The images of the tsunami, frightened crowds, and devastated landscapes spread across world in real-time. Meanwhile, in the seriously afflicted areas, the people in freezing cold temperatures suffered not only from food and water shortages, but, just as importantly, from a lack of reliable information directly concerning their own communities. As one of the survivors said, "we desperately needed news and information about 'our place' rather than news about other areas or about crowded train stations in Tokyo." Their needs were met by the journalists of local newspapers, who stood by their side trying their best to provide local people with urgent and practical information. For example, in Ishinomaki, in the absence of electricity, a long-established newspaper was copied out in handwriting and distributed on the day following the disaster. In a subsequent documentary on the newspaper's heroic efforts, one of the editors of that paper said that on that particular day, he reported, not as a journalist, but as a 'localist'. Their local knowledge and the relationship of mutual trust with the local people made this possible. The purpose of this presentation is 1) to examine how local and non-local information diffused or was mediated by the affected local societies and 2) to point out the effectiveness of paper media and local journalists. These focal points lead us to rethink the social significance of local papers and the importance of focusing on the feeling of 'our place' (locality) in media studies. I will also discuss the collaborative relationships of the paper media and the new media such as SMS and twitter.

"We are all Khaled Said": Visual injustice symbols and activism

Photographs and images have received relatively limited systematic attention within the mainstream of social movement studies. This is quite surprising given that photographs and images have historically played key roles in mobilization (e.g. Alexander, 2006, 2011; Biggs 2005; DeLuca 1999; Goldberg, 1991; Halfmann and Young, 2010; Sontag, 1977). Within social movement studies framing theory offers perhaps the most receptive approach for visual analysis. In the paper I seek to develop framing theory to encompass a visual dimension. The pivot of this exercise is the concept of visual injustice symbols. Visual injustice symbols are central to framing because they help galvanize and diffuse existing frames by providing them with an emotionally charged and universalizing visual "carrier". My understanding of this process is dialectical: injustice symbols are simultaneously outcomes of and resources for political activism. In other words, activists and injustice symbols "produce" each other in an ongoing interactional dynamic.

I apply the theoretical framework to the case of Khaled Said, a 28-year old Egyptian man beaten to death by Egyptian police in June 2010. The horrifying cell phone photographs taken by Said's family at the morgue became a key injustice symbol for the protests that toppled the Mubarak regime in early 2011. The photographs primarily reached a larger public in and outside Egypt through the Facebook page "We are all Khaled Said". The analysis is divided into three parts: the first accounts for the agency involved in transforming Said into a visual injustice symbol; the second discusses how this involved a universalization of the Said murder ("We are all Khaled Said"); the third outlines the interaction between the national and global level in the formation of the Khaled Said injustice symbol.

Dispositivos, sentidos y mecanismos causales de la acción colectiva contestatária

Lo que pasa cuándo los movimientos sociales tienen sus demandas alcanzadas? El fin del movimiento? La gente deja de movilizarse? La gente movilizada conecta sus objetivos más específicos a grandes cambios sociales para reproducir su organización, institucionalizando el movimiento? Estas son algunas de las preguntas que motivan la realización de este trabajo de investigación. Nuestra hipótesis es la de que la realización de un objetivo alcanzado por la acción colectiva trae consigo la propensión al fin de la movilización. Para encontrar una respuesta que confirme o refute esta hipótesis, se hace un trabajo de investigación sobre el Movimento de Atingidos por Barragens (MAB) en el sur de Brasil. Este movimiento es compuesto por campesinos en fines de la década de 1970 tornándose en mediado de los 90 uno de los más grandes movimientos sociales brasileños. Su movilización consiste en la resistencia a la construcción de grandes y medianas represas hidroeléctricas que resultan en la inundación de sus tierras o en la remoción de los campesinos a otras regiones. A través de un estudio de la historia del movimiento, sus repertorios de movilización a lo largo del tiempo y de la reconstitución de las trayectorias de algunos de sus militantes, se busca los mecanismos causales que explican el sostenimiento y las motivaciones de la acción colectiva movilizatoria a lo largo del tiempo. A través de la comparación entre las trayectorias de militantes que lograron un buen asentamiento y otros que siguen movilizándose, buscamos comprender sus motivaciones a través del diálogo con corrientes teóricas como la de construcción de identidades militantes, de la psicología social, de las disposiciones y retribuciones del alistamiento militante, de la reproducción de las organizaciones sociales y, sobretudo, de la atribución de sentidos en la construcción de carreras militantes.

Who is the new middle class in Brazil?

In Brazil, it has been noticed the emergence of a new middle class as one of the most significant social phenomena of the recent years. Surveys estimate that in the last decade about 40 million people moved forward and now have a household income between R$1.200 and R$ 5.174, which is considered Class C in Brazil and it has been called the new middle class. In this sense, it has proliferated discourses about this new middle class, which has been associated with this increase in income and new consumption possibilities. Media and government refer insistently to this new middle class to demonstrate social mobility in the country and how the assumed development pattern has reached good results. However, aspects related to quality of life, such as access to education, housing, transportation, health care and basic services (electricity, water and sanitation) has not been incorporated into the debate on social mobility. Therefore, the perspective of new middle class that has been released does not include social precariousness in which people with this particular income live. In this sense, my research is the discourse analysis of TV and printed media reports about how are being elaborated discourses on the new middle class. In my work, I discuss how the new middle class has been related to the notion of social mobility through an increase in income, it means, through which categories it's being established the relationship between income, consumption and social mobility. Another aspect is the relationship between the new middle class and the traditional middle class. In spite of it refers to the traditional one, the new middle class has constantly been differentiated to the former middle class in the media reports, in a way that one of the recurring questions is who is' and 'what think this new middle class'.

Culture and market: The virtual capitalism (A case study of the site catharsis)

This paper discusses new forms of social interaction made by economic actors in the virtual environment. Which is the spirit assumed by virtual capitalism? The informationalism is presented within this work, as the basis of the expansion into the new configuration of virtual capitalism. I defend that in it, earlier phases of capitalism and its various historical formats coupled with new features assumed in the field of information technology coexist.

The Internet, by its network dimension, has always relied on collaborative practices for its creation, improvement and dissemination. But the current virtuous cycle experienced by this practice has taken on ever greater dimensions. It works as if there were an "army" of people working to update the cyberspace extensions, either by inserting new content, working with the improvement of its size and programs or acquiring and producing goods and services. Models of "collaborative sites" are increasingly most common; Internet users do not visit the pages only as observers, now, they also participate of the creation process.

I raise the following questions: how consumers, entrepreneurs and suppliers behave within this new sociality of cyberspace? And what are the consequences of their behavior? More precisely, this research investigates the appropriation of the cultural signs by the part of social actors and their relative changes in virtual goods and services (commodities), thus, its inherent process of commodification.

For a better understanding and location of the phenomenon, the CATHARSIS Portal, created in 2010 in São Paulo, Brazil, with the aim of facilitating the establishment, funding and publicity of cultural projects, was defined as a space of observation. This website condenses the explicit variables throughout this study, primarily with regard to the virtual realm of cultural entrepreneurship. It works with a concept developed in the U.S. called "crowdfunding" which means "collaborative funding."

Interpretations and values in conflict within a policy of human rights protection against the threat of death

I intend to share some of my experiences within the Secretariat of Human Rights (SDH/PR), where I worked throughout the year of 2011. What I have to say has to do with PPCAAM, a protection program for children and adolescents threatened with death.

It is well known that most of the people under the threat of death find themselves in this situation due to involvement with drug traffic. We can say that PPCAAM is based on a humane philosophy of government, not only because it has as one of its objectives the protection of life, but also because it actively promotes the Statute of the Child and Adolescent (ECA).

However, observing the program through my ethnography, I realized that frequently there was a divergence, mainly between those workers that above all wanted to protect life and those that wanted to see the rights of children and adolescents respected.

For instance, there are norms and rules that demand that the child or adolescent must volunteer for the program, but that does not always happen. In moments such as these we can identify the values each party uses to defend its point-of-view. The "ECA defenders" accuse the "life defenders" of being authoritarian, overly concerned with "public security" and of imposing symbolic violence on the children, adolescents and their families. For their part, "life defenders", accuse their opponents of being bureaucratic and insensitive.

Usos de las tecnologías digitales y construcción de identidades colectivas por grupos de jóvenes de São Paulo

Este trabajo es parte de la investigación en desarrollo desde 2008 y cubre los usos de las redes sociales digitales por parte de grupos, colectivos y movimientos juveniles de la ciudad de São Paulo. Se parte del supuesto de que los modos de uso de las tecnologías digitales pueden ser vistos como formas de resistencia y lucha y herramientas de visibilidad.

El objetivo principal de esta investigación en curso es el de investigar los usos de la cultura digital de los jóvenes, con especial atención a las formaciones colectivas, y como la cultura articula con la política, la ética y la estética. En este trabajo específicamente se busca tratar el proceso de construcción de las identidades colectivas a partir de la inserción de los grupos de jóvenes en las redes sociales digitales: ¿cuáles son las identidades y afiliaciones en la construcción de estos grupos y colectivos?

La metodología consistió en la cartografía, clasificación, análisis y seguimiento de los blogs y perfiles colectivos de estos grupos de jóvenes en las redes sociales digitales y el uso de la etnografía de los entornos sociales de algunos de estos grupos juveniles.

Los resultados obtenidos apuntan la emergencia de sujetos colectivos expresos en esos espacios digitales: encontramos decenas de grupos dedicados a la construcción de una "identidad periférica", que afirman que pertenecen a la periferia y utilizan la producción cultural de estas regiones como un medio de transformación de sus realidades sociales y políticas; tenemos también otras decenas de grupos de jóvenes que se vinculan a los movimientos transnacionales que proponen la construcción y difusión de prácticas alternativas de consumo y la movilidad urbana, además de los usos innovadores de las tecnologías digitales y las proposiciones vinculadas a los temas ecológicos (urbanos o no) y la utilización y la revitalización de los espacios públicos.

La tríada de la política urbana de conciliación de clases en Brasil

La segunda gestión de Gobierno de Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva (2007-2010): Partido de los Trabajadores (PT), se caracterizó por la aplicación de una política urbana de reconciliación de las clases sociales, basado en el lema "Brasil: un país de todos", al generar un nuevo padrón de la urbanización y la propiedad de las poblaciones en las ciudades brasileñas y para cambiar los valores predeterminados de la urbanización periférica para un tipo de urbanización fractal estándar segregación sócioespacial, basada en enclaves fortificados y muros que separan el hábitat de la ciudad.

El primer programa para impulsar la economía y el sector de la construcción civil fue el programa de aceleración del crecimiento (PAC), para intervenir en la construcción de infraestructura urbana. Siguiendo el programa mi casa mi vida (PMCMV), cuyo objetivo era construir 1 millones de viviendas en dos años, con subsidios a los constructores en la construcción de edificios y casas para vivienda de interés social y medio. El tercer programa se centra en Mega eventos deportivos: Copa Mundial de fútbol de 2014 y los Juegos Olímpicos de 2016, cuyos incentivos van desde la construcción de estadios de fútbol, gimnasios, incluso las operaciones urbanas, instalación de pacificación de las unidades de policía (UPP), etc.

Tales intervenciones urbanas revelan una especie de consenso político entre capital, trabajo y estado, en el sentido de que generan empleo a trabajadores, empresarios, sector beneficios de impuestos al Estado y cumple con sus consumidores. Conflictos derivados de estas acciones se tratarán en este trabajo de planificación con el objetivo de demostrar los puntos ciegos entre el discurso político, las prácticas económicas y la realidad social de sus impactos. Nuestra hipótesis es que están experimentando un proceso de implosión-explósión de ciudades brasileñas a través de este tipo de urbanización.

Democracy and the child participation

The discussion in this article aims to systematize essential elements around what exactly turns out to be the child participation in the decision-making processes from the perspective of democracy. With qualitative and documental aspects, this research systematizes the child's participation, emphasizing the contributions of Sociology of Childhood and History of Childhood, and analyzes the children participation in the decision-making processes based on studies that point out the child as a capable individual. Frequently the children's idoneity and maturity to reason, stand up for themselves, talk about themselves and tell their story, as well as their capacity of decision and action, are questioned. Modern societies face the paradox of, at the same time as they show a great concern about childhood, depriving the children of their rights, instead of giving continuity to the acknowledgment of the children as capable of being subject of their own history, as we have seen in researches and experiments. To promote the participation means to experience a complex system of interactions that is settled around the initiative, the shared responsibilities, and mainly around the commitment that groups of people, children and adults, can assume while conducting the decision-making process of the realization of the actions of a determinate project. The unequal distribution of power between adults and children is defined by social and ideological reasons, with consequences in the control and domination of groups. The conclusion indicates the need to expand democracy, starting with a broader discussion about the rights of participation that children and teenagers have, from the perspective of a more humane and inclusive education. This implies a consideration with the child and the teenager as social and political individuals that are entitled to have an opinion and to access information.

The problem brought by the use of genetic database in criminal investigations and the protection of human rights

The problem brought by the use of genetic database in criminal investigations and the protection of Human Rights.

Starting from the observation that the use of biotechnology, in particular of the new possibilities of use of genetics, raise a discussion about their ethical-legal implications in human life and their social impacts to rhapsodize about the consequences of the use of DNA by the criminal justice system, through the implementation, by the Brazilian State of databases of genetic profiles-criminal convicted.

These banks, if placed in operation, make direct comparisons of DNA profiles from samples collected in places where a crime has occurred, with suspicious profiles registered in these banks. This is possible because the DNA is a unique biological structure in each individual, with the exception of the monozygotic twins, which allows the identification of the person and serves as the foundation of criminal investigation and forensic genetics.

However, this application is not impassive fault, which requires the adoption of a critical positioning that demonstrate the potential risks that could arise from the creation of databases of genetic profiles-criminal convicted.

Furthermore, from a transdisciplinary approach, seeking to respond to what extent the creation of a genetic database for criminal purposes will not configure the Suppression of Human Rights and guarantees set out in our legal system.

In the end, it will demonstrate that advances from genetics bring with them the need to create new forms of protection of human beings, their dignity and integrity, and defence of the collectivity.

From the "physiotherapist practice" to physiotherapy as a profession: The Brazilian case

Physiotherapy is a profession recognized in Brazil since 1969 and set in its origins an interesting case study - the transformation of an occupation into a profession. According to a socio-historical approach, associated with the concepts of expertise and credentialism (Freidson, 1996, 2009) and interactional expertise (Collins and Evans, 2006), it is possible to investigate in what extent the occupation of physiotherapist was accredited by the State to become a work activity, since 1938. The rough data will come from Registration Books of the Professional Practice Supervision (1930-1940) that contains information such as: name, date and place of birth, parentage, occupation and current legislation. The data shows the existence of a group of workers, which characterize a pre-institutionalization of a future profession. During this period, the "physiotherapist practice" (hydrotherapy, therapeutic exercise, electrotherapy, thermotherapy, phototherapy and massage) was widely used. The physiotherapists that were associated with medicine and nursing profession, develop a certain expertise prior to the formal structure of education that would occur only from 1951. In this sense, the interaction between physiotherapists, doctors and nurses was the main way of exchange for the acquisition of tacit physiotherapist knowledge's. The "physiotherapist practices" were shaped in a kind of interactional expertise, being an existing practice before starting the process of professionalization of this occupation.

E-migración: Sociedad de la información, inmigración y políticas públicas de integración

Se presentan los resultados de la tesis doctoral del autor sobre el modo en que las Tecnologías de la Información y la Comunicación (TICs) estarían participando en el proceso de "integración social" de la población migrada en el país de destino, a partir del concepto propuesto de e-migrantes, y distinguiendo entre dos colectivos de inmigrantes: franceses (comunitarios) y ecuatorianos (no comunitarios) en la Comunidad Autónoma de Cataluña (España).

A partir del concepto de e-migrantes, se observa la importancia de analizar los principales procesos técnicos (TICs) y políticos (políticas de integración) dentro de la Sociedad de la Información, en el campo de las ciencias sociales y humanas y en la línea de la investigación crítica de la Sociedad de la Información y de la Antropología de las Políticas Públicas.

La metodología utilizada combinó la investigación social cuantitativa y cualitativa con métodos de la Antropología de las Políticas Públicas. Esta metodología consistió en la elaboración de una encuesta estructurada, de grupos de discusión y entrevistas en profundidad a gestores, funcionarios y expertos en inmigración; y en una revisión de la literatura relevante, se analizaron fuentes secundarias y se estudiaron las políticas públicas de inmigración. El análisis se centra: (a) los usos, prácticas sociales y apropiación de las TICs por parte de la población migrada y, (b) la presencia de las TICs como instrumento que ayude a la integración de los migrantes en una cultura pública común en la Comunidad Autónoma de Cataluña (España).

Los resultados señalan que los ecuatorianos estarían más integrados al país de destino que los franceses; que estos últimos estarían más conectados a sus países de origen; que los territorios virtuales generan nuevas formas de negociar las prácticas sociales y por fuera de las instituciones; y que las TICs no estarían superando antiguas formas de explotación social.

Educación y cultura política

En América Latina se produjo un conjunto de reformas que dieron un giro notable a los distintos sistemas educativos desde hace más de veinte años. Se destaca una tendencia en las políticas educativas por generar una cultura política en los niños y jóvenes desde la particular perspectiva del Estado donde la institución escolar juega un papel central.

En México por ejemplo, los nuevos libros de texto incluyen las nociones de ciudadanía, participación democrática, cultura y formación ética como los temas más relevantes. Sin embargo pueden identificarse tres esferas en permanente oposición: 1) los lineamientos discursivos en la política educativa y sus cursos de acción, 2) el proceso de implementación institucional de tales acciones, confrontada entre la autoridad escolar y la comunidad educativa y 3) las prácticas culturales propias del espacio escolar y sus consecuencias en el desarrollo en el aula.

La complejidad de procesos contextuales y multidimensionales en México, como en otros países latinoamericanos, hacen que los temas de la democracia, la igualdad y la tolerancia tratados teóricamente en las escuelas se contrapongan a la práctica educativa cuando la estructura escolar tiende a ser autoritaria, discriminatoria y poco tolerante. Así también se contradice en la esfera de la práctica social.

En este trabajo intento mostrar la disociación entre el discurso formal de las políticas educativas y las prácticas escolares de nivel secundaria que muestran a través de la acción explícita y simbólica de sus actores los procesos de resistencia, conflicto y contradicción.

Problemas corrientes, respuestas alternativas. El movimiento carismático católico y la búsqueda de bienestar

Actualmente, el campo sociorreligioso argentino se caracteriza por la multiplicación de cultos y agrupaciones religiosas. Sin embargo, el 76,5 % de los argentinos continúa definiéndose como católico[1]. Lejos de ser un espacio uniforme, dicha denominación religiosa es plural, heterogénea y engloba un amplio espectro de prácticas, experiencias y grados de compromiso en un contexto signado por la presencia de procesos de secularización. En este marco la Renovación Carismática Católica se inscribe como alternativa religiosa y cultural cercana a las soluciones mágicas, para quienes están desencantados por diversas razones –religiosas, políticas y/o económicas - con la rigidez de la iglesia y su alejamiento de la vida cotidiana.

Tomaremos como caso el movimiento carismático de sanación formado en torno a la figura del Padre Ignacio Peries, cura párroco de la Parroquia Natividad del Señor (Rosario, provincia de Santa Fe). El Padre Ignacio es conocido públicamente por impartir bendiciones a todos aquellos que las soliciten y a personas enfermas en particular. Esta característica ha generado un movimiento religioso, que congrega más de quince mil fieles por fin de semana, y que al estar inserto en una dinámica social mayor, implica también transformaciones económicas y sociales. Asimismo, la Parroquia ha incursionado en distintos ámbitos como ser la educación, el deporte, la tercera edad y la salud.

El presente trabajo busca explorar y caracterizar esta modalidad innovadora de la tradición monolítica e institucionalmente legitimada del catolicismo argentino con miras a problematizar la secularización, ya no como pérdida de poder y control social de la religión sobre otras esferas de la actividad, sino en tanto proceso de reorganización del trabajo de la religión para otorgar respuestas en una sociedad que es percibida como estructuralmente imposibilitada para hacerlo.

Reconstruction of communities following the great East Japan disaster

The earthquake and tsunami that struck northeastern Japan on March 11, 2011 not only caused extensive direct damage to people, but triggered a nuclear power plant accident bringing the terror and reality of radiation. Reconstruction of communities in Iwate, Miyagi and Fukushima Prefectures presents enormous problems. While communities affected only by the earthquake and tsunami can be rebuilt physically and socially, it will be very difficult for people in the radiation-contaminated areas in Fukushima to reconstruct. Many residents fleeing the radioactivity have already dispersed far and wide throughout Japan. The social bonds among both groups of sufferers have changed. Though some people have already redeveloped ties in the quake-tsunami disaster areas, others, especially those whose houses were not destroyed by the tsunami, have hesitated to communicate with less fortunate friends and neighbors because of 'survivors guilt.' In Fukushima, the additional nuclear disaster inflicted quite another kind of damage on people. It was not only physical, but mental. Many farmers have had to transfer to other areas because their crops became unmarketable due to radioactivity, real or feared. The government forces many other people to evacuate to areas far from the nuclear plant and so far from home. While older people wish to return to their hometowns, younger people have determined to find new jobs in other areas. This too strains ties. The purpose of the paper is to inventory and clarify the particular problems of conflict in communities such as the loss of confidence in neighbors caused by the disaster and to explore the possibilities of rebuilding communities, especially indicating how to cope with 'social demise of communities' where local people had formed and occupied all their lives.

The paper focuses on responses to recent Van earthquakes in the media: The case study of national newspapers and TV programmes following 6 weeks of the earthquake

The followups of the disasters in written materials and visual records can be important tools for tracing the processes for awareness, constructive and deconstructive purposes in the disaster phases. There are ongoing arguments on the values of such studies. Most recent questions following Japan's recent experience are how exactly do disasters lead to social changes, how far they differ and why?

However, present study questions differing responses to Van earthquakes in selected 6 national newspapers and disaster focused, selected national TV programmes in following 6 weeks of the post-disaster phase. Study will be tracing awareness levels and reflections of the different occupational groups to the disaster. The backgrounds of appearing reflections will be taken into account during evaluations in the context of local, national and international experiences.

The discussions will be basing on several variables such as distance and coverage of the issue, approaches and types of the presented knowledge.

Invoking and disrupting community in urban development strategies: Exploring its (post-)political tendencies

Community-based governance has become an increasingly popular strategy for urban development strategies in disadvantaged urban areas across the world (DeFilippis and North, 2004). It puts community building, civic engagement and the development of social capital to urban renewal plans and steers a middle course between state- and market led forms of territorial development. The idea of community as the vehicle for collective action in urban neighbourhoods has however been criticized from various angles (Mayer, 2003). Marxist, feminist and post-structuralist scholars have argued that the idea of community ignores asymmetric relations of power and domination within the community. It tends to ignore the fundamental split of the social along (amongst others) class and gender lines. In this paper we explore the conception of the political underlying attempts to both invoke and disrupt community in urban renewal strategies. We do this through a case study of community-based planning in the gentrifying neighbourhood Brugse Poort in Ghent, Belgium. A recent social urban renewal program successfully revived community dynamics in this post-industrial neighbourhood, but was met with a powerful attempt of a local social worker at disrupting the new hegemonic image of the neighbourhood. He defended his intervention by arguing that the new community being built obscured and marginalized his clients and their social needs. This intervention is analyzed as an attempt to create a space where a political disagreement about who constitutes the community can be staged (Rancière, 1999).

Promoting sustainable palmoil; Are consumers really involved or only virtually?

Palm oil is the leading tropical vegetable oil and used as an input for food products, cosmetics, animal feed and bio-energy. Its production is concentrated in Southeast Asia, but its use is increasingly spread worldwide. The sector provides income and employment to millions of people and foreign currency for many countries. Nevertheless, the growing palm oil sector has led to negative environmental consequences, such as tropical deforestation and soil erosion, to increased greenhouse gases and to air and water pollution. In addition, the expansion of large-scale plantations has contributed to social-political unrest at community level.

Several initiatives have been taken to respond to these challenges, including by governments, private companies and NGOs. Interesting initiatives are the Round Table on Sustainable Palm Oil (RSPO), established in 2004 by international private companies and NGOs, and the recently launched Indonesia Sustainable Palmoil Standard (ISPO). Although consumers are not actively involved in these initiatives, they are often referred to when sustainability standards and certification are proposed or developed. However, it is unclear how consumer concerns are actually involved or whether these are used in an indirect manner to promote the interests of particular organisations. It is complicated for consumers to directly influence production practices because the palm oil origin can hardly be recognized in margarine, soap, cookies or biodiesel. A key question is therefore how consumer concerns play a role in these sustainability initiatives and what this means in the lives of consumers when they are operationalized.

This paper will analyse the ways in which the RSPO and the ISPO incorporate consumers and their concerns in developing and implementing their respective standards and discuss what this means more broadly for sustainable consumption.

Honor y masculinidad en la vida pandillera

Este es un estudio sobre el honor y la masculinidad como elementos culturales de la violencia en las pandillas. A la violencia pandillera, sus luchas territoriales, atracos y cadenas de venganza les subyace un conjunto de narrativas en torno a la masculinidad y al honor que obran como justificaciones de la violencia. Varios autores coinciden en que las pandillas son producto de la desocialización, un progresivo adelgazamiento de lazo social que afecta la interiorización de las reglas simbólicas de la vida social. La hipótesis es que ese déficit simbólico es compensado por un abultamiento de la proyección imaginaria y subjetiva, visible en las formas en que se representan la identidad y la realidad social, de lo cual el honor y la masculinidad son excelentes ejemplos.

Se trabajó con pandilleros de barrios marginales en la ciudad de Cali (Valle) Colombia, con una metodología etnográfica en una compilación de diálogos, entrevistas y apuntes de observación etnográfica consignados a largo de varios años (2002-2008). El resultado es una teoría psicosocial de la violencia basada en la perspectiva egocéntrica, donde la particular configuración emotiva del hombre violento explica los discursos de la identidad masculina y el sentido del honor pandillero. Se concluye que la identidad de género masculina y los sistemas del honor son expresiones culturales que transan entre la realidad social objetiva y la vida subjetiva e imaginaria. La dimensión cultural de la violencia y sus motivaciones subjetivas empiezan a comprenderse de esta manera.

