The occupiers/indignados movements, and in particular their occupation camps, have open "spaces of experiences" that foster the expression of activists creativity and subjectivity (McDonald, 2006) and the implementation of prefigurative activism by which participants experiments alternative forms of social relations and democracy.

(4) A democratic movement

Democracy may be considered as the core value of these experiences, both in activists' claims (e.g. the opposition to the power of global corporations) and in their concrete experimentations and innovations.

Higher education and the role of family background: Reproduction of the social structure?

After a massive expansion of Higher Education in recent decades, a key question is whether it reduces inequality by providing better opportunities to people of lower socioeconomic status, or it magnifies difference, by disproportionally expanding opportunities for those groups that are already privileged. In this context, access to Higher Education can be considered both as a vehicle for social mobility; or as a mechanism of social closure resulting in the reproduction of the social class system.

Taking this question into consideration, for this paper we analyze whether family background (and other individual characteristics such as age, gender, etc) play a part in the possibility to access and successfully finish Higher Education studies in Argentina. We understand that social reproduction takes place not only through the transmission of material conditions, but also through the intergenerational transmission of cultural capital and standards of education. The study is quantitative, using secondary data from a survey about Social Stratification and Social Mobility conducted in 2007-8. The sample is random, and has 3313 cases nationwide.

The transnational positions of male Chinese-Singaporean migrants and their social integration in transnational spaces

This presentation presents conceptual and theoretical ideas in order to generate an analytical model—transnational positions—that can analyze the subjective perceptions of (in)equalities of the 22 male Chinese-Singaporean transnational migrants when they attempted to access desired cultural, social, economic, and/or political resources in their transnational contexts, which they constructed through migration. The proposed model, by deconstructing the Chinese male migrants' performances of their transnational positions, can undertake in-depth analysis of thick data in order to explain how the transnational migrants' performances of their 'transnational positions' is related to their subjective experiences of (in)equalities when attempting to access desired resources in their transnational spaces and to their social integration in the different places in which these male transnational migrants lived.

When social risk became individual. Biographies made during December 2001 in Argentina

In order to analyze the careers of middle-class professionals between 2001 and 2008, I interviewed 60 individuals belonging to 14 families. The question of the first meeting was to tell me the story of his family at work. The fact that interviews were conducted between December 20, 2001 and January 20, 2002, the reference to the context of national crisis was - as might be expected given the nature of the crisis very strong. However, the interested about these biographical discourses is the way that social risks resulting from the economic, social and political crisis, become personal risks.

The aim of this paper is to analyze the way in which the actors transform these social risks in individual risks. That is, analyzing the way in which social risks are translated into individual risks in their own labour itineraries. To do this, we will focus primarily on the biographies of young professionals during those years were inserted for the first time in the labor market. Through analysis of these biographies, I propose a reflection on the way in which biography as methodology allows us to account for social history.

Visual representation of desurbanization: New downshifting communities in the near north of Russia

An extensive sociological survey on the effects of 'cellular' globalization on a rural region typical of "Russia's heartland." Pokrovsky's team works in the Russian region of Kostroma, which is similar in size to West Virginia and has a population of 800,000.

Despite the region's seeming isolation from the currents of the global trading system, a process of "cellular globalization" is subtly but inexorably changing the character of the region. Cellular globalization refers to the emergence of internalized changes within the individual attributable to the effects of globalization. It is noted that almost every family in the region's rural areas has relatives in larger cities—the regional capital of Kostroma, Moscow, or St. Petersburg—and these extended networks are carrying the influences of globalization back to the Russian heartland. This process is slowly changing traditional rural attitudes towards wealth—more rural residents are placing greater importance on wealth than in the past.

The effects of globalization will not be limited to the internal lives of the residents of Kostroma. It is suggested that new urban-rural aggregations would come to support each other in the formation of new communities. The economic basis of these communities will include niche agriculture (such as agricultural tourism and organic agriculture), regulated hunting and fishing resorts, and local handicrafts. A new migration force is about to radically change the profile of local community life. The dramatic crisis of urban life (for example, in the cities like Moscow) enables sizeable groups of middle-class professionals and IT-experts to consider moving to environmentally balanced areas in the North of Russia while continuing their professional employment in the format of distant work. It brings into being a new form of horizontal mobility which is 'liquid' by its nature.

The paper is illustrated with diverse visual materials.

Los conflictos ambientales como laboratorios culturales y políticos

Los conflictos ambientales se están convirtiendo en laboratorios culturales, sociales y políticos en los que comunidades afectadas por alguna obra o intervención que amenaza a su territorio llegan a reelaborar de ideas, valores y visiones del mundo que, en algunos casos, se convierten en prácticas y proyectos alternativos al actual modelo de desarrollo.

La presente comunicación se centrará en la descripción de algunos de los procesos cognitivos que se desencadenan en estas experiencias, en los que las emociones juegan un papel fundamental, y que finalmente contribuyen a la emancipación de los participantes. A través el estudio de tres casos de conflicto contra obras hidráulicas, en España y México, analizaremos la dimensión política de la protesta, desde los cambios en la percepción de la política institucional, a la reelaboraciones de conceptos como democracia, desarrollo y progreso, para llegar a la experimentación de nuevas prácticas. También examinaremos los cambios en la dimensión biográfica de los participantes, que a través de un proceso de empoderamiento se convierten en sujetos políticos conscientes de sus capacidades a la hora de influir en decisiones que afectan a su territorio y sus vidas.

La metodología empleada en la investigación son el estudio de caso y el análisis cualitativo de la información recogida a través de entrevistas semi-estructuradas y en profundidad a los miembros de las comunidades afectadas. El enfoque elegido será desde abajo, centrado en los participantes y activistas locales de estas experiencias de resistencia, en su dimensión biográfica y colectiva y/o comunitaria. Partiendo de la reelaboración del análisis teórico de la protesta de investigadores como James Jasper o James C. Scott, con el aporte de la literatura latinoamericana sobre las experiencias de resistencia y nuevas prácticas, véase Raul Zibechi, John Holloway, etc. nos proponemos contribuir a la comprensión de los conflictos ambientales como experiencias de emancipación.

The role of emotions in protest. A proposal of analysis

The aim of the paper will be to describe how the authors have studied the role of emotions in local protests. Focusing on the analysis of the conflict from below, we have paid special attention to the emotions felt by the protestors and their consequences in the dynamics of the protest. We begin by studying the role of emotions in motivation, and how negative emotions radicalize the protest. We then consider how affective loyalties contribute to the collective identification, with particular attention to the place attachment, and finally how moral emotions affect the cognitive processes, like framing, cognitive liberation, or empowerment. This paper will attempt to demonstrate that emotions, playing an important role in these processes, not only influence motivation and recruitment, but affect the outcomes of protest.

The second section of the paper will describe the methodology that we have developed in our PhD research, underlining the importance of depth interviews and narrative analysis of the biographical material and giving special attention to the different labels that we have assigned to different emotions, feelings and moods that play an important role in the protest.

Finally we will present some results, based on analysis of two specific case studies: a resistance against a dam of a village in Los Altos de Jalisco, Mexico, in 2004, and the insurgency of Oaxaca, Mexico, in 2006.

Memoria colectiva y regímenes de protección cultural en los discursos contemporáneos de justicia

En este trabajo pretendemos adentrarnos en el estudio de los denominados "Regímenes de protección cultural" desde una perspectiva crítica, la cual nos permita dilucidar, al menos en principio, las relaciones de poder significadas en ellos así como sus consecuencias, causas y contradicciones con los discursos de justicia contemporáneos.

Para lograr este contenido comenzaremos señalando determinadas "falencias" de las producciones jurídicas imperantes en la materia, tanto en el orden nacional como internacional, pretendiendo señalar a estas no como omisiones sino como una resultante de una racionalidad aplicada de tipo paradójico, la cual estatuyendo derechos logra reproducir discursos compatibles con la distribución material y simbólica de una sociedad desde el Estado. Así mismo en este punto reseñaremos la actividad de los actores públicos que operan mediante estas normas, detallando como estas son llevadas a los hechos por parte de las sentencias judiciales y resoluciones administrativas.

Seguidamente pretendemos señalar los discursos de justicia imperantes en la actualidad en materia de Derecho a la Igualdad mediante el reseñamiento de diversas elaboraciones normativas y judiciales, las cuales brindan contenido a las disposiciones constitucionales de la materia en la actualidad. Este desarrollo tendrá como fin el poder colisionar estas concepciones sobre igualdad con las características desarrolladas en el primer punto de esta ponencia remarcando la apropiación, mediante la paradojalidad, de la distribución del material simbólico de una sociedad de una forma "legalmente apartada de todo estándar de legalidad".

Para su conclusión, la ponencia intentará señalar la necesidad de debate de los fundamentos de este tipo de intervenciones estatales así como su interpretación como necesarios de no solo un proceso democrático sino de uno culturalmente democratizador, para lo que será necesario reevaluar algunas de sus actuales características.

La educación y las TIC: Notas sobre la observación etnográfica de dos colegios receptores del plan conectar-igualdad en la ciudad autónoma de buenos aires

El presente trabajo analizará las modalidades de apropiación tecnológica de los docentes pertenecientes a dos instituciones escolares secundarias de la Ciudad Autónoma de Buenos Aires (CABA). Los colegios seleccionados están ubicados en el centro de la ciudad. Uno de ellos depende de los subsidios otorgados por el Ministerio de Educación de la CABA. El otro, de la Universidad de Buenos Aires. Ambas instituciones están siendo interpeladas por las nuevas políticas universales tendientes a privilegiar el acceso a las TIC en el área educativa. No obstante, la afluencia de los sectores sociales imbuídos en uno y otro caso es radicalmente diferente en términos socioeconómicos. Mientras que la primera de las escuelas cuenta con un alumnado proveniente de sectores populares, la matrícula de la segunda está compuesta mayoritariamente por jóvenes pertenecientes a los estratos medios y altos de la sociedad porteña. Los docentes aplican estrategias pedagógicas y educativas diferentes en cada caso. A su vez, también lidian con sus propias estructuras tradicionales frente a las transformaciones propuestas por los canales institucionales. En tal sentido, se procura establecer la correlación entre el discurso y la praxis de los profesores, y cuánto de su accionar se traduce en contribución para el uso de las netbooks en el aula y el ámbito escolar. Para conformar la materia prima de nuestro ensayo se indagó, desde una perspectiva cualitativa, sobre el impacto y las transformaciones que suscitaron la implementación de este tipo de políticas públicas en la vida cotidiana escolar. El trabajo de campo que sustenta la investigación se basó en entrevistas semi-estructu-

Gender violence in conflict zones: A story from Gadchiroli, Maharashtra

Based on a story of a life and death of a tribal woman in a village caught between the crossfire of Maoist insurgency and brutal police repression, this paper examines the consequent escalation of domestic violence and the silencing of women. Located in Gadchiroli, one of the poorest districts of Maharashtra, the narrative explores the sequence of events leading to the death of a middle-aged woman against the background of the socio-economic and political climate affecting this forest community. This narrative uncovers how gender relations are shaped by the prevailing socio-political struggles and by the village leadership. It also hopes to highlight one of the central dilemmas of feminist politics of accommodating different cultural practices without compromising on its core commitment to the realization of gender equality.

Initiating social change through self help groups: Case studies from Maharashtra

There is considerable discussion in development literature on the efficacy of Self Help Groups (SHGs) in realizing the goals of gender justice. On the one hand, nation states and multilateral agencies float SHG formation as a "quick fix" solution to meeting the livelihood needs of vulnerable communities; on the other, the SHG movement is criticized as an imperfect solution to the prevailing socio-economic inequalities in society. Stemming largely from the Left criticism of the ongoing process of economic liberalization and globalization, these studies have argued that the SHG programmes do not address the real problems of vulnerable communities. Apart from their failure to meet the livelihood needs of the people, the excessive focus of the SHG programmes on banking and credit prevents it from realizing its potential of social and political transformation. The most scathing criticism of the movement is that it actually reinforces the status quo and keeps rural communities enmeshed in debt.

This paper seeks to examine these questions on the basis of the ground-level experiences of the SHG movement in Maharashtra, one of the larger states in India. Beginning with a brief description of the movement in the state, it explores the impact of the movement on local communities. Some of the questions asked on the basis of my field research studies on SHGs are as follows: 1) to what extent does the movement enable women to move out of poverty? Or is the claims made by the programme facilitators merely an illusory change? 2) Does the movement have the potential to enable women to participate in local governance structures and challenge some of the entrenched inequalities of caste and gender? And 3) to what extent does women's involvement in community development activities through the movement impact on their status?

Climate change adaptation and structures of power in community interventions

This paper is based on a multi-disciplinary research and collaborative interventions for climate change adaptation among vulnerable, marginal, riverine communities in the three flood plains of Metro Manila. Anchored on the principles of participatory action research (PAR), the central goal was to produce science-based, community-driven interventions that assesses their vulnerability and facilitates climate change adaptation among the urban poor communities and, in the process, increasing their resilience to climate change effects such as floods, typhoons and sea level rise (SLR).

The study argues that clinical analysis and intervention aimed to promote climate change adaptation and resilience among vulnerable groups must maximize the intersections of insider and outsider knowledge/expertise and institutional resources of the marginal communities, academia, civil society and the state. In the process the production of science-based but community-driven interventions result in creating more sustainable networks and collaborative engagements among different sectors/actors.

Este estudio teórico-práctico está elaborado por el Grupo Científico UCM-Banco Santander "Transparencia, Buena Gobernanza y Comunicación" (TRABUCOM) durante el año 2011.

En total han participado 24 agentes entre los cuales se incluyen las televisiones, las radios, los operadores de cable, los consejos audiovisuales así como las diferentes instituciones públicas con competencias en el sector español del país.

La metodología empleada en este Cuarto Informe se fundamenta en dos clases de procedimientos: por un lado, en el análisis de los sitios web -valorando la transparencia formal y sustantiva de las páginas oficiales- y, por otro, el envío de cuestionarios a los agentes seleccionados. Esta investigación constituye un estudio cuantitativo y cualitativo sobre la responsabilidad social y la transparencia informativo en los medios de comunicación y resumen las principales actitudes frente a estos principios a lo largo de estos últimos años.

Hugo Chávez reivindica el socialismo desde enero de 2005. Las nacionalizaciones se multiplican desde 2007. Sin embargo, fuera de la excepción de SIDOR, nunca hubo nacionalizaciones bajo la presión de los trabajadores. El ejemplo de Sanitarios Maracay es elocuente. Sanitarios Maracay es una empresa de fabricación de sanitarios quien empleaba 600 personas. El empresario, Alvaro Pocatererra Silva, se asoció a las tentativas insurreccionales de la oposición en el Paro de 2002 /2003. El 14 de noviembre de 2006, cierra su empresa. Los trabajadores ponen de inmediato la fábrica bajo su propio control, aplicando así la máxima de Hugo Chávez : « empresa abandonada, empresa ocupada ». Frente al fracaso de las empresas en co-gestión (INVEVAL, INVEPAL, INVETEX), los trabajadores de Sanitarios Maracay reivindican la nacionalización bajo control obrero. Después de numerosas marchas en Caracas, son reprimidos en abril de 2007 por la policía del Estado de Aragua. En agosto de 2007, después de negociaciones en el Ministerio del Trabajo con el patrono, es el fin de la ocupación de la mayor parte de la empresa en intercambio del 10

% de la deuda del patrono con los trabajadores. Algunos cincuenta trabajadores siguen ocupando una pequeña parte de la fábrica para obtener la totalidad de las prestaciones debidas por el empresario. El gobierno intentó desalojarlos en diciembre de 2007. En vano. Los trabajadores regresaron un mes después. Hugo Chávez ha anunciado la nacionalización de la empresa en diciembre de 2010 pero el porvenir de los asalariados es todavía incierto. En esta comunicación, queremos desarrollar la experiencia de control obrero en un contexto de cambio político y el doble papel del gobierno en esa situación.

In some western countries with Muslim minorities, there has been debate in the last few years about the role of Sharia in the context of domestic family law. The aim of this paper is to do three things: first, to show the extent to which matrimonial settlements by Muslims in divorce cases in western countries reflect a variety of personal practices and strategies towards Sharia and family law; second, to examine the values of selected western legal systems and how law as a 'form of practice' excludes Muslim values; and third, to situate this debate within the multiple modernity thesis and argue that, to move the matter further, we should work towards a new multi-faith pragmatic modern project. This paper is based on recent research by the three authors who are exploring the everyday life practices of Shari'a in New York and Sydney.

Democracy, human rights and the punitive discourse

This presentation is part of my postdoctoral research, which is being done at Núcleo de Estudos da Violência (Center for the Study of Violence), of the University of Sao Paulo. My research consists in analysing how the expressions "human rights", "democracy" and "punishment" are being mobilized by the political and human rights movement discourses.

One of the main questions that appeared in my research concerns the way the expressions "human rights" and "democracy" have been confused and used as justification for demanding severe criminal penalties. In other words, both human rights and democracy categories are mobilized to support the reproduction of an undemocratic and non-humanistic system of penalties. As the empirical material, I am working with newspaper articles and, more specifically, editorials written by politicians and human rights activists on the issues of human rights and democracy.

How many heterosexuals, homosexuals and bisexuals are there in the U.S.?

Much of the social science literature on sexuality and sexual orientation conceptualizes and measures the phenomena of heterosexuality, homosexuality and bisexuality using two basic perspectives or approaches, namely, essentialism and social constructionism. Founded in biology, the essentialist view states that there is an essential characteristic that identifies one's sexuality and is present in all persons with that sexuality. Hence, for instance, homosexual individuals are thought to be distinct and separate from heterosexual individuals, who are different from bisexual persons. This common characteristic, or essence, is thought to be based in biology or psychology, and is a fundamental drive or trait that establishes a person's inclusion into a sexuality category. The social constructionist view of sexuality counters and critiques the essentialist perspective. It argues against the notion of binary categories, that is, that one either is or is not a homosexual (or heterosexual or bisexual) individual. Instead, this approach argues for a continuum with varying degrees of sexuality. Social constructionists point out that homosexual (and heterosexual and bisexual) prevalence rates and visibility vary across time and settings, and that the concepts, definitions, and practices are often not the same across context and cultures. In this paper we use sexuality data from the 2006-08 National Survey of Family Growth; we specify three different dimensions of sexuality, namely, sexual behavior in the last 12 months, sexual self-identification, and sexual preference. We examine the consistency in the dimensions for heterosexual persons, homosexual persons, and bisexual persons. And we show how the counts of heterosexuals, homosexuals and bisexuals in the U.S. in 2006-08 vary tremendously depending on the definitions used. We discuss some of the implications of the findings of our research for demographic analyses of sexuality.

The risk of inaction: Correlating bullying with youth suicide across nations

Daily hassles are understood as an unavoidable condition of the modern human experience. Whether we deal with a morning traffic jam, a surprise pop quiz, or a long line at the post office, we share certain irritants that interrupt our daily routines. Most of these trifles are no match for our coping resources; instead of "stressing us out" for an extended period, they ebb and flow as part of the rhythm of daily life. However, there is a point when particular stressors become too much to manage; for many children, bullying can be one such stressor. Bullying is known to have particularly nefarious effects ranging from increased absence from school and dropout rates, all the way to elevated levels of suicidal ideation, attempts, and completion (Almeida, et al., 2009). Despite our knowledge of how bullying puts children at risk for negative outcomes, there are relatively few international studies, and even fewer that frame bullying as a risk to the life course. This study examined teen suicide rates across 24 countries including Europe and North America and found significant correlations with reported bullying victimization for both males and females, demonstrating that bullying puts children at significant risk, not only for poor academic performance respective of their peers, but also at increased risk of early mortality due to suicide. The paper concludes with a discussion of factors thought to promote hostile school climate as well as recommendations for future research.

The possibility of coping with the past in Turkey: The Dersim 38 Tertele (massacre)

The Turkish Republic, as a national state, has been successful in ignoring the sins of its past and has remained proud of its history until recent years. In this context, the past has been forgotten and past tragedies suppressed; it is even possible to say that this attitude of forbidding accurate historical remembrance became state policy. However, as a result of identity struggles, it was revealed that the nation state has a dirty past.

In this study I will try to analyze the Dersim 38 Tertele (Massacre) that was planned and implemented by the state. The Dersim 38 Tertele is the biggest and dirtiest page of the Turkish Republic. According to army records, 14,000 people were killed and 12,000 people were forcibly evacuated out of the region. The government's intention all along was to destroy Dersim; every single man, woman and child in the region was either butchered or forcibly evacuated out of the region. In the early period of the national state, the Turkish Republic's attitude to Dersim was to suppress and forget the massacre, even defining it as a rebellion. Although there is a determined state policy to ignore the Dersim 38, a speech made last month by a Dersim parliamentarian was reflected in the public sphere with a bang. After 73 years it would be possible to speak about transitional justice. However, the Turkish state and all other responsible institutions do not keen to accept the Dersim people's demands. In this presentation I will try to discuss how it can be possible to improve transitional justice for the Dersim 38 Tertele. If Turkey can cope with the Dersim 38 Tertele, it would be a model for all other dark pages of the Turkish Republic's history.

Trajectories of life of female offenders in the Spanish juvenile justice

The research for this article focused on a study of young female offenders serving custodial sentences in juvenile reform schools. The central object of the research was to understand, analyze and describe the factors, contexts and social processes that lead young females to break the law and end up being placed in juvenile reform institutions (in Andalucía). This objective was achieved by analyzing the meaning and significance of gender socialization and its influence on the commission of crime. In addition, by looking at the life experiences of these young women, studying the social and judicial dossiers/case studies and by observing the women in the juvenile institutions the study assesses how many young women are entering the criminal sphere and the reasons why. The study looks in particular depth at research into the contexts of the criminal behavior including the factors of ethnicity and socioeconomic class and culture.

Governance and socioeconomic innovation: Two european territories compared

This paper aims to analyse the emergence of forms of local welfare in territories under economic transformation. Traditionally welfare states have been conceived with a national dimension. Nevertheless, with the emergence of multi-level governance, local and regional levels are playing a stronger role in the delivery of social policies. The paper explores the decentralization of active employment policies in two subnational territories: the Black Country, in the West Midlands region of the UK and Vallès Occidental in the Barcelona metropolitan region. Local actors in these two areas have developed partnerships for economic development in order to tackle economic restructuring. The objective of these partnerships is to coordinate efforts between municipalities in local economic development and active employment policies. The paper analyses the ways in which public actors try to promote economic agglomeration and new industrial districts, and to what extent these partnerships create systems of local welfare in terms of employment. Finally, the paper analyses how new local identities are created to foster territorial cohesion. The conclusion is that although these partnerships bring more coordination and efficiency, their impact in welfare depend to a great extent on the national context. Variables such as the welfare tradition, the integration between levels of government, or labour market structure explain the consolidation and action of the partnerships. The role of national and regional governments providing material and immaterial resources is also key.

Conflictos, movimientos sociales y política urbana en la zona metropolitana del valle de México 1980-2011

A partir de 1980 la Zona Metropolitana del Valle de México (ZMVM) experimentó una reestructuración económica con procesos de terciarización y desindustrialización, el impacto principal de los cambios económicos fue el desempleo y un aumento de la informalidad.

Los cambios económicos también produjeron cambios territoriales que se expresaron en el surgimiento de megaproyectos inmobiliarios, obras viales de gran envergadura y cambios en el sistema de transporte.

Estos procesos de reestructuración económico-territorial de la ZMVM, generaron conflictos sociales que se pueden relacionar con el desentramamiento de las dinámicas económicas.

Los nuevos movimientos sociales urbanos que surgieron de esta reestructuración contemporánea coexisten con los que existían previamente, sin embargo presentan las siguientes diferencias:

Los grupos sociales demuestran una ideología y politización muy básica, en comparación de las organizaciones de las décadas del 60 y 70.

Las organizaciones de colonos, vecinales y comunitarias han sido movimientos vinculados principalmente a problemas locales.

Los conflictos respondieron a situaciones concretas como la expropiación de terrenos, obras públicas y privadas, pero también al mantenimiento de derechos culturales como la protección del patrimonio histórico y de la identidad.

Los vínculos internos entre los miembros de los movimientos en ocasiones se formaron en organizaciones preexistentes de tipo territorial como juntas ejidales y asociaciones de vecinos, por lo que el tejido social preexistente fue un elemento importante en la conformación de las organizaciones.

Se incorporaron clases sociales de zonas que anteriormente prácticamente no tomaban parte en las movilizaciones, como el caso de las clases medias y los vecinos de colonias de ingresos altos, afectados por la crisis, los megaproyectos y las obras viales.

A diferencia del MUP, las nuevas organizaciones vecinales o comunitarias no lucharon por obtener tierras o servicios, sino para mantenerlos y conservar su calidad de vida, por lo que sus luchas son de tipo predominantemente defensivo.

L'enfant à l'école maternelle: Entre résistance et soumission au projet éducatif et social

À l'heure de la proclamation de l'enfant sujet et acteur à part entière, le projet éducatif et social de l'école maternelle française reflète l'espoir politique mis sur les enfants. L'école veut adapter l'enfant à la « forme scolaire » avant qu'il ait atteint l'âge de l'obligation scolaire. Il continue ainsi à être considéré comme dépendant du projet de l'École et soumis à des attentes de la part des diverses institutions. Cette thèse s'appuie sur des travaux des historiens de l'éducation, sur des sources liées aux savoirs clinico-pratiques de la connaissance de l'enfant et sur l'évolution de sa prise en compte dans l'histoire, sur des travaux des théoriciens de la Sociologie de l'enfance et de l'Analyse Institutionnelle. Pour mettre en oeuvre méthodologiquement ces conceptions et cadres théoriques, elle se situe dans une orientation ethnographique, avec des entretiens individuels avec élèves et enseignantes, des dessins faits par ces élèves lors des entretiens, ainsi que des observations faites dans quelques écoles maternelles de Paris et de la banlieue parisienne. Du côté des enseignants, leur discours relate une injonction paradoxale ressentie par certains sous forme de tension constante. La mise en place de la forme scolaire en maternelle semble être plus tournée vers les compétences scolaires et non vers la prise en compte singulière des enfants. Pourtant, on note que la vie des enfants est organisée par une dialectique entre dépendance et indépendance relative. Assujettis au pouvoir adulte, ils peuvent prendre le contrôle de la situation, agir, réagir. En dehors de l'autonomie accordée par les adultes, ils conquièrent et créent leur espace d'autonomie à eux, en fonction de leurs intérêts.

Legal discourse critical analysis: Deconstruction of normative myth as element of consolidation of the movements fighting for social change

The immanence between discourse and society guide the paper to the interdisciplinary field of interaction between Law and Language beneath perspectives and theoretical-methodological assumptions of Critical Discourse Analysis and Critical Thinking of Law. The paper proposes to verify the interference of the legal-discursive field of the theoretical common sense (abstractions and fallacies of the formal-logical dogmatic) in interfaces and practices of the social movements shaped by ideological acknowledgment effects and rhetoric social persuasion of the "hiper suficiencia" of the legal apparatus (positivization of struggle flags) to social transformation of the Brazilian context. The dialectical-relational approach, belonging to the analysis, will demonstrate how the dominant legal "discursive niche" produces, legitimates and reaffirms relationships in hierarchies of power to ensuring the exclusion, marginalization and maintenance of institutionalized order through emptying and weakening the organization of social movements. The approach will focus special attention to the Landless Workers Movement (MST). Moreover, the critical analysis of the legal discourse will deal with identifying and exposing "the naturalized" on orality, images and normative texts, that are attached and reproduced into the political and socio-cultural context of domination that influences the imagination of equivalence between the textual-regulatory ambit and the real ambit. The perspective of social inequality reveals the political and ideological manipulation perpetrated by the "official (legal) world" starting from the dissimulation and occultation that relies on stereotyped values by institutionalized beliefs of justice, peace, security, democracy and cooperation to build a fictitious reality and a consequent social control of a single "ideal structure of the world" and the maintain of (dis)order. What concerns the legal discourse fable, it aims to explicit emancipators and democratizing discursive forms of the language in action and of its respective speakers and interlocutors (human subjects) to allow rethinking the legal beneath the libertarian paradigm, proper of the latin-american aspiration.

The hydroelectric power station of Belo Monte and indigenous issues: Aspects silenced for an indolent reason

The ambitions Xingu river hydroelectric dam of basin date over 30 years, in the mids of an project guided by a developmental logic of the '70s and forged by conglomerates of large lobby in the National Congress, therefore, since the start, the debates have been guided around the economic advantages of the enterprise, especially therewith the increase of the nacional energy potential at the expense of human rights of the local populations (indigenous, quilombo communities and people that depend on river), the preservation of environmental heritage and the maintenance of biodiversity. The prioritization of the economic interests to overpower others is a elucidation that the the treatment of the issue fallsat the heart of modern rationality which according to Boaventura de Sousa Santos promotes an aggregation of reality from the principle of regulation, with the exacerbation of the market pillar, places outside the experiments not consistent with the hegemonic paradigm. Within this paradigm the understanding of the silenced questions are made impossible, constituting an obstacle that the modern razon does not transpote, why other human and environmental relational are disqualified and not recognized by the technical-scientific rhetoric. In face of this latent failure, the refounding of the debate led by a new rationality is needed to overcome the duality between economic development and respect for the rights of traditional peoples to self-determination. From this perspective, somatized to the critical thinking on human rights, it is intended to point out the silenced aspects of a debate that has failed to embrace the complexity of the problem, being unable to recognize the different form of relationship between traditional people with the environment, reducing the whole to economic interests.

Child labour on the Brazilian academic production of psychology: Stigma and ideology

In contemporary Western societies, the approach to child labour (or to child work) is exemplary for a better understanding of the relationship between children and adults, and between childhood and adulthood. Recognizing the academy as a privileged actor in the definition of social problems, the purpose of this essay is to offer an interpretation of the treatment given to the theme child labour on the Brazilian academic production of Psychology. The research analysed articles about child and adolescent labor elaborated by psychologists and published between 1985 and 2010. For such, it have counted on the contribution of the Sociology of Childhood, the studies regarding the construction of social problems and, as central theoretic referential, the John B. Thompson's production about ideology. At the methodological level, it sought to link the hermeneutics of depths, as proposed by John B. Thompson, to the content analysis techniques. The results show the use of dramatic rhetoric on the Brazilian academic production of Psychology – rhetoric that stigmatizes working children and poor families. In this way, this production can be (re) interpreted as ideological, in the sense that it supports the relation of domination between ages and social classes.

The differential access to labor market positions of higher occupational prestige and the type of organizational management of higher education institutions

This paper discusses the effect of relationships between the type of organizational management of institutions of higher education and its effects on the performance of their graduates in the labor market in terms of access to positions of higher occupational prestige (Prates, 2007.2010). The article brings together two separate studies, performed by the authors on this issue. The first one is a qualitative study conducted in 2008 with teachers of private institutions of higher education and a case study the EACH (USP-Leste). The second is a quantitative study conducted in 2011, with data from the PNAD 2007 with the purpose of testing, via linear regression models, whether either the type of institution - public or private - and type of course - baccalaureate or technological - affect student performance in terms of unequal access to jobs with higher prestige in the labor market. The main conclusion, though not definitive, is that the Prates' hypothesis (2007.2010) is plausible, namely that the institutional environment generated by the type of internal organizational management of the institution of higher education affects

The beneficiaries of bolsa familia program and labor market: Empirical findings and the trajectory of the welfare policies in Brazil

This paper aims to analyze the situation of the Bolsa Familia Program's beneficiaries in urban labor markets in Brazil, from a database of approximately 21 million households registered in "Single Registry of Social Programs" of the Brazilian federal government ("CadÚnico"). The Bolsa Familia Program is now one of the main pillars of social policy in Brazil and several studies and evaluations have shown positive impacts on various dimensions, especially in reducing poverty and inequality. On the other hand, although about 70% of adult beneficiaries are included in the labor market, this insertion occurs in an extremely precarious way and it's poorly paid, contributing decisively to the reproduction of poverty and exclusion, especially in large urban centers.

At first, from multivariate statistical analysis, we intend to present the main determinants of poor integration of beneficiaries into the labor market and some of their characteristics (like age, sex, skin color, education, household composition and others). Later we will seek to identify the trajectory of the Welfare State and the structure of the Brazilian labor market elements that helps us to interpret the current social condition of this large population that has historically been treated in the sociological literature as "marginal" or "excluded." How the Bolsa Familia Program has helped to change this reality considering productive insertion? What were the advances of the social protection system in Brazil and how it extends or limits the chances of social and occupational mobility of those who are in poverty? We believe that this perspective that also incorporates the Welfare State historical and institutional aspects can make important contributions to the study of poverty and its social policy confrontation.

Time capital and social gravity: Two new concepts for sociology of time

Time represents an essential topic for several sciences but it does not look to be central in contemporary sociology. Central research topics in sociology have been classical, mainstream ones, strongly related to the social problems on the public agenda.

John Urry, wrote 11 years ago that "a reconfigured sociology has to place time at its very centre." (Urry 2000:105). Hall (2010), Bergson (1896/1996), Adam (1990, 1995, 1998) and other authors describe various time categories, such as the here-and-now present and the chronological clocktime, or distinguish between time as a chronological, objective and physically measured entity and duration and a subjective, perceived or psychological time.

I propose two new concepts, time capital and social gravity that will increase significance of time in social theory and, on the other hand, will create bridges between theory in sociology and in physics.

The structure of my theoretical research includes two main themes:

1) Establishing the foundation of the concept of time capital through an analogy {with what} and in relationship with the concept of social capital (Bourdieu 1972, 1986; Portes 1998; Putnam 2000);

2) The analogy between social life and the movement of lifeless bodies. The relationship between social mass and individual time capital, in other words, the way some individuals (for example, VIPs, managers, leaders) and some institutions or organizations can influence, to a very large extent, the individual time of the others.

The main research questions are:

1. How is social influence sustained by time capital and what are the transfers in which it is involved? (Social influence can be appraised as authority, which is the capacity of some people to orient the actions of other people.)

2. How can analogies between sociological concepts and concepts from physics be formulated in order to clarify these links between social influence/authority and time capital?

Urban segregation and school inequalities: Structural changes and the impact of the school district policy reform in Parisian suburbs

In a country where the public school was considered to be the heart of the "Republican model" of equality, the perception of increasing school inequality and school segregation has become recently a worrying concern.

The first part of the paper will analyze the intensity and structure of middle school segregation in the Paris metropolis, using variables describing the socioeconomic background and nationality of pupils in the first year of middle school (collège); it will then discuss the recent trends of change.

The second part of the paper will confront those results about the school population to those regarding residential segregation. The former is not a simple translation of the latter, since several processes contribute to a distortion between the two: demographic characteristics, particularly younger households and higher birthrate for some groups such as immigrants; economic inequality disadvantaging households with children; parents' strategies to avoid the local school.

This last process is widely discussed, often referred to the "white flight" in US cities; but the first two processes mentioned have to be analyzed thoroughly in order to understand the scope and structure of the effect of parent's strategies (which parents, in which local situations?) as well as the consequences of reforms stimulating school choice.

Universalizing access in education, health, and social assistance

Social protection systems can provide crucial assistance to the poorest and most vulnerable groups in society, but not all systems are created equally. In Latin America, social policies have historically exhibited large coverage gaps and high levels of inequality in benefit size. Since the late 1990s, countries in the region have begun to grapple with these challenges, enacting a series of reforms to education, healthcare, and social assistance policy. While some of these initiatives have been effective at boosting coverage and reducing inequality, others have maintained existing segmentation, and yet others have moved in a regressive direction. What explains variation in the ability of Latin American states to universalize access to education, health, and social assistance programs? This paper addresses this question in the context of Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, and Venezuela, presenting an original theory that focuses on the role of political parties, policy legacies, and political competition.

(What) did we learn from history? current debates on circular migration in Germany

Since the late 1950s Germany developed guest-worker programs with a multitude of – mainly Mediterranean – countries. Although successful for migrants, countries of origin and of arrival in some aspects, these programs had many effects not intended by the actors involved. During the last years and mainly due to projected demographic challenges there rose up new debates on circular migration. The paper will analyze to which extent these new debates took up the most important lessons learned from the older guest-worker experience. It will be argued that despite of a triple-win-discourse a narrow one-sided utilitarian approach dominates.

The paper will (1) summarize the principal outcomes of the guest-worker program in Germany as stated in related empirical studies, (2) present the scenarios of labour market development for the next decades to come, (3) resume the crucial criteria discussed and developed by international scholars and at the EU-level more recently for circular migration strategies and (4) on this background and based on analyzing statements of political parties and interest groups like employer associations and unions evaluate the probability of (a) putting into practice new circular migration programs and (b) actually integrating the 'lessons learned' from the older guest-worker programs.

How to promote effective participatory schools in the managerial era: The case of successful democratic schools in Europe

In this paper we present the outcomes of INCLUD-ED project, Strategies for inclusion and social cohesion in Europe from education; the largest European research project on schooling funded by the European Commission. In this research, the consortium composed by fourteen research centres identified different types of family participation that some effective schools are carrying out and how specific family and community participatory processes are related with equity and with closing the achievement gap. These cases have strong policy implication because most of these schools are placed in low-income neighbourhoods with high percentage of ethnic minority –mostly Roma- and immigrant population. Thus, INCLUD-ED outcomes reflect how social justice can go hand in hand with democratization processes in an era where managerial and bureaucratic rationales are hegemonic. The success of these experiences depends not only on mere participation of parents, students and community but also on how this participation promotes a set of Successful Actions such as Interactive groups, tutored libraries, dialogic literacy gatherings and mixed committees for curriculum and school evaluation. In this paper, we analyse how these practices affect to school administration, curriculum, teaching practices and especially students' outcomes. These real utopias are not mere particularities of their context neither product of institutional monocropping but they are institutions where transferable successful actions have been applied through a participatory and deliberative process. These cases go beyond the traditional limited family participation in schools to attend meetings and conferences and receive information.

The role of inscription in organizational life

The relationship between ethnography and inscription is a complex one and the relationship between ethnography and writing a curious one. Naturally, both inscription in general and writing in particular often appear as important elements in most social and organizational settings. Yet, despite this, the role of inscription is often marginalized in ethnographic studies. Indeed, where inscription (as text) does appear in ethnography it is often positioned as a mute 'informant' and valued almost solely for its content. A focus on content is, however, unnecessarily limited and limiting in scope and it can often be more instructive and revealing to examine the ways in which the carriers of text and other forms of inscription are manufactured, manipulated and used in empirical setting rather than to examine their content or 'meaning'.

In this paper the author reviews four distinct ways in which documentation - as key carriers of inscription - may be approached in the field. These are as informant (ie. as containers of information and knowledge), as manufactured object, as a tool for use, and as actor. In this presentation examples of each of the aforementioned roles are provided, examined and commented on. The author concludes by arguing that documents, records, and writing in fieldwork settings ought to be understood and approached as dynamic and active agents rather than as static containers of knowledge.

Shame, guilt, and debt: The experience of bankruptcy filers in the United States

Personal bankruptcy cases in the United States have skyrocketed over the past 5 years, increasing from 597, 965 cases in 2006 to 1,536,799 in 2010 (Administrative Office of the Courts, 2011). Although many studies have debated the causes for this surge and others have provided a demographic profile of bankruptcy filers, little scholarly work has focused on the consequences that filing for bankruptcy has had on the mental and emotional health of individuals. Using multiple data sources, including in-depth interviews of bankruptcy filers in the Southeast United States, a database of bankruptcy filers from the Southeast United States, and the Familial Responses to Financial Instability Dataset (Furstenberg, Gauthier, and Pacholok 2009), I will examine the role that the social stigma of bankruptcy plays in the decision-making process leading up to filing for bankruptcy. I will also consider the consequences of stigma on the mental health of bankruptcy filers, highlighting gender differences.

Forms of alienation in conflict: Protestor bodies as a medium of police performance art

On November 18, 2011, a group of student protestors who were part of the larger Occupy protest movement were pepper-sprayed by police on the University of California, Davis campus. Police, dispatched to enforce campus rules, were caught on video in a series of postures that suggest the bodies of the students functioned as the medium for police performance art. This paper attempts to deconstruct the meaning of those postures. The various forms of alienation embedded both in the actions of the protestors and of the police will be juxtaposed against each other. In doing so, it will be shown that forms of alienation can come into conflict, that the unitary idea of alienation originating out of Marx as the mass response to industrialization and dehumanization, needs amendment. This episode raises some perennial issues not only concerning the nature of alienation, but the nature of policing in a state choked by corporate power and the meaning and possibilities of protest. The high ironies of Baudrillard will be utilized to further explicate the nature of these phenomena.

Changes in the composition and organization of the Mexican business elite

In the last two decades, the Mexican business elite has drastically changed as a combined result of democratic changes and economic internationalization. These have had an important effect on the elite's composition as well as in its social, economic and political behavior that now point out towards a new pattern which may be generalized among other countries in the Latin American region and other emergent economies.

The paper explores these changes in order to recognize the new relevant sectors, their new organizing trends and the shift in their values and norms that explains a new relationship with state power and society. It considers that internationalization has brought forward a clear predominance of a new export-oriented elite which has overcome the former financial sector, at the same time that new economic sectors have developed such as a tourism oriented commercial sector and a new middle-range, technological-developed industrial sector much intertwined with big, corporate export firms.

Changes towards democratization in the political system, on the other hand, have led to a fade-out of the old large business political organizations which once monopolized the relation with the state and given way to many different ways of business organization and participation. There is also a shift towards a greater mobility between the state, market and civil society spheres, which creates new patterns of business social and political behavior such as CSR promotion, philanthropy, social activism through movements or social foundations, and participation in both domestic and international governance groups.

Finally the paper briefly explores the lack of new norms to cope with those changes and with the social and political tensions that they create.

Être mère Sur la blogosphère: La maternité active dans les cybercarnets L'objectif central de cette recherche, c'est une étude anthropologique sur les conceptions de la maternité dite active (re) formulées par des femmes brésiliennes ayant des enfants et qui s'utilisent des blogs comme un véhicule de partage d'expériences sur la maternité. L'hypothèse qui mène cette recherche, c'est celle qui propose que, pendant ce processus de partage - réalisé à travers les publications de textes et de débats sur ceux-ci dans un espace réservé aux commentaires -, les mères blogueuses créent des relations entre elles-mêmes de façon à construire une identité en commun, basée sur les réflexions sur la maternité active. À partir des concepts de biopouvoir, de Michel Foucault et de réflexivité, de Anthony Giddens, particulièrement des lectures que Stuart Hall et Avtar Brah, dans leurs études sur l'identité, font de ces auteurs, la question qui se pose c'est dans quelle mesure est-il possible de comprendre les formes d'agir comme mère, revendiquées par ces femmes, comme l'expression du biopouvoir inscrit sur le corps de la population ou, d'un autre côté, comme une façon d'auto-réflexion et de recherche de la définition d'un "self" jamais fixe et rigide. Par ailleurs, on demande quelles sont les implications pour les féminismes et pour les luttes pour l'égalité entre les genres quand un certain groupe de femmes (re) valorise la maternité, autrefois l'expression ultime de la domination masculine. Dans ce but, celle-ci c'est une recherche qualitative et l'ethnographie des blogs de mères est l'outil méthodologique privilégié. Finalement, les intentions de cette recherche c'est de soulever les débats à propos des relations entre maternité et féminisme, aussi bien que de contribuer pour les débats concernant aux questions d'identité et la manière à partir de laquelle ces questions sont posées dans le monde contemporain.

El movimiento ambiental en monterrey: Acciones colectivas e identidad

Después de los movimientos sociales protagonizados a finales de la década de los sesenta y principios de los setenta del siglo XX, el movimiento ambiental adquiere un carácter global. En México es a partir de la década de los ochenta que el movimiento ambiental, que pugna por la defensa de ecosistemas y derechos medio ambientales, toma una gran dimensión en su diálogo y dinámicas con los gobiernos. La literatura existente en este rubro recoge diversos aspectos en diversas ciudades del País. Sin embargo, en la ciudad de Monterrey existe una carencia de estudios sobre el movimiento ambiental y la acción colectiva contemporánea. Luego de una represión a movimientos estudiantiles, guerrilleros, de toma de tierras y obreros en las décadas de los sesenta y setenta, el movimiento ambiental en Monterrey se convierte en un eje generador de acciones colectivas y movilización social.

Esta ponencia pretende presentar avances del análisis realizado en la etnografía de una tesis doctoral en la que se identifican procesos de identidad colectiva que llevan a diferentes individuos a sumarse a acciones colectivas en defensa del medio ambiente. La investigación es pertinente en cuanto a que el estudio de caso de un movimiento ambiental en Monterrey permitirá explorar los nuevos canales de movilización social en la sociedad de Monterrey, a través del proceso de creación de una problemática ambiental. En una ciudad marcada por un alto nivel de violencia y ausencia de movimientos sociales, los grupos ambientalistas se presentan como una de las pocas alternativas para la movilización social.

Whose language? Whose experiences? Examining the language of organizing among LGBT (Indian subcontinent-origin) groups in the US and India

Drawing upon Adur's research in the US and India, this paper examines some of the terms used by groups described as LGBT groups in the US. We will focus on three themes. We will discuss the linguistic conventions expressing 'sexuality beyond maleness and femaleness' along with the social location of people who are identified by these terms. Second we will discuss the renewed usage of "traditional" terms by contemporary groups in the US and India as they attempt to create more mainstream spaces for themselves within their specific ethno-religious groups as well as the majority society. We will comment on the ways in which these terms help to maintain transnational linkages and sustain queer communities across the two countries. Third, we will trace some of the juxtaposition of non-English terms with English terms to trace the simultaneous transnational linkages with non-Indian-origin groups. Overall the aim of this paper is to highlight dynamic forms of queer-ness in multiple geographic sites, and highlight the ways in which these terms reflect diverse social locations within shifting structural contexts.

En el marco del Programa Delito y Sociedad de la Universidad Nacional del Litoral, a través del proyecto de investigación CAI+D orientado a problemas sociales: "Niñez y juventud, exclusión social, delito y policía en la ciudad de Santa Fe", hemos intentado reconstruir las voces de los actores estatales que forman parte del entramado institucional que configura el sistema de justicia penal juvenil en la ciudad de Santa Fe. Sin dudas, la sede judicial es uno de sus escenarios protagónicos.

Este entramado institucional se expresa a través de prácticas que, necesariamente, inciden en las trayectorias vitales de los jóvenes sobre los que intervienen. Cómo se construyen estas prácticas es uno de los puntos centrales sobre los que discurrirá el presente trabajo. Sugerimos que es un proceso complejo, en el que tensionan y resisten en forma constante la cultura institucional y el vocabulario de derechos, y en el que la contingencia juega un rol clave.

De esta forma, este trabajo se presenta como un intento por reconstruir, desde las principales perspectivas teóricas que se ocupan de este tipo de problemas en el campo de la criminología, el proceso a partir del cual construyen sus prácticas los operadores judiciales del sistema de jus-

Fat. Hairy. Sexy. Contesting standards of beauty and sexuality in the gay community

Even within marginalized communities and social movements, there are institutionalized power relations. In the gay male community, men who are considered beautiful (young, skinny, hairless) have an easier time navigating their social world (Levine 1998; Pyle and Loewy 2009). Men whose bodies do not conform to this narrow beauty ideal and/or whose sexual attractions are to men whose bodies do not conform to this ideal often feel ostracized in conventional gay spaces such as bars, nightclubs, and community organizations (Hennen 2008; Pyle and Loewy 2009). As a result they have created alternative spaces in which they feel comfortable and, through gathering together, have begun to form identities as big men, bears, and their admirers (also known as chasers). Big men, or chubs, are large-bodied or fat gay men and bears are masculine, hirsute, and often large-bodied gay men. As spaces for big men, bears, and chasers grow and more men congregate, these individuals and groups begin to take on a more public presence at pride events and other queer community functions (Hennen 2008). Their public presence is an embodied contestation of queer power relations, legitimizing a broad range of body types that include fat and hairy male bodies and a multiplicity of sexual identities that include attraction to these bodies. In this project ethnographic and interview data are used to illustrate how big men, bears, and chasers use their bodies to challenge the institutionalized power relations that define sexiness within the gay male community.

Memory and documentary film

In Argentina, the views of the last dictatorship have been changing since the return to democracy. Nowadays, we can't find a crystallized memory about it, but we find ourselves in front of different ways of remembering. We can affirm that since 2003, some events, such as the reopening of the trials to judge the responsible for state terrorism, make us think about a new state role in the way of carrying out the politics of memory.

As we consider the cinematographic documentary as a social practice of memory, we will analyze the use of the audiovisual tools and the speeches which appear in the films, to show the different forms of rebuilding and expressing memories. Particularly, we will focus on the significations which the testimonies and the ways of representation in the cinematographic documentary acquire, to take into account their political effects and the subject of the enunciation that is pretended to be presented as legitimate.

To carry out our aim, we will analyze the documentary films that were made from year 2003 to year 2010, which portray the events that have taken place during the last dictatorship. Special attention will be given to state terrorism, the human rights violations and their current consequences.

Assessing barriers to health insurance and threats to equity in comparative perspective: The health insurance access database

Background: Typologies traditionally used for international comparisons of health systems often conflate many system characteristics. To capture policy changes over time and by service in health systems regulation of public and private insurance, we propose a database containing explicit, standardized indicators of policy instruments.

Methods: The Health Insurance Access Database (HIAD) will collect policy information for nine OECD countries, over a range of eight health services, from 1990-2010. Policy indicators were selected through a comprehensive literature review which identified policy instruments most likely to constitute barriers to health insurance, thus potentially posing a threat to equity. As data collection is still underway, we present here the theoretical bases and methodology adopted, with a focus on the rationale underpinning the study instruments.

Results: These harmonized data will allow the capture of policy changes in health systems regulation of public and private insurance over time and by service. The standardization process will permit international comparisons of systems' performance with regards to health insurance access and equity. We present the examples of public coverage and private insurance regulation for prescription drugs and physician services in the 10 Canadian provinces to illustrate the salience of this indicator approach to health systems analysis.

Conclusion: This research will inform and feed the current debate on the future of health care in developed countries and on the role of the private sector in these changes.

De las prácticas articuladoras entre movilización social y gobiernos: Notas sobre las experiencias de Argentina y Bolivia en el siglo XXI

El objetivo de esta ponencia es examinar los procesos a los que se exponen los gobiernos y los movimientos sociales latinoamericanos en su articulación política mutua. La noción de articulación remite a la existencia de una relación entre las identidades a partir de la cual ambas resultan modificadas (Laclau y Mouffe 1985). En consonancia con esto, pensamos la articulación entre Estado y organizaciones sociales, identificando agencias o iniciativas de acción que ponen en juego una determinada subjetividad y trazan un mapa de fuerzas estructurando un espacio en el que adquieren consistencia los sujetos.

Dicha articulación es uno de los grandes desafíos a los que se ven expuestos tanto los gobiernos como los movimientos y las organizaciones sociales. Para los primeros está en juego el apoyo popular, la legitimidad de sus actos y el alcance de sus propuestas de inclusión. Para las experiencias de movilización social se trata del dilema de cómo preservar la autonomía cuando los gobiernos parecen avanzar cada vez más sobre ellos.

En este trabajo pretendemos analizar cómo se presenta la mencionada articulación en las realidades nacionales de Argentina y Bolivia, tomadas como una muestra del heterogéneo abanico de países y clivajes presentes en América Latina. En Bolivia, el Instrumento Político que llevó a Evo Morales al poder, surgió como iniciativa de las organizaciones campesino-indígenas. En este contexto, los movimientos más radicales presionaron al gobierno para que no cediera ante los reclamos opositores y muchas veces se enfrentaron entre ellos por pujas corporativas. En Argentina, numerosas organizaciones sociales se acercaron a los gobiernos de Néstor Kirchner y Cristina Fernández, manifestando sentirse integrados en su proyecto inclusivo. También hubo agrupaciones que se distanciaron, criticando la concentración de poder en el Ejecutivo, el estrechamiento de lazos entre los Kirchner y el Partido Justicialista y la extensión de viejas redes clientelares.

School as solution to the problem of place: Student migration, perceptions of safety, & children's concept of community

Urban school reform increasingly locates student migration as solution to the problem of urban place. Low-income Latino and African American parents and their children describe how social, economic, and environmental factors combine with schooling experiences to delimit "place" for children and impact their perceptions of community. The paper explores how safety plays a key role in the restrictions of children by parents and how it factors into their schooling experiences in a total institutional environment. As such, it characterizes how one community is displaced by another, however, inadvertently. Recognizing children's views of place, not only as a product of their observable experiences, but also as the ways in which they interpret and express those experiences, we combine interviews of parents and children with children's community asset maps and photographs to convey an understanding of how they perceive their communities and what changes they offer to improve them. Data are taken from a larger case study of a unique private school [the World Citizen's School] that buses low-income children from their neighborhood to an ultra-modern facility in the heart of an a major urban center.

Aprendiendo a ser joven con derechos propios en condiciones de pobreza y exclusión social. un estudio de caso en Mérida, Yucatán, México

El reconocimiento de que los jóvenes tienen derechos propios es un tema que se debate en ámbitos jurídicos, políticos y académicos, nacionales e internacionales. Ese debate baja en algidez cuando el reconocimiento se ubica en el campo de los derechos humanos fundamentales y de las garantías individuales, ya que no es posible negar que todos los poseemos por el solo hecho de ser seres humanos y que un número considerable de Cartas Magnas los garantizan. Pero crece la discusión cuando se afirma que los jóvenes son sujetos con derechos propios y eso implica reconocer su capacidad de acción para incidir en/ o ser constructores de los cambios sociales que les garanticen una vida digna y libre. En México, numerosos estudios de juristas, antropólogos, sociólogos y politólogos, así como el trabajo de denuncia de los defensores de los derechos humanos, han vuelto visible el hecho de que los jóvenes, particularmente los que viven en condiciones de pobreza y marginación, experimentan la violación cotidiana de sus derechos.

En el sur de Mérida, Yucatán, México, una zona caracterizada por la desigualdad social y la pobreza, numerosos jóvenes viven su condición juvenil en condiciones de exclusión social y discriminación; sobre ellos recaen múltiples percepciones negativas que los criminalizan. La expresión de sus identidades juveniles y prácticas culturales distintivas los lleva a experimentar una frecuente violación de sus derechos propios. Mediante un estudio de caso, indago las relaciones de poder que la autoridad (Estado/servidores públicos) establece con estos jóvenes cuando ejercen sus derechos propios, así como el significado que les atribuyen a tales derechos en el contexto de su vida cotidiana y los recursos de que disponen para garantizarlos.

Leisure and dreams. Traveling as a leisure imaginary in South America

Leisure time is not always what everyone want. For many reasons, different social classes in South America capital cities –Santiago, Buenos Aires and Montevideo- wish travel as a perfect leisure time. They confront the real leisure time –for the most of them inside home, watching TV with their family- with their wishes and imagination –traveling around the country or the world, most of them alone or with friends-. As a result, the research concludes leisure practices and leisure imaginary are extremely distant –as a consequence everyone is unhappy with the real leisure time- and at the same time, leisure time is social situated -essentially unequal-. The paper is part of a comparative research about Cultural consumption patterns in South America (Gayo, M. (coord), Wortman, A, Mendez, M.L, y Radakovich, R.) supported by the Fundacion Carolina.

Doing biographical research in a (post-)conflict setting: A case study of ethnic Germans in southern Ukraine

My paper takes a biographical and collective-history approach to analyse conflicting versions of the German-Romanian occupation which are present in the grouping of ethnic Germans in southern Ukraine. It shall be shown how unequal balances of power can evolve in a post-conflict setting and to what extent they suppress the voices of the outsiders. Furthermore, I would like to discuss, how the field researcher might deal with the various challenges of doing research in such a conflictive context.

My analysis is based on research carried out in southern Ukraine, where ethnic Germans started to settle from the 18th century. I will take a closer look at the years of the German-Romanian occupation (1941–44) with a focus on the question how my interviewees, born in 1920s/30s, talk about the events of this period today. On the one hand, there are those ethnic Germans who aim to absolve the locals from guilt concerning the crimes during the German-Romanian occupation (grouping A). On the other hand, there are other ethnic Germans who address the events of the years 1941-44 in a critical manner and talk relatively openly about the participation of local inhabitants in the genocide of Jews and Roma (grouping B). The figuration between grouping A and B is marked by unequal balances of power. While the representatives of grouping A are established, the representatives of grouping B and their versions of the occupation are largely excluded from public discourses. In order to understand the emergence of this "established-outsider figuration" (N. Elias), a closer analysis of several developments is required, including the asymmetrical balances of power and public discourses among the diverse groupings of the present and former inhabitants of Ukraine. Finally, I will highlight the various challenges that this (post-)conflict setting produces and how the researcher might deal with them.

Technology as a social system

Mainstream sociological theories of technology tend to equate technology to the objects that humans use in solving practical problems. This society | technology distinction is a macroscopic extension of the anthropocentric distinction human | nonhuman. This paper attempts to go beyond essentialist humanism in developing a conceptual outline for a sociology of technology. The basic proposition of this paper is that technology is a functional subsystem of modern society observing the world of tools, techniques and applications and operating under the code of state-of-the-art | obsolete with a function of stimulating innovation. Technological communication – the logos about the techne - uses a temporal distinction. Distinguishing and indicating an object as state-of-the-art indicates its currency and creates expectations (thus structures) of future obsolescence, making obsolescence inevitable and thus exhibiting technology's modernity. Viewing technology as an operationally closed system transforms the problem of technological determinism into a problem of resonance of other systems to technology and the problem of social construction of technology into a problem of the resonance of technology to the other functional social subsystems. Elite formation is also reformulated as a problem of the structured concentration of communicative potential in social systems. In the system of technology, elite formation is operationalized through the distinction between the processes of innovation and diffusion, the former's reproduction being concentrative and the latter being distributive. While the paper uses Niklas Luhmann's systems theory as its backbone, it breaks with Luhmann in his conception of technology as being in the environment of society and argues that Luhmann's position stems from his failure to distinguish technologies from the social system of technology.

Emplaced emotions: Hope explored

A current emotion which unites diverse migrants all over the world is that of 'being hopeful': to hope for a better future. This state expresses a common rhetoric which is functional to specific life trajectories and is differently nuanced in diverse settings. What 'hope' means in specific contexts has not been fully unpacked in current research and attempts lack an overarching theoretical framework. This paper examines how 'hope' is made in practice among Ecuadorian migrants in an Italian north-eastern region through the analysis of affective states produced by material and social resources available in the place in which Ecuadorian have migrated. The interaction between place experience and emotions, and the link between affects and emotions are discussed.

Civic media, embodied practices and creative youth activism in post-election Iran

This study looks at the creative youth activism in the medium of civic media practices tied to the visual strategies adopted by the activists in post-election Iran. The focus is on the complex ways in which representations of visual strategies of youth resistance in new media like Internet can both define and construct knowledge of social movements, partly produced in the contentious field of cyberspace. The study presents a study of the configuration of a media culture of civic resistance that seeks to re-define youth politics in terms of embodied practices of emotions and symbols in alternative mediums of interactions such as Facebook or Persian-language social networking sites like Balatarin. With a focus on the works of Gilles Deleuze, Jean-Luc Nancy and Talal Asad, the paper argues that it is in the visualize culture of embodied practices of loss and sacrifice that new social movements in Iran can be described as significantly creative in the context of authoritarian strictures. Such online visual cultures construct semantics of reality for the young activists and the observers who re-define politics in terms of a drama of mortality, which the state is framed as an imagined adversary to confront and transform through idioms of sacrifice and loss. The study looks at the Green Movement, a protest movement largely constituted by the younger activists and formed after the disputed 2009 presidential election in Iran, and underlines two media cultures of civic resistance in connection with various visualization strategies online: (1) the conceptualization of an imagined community of contentious performers as a social body of activists who seek martyrdom in face of death and (2) the articulation and visualization of activism in embodied mediums of symbolic performances and discursive ways that such modes of activity can be meaningfully decoded and reproduced (and eventually institutionalized) as new form of political action.

Labor migration in Israel: The creation of an unfree workforce

This paper describes the ways by which state regulations created fertile soil on which legal labor migration in Israel developed into an unfree workforce. We show how state policies effectively subject foreign workers to a high degree of regulation, giving employers and manpower agencies mechanisms of control that they do not have over Israeli citizens. These mechanisms create a group of non-citizen workers that are more desirable as cheap, flexible, exploitable and expendable employees through enforcing atypical employment relations: fixed-term contracts, the binding system enforcing direct dependence of the migrants on manpower agencies and employers, and the threat of automatic deportation. These stringent state regulations have provided the context for the legal labor migrants to turn into a captive labor force, the system sometimes even degenerating into a human trafficking industry. In the paper we provide a description of the phenomenon of labor migration in Israel followed by the analysis of its four pillars: (1) the binding system which regulates employment relations (2) the policy of quotas and work permits; (3) the deportation policy; (4) the manpower agencies and their active role in the institutionalization of labor migration. We show how attempts at reforming the system have resulted in its further institutionalization.