Alianzas público-privadas: La industria del software. Experiencias en Argentina e India

La necesidad de promover en Argentina una industria del software y un sector de servicios informáticos (SSI) con proyección internacional concita un gran consenso tanto en el ámbito público como privado por tratarse de actividades intensivas en conocimiento y de gran valor agregado (Chudnovsky, López y Melitsko; Delgado, Sedano; Lopez y Ramos, entre otros autores).

Este trabajo consiste en un análisis de políticas públicas comparando Argentina e India, cuya pertinencia se basa en i) la similitud de sus economías agroexportadoras que desarrollan paralelamente un SSI competitivo, y ii) en el contraste entre ambas en tanto India es una gran potencia emergente incluida en el grupo BRICS..

Se centrará en la comparación de las capacidades estatales y las interacciones público-privadas, es decir, los roles de los organismos y agentes públicos y del sector privado en la formación de recursos humanos, en la participación en actividades de I+D, en los procesos de captación de inversión extranjera directa, en la internacionalización de pequeñas y medianas empresas, y en la promoción de exportaciones e innovación.

"Carers' transnational links: The ambivalence of immigrant remittances"

Recent studies on international migration have paid special attention to the transnational perspective; this new branch of the sociology of migration studies the process through which migrants build social fields that link the countries of origin and destination (Glick Schiller et al 1992; Tognetti Bordogna 2004; Ambrosini 2008; Boccagni 2009).

The economic transnationalism connected to the great phenomenon of remittances - financial, material or immaterial - is one relevant aspect of this field of study (Vinello 2009).

Remittances are ambivalent, because they can be interpreted either as a medium of consolidation of Transnational ties or as a bond linking migrant women to the country of origin.

Our target is, in fact, those migrant women who carry out in Italy a particular work of care: the badanti, or informal caregivers. As such, they constitute an important resource of the Italian welfare system, characterized as it is by an important family component.

Any migratory phenomenon is, by nature, complex and dynamic, with different historical, economic and social characteristics; moreover it operates changes at many levels. The caring work done by badanti as well as the transnational links represented by cross-border remittances take place and must be read within this broader dynamics

The research question for this paper is precisely whether remittances are mainly bonds or mainly ties for badanti, relative to other migrant workers employed in the care sector.

We use qualitative and quantitative data from the Prin 2005 research project[1] concerning nationality, gender and class in new house holding work in Italy.

After describing this phenomenon and its peculiarities, we shall analyze the mechanisms that originate it and, establish correlations with the surrounding context.

A multidimensional index of labor vulnerability in Mexico (Decent Work)

According to Mexican Labor Laws and ILO Regulations we build and index of decent work using all existing panels of the National Survey of Occupation and Unemployment for Mexico (ENOE, 2005-2011). This index is multidimensional and takes into account eight dimensions, one monetary and seven non monetary, which are labor income, hours worked, social security, family care, sufficient work, protection to labor rights, respect to labor rights and job stability. This index shows that more than 60% of the Mexican labor force has a non-decent job, which means that don't have enough labor income to buy the food basket and at least one of the labor rights is violated. Additionally, about 30% of the population that can afford the food basket have a job that violates at least one right and are called vulnerable by MEL (minimum labor standards). Moreover, about 10% of the population whose job complies with MEL has a wage that is not enough to buy the food basket. In summary there are more than 90% of the labor force in Mexico that suffers from one type of vulnerability. When we look at the index by age group, children and the elderly are the most vulnerable, and an analysis by sex makes woman much more vulnerable than men. Across time we can observe that after 2008 the percentage of people with no decent work has increased. These results are alarming as this implies that Mexican population suffer from non safety nets in case they lose a job, when they have it, as more than 60% of the labor force reports have been inactive at least one trimester during a given year

Las formas de reclutamiento de candidatos de los partidos políticos oficialistas en las provincias argentinas. El caso de Santiago del Estero (1999-2010)

La problemática general es la de los procesos de reclutamiento de candidatos en las provincias argentinas. Se presenta un estudio de caso sobre los partidos oficialistas en la provincia de Santiago del Estero, en el período 1999-2010. Tomando como punto de partida las trayectorias individuales de los diputados provinciales, se ha logrado identificar ciertas lógicas sociales y políticas que guían su reclutamiento. A través de un análisis que articula datos cuantitativos y cualitativos, es posible dar cuenta de aquellas lógicas que no son explicables por las instituciones escritas, ya que a menudo las reglas que rigen el reclutamiento de los dirigentes no se encuentran frecuentemente escritas o cristalizadas.

Se postula que el principal capital político para ser candidato a diputado provincial es el de ser un representante de un departamento provincial, ser capaz de concitar el apoyo de los votantes en un territorio determinado. Asimismo, se han identificado lógicas de reclutamiento de diputados ligados estrechamente con la historia política local, como la importancia de las mujeres y de los sindicalistas; al tiempo que se postula que los vínculos familiares ocupan un rol marginal.

Se logra presentar evidencias empíricas que matizan la imagen de un partido monolítico controlado por un líder autoritario, si bien se da cuenta de la forma en que el gobernador emerge como el principal líder político en términos de recursos simbólicos y materiales y en virtud de ello como principal decisor en los procesos de reclutamiento de candidatos. Así, tener un vínculo de cercanía con el gobernador o miembros de su círculo cercano, constituye un capital político tan importante como el de ganar las elecciones. Para ser diputado provincial ser elegido por los votantes es tan importante como ser elegido por quienes ocupan la cúspide del gobierno provincial.

La televisión como mediación sociopolítica: Entre la responsabilidad social, la imagen y el espectáculo

Desde las perspectivas de los estudios culturales y la sociología se abordan aquellas tendencias generales que han figurado la televisión como medio de comunicación y estructura implicada en el registro del mundo social. Un análisis teórico de estas transformaciones de los medios y sus alcances son la base de la presentación. En este contexto, innovaciones tecnológicas, la massmediatización de la vida, el espectáculo, la globalización, la industria cultural y nuevas agendas mediáticas de responsabilidad social figuran entre los factores o condiciones a través de los cuales se produce el "medio difuso". Las relaciones y desplazamientos que se producen entre la responsabilidad social, la imagen y el espectáculo dan cuenta de un medio que condensa y figura nuevos realineamientos y sentidos de las estructuras tradicionales de Estado, empresa y medios. Mas allá de lecturas apocalípticas de la televisión como espacio de comunicación social, intento abordar su mutación hacia una intervención o capacidad sociopolítica. La contención central de este trabajo es que esta mutación del medio televisivo tiene efectos socio-teóricos en nuestros entendidos del Estado, lo público y lo privado, ciudadanía, entre otras nociones propias de la experiencia moderna. Desde este escenario de mutación, la noción de medios se amplía a medio-social en la medida que se abandona el traje funcional que éstos cobijaban bajo la modernidad al entrar en nuevos espacios de co-agencia política.

Building migrants' belonging through positive interactions

Integrating transnational migrants into local communities is a significant challenge for policy-makers in many different national contexts. A key part of this challenge is how to generate a sense of belonging which incorporates migrants within these communities, and which helps to overcome potential isolation, exclusion or discrimination. This paper will explore the perspectives and dilemmas faced by policy-makers in European countries trying to achieve these aims, by presenting the empirical findings from a project funded by the Council of Europe. These findings arose from the use of qualitative participatory research methods with a range of policy-makers responsible for migrant integration policies across a wide range of European countries. These findings will be set critically in the context of some key theories of identity and interaction from a range of disciplines. By doing this, implications will be considered for policy and practice which achieves more cohesive societies by supporting improved interactions that contribute towards these aims.

Changing practice? Reflecting on participatory qualitative research in diaconal ministry

The diaconate in many Christian churches is located at the interface between these churches and wider societies. However, this role is often heavily contested, both within and between denominations, and it can be controversial in a range of ways. These include, for example, in the ways it connects churches with wider societies and advocates for individuals who are otherwise marginalised, its relationship to issues of gender in ministry, etc. This presentation will reflect on the experience of conducting participatory qualitative research into the diaconate within one particular denomination, the Methodist Church of Great Britain, and the methodological issues such research can raise. Within such research, traditionally-recognised challenges (such as managing insider/outsider dynamics) can combine in complex ways with additional challenges of researching practitioners' perspectives within multifaceted organisational and historical contexts. These are further complicated by the ethical and interdisciplinary challenges of engaging critically with participants' practical theological reflection in ways that may stimulate changes in their practice. Furthermore, the very process of conducting and writing up such research can have an impact on the practitioners involved, and can itself trigger further methodological debates about the interpretation of findings. Key debates include the relationship between these personal perspectives and the perspectives of others, including the normative perspectives ascribed to by the denomination as a whole. In response to these issues, the presentation will explore the reflective engagement of the qualitative researcher when using these methods. This reflective engagement includes considering how the ethics of research impact become an integral part of the researcher's involvement in such work.

En esta ponencia buscaré abordar algunas de las formas cotidianas de exclusión más comunes que se practican contra los jóvenes de los estratos sociales bajos, dentro de ciertas instituciones públicas asistenciales en México. En efecto, trataré de abordar algunas de las acciones con las que los profesionales y autoridades de estas instituciones ponen en práctica formas de atención que resultan ser paradójicamente excluyentes para los jóvenes internados, sea por omisión, por desatención o incluso por cálculo. Y esto a pesar de estar investidas muchas veces con discursos de "apoyo" o atención irrestricta hacia los jóvenes. Lo anterior con la finalidad de indicar cómo es que en México y en otros países de América Latina, la estancia de varios sectores juveniles dentro de una institución asistencial no asegura "per se" su atención social dentro de la misma. En este sentido, esta ponencia busca presentar algunas notas para re-pensar y discutir la forma en que se ejerce la exclusión dentro de las llamadas instituciones de inclusión, como serían las asistenciales, encargadas de velar por los estratos sociales vulnerable o en riesgo.

Para llevar a cabo esta tarea, me basaré en una serie de datos empíricos recabados en 2010 en una institución pública asistencial ubicada en el Toluca, México, como parte de mi investigación doctoral en la Facultad Latinoamericana de Ciencias Sociales, sede México, así como en nueva investigación etnográfica que llevo a cabo actualmente en otra institución asistencial ubicada en el Distrito Federal, con apoyo del Consejo Nacional de Ciencia y Tecnología (CONACyT).

El presente trabajo presenta resultados de la investigación FONDECYT N° 1110110, sobre la viudez como factor estructural que influye en la construcción social de la vejez y el envejecimiento. Se analizan trayectorias conyugales y de viudez, sobre la base de una muestra de 36 personas mayores viudos/as mayores de 60 años, de Santiago de Chile. En América Latina están ocurriendo profundas transformaciones en la experiencia de envejecer, lo que se ha traducido en un significativo cambio en la estructura demográfica según edades. Esto se manifiesta, principalmente en el envejecimiento de la población y al estancamiento del crecimiento de los grupos más jóvenes. El aumento de la esperanza de vida después de los 60 años y la consecuente mayor longevidad en las personas, se traduce en una extensión del periodo entre la jubilación y la muerte, constituyéndose la viudez también en una nueva etapa de la vida en la vejez. Este segmento de personas mayores, que experimenta las transformaciones del envejecimiento, se ha ido constituyendo como un grupo de edad diferenciado, con características culturales, intereses y demandas sociales propias. Una interpretación sociocultural de la condición de viudez en la vejez, nos muestra a una persona que ha perdido a su cónyuge, pero también lo que ser hombre o mujer viejo/a significa en un continuo de experiencia vital que conlleva cambios claves para comprender el proceso de envejecimiento. En diversos países latinoamericanos se están produciendo cambios sociodemográficos significativos. Estas transformaciones han influido en la experiencia de envejecer y en los significados sociales asociados a ella. La viudez marca un hito real y simbólico de cambio hacia nuevas experiencias vitales en la vejez. La viudez se nos presenta, por lo tanto, como un factor de estructuración social e identitario en el proceso de envejecimiento.

The thesis that economic theories perform markets has become widely accepted. In this context, a lot of attention has been paid to economic knowledge that is inscribed in specific calculative devices used by market practitioners. Less attention has been given though to economic arrangements that are rather straight forwardly designed by economics, particularly markets that are developed as social policy (see however the increasing discussion about carbon trade). In this context, economics is not only used to create (or radically reform) an area of social policy, but also, to deal with the amazing amount of unexpected consequences that the newly created markets bring. This article focuses in such type of processes.

This article develops a comparative historical exploration of the performance of two quite different markets in Chile: health insurance and public transport. Both cases were part of a common state project that looked to economize social care in the country, however knowledge has played a different role in each of them. On the one hand, the private health insurance was created without previous research (based mostly on a simple laissez faire principle), but an important amount of expert discussion has been developed in order to understand the particularities that make this market to work quite differently to how it was expected. On the other, public transport early reforms were also based on "deregulation", but later on became a laboratory to test very sophisticated market-based policy instruments.

Through the similarities and differences between both stories this paper will make the case that more attention has to be paid to economic knowledge that is used, not only to "make" a new market, but to tame them.

RC02-736.4OSSANDON, Jose (Universidad Diego Portales, jose.ossandon@udp.cl)Sowing financial consumers: Retail credit in Chile

The expansion of consumer credit is one of the most wide-ranging recent transformations in Chile. While not unique, the Chilean case contains an important particularity: it has been driven by retailers such as supermarkets and department stores. In today's Chile, retail cards are not merely used to purchase goods in the issuers' institutions, but also in a growing network of associated stores. Retailers have also expanded their range of services to include installment loans, cash advances and insurance. In a country where a large proportion of the population is not considered by banks, stores are becoming the main access to finance, and this novel "model of financialization" is quickly expanding to neighboring countries. Drawing on information collected in 40 in-depth interviews with senior managers, this paper argues that this process arises not only from regulatory arrangements and the elitism of Chilean banks, but from a particular mode of managing consumers (namely "to sow" – or issuing to risky consumers small amounts of credit that is made to grow by carefully following and classifying purchases and debt behavior), whose expansion has been enabled by the development a wide quantitative datascape and the shopping mall as place of encounter.

On the basis of two researches projects conducted at different types of institution, we will interrogate the notion of citizenship and explain how this notion is conceived and used by the institutional agents and the people whom they interact. We will also try demonstrating how ethnological research in institution can contribute both for academic and practical knowledge.

In the first research project (see for example Ossipow 2011), we are examining "horizontal" and "vernacular" notion of citizenship. We are discussing how educators and young people living in juvenile facilities interact with each other and negotiate activities and rules. We will also illuminate, how in this context, citizenship turns to civility and the necessity to sensitize educational and political authorities to the paradoxical question of juvenile autonomy.

In the second research project (Ossipow, Csopor 2011) - which is more about "vertical" and "state" citizenship- we describe the Swiss civic ceremony of reaching adulthood for young people when they turn 18). We will to document how the local politicians think about citizenship and how young people experience the ceremony. In addition to this ethnographical approach, we take a more historical perspective which allows us to document the evolution of the ceremony since 1924 (date of the first ceremony in Geneva) and the non/places reserved for immigrant youth.

Acceso a la vivienda y conflictividad en conjuntos urbanos en Buenos Aires. Aproximaciones a la perspectiva de los residentes

La ponencia tiene como objetivo presentar algunas reflexiones sobre las experiencias de los habitantes de conjuntos habitacionales desarrollados por los programas de vivienda actuales (Programa Federal) en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires (Capital Federal). Nuestra motivación se vincula con que desde 2004 en adelante se asiste en Argentina a un retorno de las políticas de construcción de vivienda nueva. El marco de posibilidad para esta reorientación presenta elementos diversos: la necesidad de generar puestos de trabajo en la poscrisis de 2001, la estrategia de reactivar al sector de la construcción como mecanismo de dinamizar la economía, la búsqueda de reducir el déficit habitacional. Estos elementos incidieron de manera diferencial en la promoción del acceso a la vivienda, en función de las características locales y de los diversos escenarios de implementación del programa aludida. Así, en trabajos precedentes hemos analizado su proceso de implementación en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, observando los niveles de ejecución, los actores involucrados, y su vinculación con el mercado de suelo local.

Aquí intentaremos profundizar el análisis de la perspectiva de los residentes para indagar en la relación entre lo que construye el Estado y las maneras en que los sujetos se apropian de las viviendas. Tanto en las investigaciones que nutren nuestra ponencia como en los debates clásicos sobre la cuestión de la vivienda y el rol del sector público, se plantea una distancia entre esas dos cuestiones, originado en aspectos diversos: el tamaño de la vivienda y las necesidades de las familias, conflictos de convivencia entre vecinos con diferentes trayectorias previas, la ubicación de los conjuntos en sectores históricamente postergados de las ciudades, entre otras características. Incorporar la perspectiva de los residentes sobre estas cuestiones puede aportar a la mejor comprensión del conflicto, actual y potencial, de vivir en los nuevos conjuntos urbanos.

Cuestionando el "consenso punitivo": Reacciones sociales hacia la inseguridad de los residentes del AMBA (2000-2010)

En Argentina varios académicos señalan que existe consenso entre el público, los medios de comunicación y los políticos sobre el control del delito a partir de mayores castigos hacia los delincuentes, fenómeno conocido como "populismo penal". Sin embargo, existe desacuerdo en el orden de estos componentes: para algunos, nos encontramos ante un populismo penal de "arriba hacia abajo" donde políticos populistas a través de los medios manipulan al público con la cuestión delictiva con fines electorales; y para otros, nos encontramos ante un populismo penal de "abajo hacia arriba" donde el público con crecientes demandas punitivas utiliza a los medios de comunicación para imponerle dicha agenda a los políticos.

Más allá del lugar que ocupe, en ambas perspectivas se asume que el público se ha vuelto más punitivo con el tiempo: a partir de los crecientes niveles de victimización, de la preocupación por la (in)seguridad y del temor a ser víctima de delitos, se generaliza y se asume que la demanda punitiva también se ha incrementado. Esta creencia generalizada en un público punitivo limita el planteo de medidas de control alternativas y es tomada como aval de medidas y discursos represivos por parte de algunos dirigentes políticos.

En esta ponencia buscaremos diferenciar dichas reacciones hacia la inseguridad, dando cuenta que si bien en la última década gran parte del público residente del Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires (AMBA) se declara más preocupado y atemorizado por la inseguridad, no necesariamente demanda medidas más punitivas. Así, se busca distinguir entre una demanda de seguridad mayoritaria y una demanda punitiva minoritaria. Para tal fin, analizaremos las encuestas de victimización realizadas a residentes del AMBA por la Dirección Nacional de Política Criminal (2000-2005) y por el Laboratorio de Investigaciones sobre Crimen, Instituciones y Políticas (2006-2010).

Jóvenes y movimientos sociales: Formas de participación político social

Este texto tiene como objetivo central reflexionar sobre las expresiones de participación social y política de los sujetos jóvenes en el contexto contemporáneo, y en la argentina actual. Específicamente se trata de abordar el encuentro de dos temáticas acción colectiva y condición juvenil, a partir de los nuevos paradigmas propuestos para el análisis de los modos de relación juvenil y construcción del espacio público. La lectura toma como material de base los hallazgos de una investigación desarrollada desde principios del 2000 entre un grupo de jóvenes inscriptos en un movimiento social de raigambre autonomista. Es una organización de trabajadores de desocupados nacida a fines de los '90, que como parte del espacio "piquetero" alcanzó visibilidad en el escenario nacional. En el estudio el interés estuvo puesto en explorar distintas dimensiones de las trayectorias del grupo y en la dinámica de construcciones al interior de la organización que permitieron abordar las formas de acercamiento juvenil a la propuesta colectiva. A lo largo de esta disertación se avanza hacia una interpretación de los rastros de aquellas experiencias en el marco del renovado mapa político del país instalado luego del periodo crítico de principios de siglo.

An ethnicist state sells its multicultural heritage: Marketization as a rupture in Turkish nationalism

This paper explores the relationship between nationalism and marketization by focusing on production of national pasts at cultural heritage sites. Scholars have already shown that production of national pasts is a negotiation process between different groups with different objectives. They have also pointed out that arenas of memory making are constantly in flux because paradigm shifts or other ruptures may create niches for new memories. Building on these literatures, I argue that the rupture created by neoliberal marketization generates a ground for agents of memory to re-engage in the making of national pasts. In other words, marketization opens up new possibilities for proponents of alternative constructions of past to use the validation of particularity, uniqueness, culture and aesthetic meaning in their political struggle for challenging institutionalized constructions. In the last decade increasing attention has been focused on national heritage sites by national governments and various other actors (i.e. local governments, firms, transnational groups, social movements, regional and global regulatory systems of trade) as cultural tourism was depicted as an important potential growth sector for many countries. Particularly in the developing world, with rising emphasis put on outward-oriented growth in the framework of development based on national comparative advantage, heritage tourism became a major source of revenue. In this framework, Turkey as a Muslim nation long ill at ease with its non-Turkish, non-Muslim history has now discovered Anatolia's Christian heritage as a way of drawing visitors and of cultivating an image of the country as a cultural mosaic and arbiter of civilizations. In this regard, to illustrate my argument I analyze the marketization process of the Armenian Akhtamar Church in Turkey in the context of neo-liberal development strategies of cultural tourism.

Latin American conditional cash transfers (CCTs) and Scandinavian activation schemes – similar ideas, similar implementation problems?

From a diffusion-of-policy-ideas perspective, Latin American CCTs and Scandinavian activation schemes have both been quite influential, also outside their regions of origin. A joint characteristic of both types of schemes is active conditionality. That is, receipt of a benefit is conditioned on the claimant, or his/her household, doing some specified activity "in return" for accessing the benefit. This activity is meant to boost human capital (broadly defined), or it consists of some type of work effort. The paper compares types of conditionality in a selection of CCTs and activation schemes. The study focuses in particular on CCTs in Mexico (the innovator of CCTs), Brazil and Argentina, compared to activation schemes in Sweden, Norway and Denmark. The paper further investigates crucial aspects in the implementation of such schemes, in particular the relationship between central, regional and local authorities in financing and distributing benefits, and in supervising conditionalities. It ends with a brief summary of perceived challenges to make such schemes work, including if perceived challenges are similar in Scandinavia and Latin America.

Domestic 'sustainable' technology use: Tensions between governing and performing practice

The UK Government launched the Code for Sustainable Homes (2006), requiring housing-developers to incorporate technologies intended to reduce carbon and create energy renewal. This encourages a technologically deterministic approach to the reduction of energy consumption, and positions 'end-users' behaviour as pivotal. Some researchers (e.g. Guy, 2006; Shove, 2004; Southerton et al., 2004; Spaargaren, 2011; Wilhite, 2004, 2008) advocate a shift from the analysis of technological efficiency to that of 'socio-technological' relations and practices. This strand of research suggests that energy consumption does not occur in a vacuum: users' practices are not isolated from the activities of other actors (e.g. state agencies). Furthermore, energy consumption is influenced by embedded socio-technical practices. The emphasis here is less upon the provision of consumer 'choice', than an understanding of how practices and energy consumption co-develop. In line with this latter effort, we investigate how the consumption of energy is affected by embedded socio-technological practices of residents who live in a social housing scheme with heat recovery ventilation and solar water heating installed. We examine how such government-recommended technologies embody assumptions about normative use; this allows us to examine the tensions between actual and intended use. The study is longitudinal with repeated resident interviews over 18 months, and interviews with professionals from a social housing association who worked to develop and manage the scheme. Our analysis sheds light upon factors influencing professional actors' approaches to shape intended use. We contrast this with an analysis of how socio-technological practices are performed to manage daily life (e.g. cooking and time-management), including an engagement with sustainable technologies. Our study shows how residents creatively incorporate and adapt to technologies within the home to accomplish everyday activities. In certain cases, sustainable technologies are made obsolete, thus challenging the notion that state actors could 'edit' consumer choices to enact environmental change.

"Educated gender, unattached desires: Muslim pious women's narratives

The narratives and practices articulated in the realms of romance, love, and sexuality, I argue, offer a privileged vantage point for understanding the multi-layered and complex ways in which new pious women's configurations of the self, marriage, and sexuality are produced and made relevant to a new desired society. Narratives collected through in-depth interviews with upwardly-mobile young pious women in Istanbul provide the empirical foundation for this paper. I elaborate the interconnections between democratization in inmate relations and democratization in social order by explicating three desires: Hermeneutic Curiosity in imagining and defining the ideal Muslim Man; Marriage of Compatibility in articulating a paradigmatic shift from marriage of logic; and Corporeal Compatibility (tensel uyum) in (re)defining sexual desire and practices.

A case study of health workforce governance change in Australia

Changes to health workforce governance at a national level can be lengthy, complex and expensive, especially in federated nation states such as Australia. This paper presents a case study of a recent development in Australian health workforce governance – the establishment on 1 July 2010 of a national registration and accreditation scheme for health practitioners.

Prior to the scheme's introduction, there were over 80 bodies in Australia's six states and two territories responsible for the registration of individual health practitioners and the accreditation of their education and clinical training. These were replaced with a single regulator – the Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency – operating under a single legislative framework. The introduction of the scheme was a significant change, and in some instances contested existing power relations between the state and health professions.

This change followed more than twenty years of inter-governmental discussions that sought to address a series of health workforce governance and management challenges. These included multiple boundary issues; standardisation of registration criteria in each state and territory within and across different health professions, ensuring consistency of criteria for the assessment of overseas-trained health practitioners, as well as underlying concerns of patient safety and management of risk to patients.

This study has utilised a range of techniques to examine the policy process that led to the establishment of the scheme, including policy mapping, historical institutionalism and problem representation analysis. The paper will describe critical events in the wider policy environment and report on the parallels with, and the influence of, whole-of-government economic reform agendas. We will canvass the integration of this policy change with other health governance mechanisms, considering how notions of safety, quality and the balance between professional responsibility and autonomy have been addressed.

Trabajo informal en plazas comerciales

Ante la crisis del empleo en México, el trabajo informal constituye una alternativa para miles de jóvenes que no cuentan con otras posibilidades para sobrevivir. El trabajo informal aunque es penalizado por las leyes de la ciudad de México, cunde por todos lados. Los vendedores ambulantes y los que "ofrecen servicios" como limpiar los parabrisas de los autos en los cruceros, o facilitan el estacionamiento a cambio de una propina, etc., participan en un sistema de corrupción con la participación de líderes que organizan a los informales y median con la policía y funcionarios públicos para hacer posible la existencia de este fenómeno y evitar así un estallido social de grandes proporciones.