Yaskot Tokm El3askar: Code choice and the battle for identity in post-revolutionary Egypt

This paper examines the strategic use of Egyptian Colloquial Arabic (ECA) and Modern Standard Arabic (MSA) for identity construction and identity attribution in protest signs and government communiqués in post-revolutionary Egypt.

The data analyzed in this study consist of approximately 400 protest signs as well as approximately 90 SCAF communiqués published exclusively on SCAF's Facebook page. Following the success of the January 25th Egyptian revolution, protesters have periodically re-occupied public spaces—such as Cairo's Tahrir Square—to make demands of the military ruling council (SCAF). In the summer of 2011, sit-ins in Cairo and Alexandria emerged as democratic public spaces, free for over a month from physical interference by the state, spaces in which citizen authors used the medium of protest signs to address each other, SCAF, and the nation. Signs are categorized according to medium (handmade or machine-printed), imagery, and the linguistic codes they employ (ECA, MSA, romanized Arabic and English). SCAF communiqués employ only high-register Modern Standard Arabic.

According to most scholarship on diglossia in the Arab world, colloquial Arabic is limited to spoken interactions in informal contexts, while MSA is the primary vehicle of written discourse. However, a significant percentage of analyzed protest signs employ ECA, either as the sole linguistic code or alongside other codes. This diversity contrasts starkly with the elevated register of the SCAF communiqués. This paper argues that sign authors and SCAF employ divergent tools in their competition for authority and authenticity, each seeking to undermine the other's articulation of identity through choice of medium (SCAF's use of Facebook, cognitively associated with the success of the revolution) and linguistic code (sign authors' use of ECA in written political discourse).

Alternative energies: Social, economic and environmental impacts

This study is the result of a comparative analysis between Brazil and Canada on the current development of alternative energy and its social, economic and environmental impacts. Although the number of studies on these impacts are reduced, it is possible to propose a model of "types and impacts" of the changes generated in the economy, the environment and lives of people, including changes in the habits of citizens, businesses, civil society and civil governments. The study is based on field research in Brazil and Canada, besides the analysis of indicators of the industry and energy policies of countries in the Americas. The thesis of the study is the development of an "energy transition", and the trend appears to be hybridization with increasing deployment of plants based on renewable and alternative energy - that is, a gradual energy transition toward a "world of low carbon".

Digital revolution and docile body

Articulating a Foucault-Deleuzian framework, this paper will explore the influences of Information and Communication Technologies (ICTs) that spurred the political uprisings of the Arab Spring, e.g., Egyptian and other recent democratic movements in Africa and the Middle East. Illustrating my arguments with examples from the Facebook and Twitter communications on these uprisings, I will examine the potential of ICTs. My focus is to show how Foucault's model of 'docile body' disciplined by power, and Deleuze's model of 'dominated body' controlled by more fluid forces than disciplinary, when exposed to the liberative potential of the digital revolution, unleashed their resistance against political subordination. Using interpersonal digital communications, e.g., Facebook, Twitter, etc., popular uprisings against authoritarian power have rejected the dehumanization of a people that resulted in an oppressed society of 'Docile Bodies'.

Youth in Britain: 99 problems but the gang ain't one

Neo-liberal governments are engaged in managing the security of their citizens through identification and surveillance of risky populations. New forms of risk technologies and risk management strategies are sought and developed to control new risks posed to society. Taking the current fears around youth gangs in Britain - heightened by the recent riots of August 2011 - as a case study, this paper provides a critical analysis on the development of risk management technologies and the policing of young people within the 'gang-risk' paradigm. Drawing on several empirical studies undertaken by the author, together with an analysis of local authority and national gang policy, it reflects on the increasing use of risk discourses in framing responses to young people associated with youth gangs in Britain. The risk paradigm is drawn upon to illustrate and problematise the ways that modes of governing gang populations using police intelligence, conflate 'gang association' with high levels of risk, which invariably lead to disproportionate sentencing and a range of exclusionary practices. In doing so, discourses of safety, risk and danger are explored. The impact on young people living in gang associated neighbourhoods who are increasingly referred to as either 'at risk' or 'posing a serious risk' based on gang association is highlighted. It is argued that 'gang speak' has resulted in elevated risk management strategies and unprecedented new forms of risk technologies when dealing with young gang associated individuals.

A economia solidária pode ser entendida como uma rede de ideias e experiências que traz no seu bojo raízes históricas que se encontram focalizadas nas ações e lutas das organizações de trabalhadores, de movimentos populares, de grupos ativistas nas universidades e nas igrejas contra o capitalismo. A economia solidária é um elemento medular na composição de mecanismos estratégicos que contribui para o processo de desenvolvimento local dos territórios ao viabilizar a economia a partir das potencialidades econômicas locais como meta para gerar localmente ocupação e renda na busca da inclusão social e a melhoria da qualidade de vida dos trabalhadores dos territórios, ao mesmo tempo em que oferece elementos ao poder público para estratégia de planejamento de políticas públicas de apoio e incentivo as atividades empreendidas. Com base nesses pressupostos o estudo tem como objetivo principal analisar a contribuição da economia solidária para o desenvolvimento sustentável dos territórios a partir das potencialidades econômicas e culturais. A pesquisa desenvolvida foi do tipo exploratória tomando como base um mapeamento das atividades econômicas em potencial, desenvolvida por cidade/territórios do Estado da Paraíba. Socio-demographic determinants on children's morbidity and mortality - a study of slums in Puducherry

Socio economic conditions in both developed and developing countries play an enormous role on the health of children. Economic advancement has brought about many hazardous consequences to the society through industrialization and urbanization, specifically affecting the health condition of children. Industrialization has brought about environmental pollution, migration, conjunction in cities leading to slums. The social condition of society are thereafter affected by this industrialization, slums etc., leading to deteriorated sanitary condition which affects health condition specifically the children. Keeping the above determinants, the present paper aims that to examine socio-economic condition affecting the health of children. The objectives are (i) to examine the influence of environmental factors on child health morbidity and mortality, (ii) perception and behaviour of slums dwellers on child mortality and morbidity and (iii) to make policy recommendation on strategies that can be used to reduce child morbidity and mortality. Overall child mortality declined significantly in 1990's, but environmental hazards still kill at least 3 million children under age five every year. Environmental risk to children health which is taken in the present study includes in-door air pollution, out-door air pollution, infectious disease vectors, unsafe drinking water and exposure to hazardous chemicals.

The data used in this study was collected using in-depth interview and existing review of literature. Purposive sampling method was used in the study and 100 women were interviewed in the slums of Puducherry. The key findings of this study included the fact that poverty and lack of awareness are the major factors in child mortality and morbidity. This study therefore recommended the development and support of community level initiatives to reduce environmental threat, to increase awareness about health practice and provide education about children's environmental health issues and to formulate programmes to increase sanitation facilities.

La imbricación estado, grupos dominantes y think tanks en los orígenes del neoliberalismo del cono Sur

En la ponencia pretendemos comprender el proceso de construcción del neoliberalismo en el Cono Sur de América Latina, alzado a ideología dominante en las décadas del ochenta y noventa, pero que reconoce raíces más antiguas, por lo menos a los años cuarenta, cuando se crea la Société Mont Pèlerin. No obstante haberse asociado con las premisas del Consenso de Washington, sus ideas provienen de varias matrices de pensamiento, en particular las doctrinas neoclásica, especialmente la austríaca, la ordoliberal, de la elección racional y el conservadorismo anglosajón, que serían sintetizadas y difundidas bajo ese rótulo genérico. Tal ideario fue diseminado mundialmente a través de una intrincada red, que incluía órganos estatales de diversos países, entidades internacionales, organizaciones privadas y centros universitarios que imbricaron sus intereses en nivel mundial y nacional a fin de generar transformaciones profundas en el ámbito económico en vista a solucionar problemas que aquejaban al capitalismo. El antecedente más antiguo en los países del Cono Sur es el acuerdo firmado entre las universidades de Chicago y Católica de Chile. A partir de ese momento tal ideología se enraza lentamente, sirviendo como soporte de varios programas opositores, como el "Ladrillazo" en Chile y el impulsado por el IPÉS en Brasil. Aunque fallidos, los mismos sirvieron para deslegitimar los gobiernos legítimamente constituidos y dar sustento a las dictaduras que les siguieron, procediéndose a una primera etapa de reformas, no obstante tuvieran la oposición de sectores internos, que serían desplazados rápidamente. Durante el momento inicial del proceso de democratización tales ideas fueron desplazadas, pero debido a los descalabros estructurales, la habilidad de sus cultores para reconvertirse, la colonización de vastos aparatos locales e internacionales y la incapacidad de otras posiciones para hacerles frente, nuevamente volvieron a primeros planos, procediéndose a un segundo momento de reformas mucho más radical que el anterior.

Las formas de sentido del conocimiento en las universidades indígenas en México y Colombia

La sociedad contemporánea se describe como una sociedad del conocimiento. Esta descripción ha sido cuestionada ya que a pesar de la gran acumulación de productos científicos y tecnológicos, estos no resuelven el problema de la exclusión de las personas a los beneficios de dicho conocimiento, o bien, la inclusión de otros conocimientos más allá de los certificados. Al realizar estudios sobre las formas del conocimiento en las universidades indígenas de México y Colombia surge el problema ya mencionado por Lars Qvortrup sobre lo que debe ser una adecuada descripción del mismo. Tomando la definición de Niklas Luhmann de este como condensación de observaciones, se analiza cómo se conjugan formas de conocimiento tradicional (no codificado en relación a lo verdadero/falso) dentro de los criterios universitarios (que suponen un conocimiento más formalizado). Desde esta análisis se reconstruyen formas sentido emergentes del conocimiento, se identifican diferencias entre estas formas de conocimiento y se observa la forma utilizada por los estudiantes para resolver problemas prácticos en sus comunidades.

Scientific collaboration networks in the department of Antioquia, Colombia. An analysis from the scientific field and power

This paper proposes an analytical model for scientific collaboration networks supported on the field theory of Pierre Bourdieu, specifically the analysis of power, and social network analysis (ARS). The database on which is applied the model was built into the research project "Scientific and Technological knowledge available in Department of Antioquia. 1990-2010". This database collects all the scientific papers published by authors from the Department of Antioquia in Colombia in Scopus, Web of Science and Pubindex (scientific classification system of the country). This proposed model means by scientific collaboration networks all the relations generated by researchers affiliated with institutions of Antioquia within 2 topics: 1) the collaboration between authors from different universities and 2) the collaboration between authors from universities and public and private institutions (these two issues are analyzed at the regional, national and international level). In addition, is made measurements of the productivity of the authors, the language most published, analysis of references to see the most cited authors and invisible colleges that are generated to describe if these factors are decisive or not in collaboration. Finally, the analysis is segmented according to scientific disciplines and research topics more relevant, given that for the volume of publications. The theory behind the model describes the relationships within science as a "field", specifically force field, with a structure and actors involved in this structure. These relationships contain rules and strategies charged of specific interests.

The effect of party primaries on electoral performance

One of the most relevant issues linked to party democratization to be researched is the consequences of more inclusive methods of candidate selection, and particularly of primaries, on party competition. To approach this issue implies to analyse whether or not the use of primaries make the parties more competitive. In spite of the relevance of the issue, and contrary to the attention it has received in US, it has rarely been analyzed in Europe. What we intend to do in this article is to analyse if the use of one member one vote (OMOV) primaries for candidate selection affects the electoral result of the party and, if it does, in what direction. In this way, we will increase our still limited knowledge of this aspect of European party politics through the analyses of the use of closed party primaries in the Spanish Workers Socialist Party (PSOE) and their effects on its electoral performance in local elections. Therefore, this paper has two main goals. The first one is to describe the use of party primaries in the selection of candidates for local elections by the PSOE and its evolution. The second and main one is to answer the question on the effect of party primaries on electoral performance studying the case of the Spanish Socialists in the 1999, 2003, 2007 and 2011 local elections.

Programa de Pós-Graduação em Ciências Sociais/Universidade Federal do Pará. Bolsista CAPES.

"Não deves tomar o sangue de carne alguma, pois a vida de toda carne é o seu sangue. Qualquer pessoa que tomar dele será 'cortada'". Esse é o mandamento de Deus no Livro de Levíticos 17: 13,14 da Bíblia Sagrada Cristã e faz parte do conjunto de coisas interditas aos seus filhos, logo, refere-se à santidade de seu povo. Segundo a interpretação das Testemunhas de Jeová: Sangue é vida, explícita o mandamento divino, mas o uso indevido significa a morte daquele que o viola. "Somente Jeová Deus tem o poder sobre a vida; Jamais sustentarão a própria vida por violar a lei". Frequentemente essa determinação gera polêmica entre os não-adeptos que acreditam que "sangue é vida", no sentido de quem recebe transfusão tem a vida resguardada. Com isso, adeptos da Organização e diversos profissionais constantemente enfrentam situações conflituosas onde pacientes, familiares, membros da Organização e médicos se enfrentam para garantir, via judiciário, o que seria melhor para a manutenção da vida do enfermo TJ. Essas situações, muitas vezes levam à morte do paciente por não receber tratamento adequado (isento de sangue). Situações que enfatizam a necessidade do diálogo com a Antropologia, em especial das Antropologias da Religião e da Saúde no que tange aos preceitos religiosos de separação, noções de pureza e impureza, bem como de santidade que pensamos associar aos princípios e convenções - Direitos Humanos e Dignidade da Pessoa Humana - bem como ampliar as discussões acerca do Respeito a Diversidade afim de sensibilizar a comunidade em geral sobre o conflito espiritual que essas pessoas enfrentam no momento de maior fragilidade - a doença.

Social science structures of communication in Chile: Local and global networks

This paper (1) analyzes the connections of Chilean social science with central countries in comparison with those established with the same country and other Latin American countries, especially regarding theory; and (2) analyzes the structures of communication and collaboration in the field of social science in Chile. Concerning the second point, it examines the hypothesized effects of cohesion and fragmentation coming from: (1) paradigmatic framing (positivist, interpretative, and critical), (2) type of institution of knowledge production, (3) scientific discipline and (4) researchers' gender. It is based on content analysis of academic publications, and on social network analysis applied to a data base of almost thirty thousand bibliographical references generated for this research from the universe of published investigations by Chilean social scientists in a period of seven years, in the 2000s, in magazines and books, nationals and foreigners. The results show that, regarding international communications, there is a small proportion of connections with other Latin American countries, but that the national connections are relatively important and particularly those with a group of local theorists occupying central positions in the network. On the other hand, it is found a scientific field noticeably fragmented by discipline and gender; regarding gender, in addition, the structure of women networks is characterized by symmetry, horizontality and greater density in comparison with those of men. The scientific paradigms have a fragmentation effect on the subfields of anthropology and political science, but much less in sociology, where it was discovered the operation of an important group of brokers, paradigmatically hybrids. The structure of scientific relations also is influenced by the different types of institutions of production (old and public universities, new private universities, regional universities, independent centers, international organisms). In general, the scientific network is shaped by the combined effect of epistemic cultures and power relations.

'Racialised facilitative capital' and the paving of differential paths to achievement of Afro-Trinidadian boys

Interrogating the achievement of Afro-Trinidadian boys requires a theoretical approach which appreciates both structures of race and their embodiment in daily discourse, and the postcolonial non-white majority context of Trinidad. As such, this paper employs a symbiotic theoretical platform which combines and augments Bourdieu's Sociology and Critical Race Theory (CRT). Adjusting for the context of Trinidad a concept of 'racialised facilitative capital' is fashioned. While Bourdieu describes capital as the political building blocks of social order that give meaning to social accumulation and consumption, it is argued that in relation to Trinidad, it is also inherently raced. This is premised on an understanding of Trinidadian society as pigmentocratically structured, where lighter skin is rewarded with a myriad of social advantages, and darkness denigrated as illegitimate and 'other'. Arguably, the premium placed on lighter skin is manifested interdependently in the forms of social, economic and cultural capital. The operation of capital as politic, not only reflects societal structures of power and domination, but importantly also contributes in the maintenance of said structures. This thereby presents capital as inseparably both facilitator of social status and as racialised process, giving birth to the term 'racialised facilitative capital'.

This proposal discusses the relationship between social movements and the re-democratization of Brazil. Emphasis will be given on the black social movements and their demands for both affirmative action in higher education and for the reform of the curriculum in the educational system. It will defend the hypothesis that the democratization process which the country has gone through in the past twenty years represents new dynamics in the relationship between the state and civil society. In this period new policies were designed under the pressure of new organized sectors of civil society. This paper deals with two main objectives: a) the research project that I have been leading about affirmative action in public universities will be presented; b) the analysis tackling the contextualization of new public policies that have meant changes for the participation of new social actors, who have organized their demands for more redistribution of wealth in the nation as well as for recognition of new identities that have been reinforced. And we might as well ask the following question. Do such dynamics represent new possibilities for participation in the exclusive Brazilian public sphere or do they mean old practices under new labels?

Constitutional courts and the instrumentalization of legitimacy

Democratic institutions fulfill their constitutional role in a political activity of State. The Constitutional Courts present itself as the institutions which better prosecutes that function. This study investigates, in particular, the Brazilian Supreme Court and its activity as guardian of the Constitution. Considering the crescent importance of new mechanisms in the constitutional jurisdiction, some foreign institutions help this analysis, as U.S. and

Canada Supreme Courts. The establishment of a constitutional order, of political rules and the promotion of a system of rights by Constitutional Courts are situations which, traditionally, reassemble difficulties in the democratic ground, resulting in significant wear. The central object of this research is the phenomenon which had been rugged recently supplying the democratic deficit of Constitutional Courts, the instrumentalization of legitimacy. These mechanisms as consequence present, at least, two distinct forms: participative-inclusion, and dialogical mechanisms. Both permits to recognize the Courts in an superior position in the definition of deliberative parameters, eliminating, although, the possibility of characterizes a judicial supremacy design. In Brazil, there are examples as amicus curiae and public audiences. In addition, an institutional activity compatible with a cooperative commitment requires the deliberative parameters elaborated reinforcing their legitimacy degree. On one hand, a Court actuating in political issues of outstanding disagreement without the support of instruments increasing its democratic degree is more susceptible to the wear vis-à-vis collectivity and other institutions. On other hand, the Court attending the crescent social demand in achieve basic rights and relevant decision-making at the same time maintaining open to participation and dialogue with other institutions may had a highly recognize of their legitimacy. Migration trajectories and environmental risk: A case study from Albay, Philippines

One of the anticipated impacts of climate change is a change in migration patterns on local, national and even international scales. While the nature and extent of this change is the subject of growing policy and academic interest, the environmental migration literature continues to suffer from a lack of theoretically grounded conceptual frameworks. Using metatheoretical discussions of the relationship between structure and agency, the paper outlines an analytical framework, which seeks both to explain and describe how environmental factors may shape migration. These theoretical discussions are explored in a case study of migration patterns from Albay province, Philippines. Findings reveal the importance of seeing migration as a process, the result of dialectical relationships between actors and structural processes of economic, political, social, cultural and environmental change.

Between trivialization and accusation - Different patterns of experiencing racism in Germany

My paper is based on empirical research for my PhD project which is entitled: The Construction of the Self in Relation to Racism - Experiencing and Processing of Racialized Discourses and Practices by People of Color in Germany.

The research is concentrated on the reconstruction of different ways of experiencing racism by People of Color in Germany in interrelation with other mechanisms of exclusion. To approach this interest I employ two different focuses.

1. I conduct biographical-narrative interviews combined with a reconstructive approach of analysis (see Rosenthal 1995) in order to gain insight not only into the current perception of racism but also into the genesis of strategies of dealing with experiences of racism.
2. Moreover, my project also draws attention to the discourses of racism in Germany as well as to existing power relations and the ways in which these interplay with the life history of individuals.

Within this interdependency of life-history and discourse different patterns of handling racism can be defined: E.g. depending on where you are from- on whether someone is born in Germany, comes to Germany as a student from an African country or as a refugee. Other factors, amongst others gender or social status, also influence the way of dealing with experiences of racism. The complex interrelation of these factors on the level of biography necessarily provides a potential for an intersectional perspective.

In my presentation I will therefore introduce different cases from my research to exemplify strategies and patterns of biographical work of experiencing and dealing with racism.

What is left to say about the GDR? – The interrelation between narration and discourse

People of Color have to deal with specific discourses; this raises the question of the interrelation between biography and discourse.

I will go into this question by applying empirical findings from my PhD project which carries the title: The Construction of the Self in Relation to Racism - Experiencing and Processing of Racialized Discourses and Practices by People of Color in Germany.

My presentation focuses on the methodical issue how to analyze the complex ways in which an individual is dealing/has to deal with discourses.

Discourses create possibilities to speak. Individuals refer to discourses to address particular views and themes. Biographical narrations are thus permeated by discourses. Biographical-narrative interviews therefore exemplify how discourses might be used by interviewees to position themselves or to establish a particular version of their live story or the history of their society.

In order to reconstruct the ways of referring to and dealing with discourses I will present a triangulation of biographical case reconstructions (Rosenthal 1995) and discourse analysis (Keller 2005).

As an example, I will introduce the interview with an Afro-German woman born and socialized in the GDR. Her ways of speaking about the GDR highlight the possibilities which such a triangulation might have when it comes to gaining knowledge about the complex interdependency between biography, discourse and narration. I will argue that the combination of case reconstruction and discourse analysis in the context of an interview text can be fruitful not only to visualize the ways in which people refer to specific discourses in their narration but also in order to gain insight into the factors that determine why particular references are made at specific points.

Social exclusion and affirmative action from a human rights' perspective: The Indian context

Social Exclusion may be termed as a process by which individuals and groups are made disadvantaged through discrimination on the basis of ethnicity, race, religion, sexual orientation, caste, descent, gender, age, disability, HIV status, migrant status, and so on. Social Exclusion generates tension and violence, disrupts normal life, and makes the victims sub-human. More importantly, it perpetuates inequality and deprivation, and denies human rights and justice to the victims. Social discrimination in India cannot be understood by the euro-centric approach and its labour market framework. Discrimination has been the working out of India's centuries-old caste system. As caste system is based on Hindu religion, understanding the imperfections and inadequacies of caste and religion in India is the proper way of grappling with exclusion and discrimination and their outcome in Indian society. The Constitution of India directs that the State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds of religion, race, caste, place of birth, or any of them; and that the State shall promote with special care the educational and economic interests of the scheduled castes/tribes and shall protect them from social injustice and all forms of exploitation. Despite these and other related provisions, discrimination and exclusion based on caste and religion still continue, denying a large section of Indian population their legitimate human rights and social justice. This paper seeks to present the Indian problem from a historical and contemporary perspective with a view to help in developing a just, equal, and humane society in India.

Planification participative d'un quartier sensible dans la périphérie de Lisbonne

À travers un regard critique sur la mise en œuvre dès 2005 d'une politique publique de qualification de quartiers sensibles, on aborde la complexité des relations entre la multiplicité d'acteurs publiques (au niveau de l'État et de la municipalité) et d'acteurs d'un bas (associations locales et habitants) qui interagissent dans une même arène pour l'élaboration d'un plan urbain de détail. Prenant comme cas d'étude l'intervention à Cova da Moura, un quartier « informel » majoritairement Cap-verdien, aux marges de Lisbonne, on restitue les multirationalités, intérêts, stratégies et pratiques des différents acteurs (Sardan 1995), et on confronte le discours émancipatoire des documents officiels, qui se reproduit dans les documents du plan urbain, avec les pratiques autoritaires de certains acteurs publiques et des responsables du plan qui véhiculent un modèle urbain contraire à celle des habitants. On cherche à montrer dans quelle mesure, dans un contexte capitaliste et neo-libérale, cette intervention contribue à renforcer la participation sociale, la capacité d'action et la cohésion locales, créant des germes de gouvernance au niveau local, mais aussi, au contrôle pervers de cette initiative et au ralentissement de la mobilisation populaire. Le temps lent de ce processus de planification participative (Boelens 2010) devient un instrument dans le rapport de forces sur place. Le droit à la ville, en tant que droit à la transformation du territoire et de soi-même, selon Harvey (2007), est interpellé comme concept de base pour appréhender le processus à l'œuvre de changement social et du territoire.

Uno de los más importantes grupos de bailarines de break dance del Rio de Janeiro se encuentra en la Maré, un conjunto de dieciséis barrios de chabolas con más de 140 mil habitantes. Inicialmente creado a partir de ONG's locales, este estilo de danza se expandió y ha ganado nuevos adeptos, lo que hizo emerger un circuito de break dance independiente de las instituciones. Son los b-boys y las b-girls (bailarines de break dance) de la Maré que definen el formato de los entrenamientos (movimientos a ejercitar, músicas a oír, horarios de los entrenamientos) y garantizan los aspectos logísticos: local del entrenamiento, limpieza y iluminación del espacio.

Compartir experiencias en la danza y formar un conjunto de reflexiones sobre la cultura hip hop ha sido el arquetipo de una intensa relación afectiva que convirtió algunos de ellos en amigos inseparables. Durante los entrenamientos se vive una intensa convivencia, cuyos rituales y performances crean un "espíritu de grupo" entre los participantes, haciendo viable una identidad colectiva. El término "familia" es constantemente utilizado por ellos para nombrar el grupo que integran lo que reitera el carácter colectivo de sus identidades. Refuerzan así la unión y la amistad entre los miembros del grupo elaborando un "nosotros". Simultáneamente, buscan una singularidad y rechazan las imágenes estigmatizantes a las cuales están muchas veces asociados por vivir en barrios de chabolas.

La pedagogía implícita en el aprendizaje del break dance fomenta un conjunto de normas y valores asociados a las ideas de cohesión y solidaridad entre los adeptos, que se opone a la fragmentación y al individualismo que la modernidad tardía inauguró. Es una forma agradable y grupal de cultivo de la subjetividad, constituyendo también una manera creativa de buscar reconocimiento y dignidad viéndose como miembro de una prestigiosa cultura global.

Este trabajo propone debatir sobre la relación entre Procesos de Integración Regional, Infraestructura ferroviaria y modelos de desarrollo territorial partiendo del análisis de diferentes actores (públicos y privados). Se considera fundamental poder diferenciar entre proyectos (políticos y de desarrollo) que estén vinculados al regionalismo supranacional, como el Mercosur o IIRSA[1] y los proyectos de cooperación de las unidades subestatales, para estos procesos retomaremos el concepto de Micro-regionalismo. Vamos a considerar, entonces, a aquellos procesos que parten desde la escala nacional o global pero que se enmarcan en dinámicas territoriales locales frente a aquellos procesos de subsistencia/resistencia de las áreas locales frente a modelos de desarrollo donde las áreas locales tienen una única funcionalidad vinculada a la explotación de los territorios para el comercio internacional. A través de un relevamiento de documentos de trabajo de IIRSA, de los Ministerios de Infraestructura y de bibliografía específica sobre los procesos ferroviarios en los territorios nacionales, se analizará el papel de los actores centrales en la toma de decisiones para la construcción de nueva infraestructura ferroviaria regional, a la par de los debates entre modelos igualitarios de ordenamiento territorial y la posibilidad de que la nueva infraestructura regional replique desigualdades territoriales históricas. Se trabajará específicamente sobre los Ejes de Desarrollo de IIRSA en relación con las obras de infraestructura que pretenden ser realizadas y los modelos territoriales que éstas implican.

Trade unions, climate change, and the north-south divide

Global environmental degradation and the global division of labour constitute a "dual exposure" to the effects of globalisation. The focus of our analysis is on how these processes intersect with industrial relations and the formulation of trade union environmental strategies.

The paper presents findings based on trade union policy and discussion papers, participant observation at conferences, and over 35 in-depth interviews with senior trade union officials in national and international unions and NGOs.

Our findings show that the traditional power relations between the global North and the global South are reproduced to a certain degree within the trade union movement. Given the evidence of environmental destruction and the crisis of justice, there is a need to reconfigure what development means. Alternative models of development that are being created in the North and the South by unions and by environmental movements might provide the bridge to connect the seemingly irresolvable conflicting interests of Northern and Southern unions. The task appears less impossible when we remember that historically unions were created precisely to solve the apparently irresolvable conflict between the individual interests of workers competing against each other and the need to organise a unified response against exploitation. This same conflict exists now at a global level and suggests the need for a global response from workers. This could be a critical moment in trade union history, where unions recognise that although addressing climate change is a non-traditional area of their concerns, it could be decisive for their future, not only in terms of the effects it will have on jobs, but also regarding the impact it could have on international solidarity.

Sobrevivir en la ciudad: Las representaciones de los niños y niñas cartoneros sobre su espacio de trabajo

Una de las particularidades que asume el trabajo infantil urbano en Argentina es su significativa presencia en espacios públicos. Para los niños que trabajan y sus familias "salir a la calle" no sólo tiene el significado literal de desplazarse hacia el ámbito público y de abandonar temporariamente el hogar -habitualmente emplazado en zonas pobres de la periferia- sino que es sinónimo de "ir a trabajar". De este modo casi todos los chicos que trabajan nominan bajo esta expresión dos aspectos de su realidad, tanto el trabajo que desarrollan como el desplazamiento hacia el espacio en el que lo desenvuelven: la calle. Ahora bien, hablar de espacio público a secas nada nos dice sobre la peculiaridad que el fenómeno adquiere para quienes desarrollan su actividad laboral allí. Esta situación imprime ciertas particularidades a las actividades laborales y a la vida cotidiana de estos niños. Tomando en cuenta a las mismas, el presente trabajo se propone explorar -a partir de una investigación con abordaje cualitativo basado en entrevistas a niños trabajadores en el cartoneo y sus padres y observación participante junto a una familia de carteros en su trabajo diario- el mundo de los niños que trabajan como cartoneros, analizando en particular cómo la calle, en tanto espacio de trabajo permite comprender diferentes aspectos que asume la práctica laboral en sí misma como así también se constituye en una llave para explorar diferentes modos de sociabilidad de los niños pobres.

Cultural tourism, a complex strategy for social development: State of Morelos, Mexico

The understanding of the territory is central to the proposal for a cultural tourism strategy, which is defined as: "He motivated junket to know, understand and enjoy all the features and distinctive spiritual, material and emotional features of society or social group to a specific destination" (SECTUR-CESTUR, 2002).

This involves solving a complex problem because of the large number of factors in the act and where the intervention of different specialists is imminent for its articulation and resolution (García, Complex Systems, 2006)

Mexico has poverty increased from 1.5% one of the highest in Latin America (CEPAL, 2011) and ranks second in income inequality in OECD (NOTIMEX, 2011).

Whereas Mexico Tourism represents 9% of GDP (The Weekly Agency, 2011) and according to the World Tourism Organization, the sector's growth prospects are positive for the coming years in emerging countries (World Tourism Organization, 2009), it is appropriate to take this opportunity and create a social positive impact on the population by implementing a coordinated participatory democracy to build sustainable social development in the State of Morelos, characterized by a large inventory of cultural resources.

This paper will present the importance of a complex strategy linked to the social development of a territory with multiple determinations, including: knowledge of resources, needs and opinions of the population, public policy, the expectations of visitors and the infrastructure good performance of the tourism product, based on differentiation. It is only through knowledge of all these elements, the complex interplay between them and with different actors and their relationships, which may suggest a complex strategy conducive to social development of the community.

El turismo cultural, una estrategia compleja para el desarrollo social: Estado de Morelos, México

La comprensión del territorio es fundamental en la propuesta de una estrategia de turismo cultural el cual se define como: "Aquel viaje turístico motivado por conocer, comprender y disfrutar el conjunto de rasgos y elementos distintivos, espirituales, materiales y afectivos que caracterizan a una sociedad o grupo social de un destino específico" (SECTUR-CESTUR, 2002). Esto implica la resolución de un problema complejo, por la gran cantidad de factores que en él actúan y donde la intervención de diferentes especialistas resulta inminente para su articulación y solución. (García, Sistemas Complejos, 2006)

México registra un aumento de pobreza del 1.5% uno de los más elevados de América Latina (CEPAL, 2011) y se clasifica en el segundo lugar en desigualdad de ingresos de la OCDE (NOTIMEX, 2011).

Considerando que el turismo representa para México el 9% del PIB (El Semanario Agencia, 2011) y que según la Organización Mundial del Turismo, las perspectivas de crecimiento del sector son positivas para los próximos años en los países emergentes (Organización Mundial del Turismo, 2009), resulta pertinente aprovechar esta oportunidad y generar un impacto social positivo en la población, implementando una propuesta articulada en la democracia participativa para forjar desarrollo social sostenible en el Estado de Morelos, caracterizado por un nutrido inventario de recursos culturales.

Esta ponencia dará a conocer la importancia de una estrategia compleja vinculada al desarrollo social de un territorio con múltiples determinaciones tales: el conocimiento de recursos, las necesidades y opiniones de la población, las políticas públicas, las expectativas de los visitantes y la infraestructura para un buen desempeño del producto turístico, basado en la diferenciación. Es sólo a través del conocimiento de todos éstos elementos, del complejo entramado entre ellos y con sus diferentes actores y de sus relaciones, que se podrá proponer una estrategia compleja conducente al desarrollo social de la comunidad.

Citizens and/or strangers: EU free movers' associations in southern European civil societies

In the global population of migrants, European citizens living abroad within the EU enjoy a quite exceptional legal status, as they are entitled to the same rights as nationals of that state (with the only exception of voting at general elections). compared to 'average world migrants', 'EU movers' enjoy the privilege of living in societies where being an immigrant does not imply any second-level status per se. Technically speaking, citizens of EU member states who have moved to another EU member state are international migrants. That is, they fulfill the requirements of the standard UN definition of migrants as 'persons who move to a country other than that of his or her usual residence for a period of at least one year'. On the other hand, their status makes them very similar to internal migrants. They are citizens and strangers at the same time.

Especially after the 2004 and 2007 enlargements of the EU and the subsequent waves of East-West continental migration, the number of EU movers has grown and their impact on receiving society more visible. Drawing on a recent survey of the associations of Poles, Rumanians, Britons and Germans (see www.moveact.eu), the paper shall assess the impact of movers on civil society in Italy, France, Spain and Greece, showing diverging demands and strategies of active citizenship for Eastern and Western European movers.

Europe as transnational social space: A comparative assessment

European integration and globalisation bring about emerging possibilities to exit the 'box' of national societies more easily than ever before in history. Europeans today can travel, work, study and retire abroad freely, using low-cost flights made possible by EU deregulation; they can buy property in other EU member states within a mutually recognised legal system; they can shop across the EU without having to pass through custom offices. All this opens increased opportunities of interaction with people across national borders. But do citizens of EU member states take these opportunities? Who is taking them and who is not? Are there individual and context-level differences in the degrees of transnationalisation of social life? Does involvement in transnational spaces makes up a growing type of social distinction, much along the lines of classic insights by Merton, Bourdieu and Bauman? Or does it associate in more complex ways with educational and occupational stratification patterns?

This paper sets out to answer such questions by charting the forms by which Europeans have expanded the radius of their lives by travelling physically and virtually across national borders. It shall presents the results of a unique comparative survey – the EUCROSS survey – carried out among residents in Germany, Italy, the UK, Spain, Denmark and Romania (1,000 cases per country) on the basis of a EC-funded research project on border-crossing behaviours (www.eucross.eu) coordinated by the author. Several types of cross-border practices shall be taken into account, distinguishing between physical and virtual practices (e.g., resettling, holidaying, business travelling on the one hand; following foreign media, shopping online on international sites, participating in transnational web forums/chats on the other). An index of cross-border behaviours shall be created and analysed through multi-level modelling to single out the conditions that help explain different propensities to the transnationalisation of social relations.

Violaciones a los derechos humanos durante la última dictadura militar Argentina: Disputas jurídico-políticas en torno a la restitución de niños apropiados en la "transición democrática"

Esta ponencia se centra en un caso particular de violación a los Derechos Humanos durante la última dictadura militar argentina: la apropiación de niños, hijos de detenidos-desaparecidos. Se analizan específicamente las disputas jurídico-políticas desatadas a partir de la localización, en tiempos de la "transición democrática", de una niña desaparecida buscada por Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo.

Por un lado, se indaga la diversidad de concepciones en conflicto en torno al parentesco y la identidad sostenidas por los agentes judiciales intervinientes, que determinarán si la niña es restituida o no a su familia biológica, y su articulación con las figuras jurídicas de "abandono", "riesgo" y "peligro" que justifican formalmente estas decisiones y que serán re-leídas de forma novedosa en este caso.

Por otro lado, el uso de estas categorías, los argumentos y estrategias jurídicas desplegadas dentro del tribunal, se estudian a la luz de la posición y actuación en la trama político-ideológica de los distintos actores judiciales. De esta manera, al mostrar las distintas mediaciones de las decisiones judiciales, se pretende contribuir a la reflexión respecto de la compleja relación derecho - sociedad.

The role of globalization in cultural industries: The case of commemoration

The three main links that constitute the cultural industry chain are production, promotion and consumption. These links represent the culture triangle needed to energise an industry whose aesthetic nature and artistic values mirror the essence of human Western civilization. The act of commemorating; an observance designed to honour the memory of some person or event. The proposal is intended to examine the intersections of commemoration and modernity, while examining experiences and memories of the Holocaust in the cultural industries in a global perspective.

The central interest is the (re)construction of a sensitive memory of the Holocaust and other genocides through the drawing of boundaries defined in national, regional, social, racial or cultural terms. The assumption is that the network (trans-)national and regional images and narratives that derives from the remembrance of Holocaust had long lasting effects on the memory culture of a globalized world in general and the relations of nation and regions in particular. The second hypothesis is that the concepts of universal virtues and values are entirely useful as a scientific concept in conveying Holocaust.

In the context of Holocaust commemoration, the concept of cultural industries seems quite problematic. The expression of "Holocaust industries" establishes a connection between cultural industries and Holocaust commemoration. The term "cultural industry" as shaped by Adorno and Horkheimer may cultivate false desire; that is, desire created and satisfied by capitalism. According the emergence of global modernity changes, expressed by a shift towards Asia, especially in the economic sector, in the context of Holocaust and genocide commemoration it seems doubly difficult to take a shift of Western values to Asian values in account.

Modernidad latinoamericana: Autorepresentaciones, problemas y dimensiones de análisis

Más allá de la incertidumbre y diversidad de los pronósticos, la crisis de los hasta ahora sujetos hegemónicos de la historia mundial (Europa, EEUU) y la emergencia de nuevos (viejos) actores (Brasil, Rusia, India y China), requieren que América Latina, como región, busque redefinir su lugar en el mundo.

En esta tarea, América Latina debe revisar sus autorepresentaciones de la modernidad, que incluye la reformulación de dos viejas preguntas: a) ¿Hay una o varias modernidades Latinoamericanas?, 2) ¿cuál es la índole de lo americano (distinción entre América Latina y Norteamérica (EEUU)? Ambas preguntas incluyen, por cierto, la reflexión acerca de su pertinencia misma.

En esta revisión hay que destacar los aportes del giro intercultural y comparativo de la filosofía, sociología, antropología e historia contemporáneas que prioriza estos debates yendo más allá de la interpretación canónica y normalizada del universalismo eurocéntrico, de la crítica dependencista y del pensamiento poscolonial, tanto en su versión moderna o posmoderna. Estos debates han asumido un enfoque que se ha beneficiado con la revisión de la historia universal efectuada desde la perspectiva de la historia global y que permite sostener que los procesos actuales de modernización son producto de complejos procesos de cambio a) respecto de la propia historia, b) respecto de las historias de los otros y c) en relación con la base social global. Se trata de procesos de asimilaciones, entrecruzamientos, mestizajes y diferenciaciones, descentramientos y recentramientos, por medio de los cuales ninguno de sus protagonistas permanece igual.

Este nuevo enfoque de la modernidad requiere también y muy especialmente revisar los abordajes epistemológicos con los que se ha construido la tradicional historia de las ideas en Latinoamérica (y su crítica revisionista), muy especialmente, las nociones de modelo y copia, centro y periferia.

Arts and crafts: Between creativity and techniques learning, art and work, identity and subjectivity

How categories such as "arts and crafts", "popular art" and "manual works" are manipulated in the context where the artistry market in Rio de Janeiro comes into contact with the artistry production of the "community" of mental health? The native use of the category "community", as a form of totaling a heterogeneous group, is a rhetorical construction that appears at the same time as a device for blurring the borders that separate "users of mental health services", from its relatives and from technician that take care of such people - becoming all of them part of one single group - and an essentialization of a border that separates this "community" from the national society - the "normal" people. One of the specificities of this group of artistry producers is that it cannot be thought of as a "community" in the conventional sense of the term, that is, a group that shares a common origin - real or imagined -, distinctive territory, same cultural values and the idea of belonging that makes it possible the construction of public politics and social identities. Still, many devices for setting identity landmarks have been used in the current Psychiatric Reformation movement in Brazil treating it as any other kind community (ethnic, religious etc). Artistic manifestations have functioned as privileged instruments in this process. Several contradictions lie behind this process such as the representations that separate creativity and techniques learning, art and work, identity and subjectivity. These contradictions mostly related with the axiology of the contemporary artistic phenomena, the values that support the artistry production classifications and the representations on madness and the idea of social identity related to it is what I intend to develop in this presentation.

Back and forth of the silk: Regional production and reproduction of memories and identities

Seropédica is seen as a "region of border" between urban and agricultural universes. One of Rio de Janeiro state's cities it had in its cultural past, in the middle of the 19th century, the presence of a farm that created the silk animal, produced and exported the silk fabric. The city counts with a political project of identity construction for the region on the part of the public agencies. The actions on the part of this agencies point to a processes whose horizons are the rescue of a lost memory, from new references, as a base for the construction of a municipal identity. Some characteristics of the city that remind of the "wastelands" have been stimulated like dancing groups, music balls, the local carnival but also the carnival that connects the city to the big metropolis. The interest in developing tourism in the region uses the advantage of the silk culture of the past to stimulate the black-berries and it's tea leaf as a distinctive reference to a glorious past identity. The identities are symbolic constructions through which the individuals and groups perceive their ethnic and/or regional belonging. These constructions are, in great measure, consequences of social identities consisting "from idea of belonging to collectives culturally defined and, eventually, related to specific territories" (Seyferth, 1995:57) that, in turn, result in multiple axes of social classification of ethnic and regional nature coexisting in modern societies. These classificatory axes have influence in the objective reality of the people defining their behaviors, rights and duties conditioned by the social status that they occupy in this society. We intend to investigate how those identities forged for Seropédica are appropriated by the people who live and work in the city with regards to defending common economic and/or political interests.

Heading towards the old continent: Building transnational networks of interaction between Brazilian and Swedish Pentecostal leaders

It has been some years that the Brazilian Pentecostal process of transnationalization towards Europe and other countries it's not been considered as a new fact and understanding for some researches in the anthropological religious field. Recent studies have shown the existence of what it's been called as "inverted mission". Brazilian religious leaders are taken their way back to Europe, when, before, there used to be a religious flow from Europe to America. Therefore, this is a two way interaction that involves a transnational movement of the Brazilian Pentecostals ministries leaders from Brazil to Europe, from Europe to Brazil, as well as to other countries, creating the perfect environment to build networks between Pentecostals churches around the world This article seeks to analyze the relationship, the bonds built specially between Word of Life Church in Uppsala, Sweden, and Encontros de Fé in Porto Alegre, Brazil. Such relationship contributed to bring to Porto Alegre the Word of Life Bible School which was founded 27 years ago by Ulf Ekman, the president of Word of Life Church, to be installed at Encontros de Fé church. Some of the results collected in field research shows that the aim of this partnership regards on the goal of raising social capital and, also, form new leaders for church's own needs and growth.

La recuperación del trabajo y los procesos de democratización en Uruguay

Se abordará la temática de las empresas recuperadas por sus trabajadores en el Uruguay, quienes ante el cierre o quiebra de su lugar de trabajo se niegan a formar parte del desempleo "trabajando sin patrones".

Se indaga sobre las fuerzas enajenantes que se establecen mediante las relaciones sociales que caracterizan las empresas de las que provienen, buscando historizar los procesos autogestionarios para comprender su posible dinamismo en la transformación social.

Se analiza cómo a través de demandas que emergen con carácter defensivo, se van configurando subjetividades específicas, entramados y fuerzas sociales capaces de generar nuevos espacios de implicación que pueden ser interpretados como nuevos horizontes y oportunidades en el espacio de la lucha social.

En la búsqueda por recrear su trabajo, los trabajadores recorren complejos procesos de autonomización que son abordados y analizados desde su dimensión económica-productiva, relacional y simbólica.

El enfoque teórico/metodológico elegido incorpora a los sujetos colectivos en tanto factores determinantes/determinados en las estructuras económico-productivas, mientras que el trabajo de campo constó en una triangulación de técnicas cualitativas y cuantitativas.

Los datos fueron generados a través de: una encuesta y entrevistas semi-estructuradas a representantes de veinte unidades recuperadas, observación directa en los establecimientos, participación durante tres años en la incubación de una cortinumbre en proceso de recuperación y por último, una encuesta realizada a quinientos trabajadores que se encuentran actualmente produciendo bajo esta modalidad.

¿Cómo se dan estos procesos de autogestión obrera en Uruguay? ¿Cuál podría ser su significado dentro del enfoque sociológico-político sobre la democratización social?

Financiamiento de campañas electorales y sistema electoral: Reflexiones sobre la agenda de la reforma política en Brasil, 2003-2011

Aunque el constante debate público sobre la reforma política en Brasil parezca volver a empezar desde el principio con nuevas proposiciones, desde 2003 consiste en variaciones alrededor del mismo núcleo: la adopción de listas preordenadas y financiamiento exclusivamente público de campañas electorales.

Es en 2003 cuando la comisión especial de la Cámara de los Diputados consolidó en esos dos pilares todos los proyectos que tramitaban sobre esa materia. La propuesta del financiamiento público exclusivo presentó el propósito explícito de mejorar los controles institucionales sobre los flujos de capital. Para habilitar su implantación, fue propuesta la institución de las listas preordenadas, evitándose así la disolución de los recursos en diversas campañas individuales, además de facilitar la fiscalización.

Derrotada en 2007 y abortada en 2009, la propuesta resurgió en 2011 cuando una comisión del Senado Federal votó en su mayoría por la institución del financiamiento público y de las listas preordenadas. A pesar de todo, en 2011 una comisión de la Cámara de Diputados encaminó proposición distinta con financiamiento público complementado por donaciones "a ciegas" a un fondo y un sistema electoral vectorialmente opuesto a las listas preordenadas, intentando combinar la competición entre las listas partidarias abiertas con una competición individual entre candidatos.

¿Cómo conciliar el hecho de que el Poder Legislativo brasileño vuelva siempre a la misma propuesta con el precedente de haber sido reiteradamente rechazada en el plenario desde 2007? ¿Si la propuesta es inviable, por qué siempre se vuelve a ella? ¿Si es suficientemente fuerte para ser reiteradamente resucitada, por qué nunca prospera?

Así, el trabajo pretende a partir de una narrativa de las tentativas recientes de reforma del sistema electoral brasileño, complementada por los datos preliminares de pesquisa comparativa sobre sistemas de financiamiento de campañas en sus relaciones con el sistema electoral, propiciar parámetros productivos para el debate.

Indiferencia civil e infancia: Un análisis de la "frialidad burguesa" en relación a los niños

Este estudio consiste en analizar la ontogénesis de la indiferencia civil, hacia los niños en la región metropolitana de Belo Horizonte – MG/Brasil. Aunque hay un número importante de estudios que demuestran las diferentes formas de exclusión de género, etnia, clase social y edad, las situaciones de desigualdad social y la subordinación prevalecen, que indican la necesidad de estudios referentes a la formación de la moral social basada en la "frialidad burguesa" (Bürgerliches Kälte) Este tipo particular de frialidad ocurre, según Gruschka (1996, 2004), debido a la indiferencia civil, demostrada en las prácticas y rituales sociales que conducen a la desensibilización, semejante a las contradicciones del proyecto capitalista basado en la moral burguesa. Considerando a la escuela infantil como un ejemplo de lo que queremos demostrar, analizamos que en medio de las contradicciones entre la propuesta de formar-educar-enseñar en un proceso emancipatorio y la desigualdad de condiciones objetivas de oportunidades educativas, muchas de las situaciones cotidianas de conflicto se experimentan en la educación, en la que la moral de la indiferencia se transmite y refuerza en los estudiantes desde la educación infantil. Observamos que en la actualidad existe un macro e micro modelo de gestión pública incapaces de captar a las diferentes fuerzas sociales que intervienen en el proceso de superación de las desigualdades. Hemos encontrado que la frialidad burguesa afecta a todos los ámbitos sociales, como: la educación, la salud, la planificación familiar, las políticas de vivienda, es decir, la economía en general. Por lo tanto, la indiferencia civil puede ser entendida como una operación económica calculada.

Trajectorias institucionales, colectivos sociocognitivos y agendas de investigación: A propósito de la investigación a escala nanométrica en Argentina

Se analiza la fisonomía y dinámica que ha adquirido la investigación a escala nanométrica en Argentina en el último decenio. Este periodo permite analizar en el surgimiento y desarrollo de un campo de conocimiento incipiente su eventual subordinación a agendas de investigación internacionales así como el impacto de las políticas científico-tecnológicas implementadas para el sector. Con el objeto de explorar eventuales variaciones en el carácter aplicado o no del conocimiento generado en el mismo se ha optado por el término "investigación a escala nanométrica" como denominador de las prácticas consideradas.

Desde esta perspectiva se problematizan tres factores: la trayectoria de las instituciones que detentan en el periodo la mayor cantidad de proyectos aprobados por organismos científico-tecnológico nacionales y/o la mayor cantidad de investigadores abocados al área, la estructura organizativa y funcional de los "colectivos sociocognitivos" (Giere, 2008) que han impulsado este tipo de investigación en el país, considerando particularmente la interacción interinstitucional respecto al equipamiento y las facilidades experimentales, y las agendas de investigación, atendiendo a la incidencia que en su definición han tenido aspectos tales como las políticas implementadas en el país, las orientaciones establecidas para el campo en las iniciativas nanotecnológicas de otros países y las redes internacionales de las que se ha formado parte.

Tales factores han sido considerados mediante una base de datos propia construida a partir de la información brindada por el Consejo Nacional de Investigaciones Científicas y Tecnológicas y la Agencia Nacional de Promoción de la Ciencia y la Tecnología. Particularmente se han analizado resultados de convocatorias públicas para la financiación de proyectos de investigación, reuniones científicas, compra de equipamiento y/o refacción de laboratorios, radicación y/o relocalización de investigadores y formación de recursos humanos. Se han evaluado publicaciones, patentes, convenios con empresas y se han realizado entrevistas en profundidad a científicos y responsables institucionales.

Situaciones de irregularidad dominial del hábitat popular urbano y acciones del estado, provincia de Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1990-2004

En la conformación de las ciudades de la provincia de Buenos Aires -fundamentalmente del Conurbano Bonaerense- observamos procesos que han derivado en distintas situaciones de irregularidad dominial. Por un lado, frente a las imposibilidades propias de la producción de ciudad en el capitalismo para dar acceso a la vivienda urbana de manera regular a todas las familias, aparecen formas de producción del hábitat que se desarrollan fuera de los marcos normativos: la ocupación de suelo o inmuebles deshabitados y las compraventas de viviendas y lotes por fuera de los circuitos formales son algunas maneras de resolver la necesidad de encontrar un lugar donde vivir en la ciudad, negado para quienes carecen de recursos económicos suficientes. Por otra parte, la producción formal de lotes urbanos -previa a la sanción de la Ley de Ordenamiento territorial y usos del suelo de 1977- y su venta a plazos, en ocasiones también ha sido generadora de irregularidad. Algunas de estas situaciones han sido objeto de medidas de regularización encaradas desde el gobierno de la provincia de Buenos Aires.

Presentamos los resultados de la revisión de las medidas adoptadas frente a los distintos tipos de irregularidad dominial en los que han derivado las diferentes formas de producción del suelo urbano. Para ello, concentramos nuestra mirada en un período de profunda reforma del Estado (1990-2004), recurrimos a la compilación y análisis de leyes, decretos y resoluciones ministeriales, y a entrevistas a actores políticos con funciones relevantes frente a la cuestión durante el período. Nos encontramos con un conjunto heterogéneo de acciones cuyos procedimientos, tiempos de implementación y resultados son muy disímiles, lo cual nos permite afirmar que la política de regularización de la provincia está conformada por un conjunto de iniciativas tomadas desde diferentes ámbitos de gobierno y como respuesta a casos visibilizados con cierta conflictividad.

Improvisations of leisure behind bars

The core of this research is to identify and typify nuances of leisure as strategies (re)created by convicted young foreigners, who are compelled to live 24/7 behind bars, under countless deprivations and limitations imposed by those who, formally, rule the prison.

On an overall sense, being under a custodial sentence may reflect, for those who are imprisoned, effective forms of lack of autonomy. Nevertheless, focused interactions on leisure, along the daily routines of inmates, can exhibit: the search of sources of momentary joy through shared belongings of pleasure, traces of creativeness, (re)conversion of dramatic episodes and appointments of critical sense of humor. Likewise, encounters on leisure may shape or be shaped by implicit or explicit formulas of resistance, intimidation and/or social distinction amongst those who have to face a prison sentence.

Under the scope of the Symbolic Interactionism approach, this communication is enlightened by a multiplicity of leisure expressions as informally experienced and interpreted by 18 (eighteen) convicted young foreigners in a Portuguese prison with an outstanding variety of nationalities. Therefore, an innovative combination of qualitative techniques was adapted to the specificities of the prison context and the socio-cultural backgrounds of those who were the subjects of study.

Hence, a comprehensive analysis is going to reveal exclusive and inclusive leisure activities which are a double bladed sword: conformity and confrontation to the restrictions and tensions of a prison environment. Alike, one is going to have a more in-depth knowledge on how do collective and individual singularities are likely to emerge from the participation on multiple gatherings promoted by young foreigners within the prison walls.

In sum, it is going to be presented groundbreaking data related to leisure (re)configurations as far as confinement experiences are concerned.

Everything under my skin: The tragic in the vulnerabilities of HIV positive people in Portugal

The figures of the vulnerable people are many and diversified. These figures are also encountered in Portugal. They are people with hidden voices and faces. They emerge in the public arena covered by a skin that notoriously announces their presence. Among the strange figures that tangibly foretell the presence of vulnerable beings, this text makes a sociological analysis following the critical operations made by HIV positive people taking as a starting point the diverse perspectives that make up their involvement with the world. Some mobilize themselves in causes that affect them and face various difficulties which run into their lives and into the lives of those also infected and affected by the disease. They fight with their bodies and everything under their skin is a means and an end to promote their causes in order to have their own human rights truly recognized. On the other side of the mirror, the organizations that support these movements are seen by HIV positive people as tools to make live and real, and to advertise, their denunciations of the ways they are disregarded, since the rule that does not allow, in democracy, the injustice at its worse, in its worst extreme forms, does not work and, through interposed voices, they claim the acknowledgement of their rights as beings that belong to a common humanity. But whatever the circumstance for the monitorization of these experiences, either HIV positive people that publicly expose themselves or HIV positive people that do not publicly reveal their presence in the city, they express their suffering, at a distance or presentially, through the coating of their bodies. The tragic in their skins throws them into experiences of unaffektness of themselves and of others in this modernity that sees itself as an enlarged liberality.

Sense of justice as a hidden curriculum: Indicator of school democracy that affect democratic attitudes

Early adolescence is a crucial period in the formation of civic identity, the shaping of one's "philosophy of life", and the gradual growth of independence and social responsibility that are essential conditions for becoming an active member in complex and stable democracies. We contend that justice experiences in school can be seen as a hidden curriculum: The sense of a 'just school', where instrumental and relational goods are justly distributed and where the procedures of their distribution are perceived to be 'fair', is in itself an indicator of a democratic milieu. Moreover, sense of justice in school will contribute to the development of social and institutional trust and to the formation of a democratic orientation.

Adopting a multidisciplinary – psychological and sociological – approach, we have developed a theoretical framework for the investigation of the relationship between students' sense of justice at school and different facets of civic attitudes and behaviour - i.e., social and institutional trust, democratic attitudes, civic engagement in school and social orientations.

Civic attitudes

- Institutional trust
- Social trust
- Democratic orientation

Civic behaviour

- School involvement
- Truancy/ absence
- Deviant behaviour
- Rule-oriented behaviour

Class context

- Procedural justice
- National/ethnic context
- Jews - Arabs

The model was tested empirically in Israel in a national sample of 48 middle schools (about 5000 8th and 9th grades students). Our presentation of findings will focus on the attitudinal outcomes (measures of trust and democratic attitudes). Implications for school organizational pedagogy will be discussed.

Del temor de dios al cuidado de sí. Una propuesta ética para la construcción de subjetividades desde la infancia

Si bien la Ley se ha pronunciado constante y prolijamente sobre la igualdad de derechos en lo que refiere a la condición sexual, incluyendo en dichas consideraciones a niños, niñas y adolescentes, difícilmente la Ley puede cambiar patrones sociales anclados siglos atrás y más aun cuando a estos los sustentan factores religiosos.

En nuestra sociedad, la colombiana, la incorporación de derechos ligados a la moderna concepción de género ha sido relativamente reciente, pero a pesar del empeño y buenas intenciones de nuestro legislador, la sociedad ha marchado, y lo sigue haciendo, movida mas por las indicaciones de credos religiosos (en su mayoría el cristiano-católico), presentes no sólo en el hogar, sino también en la escuela, definidos desde hace mas de un siglo como los valores sociales determinantes y que nuestro actual Estado laico no ha podido modificar.

Estos modelos de hombre y mujer virtuosos, ha impuesto en nuestros niños y niñas unos patrones ligados a los roles que se espera cumplan en sus contextos: casa, escuela, sociedad, presentes en la crianza, los castigos, la ropa, los comportamientos y hasta los juegos. De ésta manera, desde pequeños se nos ha dicho cómo debemos comportarnos, qué color usar, cómo sentarnos, cómo hablar... ligado siempre a la condición sexual dada por los órganos reproductivos.

Y no es que esté mal que una sociedad instaure en sus niños y niñas el modelo de ciudadano que desea, lo que no es prudente es que insista en asignar los roles de éstos según modelos sociales desarrollados en el Asia Menor a finales del primer milenio antes de nuestra era y sostenidos como ideales por la Iglesia Católica.

Tensiones y negociaciones entre religión y política: El caso de la educación sexual en las escuelas en la provincia de mendoza

Estudios recientes que abordan el lugar de las religiones en la sociedad actual, manifiestan la existencia de un proceso de quiebre del monopolio católico en el campo religioso. Argentina, si bien conserva un importante predominio del culto católico evidencia sin embargo un proceso de diversificación religiosa. No obstante, la iglesia católica como institución continúa manteniendo poder de negociación con el poder político y con el Estado.

En el presente trabajo nos proponemos abordar las lógicas, estrategias y negociaciones que establece la Iglesia con el Estado para lograr imponer sus concepciones en el diseño y aplicación de políticas publicas, en especial la referida a la política educativa, y en este marco, a la educación sexual. Tomaremos como espacio de referencia, la Provincia de Mendoza.

Podemos constatar que a nivel del estado nacional se creó un programa denominado "educación sexual integral", el cual presentó grandes dificultades para ser aplicado en Mendoza, justamente por la presión ejercida por grupos religiosos. Se observan al mismo tiempo tensiones y disputas en torno a su aplicación y a la definición de los contenidos sobre sexualidad que deben transmitirse en las escuelas. En este marco, nos ocuparemos de abordar la capacidad de trato que tienen diferentes actores con el Estado.

Se analizarán estas lógicas de negociación, a partir del análisis de las trayectorias políticas-religiosas de algunos funcionarios de la Dirección General de Escuelas. Dichos actores gozan de un espacio de poder que les permite otorgar un mayor o menor margen de acción a las comunidades educativas para que redefinan e implementen la política educativa. Así, los funcionarios cumplirían un rol de reguladores en la transmisión de los valores y principios religiosos a través de la política pública. Condensarían con sus posiciones políticas-ideológicas-religiosas, los avances y retroceso de un proceso complejo de secularización y laicización de la educación.

Cyborgs from Central America unite! A decolonial feminist approach to Central American women's groups in cyberspace Postcolonial studies have their origin in areas (Asia and Africa) where their history of independence from European colonial powers is relatively recent. The Americas have a much earlier history of colonial experience, and some of its countries have been formally independent for more than two centuries. Given that difference in background, scholarship in Latin America has been developed on the grounds of coloniality (colonialidad), a category coined by AnibalQuijano. According to Quijano (1993 y 2000), coloniality is a set of features and remains of colonial power and domination still shown by societies that once were colonies. Nonetheless, this state of affairs finds its significance through the place it has within a world-system. Most recently, through the production of Information and Communication Technologies (ICTs), it can be seen how this pattern is being followed.