Hoy el trabajo informal tiene modalidades distintas, como la asimilación de lava autos adentro de plazas comerciales, se trata de la incorporación del trabajo informal en establecimientos formales, la informalidad dentro de la formalidad, que se presenta en esta ponencia, donde además se exponen las condiciones sociales y las remuneraciones de los investigados,

Defeat, soccer and the media: Paradoxical images and discourses of aging

The aim of this work is to analyze the paradoxical images and discourses of aging constructed by the (sports) media to understand and justify the Brazilians national team defeat in the World Cup of Mexico in 1986. This is done through a research using the main Brazilian magazines and newspapers – such as Placar, Veja, Estado de Minas e Folha de São Paulo –, from January 1985 to August 1986. The material examined – photos and articles – provided evidences on how the process of aging is depicted depending on the performance of the athlete. Moreover the analyses of the images and discourses allow us to reflect on the category of age in specific institutions such as sports.

Participatory and deliberative democracy from local to global: The example of women's conferences as new spaces for mobilization and propose public policies on gender in Brazil

The core of the feminist debate has always been located in a supposed search for equal rights. However, the claims should be referred to the different rights of womanhood, which collides with sexual and reproductive issues, which itself expresses an inherent difference in relation to their arch-rivals of the opposite sex. Woman is not yet exceeded its historical trajectory of social inferiority, economic and political crisis continues to demand of the welfare state to ensure them a new perspective of social action based on guarantees of rights simultaneously egalitarian and differentiated. What is presented as new, at least the last decade, is how the claim is being organized. No longer seems to be a full antagonism between the state and organized movements, but a search for bilateral dialogue mechanisms that are taking the claims that can operationalize them. The Conference of Policies for Women, which includes the local to the national reach, we present in this context as one of the main mechanisms for promoting dialogue society - government. Because it is a space in which the composition is required or semi-equal parity between civil society and representatives of government agencies, it is new locus for broad and open discussion between the plaintiffs and defendants. The logic that governs this type of thinking more democratic policies in Brazil is trying to converge the needs of minorities with a reasonableness of the proposals, which must take into account the capacity of the legislative and executive power to implement them. It's now time, therefore, understand and discuss the proposition of new structures of gender policies in developing countries, taking, for example, new spaces for women's mobilization in Brazil, seeking to analyze their effectiveness and their actual ability to defend the enforcement of such rights, what's the proposal of this proposed work.

Translational agency in resilient social-ecological systems: First nations and the conservation economy in Canada

This paper examines the nature and role of agency in the collaborative design of resilient social-ecological systems (SESs). SES researchers examine factors that influence the ability of SESs to absorb disturbance and adapt to change. While this work draws attention to the importance of social learning, leadership, and governance institutions for collaborative resource management, it generally operates with an under-theorized understanding of agency and power. However, poor conceptualization of SES agency entails that our knowledge of how resilience can be achieved in practice – particularly by marginalized groups – remains incomplete. Moreover, by assuming that the capacity to act exists within the social 'side' of coupled social and ecological systems, researchers fail to consider how agency pertains to the entire SES. Drawing on Actor-Network Theory, I propose the concept of translational agency – the ability of a system to transform in the face of stress – to better account for agency within SESs. I illustrate the concept through a case study of British Columbia's newly designed 'conservation economy'. Analysis of textual material and interviews with First Nations, environmentalists, forestry companies and governments reveals three aspects of translational agency: 1) the ability of marginalized groups to influence SES design is contingent upon the translation of actors' interests and identities, 2) the ability of an SES to adapt to stress depends on the translation of hazards into less threatening forms, and 3) the design of resilient SESs is influenced by nonhuman actants. The paper contributes to research on natural resource governance by developing a concept of agency specifically applicable to SES resilience.

State repression and collective action

For decades, social movement scholars have sought answers to why authorities react as they do to protest. Most of the studies agree that authorities respond to behavioral threats with repression. That is, the more threatening a movement or protest event is to political elites the more likely it is to be the target of repression (Earl 2003; Earl, Soule and McCarthy 2003; Earl 2006). Yet it is not clear how this process works, and how the process varies in a context of high mobilization of unemployed workers.

Using newspaper data, in this paper I test police action during protest events in Argentina between 1998 and 2006 with the aim of understanding, what precisely do authorities respond to. Furthermore, and drawing on research on protest policing (Davenport et al 2011; Earl 2003; Earl et al 2003; Earl and Soule 2006), the criminalization of protest (Svampa & Pandolfi 2004), and on unemployed and informal workers collective action (Garay 2007) I will analyze whether protesters social class matters. Specifically, are marginal groups depicted as violent and dangerous by authorities and the media? Are pickets subject to more and harsher repression?

Put simply, the repression, control and policing of protests in democratic Latin America has not received much attention. By using newspaper data on protest events this study seeks to address this omission.

Workers center: From activism to survival

Immigrants are many times at greater risk of being injured and exploited (Chang 2000; Cranford 2005) on the job than native-born workers. Some immigrants also face language barriers and suffer discrimination (Hondagneu-Hondagneu-Sotelo 2001; Salazar Parreñas 2001). Such is the case of day laborers in the United States who, in addition, often don't have legal documents that allow them to work. Thus, in order to find their way in the world of work in the US many immigrant day laborers seek the assistance of community organizations. A specific type of community organization is the workers' center that provides opportunities for organizing collective actions as well as training, legal assistance, and English tutoring among other services.

Based on ethnographic research on day laborer organizing, in this paper I look at the methods that a worker center uses to mobilize day laborers to fight for better work conditions, wages and rights while at the same time subsist as an organization.

La construcción de represas en la cuenca del río Uruguay y el proceso de corporatización del territorio

La intensificación de la extracción y explotación de los recursos naturales en Sudamérica -a través de grandes proyectos de infraestructura- está poniendo en relieve nuevas fronteras de exclusión y de dominación. Como ha señalado Harvey, la actual etapa de expansión del capital conlleva un proceso de acumulación por desposesión, ocasionando un deterioro social y ambiental sin precedentes en el planeta tierra.

El caso de la cuenca trinacional del río Uruguay que abarca territorios de Argentina, Brasil y Uruguay -con sus diez represas construidas, dos proyectos en construcción y seis en etapa avanzada de planificación- posibilita el análisis de la materialización del modelo energético implantado en la región desde la mitad de los años noventa. En ese contexto, la ponencia tiene como principales interrogantes: ¿agua y energía para qué? ¿Para quién?

El abordaje propuesto se enfocará en el proceso de corporatización del territorio de la cuenca del río Uruguay ocasionado por emprendimientos hidroeléctricos. En este marco, vamos destacar el rol de los Estados Nacionales, especialmente el brasilero, en la planificación y en el financiamiento de dichos proyectos que tienen ocasionado la privatización de la tierra, la sobreexplotación del patrimonio natural común y la expulsión del territorio de campesinos (as), pescadores (as), comunidades indígenas y arrendatarios (as), por ejemplo.

La diversidad cultural presente – grupos de otros países y/o comunidades, etnias, género, edad- comienzan a (re)construir novedosos procesos que modifican las formas sociales y culturales de ejercer la vida política en la ciudad en las demandas de dar luz a estos grupos como sujetos de derecho. Ante esto, es posible observar la convivencia de diversas formas de pensar "lo cultura" que complejizan la gestión y acción de las prácticas y los espacios culturales. En este escenario, los productores culturales han sido (re) significados como (re)creadores de beneficios económicos y políticos generando una fragmentación local y regional en relación a las posibilidades de las minorías de acceso o no a "lo cultural". No obstante, el aumento poblacional de las últimas décadas y la fragmentación socio-económica ha situado las cualidades culturales como habilidades de acceso en ciertas minorías. Nuevos desafíos de la política económica de América Latina mediante la producción de conocimiento: Desafíos de la política de estado en Venezuela

América Latina en su conjunto viene manteniendo un crecimiento económico casi sostenido desde comienzo de la primera década de este siglo, aún en medio de la recesión económica mundial iniciada en el 2008 hasta nuestros días básicamente en los Estados Unidos y países de Europa. La producción de materias primas que es uno de los factores más importantes de la economía de estos países se constituye, en medio de la crisis, en una actividad con significativa demanda en el mercado internacional.

La ventaja en algunos de estos países se expresa en el desarrollo industrial y socioproductivo generado por la diversificación de las materias primas, estas capacidades son producto de una madurez del Estado y de la práctica de formulación e implementación de políticas públicas basadas en la generación y aprovechamiento del conocimiento.

Otros países de la región vienen fortaleciendo sus políticas sociales producto de los ingresos que genera la producción de materias primas, como es el caso de Venezuela, país productor de petróleo con las mayores reservas internacionales de este producto en el mundo. Se trata de un país donde el desarrollo socio-económico depende fundamentalmente de la renta petrolera, prácticamente sin una cultura de producción suficientemente madurada para conectar la economía y el conocimiento.

El siguiente trabajo tiene como objetivo analizar los aspectos estructurales que conforman la articulación de la economía con el conocimiento y caracterizarlos dentro de la visión y papel del Estado. Para ello se analizará las políticas científicas y tecnológicas de Venezuela y su relacionamiento con la política económica, lo que permitirá visualizar el impacto de dichas políticas en la reducción de la pobreza y crecimiento exportador.

La literatura existente sobre la relación usos del agua vs Estado en México ha sido enfatizada a partir de los espacios hidráulicos generados y construidos por el Estado en el país como los grandes distritos de riego, los sistemas de agua potable, las grandes presas, entre otros, se ha dejado de lado la multiplicidad de espacios hidráulicos que han surgido de la organización de la población para responder a la satisfacción de sus necesidades, tanto básicas como productivas como lo son las unidades de riego, las juntas de agua, entre otras. Cada vez mas se requiere conocer la capacidad autogestiva y organizativa de la diversidad de los espacios hidráulicos que se han generado en el país y que requieren una atención de las instituciones y del diseño de políticas. En este trabajo presentaremos los cambios en la legislación, la operacionalización diversa en distintos espacios hidráulicos, la importancia de las organizaciones y acuerdos "no formales". Concrete and imaginary: Meanings of Roosevelt Square, São Paulo

The objective of this work is to observe how social sentiments are constructed in a public space through examining the case of Roosevelt Place. Located in downtown São Paulo, this square has been used in diverse ways over the course of its existence. This paper reads and articulates discourses, images, and narratives about the plaza, a space with on-going changes related to its meaning and significance.

In this way, time and space receive treatment in considering communication in urban life. Regarding questions of time, the square is considered to be the confluence of memories of the past and projects for the future. As such, this study seeks to relate residual feeling of past dynamics, emerging ways of thinking about space, and institutional proposals and projects.

This study focuses on three main questions: the construction of a narrative of the decline of the region, the square as an image of a place where one can be free, and the official and market notions about the space.

The square's concrete structure has been created as part of an official project to increase the road network of São Paulo, during the Brazilian military government. Before this, Roosevelt Square was a residual area used as parking lot and surrounded by sophisticated nightclubs. When the concrete plaza was founded (in 1970), it was taken as a civic place according to the discourse of the regime. But, soon, the image of civism was denied and another social narrative has been formulated, one that involves images of decadence and technical critiques for the project. At the same time, different versions were being formulated by several groups that have used the square: gays, rappers, skaters, artists and others. Recently, the plaza is passing by a process of culturalization, and ghosts of ancient imaginaries reappear in the public debate.

The female fashion body: Construction and reproduction of images found in vogue Brazil

The main objective of this project is to analyze the images of the female body found in the fashion magazine Vogue Brazil, more specifically in its December issue of 2011. Following the line of thought of Lipovetsky (1989), who says that fashion is running our society because the principles of seduction and the ephemeral became the organizers of modern collective life. Therefore, fashion would not only be an esthetic device, but the cornerstone of the process of functioning of liberal societies. Among the diversity of sub-themes that fashion studies offer, the bodiliness occupies a prominent place. In a context which both image and appearance are essential, our body is configured as the center of attention, along with clothing. According to Foucault (2010), it is because of the bodiliness that many discursive conformations emerge, producing "truths" that recreate the sense of present body or its individual/collective sensitivity. So, with the ultimate goal, which is the consumption, fashion reconceptualize the body status and invests symbolically in it, aiming to seduce consumers and sell goods or materials, people and things, according to Villaça (2007). As I refer to the fashion body, I focus my analysis on the stereotyped body broadcasted in the media (magazines, editorials, advertising materials), and which is presented in fashion shows as the body of the models. The "physical capital" is the passport for the entry of women in this profession, in which you must follow fashion trends, meeting the demands of a dynamic and rigorous market. How is this capital worked in these advertising materials? What are the values that the images attempt to reproduce? These are the questions that guide this research, which is still in its early stages.

Les marchés de l'emploi flexible et la profession d'ingénieur

Le panorama en Argentine ainsi comme dans plusieurs pays latino-américains, montre que les processus de « institutionnalisation » du professionnel est plus faible que dans les pays développés. Mais dans certains cas, comme dans les diverses formes de l'ingénierie, ces processus ont eu une importante répercussion dans le développement et elles sont aussi en rapport avec les paradigmes de croissance dans des niveaux éducatif et politique.

Pendant les décennies d'expansion de la substitution des importations, l'augmentation de l'immatriculation, du nombre de professeurs et des gens diplômés, ainsi comme le nombre d'étrangers invités et la participation de ceux qui ont accompli la Carrière dans des diverses activités, montrent qu'il existe une « masse critique » d'ingénieurs qui est consolidée de plus en plus dans tout le pays. La réalisation de Congrès Nationaux, la création de Centres d'Association et Contrôle de la Profession, l'existence de magazines spécialisées ou des organes d'expression des idées, les Centres d'Association Syndicale et la quantité des œuvres construites ou le milieu où leur participation est stratégique, font preuve du degré d'association entre le développement de cette profession et la croissance du pays.

Les dernières décennies montrent une crise de ces professions traditionnellement établies comme celle de l'ingénierie, due aux changements dans le marché du travail professionnel et dans la structure productive. En bref, la façon de comment cela affecte l'exercice professionnel, la qualité de vie et les aspirations professionnelles des ingénieurs. En plus, quelle est l'incidence de la flexibilité des marchés du travail, la segmentation de ces marchés, ou la hétérogénéité et la coexistence des différents marchés de travail face aux trajectoires de carrière interne de l'entreprise, mais aussi pour l'insertion dans le marché ouvert.

A case study of disability, economic globalization in India

People with disabilities are one of the most disenfranchised groups in India. Standardized measurements of disability in India and internationally have overlooked the linkages between the economy and disability. In recent decades, neo-liberal economic reforms imposed in developing countries, under pressure from international financial institutions, have downsized state role, privatized social goods, and encouraged export-led strategies and market-based economics. India's economic reforms, initiated in 1991, have led to rapid economic growth that is, however, increasingly mal-distributed.

This paper investigates the implications of economic restructuring in the arenas of social programs, education, employment, accessibility, health, agriculture and food security, and water and land acquisition from a disability perspective. Our analysis shows that while increased employment opportunities and accessibility have benefitted middle-class and highly-skilled disabled persons, the majority of people with disabilities have been left out of India's economic affluence. We contend that India's globalized economy and reduced state role necessitate renewed understanding of human rights, including disability rights.

The role of Indian judiciary with special reference to global I P regime

Intellectual Property pertains to invention/creation/innovation of any artistic, literary, scientific creation, concept etc. by human intellect. Intellectual property rights refer to rights vested by the state to the inventor or creator. IPR is a strong tool, to protect investments, time, money, effort and the like invested by the inventor/creator of an Intellectual Property, since it grants the inventor/creator an exclusive right for a certain period of time for use of his invention/creation. Thus IPR, in a way, aids the economic development of a country by promoting healthy competition and encouraging industrial development and economic growth. Lately due to globalization, easy accessibility to information, technology, development of innovative models of business and shrinking of trade barriers by formation of groups and associations of countries like EU, SAARC, NAFTA, G-8 etc. intellectual property has acquired a trans-boundary effect making it increasingly vulnerable to infringement. The judiciary can play vital role in protection of private and other rights which will eventually depend upon the perceptions of those who have to struggle and acquire it. It is therefore essentiality that they thoroughly realize the nature of the rights recognized by law, the need for their protection and the steps required to be taken in case of urgent matters. The Judicial Academy is established for providing periodic grooming and refreshers which can keep the decision maker abreast of the requirements of time and situations and be aware of the significant role that they have to play.

Understanding population ageing in India: A case study of Maharashtra

Maharashtra, in the west peninsular region of India, is the third largest, one of the most industrialized and urbanized, affluent Indian state. Geographically it constitutes 9.84 per cent of the total area of India and is the second most populated state after Uttar Pradesh. Its economic growth and achievements are comparable to that of East Asian countries. The state produces 19 per cent of the country's industrial output, 15 per cent of service output, and about 13 per cent of its Gross Domestic Product.

Maharashtra is rapidly ageing. It is the fifth Indian state with the highest concentration of elderly population. In merely 16 years, nearly 13 percent of state's population will be the elderly. The number of older persons in India has increased nearly four times since 1950s. The 2001 census noted around 76.6 million elderly; their figure is expected to rise to 1149 million by the mid-21st century. According to the Population Division of United Nations although the world elderly population will remain concentrated in the economically developed countries, the number of elderly will be disproportionately large in two densely populated countries, India and China.

It is urgent and important to understand the ageing phenomenon in India. Findings from a detailed analysis of Maharashtra's ageing shows that on aggregate population is ageing but the phenomenon is largely localized in some districts, associated with the rural areas, particularly those having lower standard of living, higher fertility levels, lower degree of urbanization and poor agricultural conditions. The experience of economically advanced countries has been to the contrary. Therefore, this paper draws insights into how to understand ageing in India, with reference to Maharashtra; investigates the extent to which distress internal migration influences ageing at district level; also develops a critique of perspectives and policy approaches towards population ageing in India.

La construction de l'ouvrier polyvalent par le SENAI-RJ au Brésil

La recherche porte sur l'ouvrier qui sort des cours professionnels du Service National d'Apprentissage Industriel (SENAI) dans le cadre de la restructuration productive qui a caractérisé le développement du capitalisme dans les années 90 au Brésil. Le SENAI est une des principales écoles qui forment les ouvriers brésiliens, maintenue par les entrepreneurs de l'industrie brésilienne. Le SENAI a changé vers la moitié des années 90 sa grille curriculaire et sa pratique pédagogique pour répondre à la demande du nouveau standard de production capitaliste. Notre propos a été dédoublé en deux moments distincts. Dans un premier moment, nous avons analysé comment le SENAI a réalisé la formation des apprentis qui sortaient comme les nouveaux ouvriers du secteur métal-mecanique à Rio de Janeiro. Pour cela, nous avons identifié les nouvelles habiletés, le nouveau savoir-faire, les nouveaux principes, les valeurs que le SENAI a inculqué aux apprentis et les nouvelles compétences. Dans un deuxième moment, nous avons appréhendé les perceptions et les représentations de ces apprentis et aussi de leurs maîtres sur les expériences qui ont été éprouvés, en ce qui concerne les changements qui ont eu lieu dans le monde du travail et aussi dans le processus d'apprentissage industriel au SENAI. Enfin, nous avons essayé de montrer la dimension et le rôle du SENAI dans la formation des ouvriers de l'industrie.

Violencia simbólica, discursos mediáticos y reproducción de exclusiones sociales

El fenómeno del despojo se ha desarticulado, de las formas como los grupos sociales elaboran y reproducen significados. El estudio de fenómenos sociales como la exclusión se ha asociado al tema del ingreso, dejándose de lado el papel de lo simbólico en la estabilización de las jerarquías y las brechas sociales. Los medios de comunicación se constituyen en actores capaces de participar en la dinámica social ya sea contribuyendo a la integración social o, por el contrario, a la fragmentación y a la desintegración de la vida comunitaria. En este trabajo se aborda la relación entre los procesos de mediatización y la representación de los fenómenos del despojo y la exclusión. Cuando desde las instancias mediáticas se construyen discursos que refieren a los actores armados del conflicto colombiano.

Se parte de la idea de que el despojo se asocia a la violencia simbólica, y que se lleva a cabo cuando un agente, impone una visión social como la única autorizada, negando la alteridad de quienes difieren de la construcción dominante (Bourdieu, 2000). Se asume que la acción mediática ha agudizado la violencia social y política en Colombia y, a través de ella, ha incidido sobre la reproducción de sistemas de exclusión. Así, la representación mediática de los actores armados del conflicto se inserta en la pugna entre la necesidad de democracia y reducción de las brechas sociales, y los intereses de los actores sociales que desde posiciones dominantes aspiran a incidir en la construcción de opiniones públicas, en la generación de consensos y, en la acción social (Pardo 2008b).

Las consecuencias ambientales de la reproducción del poder económico en el conurbano Bonaerense

Este trabajo analiza la reproducción del poder económico a través de la relación entre grandes empresas y sus consecuencias ambientales en un barrio de clase trabajadora del Conurbano Bonaerense.

El barrio seleccionado para llevar adelante el estudio es similar a otros territorios relegados en Argentina, no obstante lo que lo distingue es: la ubicación estratégica de grandes industrias, la desigualdad social plasmada en la presencia de barrios cerrados y populares y la extensión de la contaminación del agua que afecta a sus habitantes.

El trabajo será abordado a partir del método de los directorios cruzados de las grandes empresas, el cual se encuadra dentro del análisis de redes; documentos; y resultados de muestras de agua tomadas por el Taller de Aguas (FCEyN, UBA).

Este trabajo aportará conocimiento sobre la injusticia e inequidad ambiental mostrada a partir de la interconexión entre las corporaciones, sus prácticas y consecuencias en la contaminación del agua y en la vida de los habitantes del territorio.

Labor politics in the United States and South Africa

In the 1980s the United States labor movement reached new lows in union density and was detached from non-labor social movements. In contrast, the South African labor movement was growing rapidly and increasingly connected to the broader anti-Apartheid movement. But in the 1990s and 2000s they swapped places. The American labor movement began to organize low-wage workers, and became involved in struggles around immigrant rights. Meanwhile, union density in South Africa stalled and organized labor became detached from insurgencies in the townships and informal settlements.

To explain these trends I develop the concept of labor politics, which has two components: workplace politics, defined by the extent to which organized labor seeks to organize new members; and community politics, defined by the extent to which organized labor seeks to build ties with non-union organizations and movements. I argue that labor adopts an outward-looking politics when it is weak and seeking to build strength. This means it will embrace new segments of the workforce when union density is low, and seek alliances with non-labor organizations and movements when it is detached from the state and politically weak. Workplace politics and community politics are mutually reinforcing, and thus tend to mirror each other.

The divergent trajectories of labor politics in the United States and South Africa reflect divergent patterns of membership growth and state incorporation. Whereas union density declined and labor became detached from the state in California, union density increased and labor became incorporated into the state in Gauteng. In California this produced an outward-looking labor politics, with reinforcing efforts to organize new segments of the workforce and build ties with non-labor actors. In Gauteng this produced an inward-looking labor politics, with limited efforts to organize the growing precarious workforce and build ties with community struggles.

Politics of the marginalized in the United States and South Africa

Recent scholarship points to the rise of new classes that are not organized into unions. They are variously labeled "precariat", "informal proletariat", and "sub-proletariat". These new classes share a combination of economic and political marginalization: they have a lower standard of living than unionized workers, lack political power, and often have restricted rights and legal protections. While identifying the new classes, however, scholars have paid little attention to their politics. They are often assumed to be disorganized and without a politics at all.

This paper addresses the gap by theorizing and examining marginalized politics. Following Nancy Fraser, I posit that marginalized politics has two dimensions: politics of redistribution, which pertain to the distribution of goods and services; and politics of recognition, which pertain to status and respect. Due to uneven patterns of economic and political development, the content of each politics varies across locations within the world system.

I explore this variation empirically by examining marginalized politics in two places where they have been particularly visible: California, United States and Gauteng, South Africa. In California the marginalized have economic leverage because they are incorporated into the economy as low-wage workers, but they are politically excluded as non-citizens. This leads to market-oriented politics of redistribution, which take the form of struggles against employers, and state-oriented politics of recognition, which take the form of struggles for immigrant rights. In Gauteng the marginalized have political leverage because they are South African citizens, but they are largely excluded from the formal economy. This leads to state-oriented politics of redistribution, which take the form of struggles for basic service delivery, and market-oriented politics of recognition, which take the form of attacks against non-citizens.

The transformers. Dealing with citizenship as undocumented migrants

This paper aims at recapturing citizenship through biographies of Korean "illegal" migrants in Japan in early postwar period.

Just after the Second World War, enormous number of people migrated to Japan from Korea, Taiwan and China, because of conflicts and civil wars due to the Cold War. At the same time, in many regions where had been the parts of Japan Empire had to refine their borders and migration systems, dealing with mass traffic of people on one hand and wars and conflicts on the other. Citizenship as system in East Asian countries was largely re-established during this period, from late 1940s to early 1950s.

One of the citizenship systems which were introduced in this period was finger printing registration. This system was introduced to Japan and South Korea almost at the same time, in order to control this traffic and to capture "illegal migrants" who were thought as "communists". The system originates in Japan's colonial management in Manchukuo, and encouraged by Occupational Forces. Through the registration, "illegal migrants" in Japan were made to be outsiders from their homelands, immigrated societies, and even from their own ethnic group members who had lived "legally" in Japan.

However, such "illegal migrants" neither were just subjects of systems nor remained suppressed; they negotiate their citizenship and tried to live where they wanted, even sometimes with different legal identities.

In my presentation, citing written documents from and about "illegal migrants", I first figure out hidden historical ties in Japan, South Korea and United States, which tried to capture nationals through fingerprinting registration. Then, using biographical interviews from "illegal migrants", I turn to the migrants' experiences. Their experiences of exclusion and obtaining quasi-citizenship will cast light to another aspect of citizenship, which performed and negotiated in our daily lives.

Transformation of citizenship

This paper aims at recapturing citizenship and boundary making from viewpoints of "illegal" or undocumented Korean migrants in Japan in early postwar period.