Even though these technologies, in terms of production and culture, mark a great difference between the metropolitan areas (global North) and peripheral countries (global South), the use of such technologies is becoming very important for political resistance in Latin America. Cyberspace has become a resource of resistance for women who fight against political upheaval and inequality in Latin America. By combining the theoretical approaches of coloniality and cyberfeminism, I will discuss and analyze how women from Latin America build their own agency by creative ways of use and networking within cyberspace. I will pay special attention to two examples of Central American cyborgs, namely, the Feministas en Resistencia (Feminists in Resistance), a network of women throughout Latin America, that oppose the coup d'état in Honduras, and O.T.R.A.S. an organization of young women in engineering and computing who promote the access to free culture and software for women in Central America.

La ponencia presenta los resultados de la práctica de la coproducción investigativa, a través de un método para la producción colectiva de conocimiento científico. El encuentro discursivo no se limita a la escucha activa y metódica, postulada por Pierre Bourdieu como mecanismo de reducción de la violencia en la comunicación, sino que va más allá al comprometer a los actores sociales en tal práctica, convirtiéndolos en sujetos investigadores y, por lo tanto, coproductores de conocimiento. De este modo, el encuentro discursivo puede ser considerado como praxis: no se detiene ante lo dado del discurso, sino que éste es interrogado críticamente en su materialidad, toda vez que su anclaje material es el fundamento de la producción teórica de conocimiento, permitiendo dinamizar dialécticamente el proceso colectivo de producción cognoscitiva. La disputa por el espacio urbano genera en esta época la necesidad de respuestas novedosas por parte de los movimientos sociales quienes siendo protagonistas de estas luchas deben dirimir con otros actores sociales y políticos los desafíos de su futuro. El equipo de investigación ha promovido, tanto en la ciudad y la provincia de Buenos Aires, como en el área de Lima metropolitana, espacios de reflexión entre representantes de movimientos sociales sobre la apropiación y cambio del espacio urbano. Es así que se tomarán experiencias sistematizadas en los Encuentros de la Universidad Popular Urbana de la Alianza Internacional de Habitantes.

Discourses of child free later life: A gendered topic

In earlier research on singleness, I talked both to women who had always been single and to those who were single again following marriage or a long term relationship. While some had children, many did not. It appeared that those without children had a double set of accounting to do. They felt required to explain why they were single. Furthermore, they found it hard to respond to questions on whether they had children, with their implicit query 'why not?'

In this paper I explore the discourses employed by participants in my follow up interviews with these childfree women some thirteen years later, now they are aged 60+ years. I make some comparison with datasets that include transcripts from interviews with men aged 65+ (Arber and Davidson*, Bowling).

In contrast to some discomfort expressed when younger in the contrast between their life and that of friends with children, a number of participants mentioned talk in older age about younger family members as something of a nuisance that could make for tedious conversation: 'I wish we could talk about something other than their grandchildren', or 'it cuts down their self-awareness as if they can only focus on somebody else'. Something had changed in their balance of accounting meaning some participants positioned themselves as companionable, free and active, and their friends with grandchildren as burdened by a sense of duty that required them to prioritise time caring for them and a narrow conversational focus.

Autonomia: Visiones de los autores y actores sociales

Este artículo pretende comparar las concepciones elaboradas por autores académicos, con las elaboraciones internas de los movimientos sociales sobre el tema de la autonomía. Los análisis de los movimientos sociales, que han surgido en los años 1970, fomentaron percepciones de una sociedad civil virtuosa en oposición a un Estado satánico (DAGNINO, 2002). Esta imagen, ofrece elementos para comprender la actitud "anti-institucional" y la defensa de la "autonomía" en el discurso de los sujetos protagonistas de estas experiencias. Dagnino alerta por la insuficiencia de asignarles características de pureza a los movimientos sociales, una vez que estos surgieron en una estrecha relación interactiva con actores externos, constituyendo relaciones que atraviesan el Estado, los partidos políticos, la academia y los propios movimientos, a través de las relaciones institucionales e interpersonales, reconfigurando sus prácticas e directrices.

El discurso de la autonomía también fue activado como instrumento retórico para disputar la hegemonía de la dirección política de los movimientos. Así, la autonomía adquirió diferentes significados: establecimiento de mecanismos de participación sin vínculos formales con los órganos del Estado; independencia de las organizaciones populares en relación con la iglesia católica o a los partidos, indicando la necesidad de los movimientos mantenerse "puros" en relación a los otros sujetos (Estado, iglesia, partidos). Sin embargo, los análisis del discurso de la autonomía sugieren que se trata de una elaboración ajena a los movimientos, introducida por uno de estos actores en referencia a los demás. Las organizaciones populares, según la perspectiva de estos actores, parecen ser retratados como inmaduras frente a los enfrentamientos políticos decisivos y dependientes de asesores externos. Frente a estas reflexiones, cabría incluir la autonomía en la lista de "conceptos en controversia" (Dagnino, 2006) porque, así como "participación" y "democracia", necesita explicitaciones capaz de poner de manifiesto las intenciones que oculta.

Why is art for social understanding important? Can we grasp deep connections among social and institutional elements from observing art tendencies? Is it possible to shape a structure of western development reading it from avant-garde adventure within the first twenty years of the Nineties?

This paper originates from the attempt to give such questions an adequate answer, that might become a first step towards sociology of the avant-gardes.

This paper is based on a specific conceptual framework that is the relative autonomy of artistic activity. As such, it implies a critique of both the approaches of historical materialism and of neo-idealistic intuitionism. Artistic activity is conceived neither as totally determined nor as completely free. It is a historically conditioned activity. For this reason I submit three major types of historical context that can be usefully considered:

- 1) a tradition-bound context.
- 2) a relatively developed industrial context.
- 3) a fully developed and economically dynamic context.

At first we shall consider each avant-garde expression within its own social and political context.

Avant-garde social action can be analyzed through three stages of attitude and role within the society of belonging, to be seen in a close relation with politics and social development (Poggioli: 1967; Bürger: 1974; Willett: 1978; Riccioni: 2003; Ferrarotti: 2005)

A first stage of avant-garde art can be identified with a total revolutionary intent, such as the futurist movement in Italy, as well as Futurism in Soviet Union, Surrealism in France, Vorticism in United Kingdom. Collaboration between arts and politics would then turn out to be political aim with the tools of art. This paper will go through the main historic avant-garde movements in order to construct a frame from which also contemporary art can receive a new light.

Re-visioning ethical responses to fat: From enforcing body norms to exploring the possibilities unique to different bodies

This paper offers a new materialist theory of fat and develops a feminist body ethics based on the narratives of a diverse sample of adult Canadian women self-identified as former fat girls. Drawing on my earlier research that analyzed popular and public health messages concerning fatness and fitness received by participants in their childhood social worlds (Rice, 2007, 2009), I draw on an growing corpus of new materialist writing to analyze how big girls become fat girls in social and physical spaces, which I argue are productive of "overweight." While the women I spoke with grew up prior to the obesity epidemic moral panic in Canada, their experiences are relevant to current debates since they confronted earlier campaigns calling for fitness promotion and fatness prevention among citizens. Although it is commonly claimed by obesity scientists that too much food and not enough exercise cause overweight, for those with whom I spoke, the opposite more often was true: pervasive weight stereotyping and enforced dieting lead them to avoid activity and engage in problem eating, which contributed to life-long difficulties with food/weight. In light of dire warnings and moral panic about rising obesity in today's North American children, I turn to discuss of the implications of women's accounts for contemporary feminist-informed policy and practice. I argue that with renewed focus on fatness prevention through fitness promotion, obesity prevention proponents may be leading a new cohort of large children to adopt problem eating and exercise, possibly contributing to another generation's struggles with weight. In this context, I am interested in thinking about an ethics that emphasizes more open-ended and embodied ways of approaching the relationship of fatness to fitness, by moving away from practices of enforcing norms toward creative ways of exploring the abilities and possibilities unique to different bodies.

Modernity/coloniality and conflicts over indigenous rights in the Chilean South

Officially annexed by the Chilean state in 1883, the region of the Araucanía is a classic settler society. In recent years it has been fraught with often-violent conflicts between Mapuche indigenous people, who are autochthonous to the territory, and the state, European-descended land-owners, and corporations over land, natural resources, development, and indigenous rights.

I will explore the links between state violence, democracy, and indigenous rights claims. These are usually described in terms of the confluence between neoliberalism and multiculturalism, but, drawing on the work of Anibal Quijano, Arturo Escobar, Maria Lugones and others, I make a case for the relevance of the concept of modernity/coloniality in understanding this reality. I argue that conflicts that on their face are about material claims are in fact infused with epistemological struggles, the subordination of indigenous knowledge claims, and debates over law and legitimacy.

The concept of modernity/coloniality serves four purposes in understanding these conflicts. First, it brings into sharper focus how neoliberal-multicultural policies reflect and perpetuate colonial exploitation and function as part of systemic racism. Second, it makes the role of racism in sustaining the contemporary global economy explicit. Third, in its attention to ongoing material dispossession as well as the subjugation of indigenous knowledge claims, it is more in tune with indigenous theorizing (and creates room for the imagination of alternative modernities based on subjugated forms of knowledge). And finally, it helps us understand that when the state responds to Mapuche demands with violence, it is because their demands/actions represent an assertion of rights that challenge that model, both the material interests it holds up and the epistemological assumptions that justify it. Not only do Mapuche resisters not consent to neoliberal multiculturalism, they challenging the epistemological assumptions at its base.

What binds low status members to the group?

How do interpersonal status hierarchies draw their low status members into the group and maintain their involvement despite casting them as relatively less valued, influential, and esteemed than others in the group? If status hierarchies are a reward system that helps people solve the collective action problem they face when they are interdependent with respect to a shared and valued goal, then maintaining the commitment of low status members is part of this collective action problem. I propose a theoretical account of how status hierarchies provide partially compensating rewards for the deference of low status members, despite the other costs they endure. This account begins by developing an improved understanding of the nature of the working consensus about each member's relative value that creates and coordinates the status hierarchy. Drawing on this, I further argue that a low status member, by deferring to a high status member rather than resisting, appears (regardless of actual intent) to others as if he or she recognizes and endorses the group's shared standard of value about what is "better" and "reasonable." Other members, even those who are not direct recipients of the deference, react by offering a level of approval and baseline respect for the low status member. Anticipation of such respect provides the low status member with a positive temptation to defer despite the egoistic costs of doing so. I describe possible tests of this account.

Global consumption culture: Global brands influence in social practices

To understand the contemporary context in which global brands can be analyzed, we propose the discussion based on global consumption culture and the influence of these brands in social practices. In the global world, identities are related to communities of consumers that are built on symbols related to products, and especially on cosmopolitan lifestyles. Given the centrality of consumption as a social practice, the delimitation of groups through it creates different styles, which are a representation of the identities of a global world.

One who has not a fixed or essential identity (or national, as described in different cultural stereotypes) identifies himself over social mediations in its context - large cities, consumption of global brands, constant relations with foreign countries. The globalization of culture is not its homogeneity, because it involves a variety of standard-setting instruments, that dialogue with the heterogeneity of local symbols, while incorporating global senses to social practices.

Considering the heterogeneity of global culture, the imaginary constructed exceeds national barriers, forming larger and often dissonant panoramas. Appadurai (1996) proposes that the reality of global culture resulted in both production and consumption fetishism, since production is illusion created in an international level and consumption, on the other hand, due to its symbolic nature, is a result of the products' flows, filled with global and local representations. From this perspective, modern mediascapes mean people can be cosmopolitan without leaving their country and still enjoy extensive exposure to global brands.

The globalization of human symbolic exchanges, such as communication processes, has gained a prominent role in contemporary society (RITZER, 1993). In this context there are challenges to integrate diverse cultures and identities, especially when symbolic exchange, as proposed by brands, is essential to build experiences of cosmopolitan lifestyles.

How the Chilean pension system discriminates against women

In the previous pay-as-you-go Chilean pensions system, which is still effective for those who in 1981 were able to resist pressures to switch over to the FAP system, a woman had the right to retire at age 60 with an annuity identical to that of a 65-year-old male with the same salary and number of years of contributions, regardless of marital status or number of dependents. Conversely, in the FAPs today, a single 65 year old male receives a pension approximately one third higher than a 60 year old woman with the same initial fund. Even should she renounce her right to retire at 60 and remain in the workforce until 65, the man's pension will remain one sixth larger.

Two thirds of senior citizens are women, and women receive two thirds of public pensions. In the FAP system, on the other hand, women receive only 30%, whereas 70% are received by men. Clearly, the FAP system discriminates against women.

Judicialisation et violence de genre: Les expériences au Brésil et au Québec

Il s'agit des résultats d'une recherche en cours menée par le Laboratório de Estudos das Violências (LEVIS/UFSC) et le Centre de recherche interdisciplinaire sur la violence familiale et la violence faite aux femmes (CRI-VIFF/Université de Montréal) sur les politiques contre la violence conjugale au Brésil et au Québec. Il s'agit d'une question complexe à la fois globale et locale qui concerne les droits diffus et l'équité sociale dans les sociétés démocratiques. En fait, depuis les années 1980 plusieurs politiques sociales et stratégies d'intervention ont été mises en place pour tenter de réduire l'incidence de la violence conjugale. Dans les deux cas, Brésil et Québec, encore que par des dispositifs légal et institutionnel divers, l'utilisation d'une intervention de nature « sociojudiciaire » est encouragée auprès des personnes vivant une situation de violence conjugale. L'analyse des politiques et textes normatifs, ainsi que des travaux ethnographiques montrent que non seulement le concept n'est pratiquement jamais défini, et il n'est que très partiellement opérationnalisé. Pourtant, au Québec ce type d'intervention est à la base de la Politique d'intervention en matière de violence conjugale (1995) et des plans d'action s'y rattachant (1995; 2004-2009). Au Brésil, les Commissariats de Protection de la Femme ont été, avec leurs actions psychosociales, le centre de l'action gouvernementale dans ce domaine, jusqu'à la promulgation de la Loi fédérale 11340 en 2006. Cette loi prévoit également une série de services pour les victimes et les agresseurs, et cependant elle n'a pas réussi jusqu'à maintenant à engendrer une politique cohérente d'ensemble guidant l'intervention auprès des femmes et des hommes en contexte de violence conjugale. La présentation propose donc une réflexion les particularités et la circulation internationale des stratégies de lutte contre la violence envers les femmes tout particulièrement sur la place spécifique de la judiciarisation dans les deux contextes analysés.

Social representations and social identity of the ex-prisoners in Greece: A social clinical psychological approach

"Social representations and social identity of the ex-prisoners in Greece: A social clinical psychological approach"

Anastasia- Valentine Rigas—Emmanouela Papa
University of Crete- Greece

In our presentation we analyze the social representations of the Greek citizens concerning the social identity of ex-prisoners and their quality of life. We have used a) an open ended questionnaire, analyzed by the statistical package SPSS and b) the IMIS questionnaire based on the Ego-Ecology approach of Zavalloni & Louis Querin. Our results confirm our hypothesis that the prison environment, the stigma and the marginalization complicate the quality of life of the ex-prisoners. The social group, the citizens of our study, maintain a neutral attitude for these individuals while the ex-convicts constantly face social reactivity.

Institutionalising patronage politics? Overlapping local authorities in the implementation of a participatory urban development programme in Nairobi

Through an original ethnography of a participatory slum-upgrading programme and an historical exploration of the history of the settlement's governance, this paper seeks to analyse the complex arrays of overlapping local governance structures and how the new participatory structures introduced by the development programme have interacted with those previously in place. The informal settlement has been created through ethnic and political clientelism in the land allocation process since the late 1970s. Political patronage characterised pre-existing governance institutions such as the Council of the Elders chaired by a government-selected Local Chief.

The programme has created new participatory governance structures through community elections. On one hand, the process has further institutionalised some pre-existing inequalities; many members belonging to 'traditional' governance structures have been re-elected in the new residents' committee. On the other hand, new sections of the residents – previously excluded – have gained access to decision-making arenas, generating internal conflicts whose effects will be analysed in the paper. Finally, the paper examines how and why the settlement's elites have been able to reproduce themselves in the new and supposedly democratic local governance structure.

Reproducing inequalities through community governance structures: Elite capture in a participatory slum-upgrading programme in Kenya

Community and democratic participation are an essential component of current mainstream development interventions. Development and government agencies need community partners in order to implement their programmes and therefore 'build' communities and their governance structures. They often assume that slums host uniform populations sharing similar interests, however, Nairobi informal settlements house heterogeneous and fragmented residents. They are socially divided into two main groups – landlords and tenants – and their livelihood's strategies are organized differently upon the current informal arrangements in place.

Through an original ethnography of an internationally-funded slum-upgrading programme, the paper seeks to contribute to critical participation studies analysing the effects on equality of the technical implementation of participatory policies seeking to get community democratic representation in a context of pre-existing consolidated power imbalances and overlapping informal authorities.

The local elite of landlords, who have learned through the years how to deal with project implementers, has found ways to subvert democratic policies and maintain their leadership through patronage politics. Community elections become tools to institutionalise pre-existing power structures by turning landlords into the legitimate representatives of the entire community. Development agencies obtain formally democratic community governance structures that fulfil their overarching participatory policy frameworks; however such structures are dominated by one particular class of landlords. This is very functional to a smooth programme implementation since recognising the established elite as the official representatives of the community creates an alliance between development agencies and the elites who have the resources to generate conflict.

The analysis of specific programmes' activities will show the progressive process of exclusion of a section of the residents. This may have consequences on the increase of inequality and lead to gentrification, evictions, and exclusion of vulnerable categories.

Changes in livelihood capital assets in female-headed households: A post-conflict situation in Nepal

In Nepal, conflict has affected different social groups at different levels and scales. Taking an example from Bardiya district, western Nepal, the paper aims to assess economic activities and safety-nets of conflict affected female-headed households using capital assets in the sustainable livelihood framework. The study area was highly affected by the decade-long 'people's war' between the government and Maoists that resulted into the formation of many female-headed households especially in the rural part of the country. Open ended interviews with 30 conflict-affected female-headed households were conducted, in addition to an extensive visit of the study area, key informant interviews, and focus group discussions. The study confirms that in conflict and post-conflict situations to female-headed households, livelihood options and opportunities are limited. However, due to proliferation of development initiatives targeting conflict affected families, their social capital has increased to a great extent and economic capital to lesser extent. Realizing the limitation of the pentagon of capital assets within sustainable livelihood framework in conflicts and disaster situations, the paper recommends political capital and psychosocial trauma as additional capitals and a heptagon of capital assets, for household level livelihoods in conflict and disaster situations.

La protección en Brasil

En este trabajo la propuesta es presentar primeros estudios acerca del "Programa de Proteção a Víctima e a Testemunhas Ameaçadas", un intento brasileño de garantizar los derechos humanos, principalmente el derecho a la seguridad y a la vida de personas que se encuentran amenazadas por ser testigo o víctima de una situación de violencia. Se utiliza de las narrativas de personas que trabajan directamente con la protección para comprender como son construidas sus prácticas cotidianas. Espera-se comprender también la relación entre la existencia de reglas y normas que reglamentan el programa, o sea, el discurso oficial sobre el programa, y lo que se pasa en la realidad de estos/as trabajadores/as. Para esto se proponen reflexiones de cuestiones como: a) la formación que estas personas poseen para que realicen la protección de otras personas en situaciones de grandes posibilidades de riesgos individuales y sociales; b) la forma como se establecen las relaciones con las personas que ingresan en el programa como usuarias; c) las practicas cotidianas desarrolladas para se torne efectiva la protección; y d) las representaciones que estos/as trabajadores/as hacen de las mujeres usuarias del programa. Con el objetivo de responder a estas cuestiones y presentar un panorama de la protección de personas en Brasil, serán hechas entrevistas durante el primer semestre del año de 2012. Espera-se coleccionar y analizar narrativas de coordinadores/as y trabajadores/as del "Programa de Proteção a Víctima e Testemunhas Ameaçada", para presentar en el "Second ISA Forum of Sociology" primeras reflexiones sobre esta temática.

Lost amongst imperatives of energy security, risk and climate change: Un-learn lessons of Chernobyl in the post-Soviet societies

Did the 25th anniversary of Chernobyl mark any new – perhaps more reflexive, inclusive and participatory - modes of nuclear power and climate change governance in the post-Soviet countries? The article examines these questions by addressing the public controversies around new and old nuclear power facilities in divergent post-Soviet societies, particularly Lithuania, Belarus and the Ukraine. What are the lessons (if any) reflected in the public attitudes regarding nuclear power in terms of participatory governance, climate change and energy policies? How are they reflected in different post-Soviet countries, some of which are the EU new-comers, whereas the others are still characterized by rudiments of totalitarianism? Have 25 years lessons from the Chernobyl catastrophe, and possible cultural trauma stemming out of it, triggered environmental, climate and energy policy change towards more inclusive, participatory mode? By contrast, as this paper concludes on the basis of empirical evidence from Lithuania and neighboring countries, the processes point to the opposite direction. This direction is geared towards privatization of the public sphere, towards new emergent forms of state-private oligarchy, epitomized by the establishment of undemocratic nuclear power consortia, e.g. in Lithuania. Instead of witnessing any new off-springs of participatory governance, as paper indicates, these tendencies could be described as leading towards emergence of new "nuclear triangles" or – more generally - nuclear "renaissance" in the post-Soviet space. Is this "renaissance" a reflection of dichotomous public attitudes towards energy security in the period of economic crisis and transition? Or is it a more general tendency of societal neglect of Chernobyl lessons vis-à-vis globalizing uncertainties in the fields of economy, ethnocentric politics and climate change? The paper provides some sociological exploration of these issues based on recent public opinion surveys and analysis of public discourse.

Sustaining the bee gees in Lithuania: Exploring social controversies and media impact on public discourses concerning organic foods and GMOs in rural communities

This article examines recent developments and controversies in Lithuania around the two kinds of food-risk societal issues. On the one hand, it examines the discursive aspects and dominant story lines regarding the organic farming and food production in the quest for sustainable development. On the other hand, it contrasts these societal responses vis-à-vis the attempts of international and local promulgators of GMOs to penetrate the agri-food sector in Lithuania. The research is based on the three-year project RINOVA ('Public risk perceptions, communication and governance in the knowledge society') coordinated by the author of this paper and carried out by the team of researchers in Lithuania on behalf of the Lithuanian National Research Fund. The findings of the paper are based on the quantitative (public opinion survey) data and qualitative (public discourse) studies stemming from the RINOVA project. Paper concludes by an illustrative case study of the bee keepers' community in Lithuania where the two discourses, media impacts and the two fields of societal controversy meet, namely the seek for organic farming and the challenges // controversies of GMO-based farming and food production. A theoretical discussion is further developed in the paper on the conflicting value orientations and social practices of the "global village" vis-à-vis "local village". This theoretical elaboration is contextualized by simultaneous institutional pressures from the rather different societal domains – the globalizing businesses, the local civic cultures and the governance institutions which are politically increasingly becoming inter-twined by the national and supra-national policies as well as social actors. The role of mass media is analyzed in shaping the public discourse on GMOs and by contrast, concerning organic foods in Lithuania.

Sociedades de control y subjetividades contemporáneas

Tanto las Sociedades Disciplinarias como las Sociedades de Control han sido estudiadas, descritas y analizadas conceptual y epistemológicamente por muchos autores contemporáneos. Y en este tránsito conceptual, se han identificado diferentes tipos de relaciones referentes a las formas de poder, el papel del cuerpo, el tiempo y el espacio, para pensar las continuidades y rupturas entre ambos modelos. Sin embargo, el nudo temático que constituye el Sujeto en general, y la subjetivación en particular, ha inaugurado un escenario de quiebre para el análisis de las sociedades contemporáneas desde este paradigma teórico. Las Sociedades de Control exigen desde su interior una evaluación de las categorías más elementales con las que hemos venido considerando lo social, y una re-configuración de las formas de referirnos al Sujeto y a la subjetivación para poder caputar una instantánea de nuestros contextos hoy. Es desde ahí que proponemos un primer recorrido por la literatura relacionada para re-pensar lo que somos, y las necesariamente nuevas formas de referirnos a lo social hoy. A partir de dicho recorrido, es posible pensar en algunas renovadas categorías de lo social, así como la emergencia de nuevas categorías para analizar y procesar las situaciones sociales relacionadas con el poder, la libertad, la acción social, lo colectivo, las espacialidades/temporalidades, el trabajo y la muerte, entre muchas otras, que siguen siendo de vital importancia para el acaecer científico social en nuestros tiempos.

Neoliberal policies, HIV-related vulnerability and AIDS activism in Mexico

This presentation is based on a qualitative research that interrogated whether and to what extent the institutional dynamics that have emerged in Mexico as a consequence of neoliberal state policies have shaped the vulnerability and institutional violence to which people living with HIV have been exposed. Likewise, it interrogated the ways in which people living with HIV have organized as a social movement to deal with, contest and transform these forms of exclusion, subordination and institutional violence.

Using a hybrid theoretical framework that combines a neo-Marxian understanding of neoliberalism as a class power restoration project and a political process approach, this presentation: 1) will argue that the neoliberal reforms to the health care system implemented by the Mexican state over the last 20 years, along with a set of representations that imagine HIV as a 'homosexual disease,' have underpinned the forms of violence, displacement and vulnerability to which people living with HIV have been exposed, 2) will localize, describe and analyze the emergence and transformation of AIDS activism and its repertoires of protest in relation to the broad social transformations in Mexican society, and 3) will contend that the struggles for social recognition and forms of redistribution, carried out by AIDS activists, along with other Mexican insurgencies (Zapatistas, sex workers, and displaced peasants), are obstructing the consolidation of the neoliberal project in Mexico. They do this by putting into practice a series of contentious politics that have generated institutional dynamics that guarantee forms of social inclusion, legal reforms that have expanded the constitutional right to the health care, and redistributive policies that have been beneficial to the sick and the needy in Mexican society.

20 in-depth interviews with AIDS activists were conducted, as well as primary and secondary data collected from official government documents, media reports, bibliographic and hemerographic material.

Exploring participatory online music fandom through reggaetón

My project examines reggaetón, an Afrodiasporic musical form derived from Puerto Rican Underground rap in the 1990s and repackaged as a "Latin-urban" genre during its commercial crossover in 2004. While previous musical forms have crossed over from the periphery to the empire, reggaetón's challenges to musical and bodily expressions as well as to discourses of nationhood have been deemed revolutionary enough by governments, social institutions, and individuals to generate a broad range of reactions and regulations, few of which have been successful as the rapid transformation represented by this musical form is both transnational and intersectional. Focusing on participatory online music reception, I explore how anti-fans/fans interpret mainstream media coverage of reggaetón online. I textually analyze 3 online reggaetón music forums and anti-fan/fan-generated content archived (2004-2009). The author suggests that fans/anti-fans negotiate reggaetón in relation to the ways they are interpellated as target audiences based on shared language alone. This research contributes to an understudied area of new media work on ways Spanish-language dominant Internet users assert themselves as interactive subjects online. Situated at the crossroads of digital/new media, popular music, and Latin American/Latino studies, this project offers innovative approaches to examining the convergence of transnational music flows and participatory audiences online.

"Erano altri tempi". Parents' diachronic look at children's experience of public spaces in two European metropolises

Urban research has shown how the decrease of children's presence in urban public spaces has been an international trend in western countries for the last decades. Many quantitative studies have been conducted, as well as qualitative ones: interviews with children grown in urban areas between the 50's and the 70's confirm this progressive retreat from public spaces and a greater supervision by parents over time (Valentine and McKendrick 1997; Karsten 2005). Nevertheless, these important findings can be improved as they only address the scale of the neighborhood, which tends to reduce the focus to the "parochial realm" at the expense of the "public realm" (Lofland 1998). Therefore, the stranger as a classical urban feature is the one parents mainly distrust for the sake of the safety of their children. Considering their own experience as a child and then as a parent, what do the contemporary parents have to say about the evolution of children's experience of public spaces at both the local and the urban level? Mainly based on in-depth interviews with parents of children aged from 8 to 14 (n=80), my doctoral research concentrates on parental supervision of children urban practices in two socially mixed areas of Milan and Paris. The study confirms that they tend to consider their own experience of public spaces as a child as much safer and cooler than the one of their own child(ren) in both metropolitan contexts. Classical (and important) explicative factors such as the increase of the number of the cars and the changes in the domestic and familiar spheres are not sufficient enough in order to understand this trend. Parents' diachronic look at children's experience of public spaces in focus is indeed a fruitful way of studying empirically the influence on urban practices of the public discourses on crime and pedophilia.

Se busca responder las preguntas: ¿Contribuye la iniciativa a la inclusión digital de los beneficiarios?; ¿a través de que procesos (usos, desempeño educativo, acceso a información y conocimiento)?, ¿Cuál es la apreciación de los beneficiarios sobre los beneficios obtenidos para la inclusión digital? A partir de estas respuestas se reflexiona acerca de las perspectivas de este tipo de iniciativas, y su contribución a la inclusión digital y el desarrollo humano.

Emotions and the courtroom

Courts and judges are essential for the administration and symbolization of justice in developed, developing and transition countries. The rule of law relies on impartial adjudication by judges who decide cases and exercise authority without fear or favour. This understanding of legal authority has often been interpreted as requiring the suppression of emotion because emotions are viewed as inherently irrational, impulsive and personal. Courtrooms and the judiciary have strong norms regulating the display of emotions in court. Nonetheless, courts are settings of considerable emotion. Face-to-face interaction involving the judicial officer and other participants, especially defendants in criminal cases, can elicit a range of emotions.

This paper draws on empirical research – surveys and court observations – to investigate the roles of emotions in the everyday work of magistrates and their courts in Australia. It focuses on the ways in which magistrates deliver their decisions on sentence in criminal matters. The imposition of a sentence is an occasion where there can be direct interaction between a defendant and the judicial officer with considerable potential for emotional expression and management. Communication of the sentence can be structured in three ways: giving the decision only, giving the decision followed by reasons, or giving the reasons first followed by the decision. These different structures can extend or reduce opportunities for emotion performance and management on the part of the magistrate. The research demonstrates the significance of emotions, especially in sentencing, in a context – the courtroom—where the conventional model of legal authority disavows emotion.

Violence, the consolidation of the city and low-income settlements in Guatemala City

The paper takes a three generational view of the disorganizing and reorganizing role of globalization and violence for the population of Guatemala City. The starting points are the low-income neighborhoods created by their settlers in the late 1950s and 1960s and the ending points are these neighborhoods today. The 1990s witnessed a rapid, but dependent, incorporation of Guatemala into the legal and illegal global economy through the development of the modern service sector and the criminalization of the informal economy. In this period, the city consolidates in terms of the provision of services and upgrading of existing informal settlements, but its spatial segregation becomes more complex as its boundaries expand to include what were previously rural municipalities. The market liberalizations accompanying globalization stimulate investment in business and residential enclaves throughout the city. The poor disperse from the center to the periphery of the metropolitan area to poor areas of the city. The paper uses life histories of three generations of families of original settlers to document their own occupational and residential trajectories, their perspectives on the changes that have happened in the city and their strategies of survival, including in face of the increasing levels of drug-related violence. Two different types of trajectory will be identified. One in which as the original family expands generationally, so too they seek to remain close together residentially. The other is a process of dispersion as younger generations leave the parental neighborhood to move elsewhere in the city or internationally.