Recent historical surveys have discovered a large flow of people 'illegally' migrated to Japan just after the Second World War. Since the defeat of Japan meant the beginning of conflicts and civil wars in China and Korean Peninsula, enormous number of people had to leave their hometowns and families. At the same time, in many regions where used to be the parts of Japan Empire had to refine their border and migration systems, dealing with mass traffic of these people on one hand and wars due to the Cold War on the other. Citizenship and nationality registration systems in East Asian countries were largely established during this period, from late 1940s to early 1950s.

One of the citizenship and nationality registration systems which was introduced in this period was finger printing registration. This system was introduced to Japan and South Korea almost at the same time, in order to control this traffic and to capture "illegal migrants" who were thought as "communists". The system originates in Japan's colonial management in Manchukuo, and encouraged by Supreme Commander for Allied Powers.

However, these "illegal migrants" were not just subjects of systems; they negotiate their citizenship and tried to live where they wanted, even sometimes with different legal identities.

First, citing written documents from and about "illegal migrants", I figure out hidden historical ties in Japan, South Korea and United States, which tried to capture nationals through fingerprinting registration. Planning for appropriation: Public space led development to counteract territorial stigmatization

In a recent effort the municipality of Malmö, Sweden has sought to increase citizen involvement and active participation in the governance of public space as a platform for creating social integration and raising the status of stigmatized areas. It is hoped that the citizens themselves once these platforms are available will contribute to reversing the stigmatization of an area both by addressing undesirable behaviors directly but also indirectly through the symbolic value created by cared-for public space. The central concern of this paper is the comparison of three attempts by the municipality at creating forms co-governance of public space as a means of social integration along a central path or route connecting affluent parts of the city with less affluent and stigmatized areas. The examples illustrate what may be considered planning for appropriation, where local government actively encourages specific groups to appropriate public space in order to shape social interaction. The first case analyzed is an attempt to break-up the mono-functional housing in the area by introducing small shops and thus create a greater diversity and increasing the number of 'eyes on the street'. The second case concerns encouraging the use of municipal parks for community gardening, once again to increase diversity and presence in underused space but also to build social capital and efficacy in a broad sense. The third case is concerned with creating an outdoor cultural event space to be co-run by the municipality and residents. This event space is also tailored toward providing young women with an opportunity to shape public space. The cases are analyzed in the light of policy making and also in the light of general discussions on the politics of public space.

Youth homicide, gender, and alcohol: Cross national comparisons

The study of youth homicide in North America has been limited by its focus on U.S. data and cross sectional analyses, and by a lack of consideration of alcohol in youth homicide causation. European research has been more dynamic and dealt extensively with the alcohol and violence relationship, but these studies also have limited generalizability. A cross national dynamic analyses of homicide victimization by gender is reported here, as an extension and replication of Gartner's (1990) theoretical model of homicide, with alcohol related concepts integrated into this model. Results based on the analysis of 17 nation states, 1950-2000, provide evidence that two aspects of alcohol related behavior, consumption rates and the drinking culture, interact with divorce to cause youth homicide victimization. Further, gender differences are found in the nature of these interactions; the importance of these results for youth homicide causation and violence prevention policy are discussed.

Avant-garde discourses and the musealization process: The museum of modern art in Rio de Janeiro in the 1960s

This paper attempts to discuss the relationship between the museums and the avant-gardes, regarding the practices of innovation in the arts and their articulation to mnemonic techniques. Seen as modernity's mausoleums, the museums have always been regarded as the aim of the historical avant-garde criticism. As Poggioli strengthened, the residues of nihilism and agonism have shaped the relationship between avant-gardes and institutions. However, as Andreas Huyssen after Peter Burger has shown, the avant-garde project of relating art to life, once hosted and exhibited by museums, has given shape to new practices and perhaps to a musealization process. The preeminence of curatorial practices, the emphasis on the foundation of cultural centers and the educative policies on exhibitory institutions are some of the consequences now related to a series of exhibitions that hosted and welcomed avant-garde art.

Presenting research results, this paper attempts to understand how the Museum of Modern Art (MAM) in Rio de Janeiro, in incorporating the avant-gardes discourses, has given shape to new musicological techniques and to social practices that can now be related to mass culture museums. I shall also underline how those changes in 1960s have deepened roots in the art world, ordering the foundation of new art institutions in the city. I shall, therefore, try to understand the consequences of these processes through the analysis of a new institution, namely the Museum of Art in Rio de Janeiro (MAR), expected to open in 2012, as part of the urban interventions for the 2016 Olympic Games. Finally, I shall discuss whether those practices have indeed contributed to the democratization process they claimed to engender.

Representing race: Reproducing whiteness in the public imaginary

Cultural discourses regarding the presence, meaning and value of marginalized racialized groups are entangled with battles for visibility. Even as cultural practices move toward greater inclusion, the hegemonic stability of whiteness can be reproduced with apparent ease. In this paper, I consider the reproduction of whiteness through racial significations in popular media. I examine a variety of images from news, editorials, and advertising to develop insight into public discourses and cultural assumptions about the meanings of race while attending to intersections of class, gender and sexuality.

All forms of signification are polemical, strategic relations of power. The efficacy of this power depends on people being predisposed to accepting an image or expression as a legitimate form representation—even if such representation is a caricature or a joke. If processes of signification seem tangential to material inequalities, it is worth remembering that political and economic power are most often exercised—not as brute force or overt oppression, but as legitimate relationships, embedded in hegemonic forms of symbolic capital. In an era where open expressions of racism are less tolerated than in the past, it is important to understand the cultural logics through which white racial domination continues to assert itself. This paper considers how groups are racialized within and across national boundaries in ways that sustain the cultural hegemony of whiteness.

Seeing violence where It is unseen: Violence as a structure forming masculinities in political youth organizations

For the analysis of political masculinities, 'violence' becomes a central structure and a basic tool for the analysis of the 'gendering' of politics within political organizations. Beyond the structural level, the spheres of activity and experience of the individuals and groups within organizations enable a constant 'being' in relation to violence, politicizing violence and even theorizing violence.

As becomes clear, violence cannot be limited to men's violence, as there is the danger of isolating violence from the rest of social life. Many explanations about the gendering of violence have focused on individual male psychologies, on socialization experiences of boys and men, on sub-cultures of men, on societal patriarchal structures and trans-societal processes. In the case of violence in political youth organizations and its connections to the formation of male subjectivities, 'violence' can take all the above theorizations. What becomes even more crucial for the understanding of violence and its gendering character, however, is that it becomes a structural pattern of men's individual and interpersonal violence.

Individuals and groups within political youth organizations in Greece are subjected to state and institutional violence and are in the centre of structural relations of institutions that are historically violent, such as patriarchy and capitalism. Even if individuals have agency concerning the de-construction of dominant patterns of violence, this is indeed very demanding and often impossible, not least because this process is quite beyond individual control. At this point I might argue that certain moments of resistance and break with dominant violent practices, representations and discourses are constituting factors of various forms of masculinities within political youth organizations.

Prevención social del delito orientada a jóvenes en la ciudad de Buenos Aires

El presente trabajo se propone abordar el despliegue de una estrategia local de prevención del delito en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires en el período 2008-2010.

La política pública analizada, denominada originalmente como Programa Comunidades Vulnerables —en adelante el Programa—, tiene por destinatarios a "jóvenes vulnerables, en conflicto con la ley penal o en riesgo de estarlo" y fue construida como el dispositivo destinado a poner en marcha una lógica de prevención social del delito orientada a jóvenes, en el marco de una propuesta más amplia de prevención integral del delito que supo ser de escala nacional hasta el año 2008 (el Plan Nacional de Prevención del Delito).

Metodológicamente recurriré al análisis de entrevistas realizadas entre julio de 2008 y febrero 2010 a operadores y ex operadores del Programa en la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, a coordinadores y ex coordinadores del mismo y a aquellos técnicos que participaron en el diseño y coordinación del Plan Nacional de Prevención del Delito. En el mismo sentido, se analizarán las entrevistas a los responsables de otras políticas públicas que se articularon de modo diverso con el Programa específicamente analizado, así como las realizadas a algunos de sus destinatarios.

Asimismo, serán analizados en calidad de fuentes secundarias documentos públicos y de curso interno vinculados al Programa y a las características que asumió en la jurisdicción seleccionada.

Como fuerte emergente del análisis se señalará la tensión entre un diagnóstico que insiste sobre problemáticas estructurales y una práctica focalizada que es intrínsecamente incapaz de lidiar con ese mismo diagnóstico.

Desde el proceso brasileño de democratización que se inició en la década de 1980, ofrece una vista panorámica que se extiende hasta finales de 2010 como el curso que se inició en la asimilación de los principios relativos a los derechos humanos en el país. Estos cambios fueron consagrados con la aprobación de dos ordenanzas que se puede entender como un símbolo de las posibilidades que se abren a la política de seguridad pública en este momento. Señal para la consolidación de un nuevo paradigma que incluye el respeto de los derechos humanos a través de las acciones del Ministerio de Justicia y el Nacional de Seguridad Pública y Ciudadanía. Aunque controvertido, el papel del sector tercero se ha destacado en este sentido a la creciente necesidad de preparar a los jóvenes para acceder al mercado laboral. Las consideraciones planteadas en el estudio se ponen con el fin de equipar a los debates sobre la cuestión. En general, la oferta de formación profesional a los jóvenes se asocia con la posibilidad de la inclusión social. A pesar de que es necesario implementar políticas públicas que garanticen la formación y el empleo y la generación de ingresos, e incluso bajo fundamental para despolitizar la lucha por las políticas, el papel del tercer sector en este ámbito es fundamental.

Indigenous communities: Demographic and socio-economic conditions of scheduled tribes in India

Indigenous population has been estimated as 300 million by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, United Nations, Geneva whereas International Work Group on Indigenous Affairs (IWGIA) has estimated it as 350 million at the start of 21st century. This is just fewer than 6% of the world population.

The vast regions of Asia contain the majority of the world's present-day Indigenous populations, about 70% according to IWGIA figures. The most substantial populations are in India collectively referred as Adivasis. These are constitutionally recognized as Scheduled Tribes. The Constitution of India defines Scheduled Tribes as such tribes or tribal communities or part of or groups within such tribes or tribal communities as are deemed under Article 342. According to the 2001 census, the ST population in India is 84.3 million which is about 8.2% of the total population.

The paper focuses on description of demographic and socio-economic conditions of the Scheduled Tribes in India after independence in 1947. The secondary data from Census of India, 1951 to 2001 have been used. The description of Scheduled Tribes has been done with special reference to demographic situation (share of Scheduled Tribes in total population,

Participatory watershed management: A review of studies on Ralegan Siddhi Village in India

In the developing countries there is increasing demand of water but at the same time diminishing availability of water. This is one of the environmental challenges which are being faced by these countries. India is a country where majority of the population lives in villages and two-third of agriculture is dependent on rain. So water as a natural resource has the significant place in Indian agriculture. Though India receives 400 million hectare-metres (mham) of precipitation primarily as rain, it faces water shortage. The Green Revolution in India had little effect in the rain fed, semi-arid regions. Agricultural productivity remained low and natural resources were degrading. In 1980s and 1990s, planners turned to watershed management to develop rain fed agriculture while conserving natural resources. The strategies ranged from the purely technical to those that emphasized social organisation. The projects involving the villagers in planning and decision making are being implemented.

The paper reviews concepts of sustainable natural resource management and participatory watershed management. It analyses situation of Ralegan Siddhi village in India where efforts were initiated by non-state actors for participatory watershed management. Anna Hazare is the main architecture in the transformation of the village. His thoughts on watershed management and five rules for villagers have been discussed. The paper reviews studies with reference to impact of watershed development programmes and the Govt. of Maharashtra's plan of replication through Ideal Village Scheme.

This study aims to discuss how the hierarch between teaching and bachelor degrees reflects the gender inequality. The lower prestige and status of teaching degrees in relation to bachelor degrees has been shown in studies of power relationship in academic field as well as studies about the socioeconomic and cultural profile of students in higher education in Brazil. We intended to discuss specifically gender inequality, related to the feminization of teaching.

It is known that teaching in Basic Education in Brazil has a low attractiveness. This study tries to understand the profile of students and its impact on education in schools.

We analyzed the students of several courses from different areas of expertise at the Federal University of Minas Gerais (UFMG): Biology, of Biological Sciences area, Physical Education, of Health Sciences area, Physics, of Exact and Earth Sciences area, History, of Human Sciences, Geography, of the area of Applied Social Sciences, and Letters, of the area of Linguistics, Literature and Arts.

This study will discuss gender, socioeconomic and cultural differences between students in teaching and bachelor degrees analyzing data collected by the University. But it will also verify if there are differences in the quality of academic performance of the students, by analyzing the ratio of income of the students as well as information regarding their involvement in academic activities. Finally we will analyze the provisions which congregate for career choice and conceptions of how students perceive themselves as located in a hierarchical scale of values, conducting interviews with them.

Informal labour in recession and growth: A new structural feature of labour markets in Argentina?

During the last years, Argentina has undergone a 'miraculous' recovery that involved unprecedented growth rates and a swift reversal of the record levels of unemployment and poverty that had accompanied the recession and crisis of the late 1990s and early 2000s. The shifts in macroeconomic policymaking that occurred in 2002 and 2003 helped both to boost the competitiveness of the domestic economy and to revitalize the domestic market. Accompanying these shifts, the government's discourse departed from the neoliberal blueprint and started to argue for the reregulation of the economy as a way to achieve growth with social inclusion. But these more progressive political goals have been conditioned by the depth of the neoliberal transformation of the economy and the social fabric undergone during the previous decade. GDP growth, lower unemployment and more progressive policies fell short to significantly reduce the high levels of informal employment.

Our paper will examine the scope and limitations of the changes in labour markets and progressive labour policies. To do so we will explore the limitations of policies aimed at increasing employment and reducing the incidence of informality within labour markets. We will also consider the implications of social policy designed to provide precarious alternatives to a sizeable segment of the labour force within the growing sector identified as the social economy. Our aim is thus to show some of the trends in the economic recovery of Argentina that reveals unwavering tendencies toward the segmentation of labour markets.

Social movements, urban reforms and participation: A comparison between Marseilles (France) and Montreal (Canada)

The objective of this paper is to compare the different types of citizens' committees that exist in Montreal (Canada) and Marseille (France). These organizations, which engage inhabitants of specific neighbourhoods, generally struggle against planning urban projects. With this comparison, I seek to question the way in which groups that do not explicitly adhere to any social nor political movements participate in urban conflicts and attract the attention of political representatives. The comparison between Montreal and Marseille is particularly relevant, as both cities have recently implemented consultative and participatory mechanisms. The city of Montreal underwent a complex process of municipal mergers and de-mergers (2000-2002) and is now among the most decentralized cities in the world. Moreover, one of its more progressive and active boroughs, the Plateau Mont-Royal, has announced to adopt a participatory budget. And in Marseille, various decentralization reforms have taken place to adopt several districts and consultative bodies. However, while the Canadian metropolis looks back on a long tradition of citizen involvement and urban conflicts, the Phocaeen city is characterized by a "clientelist management" that has hindered the emergence and collective action of social movements. What have been the consequences of these decentralization reforms on the urban conflicts and on the collective action of citizens' committees? What is the significance of the transformations observed? Do these new consultative/participatory mechanisms promote a better collaboration between municipal representatives and citizens' groups?

To answer these questions, I conducted a field study in two citizens' committees in poor neighbourhoods, followed by an analysis thereof in a larger historical perspective. In this way, the paper engages in a broader reflection about the evolution of urban struggle and its significance for "the spirit of democracy."

The objective of this paper is to compare the different types of citizens' committees that exist in Montreal (Canada) and Marseille (France). These organizations, which engage inhabitants of specific neighbourhoods, generally struggle against planning urban projects. With this comparison, I seek to question the way in which groups that do not explicitly adhere to any social nor political movements participate in urban conflicts and attract the attention of political representatives. The comparison between Montreal and Marseille is particularly relevant, as both cities have recently implemented consultative and participatory mechanisms. The city of Montreal underwent a complex process of municipal mergers and de-mergers (2000-2002) and is now among the most decentralized cities in the world. Moreover, one of its more progressive and active boroughs, the Plateau Mont-Royal, has announced to adopt a participatory budget. And in Marseille, various decentralization reforms have taken place to adopt several districts and consultative bodies. However, while the Canadian metropolis looks back on a long tradition of citizen involvement and urban conflicts, the Phocaeen city is characterized by a "clientelist management" that has hindered the emergence and collective action of social movements. What have been the consequences of these decentralization reforms on the urban conflicts and on the collective action of citizens' committees? What is the significance of the transformations observed? Do these new consultative/participatory mechanisms promote a better collaboration between municipal representatives and citizens' groups?

To answer these questions, I conducted a field study in two citizens' committees in poor neighbourhoods, followed by an analysis thereof in a larger historical perspective. In this way, the paper engages in a broader reflection about the evolution of urban struggle and its significance for "the spirit of democracy."

ICT revolution in India and socio-cultural changes: Sociological explorations

This paper tries to articulate some of the socio-cultural impacts of the globalization induced ICT revolution in India from sociological view points. Having perceived the phenomenon within the framework of social stratification, the paper tries to deal with the, (i) emergence of a new class of capitalists and a new class of elite workforce that has come to be known as ICT/ knowledge workers, (along with its own sub-culture). (ii) Further, the paper tries to sociologically analyze the phenomenon of growing class consciousness among the knowledge workers in terms of being class in itself / class for itself as they displayed conscious resistance to unionize themselves. (iii) The paper also analyzes the phenomenon of embourgeoisement among the knowledge workers in terms of their cultural and social capitals. Thus, based on primary as well as secondary source observations, the paper is a study of India's Techno-Coolie and Cyber-Coolie, as a new class of elite technical workforce, the basis of its identity formation and its emerging sub-culture.

Key words: New class of capitalists, New class of elite workers, Class consciousness, Embourgeoisement, Social capital, Techno coolie and Cyber coolie.

Studying science communications in India, through people's science movements

It hardly needs emphasis that People's Science Movements in India have been very unique and such movements are not seen elsewhere although science popularization/ science communication movements were seen in USA, Europe and Australia. As such social phenomena have caught our academic fascination, we first tried to characterise the phenomenon; second, tried to locate such phenomena historically meaning, locate their socio-historical roots. Lastly through extensive studies of six cases of various types of PSM (Bharat Gyan Vigyan Parishad, Delhi Science Forum, Orissa Bigyan Prachar Samitee, Jan Vijnan Vedica, Paschim Bango Bigyan Mancha, and Marathi Vidyan Parishad) we have tried to analyse them from the view point of social movement perspective.

Mindfulness interventions, disadvantaged students, and the civilizing process

There has been an explosion of "mindfulness" based interventions more or less integrated into educational settings. A few of these have been aimed at highly disadvantaged children and adolescents. According to the scholars describing them, these interventions (strive to) habituate greater capacities for emotional self-control and the use of foresight. This brings us to the heart of what Elias theorized in terms of the formation of more civilized internal steering mechanisms. But the external social constraints and practices supposedly interrelated with these internal transformations seem to be very different than those discovered by Elias. Could secularized versions of an ancient Eastern practice be ushering in a new phase (or dimension) of the civilizing process in the West? And could these new developments be extended to the poorly born students presently attending our worst schools? Might this signal a new role for teachers in distressed schools?

Drawing from nearly six years of fieldwork and teaching experiences in New York and Amsterdam, this paper indicates that what truly disadvantaged teens need to avoid self-destructing in high poverty, high stress secondary schools is remarkably close to what advocates claim to observe being fostered among children and adolescents participating in mindfulness interventions. The paper then attempts to place the relevant findings and claims about short-term habitus formation processes related to mindfulness interventions in a longer-term perspective. Focusing as much on what Elias's helps us see as on what he may have missed, this longer-term perspective will focus on social and self-constraints emerging out of both Western and Eastern epistemologies and practices based body-based learning. Hype or not, the argument is that the flurry of interest in mindfulness in educational settings can at very least help us advance on Elias's theoretical accomplishments.

Sociological underpinnings in pre-service elementary teachers' attitudes towards artworks

While recent approaches for art teaching give substantial emphasis on learners, art lessons are still largely framed by teachers as they are responsible for the opportunities offered for creating art and responding to artworks. Therefore, issues surrounding the way elementary teachers develop their knowledge and attitudes towards art and education inform to a great extent the content of art education at elementary level.

This study focuses on what lies behind pre-service school teachers' attitudes towards artworks and the sociological implications of their choices of artworks on the expected social knowledge that results from them. In particular, it investigates a) the kind of artworks that they are more likely to use in their art-teaching, b) ways to challenge their assumptions and develop their professional adequacy for approaching artworks with children, and c) their beliefs about the role that artworks may have for cultivating social knowledge. A mixed method approach is adopted. The study was carried out in Cyprus and the sample consisted of 91 pre-service elementary school teachers.

The findings suggest that the participants were inexperienced viewers of artworks. When their assumptions about art were challenged through a formalistic approach for understanding artworks, their confidence in understanding artworks and planning art-viewing activities was boosted. However, the participants appeared to have a limited understanding of what art is and reflected a narrow range of ideas and values about art with little or no relevance to the sociological context within which they are produced. In particular, they mostly chose 19th century European male artists' artworks based on the ideas of beauty, realism, skills and expression of feelings and ideas. Implications of this study are discussed within the context of teachers' training programs and ways to enrich participants' professional adequacy to use artworks to address cultural and social issues both locally and globally.

Resisting permanent impermanence: Performances of subordination and resistance, and the possibility of a migrant workers-led movement in Canada

In the recent years Canadian immigration policies have shifted from a model of permanent immigration and settlement to one of 'permanent impermanence' as Temporary Workers Programs (TWP) have greatly expanded in a short period of time. Though TWP's are not a new phenomenon, today Canada accepts more low-skilled workers to work on a temporary basis than permanent immigrants with full citizenship rights. The Canadian state has touted TWP's as successful economic policy that addresses alleged labour shortages, as well as a humane and just migration scheme that matches prospective workers with employers. The recent expansion of TWP's has brought to light numerous cases of abuse and exploitation faced by migrant workers across Canada. In defining these abuses as exceptions, the Canadian state and its provincial counterparts have strategically engaged in piecemeal responses to these abuses by limited legislative reforms or by emphasizing that migrant workers enjoy equal entitlements and legal protections similar to Canadians. However, with the expansion of such programs, also several avenues have widened to raise awareness of the litany of violations faced by migrant workers such unsafe working conditions with little to no protection equipment, exclusion from some schemes of labour legislation, lack of access to health care and very low wages for hard and dangerous jobs. This paper will focus on 1) the performances of subordination and resistance that migrant farmworkers under TWP's simultaneously engage in order to secure participation in the (temporary worker) program while not giving up completely their agency to resist labour exploitation, 2) community grassroots efforts to organize and to counteract the official narratives of the so called 'success' of TWP's programs and the exploitation faced by migrant workers, and 3) the barriers and challenges involved in organizing an 'unfree' and temporary labour force, and in developing a transnational migrant workers-led movement.

La fabrique des politiques sociales en Amérique latine : Des acteurs et processus au basculement de référentiels

Privilégiant une approche cognitive du processus de formation, consolidation et fragilisation du modèle de l'Estado de bienestar latino-américain, cette communication vise à retracer l'évolution historique des référentiels des politiques publiques qui ont façonné les modes d'intervention de l'Etat dans l'économie et le social dans les pays semi-industrialisés de la région – dont l'Argentine, « pionnière » à plusieurs égards, l'a été autrement récemment. Son expérience des trente dernières années permet d'illustrer les questionnements sous-jacents à la problématique du passage de la question sociale à la question politique dans un cadre où la mondialisation économique-financière semble accentuer les contraintes d'alignement des Etats, promouvant des politiques transnationales et l'émergence de nouvelles formes de leadership différenciées dans leur répercussion locale. En toile de fond de l'analyse, qui cherche à dégager une mise en perspective comparative régionale, les notions de régulation et dérégulation se profilent à la base de nombre des transformations de l'action publique et des objectifs et instruments d'intervention sociale. D'autant plus dans des contextes institutionnels moins stabilisés que ceux des sociétés européennes au sein desquelles les formes de l'Etat-providence ont été construites et développées dans le deuxième après-guerre dans le but d'assurer la cohésion sociale.

Dans la restructuration contemporaine de l'Etat social s'articulent différentes logiques, certaines formes de mise en œuvre des politiques publiques, des nouveaux arrangements institutionnels. Revisiter l'expérience latino-américaine récente permet d'examiner les référentiels à l'œuvre dans la redéfinition des politiques sociales dans une période d'ajustement structurel (i.e. des formules de « compensation sociale », promues dans un premier temps, et de « cohésion sociale » diffusées plus tard). Mais vise aussi à identifier les dynamiques de support et d'opposition vis-à-vis des réformes institutionnelles qui permettent de spécifier les compromis résultants des interactions entre acteurs et processus de restructuration dont l'enjeu de management semble être de plus en plus national/transnational.

Social policies strategizing in Latin America: A cognitive return on the regional experience and on the shift of their reference frames

Emphasizing a cognitive approach of the processes of constitution, consolidation and weakening of the Latin American Welfare State model, this paper aims at retracing the historical evolution of public policies' normative frame of reference that have shaped the ways of State's economic and social intervention in the semi-industrialized countries of the region –among those Argentina, which had been a "pioneer" on several aspects and pioneered again although differently in the recent period. Its experience of the last thirty years let us illustrate the main questions underlying the framing of this problem area. In other words, the passage from the social to the political question in the framework of economic and financial globalization which seems to strengthen pressures for the States' alignment, promoting transnational policies as well as new forms of leadership with differentiated local impacts. In the background of an analysis searching to underscore a comparative perspective at the regional scale, the notions of regulation and deregulation appear in tension at the basis of different transformations of public action and of goals and tools of social intervention. Even more in institutional contexts less stabilized than those of European societies, where the Welfare State forms were built and developed during the second Post-War for strengthening social cohesion. Social protection systems are deeply challenged by financial crisis at present. This approach intends to focus on the social policies and their main trends in this context of restructuring. The goal is to identify regarding to the experience of crisis in Latin America, the social construction and reforms of social policies which took place during and after this period, so to discuss the frame of social relationships between restructuring of social State and contemporary definitions of social policies. Our proposal searches to advance some comparative analytical perspectives of this social policy making and results.

Reproductive technologies and systems of kinship

With the advancement of human interventions derived from the numerous discoveries in the field of reproductive technologies in recent decades, new questions arise all the time, challenging research in the humanities. Offering an endless possibility of choices to those who have access to them, corporal interventions and new interventions in the area of human reproduction became now the object par excellence to incite against the construction of narratives that match the complexity of the problems that open up the daily life of common man. Advances in technoscience seem to be making obsolete the criteria that guided the conception of human, putting to rest the possibility of a "natural nature" and bringing us closer to what some authors have termed "post-humanity." Among the issues that challenge us worth mentioning those related to systems of kinship and affiliation at present, to the extent that advances in the technologies of human reproduction shall produce a demand for changes in the parenthood and kinship. The reality of the market offer that expands in semen banks and open the intense search for "genetic ideal types" has brought new effects on the forms of marital and parenthood. We draw particular attention to the challenges that the thinning of the boundaries between nature and technique imposes on the legal field, which is confronted with the emergence of unusual situations for which they have no appropriate parameters.

Social learning within institutions or expanding them? The limits of private governance in environmental politics

Social Learning within institutions or expanding them? The limits of private governance in environmental politics.

During the 1990's main attention has been paid to institutional design and reforms as drivers for social learning. Private governance in the form of voluntary agreements and corporate social responsibility were put on the top of the agenda of environmental politics and global governance. We use to consider accountability, transparency and participation as the main criteria for improving democracy, governance and institutional reform. However, the current impasse of global environmental politics and the recent malaise respecting existing political regimes as well can be conceived as signs of such an exhaustion of this agenda. The aim of the paper is to explore the opportunities for social innovation and institutional experimentation that can be opened, if one increase the tension between the agenda of institutional reform as minimal standards of "good governance" and the normative implications they contain.

Stages of agricultural research in Argentina. / Etapas de la investigación agropecuaria en la Argentina: Cambios en la cantidad de personal del INTA entre 1956 y 2010

The present work aims to analyze the changes in the INTA throughout its history, in relation to the number of staff affected to the institution. INTA (National Institute of Agricultural Technology) is the most important public research center on agricultural issues in Argentina. Created in 1956, INTA has deployed a huge presence throughout the country, developing basic and applied research (in various disciplines) and rural extension activities. This diversity of practices—from knowledge production to technology transfer—for the agricultural sector has gone through various political and economic contexts. Although it has maintained its overall profile, INTA has not been immune to these contextual changes.

This work aims to show one of the fundamental ways in which these changes impact on a research institution, that is, through its human resources. To this end, this paper focuses on a quantitative study, analyzing the changes in recruitments and retirements throughout the institution history. It accounts of these changes not only at the level of the institution as a whole, but also particularizing in some research institutes within the INTA. This analysis, moreover, is supplemented with a qualitative approach to account for certain general features which have marked these stages of Argentina's history and thus relate these macro changes and some measures taken by the INTA with changes in the number of staff at the institution. This way, this study makes evident much of the specific policies that have been implemented in agricultural research in Argentina in the last 55 years.

How current infrastructures shape future democracy: Notes on orphans and belonging in politics of information (technology)

The paper departs from studies of information infrastructure and classification (Bowker and Star, 1999; Star and Griesemer, 1989 amongst others) to frame consequences of classification and ordering with reference to democracy, inclusion and exclusion through politics of information and especially ICTs.

In a society defined as 'knowledge-centred', politics of information (and infrastructures) is crucial to observe and trace the material and immaterial boundaries between 'having' and 'having-nots', going beyond the classical debate on the 'digital divide'.

The paper argues from a theoretical perspective and through exemplary cases in the literature, that current infrastructures shape future democracy in a peculiar way, namely because of processes of inclusion and exclusion of categories, individuals, groups, and practices on different bases. In this sense, the way infrastructures are imagined (discursive technological frames), designed (inscription of global and local politics) and used (by naïve or advanced users) embed visions of current and future social assets, criteria of inclusion/exclusion, politics of belonging and orphanages resulting from the categorization of otherness. Specific attention will be devoted to cumulative effects of inter- and cross-categorizations across different infrastructures, which control and constrain people's everyday lives as well as attitudes, trust towards the future, chances for empowerment and envisage of self and collective improvement.

La responsabilidad social (sobre la violencia) de género. Construir la responsabilidad social a través de los medios de comunicación

Esta contribución trata de cómo la comunicación social representa una manera de construir responsabilidad social, cultura y ciudadana en la sociedad contemporánea.

En esta construcción, un elemento clave es la acción continua de los medios de comunicación tradicionales (prensa, radio y televisión) y nuevos (Internet y los SNS en particular).

Los actores sociales que hacen comunicación social, bien sean instituciones, empresas privadas u organizaciones sin lucro (no profit), representan una señal de cualidad y pluralismo democrático en un contexto socio-cultural.

El caso analizado en la ponencia será el de la violencia de género en particular y, más en general, el de la comunicación en perspectiva de género.

La violencia de género se presenta como una de las primeras causas de fallecimiento de las mujeres en muchos países. El presente trabajo enfoca la situación italiana, y las representaciones de la identidad femenina presentes en los medios de comunicación. La televisión en particular, y la comunicación social a través de la publicidad televisiva, se tendrá en consideración para poner a tema la cualidad de la democracia construida a través del imaginario mediático y las fronteras de la igualdad de género como establecimiento de una más amplia justicia social.

Doing the right thing: Ethics and justice in environmental politics

'Environmental justice' is a label long-applied to social movements which, at different scales and with different ideological orientations, seek to connect environmental protection with social justice. A similar case, on specific theoretical grounds, has been made by Marx-inspired, 'political ecology' movements and intellectuals. Yet in the last twenty years a tendency can be observed towards a weakening of this link. Environmental problems are increasingly depicted as something involving all and everybody on basically the same level. This generalization goes hand in hand with a growing individualization of responsibilities and actions. The depoliticization of environmental issues and struggles, on which no major divides can be found according to traditional left-right alignments, builds on four factors: globalization of threats, manufacturability of nature and uncertainty, technicization of policies and ethicization of behaviours. Taken together these tenets represent what Foucault would define a power/knowledge or truth regime that dramatically narrows the scope of 'doing the right thing', wide-ranging consequences of which are the securitization of life, the commodification of nature and the fundamental failure of policy action (as the likely demise of Kyoto testifies).

The pillars of this regime hold on each other, yet I will argue about the pivotal role of ethics; a role that can be observed at both individual and collective level. The growing relevance of ethics has been extensively elaborated by the governmentality scholarship, yet its emancipatory or subjecting implications remain contentious. Is ethics beneficial or detrimental to justice? To make a step forward I first elaborate on the differences between ancient and current ethics, as resulting especially from the Foucault-Hadot debate; second, I elaborate on the notion of power, at the intersection of three semantic fields; third, I apply these insights to the emergent lines of political division vis-à-vis the economic crisis and the degradation and appropriation of nature.

Infidelity.com - The market for affection and reiterations of familism in betrayal websites

"Life is short, so enjoy a fling". This is the slogan of one of the three websites about extramarital affairs that currently operates in Brazil promising discretion and fun provided by a "controlled" and "safe" practice of marital infidelity. Until August 2011, together, the three websites accounted for 370 thousand users in the country with growth expectations given the massive investment in the marketing and dissemination of their services. Although the "secret betrayal" is the motto used to persuade people to become users, we believe that the main appeal of this service is indeed hidden, i.e., it is an undeclared proposal: to keep familist values, that is to say, to protect the monogamous, and based on our research, heterosexual marriage by offering occasional affairs to customers, which, theoretically, would not interfere in a stable relationship. Infidelity as a sign of a failed relationship seems to be resignified in this online context given the number of men and women who identify themselves as being satisfied with their marriage. Accordingly, "betrayal" would not necessarily mean infidelity, but rather a way to "spice up" the marriage. Analyzing the slogans of the websites, we think that through them infidelity is sold as an adventure that can provide entertainment and pleasure without questioning the monogamous marriage as a model to be followed. In our incipient research, we have been using online ethnography in order to understand the dynamic interactions of these platforms, in which romance and market seem to be associated reiterating bourgeois conventions. These issues refer to the meaning of romantic love, marriage, fidelity, and betrayal in those environments considering, in addition to gender bias, social class and generation divisions. Hence, we use the contributions of anthropology of the emotions, gender studies, and sexuality, as well as contributions of symbolic interactionism and social psychology.

Participation and land reform in Brazil

Since the democratic transition, agrarian reform policies in Brazil have been formulated and implemented with a great degree of social movements' participation. The institution in charge of agrarian reform policies, the National Institute of Colonization and Agrarian Reform (INCRA), was created in 1970 during the military regime, and until 1985, colonization was its priority. However, with the end of the authoritarian regime, rural social movements, such as the Landless Rural Workers Movement (MST), were created and started to claim for agrarian reform.

Since then the MST and other rural social movements have been active not only in pressing for agrarian reform policies, but also in taking part on policy formulation and execution. As a result, a number of policies such as education and rural housing have been implemented by INCRA through the work of social movement activists. Immediately after the creation of an agrarian reform settlement by INCRA, an association of settled families must be organized and legally registered. In most of the cases these associations are affiliated to social movements that organize and coordinate land occupations and encampments, which are informally prior steps in the land reform process in Brazil.

Relationship between the state and rural social movements in Brazil takes place in many different forms during the claiming phase (collective actions, INCRA occupations, negotiations, etc.). Notwithstanding, after the inclusion of landless families in the agrarian reform program, the relationship happens through local settlers associations, which execute policies such as houses construction and credit distribution. This paper analyses these associations and their relationship with INCRA with a view at assessing to what extent they improve democracy, by guarantying the expansion of social rights such as housing and education; and to what extent they mitigate social movement's autonomy while cooperating with INCRA in the implementation of agrarian reform policies.

Re-imagining economic relations and the role of the social welfare state: Perspectives from an Argentine shantytown

Based on ethnographic fieldwork and in-depth interviews in a Buenos Aires shantytown, this research examines how shantytown residents' perceptions and experiences of inequality, marginality, and injustice shape their beliefs about – and collective initiatives to advance – alternative conceptions of economic rights and welfare-state responsibilities. This paper begins by presenting residents' perceptions of instrumental relations, injustice, and power dynamics in processes of economic migration and welfare distribution, through which segments of the population are able to take advantage of extant socioeconomic inequalities and the sociostructural position of shantytown residents in order to advance particular politico-economic agendas. The second section of this paper analyzes collective economic projects and critical discourses that members of the shantytown community have developed in response to their perceptions of inequality, marginality, and injustice. These initiatives reject many of the tenets of neoliberalism and economic development in their current configurations on the grounds that these configurations fail to recognize the humanity and dignity of large segments of society, propagate inequalities in economic capital and agency, and exacerbate relationships of force that emerge between people of different resource levels. In conversation with theoretical frameworks on the welfare state and human-rights initiatives, residents' critical discourses and collective economic projects ultimately suggest that the actualization of economic rights and a more comprehensive welfare agenda depends on beginning to view the fulfillment of basic material thresholds as a means to minimizing relationships of economic dependence and power inequalities instead of as an end in itself. This paper concludes by outlining how residents' alternative economic projects attempt to advance this agenda within specific and limited contexts, and by developing a theoretically and empirically informed analysis of how a rearticulated role of the state could support this agenda in broader contexts and in an effort to work toward a more just future.

Worker's centers: A case study about immigration, work and representation in United States

The issue of migration is a theme that spans many fields of research. We will seek to reflect the theme of migration, in agricultural scope, through the temporary work, as well as the relationships and work conditions on various forms of workers in the current context of global agribusiness. We focus our eyes on the West Coast region of California / USA, featured as one of the leading producers of fruits and vegetables in the U.S. We aim to understand from the context of migrant Mexican labor to the U.S. after the 1970s, the deterioration of living conditions of migrants, and especially to understand how they have been organizing in resistance movements. Our hypotheses is that migration is the result of several effects on social relations of subordination and power, as well as aspirations, desires, income support and family life projects that comprise the complex output frames of decisions of migrants. This path does not proceed unilaterally, or stripped of grounds of opposition. Several models of resistance in search of citizenship and social and economic rights are created as we watch the way the conflict capital and labor are expressed. Therefore, we intend to outline an analysis of working conditions of migrants in the field, as well as the heterogeneous field resistance strategies of these workers, based on the Workers' Centers: non-governmental institutions, formed by Latin leaders, which is proposed assist and support migrants in the destination country.

Desarrollo urbano y política de regularización de tierras: El caso del quilombo de Paratibe y la expansión urbana de la ciudad de João Pessoa – PB, Brazil

Uno de los principales argumentos contra la realización de los derechos de las comunidades tradicionales se basan en la idea de "obstáculo para el desarrollo". Este discurso se alimenta de la idea de que formas arcaicas de organización social, impiden el progreso y el crecimiento económico. Sin embargo, un análisis más crítico de este argumento demuestra que el verdadero conflicto es la batalla por los recursos naturales entre la concepción dominante de desarrollo y los pueblos tradicionales. En este complejo escenario de batalla, característica de los llamados conflictos sócio-ambientales, surge nuestro objeto de estudio: la batalla por el territorio quilombola de Paratibe, entre la especulación del territorio por el desarrollo urbano y su población tradicional. Situado en la costa sur, área urbana de João Pessoa, capital del estado de Paraíba, el territorio reconocido y tradicionalmente ocupado por la comunidad negra de Paratibe, ha pasado por un proceso de desterritorialización de más de veinte años. El creciente valor económico de esta área ha contribuido para el desarrollo urbano y la ciudad ocupar el territorio del quilombo, donde se erigen casas y edificios que interfieren en su tradicional uso colectivo por la comunidad. En este sentido, el objetivo de este estudio es describir la dinámica de este conflicto, y con un enfoque centrado en la presencia o ausencia del Estado, evaluar históricamente cómo la política pública de regularización de la tierra dirigido a este segmento de la población se refleja en este caso. Por lo tanto, el estudio propuesto, parte de una investigación más amplia de tesis de Maestría en el Programa de Postgrado en Desarrollo Regional de la Universidade do Estado da Paraíba (UEPB), usa los conceptos teóricos de temas como Ecología Política; Justicia Ambiental y Racionalidad Ambiental como herramientas para la comprensión de la realidad del caso en reflexión.

Design, culture and consume: A Campana Brothers case study

Globalization can be seen as a new form of capitalist expansion which requires the integration of local economies in a global and unregulated market economy. For large corporations, national elites and people with higher income and education, globalization has brought benefits such as access to technological progress and greater purchasing power. Such economic benefits, however, are beyond the reach of small local producers and low-income population.

From a cultural perspective, the modern citizen feels rooted in local culture, which he identifies with, but at the same time, the communication systems of the global society make this culture surrounded by values and references broadly defined by the markets logic, which imposes a consumerist lifestyle choice.

When abundant consumption desires contrasts with scarce economic resources, a paradox is created, which, in Brazilian culture, is solved by its most typical features - flexibility and adaptability. The aim of this paper is to discuss how that paradox is solved within an area that connects the cultural and the commercial aspects: industrial design. The paper will discuss how design can add value to products and services and turn them into "luxury." To do so, a case study will be presented, analyzing the experience of the Campana Brothers, Brazilian art designers who achieved international recognition for bringing together, based on common and low-cost material, works of acknowledged creativity and Brazilianness.

Expandindo as possibilidades de compreensão da inovação:
Alternativas da sociologia econômica

O desenvolvimento tecnológico, e por consequência a inovação, são temas recorrentes na Teoria Econômica. A sua importância para o desenvolvimento econômico e social dos países é inegável. Todavia, ao abrir mão das discussões sobre a ação econômica, a Sociologia deixou a inovação fora do seu mainstream, apenas a partir de 1990 é que ela passa a ganhar espaço. Visto que o conceito de inovação se caracteriza, entre outras coisas, pelo seu valor econômico no mercado, pode-se considerá-la como uma ação econômica. É a partir desse pressuposto que se defende a ideia de que a Sociologia Econômica (SE) possui o arcabouço necessário para abordar o conceito. O objetivo do artigo é discutir como a SE pode contribuir para a compreensão da inovação, propondo uma agenda de pesquisa que aborde desde as influências sociais sobre o seu surgimento até o impacto na vida social. Para isso, será discutido o conceito de inovação e aspectos da SE para propor uma agenda de pesquisa. Essa agenda pretende discutir três pontos. O primeiro foco de pesquisa para a SE deve ser voltado para os sistemas nacionais e regionais abordando o desenvolvimento econômico. Para além das discussões da Teoria Econômica, que mede o impacto das mudanças tecnológicas no desenvolvimento econômico, a SE discute as condições sociais e institucionais do surgimento dessas mudanças. O segundo foco na agenda é a construção social dos mercados. Toda inovação pressupõe que em pelo menos alguma medida um novo mercado seja criado, mas a criação do mercado não se resume a um espaço de troca de mercadorias, conceitos tipicamente sociológicos. Por fim, a relação entre redes de relações sociais e inovação é outro aspecto de destaque na SE que precisa ser desenvolvido, especialmente em relação ao nível de análise organizacional, ou seja, de que maneira os relacionamentos influenciam a inovação.

Las condiciones de enseñanza y de trabajo de los profesores de sociología en la educación secundaria en Río Grande del Sul, Brasil

El presente trabajo presenta reflexiones acerca de las transformaciones en la educación en Brasil en los últimos veinte años, especialmente cuando se trata de la universalización de la Educación Secundaria y de la inclusión de la Sociología como asignatura obligatoria en este nivel de enseñanza. Ese trabajo trata aún de las condiciones de trabajo de los profesores de sociología y las condiciones de enseñanza de esta asignatura. Se encontró que las condiciones salariales y de trabajo afectan la enseñanza de sociología en la Educación Secundaria, pues cuando uno examina la situación de enseñanza de esta asignatura en algunas escuelas de la ciudad de Porto Alegre, localizada en la provincia del Río Grande del Sul, Brasil había una significativa limitación en la actualización teórica y metodológica de esos profesores. La conclusión es que más allá de la necesidad de reformas estructurales en este nivel de enseñanza, como aquellas de sellos salariales y de las condiciones de trabajo, hay la necesidad, principalmente, de emplear un nuevo abordaje teórico-metodológico para la enseñanza de la sociología en la Educación Secundaria.

Governing drug use among young people: Crime, harm and contemporary drug practices

This paper presents PhD research findings of interviews with thirty young people who use illicit drugs, and fifteen professionals involved in the governance of drugs. The sample of research participants comprised homeless young people, students and workers, who use a variety of different drugs in a range of social and cultural contexts. Respondents working in a professional capacity include police officers, medical doctors, health workers, and drug educators, who were interviewed about their views and roles in the governance of illicit drugs. The paper argues that young people's experiences of drug use are embedded in their social and economic circumstances, cultural norms, and self-identities. Some research participants described their illicit drug use as related to multiple social, legal, and medical problems. However, the majority reported that they use drugs for recreation and fun, and described their drug use as unproblematic. Using Foucault's concept of techniques of the self, the research theorizes young people's drug use as a practice of the self that is constituted within the governance of illicit drug use. This conceptualization of drug use is opposed to the notion that drug use is necessarily problematic behavior, or associated with social or individual pathology. Drawing on Foucault's notion of biopolitics, the paper argues that legal and medical strategies of drug governance are not simply authoritative responses by professionals to the use of harmful chemical substances. Rather, drug use as a problem for government has been made knowable by a range of veridical scientific discourses. Finally, the paper discusses the relevance of contemporary understandings of drug use for the diverse ways in which young people use drugs.

Global or transnational expansion of Japanese religions? an analysis centering on case studies from Brazil

Up to the World War II, Japanese religious expansion happened alongside the colonialist politics of Japan's empire as well as through migration and missionary efforts. Later on it was immensely helped by the Japanese prosperity from the 1960s throughout the 80s. Some religious organizations managed to get a reasonable membership in different countries to the point that scholars now talk about the globalization of Japanese religions. This presentation will show the struggle of some Japanese religious groups to move from local to national scale, and eventually to the international arena. However, the focus will be on case studies from Brazil to demonstrate first that there is a difference between transnational and global propagation. It will contend that, although globalization opened innumerable possibilities for religion, it is an exaggeration to apply the word "global" to Japan's overseas religious expansion, excepting from Soka Gakkai International. Also a case of the reconstruction of Ishizuchi beliefs and practices in Brazil will serve to illustrate how the global has been shaped locally at the same time as the local is ceaselessly subject to national and global influences.

Injustice and exclusion revealed through photos (1898-1908)

The theme of injustice and exclusion represented through photographs proposes an analysis that was based on visual documents that served as propaganda of the government in the last decade of the nineteenth and early twentieth century. The photograph, which reveals, among other aspects of the city, people left out the long process of modernization, which made the day labor the ticket in the modern world. Therefore, shoe shiners, street vendors, porters, workers stole stowages not posing for composing scenarios that have shaped and composed the instruments of propaganda and dissemination of the "belle époque" in the state capital. The visual language allows us to show how individuals were represented in urban settings, giving visibility to social types that were subtly caught by cameras at the service of government propaganda that aimed to promote a modern city, showing the intensity and speed with he wanted to achieve modernity, notice the record of another city that reminds us of the living spaces of different realities. The contribution of this study is anchored in the use of photography as the primary document analysis, understanding that photography is a witness who "speaks" of the past.

La responsabilité individuelle et l'automanagement émotionnel

La conception des travailleurs comme des entrepreneurs qui doivent gérer son capital humain a été introduit dans le discours du management depuis les années 1990. Cette responsabilisation individuelle répond à un impasse. D'un côté, il faut obtenir l'engagement subjectif du travailleur dans des entreprises qui ont généralisé l'autonomie et la prise de décision dans un modèle de réseaux flexibles et travail en équipe. Cette organisation a mis en relief des qualités émotionnelles liées à la motivation au travail, au compromis avec l'entreprise, à la leadership charismatique des équipes et au rapport aux partenaires et aux clients. Les dispositifs de pouvoir se sont tournés vers la dimension soft des organisations, en contrôlant la subjectivité, les émotions, la culture, les valeurs, l'imaginaire et le sens de la vie. D'autre côté, la recherche de l'engagement subjectif s'est passé au moment où la croissance du chômage et l'émergence de formes plus flexibles et précaires de travail ont défait les liens de appartenance par rapport à la corporation, en constituant des émotions négatives comme anxiété, frustration, apathie, père et souffrance. La conception du capital humain a permis de concilier l'engagement subjectif avec la flexibilité et précarisation par l'idée de que chacun travaille pour soi même et doit se responsabiliser pour développer et gérer ses compétences émotionnelles. C'est une obligation de l'individu s'adapter à les règles émotionnelles demandé par le management. À travers d'un souci de soi, il faut éliminer les émotions négatifs et pathologiques qui provoquent des comportements irrationnels dans l'organisation et créer des émotions positifs pour la meilleur relation productive au travail. L'intelligence émotionnelle est le dispositif qui convertit toute émotion en un produit de entière responsabilité du travailleur. L'automanagement du capital émotionnel est mesuré par des échelles qui quantifient et classifient les travailleurs, en produisant une nouvelle forme de inégalité émotionnelle.

Le pouvoir émotionnel managerial

Depuis les années 1990, plusieurs spécialistes du monde corporatif présentent les émotions comme l'élément fondamental dans la compétition des entreprises et annoncent que les compétences émotionnelles sont le différentiel capable de définir le succès ou l'échec d'une carrière professionnelle (Goleman, 1998). Cette prise en compte de la vie affective des travailleurs et des consommateurs se produit au moment même où le gouvernement néolibéral élargit la conception de l'homme économique aux divers domaines de la vie et pense les rapports humains selon le modèle du marché (Dardot et Laval, 2009). Pour comprendre ce mouvement apparemment paradoxal de problématisation des émotions dans le modèle de l'homme économique intéressé et calculateur, on analyse le discours du management américain des dernières deux décennies, quand les agents économiques sont conçus comme des capitaux humains qui doivent gérer ses compétences émotionnelles. On fait la généalogie de la conception d'émotion dans le management pour comprendre l'introduction des techniques de gestion comme la culture organisationnelle, le marketing d'expérience et, finalement, l'intelligence émotionnelle. Les nouvelles techniques de pouvoir émotionnel diffusent le travail émotionnel (Hochschild, 1987) et imposent à l'homme économique l'investissement dans un nouveau type de capital: le capital émotionnel (Gendrom, 2004).

Neither commodity nor human right: Water as a political intervention from below

When water became a political topic in the last two decades, one had to choose: either water was a commodity to be bought and sold in the market, or a human right to be universally provided by state-owned companies. Transnational corporations, global financial institutions, and neoliberal governments advocated the former while seeking to legitimize the privatization of water supply. Socio-environmental activists, NGOs, strands within UN agencies, and supportive intellectuals passionately defended the latter in their anti-privatization campaigns. As time went by, and as the human right to water was, belatedly, established by the UN in 2010, the dichotomy became murkier. Some have argued that "human right" was not the best concept or strategy to frame anti-privatization campaigns. While human right is a legal category for individuals, commodity refers to the property regime of the resource (Bakker 2007). If the human right to water is to overcome its anthropocentric and possibly capitalist nature, it needs to be revised under the lenses of the social production of wealth (Linton 2011). Others have explained that water is never fully privatized—accumulation by dis-possession of water assembles private and public actors in neoliberal water governance (Swyngedow 2005). Still seeking to overcome the binary, the paper explores how "the human right to water" was mobilized in Colombia in the 2007-2011 referendum campaign for a Constitutional reform. Drawing on Latour (2005) and on multi-sited fieldwork, the paper explores how the struggle for the human right to water became a language for local political interventions, as it assembled a socioenvironmental counter-network of humans and non-humans. Tracing the energy, movement and connections that made the campaign happen, the paper discusses the political interventions that the universal "human right" made (Tsing 2005) and how the counter network challenged dominant representations of water, and proposed relational counternarratives of socio-nature.