Youth cultures and social change

Youth cultures are formed in specific educational, labour market and family contexts, and additional relevant contexts are the uses of leisure that are catered for and role modelled, with which young people become acquainted during childhood socialisation. This paper uses Britain to illustrate how youth cultures have changed alongside successive transformations in broader uses of leisure. The first era of modern leisure saw recreation movements, which included numerous youth organisations, struggle to save working class youth from gang and other street cultures. Upper and middle class youth were relatively protected by families and schools. The second relatively classless modern era of leisure for young people was created in the post-Second World War years of full employment, progressively rising standards of living, and the expansion of new consumer industries. The third and latest era, still historically in formation, is characterised by post-industrial economic and employment profiles, slower economic growth, widening income inequalities, an extended youth life stage, the multiplication of information and communication technologies and uses thereof, and, perhaps most profoundly, the inability of most young people to move into adulthood during which they will live as well as their parents, at least in material terms. Historical transformations in uses of leisure, like changes in the circumstances of young people, are associated with broader social, economic and political changes, but in the case of leisure the changes spread completely throughout a population only with cohort replacement, and the broader economic and political changes are more likely to extend over decades rather than just years. Moreover, the changes operate differently and occur earlier and later among different socio-demographic groups. This complicates the task of relating youth cultures to broader leisure and other patterns, but doing so helps to resolve issues such as whether, during the late-20th century, young people's leisure became post-subcultural.

Modernisation theory and leisure in late-developing countries

The latest versions of modernisation theory claim that, since the end of communism and the globalisation of capitalism and the market economy, all countries have joined the same modernising trajectory. An implication is that, in those countries that have recently joined this trajectory, leisure forms and practices should be converging with those in the more advanced western countries. This paper argues that recent trends in leisure in post-communist East-Central Europe and Eurasia, and in East Asia, are broadly supportive of the theory, but that traditional practices that are compatible with modern lifestyles survive everywhere, that there are specific late-development effects, and correspondingly there are enduring distinctive features of leisure in the first-wave, western industrial societies.

What will be the repercussions of the current financial crisis for future housing system?

The global financial crisis began as a housing crisis within the US: predatory loans made on a massive scale to low-income homeowners prioritised sub-prime lending. Such loans never had the capacity to be repaid, but were pooled and tranchised in securities that should have been accorded Tier 1 status but due to the financial engineering employed, were sold on as AAA, as safe as Treasury bonds. Following the Clinton period Treasury bonds were in short supply, given fiscal austerity arising from a low tax fiscal regime combined with the steady repayment of historic Government debt. It was this shortage of Treasury bonds combined with market liberalisation, via the emergence of shadow banking, that brought about this financial innovation.

Homeowner defaults in record numbers saw the US housing bubble burst, triggering a vicious cycle of depreciating assets and securities fire sales. Because of the role and nature of shadow banking the crash in the asset backed securities market was not contained global market confidence was shattering market: more bank runs, more fire sales and eventually the entire banking system seized up. Credit dependency demanded quantitative easing to loosen up credit: massive bank bailouts paid for by the taxpayer in jurisdictions whose banks had exposure to these toxic assets. Its enormity saw Government debt skyrocket, leaving no public money for anything else.

Through adopting a historic analysis, this paper traces the departure from what could be termed 'Keneysian' economics into market liberalisation. It argues that this has seen our understanding of home ownership change, a change that has delivered massive consequences for households, banks and governments. Given the continued desire for high yield, low risk securities and Governments' reluctance to bring about dramatic banking reform what are the potential future trajectories of this arrangement for the housing system?

The suffering of others: Moral boundaries & political violence

This study examines how the suffering of others is interpreted through the drawing of moral boundaries. Taking my cue from Zerubavel's theories of moral concern and Lakoff's work on moral metaphors, I examine how spheres of moral concern are defined in reaction to political violence. Using a multi-method approach (ethnography and content analysis), the research examines how people identify and disidentify with victims of terrorism and aggression. The data is comprised of over 30,000 contributions to online communities hosted by flagship newspapers in Brazil, France, and the U.S.: Le Monde, O Estado de São Paulo, and The New York Times. The research elucidates the frames used by French, Brazilian, and American participants of each online community to articulate competing constructions of justice, responsibility, and victimhood in response to 9/11/01 and other events of political violence. The work explores how individuals and groups react to others' suffering by engaging in identity work. Findings reveal that in assessing others' suffering, individuals employ identity categories as boundary markers to include or exclude others from their own spheres of moral concern. Some social actors draw on moral metaphors to identify with others as a member of their own spheres of moral concern. Others, by contrast, do identity work to disidentify with others in order to exile them from salient spheres of moral concern. These findings offer evidence that when faced with others' suffering, social actors form relational categories of inclusion or exclusion. Through moral focusing, individuals divide the world between the morally worthy us and the morally unworthy them to generate or withhold compassion. In revealing these trends, this project illuminates how identity work allows us to efface or construct difference between the "us" and the "them" in order to designate victims as worthy or unworthy of our moral concern.

Transnational solidarity in global supply chains: Where are the 'pinch points' and what are the levers for global networks to improve labour conditions?

The changing nature of global production and distribution processes has implications for labour governance systems and the mobilisation of transnational networks that support workers' rights. The expansion of multinational companies (MNCs) across national boundaries has limited the capacity of nation states to regulate labour standards in global supply chains, whilst at the same time the internationalisation of production has reduced the points of contact between firms and organised labour groups. During the last decade, the difficulty of ensuring labour's interests has been further exacerbated by the increased control exerted by branded retailers and international supermarkets in the developing countries where products are made and where the cost of labour is constantly squeezed (Prieto-Carrón, 2004). The implication for labour governance systems during this period has been a shift to voluntary standards e.g. private labour codes and standards, corporate social responsibility (CSR) policies and practices (Robinson, 2010). A development which has been due to both the drive of business itself towards self-regulation and the emergence of civil society organisations (CSOs), global enterprise networks and community based organisations representing labour (Palpacuer and Parisotto, 2003; Heery and Frege, 2006). This paper discusses the challenges of different 'pinch points' of control in global supply chains and the various levers for labour and their representatives in terms of upgrading labour standards and skills (Ramirez and Rainbird, 2010). It explores how one particular international network, the World Banana Forum, has built solidarity between worker representatives, trade unions, CSOs, consumer activists and other key actors (business and governments), from the point of consumption (mostly Northern-based markets) to the countries of production (in the South), in order to ensure a sustainable banana chain for the future.

Movimientos sociales urbanos y minería transnacional: En búsqueda de la justicia del agua en Arequipa, Perú

En un contexto urbano en el cual se apuesta por un "desarrollo" basado en gran parte por el aporte económico de la minería, con alta inequidad en el acceso al agua, y en donde la principal fuente de agua esta contaminada, esta investigación propone analizar qué significa justicia del agua para los movimientos sociales urbanos más marginados y el rol que juegan estos movimientos en cambiar las inequidades e injusticias ambientales en torno al agua.

A través de un estudio de caso sobre el reciente conflicto entre movimientos sociales urbanos, autoridades gubernamentales y una empresa minera transnacional en la ciudad Arequipa en Perú, esta ponencia propone entender la lucha del movimiento social urbano por el derecho al agua y a un ambiente saludable como una lucha enmarcada en una nueva relación con el estado y con la minería a gran escala. Por medio de un enfoque metodológico cualitativo basado en observación participante, entrevistas en profundidad y análisis de fuentes secundarias se observa que frente a la colonialidad del poder que ejerce el estado peruano (Quijano 2000) los movimientos urbanos en Arequipa se organizan para demandar su derecho humano al agua y lo hacen como sociedad política (Chatterjee 2004). Al mismo tiempo, surge la empresa minera transnacional como actor político fundamental dentro de la gobernanza del agua, lo que genera que los movimientos urbanos emprendan una relación política directa con la empresa la cual esta encuadrada en una batalla discursiva y material en donde la justicia ambiental es negociable.

Estos hallazgos preliminares problematizan la teoría del ecologismo de los pobres (Martínez Alier 2004) y contribuyen al estudio de la justicia ambiental y de ecología política en Latinoamérica (Gudynas 1992). Este trabajo intenta también iniciar un diálogo con una emergente literatura sobre justicia del agua o hídrica en Latinoamérica (Boelens et al. 2011).

The struggle for rights in labor-community coalitions: The Los Angeles clean carwash campaign

The paper presents the story of the CLEAN Carwash Campaign as unique labor-community organizing campaign. This campaign is not only important as an innovative model for organizing labor but also because it incorporates the worker centers' emphasis on immigrant workers' social and political necessities. While organizing to achieve economic rights, carwash workers claim rights as immigrant workers, and in doing so challenge various forms of exploitation. In this regard, even though the predominant approach to immigrant worker rights within the CLEAN Carwash Campaign centers on economic rights, a large portion of it focuses on building civic participation and social inclusion to U.S. American society. There coexists within the campaign a less articulated and marginal approach based on the idea that carwash workers' rights transcend the notion of national membership and instead as based on their rights as human beings to mobility and to a decent life wherever they are. So, how does this community-labor hybrid campaign serve immigrant workers attain their rights and navigate the world of work and that of larger U.S. American[1] society? I argue this is done through at least five dimensions of a constructive discourse and practice of rights. Together, the first three dimensions represent a broader definition of rights and manifest as collaborations between labor and community alliances, as well as through political and socio-cultural constructions of rights. The last two dimensions are tied more closely to the world of work and it can be seen through the efforts of CWOC's Workers' Brigade and the Health and Safety Committee.

El trabajo se estructurará en torno a dos ejes. En primer lugar, se analizará la presencia de las identidades peronista y petista (identidades partidarias de origen de ambos presidentes) al interior de las organizaciones sociales y las características diversas que asumían esas identidades en esas organizaciones.

En segundo lugar, serán examinadas las diferentes implicancias de la pertenencia al oficialismo en las organizaciones sociales a través de la ubicación del "nosotros" en relación con el gobierno.

A small revolution: Young favela dwellers and audiovisual production

Intellectuals, policy makers and foreign visitors have historically stigmatized Rio de Janeiro's favelas as dangerous settlements but also celebrated them as exotic places with a rich and unique culture. While violence and exotics remain important representations of Brazilian favelas, new portrayals but especially new actors have emerged in the last years, since residents of these territories have been able to present their cultural production in different spaces of consumption (television, music and movies industries). This article discusses how young slum dwellers, participants of "social projects" carried out by local non-governmental organizations, become producers of "alternative" images of favelas. The analysis reflects upon the production of images and representations by these young people about themselves and where they live, and how their production is linked to activities of nongovernmental organizations in those territories. I discuss how some of these initiatives are seeking public legitimacy as representations of favelas dwellers, partly as a substitute for residents' associations that have been losing strength and recognition. The so-called "NGOs from within" bring the issue of self-representation into the "social projects market" by articulating two logics. On one hand, they represent favelas as a place of risk, which is part of what I will call "repertoires of social projects." On the other hand, they identify a "local culture", which must be valued as a way to ensure the residents' citizenship rights. In this paper, representations that reinforce stigmas and self-representations that counter-act them are the object of my analysis. By analyzing the case of the NGO TV Morrinho, located in a favela called Pereira da Silva, at Rio de Janeiro - Brazil, this paper explores how these two apparently conflicting logics are articulated in the discourses and actions of these young favela residents and their NGOs.

Voicing to heal: Researching black women's suffering in the context of urban violence in Rio de Janeiro

Commonly understood to affect Black men, the urban violence in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, has concealed social, economic, political, and emotional effects on black women. Since a very specific segment of the population is selected to die, i.e., young, poor and poorly educated black males, residents of suburbs, this concentration means that many people, especially black women, must live daily with violence. However, these experiences are either invisibilized or not taken in consideration in traditional analysis of violence. When their voices are heard, a different perspective to the violence that takes place in Rio de Janeiro is revealed. In a context of suffering, longing and also activism, black women find through their leadership and political practice, a space for action or reaction either at home, in their families, in the community, or in the public arena. How do black women deal with the suffering caused by urban violence? What the meaning of justice in a context of hidden daily suffering? What methodology helps to see the unseen? This paper explores these questions arguing that black women's structural conditions increases their vulnerability and impacts the way they access justice and is heard in society.

Las políticas de "inclusión digital" en Brasil: Análisis de un experimento en el activismo de media libre en una comunidad pobre de Recife

En Brasil, políticas de "inclusión digital" empezaron en el año 2000, con Fernando Henrique Cardoso. Tales políticas parecen divididas entre los propósitos más inmediatos de innovación tecnológica y calificación de mano de obra para el mercado, por un lado, y visiones más ambiciosas de las nuevas tecnologías como instrumentos de una "ciudadanía" que sobrepasa la participación en el mercado. Compiten para la difusión de esta segunda concepción una serie de "acciones colectivas con medias libres" que, en Brasil, se articulan en redes volcadas para los temas del metareciclaje, del software libre, etc. Este énfasis en la "cultura de la media libre" fue, en parte, asimilado por el gobierno federal en los dos mandatos del presidente Lula, una vez que las lideranzas de aquellas acciones colectivas fueron llamadas para contribuir con la elaboración de políticas de "inclusión digital". El gobierno actual financió un proyecto de pesquisa y extensión que preveía la implantación de una "Unidad de Inclusión Digital" (UID) y la realización de actividades pedagógicas con vistas a la apropiación de nuevas tecnologías por los jóvenes del barrio de Coque, uno de los más pobres de Recife (capital del Estado de Pernambuco).

A través de una articulación entre la Universidad Federal de Pernambuco (UFPE) y actores sociales relacionados al NEIMFA (Núcleo Religioso), la UID fue implantada en Coque, contando con la realización de talleres de producción audiovisual, creación de páginas web y creación de herramientas y recursos mediáticos que garanticen una apropiación completa de las nuevas tecnologías por personas de la comunidad. Estas actividades fueron dirigidas por activistas de la media libre. Investigadores de la Universidad, bajo la supervisión de la primera autora de este texto, realizaron entrevistas y acompañaron las actividades a fin de comprender las virtualidades y las dificultades de propuestas como ésta.

Youth gang membership and relations of rivalry between gang members in Belo Horizonte

This study proposes an analysis about the social relations between members of rival gangs, regarding primarily their collectively built self-image, their group's cohesion and identity, the way they envision their rivals, the subsequent justifications of the conflicts that arise from these processes, and how these factors relate to the entry process for new members to these gangs. In order to accomplish this task, a case study composed of six months of participant observation and interviews was carried out in the Aglomerado Santa Lúcia slum, located at the South-Central region of Belo Horizonte, Brazil, and considered one of its most violent areas.

The objective of the study was therefore to observe the process of membership association, and the establishment of social relationships around these groups, which often have a longer lifespan than their own members, perpetuating rivalries and conflicts started by earlier generations. When questioned about the motives that lead to some of these cycles of violent conflicts between their gangs, the individuals involved usually had reasons related to the rivalry itself, such as engaging in revenge for the death of a relative or friend, or even a series of vague and diffuse characteristics about the rival gang. Also, contrary to the popular belief, only a small part of the homicides were directly related to the drug traffic.

Noting that the same categories of justifications were used by both gangs, the phenomenon was analyzed primarily in the terms of the Symbolic Interactionism, in a tentative to explain the complex chain of conflicts and alliances, changes in the way of presenting and interpreting the situation, and collective lines of action towards the rivals, were permeated by issues of territoriality and group identity, established by these groups during their daily lives.

El estudio utiliza datos secundarios recogidos en las notas policiales publicadas en los periódicos de 45 ciudades más grandes de la región (con más de 1,5 millón de habitantes y/o de capital nacional). Los datos fueron recogidos por siete días en agosto de 2011.

El estudio lleva a una pregunta: ¿Cuál es el impacto del tráfico de drogas en los centros urbanos de América Latina en las tasas de homicidios y robos?

Y la pregunta lleva a lista de hipótesis:

- La mayoría de los asesinatos en los grandes centros urbanos de América Latina está asociada con el tráfico.
- La presencia del narcotráfico en la región causa un impacto positivo en las tasas de homicidios.
- Cuanto mayor sea la presencia del narcotráfico en una región, mayor es la frecuencia de los robos.

Perfiles regionales y clases dirigentes provinciales. una exploración sobre los atributos de los gobernadores en Argentina 1976-2001

Los sectores dirigentes de toda sociedad se componen de individuos que encarnan, para cada tiempo histórico, un conjunto de atributos más o menos típicos. En el caso argentino este tipo de generalizaciones son relativamente difíciles de corroborar, entre otras cosas, por la escasez de trabajos empíricos sobre las características de los sectores dirigentes. Luego del clásico trabajo de De Imaz se han realizado recopilaciones de sectores específicos, tales como los parlamentarios, los dirigentes políticos de la UCR o los Ministros del Interior. Apoyándose en las herramientas desplegadas en este conjunto de análisis relativamente heterogéneo, este trabajo busca indagar sobre las características de los dirigentes políticos a nivel provincial. A través de la reconstrucción de los atributos sociales y políticos de los gobernadores que cumplieron funciones entre 1976 y 2001, se buscará identificar posibles regularidades en los perfiles de las clases dirigentes provinciales según sus regiones de pertenencia.

Historicamente a relação entre mobilidade social e distribuição de renda é complexa no país com períodos de rígida fluidez social e estabilidade na distribuição de renda; rígida fluidez e crescimento das desigualdades de renda; alta fluidez e crescimento das desigualdades e alta fluidez e redução das desigualdades de renda. Torche (2003) estudou o paradoxo - grande fluidez social com alta concentração de renda - para o Chile e constatou que não basta contrastar os dois níveis (desigualdade de renda e fluidez), para entender este segundo fenômeno é necessário observar o padrão de desigualdade de renda. Segundo (Ribeiro, 2005) em 1973 o Brasil estava entre as sociedades mais rígidas, mas em 1996 se aproximou das sociedades menos rígidas, isto é, das mais fluidas, embora abarcando um dos maiores índices de desigualdade de renda do mundo. A partir de 2001, observa-se uma redução no índice de concentração de renda, ainda que moderada. Não há um consenso na literatura quanto às causas da redução e as políticas que a influenciaram. De um lado, um conjunto de estudos associa estreitamente o movimento às políticas públicas de transferência de renda e de educação. De outro, encontra-se o conjunto segundo o qual o movimento decorreu da ação de diversas políticas públicas, e sua continuidade dependerá do desempenho da atividade econômica (Dedecca, 2006). Analisar o papel das políticas públicas na determinação da recente fluidez social e da redução das desigualdades de renda constitui o objetivo geral deste trabalho.

The rise of diversity in contemporary educational policies

The goal of this research is to analyze the theoretical, practical and political conditions that enabled the emergence of the concept of "diversity" in educational public policies between the years 2003 and 2006. Utilized as a slogan in the first mandate of former president Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, particularly in respect to the ministry of Education, this concept has gone through several political utilizations in the public policies of the federal government. The analysis of this process is based on the examination of the different perspectives identified in the national and international debates about culture and education. Some of the most prominent perspectives in these contexts were multiculturalism, interculturalism, and black studies.

The scenario evinces the existence of a dispute between a "universalist diverse" perspective of education and another one grounded on cultural difference. As for the evaluation of public policies, the research utilizes as primary sources interviews, discourses and official documents, such as the Government Evaluation 2003-2010, the Multi-annual Plan 2004-2007, and the Budgetary Laws between 2003-2006, administration reports and notifications from Lula's government, there was a process of institutionalization of diversity policies, but the utilizations of the concept of diversity are unequal and restricted to a few Secretariat of the Ministry of Education. Moreover, the research demonstrated that few of the programs that went through a process of institutionalization which had budgetary purposes, one of the reflexes of the multiple utilizations and diversity projects also in dispute in the political sphere.

Unpacking transnational activist networks: An analysis of anti-sweatshop campaigns in the U.S.-Caribbean basin apparel industry (1990-2008)

The rise of transnational social movements in general, and the globalization of labor activism, in particular, have become core topics within political sociology over the last decades. The growing international literature on the matter, however, has largely failed to offer systematic evidence on the composition and operation of transnational activists networks (TANs). In this paper, I aim to contribute to filling this void by using recent advances in network mapping tools to unpack the TAN behind the anti-sweatshop movement in the Americas, which brought together unions and NGOs from both the United States and the seven producer countries in the regional apparel industry (Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Costa Rica, and the Dominican Republic). Based on an original database on the universe of 93 transnational campaigns seeking to establish independent unions in apparel factories in the region between 1990 and 2008, the paper applies the tools of network analysis to the understanding of the structure and outcomes of TANs.

Traviesos: Trouble-making as resistance in U.S. debuts and quinceañeras

Mexican quinceañeras and Filipina debutantes are usually formal, expensive celebrations marking a girl's entry into life as a young "lady." Criticisms of these events as frivolous have inhibited serious scholarly consideration; however, much can be ascertained about immigrants, culture, and identities, through careful attention to these rituals. "Traviesos" is from my forthcoming book, Coming of Age: Identities and Transformations in Filipina American Debutantes and Mexicana American Quinceañeras (Temple University Press). It examines debut and quince troublemakers to reveal prevailing power arrangements affecting US immigrant communities, and to illustrate how these rituals reflect organizers' simultaneous aims to resist and become part of US culture and society.

For this talk, I focus on "Control Freaks", "Big Spenders" and "Party Crashers". I show that Control Freaks, mothers who over-regulate their daughters, and their daughters' events, highlight how debutantes and quinceañeras afford female parents with opportunities for creativity and self-expression. These are valuable because of the ways immigrant mothers have been personally and systematically prevented from satisfying many of their dreams. Big Spenders are accused of unwise time and money management. But, for them, conspicuous consumption challenges differential inclusion, by signifying economic and cultural qualification for full legal and cultural citizenship in the US. Finally, Party Crashers, uninvited guests, expose issues that threaten carefully-managed impressions of immigrant families as conflict-free. They underscore the importance of immigrant families' self-portrayals as morally superior to Whites, due to constructions as "less than" within American society.

My work enhances sociological theories of cultural resistance and immigrant adaptation. It illustrates how extraordinary events like debutantes and quinceañeras can enable actors to fashion domains of creativity under the pretext of "following tradition;" and, it demonstrates that homeland traditions and rituals do not simply "preserve" immigrant cultures, but also help immigrant communities publicly claim cultural belonging in their new homes.

Modelo de asistencia social en México y pobreza: Una reflexión al finalizar la primera década del siglo XXI

De manera gradual a partir del año 2000 México ha ido ampliando notablemente su estrategia de asistencia social, tanto en la cantidad de programas que se han generado, como en la cobertura a la población beneficiaria de los mismos. La intención de este documento es reflexionar acerca del impacto que estos programas hayan podido tener en la disminución de la pobreza y la manera en que los mismos se articulan con el sistema de bienestar previamente existente. Para ello la primera parte describe los distintos programas que pueden considerarse parte de la estrategia de asistencia social durante la década del 2000, su lógica de operación y su cobertura. La segunda parte analiza utilizando la medida oficial de pobreza, la situación de la misma en el país y la posible influencia de los programas en su comportamiento más reciente. La tercera parte reflexiona sobre si estos programas se están constituyendo en parte de una estrategia de política que amplía la cobertura de derechos para acercarse a una cobertura universal, o si más bien reproducen un sistema dual generando una ciudadanía de primera vs. una ciudadanía de segunda clase.

Género, educación y (e) migración en el sureste mexicano

El sureste mexicano es la región mexicana que mayor porcentaje de personas expulsa hacia otros estados de la república y los Estados Unidos de Norteamérica. En los últimos años se ha incrementado de manera importante la migración y emigración de mujeres. De igual manera que en otros países y regiones la educación y la pobreza, que se inciden mutuamente, son variables fundamentales para entender las razones por las cuales los individuos deciden abandonar su entorno en busca de nuevos horizontes.

El grado de desarrollo humano es un indicador que señala de manera precisa las condiciones de vida de los habitantes de un área determinada. El 2.22 % de los municipios bajo estudio tienen un grado de desarrollo humano Alto; el 67.65 % de Medio Alto; el 27.61 % de Medio Bajo y el 5.92 % de Bajo. Ocupando los estados en donde se enclavan estos municipios cuatro de los últimos cinco lugares del Índice de Desarrollo Humano (IDH) de la República Mexicana.

Como es de todos conocidos existe una inequidad entre hombres y mujeres. Aunque se hace presente desde antes de su nacimiento tiene su primera manifestación pública en el ámbito educativo. De manera significativa en la medida en que se avanza hacia los niveles superiores la inequidad en la presencia en las aulas entre hombres y mujeres es mayor.

La pobreza y la escasa educación formal son factores que inciden en la decisión de salir de los lugares de nacimiento de algunos ciudadanos mexicanos. Pero a consecuencia de la inequidad de género las mujeres están predeterminadas para cumplir con estos factores de (e) migración.

Representación política y violación a la representación de cuota de género en México

El obtener el derecho al voto fue una larga lucha realizada por las mujeres desde el siglo 19. En este proceso el éxito fue alcanzado de manera diferenciada en los países de América Latina. En México no fue sino hasta el 1953 que se otorgó la ciudadanía a las mujeres. Pero su participación como actor político no fue aceptada sino hasta años después y en un inicio con limitaciones. La inequidad entre hombres y mujeres se extendió hasta el ____ que se aprobó la cuota de género para los puestos de elección popular en las legislaturas tanto federales como estatales.

Sin embargo ésta conquista fue escamoteada al presentar para efectos legales el número de candidaturas correspondientes para las mujeres acompañadas como suplente por un hombre. Eventualmente ésta era forzada por diferentes medios a renunciar ocupando su suplente el escaño legislativo. Estas fueron conocidas como las "juanitas".

Abordaremos de manera cronológica y crítica la trayectoria que siguió en México los movimientos sufragistas de mujeres hasta lograr el voto ciudadano, la cuota de género y las últimas reformas a la misma para evitar la sustitución y pérdida de los lugares obtenidos por las mujeres en los procesos electorales.

Catching youth's drift: Understanding collective action among a web 2.0 driven generation

This communication explores the complex relationship between the increased use of social media and how a younger generation gives meaning to collective action and chooses to convey social change. Drawing on qualitative interviews conducted with young adults (20-35 years old) in 2008-2010, we look beyond typical characterizations of a technology savvy generation, while trying to understand how the Web 2.0 may alter its everyday understanding of social and political participation. According to many, innovative uses of ICTs by transnational movements and cyberactivists has allowed for the emergence of new repertoires of actions, as illustrated by new networking strategies developed in recent international events: from the Kasbah protest to Occupy Wall Street. Recent studies even suggest "online activism" have profoundly transformed the very meanings and definitions associated with "collective action", "community" and "social change". Yet, surprisingly, very little attention has been given to the analyzing of these meanings. Therefore, this communication aims to transcend the barriers that usually divide organizational and political opportunity perspectives, by taking into account the role played by social media in the circulation and diffusion of interpretations, meanings and collective actions. Arguing for a flexible multidisciplinary approach, the theoretical groundwork suggested underlines the relational dimensions involved in the sharing of experiences and the diffusion of frames through "interpretative networks". It also taps into constructivism and an older "collective behavior" definition, by drawing insights from Blumer's (1969) cultural drifts theory. Finally, we suggest the need to rethink what we analyze and define as engagement, participation and social change. As informational and relational paradigms quickly transform, new theories and methodologies should pay crucial attention to the ways in which young actors choose to bring shifts in collective ways of thinking, acting and perceiving – on, or off the Web.

Juventud y transgresión e identidad

Los jóvenes en México se encuentran en una situación de exclusión del trabajo y de la educación francamente grave. Su situación como sujeto colectivo es de desempoderamiento y marginación. En este contexto han desplegado su capacidad de agencia en su propia individualidad, específicamente en el terreno de su vida íntima y en sus cuerpos, sobre los cuales su poder es mayor.

En este trabajo se explorará la posibilidad de transgresión de algunos jóvenes de la ciudad de Guadalajara desde ese punto de vista, desde la dimensión personal, privada.

Se expondrán y analizarán los casos de tres jóvenes de la ciudad de Guadalajara que muestran su capacidad creativa, liberadora, de agencia, y al mismo tiempo las posibilidades que tienen de explicitar los límites y llevarlos más allá de las prácticas consideradas "correctas" o "normales". De ahí la razón de llamarlos "transgresores".

Se observará el caso de un joven adscrito al movimiento cultural queer punk, el cual pretende "borrar" la diferenciación genérica masculino/femenino proponiendo su superación en un nuevo concepto. Por otra parte, se conocerá la trayectoria de vida de una chica con períodos de su vida con preferencias sexuales y afectivas que alternan entre lo heterosexual y lo homosexual en un contexto familiar represivo. Finalmente, se explorará la experiencia de una chica que se ha tatuado gran parte de su cuerpo y que incluso profesionalmente ha intentado legitimar esta práctica sustrayéndola del universo de los jóvenes pobres o migrantes.

Did markets for emission trading reduce pollution? Empirical evidence from EU emission trading system - phase I (2005-2007)

Did the scarcity of emission certificates deal to emission reduction? In the logic of the market, companies optimize reducing emissions through the scarcity of certificates. In a context of uncertainty companies fail to get enough certificates because they lack a sufficient lobbying power or because they simply do not have adequate information about the future demand.

During the Phase I of the EU Emission Trading System, not every company had more certificates than necessary, but companies were over-allocated as a whole. The companies received the first allocation of these certificates for free, then the demand for more certificates means greater cost pressure for these companies. This paper analyses the delegation of emission certificate's responsibility within departments of the company (panel data) in front of increasing cost pressure. We assume that there are two possible strategies of responsibility delegation for emission certificates within company departments: coupling and decoupling. Coupling implies the delegation about responsibility of the emission certificates closer in the process of production departments and decoupling means delegation in the more administrative and financial departments. We assume that the more delegation of emission in the decoupled departments, the less they know about their abatement costs. Abatement costs are a key part of the rational decision to reduce emissions and thus we assume that a greater decoupling means less reduction.

The hypothesis is that the higher the decoupling is, the higher cost pressure increases because companies are in uncertainty and they prefer increasing costs to invest. Therefore the scarcity of certificates do not produce the less reduction.

The empirical support for our research is provided by a yearly survey of companies participating in the EU ETS in four EU countries (Germany, United Kingdom, Netherlands and Denmark / 1040 observations) during the period 2005-2007.

What did companies learn in the EU emissions trading system phase I?

The European Union tried to meet the agreed emissions reduction target in the Kyoto Protocol with the creation of an Emission Trading System.

Due to lobbying and uncertainty, the Phase I (2005-2007) finished with an overallocation of emission certificates and the authorities decided to change the main objective from „reduction of emissions“ to “learning” (Knoll 2009). The objective was European companies shall learn how to reduce greenhouse emissions by participating in a market of emissions. This paper asks: What did companies learn in the EU Emissions Trading System Phase I?

To make learning visible, we research about the relationship between the trading activity of participating companies and the delegation within the company departments of the decision on the purchase and sale of emission certificates.

Based on a qualitative study, we assume that there are two possible strategies of responsibility delegation about emissions within company departments: coupling and decoupling. Coupling implies the delegation about responsibility of the CO2 certificates closer in the process of production departments and decoupling means delegation in the more administrative and financial departments.

The empirical part of the work is a panel study based on a survey in four countries (Germany, United Kingdom, Netherlands and Denmark) with 360 observations.

The conclusion shows that companies carry out a decoupling when they need to buy the certificates.

Culture-led urban transformations and the sociology of artistic and cultural creation

Since the 80s many cities around the world have made strong investments in cultural amenities and also in policies for the promotion of cultural production. During the last decade a large literature has emerged both within the academy (urban planning, economic geography, economics, etc.) and within the professional worlds of consultancy and policy making, which attempt to explain or to elaborate toolkits in order to understand and promote this type of urban transformation. Several concepts that are related with the notion of creativity have been developed in this context: creative city, creative industries and creative class. All of them have been criticized as ambiguous and weak.

Creativity-related concepts used within the literature on culture-led urban transformation have many facets but they always make a central reference to two aspects: the artistic and cultural creativity and the cultural workers. In this sense, it would seem as if the sociological analysis of the creation dynamics, well developed within the sociology of culture and the arts, should be extremely relevant for the study of culture-led urban transformations. However, this analysis has a low incidence in this literature.

In this paper from a sociological perspective we will elaborate some analytical tools that allow developing a more precise and substantiated explanation of current culture-led urban transformations. For this purpose, first, we will critically review the literature on this subject as well as the literature on the main sociological models of analysis of artistic and intellectual creation. In this respect, we will examine in particular the work of Bourdieu, Collins, Farrell, Becker, Peterson and Menger. Finally, the above considerations will lead us to conclude some principles for the sociological analysis of culture-led urban transformation in contemporary society.

Componentes psicosociales del bienestar subjetivo y el desarrollo humano

El propósito principal del enfoque teórico del desarrollo humano es ampliar las opciones de las personas y crear un entorno que les permita gozar de una vida larga, saludable y creativa. Este paradigma enfatiza la realización del potencial humano. Desde esta perspectiva, las capacidades con las que las personas hacen frente a la vida, como son la comprensión del entorno, la personalidad, el bienestar psicológico y la experiencia social corresponden al concepto de calidad de vida entendido como “capacidad para la vida” (Veenhoven, 2000). En este marco, los recursos de agencia de las personas constituyen una condición necesaria para la realización personal y el progreso social.

Pero si bien tales recursos son una condición para lograr las metas de desarrollo que se proponen los individuos, unos y otras dependen de manera fundamental de la calidad del entorno social en donde las personas nacen y se desarrollan. Resulta esencial para el estudio del bienestar subjetivo la evaluación de las condiciones sociales bajo las cuales las personas y las sociedades pueden desarrollar su máximo potencial y llevar adelante una vida productiva y creativa de acuerdo con sus proyectos, necesidades e intereses.

Resulta relevante preguntarse, ¿De qué manera las desigualdades sociales atraviesan a dichos recursos y capacidades de agencia de las personas, generando como un rasgo estructural una serie de brechas psicosociales que tienden a reproducirse entre generaciones?

Para dar respuesta a estos interrogantes, se propone abordar el análisis de una serie de indicadores e índices referidos a diferentes aspectos que intervienen en el bienestar subjetivo y las capacidades de integración social de las personas.

Los datos estadísticos surgen de de la Encuesta de la Deuda Social Argentina que se aplica a adultos mayores de 18 años o más, de ambos sexos, que pertenecen a áreas urbanas de la Argentina .

Problematizing participatory video with youth in Canada: A critical disruptive praxis?

As part of my graduate research, I coordinated a participatory video (PV) project with students in an alternative education program in New Brunswick, Canada. The project was intended to encourage students to explore PV as a way to shed light on issues of violence in the lives of youth, raise public conversations, and thereby promote social change. Students engaged in script writing and all aspects of the filmmaking process. Together, they produced seven short films on issues of violence, collectively titled Candle in the Dark. The film premiered to a large audience of educators, administrators and policy makers. In the local school district, the project has been celebrated and constructed as "therapeutic" for those students involved. In my research, I critically analyzed the project, its outcomes and the discourses that surfaced. I highlighted similar questions and concerns as those raised by the ISA panel organizers. Employing critical discourse analysis and drawing on scholars such as Foucault, Lather, Giroux and Kincheloe, this paper problematizes the celebratory construction of our project as emancipatory for the participants involved. This paper highlights how, while our project was publicly hailed as "life-changing" for the students, it tacitly reinforced power relations around gender, class, sexuality, race and ability. Further, the paper troubles the individualizing, deficit, therapeutic and at-risk discourses which surfaced in, and circulated around, the project. The paper raises three questions about PV: in hindsight one can raise critical questions about any PV project, but how do we raise concerns within a context of a project without diminishing the agency of participants; if participation is the guiding principle, how do we strike a balance that allows us to direct a project to reflect a more critical approach without imposing authoritative control; and finally, What ethical considerations are paramount when engaging in PV with youth?

Risk and resilience: Optimism and social (dis)order

Resilience is increasingly used in discourses of risk but in very different ways depending on the field of research. This paper addresses the genealogy and etymology of resilience and applies the different approaches to an optimistic re-reading of sociological research on risk, social order and social disorder. Using the lens of disaster management to apply the concept of resilience and risk to empirical research the paper suggests that there is an opportunity for researchers, policy makers and practitioners alike to use the emerging metaphor of resilience to generate a positive and participatory approach to community engagement and organisational change. Likewise it sounds a note of warning that there is also potential to create a negative responsabilisation of the individual at the expense of wider social resilience in the name of societal security. Managing the kind of resilience that is institutionalised in reforms, for dealing with disasters but also other social issues, will be a key challenge for commentators on risk and resilience in the years to come.

Participatory democracy and emerging technologies: A feminist methodological analysis of public deliberations on nanotechnology

Low public awareness combined with the unknown number of uses for nanotechnology in our lives—for example, health care, water purification, food preservation, and alternative energy sources—sets the stage for the opportunity and need for public involvement in the potential futures of nanotechnologies. However, deliberative projects involving the public pose concerns about who gets to define "the public," whose voices are heard, and whose voices are silenced. A focus on methods for egalitarian, democratic participation is significant for the construction and deployment of public deliberations held by government agencies and civil service organizations for the purpose of informing policy where all voices have the potential to be heard. This paper presents an analysis of the methods used in six US public deliberations on nanotechnology conducted by Center for Nanotechnology in Society at UC Santa Barbara in 2009. These deliberations were varied by gender composition in order to explore the relationship between gender and risk perception in deliberative settings about nanotechnologies. Drawing on a feminist perspective, we examine how the design of the deliberation, the role of the facilitator, and gender dynamics impact public participation, particularly in relation to the perceptual and cultural bases utilized by our participants as they make sense of a relatively unfamiliar technology within varied group compositions. Additionally, we examine how these narratives are constructed and/or resisted within the group and how social location impacts the dominance of particular narratives.

Transnational daughters – The inter-generational migration project of Russian au pair workers and their families

Having been brought up with the ideal of ones living a better life, the biographical acting of Russian young females, who come to Germany as au pair workers, often is strongly oriented towards fulfilling parents' expectations and hopes for their social upward mobility. While the parent's generation has fully experienced Russia's transformation and often assumes that migration is the ultimate life chance, their children actually may experience negative sides of the migration process such as discrimination and exclusion or homesickness, so that they sometimes opt for returning to Russia.

On the basis of 17 biographical interviews with Russian women, who have worked in Germany as an au pair and thereafter either settled there or returned to Russia, I would like to investigate the impact of transnational family relations on biographical acting of young female Russians.

The spatial separation of the family requires young women to construct and practice the role of a "transnational daughter". In my paper, I will argue that the change of the daughter's position in the family emerges from two interplaying dynamics of maturing and migrating. First, the au pair stay takes place in the crucial life phase of young adulthood, when young people normally attain autonomy from their parents and develop a rather equal relationship to them. Second, the spatial distance due to migration requires migrants to compensate their absence and substitute the missing direct care for family members with transferable symbols and goods. Both of these dynamics integrate into the development of the transnational daughters' role as the family provider via remittances and presents.

Young, foreign, female: The gendered and nationalized nature of household labour in the au pair institution

The au pair mobility programme was originally founded to promote the exchange of cultures by arranging a one year sojourn of foreign young people in a local host family. However, many recent studies argue that this scheme is misused by families to employ cheap live-in domestic workers from abroad.

Hidden by the official terminology of "au pair girls" and "host families" the structural conditions of this scheme enable a drastic power inequality between employer and employee. Au pairs are especially vulnerable to exploitation as this work is only very little regulated and the workplace within the private sphere of families is extremely difficult to monitor. Au pairs officially are not granted the status "workers" and are not protected by the labour law and labour union.

On the basis of biographical interviews with female and male au pairs from Russia and Eastern Europe, I would like to reveal individual experiences and coping strategies concerning au pair work in Germany. The special gendered nature of the au pair institution can best be shown by comparing the working conditions and duties of female au pairs with those rare cases of male au pairs. To sum up my findings: young women are normally hired for cleaning, cooking and babysitting toddlers, while men are hired for looking after older boys, and seldom are supposed to clean or cook. Nevertheless, both male and female au pairs experience discrimination and exploitation at their workplace, which have to be analysed as specific intersections of gender, nationality and age. Above that, my paper aims to show au pairs' strategies of resistance against mischiefs of their labour conditions such as complaining, bargaining for higher wages or threatening to leave the family, working very slowly or trying to spend time out of the house.

"Universal or selectively coordinated healthcare for Mapuche indigenous peoples?"

This paper attempts to handle the concept of "health care for all" from the perspective of the special populations: the Mapuche Indigenous people. We share with Argentina common Independence wars against Spain; Liberator Jose de San Martin and Bernardo O'Higgins in Chile helped to rid the Spanish conquistador forever. Each nation-state however, had to come to terms with the Mapuche people that lived on both sides of the border. Their defeat was also the beginning of their struggle for survival as a culture and identity. This research paper focuses the discussion of health care systems into three main questions: Healthcare for all (Universal health care?) To what extent universal health systems are sensitive to ancestral cultures and needs? A second question deals with accessibility and timeliness availability of healthcare for all. How does primary preventive health meet the needs of maternal needs of indigenous families? A third concern opens the question about the relationship of primary health and curative medicine provided within the Hospital Backbone System which has oversight onto the administration of complex hospitals. To assess the first question morbidity and mortality, health data will be provided to test comparative rates (Risk Ratios) between Mapuche and non-Mapuche patients and establish whether statistical differences exist by age, gender and ethnicity. To assess the second question this research will test maternal healthcare of Mapuche population and verify perinatal mortality as a proxy of accessibility. The data should help to discover perinatal mortality rates between Mapuche and non-Mapuche mothers and the extent that faraway residence within indigenous reservations explains higher perinatal mortality among Mapuche mothers. The final area of discussion links directly to the question of transformation of healthcare systems and how coordination between primary health systems and curative medicine provided by the Hospital backbone.

Health and mortality of Mapuches at Araucania region: Chile 2000-2005

The relationships between poverty and health and ultimately mortality have generated increasing attention among medical and social science researchers. Ever since the World Health Organization established a commission for investigating such links, the leading contributions of Sir Michael Marmot have revealed conclusively these associations. Analysis and efforts have moved to incorporate ethnic and racial minorities which remain largely neglected over the years. Data and information privacy constraints make more difficult analyses which seek to identify differences between indigenous and non-indigenous populations on critical health and mortality issues. In recent years, however, Census as well as hospital discharge records and poverty records have introduced ways to subset the data to establish and examine such relationships among minorities. This research paper presents a highly detailed study of these questions. The paper introduces the concept of preventable deaths as a dimension of ethnically-based health neglect and examines whether such neglect might threaten the generational survival of Mapuche people in Chile. Statistical and spatial analytic methods help to generate mortality rates and compare health disparities and death outcomes between Mapuche and non Mapuche by gender, age and geographical location. The geographic distribution of poverty rates help to visualize these links and connect the association between material deprivation, disease and mortality. The research focus is on children under age 5 years and the array of diseases and vulnerabilities that express themselves in high mortality rates. The paper investigates in some detail the "ill-defined diseases" concept which may well serve as a proxy for neglect. The paper presents maps and satellite imagery, tables, graphics and basic statistical output appropriate designed for understanding by a broad audience without technical expertise. Spatial statistical methods are used to demonstrate the clustering of events in space.

Human relations and well-being in Mexico

This paper uses a recent database from Mexico (2010) to study the importance of human relations and relational values in explaining life satisfaction in Mexico. The paper uses regression analyses to show that a great portion of the variability in life satisfaction is explained by the nature of human relations. Satisfaction in those relational domains of life, such as satisfaction with spouse relationship and satisfaction with friends, does substantially contribute to life satisfaction. In addition, the paper further explores the importance of these relational domains in explaining people's affective and evaluative substrates; in these way, the research aims to clarify the channel through which relational satisfaction ends up influencing life satisfaction. It is shown that people's values do play a crucial role in mediating this relationship.

Determinants of HIV/STD risk behaviors among recent Latino immigrants in South Florida, USA

Background: Researchers have documented multiple behavioral risk factors associated with HIV infection. Their research has recently expanded to include the social and cultural determinants associated with HIV/STDS among immigrant Latinos. Most research concerning Latino immigrants has primarily focused on exploring their HIV risk behaviors after they have immigrated to the US. Research findings indicate that alcohol significantly influences risky sex practices. However, the association between alcohol use and Latinos' sexual risk behaviors prior to immigrating to the U.S. is scarce. Given the prevalence of alcohol use in Latin America, and this population growth, documenting the influence of alcohol use on Recent Latino Immigrants' (RLI) sexual risk behaviors may narrow this literature gap. Methods: The data examined are from the pre-immigration first wave of a longitudinal study. Data prior to immigration were retrospectively collected from immigrants living in the U.S. for 12 months or less. A sample of 527 RLI between the ages of 18-39 was recruited and interviewed at home or at a convenient place for them. The Timeline Follow-back Interview was administered to document quantity and frequency of alcohol use during the 90 days prior to immigration. Pre-immigration sexual risk behavior was measured using the Center for Disease Control's Risk Behavior Assessment scale. Structural equation modeling was used to examine the data. Results: Males, single participants, and participants with higher incomes reported more alcohol use. Higher alcohol use was associated with lower condom use frequency, having sex under the influence, and more sexual partners. Age and marital status were associated with condom use. Older participants and participants who were married reported less condom use frequency. Discussion: Results points to the importance of targeting adult RLI men, given their likelihood to engage in alcohol-consumption, sex under the influence of alcohol, and sex with multiple partners without using condoms.

Du candidat "raul" au président "alfonsin". discours et histoires dans l'argentine post-dictatoriale (1983-1989)

Cette communication se propose analyser le discours politique de Raul Alfonsin comme candidat et premier président de la période post-dictatoriale en Argentine (1983-1989), concernant la démocratisation de ce pays, ainsi que les histoires que lui et ses assesseurs ont élaborées, révélant l'imaginaire alfonsiniste autour de la notion de démocratie et du rôle que la Justice devait jouer pour exorciser les fantômes des "deux démons": la guérilla des années 1970 et le terrorisme d'Etat exercé sous le prétexte de combattre celle-ci. Sur ce point nous distinguons entre le candidat "Raul" et le président "Alfonso". Le premier a incarné le discours éthico-démocratique; le second un projet républicano-libéral. Pendant la campagne électorale, "Raul" était le candidat qui ne remporterait pas les élections et qui préparait l'opposition politique à un péronisme qui s'annonçait populiste, mobilisateur et dont les secteurs syndicaux avaient négocié le respect de l'auto-amnistie avec les militaires en déroute, en contre-partie de leur prééminence dans le mouvement ouvrier organisé. En revanche, "Alfonso" a été le prince modernisateur, responsable d'un gouvernement qui se présentait comme l'expression de la volonté de la majorité des Argentins et comme l'avocat d'un principe d'unité, de la construction d'un Etat présenté comme l'autre visage de la Nation, à l'opposé de l'Etat militaire, alibi des particularismes corporatifs. Les deux projets ne se sont pourtant pas succédés de manière réglée et ordonnée. Ils ont coexisté pendant la première partie du mandat d'Alfonso et il y eut même une sorte de recouvrement réciproque. Le président s'est appuyé sur le discours éthico-démocratique pour faire aboutir le projet républicano-libéral, attendant de la Justice et d'un secteur intellectuel l'ouverture d'espaces socio-politiques. Il espérait que leur succès lui permettrait ainsi créer un centre légitime de pouvoir qui pourrait se charger d'organiser l'espace contractuel d'un futur régime co-associatif de type social-démocrate. Movimientos sociales y estado en el kirchnerismo (2003-2009). La FTV y la gestión de políticas sociales

En esta ponencia tomaremos la experiencia de la Federación de Tierra, Vivienda y Hábitat (FTV) y su relación con el kirchnerismo entre los años 2003-2009.

Abordaremos las transformaciones en los esquemas de organización, movilización y construcción política que ocurrieron en diferentes movimientos sociales analizando el posicionamiento político, enmarcamiento ideológico y su caudaloso trabajo territorial y social.

Analizaremos la nueva articulación de los movimientos sociales con el estado (institucionalización) y el régimen político, los efectos de su incorporación al estado mediante la gestión de políticas sociales y los alcances y logros de la gestión desarrollada. Resulta interesante también indagar los efectos que supuso en el interior del armado político del gobierno, en las prácticas y formas de representación políticas y en las capacidades de intervención estatal.

Nos preguntamos entonces ¿Qué nuevas oportunidades abrió el kirchnerismo para el crecimiento de los movimientos sociales?, ¿Cómo incidió esto en sus estrategias organizacionales?, ¿Cuál es la dimensión efectiva del reconocimiento de las demandas del campo popular?, ¿han logrado tener éxito desarrollando sus políticas sociales desde el estado?, ¿supuso esta situación para el estado una mayor capacidad para responder favorablemente a las problemáticas sociales?

Por último nos centraremos en una de las experiencias más ricas y problemáticas del ciclo de institucionalización de la FTV que es su ingreso a Subsecretaría de Tierras para el Hábitat Social en el 2006. Es interesante además destacar que la cuestión del acceso a la tierra y la vivienda ha sido objeto de una fuerte lucha en los últimos años, por lo que nos preguntaremos de qué manera la FTV canaliza a través del Estado el conflicto social y como incide esta novedosa posición en las formas de intervención pública.

Inmigración, cultura y religión. Rormas de racismo en Roma

La reflexión sobre inmigración, religión y racismo es el resultado de una investigación realizada en el marco de otra más amplia del título "Transformaciones de la población italiana" desarrollada para el Consejo Nacional de las Investigaciones (CNR) italiano. El análisis se concentra sobre el tema de la inmigración, de las políticas sociales de inclusión y del factor religioso y cultural de los inmigrantes presentes en modo estable en el territorio de Roma. Los motivos de esta investigación están relacionados al hecho que Italia sobre todo a partir de los años '90 - así como ha sucedido en el "contexto global" - ha experimentado la movilidad masiva de personas provenientes de varias naciones. La diferencia con el pasado es que de exportadora de emigrantes, se ha convertido en los últimos años en una de las principales áreas importadoras de inmigrantes.

Esta investigación tiene como objetivo comprender los mecanismos y las acciones que facilitan la integración de los inmigrantes en la ciudad de Roma. A este fin han sido analizadas las actitudes de prejuicio y discriminación racial por parte de la población "autóctona" y al mismo tiempo se han relevado diversas políticas de integración propuestas por el Municipio de la capital. Se trata de diversas tentativas de inclusión, integración y participación de los extranjeros en la vida pública romana; un ejemplo de esto es la experimentación de la participación de los inmigrantes en el gobierno local por un lado y la creación de un espacio para el dialogo interreligioso, la "Consulta de las Religiones", promovida por la oficina para las "Políticas de la Multietnicidad y de la intercultural del Municipio de Roma.

Tracking risk: GPS electronic monitoring and the production of risk knowledge in different cultural contexts

Recent technological advancements relating to global navigation satellite systems (commonly known as "GPS") have reshaped offender management practices. GPS technology is used extensively in the United States, but has also been adopted more modestly in Canada, Australia and Brazil. The popularity of this technology among crime control practitioners is consistent with the goals of prevention, precaution and pre-emption that characterize the present culture of criminal justice (Rose 2010). Importantly, however, is that GPS technology has altered the way in which "risk" is conceptualized and assessed. GPS electronic monitoring technology allows crime control practitioners to monitor the movements of individuals in "real time". Information on an offender's specific location can be considered alongside information relating to his or her offense history and patterns. Together, these sources of information produce a new form of risk knowledge. While GPS technology itself remains similar across contexts, the ways in which this risk knowledge is used is culturally variable. This paper begins by considering the types of risk knowledge produced through GPS electronic monitoring. We then consider how this knowledge intersects with the cultural specifics in which the technology is employed, focusing on Canada, the United States, Australia and Brazil. We investigate how this risk knowledge intersects with cultural contexts to potentially alter the way in which offenders are categorized and managed. Our analysis provides insight into how the dynamics of risk are shaped by new forms of correctional technologies at the same time they intersect with factors that are culturally specific.

Derecho a la ciudad en la agenda de los movimientos populares

El artículo dedica a investigar el impacto de la entrada de la noción del derecho a la ciudad en la trayectoria de las luchas por la vivienda en Brasil, incluyendo otros elementos además de la propia vivienda, llamando atención para la proposición de nuevas formas de inserción en el espacio urbano que buscan romper con la exclusión territorial presente en nuestras ciudades

Además, en las disputas concretas frente al mercado inmobiliario, en los conflictos de desalojos de favelas e tomas de tierra, en los procesos de expropiación e destinación de terrenos para vivienda de interés social, los movimientos han enfrentado situaciones de gran complejidad. El artículo analiza la utilización y eficacia de los instrumentos urbanísticos y de otras herramientas integrantes de la plataforma de la reforma urbana por los movimientos en esas situaciones de enfrentamiento e resistencia frente a las acciones del poder público y del mercado.

Los movimientos sociales han elaborado propuestas de políticas y programas de vivienda social, como los programas de vivienda social en áreas centrales, y buscaran incidir en la adopción de esas políticas por el poder público.

El artículo problematiza con que énfasis las propuestas e perspectivas han sido agregadas en esas políticas. Será dada especial atención en el actual programa "Minha Casa Minha Vida", del gobierno federal de Brasil, que tiene como objetivo la producción masiva de viviendas y cuenta con presupuestos significativos. Entretanto, la lógica financiera de estas inversiones ha prevalecido sobre la urbanística, reproduciendo la exclusión territorial y ignorando la agenda de la reforma urbana y del derecho a la ciudad.

Poder de decisão, participação y financiación del desarrollo urbano en Brasil

La Constitución brasileña, aprobada en 1988, creó un nuevo paradigma para las políticas sociales del país: el compromiso de implementar un welfare state asociado a la democratización del Estado, a través de la ampliación de la participación directa de los ciudadanos en la definición de políticas. A partir de ese momento, la política de desarrollo urbano estableció esferas participativas en todos los niveles federativos. En el plano nacional y estadual, se constituyó un Consejo Nacional de las Ciudades que realizó cuatro procesos de Conferencias Nacionales, así como 18 consejos estaduais (en cerca del 66% de los estados). En el plano municipal, en el 90 % de los municipios, se constituyó por lo menos un consejo sectorial vinculado a la política urbana experimentándose además un avance significativo, entre los años 2001 y 2008, respecto al número de municipios que cuentan con un consejo de política urbana. Por otro lado, en el mismo periodo, los modelos de financiación del desarrollo urbano – fuertemente concentrado en los niveles federal y estadual – así como los diseños institucionales creados para la gestión de la distribución de los recursos en el área, no han dialogado con toda esa estructura de participación construida. En un estudio realizado, analizamos todas las formas de asignación de recursos federales en esta área y sus procesos respectivos de decisión, con la intención de identificar sus relaciones con los espacios de debate e instituciones participativas existentes, así como determinar la influencia que estas instituciones ejercen en la implementación de la política de desarrollo urbano en Brasil. Este análisis reveló una baja o ninguna incidencia de las instancias participativas en relación a los procesos de decisión de asignación de los recursos, así como una fuerte presencia de gramáticas clientelistas.

Foucault y la sociología clásica: Un diálogo en tensión a partir del suicidio Durkheimiano

El presente trabajo buscará tensar el diálogo no siempre explícito entre Michel Foucault y Emile Durkheim, a propósito del caso del suicidio, tomando como centrales para el análisis el canónico estudio durkheimiano «El suicidio» frente al pequeño artículo de Foucault titulado «Un placer tan sencillo». En este marco de problematización, y en primer lugar, se buscará desarrollar sintéticamente ambas problematizaciones sobre el suicidio explicitando la red conceptual en las que las mismas adquieren sentido. En segundo lugar, se buscará complejizar la articulación de ciertas nociones presentes en las obras de los autores, como las de normalidad, disciplina, moral, normalización y anomia, para abrir una problematización de las normas sociales que nos arroja tanto algunas cercanías como algunas irremediables distancias en sus posiciones teóricas/epistemológicas. Por último, se expondrá la moralidad durkheimiana que constituye la sociedad, y que por tanto, se vuelve vital para la felicidad del individuo y para el funcionamiento de la sociedad frente a la politización foucaultiana de la muerte, donde se habilita un ejercicio de pensamiento sobre nuevas formas de vida que resistan a una determinada administración de la vida.

Ignacio ellacuría: A critical theory from Latin America

Ignacio Ellacuría (1934-1989) is one of the most important figures of the Latin American Theology and Philosophy of Liberation. The present paper treats his philosophical-political thought, intending to make clear his ideas concerning the foundations of a theory of critical ambition, from the perspective of the historical and social-political situation in Latin America. It deals with his reflections on the attitude and commitment which define the critical theorist's position, with the notion of immanent critique, with the concept of historization and with the adoption of "the place" that, according to Ellacuría, "gives truth" in a global and plural framework. These reflections constitute relevant elements in order to rethink the normative grounds of any critical theory, beyond the limitations of more recent representatives of this theoretical tradition. In fact, both J. Habermas's and A. Honneth's theoretical perspectives are fixed on the context of the so-called first world, which has problematical consequences for their thinking about global problems. Ellacuría's starting point however is the awareness of the centrality of the reflexion about the place in a geopolitical framework, from which a critical theory must confront the problems of global reality.

Sujetos instituyentes e identidades profesionales

En el trabajo doy cuenta de los eventos que marcan la vida y progresión en la trayectoria de un grupo de académicos adscritos a la Licenciatura en Pedagogía de la Universidad Autónoma de Nuevo León, México; durante el periodo de los setenta y ochenta, y con ello, la constitución de temporalidades institucionales y profesionales diferenciadas, lo que destaca la fuerza instituyente de los colectivos en las instituciones.

El trabajo aborda estilos de gestión diferenciados temporalmente, pero se encuentran articulados por la reflexión acerca de la forma en que los sujetos habitan las instituciones universitarias y el lugar en el que se colocan. Encontramos así, experiencias grupales que conforman identidades muy fuertes de tipo comunitario y que desde la colectividad construyen utopías que operaron como encuadre a proyectos institucionales, grupales y personales.

Frente a ello, florecen actualmente otros estilos de prácticas académicas y formas de adscripción institucional, que aunadas al periodo de vida profesional, si bien genera procesos de malestar y sufrimiento académico, nos muestra nuevos procesos de constitución identitaria, así como la progresión en las temporalidades institucionales y en las trayectorias académicas.

The neo-liberalization of housing and the 'right to the city': The variagated experiences of New York, Amsterdam and Tokyo

Housing policy de- and re-regulation have played important parts in restructuring urban housing markets in recent decades. Transformations in housing policy and conditions have increasingly pressurized, marginalized or excluded lower income groups. In this paper the neo-liberalization of housing practices and conditions is examined in three highly differentiated global city contexts: New York, Amsterdam and Tokyo. Comparative analyses that consider both housing policy and market transformations focused at the city level have been rare, especially those that link different continents. This paper takes on three 'world cities' – where the deregulatory pressures have in principle been the strongest – that have demonstrated highly differentiated pathways in terms of housing policy and market restructuring. In these contexts the 'right to the city' has been highly mediated by local practices, institutional legacies and policy regimes. The meanings of rights and de-facto access to affordable urban housing have been transformed qualitatively and quantitatively in each city context but, as this paper examines, in remarkably different ways.

Social topography of knowledge based economies

The success or failure of a social setting to adjust to challenges posed by global trends depends on its ability to form social topography conducive to knowledge based economy. Interestingly enough, sociological analysis of necessary and sufficient conditions of knowledge based economy remains curiously underdeveloped; economics, economic and regional geography and political science are in the forefront of this strand of research. However, sociology has much to offer through its analysis of the three social forces shaping social topography. First, sociological neo-institutionalism has much to offer in analysis of economic institutions. Second, social network analysis is one of the most thriving areas of sociological research in the past two decades, leading to important breakthroughs in economic sociology and research methods. Finally, sociology of culture provides us with theoretically informed accounts of cognitive frames' role in influencing social action.

Ability of a social setting to become a fertile ground for knowledge based economy thus depends on the three social forces: relevant institutions, social networks and cognitive frames. We have a rich body of literature in economic sociology at our disposal, providing evidence of each of them being relevant factors for a variety of economic outcomes. However, this literature usually fails to take into account that social forces operate interdependently, forming relational topography of social fields, making them more or less conducive to successful adaptation to global trends by determining the outcome of processes of knowledge (re)production and knowledge transfer.

In this paper we will conceptualise sociological explanation of factors and mechanisms by which social forces make social topography conducive for development of knowledge based economy, by applying Jens Beckett's theory of social fields.