Risk as knowledge or knowledge as risk? Parental perceptions and coping with newborns medically defined "at high risk"

Risk discourse has gained recognition as prominent and inherent component present in medical practitioners and patients discourse. Medical practitioners often hesitate on the right mode of provision of medical information to patients or primary caregivers. The complex dilemma of perception of medical information was studied in a prospective, mixed-methods study with 145 families of 181 newborns at high [health] risk, Jewish (41) and Bedouin (104), all residents of the Negev region in Southern Israel). . In this the paper I analyze parental responses to the perceived risk of their infants during the process of discharge from birth hospitalization, and after the first year of life of their newborns. Parents showed various patterns of resistance to threatening information about what they perceived to be a vulnerable health condition of their babies condition, sometimes, amid medical prognosis. The paper discusses the modes by which risk discourse is handled by parents as a tense continuum between knowledge as an instrumental asset in care giving, and knowledge as an additional risk factor and an obstacle to care giving. In expanding the understanding of the impact of parental perceived risk and of the coping patterns with medical information, the paper aims to contribute to the improvement of patient-doctor communication, along with ameliorating parental competency.

Una aproximación a las prácticas y representaciones de la maternidad en la cárcel de mujeres

Este trabajo pretende presentar los primeros avances de una tesina de grado la cual tiene como objeto de investigación el análisis de las representaciones sociales acerca del significado de una maternidad apropiada e inapropiada en las mujeres (presas y empleadas del Servicio Penitenciario de Santa Fe) de la Unidad Penitenciaria N° 4 de la Provincia de Santa Fe, y su relación, por un lado, con la práctica y el ejercicio de la maternidad y por otro, con las representaciones y auto-representaciones sobre el significado que ambos grupos les otorgan al ser mujer y el ser una "mujer presa".

Como hipótesis general de investigación sostenemos que la idea de maternidad apropiada e inapropiada se construye a partir de la homologación del ser madre y el ser mujer, por lo cual el haber cometido un delito, algo que convierte a las mujeres en "malas" contribuye a representar a las mujeres presas como "malas" madres.

Trabajaremos con un diseño metodológico cuasiexperimental, tomando los grupos de: mujeres privadas de su libertad y mujeres empleadas del Servicio Penitenciario, realizando entrevistas semi-estructuradas y en profundidad.

La hipótesis específica que nos conduce a tomar estos dos grupos es que aquellas representaciones que las mujeres en contextos de encierro tienen acerca de la maternidad no sólo se vinculan con construcciones sociales que se importan desde el afuera, sino que esos mismos elementos se refuerzan a través de las intervenciones de diferentes actores. Las trabajadoras del Servicio Penitenciario, por ejemplo, representan agentes de interacción con las mujeres privadas de la libertad de suma importancia no sólo por la cotidianeidad de los contactos sino también por la asimetría de poder existente entre ambos grupos dentro del sistema penitenciario, movilizándolo prácticas que contribuyen a reproducir aquellas representaciones sociales de lo apropiado e inapropiado en el ejercicio de la maternidad.

La constitución multicultural, el estado de derecho y la flexibilización de las formas jurídicas

In this presentation I articulate some considerations about the Multicultural Constitution in Latin America as it was recently enacted in some Andean countries like Bolivia and Ecuador. The Multicultural Constitution, as a process of emancipation of indigenous peoples in Latin America has provoked not only substantial changes in the traditional legal architecture of Latin American constitutionalism but also permitted the use of the Constitution as a counter-hegemonic and decolonizing instrument. The constitutional recognition of indigenous justice and its own distinct forms of legal production, has challenged the traditional concept of formal law. Paradoxically, the re-emergence of indigenous law and justice was achieved through the use of formal and legal instruments which historically had been used to strengthen colonial dominance over indigenous peoples. I will analyze very briefly the case of the indigenous people of Chibuleo and their own system of justice stressing the emancipatory and social cohesion effects which have resulted from the implementation of the autonomous indigenous judicial system. This analysis is based on some theoretical tools provided by globalization studies and global governance scholarship and focused on the transformative role that global counter-hegemonic social movements have played in the de-construction of traditional state in a context of economic globalization in some countries of Latin America.

Marcos interpretativos en torno a los comedores populares en lanús y la influencia en la toma de decisiones sobre este espacio

La olla popular ha sido un repertorio de acción utilizado por los sectores populares argentinos en momentos de crisis. Es a partir de la crisis de 1989 que esta estrategia se institucionaliza a través del reconocimiento y apoyo estatal. Durante la crisis del año 2001 el "comedor popular" se masifica transformándose en un elemento importante de la política alimenticia así como una herramienta de construcción política en el territorio. Este espacio ha sido cuestionado y apoyado fuertemente por diferentes actores políticos y técnicos así como por las propias organizaciones sociales. Sin embargo, ha subsistido hasta el día de hoy transformándose en un repertorio organizativo fuertemente arraigado en especial en algunos barrios y ciudades del país.

Esta ponencia utiliza la teoría de marcos interpretativos de Goffman para analizar la forma como este espacio es interpretado por diferentes actores políticos, técnicos y las organizaciones comunitarias. Busca analizar la forma como dichos marcos afectan las decisiones que se toman sobre este espacio. Se focaliza en las interpretaciones sobre los efectos que el comedor tiene en la familia, en la pobreza y en la construcción de poder a nivel comunitario. Su objetivo es discutir en torno a la influencia de los actores técnicos y políticos en los repertorios organizativos a nivel barrial.

Esta investigación está basada en el trabajo de campo realizado en el Municipio de Lanús (provincia de Buenos Aires, Argentina) tanto con organizaciones comunitarias como con políticos y técnicos. Utiliza también información proveniente de un relevamiento de instituciones realizado por un período de más de 10 años por estudiantes de la carrera de Trabajo Social de la Universidad de Lanús.

Sociology is not cool any longer. A discussion about teaching of sociology in secondary schools in Argentina exploring teachers, students and curricula

This paper reflects upon the reasons and propositions that educational reforms in Argentina have included or excluded the teaching of sociology in Secondary School curricula during the last two decades. Thus, the main goal of this article is to compare two different projects aimed to introduce sociology as a necessary discipline to be taught at schools in certain regions of the country, trying to show differences in perspectives, foci, and especially in the definition of sociology itself. The discussion explores possible political and intellectual reasons of those changes. Alongside, the work also intends to show distinctive differences in the teaching of sociology at public and private schools in Buenos Aires, paying special attention to sociology syllabus designed for the International General Certificate of Secondary Education (IGCSE). The whole work includes in addition a discussion about the role of teachers who had dissimilar freedom and power in each case to select topics, approaches and bibliography for their courses. Finally, using some data recollected from sampled local Secondary students on their perceptions on sociology and sociologists, the paper shows that students do have a very imprecise image of both the general sociological perspective and the professional role of sociologists, but, what is most interesting, having learned sociology or not at Secondary School do not make much difference or increase sociological vocations either.

This essay reflects upon the complex relationship between sociology and state, in a time sociologists in Argentina were perceived as actors able to promote social change and (due to both their technical expertise and ability to fully understand modernity and rationalization process) they were as well pointed as truthfully guiders to democratic planning. Hence, this paper seeks to explore the role of local sociologists in the definition of state planning in Argentina from middle 1940s to 1963, when democracy and industrialization found several obstacles but sociology offered a promissory future.

El impacto de la movilización de familiares de víctimas de la violencia policial en Argentina: sus dimensiones institucionales y culturales

El objetivo de esta ponencia es explorar el impacto que ha tenido la movilización de familiares de víctimas de la violencia policial en Argentina. Desde mediados de la década del '80 la violencia y el abuso por parte de las instituciones de seguridad se ha vuelto un tema visible gracias a dos elementos muy importantes: en principio, el interés que despertaron las violaciones a los derechos humanos en democracia en algunos organismos de derechos humanos y, en segundo lugar, la progresiva y recurrente organización y movilización de familiares de víctimas.

Entre 1987 y 1991 se hicieron públicas las primeras movilizaciones de familiares de víctimas al tiempo que se consolidaba el trabajo en algunos organismos de derechos humanos (incluyendo el surgimiento de nuevas organizaciones específicas) en esta temática. A partir de una serie de casos que tomaron estado público en esos años, se produjo un nuevo modo de entender y denunciar el uso de la fuerza en las instituciones de seguridad.

Este trabajo intenta establecer algunos indicadores de medición del impacto de este tipo de experiencias de movilización comparando casos antiguos y recientes. Nuestra intención es pensar qué dimensiones institucionales y culturales se han transformado y que permiten un desarrollo y consecuencias diferentes en el desarrollo de los casos entre comienzos de los años '90 y la actualidad.

An ethnography of failure: Actors and interactions of governance in contemporary Bogotá

A model of urban governance in the late 1990s, Bogotá is once again being characterized as a 'city in crisis'. The symptoms of 'urban disaster' are decried by journalists, experts, politicians, and citizens every day: corruption scandals, stalled public works, worsening traffic conditions, unrelenting socio-spatial segregation, and the recent flooding of working class neighborhoods, among others.

The return of the crisis was not only the catalyst for an intense electoral campaign -with the triumph of former guerrilla member Gustavo Petro (2012-2016)- but it has also raised questions about the nature of urban governance: How was it possible for the city to undergo significant urban transformations (in public finance, public space, urban mobility) in a short period of time (1995-2003)? How and why were these 'policy achievements' reversed in the past 8 years? Why was it impossible for the city to institutionalize such innovations? What are the actors and interactions that underpin governing processes?

In my paper I address these questions through an ethnographic study of the recently failed attempt to modify Bogotá's "Territorial Ordering Plan." The Plan is a potentially powerful instrument to promote 'equality' and 'sustainability', but it has also been an eloquent example of the gaps between discourse and practice. Drawing on research from within Bogotá's City Planning Department and among related communities of practice and citizens, I follow planners' own diagnostics of the Plan's truncated implementation and their proposals to produce relevant knowledge and modes of action to better materialize its goals. Importantly, I consider the political obstacles that impeded these planners' efforts at policy reform. My ethnography of failure offers a networked understanding of urban governance with an emphasis on multiple (state and non-state) actors and the ways in which they exchange knowledge, build alliances, and negotiate the overlapping realms of technical and political practice.

Public space in contemporary Bogotá: From policy artifacts to urban assemblages

In my paper I explore the emergence of public space as an object of governmental knowledge and intervention in Bogotá since the mid 1990s. I focus on the ways in which public space has been conceived and deployed as a tool of governance and planning. I also explore the contradictions and unintended effects of the implementation of such "policy artifacts" in light of the everyday politics of public space (Low & Smith 2006). I thus expect to shed light on: 1) the shifts of urban governance in Latin America and 2) the production of public space as a dynamic "assemblage" (Latour 2005; McFarlane 2011) of ideas, things, institutions, and people.

My paper asks: What urban visions have been translated into Bogotá's policies of public space? How have such policies evolved over the past years? Under what schemes, designs, and institutional arrangements have the city's recent public spaces been produced? What types of spaces have emerged from these efforts and in what ways have they been appropriated, transformed, or contested by everyday users? How are current ideals of sustainability and social justice incorporated into Bogotá's public space policies?

My paper is organized in three broad sections. First, I analyze the emergence of spaces of civism where public space is conceived as a key element in the construction of a 'culture of citizenship'. Second, I explore the creation of spaces of order aimed at 'recovering' and 'securing' urban areas. Here I emphasize the circulation and re-contextualization of policy models such as New York's "broken windows" policies (Davis 2007; McCann & Ward 2011). Finally, I study planning efforts to configure spaces of renovation through the joint action of public and private actors. Here I consider the institutionalization of the production of public space within the city's ongoing processes of 'urban redensification and renewal'.

Discourse of Argentinity at the turn of the century

Times of crisis are something usual in Argentina. Democratic transition, after last dictatorial political regime, was a path with many pitfalls. Times were not promising. Lack of sustained economic growth led to recurring periods of social and political instability, questioned the legitimacy of governments without ever breaking the constitutional order. The eighties were marked by threats of military uprisings, the economic paralysis, the uncontrolled hyperinflation and state inefficiency. At early nineties economic recovery provided some social welfare, but soon neoliberal politics was accompanied by rising poverty and unemployment. The turn of the century the Argentines were found wrapped in a crisis unprecedented socioeconomic, what also affected the modes self-representation of society. In fact, the crisis of 2001 generated a set of discussions that took the 'nation' as a referent unit, attracted the interest of large segments of intellectuality toward the analysis of common culture and history review (theme that follow to be of great interest today). Therefore, a lot of discourse about Argentinity burst in the public sphere, because in Argentine the appeal to the nation has become a privileged argument to understand the situations of political and social unrest, and a coin of change from political struggle.

The aim of this paper is to explore the process of cultural production which involves narratives of national identification as a way of imagining the political community, their social divisions, key problems and projects of future society. I will analyze some relevant intellectuals and public narratives in the context of social and political turmoil at the turn of the century, taking into account the different discursive strategies through which were promoted and legitimized political action.

Los jóvenes argentinos y la "imprevisibilidad" de sus trayectorias laborales

En Argentina se constata que la mayor rotación laboral de los jóvenes no se trata en su mayoría de una movilidad voluntaria, sino que responde a la forma de gestión de la mano de obra por parte de las empresas. Debido a que probablemente su rol en las mismas no sea esencial (por detentar menores conocimientos específicos de la empresa) y por su menor costo de despido (asociado a su menor antigüedad) son los primeros en ser despedidos en períodos en que disminuye el nivel de actividad económica. Dado que invariablemente alternan períodos de desempleo o inactividad con puestos de trabajo en condiciones de precariedad, estos jóvenes tienden a naturalizar esta situación, y la "imprevisibilidad" de sus trayectorias laborales pareciera constituir una característica previsible de las mismas.

En la presente ponencia nos proponemos analizar dicho fenómeno, buscando comprender el carácter "imprevisible" de las trayectorias laborales de jóvenes argentinos a partir de una aproximación cuantitativa y cualitativa. Los datos provistos por la EPH nos servirán para contextualizar el análisis de tres ondas de entrevistas en profundidad realizadas en el año 2006, 2008 y 2011 en el marco del Panel "Trayectorias, disposiciones laborales y temporalidades" de jóvenes egresados del nivel medio. Esta ponencia es subproducto de una investigación internacional en curso que se propone analizar las bifurcaciones laborales en las trayectorias socio ocupacionales de jóvenes canadienses, argentinos y franceses con distintas formaciones educativas.

El procedimentalismo epistémico como vía para la definición de la pobreza y el diseño de políticas públicas

El impacto generado por el enfoque de las capacidades en la definición de la pobreza, entendida como privación de capacidades, ha sido indiscutible en los planos teórico, metodológico y en el de las políticas públicas.

La propuesta de Sen, retomada y modificada por distintos autores, instituciones y organismos, apunta a la no prescripción de un listado de capacidades ya que sostiene que los procesos de selección intencional involucran actos de razonamiento que deben seguir procedimientos democráticos para ampliar las libertades de los sujetos, al tiempo que brindar legitimidad a los instrumentos de medición, y eventuales políticas públicas.

Por su parte, autores como Habermas y Estlund han impulsado la noción de procedimentalismo epistémico que asigna virtudes cognitivas a los procesos de deliberación y presuponen que a partir de procedimientos democráticos es posible alcanzar resultados correctos.

A partir de esto, nos proponemos en una primera instancia, explorar la relación entre la propuesta seniana y el procedimentalismo epistémico y luego identificar ciertas dificultades involucradas en el proceso de construcción de consensos en torno a lo valorado-valorable tanto para el diseño de instrumentos de medición de la pobreza como para proyectar políticas públicas.

Situación alimentaria en niños pobres: La problemática de la inequidad alimentaria desde la perspectiva del riesgo

El objetivo del trabajo es describir la situación alimentaria de niños pobres de Bahía Blanca a partir de categorías sociológicas (no puramente nutricionales o biologicistas) apropiándose del cuerpo teórico propuesto por autores como Ulrich Beck, Anthony Giddens y Mary Douglas en donde se enfatiza el lugar central de la categoría de "riesgo".

Se parte de la hipótesis de que la situación alimentaria de la población en estudio debe ser caracterizada como "riesgosa" o "insegura", más que como "dañada". La diferencia estriba que esta segunda acepción pone énfasis en los aspectos actuales de la situación y no en las consecuencias (conocidas o no por el actor) que ponen en riesgo a futuro, sus propias condiciones de salud. El hecho de que muchas veces las políticas sanitarias se planteen desde una perspectiva del daño, redundando en que su alcance se limite a los grupos más extremos y descuide una problemática, que no sólo cuenta con dimensiones cuantitativas importantes, sino que también por su carácter "silencioso", no puede ser percibido y sopesado adecuadamente.

Qué, cómo, dónde y con quién comen los niños son las preguntas fundamentales que organizan el trabajo. Se realizaron, encuestas, observaciones y entrevistas tanto a los chicos como a los padres y cocineros de distintos comedores escolares en el período 2006- 2011. La evidencia hallada señala que las prácticas y representaciones alimentarias de estos sectores enfrentadas a contextos con pocas opciones o con alternativas desvalorizadas, viabilizan prácticas segmentadas e inseguras de alimentación que aumentan el riesgo de malnutrición. Pero dichos riesgos son asumidos y naturalizados por los propios agentes como las "mejores" alternativas disponibles. Es por eso que se propone desde la teoría del riesgo, reflexionar sobre estos resultados a fin de mejorar la situación alimentaria y nutricional de la población infantil en condiciones de pobreza.

Adaptive model as interpreter of multiple realities of complex social systems

This paper proposes a scheme of evaluation of observables and structure of variables integration and categories associated with adaptive system model. This shows the possibilities for the analysis of the representations and social practices of students and teachers to the use of new information technologies in their academic work. The scheme of valuation of the observable ones and categories faces the challenge of establishing codes derived from the vision and academic experience that there have the investigators who take part in the analysis as well as define a theoretical body established in the genetic Epistemology that of consistency and it allows to explain the behaviors. In addition to considering the assessment of the observable proposed by each investigator, the methodology establishes criteria for establishing such codes democratization assessment of the proposals from researchers and experts involved in the academic experience.

In the first part, the article presents the academic problem and the challenges of conceptualization and integration of the theory of representations and practices social Moscovici and Piaget's genetic epistemology as part of a Cyberculture. In the second part, describes the configuration of the adaptive system that takes into account the possibilities for democratization from which sets out criteria for assessing the academic activity.

La participación como práctica social: Actores y construcción de subjetividades

Los estudios acerca de los procesos de participación, especialmente en el marco de las políticas sociales, sostienen una visión fragmentada, como si los mismos tuvieran lugar en un vacío histórico. Por el contrario, nosotros sostenemos una noción de la participación como práctica situada que reconoce las determinaciones culturales y subjetivas.

En consecuencia, en la ponencia se analiza cómo se definen y significan los procesos de participación a partir de información construida mediante una encuesta en dos localidades de la región noreste de Argentina, para definir ámbitos y prácticas de participación. Además, se efectuaron entrevistas semi-estructuradas, con vistas a caracterizar el modo cómo se subjetivan tales procesos.

Prevalece entre los encuestados una concepción amplia y diversa acerca de la participación que incluye tanto el simple formar parte de una organización, asociación o grupo como modos más activos y militantes en los que se incluyen la acción colectiva y la posibilidad de involucrarse en los procesos de toma de decisiones, asociándose esta variabilidad a las distintas condiciones materiales, sociales y culturales de los sujetos.

Pueden reconocerse las siguientes dimensiones en la noción de participación: una dimensión empática y/o afectiva que la vincula con distintas formas de socialidad; una dimensión ética, anclada en el deber solidario de ayudar al otro, más desfavorecido, en la que se implica siempre una noción de asimetría; una dimensión moralizante, sostenida por aquellos que son convocados más o menos coercitivamente a participar desde los organismos institucionalizados –Estado, Ong- y que opera como mecanismo de disciplinamiento; y finalmente, una dimensión política de la participación que reconoce la posibilidad de asumir responsabilidades en la vida social aunque esto no derive, en ciertas circunstancias, en la búsqueda del bien común, sino más bien con referencia a expectativas privadas orientadas hacia la afirmación del propio yo y la defensa de derechos individuales.

How to teach professional ethics in graduate programs? Opinions of the professors-researchers from the Juarez Autonomous University of Tabasco Graduate education has become an important issue in Mexican educational policies. Students' enrollment in this level has been showing a constant growth since 1980 and, as a consequence, educational institutions and governmental departments are being more interested in keeping trace of graduate programs, either specialties, masters or doctorates.

Nowadays, the National Council of Science and Technology urges institutions to maintain quality through the evaluation of several indicators such as student's registration, academic groups, updating and amendment of curricula, graduation rate and productivity of professors and candidates.

Particularly, since four years ago, the Juarez Autonomous University of Tabasco (UJAT) has implemented different strategies to improve the quality of its graduate programs and to get CONACYT certification. Nevertheless, the subject of professional ethics does not represent a matter of discussion in the institutional policies yet. Despite of this, professor-researchers who work at the UJAT are aware that this is a central topic in the education of new researchers.

In this paper, we present some of the results obtained in this university, as part of our participation in the Interuniversity Project on Professional Ethics. Some of the most important outcomes show that 78.4% of the professors consider that curricula must include a specific subject on professional ethics.

Talking about its content, they suggest the following aspects: Problems in professional work (17.5%), Professional principles (15%), Analytical and reflective education (15%), and Principles to achieve a good labor performance (12.5%). The main values that according to these professors must be socialized among graduate students are: ethics, cognitive values, professionalism, scientific values and responsibility. As far as the values that must be promoted among academics, they highlighted: ethics, professionalism, scientific values, democratic values and honesty.

Residential concentration, ethnicity and party competition effects on the representation of immigrant-origin minorities in the Madrid metropolitan area

Ethnic inequalities in political representation in Europe have been overlooked until very recently. Yet, with the sustained increase of immigrant populations all over Europe, an increasing body of scholarship points to the alarming gap in the political representation of citizens of immigrant descent in European societies. What are the factors that allow us gaining a better understanding of the dynamics of these gaps in representation?

Is a high concentration of immigrant-origin minorities enough for immigrant-origin minorities to gain political representation? Or are certain migrant groups more likely to benefit from certain political opportunities that facilitate their access to elected office when their number is large? This paper analyses how these three factors — residential concentration, ethnicity, and political opportunities — interact to help to account for the different levels of representation of immigrant-origin minorities at the local level, and it illustrates the theoretical underpinnings with an examination of the Spanish case.

The paper studies over time — for the 2003, 2007 and 2011 local elections — the Spanish municipalities with the largest concentration of immigrant-origin residents of different ethnic backgrounds — Romanians, Moroccans, Bulgarians and Latin Americans — and examines how residential concentration, ethnicity and party competition interact to lead to better or worse outcomes of descriptive political representation of these groups. Spain is an ideal case study to test these theoretical propositions regarding migrants' political representation, particularly since the rapid increase of the foreign-born population has resulted in a diverse intake of multiple origin groups with different patterns of residential concentration, yielding a sufficient number of places where a single group of different national origins dominates among the foreign-born.

The global diffusion of the healthy cities/communities movement

The Healthy Cities/Communities (HC/C) Movement began in the mid-1980s as an idea at an International Conference on Health Promotion in Toronto Canada. It was quickly translated into action by the World Health Organization's European office which created 34 healthy cities initiatives over the next few years. It then was adopted in the US, Australia, Latin America and Africa. The HC/C is a community based effort to develop and improve health and the quality of life by mobilizing local leaders, residents, and organizations to collaborate for positive change in prevention, health equity, and the environment. The movement has been supported and institutionalized through a series of local and national private foundations and government agencies. HC/C is a reformative social movement that advocates for limited social change across an entire community. It involves a series of interventions that bring a community together to create multi-sector partnerships that set priorities, establish new public health policy and implement programs to improve the health of the population. The World Health Organization and others have created a set of tools to build coalitions, develop plans, gain municipal approval and secure funding for local HC/C programs. They recommend that the effort should be citizen driven and feature collaborative problem solving. HC/C projects should utilize community-based Participatory Action Research for both process and outcome evaluations. WHO recommends the MARI Framework (Monitoring, Accountability, Reporting, and Impact assessment) while US projects tend to employ the Logic Model to guide the evaluation effort. Most published evaluations have been case studies, but the California Healthy Cities Project conducted a multi site comparative evaluation of 20 communities. This evaluation sheds light on difference and similarities among projects that vary in community size and sponsoring organization.

The plague of Athens and the cult of Asklepios as collective behavior and a social movement

This paper will apply theories of social movements to explain the rise of the cult of Asklepios in Athens. The cult helped reestablish norms and supportive institutions in the wake of the plague. Social movements often arise in times of sudden changes and social unrest, becoming a source of spiritual and political empowerment. Two types of social movements are redemptive and reformative. The cult of Asklepios rose to prominence after the plague as a social movement was both redemptive and reformative. Drawing on cultural and religious institutions the cult impacted healing practices and beliefs to increase social cohesion and was part of a political strategy to build an alliance with another city-state. In addition the movement may have supported the growth of rational Hippocratic medicine which was in its infancy.

Should I stay or should I go? - How choice to become an upper secondary schoolteacher are structured

When choosing higher education there are several questions that the choosing individual needs to consider: What to study? Where to study? Why study? These questions include choices that are, by necessity, in the centre of attention for presumptive students. Choices are, to a large extent, structured and limited by different determinants such as social background, geographical origin, gender, former school experiences and educational skills. In this paper I investigate what the choice to become an upper secondary schoolteacher is structured by. I claim that the educational choice is an ongoing process through the whole educational programme and not just situated before and in the beginning of the education. This claim pushes for investigation of student choices from (at least) the start to the finish of their education. In this study 10 students has been interviewed for three occasions during their education with focus on their social and educational biography. By interviewing them repeatedly, it's possible to capture and understand the very essence of their choices, what those are structured by and also track down and explain transformations in choosing. The theoretical notion of habitus is used to understand how the educational choices are structured. In this context habitus is evolved from an analysis were divided and unified habitus represent two opposing poles of different ideal options determined by choice. One option is to use education in a function of leaving the individual social and geographical background and the other is to use it to stay in that very background. The upper secondary schoolteacher vocation can actually contain both options despite background – a detail that can be explained by socially structured, more or less consecrated, images of what an upper secondary schoolteacher socially represent.

Sujeito idoso e pós-modernidade: Novas propostas de sociabilidade

A sociedade contemporânea presencia o surgimento de um fenômeno social com reflexos políticos, econômicos e culturais. Com isso, os idosos têm buscado alternativas a fim de (re) significarem suas vidas, baseados em uma cultura de consumo, de forma a manter-se jovem, saudável e disposto a aproveitar cada vez mais os últimos restantes de vida, surgindo, assim, uma nova identidade para esses indivíduos, a chamada "melhor idade".

Esta nova identidade implica diretamente na imagem do idoso que respeitava certa norma no vestir e no agir, a qual também já começa a desbotar. Observamos atualmente uma desconstrução da velhice tal como ela é ou era vista, ou seja, o perfil dos "novos velhos" não parece combinar com o lamento da estrofe de uma música popular brasileira: "velhice chegando e eu chegando ao fim..."

No atual contexto, a construção dessa nova imagem do idoso apresentada pela mídia de um modo geral e pela linguagem a ela aliada. A constituição dessa nova imagem não é realizada sem propósito. Uma indústria cultural, diretamente voltada para este gênero vem sendo montada e expandida, com a ajuda do apelo midiático e a adoção de um novo estilo de vida para os idosos, ou seja, a construção de uma nova identidade para esses sujeitos movimenta memórias diversas, sucedidas de diferentes formações discursivas, fornecendo posições-sujeitos que os indivíduos são chamados a ocupar. As diferentes práticas discursivas retomam essas diversas memórias para comentá-las, deslocá-las, transformá-las, sendo nesse campo discursivo heterogêneo que o sujeito forma sua identidade.

Tempo de novas experiências, novos projetos e novos trajetos? Falsa então, necessariamente, em rever as inserções sociais.

A partir dessas considerações, o trabalho enseja entender, sob a ótica da velhice, as novas (re) significações que os sujeitos idosos estão produzindo para suas vidas, bem como as novas propostas de sociabilidade surgidas no contexto pós-moderno.

"Jaia eta borroka": Political ethnographies of cultural activism amidst a context of illegalization in the basque country

In this paper I will discuss the professional and personal challenges I have faced during a two-year ethnographic study in the Basque Country. I will focus on the methodological decisions I have made "on the ground" to adapt my dissertation's methodological design, the negotiation of my access to the field, the effects of the relationships I established with my subjects of study, and the personal implications derived from an investigation conducted in a context of fierce political opposition and illegalization. My project studies the interaction between culture and politics in the Basque public space from both a relational and historical-comparative perspective. I do so by focusing on Bilbao's annual popular festivity (Aste Nagusia, AN) since its birth in 1978 to the present. AN constitutes a major long-term experiment of what I call "participatory culture;" it involves networks of state institutions, political parties, entrepreneur associations, and also a group of social movement organizations and cultural collectives affiliated to a Federation of Comparsas. As such, it represents the sole "cultural space" where actors with center-, right-, and left-wing ideologies, and with Spanish unionist and Basque nationalist tendencies meet, and collide, in Spain. My paper will build on ethnographic observations gathered between 2009 and 2010, two critical years for my research. During this period, the state-led repression and criminalization of the abertzale Left –the hub of socialist and independentist organizations linked to the Basque armed group ETA– finally reached Bilbao's festive field. 2009 was, too, the year in which the abertzales launched an internal process of "democratization" aimed at putting an end to 50 years of armed struggle and their 8-year electoral proscription, finally achieved in 2011. Given that almost half of the comparsas in the Federation fall within the abertzale umbrella, this has been a pivotal period to conduct my investigation.

Identity battles, social movement networks and political opportunity structures in the Basque public space: Bilbao's Aste Nagusia (2009-2010)

In this paper I will analyze the identity work performed by the organizers of Bilbao's annual popular festivities (Aste Nagusia, AN). AN constitutes a major experiment of what I call "participatory culture;" it involves networks of state institutions, political parties, entrepreneur associations, and a group of social movement organizations and cultural collectives affiliated to a Federation of Comparsas. As such, AN represents the sole "cultural space" where actors with center-, right-, and left-wing ideologies, and Spanish unionist and Basque separatist tendencies meet, and collide, in Spain. Due to these characteristics, AN is an exceptional scenario for the display of "identity battles" related not only to the fiesta, but also to divergent understandings of culture, the city and political liberties. My paper will focus on the identity narratives developed by the Federation of Comparsas, the strategies and alliances it has crafted, and their symbolic and performative representation in the festive space. It will also provide an account of the arduous work of identity synchronization/de-synchronization conducted by the comparsas to articulate internal differences amidst radically changing political opportunity structures. I will focus on the critical years of 2009-10; the decade-long repression and criminalization of the abertzale Left (hub of socialist and independentist organizations linked to the armed organization ETA) reached Bilbao's festive field during this period. 2009 was, too, the year in which the abertzales launched a "purely political way," that is, an internal process of "democratization" aimed at putting an end to 50 years of armed struggle, and to their 8-year electoral proscription. Given that almost half of the comparsas in the Federation fall within the abertzale umbrella, this is a key period for my research. Textual and visual data analyzed in the paper come from a two-year ethnographic study conducted in Bilbao, archival material, and in-depth interviews.

Families and companion animals in a contemporary world: A case-study of bodies, minds and emotions in Brazilian cyberspace

The objective of this paper is to present the research of images and messages addressed to the pet owners, posted on news and advertising sites on consumer behavior in Brazilian cyberspace in the period between 2005 and 2011. We found a wide variety of pet products, similar to those available to their owners, such as clothing, food, shampoos, toys, and also services, such as day care, in a process called humanization of animals for the pet care industry.

Remarkably, we note that the posts were addressed directly to the pet owners. Many messages were written in order to stimulate owner emotions and feelings through their animals, in a process that can be called sentimental anthropomorphism. We find products with marketing messages similar to those of products for children, women and people of luxury goods high consumers.

We must recognize that the identification of a person and a pet is present in the act of consumption. Nevertheless, we believe that this type of relationship could not be explained simply by the utilitarian point of view in the sphere of social interaction.

As Berry (2008), we think that most powerful humans impose, consciously or not, their values to the less powerful. In the same way, humans are relatively free to make their own choices about their appearance and modify their bodies and behavior, while non-humans are subject to human choices about their appearances.

However, we believe that in families in which people daily interact with their pets, new meanings emerge from this contact. In many situations, people interact with your pet as a "person" or a member of the family, or a unique and special living being.

Artistic protest strategies: The critical art ensemble

The "Critical Art Ensemble" (CAE), founded in 1987, is a globally acting group of artists who aim at exploring "the intersections between art, critical theory, technology, and political activism"[1]. A whole range of different artworks (performances, installations, posters, but also 'traditional exhibitions' in museums and galleries) as well as a number of theoretical monographs and pamphlets serve to address controversially discussed social topics, such as the effect of the spread of high-speed Information and Communication Technologies, the use of biotechnological weapons in contemporary warfare or the genetical modification of food. The members of the CAE understand their artistic work as an "attack on the authoritarian policies of the capital" and as part of a permanent "resistance to authoritarian structures". It is the distinctiveness of the artistic forms of this 'resistance' I want to examine in my presentation. The presentation will be divided into two parts. Firstly I will give an overview of different artistic protest strategies developed and deployed by the CAE, focusing on 1) the concept of 'Electronic Civil Disobedience' by the 'tactical' use of media; 2) the activation and integration of the audience; 3) the blurring of art, reality, theory and politics. Each of these aspects will be briefly illustrated by exemplary artworks and situated within the theoretical framework of the CAE. Secondly, I will trace back the above-named strategies of political resistance to earlier artistic protest-movements (Dadaism, Fluxus and Situationism) in order to develop some general hypothesis on the potential of art as a medium of 'counter-discourse' and protest.

Explaining access to individual social capital

It is theoretically argued and empirically tested that social capital is advantageous in many spheres of life like educational and occupational attainment, health, and consumption. Thus, it is a crucial criterion of social differentiation of people's life chances. Given this social relevance of social capital, the paper focuses on how people gain access to social resources and the resulting distribution of social capital across a population.

The paper offers a resource approach to describe and explain differences in accessing individual social capital. People invest in social capital if they use different kinds of capital (economic, human, social) to form networks of personal relationships. Access to social capital is seen as transformation of other sorts of capital. The accumulation thesis predicts that people with more resources will gain better access to social capital. On the contrary, the compensation thesis predicts that certain structural conditions like availability of homophilous partners, time budgets or spatial contexts constraint the choices of social relations.

Both effects are tested empirically with survey data from German cities. Access to social capital is measured with a resource generator. The measured social resources are subsumed to different dimensions of social capital. Access to these dimensions varies considerably over the population. Our results show strong support for the accumulation thesis albeit with varying influence on different dimensions of social capital. On the other hand, compensational effects are rather weak and only significant in some dimensions of social capital.

The consequences of diversity for social interactions in urban neighbourhoods

The paper presents selected results from a large-scale empirical study in German cities entitled "Diversity and Contact". In the past few years, the consequences of the increasing migration-related diversity in the cities of Europe and North America have been the subject of controversial debates. While some assume disintegrative effects on social relations others question that or expect that bridging contacts will develop and help counteract negative responses to diversity in the social environment.

A study currently conducted at the Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity in Göttingen investigates the relation between contextual diversity and interaction between migrants and non-migrants as well as their impact on selected attitudes. The study uses a longitudinal (three-wave) survey with 2500 participants as well as qualitative methods. The unique stratified random sampling design which selects individuals from 50 neighbourhoods (ca. 7500 inhabitants) located in 16 cities enables us to represent "urban normality" in Germany rather than the exceptional situation of neighbourhoods with very high shares of immigrants.

The paper presents results from the first wave of the survey. It focuses on links between contextual diversity and interactions across group boundaries. The paper will present data on different modes of interaction (from strong ties to everyday casual encounters) and their sites. It will discuss the relevance of neighbourhood for these interactions and correlations with leisure time spent there. Our results show that effects of contextual diversity are weaker than shown for the United States.

Los caminos de la memoria en "Vlado: 30 anos depois"

Esta comunicación tiene la intención de utilizar la película Vlado: 30 anos depois (Director Joao Batista de Andrade, Brasil, 2005) como material privilegiado de análisis con el objetivo de investigar como la construcción estética de la obra se centra en la reelaboración de la memoria del periodo de la dictadura militar en Brasil (1964-1985). Al trabajar los diferentes elementos estéticos presentes en la película - como, por ejemplo, el encuadramiento, el ritmo narrativo, los movimientos de cámara y la relación entre imágenes y sonidos (incluyendo los diálogos) - de modo que tratamos de poner de relieve los aspectos sociológicos sacado a la luz por la película. En este sentido, el centro del análisis gira en torno a la cuestión de la reelaboración de la memoria, porque, en gran parte, la película no es sólo un pasado que se vivió, pero fragmentos de memoria que se tornan tanto más fuertes, quanto más el pasado es revisitado por el presente.

Dado que la película produce una versión elaborada de la memoria de la época, nuestra presentación objetiva argumentar qué tipo de versión es esta, cuáles son sus proximidades con la idea de la memoria colectiva - y pensando no sólo el concepto de Maurice Halbwachs, sino también el concepto de «sociedad». Es decir, hasta qué punto el cine, y especialmente esta película, tiene la capacidad de elaborar cuestiones pertinentes a la "sociedad brasileña" (entendida en el sentido más amplio posible).

Still a drug addict? methadone clients' identity work

Methadone maintenance treatment (MMT) for opioid addicts has been the subject of much debate and conflict in Sweden during the past 30 years, and it remains highly contested and controversial. Thresholds for gaining access are high and control policies strict within the programmes. Even though they attend a legitimate treatment, methadone clients are subject to a range of control measures and exclusionary practices due to their status as ex-heroin users. Urine tests delivered under surveillance are mandatory as security measures 'in the clients' best interest', and supplementary drug use results in three months' suspension from the program.

The dominant picture of heroin users in western society is negative, producing stigmatized identities. Categorization is not a neutral act, it changes the way people act and think about a phenomenon, a situation or an individual. Individuals defined as belonging to a problem category, such as "drug addict" and "homeless", have to manage these attributed identities, either by acceptance or resistance.

The questions addressed in this paper are: how do methadone clients construct their social identities and how do these self-identities relate to 1) their prior stigma as drug addicts, and 2) the institutional identities ascribed to them by and through MMT? This identity construction is studied through narrative ethnography. In particular, the narrative resources and larger discourses that the clients use to construct their identity are explored. The data of the study are qualitative; transcribed interviews as well as field notes from observations in waiting rooms, receptions and staff meetings in three MMT-clinics.

Drawing on prior work on the management of stigmatized identities this paper illustrates and analyses which categories and institutional identities MMT-clients construct for themselves, and how they respond to membership categorizations attributed to them by others.

Are fathers accepted around here? Implicit and explicit messages about parenthood in Slovak media and legislation

The aim of this paper is to outline how media and legislation texts about reproduction and parenting interact with participants' accounts around these topics through the discourses they draw from.

Because of their power to form the public discourse, the media can influence how people "see" the world, what issues they think about, what is controversial for them and what is rather normal or even incontestable. Of course, the media discourse does not represent the public opinion, it is rather a discursive arena where the public debate is developed and personal opinions and attitudes are formed. On the other hand, legislative (con) texts overlap and interact with the real life practices, the agenda of the state as well as different political and civic groups.

We concentrated on print media and in order to investigate possible long-term changes of the media messages about reproduction and parenting we collected 1) all relevant articles in the last 10 years (2002-2011) in the most important mainstream broadsheet daily (N=1500) and analyzed them according to main themes and discourses they draw from. Then, to facilitate the inclusion of minority discourses, we collected also 2) all relevant articles in the most important Catholic broadsheet (N=132) for the last year (10/2010-9/2011). All the articles from the last year from both newspapers (N=305) were analyzed using qualitative thematic analysis and basic critical discursive analysis. To understand the legislative framework we analyzed 3) all relevant laws currently in force, selected laws also from the viewpoint of changes over time.

The findings from media and legislation text analysis correspond with the participants' accounts cumulated in our pilot study (4 focus-group discussions: 2 male, 2 female, aged 25-32, with a play-role instruction to simulate family-planning negotiation between two engaged partners), especially concerning the negative stereotypes about fatherhood.

Market making and organization of consumer goods markets

Modern markets are highly complex and organized institutions. They do not emerge spontaneously, but are created, reproduced and organized by efforts of various market-makers, typically but not exclusively large firms, who try to shape markets according to their own interests, capacities, and perceived comparative advantages. In this paper, I analyze the co-evolution of market institutions and market makers in the 20th century history of consumer goods markets. Despite being the most ubiquitous and generic type of markets, consumer goods markets have not attracted as much theoretical attention as financial markets do in economics or labor markets in sociology. Drawing on post-Keynesian economics, macromarketing literature and economic sociology, and elaborating on previously published work, I emphasize the key analytical and empirical benefits of focusing on consumer goods markets in understanding the general logic and the current transformation of market organization. The paper is organized around three analytic themes: (a) the micro-level analysis of market institutions, i.e. the institutions of searching and matching, pricing and contracting, and product management, and the way these are combined in various types of organized and reproducible "market packages," (b) the role and performance of market making organizations in creating such institutions and thus generating organized markets, and (c) market replication, integration, and growth of organizational complexity at the macro level. The interplay between these multi-level structures and processes is illustrated empirically through two historical examples: the emergence of mass-replicated consumer goods markets in the late 19th and the early 20th century American economy; the current process of the globalization of consumer goods markets with a special emphasis on the diffusion of shopping centers and e-retailing. The paper concludes by drawing general implications for market analysis in terms of market making and market organization.

Modernity and governance in four East Asian metropolises

Since 2010, more than half of world's urban population resides in Asian cities, and this proportion is expected to keep increasing for the next thirty years. With another 600 million newborns and migrants likely to join the ranks of Asian city dwellers in the next fifteen years, Asian metropolises and megaurban regions will certainly continue to dominate world rankings in terms of sheer size. Large East Asian cities also seem to be among the major beneficiaries of the newest wave of global integration. They are in the most dynamic region of the world economy, benefitting from large pools of migrant labor and with fewer legacy issues to deal with than their western counterparts. There should be little surprise then that instead of catching-up gradually, major East Asian metropolises often seem to have leapfrogged over the competition. They steal the spotlight not only by having the tallest skyscrapers, fastest trains, busiest airports, and longest bridges, but also the best schools and hospitals, avant-garde architecture, and the ability to stage spectacular events. Moreover, as the protagonists of the new polycentric, post-western modernity they are increasingly in position, for the first time ever, to define the standards and visions of what it means to be modern.

This paper draws on preliminary results from a multidisciplinary project on "Asian Cities as Centers of Global Modernity" and analyzes the relations between city makers, their visions of modernity, and the resulting styles of governance in four major Asian metropolises: Beijing, Shanghai, Hong Kong and Singapore. The focus is on the proliferation of city makers and the process through which they articulate their respective agendas into practical aspects of urban planning and management. The conclusion draws general implications for the twin questions of "who do the global cities belong to?" and "how are they to be governed?"

The everyday image of a Peronist nation? A discourse analysis of Peronism and power in Buenos Aires street art

On August 24th 2011 the Argentinian president Cristina Fernández de Kirchner inaugurated a huge mural of Eva Duarte de Perón, who is better known as Evita, at the top of the ministry of health and development building, in the political centre of Buenos Aires. Around the same time but in a different neighbourhood (Almagro), a group of party-members of the local JP (Juventud Peronista) painted six pannels commemorating the "Bicentenario", the two-hundred year anniversary of the nation, which represent central symbols of peronist movement such as Evita and the female vote, a topless and strong-build working-class man, Juan Domingo Perón encircled by the sun, and others. As a peronist, Fernández de Kirchner sees herself following the tradition of Evita Perón, who is in turn the Argentinian emblem of a caring, working-class-supporting and nationalist politician.

My M.A.-thesis, which I started writing in September 2011, forms the basis of this paper. Therein I analyze a dozen peronist murals, some painted by official powers, some by individuals, and over fifty stencils and graffiti which I collected in Buenos Aires in October 2011. With these expressions of autonomous individual and political art I try and search for a better understanding of the strength of the peronist myth which still agitates the whole nation. By doing a discourse analysis of this every day art in three different neighbourhoods of Buenos Aires, I will try to define the aesthetics of the "oficialismo" (government authorities) and its critics and therefore delineate the movements and emotions which are involved in the current power discourse.

(The abstract is also available in Spanish, as I could do the presentation in Spanish or English, as you prefer.)

Urban composition – Artists, publics and social-spatial transformation

The governmentalization of the right to the city, evident in such treatise as the World Social Forum's World Charter for the Right to the City, sustains a hierarchical view of the implementation of rights that sits in competition with the ethos of many self organized social movements. Lefebvre's affirmation of self-management ('autogestion'), organized as an alternative making of social space, intended to be read critically against such mechanisms, cannot but be seen now within the framework of capital's accommodation and recognition of self-management as a tool in the profitable inculcation of immaterial labour. Yet the terms of self-management that Lefebvre proposed are being practiced consistently. This sense of alternative practices of rights that works through and beyond the aesthetic and economic tools of capitalism forms the basis of our paper, which is drawn from our experience of curating Social Housing-Housing the Social (Amsterdam Nov 2011) within the context of public art commissioning.

As curators and theorists we are increasingly concerned with assumptions made within the cultural industries that art both contributes to new modes of thinking in Lefebvrian ways (imbricated, participatory, collective) and contributes significantly to urban economic transformation. This paper will examine some of the contradictions implicit in such an observation through case studies of artists and art collectives working critically with housing and property ownership, including Thomas Hirshhorn, Jeanne van Heeswijk, Recht auf der Stadt and the artists involved in Occupy Amsterdam.

Just as Lefebvre understood urbanism not as a fact but as a practice of recomposition, so the artists we will analyze in this paper are aiming to work beyond the confines of their autonomously understood position towards collective projects in which their invention comes in the form of creative reinterpretations of legal, political, discursive and access-based making.

Who goes and who stays: Betting on higher education in the context of expansion

The intense debate on the adoption of social programs for entry into higher education in its various formats (reserve positions, PROUNI, financing etc.) caused a huge rush for the production of data and building diagnostics on access to the university in Brazil according to gender, race, class or socioeconomic group. The present work aims to analyze the discussion from these and other aspects such as access to higher education as a mechanism of social reproduction or ascension, conditions and restrictions of this bet. Thus, the study presents three levels of data production (macro, meso and micro) and their analysis. At the macro level we tried to map the changes between young people (ages 18 to 29 years) in relation to investment in education and among those, who continue investment in higher education according to gender, color and family income through data from the National Household Sample Survey (PNAD) for the years 1993, 1998, 2003 and 2008. At the meso level will be discussed data from a survey conducted with students of the Rio de Janeiro State University (UERJ) about perceptions of inequality and mobility. And at the micro level, we carried out a series of qualitative interviews with selected UERJ's students according to the situation they are breeding, growing, and not shareholders and shareholders course he did.

The pop management culture and the construction of a market of corporative conducts in Brazil

Since the 1990's, Brazil has experienced a phenomenon that is known worldwide: entangled to the changes on the productive structure, a profusion of new notions concerning the characteristics of a perfect worker came about. An employee, and anyone who is trying to become one, has to be proactive, has to become an entrepreneur and be able to manage oneself – from problems with tasks of work life to the engineering of one's career, one is obligated to seek a life of one's own and take responsibility to the paths that their life takes.

This study tries to understand this process, but through a different perspective. It is assumed that, to do so, it is crucial to take knowledge of the construct of a market that is entwined to this process: a market where what is sold are performances, ways of conducting oneself through work and, as some producers of this market would say, through life. The idea is to apprehend how a practice, strongly subjective and vocational, becomes a product, sold through discourses highly normative and prescriptive such as self-help literature and pop management magazines.

Who are the actors involved in this market? What legitimates their actions and the construction of such products? These are the questions that this essay tries to answer. To do so, we will employ the concept of field, key in Bourdieu's work and developed by authors such as Lahire, and apprehend this market as a field of force and power relations, entwined to the changes on the labor market and the management and business studies, where actors struggle to legitimate discourses, recipes of ways to "make friends and influence people", "be a servant leader", and become "an highly effective worker" on the corporative world.

Contesting local governance in a poor peri-urban community : A case study in Senegal

The informality of African cities is currently the object of many academic debates, the population's capacity for self-organization being praised while at the same time spatial inequalities and social injustice are decried. Based on the study of a neighbourhood development at the periphery of Dakar, the presentation shows how there is very little public space left to contesting socio-spatial inequalities in poor communities that are caught in between the reformist "technical" approach to participation put forward by international aid discourse and projects, the traditional local power structure and the "modern state" form of governance. Contrary to the widely accepted meaning of informality, peri-urban neighbourhoods are confronted with a structured form of multi-scale and multi-agent governance operating via a formal, albeit implicit, order. In Senegal, social movements and youth's spontaneous organisations are contesting the national state, but political action at the local scale, as in the «set setal» movement (collective campaigns to clean the environment), seems choreographed. I will put forward the hypothesis that this is not for a lack of institutionalization and decentralization, but for an absence of public discourse on and popular representations of the nature of collective urban space and its transformation processes. A reflection on urban space as a common good is impeded by the political order in place, an order that was characterized by Chabal and Daloz (1999) as the instrumentalization of disorder. The presentation will conclude on the possible sites for citizen organisations emergence and power sharing at the local level and the need of a political approach to urban planning rather than the accommodating form effectively practiced or the concepts and ideals conveyed in international policies and reports.

Democratic participation, social justice and access to university in England and France: To select or not to select?

There has been considerable expansion of higher education in England and France since the 1960s and especially during the past two decades. Both the number and proportion of young people going to university have increased dramatically in the two countries. This has been due to specific government policies aimed at raising the amount of graduates, in the population in order to boost the economy and improve social justice.

This paper will examine whether greater participation has led to wider participation in higher education in England and France since the 1990s.

First, I will briefly explore the landscape of recent policy changes regarding higher education in England and France. Then I will study in more detail policies on widening participation to hitherto under-represented members of the population in these two countries that have very different approaches to social justice and fair access in higher education. This will lead to a discussion on the effectiveness of contemporary widening participation, fair access and social justice policies in England and France.

Neoliberalismo, reforma del estado y privatizaciones: La globalización de un modelo de gestión de la fuerza de trabajo. El caso de France télécom en Argentina y Francia

La Reforma del Estado llevada a cabo en la Argentina a inicios de la década de 1990 encontró en las sucesivas privatizaciones de empresas públicas uno de los vectores más importantes para que aquella pudiera llevarse a cabo. En tal sentido, fue la privatización de ENTel, en noviembre de 1990, la primera de gran magnitud y la que marcaría el rumbo que seguiría la imposición de nuevos modelos de gestión de la fuerza de trabajo en las restantes empresas estatales que serán cedidas al capital privado.

Pero este fenómeno no se limitó a la periferia, tal cual lo demuestran los recientes suicidios de trabajadores franceses en France Télécom, empresa que fuera una de las adjudicatarias de la ex-ENTel junto con Telefónica de España. Este fenómeno desencadenó un profundo debate en Francia sobre los límites objetivos que presenta un modelo de management fuertemente anclado en el incremento incesante de la productividad laboral.

En la presente ponencia analizaremos la actuación de France Télécom en ambos países; haciendo especial hincapié en describir tácticas y mecanismos que caracteriza a este modelo de management surgido con los procesos privatizadores de Occidente y que fungieron como el verdadero brazo ejecutor en la expansión de la doctrina de gobierno neoliberal a escala planetaria.

La hipótesis sobre la cual girará nuestro trabajo nos conduce a sostener que el rasgo distintivo de los modelos de management en pugna se caracteriza por reducir a los cuerpos a su mero soporte de valor de cambio.

Sobre este presupuesto teórico descansa el sufrimiento psicofísico de los trabajadores, tal cual puede apreciarse por la profusa literatura francesa al respecto.