Social time and the problem of desynchronization

Social Time and the Problem of Desynchronization

The paper starts from the observation that the temporality of modern society is characterized by a continuing process of social acceleration. This, in turn, leads to serious problems of de-synchronization. De-Synchronization is caused by the fact that not all spheres and systems are equally capable of speed-up. Hence, whenever an actor, institution or process is accelerated, the surrounding and interlocking systems experience temporal pressure. De-synchronization will be explored on the following four levels:

- a) Inter-Economic: The speed of financial transactions and markets is too high for the speed of 'real' economic production and consumption
- b) Inter-Social: The speed of economic transactions, technological innovation and cultural change is too high for democratic political decision-making
- c) Environmental: The speed of social life is too fast for the environmental systems to reproduce resources and dispose of waste
- d) Psychological: The speed of social life is too fast for individual psychological dispositions; stress, depression, and burnout are the observable consequences

Biographical knowledge and its implication to activism studies: A case study about the landless peoples movement in South Africa

The paper analyses the effects of a long-term ethnographic research with a landless activist in rural South Africa. Arguing that the relations we establish with the individuals change substantially along the research, I state that much we know about them, less capacity we have to classify or attach the individuals to one single social narrative (i.e. activism). Following the everyday transit of the LPM major leadership for six years, within and outside the movement, this work stresses the discontinuities among the various roles he plays and the social controversies he is involved due to that. Through this case I aim to discuss the implications of this kind of research for a sociological theory of action.

Usos y apropiaciones del espacio público en contextos de pobreza. Experiencias en Buenos Aires en el siglo XXI

Las dinámicas sociales construyen y son construidas a través del espacio público. En contextos de vulnerabilidad social, las alternativas de acción en torno a la construcción, uso y apropiación del mismo se encuentran atravesadas por biografías, potencialidades de actuar y capacidades de beneficiarse del accionar estatal. En tal sentido, por un lado se considera que el espacio público puede entenderse como una prolongación de los conflictos sociales en torno al uso y propiedad del suelo urbano, pues en aquel resultan evidentes las situaciones de disrupción de dimensiones centrales como el acceso, control y usufructo de dicho suelo. Por otro lado, el accionar estatal en materia de políticas para el espacio público nunca resulta neutral: qué actividades se aprueban, bajo qué criterio de economía y desde qué perspectiva política suele representar la ideología del gobierno que impulsa determinadas herramientas de intervención. Por lo tanto, esta investigación parte de un interés por indagar procesos sociales en los que sectores sociales vulnerables logran desarrollar acciones en torno al espacio público que habitan, generándose a partir de tal accionar tensiones respecto al diseño, implementación y uso de las políticas urbanas a distintos órdenes de gobierno. Para ello, se desarrollan distintas experiencias protagonizadas por sectores vulnerables (p.e. personas en situación de calle, asentamientos irregulares, entre otros) que propenderían a significar el espacio público en tanto instrumento para la búsqueda de una mayor equidad territorial en los ámbitos urbanos.

The power of "powerless" workers: Colombian waste picker cooperatives' struggle for social and economic inclusion

Traditional labor unions view informal sector workers as "unorganizable" due to their lack of legal protections and the fact that many are self-employed. Nonetheless, in recent decades, street vendors, domestic workers, home-based producers, and waste pickers in many countries have begun mobilizing. How do informal workers in hostile social, economic, and political contexts attain and wield power?

To explore this question, I investigate Colombia's largest and most established waste picker's organization, the Association of Recyclers of Bogotá (ARB), and its campaign to win inclusion in Bogotá's 2011 waste management tendering process. Based on ten weeks of ethnographic research, I investigate how the ARB responds to three key challenges: 1.) Waste pickers have no recognized employer, despite the fact that manufacturers, consumers, governments, and waste management firms all benefit from their labor. How and to whom do waste pickers make legal claims to win recognition and compensation for their economic, social, and ecological contributions? 2.) Due to their poverty and perceived lack of hygiene, Colombian waste pickers—traditionally known as desechables ("disposable people")—face public scorn, harassment by authorities, and threat of murder by "social cleansing" vigilante groups. How does the ARB convert stigma into a source of symbolic power, leveraging waste pickers' position at the bottom rungs of society to shame governments and businesses into action? 3.) City officials take advantage of the porous boundaries of the waste picking profession to undercut the ARB's negotiating power by promoting the creation of rival associations led by well-heeled government allies, including former military officers. How does the ARB draw upon transnational and domestic activist networks, as well its own membership, to gain legitimacy as an "authentic" representative of Bogotá's waste pickers? The paper closes with observations comparing the organizational challenges facing Colombian waste pickers with those confronted by waste pickers in Brazil.

Transnational networks and organizing in the informal sector: Waste pickers respond to challenges and opportunities of globalization

Informal sector work is intensely local in its economic organization. Yet in recent decades, street vendors, domestic workers, home-based producers, and waste pickers have begun collectively organizing to make their voices heard to governments and employers not only on the local and national level, but transnationally as well. Such organizing models remain largely overlooked and almost completely untheorized. This paper analyzes the work of the Latin America Waste Picker's Network (LAWPN), the world's most active transnational waste picker's network. Building on fieldwork in Colombia (site of the first World Conference of Waste Collectors in 2008) and interviews with movement leaders from four Latin American countries, this paper assesses the extent to which transnational networks and organization building enhance the collective capabilities of this particular set of precarious workers.

LAWPN has four key functions. First, it facilitates exchanges of knowledge, technology, and strategies between member organizations through regional conventions, country-to-country delegations, telecommunications, and strategic reports. Second, it organizes transnational solidarity to aid in local battles. For example, when waste pickers in Montevideo needed support in a local campaign, member organizations across Latin America issued solidarity statements and pressured their national ambassadors in Uruguay to do the same. Third, LAWPN sends leaders from countries with strong waste picker movements to countries with weak movements in order to promote the development of new leadership and organizations. Fourth, LAWPN organizes global waste picker committees to make appeals for support to transnational governance organizations such as the Inter-American Development Bank, the UN Convention on Climate Change, and the International Labor organization.

The complex dance of diaspora and transnationalism taking place in the Euro-African secondhand cars exportation business

The growth in global circulation of people and goods challenge our understanding of the nation-state. Strong analytical tools are needed to describe the multiple involvements of migrants in homeland and host countries. That's why old concept such as diaspora or more recent one such as transnationalism are now widely used. Those two concepts, even if closely linked, describe different realms of the global circulation of people and goods. I will illustrate those differences and complementarities through a single case study; the Euro-African secondhand cars exportation business.

Intensive multi-sited fieldwork has been conducted to describe the exportation of secondhand cars between Brussels – EU's capital – and Cotonou, Benin. Interestingly, two very different profiles of cars importers can be found in Cotonou; Lebanese one, working as a business diaspora, and Beninese one having a profile of transmigrants. Lebanese cars importers never travel to buy their cars. A high level of enforceable trust between ethnic co-members allows them to rely on the Lebanese diaspora to send cars directly to Cotonou. As a community using its network of members to address technical problems linked to a common commercial activity, they can be described as a commercial diaspora. On the contrary, Beninese importers travel themselves in order to buy their cars. The poor level of trust and the absence of a strong Beninese community in business places such as Brussels oblige them to be present at each step of the activity. Working in Cotonou, but regularly spending long sojourns in Europe, they have the double involvement characterising transmigrant concept.

The discussion of this case study allow us to describe the complex dance concepts of diaspora and transnationalism are playing together in order to help us analyse new form of global circulation.

Paradoxos do capitalismo e trabalho em call centers

O objetivo do estudo é compreender o contexto do trabalho na chamada sociedade da informação e as diferentes formas de trabalho que nela se desenvolvem, em especial o teletrabalho em call centers. Diante de um novo paradigma tecnológico característico da era da informação, trata-se de analisar as diferentes configurações do trabalho. Interessa-nos aqui investigar e analisar o trabalho ligado às Tecnologias de Informação e Comunicação (TICs). Por um lado, estas tecnologias, por referirem-se a atividades de natureza compreensiva e imaterial, traduziriam uma redução da amplitude da divisão do trabalho entre os que concebem e os que executam, mas, por outro, a realidade do trabalho ligado às TICs mostra-se complexa e ambígua pois há indícios de uma manutenção da divisão, ou mesmo a combinação, entre trabalhos "inteligentes" e trabalhos controlados e repetitivos. O trabalho em call centers parece condensar estas ambigüidades de um trabalho informacional com alto controle, o que o colocaria entre as esperanças do pós-taylorismo e os temores do neo-taylorismo. A Teoria Crítica de Axel Honneth permite-nos pensar a experiência do trabalho no seio daquilo que o autor intitula "paradoxos do capitalismo". O significado do trabalho em sua dimensão social ganha força ao ser demonstrado que o "novo capitalismo" logra produzir progresso moral, baseado nos legados do Estado Social e do modelo taylorista e fordista de trabalho, e, simultaneamente, produzir o seu contrário ao erodir o alcance emancipador dessas normas e valores. Os paradoxos do capitalismo em rede encontram no trabalho em call centers a produção exemplar desta contradição.

Pour surmonter la dichotomie entre travail décent et travail digne: Reconnaissance et droits de l'homme

L'objectif de ce travail est de faire une réflexion théorique et conceptuelle sur les notions de travail décent et travail digne, a partir de la confrontation conceptuelle entre citoyenneté et droits de l'homme. Notre argument est que le travail décent remet à la notion de citoyenneté et à une nature opérationnelle, selon ce qui est indiqué par l'Agenda pour le travail décent de l'Organisation Internationale du Travail (OIT), tandis que le travail digne remet à la Déclaration Universelle des Droits de l'Homme (DUDH) et se montre dépendante d'un réseaux plus large de droits. Afin de surmonter cette dichotomie, nous proposons la notion de reconnaissance et un approche intégral des droits de l'homme, de manière à qualifier la notion de travail décent.

Distributive grievances and socio-political blockages: The role of middle-class youth in the Israeli social protest movement

The literature on new social movements argues that contemporary protest movements embody a postmaterialist shift, hence the propensity to protest rests on subscribing to particular values rather than on distributive grievances. Correspondingly, protests are primarily the tool of those advantaged by education and other resources. The recent wave of protest in Western countries, however, challenges this reading. While educated, post-materialist young people have clearly been the major players in these protests, their demands are squarely redistributive.

We study the Israeli case as a research site to examine interactions between distributive grievances and socio-political blockages as sources of the current wave of protest. The analysis of grievances focuses on the intersection between class and generational dynamics and their connection to the transformation of Israel's political economy. Towards the end of the decade which preceded the protests, perceptions of material conditions and prospects of young Israelis with middle-class backgrounds worsened in comparison with other groups. While rising living standards marked their formative experiences, as young adults many encountered declining opportunities in labor and housing markets to maintain the lifestyles experienced in their parents' households. At the same time, alienation from institutionalized politics, fed by a clash of collective identities with the currently dominant political forces in Israel, created both actual and perceived blockages to influencing policy through "conventional" means among the educated middle class young people who led the protests.

Our conclusion is that discontent fed by declining life chances, coupled with long-standing conflicts around the distribution of socio-political power and prestige, politicized distributive issues and fed demands for a more activist economic role for the state. Theoretically, we suggest that rather than treating materialism/postmaterialism as a dichotomy offering alternative explanations of protest movements, the current challenge is to conceptualize and empirically examine interactions between economic conditions, political power and socio-political identities.

Muslim organizations in Germany lobbying for rights of social minorities: Contested issues of naturalization and religious recognition

This paper discusses the advocacy of Muslim umbrella organizations in Germany for civil rights both in the sphere of religion and beyond, including an organizational-sociological analysis of underlying motivations and challenges.

The empirical and historical background is a so-called double shift in German legislation: On the one hand, changes in the German migration regime since the turn of the 21st century include an opening up of the ethnic nationality concept due to the introduction of ius soli elements in the Act on the Reform of Nationality Law in 2000. On the other hand, the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001 were followed by a tightened security policy that has aimed at the fight against Islamist terrorism. Both developments coincided and affected the relationship between Muslims organizations and the German State

In light of the theoretical debate on securitization, which can be applied to the three security dimension state-, societal-, and human security, this paper highlights the political emphasis of a threat rhetoric, while analyzing its impact upon Muslim organizations. Especially, their responses to the changes in German nationality law and the still pending status of Muslim organizations within the German church-state relations are discussed based on empirical material gathered from six main Muslim umbrella organizations (including organizational documents from 2000 to 2010 and 11 semi-structured interviews).

The paper includes a discussion on the following topics related to the naturalisation debates: German language acquisition, integration courses, ability to ensure self subsistence, naturalisation tests, dual citizenship, and local voting rights. Furthermore, issues regarding the recognition of religious rights for Muslim individuals and organizations are discussed, such as the pending official recognition of Muslim umbrella organizations, the hampered introduction of Islamic religious education in public schools, contested issues around the wearing of headscarves, and exemption rights from school classes due to religious beliefs.

Muslims' struggle for recognition in Germany in the 21st century

Muslim organizations in Germany are not yet officially recognized as religious corporations according to public law despite various attempts to obtain this status which would grant them both legal rights and public legitimacy.

Since the 1980s, this collective struggle for public recognition has been spearheaded by the main Muslim umbrella organizations. Over time, however, new collective identities and forms of organization have emerged in the context of changing public debates.

This paper highlights these shifts in the organizational field from an innovative theoretical perspective—combining approaches from organizational sociology that focus on legitimacy concerns with concepts from political science which underscore the impact of the political environments in Germany and abroad.

This research perspective enables us to understand the manifold tensions Muslim organizations are faced with in Germany—a country that has just recently 'discovered' its religious pluralism and that still struggles with accommodating its 'newcomers'.

Based on over 30 interviews with organizational representatives from Muslim umbrella organizations, these changing public debates are critically analyzed from their perspective.

Organizational responses and claims in the areas of Islamic religious education, imam training, official recognition, and public dialogues are discussed, as well as the creation of a new Muslim peak organization in 2007.

Overall, it can be shown that the collective struggle for Muslim recognition in Germany has been influenced by changing integration and security debates. This has held in particular since the turn of the 21st century when the government finally acknowledged Germany to be an immigration country while demanding more integration efforts that are often interlinked with security concerns. At the same time a shift of discourse from "foreigners" to "Muslims" as the contested "others" in German society has occurred that directly affects the analyzed Muslim organizations. Their responses and challenges are highlighted throughout this paper.

Comparative biographical case studies in a processual perspective

This paper is meant to discuss our methodological principles and approach in comparative biographical case studies. We will point out the need to discover theory by means of open methods of data collection and data interpretation, using the example of family and life histories of ethnic Germans in and from Ukraine. By locating the cases in their social-historical context, in an intergenerational perspective, and in the reconstruction of the family history, we try to fulfill the demands of a socio-historical and figurational analysis and to avoid an 'individualizing' approach. It is our aim to overcome an ahistorical perspective, thus we embed biographies into the context of social history, particularly long-term processes of collective and socio-structural transformations and shifting balances of power. The case level of family histories and a timeframe oriented towards several generations — as opposed to a case level of separate life stories of individuals — enables us to reconstruct processes of development and changes in social phenomena over the longue durée and to analyze the family history as it is interrelated to the histories of larger groupings or collectivities. By conducting contrastive comparisons, theoretical sampling, and by taking into account various sources of data we intend to discover the subdued voices of the outsiders and the diversity of cases. Our empirical data show the difficulties to trace these voices which are excluded in the discourses of the we-grouping of ethnic Germans. Against this backdrop it is even more important to include them into the sampling in order to reflect the complexity of historical developments and to explain the relational qualities of established-outsider figurations in the present.

Palestinians in the West Bank: Diverse collective belongings, varying collective memories and the experiences of discrimination in diverse interactional contexts

To which we-group do I belong in different social contexts, how do I have to present "us" and "myself" to someone from other groupings or from the "outside", to which collective memory or narrative do I have to refer and what shouldn't I tell? According to our findings in the context of a research project funded by the German Research Foundation our interviewees from the West Bank do not explicitly ask themselves these questions. Their self-presentations are more or less based on a tacit knowledge and a long training within their extended families and milieus. The interviews made very obvious that the members of different groupings (e.g. Muslims or Christians, people with rural or urban background or refugees from 1948) all have a strong need to present themselves to non-Palestinians as a homogeneous group which more or less has no internal difficulties, no internal conflicts and whose members live together in peace. But the contrastive comparison of members of these different groupings also showed considerable differences and very clearly that under these stereotyped images lie experiences of discrimination for example as "uneducated refugees" or "Christians with a lack of national identity", etc. Furthermore, we always have to take into consideration that these different experiences are connected with suffering and violence within the context of the Israeli-Palestinian resp. Israeli-Arab conflict, the political necessity of solidarity and various attempts at creating boundaries and disunion by the Israeli governments.

I will exemplify these findings by using several cases studies (case level: the family) from the areas of Bethlehem and Ramallah.

Organisational career is not dead

Some authors claim that the old (organizational) concept of career is no longer relevant in the Knowledge Economy. Therefore, it must be replaced by a new (individual) concept of career, along with the new forms of career that this concept would entail (the new career (Arnold, Jackson, 1997), the post-corporate career (Peiperl, Baruch, 1997), the intelligent career (Arthur et al., 1995), the protean career (Hall, 1976), and the boundaryless career (Arthur, Rousseau, 1996)).

The paper argues that the existence of an individual career cannot be denied, but should not be made absolute to all professions, economical sectors, labour markets etc. The unconditional transformation of the organisational concept to the individual is debatable.

The penetration and adequacy of the new concept of career (individual career) in the modern context is criticised with following aspects: the irrevocable replacement of the organisational concept of career with the individual one; the limitations of the situational context on the individual's autonomy to independently develop their career; the universality of the concept of individual career and its application to all professions and economic sectors; the tentative originality of the concept of individual career; the waning of organisational influence in developing personal careers; the marginalization of objective indicators of career success; the advantages of life-time employment to both individuals and employers; the dynamic nature of labour markets.

Individual career is considered as one of the career forms in Knowledge Economy in this paper - "either-or" approach between organisational and individual career concepts should be rejected while the "and-and" principle should rather be used.

The construction of Lithuanian migrants' professional career paths: Moving up and down career track

Recently the phenomenon of Lithuanians' migration on a mass scale has drawn attention of scientists, politicians and publicists. The main focus of the migration analysis points out the economic explanation of labour force flows as well as implying the understanding of diverse costs and risks migrants are taking. Scientists have mainly studied the change of Lithuanian migration pattern (Sipavičienė, 2006), the economic consequences of migration (Sarvutytė, 2011), the relationship with the family members who live in Lithuania (Maslauskaitė, Stankūnienė, 2007), the brain-drain (Kazlauskienė, 2006), the meaning of social networks in migration (Gečienė, 2009), as well as other aspects of this phenomenon. However the analysis of the changes in Lithuanian career paths has not been referred to so far, especially in migration analysis context. Therefore the goal of this paper is to analyse Lithuanian migrants career trajectories (movements up and down the career track) prior to migration and in the destination country.

The chosen theory of career construction provides the contextual approach to the analysis of career paths. According to this theory, the career is understood as a subjective structure that comprises the aspirations of the past, present and future (Savickas, 2002). The paper addresses the following questions: what are the contextual factors influencing individual career paths in migration context? What kind of career move: horizontal, vertical or multidirectional could be defined as typical for migrants? What is the role of qualification and education in shaping the career paths? How the migration decisions are related to the transformation of professional career moves?

The paper analyses transformations of professional career path of 89 Lithuanian migrants (with diverse socio-demographic characteristics) in European countries. The empirical analysis is based on qualitative research data which was conducted during the period of 2008-2010 in several European countries, including United Kingdom, Denmark, Spain, and Germany.

Visual interventions and community engagement through a university curriculum in South Africa

This paper discusses ethical and political issues which emerged through a university course which used visual methods to address local social issues. Although not strictly classified as visual sociology, projects incorporated in the Visual Arts Curriculum at Stellenbosch University in South Africa, enabled sustained engagement between university students and a local community organisation. The partnership between the Visual Arts Department and a youth-focussed NGO working with adolescents from the nearby township of Kayamandi, facilitated close interaction between two groups of young people coming from very different socio-economic and cultural backgrounds. This six year partnership, shifted from a teaching-based skills-transfer model of interaction to one of collaboration, knowledge exchange and applied visual activism. Students and adolescents partake in collaborative projects using photography, design and drawing to engage with self-chosen issues like HIV/ AIDS, education, racial discrimination, collective memory, social inequality and urban environmental degradation. This paper draws from the participants' written reflections, the visual projects themselves and relevant literature.

The visual projects are designed for application within the Kayamandi community as awareness campaigns, creative reflections on urban spaces and cultural practices etc. At the same time however, they are subject to a process of aesthetic judgement imposed by the managing institution. The tendency of these parallel expectations to pull in opposite directions hints at the deeper social and racial divisions which structure the interactions between the university and the community. This paper argues that although visual media can function as a powerful vehicle of social engagement and change, the politics and power struggles which are tied to all forms of visual and cultural production, must be taken into account. In order to create truly cross-cultural and emancipatory forms of cultural expression and visual communication, the deep-seated power imbalances in much 'development' and 'community' work need to be overturned.

Reform strategies in home care for elderly in Europe

The reform of old age care is high on the agenda of countries across Europe. The ageing of societies is increasing the demand for services, while purely family based care arrangements are becoming more unsustainable. Both developments occur in welfare states which have been predominantly characterised by financial austerity since the late 1970s. These broadly common challenges make it interesting to look more closely at how different European countries with each their care regime have responded. What are the specific drivers for reform and which particular set of actors have pushed for reform? Further, what are the specific strategies for reform? While there is a plethora of single country case studies addressing these types of questions, systematic comparisons across countries are much rarer.

A recent international research project Living Independently at Home (LIVINDHOME) investigated these issues in 9 European countries. This paper presents the comparative findings in analyzing the main reform strategies in home care for the elderly. The paper looks both at the drivers for change and substance of change, in terms the organisation, provision, regulation and quality of care.

Spot on neglected function systems. Challenging the reigned trench warfare of politics and the economy by systemic constellations

Social systems theory suggests that function systems are of equal relevancy for society. Theoretically speaking there is indeed no reason for taking politics or arts for less relevant than the economy. However, observing concrete social systems we find that theoretically incommensurable function systems are actually ranked by relevance: It is not hard to imagine that the economy is more relevant to banks than to schools or to recall how the relevance of religion declined in the Occident.

In other words: There is something like a relative value of the individual function systems, which obviously varies between individual social systems and can also change over time. While this idea does not challenge, but rather support, the concept of the basic functional equivalence of the function systems, it nonetheless calls for new methods for both research on the preferences certain social systems have for certain function systems and research on how these preferences change over time (cf. Roth, Scheiber and Wetzel 2010).

Against this background, the present contribution transfers basic principles of systemic constellations to the realm of science and presents a framework for the analysis of the fashionable nature of function system preferences. The method will be demonstrated during the workshop. If applied, it allows for a) The detection of dissonances between structures and semantics of function system (p)references of social systems.

b) A critical self-reflection of sociology, which can use it to wonder whether to follow or rather to reflect the detected trends.

The recently reignited trench warfare of politics and the economy can then be taken as a chance to challenge present 'doing more of the same'-strategies. The solution to the financial crises could be to drawing away the attention from apparently strong stimuli and rather put the spotlight on so far rather underexposed function systems.

Building civic capacity in a Mexico city slum community

For the past year I have been part of a collaborative project (sponsored by the departments of political science and psychology at my institution) to study the physical, mental and civic health of a slum community in the Mexico City metropolitan area. The goal of the project is twofold: first, we hope to establish baseline data for overall community health; second, we are partnering with and studying the programs implemented by a local NGO. By using a number of measures and indicators, we intend to assess the effectiveness of these programs. Early results seem to demonstrate that residents who participate in the NGO's programs, for example, a grassroots health initiative, have better physical, mental and civic health outcomes.

The modest gains that have been made with a very small group of people, however, are dwarfed by an enormous community-wide deficiency of social capital. Given this deficit—and a number of other social and political factors that I plan to address in my paper—civic capacity is very low.

Besides describing some of the civic capacity-building strategies of our partner NGO, the purpose of my paper is to explore alternatives, using the work of sociologist Xavier de Souza Briggs and others, in order to propose refinements to existing programs and to identify new initiatives. In short, my paper uses a specific case study as a springboard, on the level of praxis, to investigate some examples of "best practices" for increasing civic capacity and, at the level of theory, to test whether various models "fit" what is happening on the ground or to see whether there are untapped theoretical insights that could be operationalized.

Belle toujours: Table conversations and civilization in Manoel de Oliveira's work

The aim of this paper is to point out at how the sociological elements in Manoel de Oliveira's film Belle toujours (2006) can be investigated by articulating some expressive resources of film, such as, on one hand, framing, music and dialog, and, on the other hand, the recurring enactment of certain sequences. The sequences to be analyzed are those taking place during meal situations (long takes which are rich in elements within the shots), a peculiar aspect in some of the filmmaker's works, such as Non – ou a vã glória de mandar (1990 – Non – or the vain glory of command), Viagem ao princípio do mundo (1997 – Voyage to the beginning of the world), Um filme falado (2003 – A talking picture) and O estranho caso de Angélica (2010 – The strange case of Angelica), among others.

The author intends to point out at how these meal situations serve as a support for developing that which is spoken in the film, and, based on that, (considering the proposal of session A of RC 37, "analysis of art works as a way to achieve social knowledge about societies or social groups"), explore how the play between dialog and silence, on one hand, and music, light and framing, on the other hand, makes it possible to build a perspective on western civilization and, very particularly, European civilization. Firstly, based on the temporal nature involved in said blocks of the film, since such situations produce a framework that breaks up with certain traditional schemes of action in film. In the second place, based on the dialogues maintained there. Thirdly, by exploring those aspects that the film does not directly show, but which allow for a sociological look, even if an oblique one, on certain civilizational themes.

Visualisation of identity in context of e-interview

New information and communications technologies open large new opportunities for qualitative research, in particular for interviewing. This paper is based on the authors' experience of biographical deep interviewing with idea of visualization of life course. In an interviews face to face, we often use a tentative schedule of life line or a family tree to stimulate the narration. If the respondent painted on paper the line with positive and negative life events, it is easier to proceed the narration of controversial subjects.

Some novelty in the net-technology on Russian recruitment market open the perspective of other visual incentive for communication between interviewer and interviewee (the computer-based visualization of resume). In order to optimize business objectives, program developers created the form for import profile data to visualize educational and professional experience with some skills, hobbies and values. For the sociologist, it is important to distinguish the structure of life event on the level of biography and the narrative story about the life, especially for the phase of narrative inter-rogation in interview.

When we compared with the face-to-face interview, the e-interview entails two types of displacement, time and space. In relation to time, the interactions between interviewer and interviewee are likely to be asynchronous; while in terms of space, the relationship takes place "at a distance" through the screen-based text. Despite of a limited register for communication and partially presented identity, e-interview with pre-visualised data creates interesting and productive scenario for start of communication of both researcher and subject because of legitime form of representing personal data in Internet. Of course it is dependent on willing and competent access to net-technology on the part of researcher and subject, but this way of research conducting can be successful in access to certain types of sampling.

Efectos del teletrabajo para el trabajador y la organización

El teletrabajo es una lógica de organización de la producción cada vez más presente en el mundo. En nuestro país varias organizaciones ya lo han implementado, por ejemplo: CISCO, Telecom, YPF, Tenaris, IBM, etc. No hay cifras oficiales, pero se estima que hay más de 1.300.000 "oficinas hogareñas" en nuestro país y se espera que continúen ascendiendo.[1]

Actores sociales a favor de la implementación del teletrabajo han resaltado los efectos positivos del mismo para el trabajador, la organización y la sociedad, y (en el mejor de los casos) han solo mencionado los riesgos que puede ocasionar.

No hay estudios empíricos difundidos que den cuenta de los esfuerzos diferenciales respecto del trabajo presencial que el teletrabajo requiere a quienes lo realizan y a las organizaciones que lo implementan.

Este trabajo tiene como objetivo abrir el debate sobre este tema. Se realizó un estudio cualitativo. A través de entrevistas en profundidad se relevaron experiencias de aquellos que teletrabajan o trabajan con teletrabajadores a una muestra no aleatoria. Con los resultados preliminares se conoció que: Sufren tensiones que en el trabajo presencial no aparecen, como ser:

- Dificultad para:
 - establecer lazos de cooperación con los compañeros de trabajo
 - separar el tiempo de trabajo del tiempo de no trabajo

- O (los jefes) dejar modelos de control basados en la supervisión directa
- Tener que ocuparse en simultáneo de más responsabilidades (las laborales y las familiares)
- Trabajar más horas y con mayor intensidad
- Afrontar el prejuicio: "Quien teletrabaja no trabaja"
- Vínculo con la organización restringido al supervisor directo
- Formalización de la comunicación
- Dependencia de la tecnología informática

La gobernanza: Qué es y qué propone

En las últimas dos décadas la palabra "gobernanza" apareció, y cada vez con mayor asiduidad, en diversos ámbitos como por ejemplo el de la gestión de entidades privadas, el de las organizaciones internacionales, el de las ciencias sociales y el de las instituciones políticas tanto nacionales como regionales y locales. Sin embargo, no hay consenso en su significado. Asimismo, tal como sucede con el término "globalización", gobernanza es un término fuertemente ideologizado y polisémico.

En este trabajo no se ha pretendido aportar a la conceptualización de la gobernanza, sino hacer una revisión de la literatura sobre el tema. Se reúnen diversas definiciones del concepto gobernanza brindadas tanto por académicos como por organismos ocupados en la temática. Se detalla qué implica para ellos la gobernanza y cómo proponen llevarla a la práctica.

Se inicia el trabajo enunciando sintéticamente los orígenes del término y la evolución que el concepto ha tenido en los últimos cuarenta años. Se presentan distintas definiciones vigentes del concepto gobernanza, ofrecidas por diferentes autores según el ámbito, nivel o área de aplicación al que refieran. También se expone la diferencia entre gobernanza y otros términos a veces usados (a nuestro entender erróneamente) como sinónimo de ella: gobernanza y gobernabilidad.

Luego se desarrolla la concepción que en estos días se tiene de la gobernanza en los dos grandes ámbitos: la empresa y los asuntos públicos (ya sean estos a nivel local, nacional o supranacional). En el caso de lo público utilizamos algunos párrafos para describir qué se entiende por gobernabilidad y cómo a partir de la evidente brecha entre la gobernabilidad en la teoría y en la realidad es que se abre camino al concepto de gobernanza.

Como cierre nos permitimos plasmar algunas reflexiones que pudimos esbozar luego de todo el material consultado para realizar este trabajo.

Élites y desigualdad urbana: Segregación residencial de las clases altas en las grandes regiones metropolitanas españolas 1991 – 2010

Las clases altas residentes en las ciudades de Madrid y