Can rights cure? The impact of rights-based litigation on health system transformation in South Africa

This paper considers the impact of court judgments upholding the right of access to health care services on the transformation of the South African health system, which remains one of the most unequal and least efficient in the world. While rich and upper-class South Africans have access to excellent medical care in the private sector, the public health system, which has to serve the overwhelming majority of the population, is severely under-resourced and under-capacitated. This means that quality health care in South Africa is often dependent on patients' ability to afford private sector care. As the State attempts to address these untenable inequalities, interest groups, patients and activists continually articulate demands for care, as well as support or opposition to health system transformation, in rights terms. The South African Constitution of 1996 contains several justiciable socio-economic rights, including a right to have access to health care services, as well as a number of other rights, such as the right to equality, which are relevant to health system reform. This means that courts are increasingly called upon to pronounce on issues of health system transformation. Relying on examples from South African caselaw and literature pertaining to the transformative potential of social rights litigation, the paper first considers the extent to which judgments involving health-related rights have impacted on the lives of patients and on the strength of the social movements that represent them. Thereafter, the paper turns to theory pertaining to the bureaucratic impact of judicial decisions, in seeking to explain the seemingly disparate impact that judgments upholding the right to health have had on the South African government's efforts to transform the health system.

La polémica con el humanismo como vector de problematización e innovación teóricas en sociología

El presente trabajo releva, coteja y contrasta los usos dados por la teoría general de sistemas sociales (TGSS) de Niklas Luhmann y por la teoría del actor-red (actor-network) (TAR) de Bruno Latour a la polémica con la tradición humanista, y evalúa la incidencia de estos usos en las innovaciones teóricas introducidas tanto por la TGSS como por la ANT en el concepto de lo social, enfocando comparativamente los arcos teóricos tendidos por Luhmann entre el concepto de comunicación y el antihumanismo y por Latour entre el concepto de colectivo y el poshumanismo. La perspectiva comparada favorece el desarrollo de una argumentación teórica sistemática sobre la hipótesis principal de este trabajo, a saber: la polémica con el humanismo constituye un vector positivo para la producción de innovaciones teóricas y para la distinción de las propuestas de ambos autores.

Biographies of activists in social movement in Chiapas, Mexico

Social movements as emancipatory movements, the struggle against legal oppression, social discrimination and economic disadvantage have a long tradition in Latin America. Actually, the mobilisation of people in social movements occurs along a wide spectrum of motivations; gender, ethnic and religious membership becomes a relevant aspect of orientation in current social movements. This presentation will focus on Chiapas as a place where a high level of inequality is evident in the dynamics of the social space. Furthermore the social dynamics are influenced by the economic and political forces acting from outside.

On the bases of an empirical study biographies of activists in social movements will be the focus. Strategies to deal with social inequality and discrimination will be analysed on the basis of the activists narratives. Social actors for instance occupy and acquire cultural-political spaces which give them opportunities to break open the power of definition coming from the established mainstream in order to pressurise political decision makers. Increasingly ethnicised discourses appear as a political resource whereby ethnicity is constructed different. On one side, the ethnic focus is used as a symbol of discrimination from which a larger group of persons is affected in order to enable alliances between different groups in terms of social change. On the other hand it functions as a marker of differing cultural practices in order to strengthen social habits such as a strong collective orientation in contrast to processes of individualisation. This study focuses in particular on strategies which possibly lead to regional social change and on learning processes which are imbedded in social movement activities. The analysis additionally highlights some of the problems and conflicts which appear when communities or groups are divided by memberships in different social movements. How to deal with these conflicts inside the communities also initiates learning processes.

Power relations and social control in violent areas

This paper discusses the interaction dynamics of people who live in areas with high levels of crime rates and presence of organized/non-organized groups related to violent or criminal actions. The focus is on how such groups establish power relations, as well as the types of social control they exert over the population. In the first part, social interaction dynamics in various sociability levels are taken into consideration, such as the relationship between neighbors and outsiders, youth gangs and drug dealers. In the second part, we focus on the social contact with power groups involved in violent and criminal actions. The role of social networks, daily sociability practices in public and private spaces and feelings of fear and insecurity is analyzed in order to understand how strategies of coping with social control exerted by power groups are elaborated and enacted by the population. The paper presents some of the results of a research that took place in five Brazilian cities, in 2009, based on 30 focus groups with inhabitants of violent neighborhoods. The project targeted areas that received special attention by the National Program of Public Security with Citizenship (Pro-nasci) and was coordinated by the Fórum Brasileiro de Segurança Pública (FBSP), financed by the Ministry of Justice/Public Security Office.

Elites políticas y empresarias en la transformación de una ciudad en destino turístico

A mediados del año 2003 se inauguró una mega-obra de infraestructura vial en la Argentina que consolidó una nueva vía de articulación del territorio nacional a través del valle fluvial del río Paraná. El monumental viaducto conectó físicamente dos ciudades muy diferentes: de un lado, en la provincia de Santa Fe, Rosario, una urbe portuaria e industrial, que supera al millón de habitantes; del otro, en Entre Ríos, Victoria, un tradicional enclave agropecuario con poco más de 30.000 habitantes. Centrando nuestra investigación en el segundo contexto, constatamos que a partir de la apertura al tránsito del punte se hicieron palpables una serie de impactos: Victoria no sólo quedó conectada con una de las principales ciudades argentinas sino que su destino parece haberse transformado para siempre, ligado al lugar que crecientemente fue ocupando el turismo. Su concepción de 'destino turístico' se vio consolidada con la instalación de diversos emprendimientos, y paralelamente fueron surgiendo múltiples lecturas en claves de ventajas y desventajas en torno a esta nueva identidad local. El presente trabajo propone un análisis antropológico de este proceso social, examinando una dimensión poco atendida de los procesos de turistificación con vistas a aportar al conocimiento de la relación entre turismo y cambios sociales. Basándonos en una serie de investigaciones etnográficas desarrolladas entre los años 1999 y 2009 en dicha localidad, en esta oportunidad, focalizaremos nuestra atención en la interacción de diversas agencias locales, provinciales y nacionales que participan del proceso de cambio que vive Victoria. Nos interesa dar cuenta de algunas aristas de las relaciones entre elites políticas y empresarias, donde lo público y lo privado se encuentran, enfrentan y combinan, y cómo dichas relaciones producen efectos locales concretos que requieren ser atendidos.

A produção agroecológica em agroecossistemas : Uma estratégia de sustentabilidade socioambiental

O uso inadequado dos recursos naturais tem configurado um processo de degradação ambiental, surgindo daí a necessidade de se buscar mecanismos de desenvolvimento rural tendo como fundamento a lógica da sustentabilidade, que se caracteriza como sendo "ecologicamente correta, economicamente viável, socialmente justa e adaptável". Sendo assim, diante das demandas sociais e ambientais resultantes dos impactos ambientais, surge a Agroecologia, como um novo paradigma de produção agrícola que propõe a utilização de técnicas e práticas de produção ecologicamente sustentáveis. Assim, o processo de transição para uma produção agroecológica pode ser considerado uma alternativa viável que pode ser desenvolvida por agroecossistemas principalmente de base familiar, tendo em vista a produção de alimentos de forma sustentável. Considerando que o processo de produção agroecológica provoca pequenos impactos ao meio ambiente e ao homem, contribuindo sobremaneira para a melhoria da qualidade de vida dos milhares de trabalhadores que se encontram em nichos de vulnerabilidade social e ambiental. Com base nos pressupostos o presente estudo tem como objetivo principal de analisar os fatores que vem desencadeando o processo de transição agroecológica em três diferentes regiões do Brasil a partir de uma pesquisa tendo como base aportes teóricos que estudam das temáticas em foco. Para tanto, foram relatadas três experiências em propriedades que tem passado por esse processo de transição da agricultura convencional para a agricultura agroecológica. Os resultados apresentam elementos relevantes alcançados nos diferentes relatos, mostrando os fatores que contribuem para a adaptação desse processo que pode ocorrer de forma articulada entre os diversos atores sociais envolvidos. São propostas desafiadoras para produção de alimentos de forma sustentável na relação o homem - meio ambiente, considerando que as alternativas à agricultura convencional possuem filosofias próprias e em alguns casos, com motivação religiosa. Mulheres, cisternas e água: Reconfigurando cenários no semi-árido nordestino Brasileiro

O cenário do semiárido nordestino brasileiro em função dos longos períodos de estiagem é marcado por vulnerabilidades de ordem econômica, social e ambiental, pois as famílias rurais que habitam o chamado polígono da seca sofrem com a escassez de água e a falta de políticas públicas capazes de promover a cidadania e distribuição de renda nessa região. Contudo, este cenário de vulnerabilidade começa a mudar a partir da década de 90 com a implementação de tecnologias inovadoras de acesso à água. Desse modo, o presente trabalho teve como foco principal avaliar a vulnerabilidade social das mulheres residentes na Comunidade Massapê, localizada no Município de Picuí na Paraíba, antes e depois da construção das cisternas de placas. Por meio de um resgate histórico e história de vida das mulheres agricultoras, da família e da criança frente à sociedade, apresentando uma trajetória de sofrimento vivenciado pelas mulheres agricultoras, que por não terem reservatórios capazes de armazenar água de qualidade perto de casa, tinham que se deslocarem muitos quilômetros como objetivo de buscar a água destinada a suprir as necessidades básicas diárias da casa. Contudo, a partir da construção das cisternas de placa, proposta implantada pelo Programa um Milhão de Cisternas – P1MC, a Comunidade se mobilizou em mutirões para construir as cisternas, e as mulheres tiveram condições de armazenar água de chuva próximo das suas residências e, portanto, não mais precisando fazer as árduas caminhadas diárias. Nesse sentido, evidencia-se que é possível a configuração de uma nova realidade social, econômica e ambiental no semiárido brasileiro a partir do momento que os atores sociais se articulam com diversas entidades no sentido de ampliar as ações de convivência com o semiárido, na perspectiva da melhoria da renda e a igualdade de gênero.

Consumos culturales y educación

Este trabajo es parte de un proyecto se propone profundizar, en colaboración con los profesores de una unidad académica, los conocimientos acerca de los consumos y las prácticas culturales de la población escolar, a fin de contrastarlas con las representaciones de los docentes sobre los alumnos y alumnas y sus prácticas pedagógicas. Se busca contribuir al mejoramiento de las propuestas de enseñanza que actualmente se llevan a cabo en esta escuela a través de la puesta en debate de las representaciones de los docentes sobre el perfil cultural de los jóvenes y niños de su escuela.

El propósito principal es dar lugar a las particularidades de los alumnos a través de objetivar lo cotidiano y mostrar lo invisible en la realidad escolar a fin de convertirlo en conocimiento útil para las prácticas educativas.

Las hipótesis de trabajo son las siguientes:

- La imagen devaluada de los docentes sobre los niños y jóvenes afecta tanto la calidad de los aprendizajes como la posibilidad de sostener su tarea pedagógica.
- Los consumos culturales de los chicos modelan su subjetividad y establecen marcas de identidad.
- Conocer a los sujetos destinatarios de la educación es fundamental para la práctica pedagógica.
- Acercar determinadas prácticas infantiles y juveniles ligadas a la cultura popular a las prácticas pedagógicas y a la cultura escolar puede facilitar una recomposición del vínculo pedagógico y re-posicionar a la escuela como creadora de cultura y de sentido.

Es un estudio cualitativo basado en el análisis de los testimonios de los chicos acerca de los sentidos que dan a sus consumos y prácticas, y la reflexión con los docentes en talleres, en función de revisar sus estrategias pedagógicas. Esta presentación se basa en lo declarado por los chicos en grupos focales por ciclo.

Corporate discourses in education

Different forms of privatization, some of them hidden, lead to the expansion of the market at the expense of society, but what has grown in education is far from a "free market." Educational Management Organization (EMO) is the acronym coined by the investment community to name the for-profit, private companies that manage schools. Businesspeople and investors have viewed education as an open field in which to expand their opportunities. Due the strong support given to charter schools and to partnerships with business from both biggest political parties in the United States, the number of for-profit EMO and the number of states in which EMO are operating has increased over the past 10 years. The politics and policies of education in the United States constitute one of the bases for anticipating the school reform trends in Latin America. The increase of educational corporate management in the United States marks a world trend, because corporate strategies originate in the "advanced" countries and subsequently are transferred to "developing countries".

This study examines the websites of major EMO and associated texts, to analyze the way in which they represented themselves. The methodology is based on critical discourse analysis and multimodal analysis including some elements of what Foucault has termed genealogy. In this paper, I return to my first analysis on the topic, ten years later, asking: How do EMO's design their images, build relations and attract consumers and, in turn shape what is understood and experienced as public education? Along the way, I reflect on the changes that have occurred in the websites, although a comparison across time is not the major focus.

The power of critic: Social risks and corporate social responsibility

This paper aims at analyzing the meanings given to the notion of "social risk", used by business consultants and business managers to refer to conflicts over land involving social and environmental movements and to understanding the meaning of the actions justified in the name of the need to "manage" such risks. Consultants and managers of large companies argue that the "corporate social responsibility" programs enable a closer relationship between the company and the community and contribute to building consensus on business activities, stabilizing the social environment where the company is located. As the object of analysis, we concentrate on the study of Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) related initiatives in the pulp and paper sector in Brazil. From this research, we intend to verify the way in which CSR projects operate in communities to mitigate the resistance of social actors mobilized against the territorialization of eucalyptus plantations in the North of the state of Espírito Santo and the South of the state of Bahia.

Este escrito obedece a la socialización de una experiencia de trabajo que realizamos en la Universidad Pedagógica Nacional de Colombia, desde el grupo de atención a problemas socialmente relevantes de la división de bienestar universitario. Desde este grupo le apostamos a la construcción de la PEDAGOGIA DE LAS DROGAS, como una estrategia de inclusión social en la escuela. Las preguntas rector de esta ponencia son ¿Porqué no se enseña sobre drogas a los jóvenes en la escuela y universidad?, ¿Porque no existe una Pedagogía de las Drogas al interior de los currículos escolares primarios y secundarios?, ¿Porque no se educa sobre drogas y si se excluye y estigmatiza al joven usador de estas sustancias? ¿Qué hacer y cómo construir una pedagogía de las drogas?

Basados en la experiencia de trabajo de casi dos años al interior de la universidad pedagógica nacional de colombia, nos atrevemos a plantear una pedagogía de las drogas fundamentada en la ciencia de las drogas, en los modelos alternativos de intervención y las formas horizontales de dirección. Consecuentemente las acciones realizadas durante el tiempo de trabajo nos generan la evidencia empírica de la necesidad de un cambio de paradigma en políticas y modelos de intervención en materia de drogas, la aplicación de modelos y estrategias de tratamiento de base comunitaria con un carácter de inclusión social y respeto del derecho humano fundamental, y el reconocimiento de status científico de la etnofarmacognocia o ciencia de las drogas, como disciplina científica.

Las buenas prácticas y las lecciones aprendidas serán la evidencia constante que estamos generando una pedagogía de las drogas conun caracter netamente incluyente, alternativo y basado en la evidencia, no en el miedo y la represión policial.

Globalization and the shifts in earnings inequality in Poland

Over the 20-year transition process Poland's economy has experienced the fundamental changes generated by globalization: moving from manufacturing to services, trade openness and foreign capital flows, technological change, education progress, and migration. These changes have influenced both sides of labor market and they have been responsible for the shifts in earnings inequality. Distinguishing a polarization of the distribution from upgrading, downgrading or convergence can be crucial for identifying causes of changes in income inequality resulted from globalization.

There is a main research question: who derives benefit from globalization in Poland? The answer required: firstly, to identify the shifts in the earnings distribution across working groups in Poland over 1998-2010; secondly, to investigate (direct and indirect) mechanisms through which globalization has affected these shifts. In the first step, the research is based on the relative distribution method. The analyses refer to household's income from hired work that covers all the incomes gained from hired full-time employment (or earnings). The data come from the Polish Household Budget Surveys. The whole sample is broken down by the following categories: age, education, 10 occupations and 21 industries as well as by 16 provinces.

In the second step the globalization mechanisms affecting the shifts in earnings inequality are investigated. The research is based on the econometric models estimated by panel techniques. Polarization indices, calculated in the first step, are used as dependent variables. The first model allows to identify factors important in the direct mechanisms. A set of independent variables covers factors being of interest: exports, imports, and FDI, broken down by industries. The second model describes the indirect mechanisms through which globalization influences the distributional shifts via technological change and human capital improvement.

El mercado de la muerte: Un estado de la cuestión sobre cementerios, memoriales y jardines de paz

En los últimos años hemos sido testigos, en la Argentina, de la emergencia de un mercado más diferenciado y diversificado en torno de las prácticas sociales de disposición de los muertos, expresado principalmente en una expansión de cementerios privados que apuntan a públicos disímiles y ofrecen distintos tipos de "servicios." En este sentido, y en el marco de un proyecto más amplio sobre "muerte, política y sociedad en la Argentina del siglo XX-XXI", hemos planteado algunos interrogantes de investigación con relación a las cambiantes prácticas culturales sobre la muerte y a los modos en que se ha visto afectado el vínculo que establecen las personas con el fallecimiento de un ser querido desde el punto de vista de su gestión. Abordar estas cuestiones ha exigido, entre otras cosas, una revisión de los estudios sociales sobre "cementerios". Al respecto, el panorama bibliográfico especializado muestra una amplia variedad de perspectivas; pero son dos en particular las que resultan más relevantes en relación con nuestro objeto de estudio. En primer lugar, el análisis de la reproducción de diferencias sociales y su materialización a través de prácticas culturales y espacios diferenciados de disposición de los muertos, así como las disputas sociales, la segregación y las identidades. En este sentido, los cementerios se tratan como escenario (uno entre otros) de la distinción. En segundo lugar, es interesante dar cuenta de los abordajes que se centran en el análisis de los cementerios desde una perspectiva espacial y territorial, centrándose en las cuestiones urbanísticas y de diseño, en los usos que cada diseño habilita y en el lugar del cementerio en la ciudad moderna.

En esta ponencia se presentará un avance de la revisión bibliográfica sobre estas dos perspectivas apenas mencionadas, intentando además poner en diálogo sus aportes (y establecer ejes de comparación) con el caso argentino.

The inscribed sensory body: The asynchronous maps of the embodied spaces in mobile Media Age

The Body and its Limit: Body Rhythms, Social Rhythms in the Information Society

The body is the compass of mind. The nature of mind must be understood on the basis of its origin, the process of its becoming, by the biological mechanism of trial and error endlessly at work. Like all living organisms, the human body is organized according to a specific time structure, where all vital functions show a temporal variability which can be described by periodic functions ranging in the length of their cycle from milliseconds to months or years, even decades. The importance of this time structure for a normal functioning has been established in many branches of human physiology. The "timekeepers" involved are as different as stopwatches and sundials. Some are accurate and inflexible, others less reliable but subject to conscious control. This paper will try to prove, by experimental samples highly patterned by the "hidden level of culture"—a set of unspoken, implicit rules of behavior and thoughts that controls everything you do. [Hall, T.H. (1989), The Dance of Life, New York, Anchor books), that rhythm is the ultimate dynamic building block in not only personality, but also communication and health. Rhythm is, indeed, the very essence of time, since equal intervals of time define a sequence of events as rhythmic. In the sense the rhythm is used here, it includes much more than the productions of musicians and dancers, although they are part of this process too. If behavior of this sort could be identified through the study of man's use of space, what might we expect to find in the study of time?

Socio-psychological dynamics of pilgrimage in turbulent times: A case study of Hazratbal Shrine

Kashmir is widely known as Pir-i-Waird 'the valley of saints' from the times immemorial. Hazratbal being the repository of the sacred hair of Prophet Muhammad PUBH has emerged a leading pilgrimage centre in Kashmir. In times of personal and public troubles the shrine has not only been the source for religious rituals but serving the socio-psychological needs. Given the long drawn conflict of two and a half decades all avenues of leisure and outing have been inaccessible to the inhabitants thus the shrines alone remain accessible to the common man irrespective of faith meeting the needs of their socio-religious worldview. As a consequence the shrines have been frequented by the people in the turbulent times to experience a socio-spiritual and psychological relief that has helped them to live up the personal and public troubles. Among the many functions that are performed by the shrine, the leisure and recreational functions stands out eminent.

In times of life crisis and life cycle events a visit to the shrine is considered a Baraka with a strong belief that the radiation of sacredness of the shrine would help in healing the crisis. Notwithstanding with an increasing consumption of media, pilgrimage to shrines remain the most important leisure activity in Kashmir.

To sum up in this paper the central argument would be to contextualize the social reality of pilgrimage and closely examine the efficacy and relationship of pilgrimage with the personal/public troubles. Moreover to analyse 'how the pilgrimage sites help in the sustained integration of society at macro and micro level during the troubled times.

Thus through the qualitative and quantitative approach there will be an attempt to develop a sociological knowledge of the contemporary relationship amongst the variables such as personal/impersonal troubles and the pilgrimage to the shrine at Hazratbal.

Global imbrications between sex and marriage markets: Brazilian women in Southern Europe

Globalization has had effects in the transnationalization of sex markets and has also facilitated opportunities for the formation of transnational couples and marriages. In this paper I explore the connections between both processes taking as reference the migratory trajectories of Brazilian women in Italy and Spain. Though Brazilians are not the largest immigrant group in these countries, Brazilian women are overrepresented in the sex industries there, and are also one of the main foreign groups that marry Spanish and Italian men. Drawing on ethnographic research carried out in transnational locations, since 2000 in Fortaleza, considered to be a center of sex tourism in the Northeast of Brazil and since 2004 with Brazilian women that migrated from different sectors of the sex markets to Italy and Spain, or who engaged in sex work in the migratory contexts I analyze the love and marriage relationships that arise from these encounters. Considering the effects of the imbrications of sex and marriage markets in the styles of intimacy, marriage and family dynamics of those couples I explore how a particular notion of "difference" that involves nationality, class, race and sexualization is a source of tension for the couples and, at the same time, an arena for the women's agency.

El absentismo laboral en las organizaciones. Un enfoque sociológico

El absentismo laboral en las organizaciones económicas es analizado desde distintas perspectivas y en función de diferentes objetivos e intereses. Ahora bien, la comunicación tiene por objetivo desarrollar un mapa de las principales líneas interpretativas de dicho fenómeno, así como la ponderación del papel asignado a las principales variables intervinientes y relevantes en una perspectiva sociológica (tipos de empresa, formas de organización interna y sistemas de control, tecnologías, tipo de empleo, cualificación, edad, sexo, etc.). Este análisis lo contextualizamos en el marco de la conflictividad laboral, en tanto estrategia teórica de diferenciación de los planteos que ubican el absentismo como indicador del ajuste de los trabajadores individuales a su medio laboral. En función de la sistematización anterior, proponemos una tipología sociológica de las formas o modalidades de absentismo.

Percepciones sobre la movilidad social y la planificación de trayectorias: Un enfoque biográfico sobre las incertidumbres al interior del hogar. Argentina. 2011

En Argentina, en el año 1976 comienza un proceso de apertura de la economía y liberalización de la misma, profundizado los noventa, con implicancias directas sobre la estructura social. Esas transformaciones se tradujeron a nivel social en un cuestionamiento de ideas simbólicas afianzadas en la sociedad hasta entonces: a igualdad de credenciales y accionar, igualdad de destinos.

Dichas ideas simbólicas se habían afianzado en una sociedad que atravesó por un proceso de industrialización por sustitución de importaciones, con una fuerte intervención estatal en la regulación de la relación capital trabajo, eje central de la modernidad que configura, propiedad privada mediante, las desigualdades sociales inherentes al sistema. Esto sucedió mediante la instauración un derecho social con el objetivo ideal de que todos pudieran disponer de recursos mínimos para su independencia: no se trata de una sociedad de iguales pero sí de semejantes, en la cual en el horizonte de posibilidades existe para los ciudadanos la promesa de la posibilidad de programar el porvenir.

Partiendo de estos supuestos, el siguiente artículo se propone analizar de manera cualitativa las percepciones de personas que atravesaron por diferentes procesos de movilidad social, con respecto a su origen, sobre las posibilidades de planificar las trayectorias de vida de todos los integrantes del hogar. Se utiliza una metodología historias de vida basadas en el enfoque biográfico y analizadas desde el método genealógico y comparado de Bertaux.

Se pretende aportar elementos para comprender los vínculos que se forman entre la estructura social, como una estructura de larga duración, y los patrones de desigualdad social que impactan los cursos de vida de los sujetos, en particular sobre el marco de referencia con el cual los mismos interpretan sus horizontes y expectativas de certidumbre / incertidumbre con respecto a los flujos probables de movilidad social al interior del hogar.

Globalization and social movements in the last decade: De-coupling internationalization and institutionalization?

While social movement and global civil society analysts have strongly associated social movements internationalization with their institutionalization (e.g. Keck & Sikkink, 1998; Tilly 2004), a new path towards an internationalization with less institutionalization and centered on more grassroots actors has emerged in the first decade of the 21st century. Drawing on a study of the World Social Forums, the US Social Forum and the rise of some international networks of grassroots actors, this paper will show that, while a pattern of institutionalisation exists within these forums and networks, it has been countered by the political culture of WSF activists; a culture that favours horizontality, internal democracy and the active participation of grassroots actors. The US Social Forum offers another interesting case study, as it has clearly rejected the participation of the most institutional part of US civil society. After describing some of its feature, the paper will focus on contextual elements that have fostered this form of internalization, its potential and some of its limits.

Indignados and occupiers: A reactive, creative and democratic movement

Inspired by the Arab revolts and regenerating some feature of the culture of the alter-activists, indignados and occupiers camps and activists have spread over Europe and North America. Drawing on fieldwork research in London and New York and of a review of the early literature dedicated to this movement, this paper proposes to successively analyze its mixed scales of actions, protest and meanings and to consider it as a reactive, creative and democratization movement.

(1) A global movement?

Preliminary fieldwork suggests a contrast between an international repertoire of actions (places occupation, camps, symbolic action, democratic assemblies...) and global scope and meanings (opposition to the hold of global corporations and financial markets) on one side, and, on the other, the dominant national framework and limited international initiatives of most of its actors. In Western Europe, the continental scale has actually been less present than in previous waves of protests, including jobless mobilizations of the late 1990s or the alter-globalization movements and its European social forums.

(2) A reactive movement

On one side, the intensity of the occupiers/indignados movement in each country seems to be connected to the intensity of the social and economic crisis. On the other side, the movement impact in mainstream media suggests it has been highly successful in providing alternative meanings and narratives to the global crisis

(3) A creative movement
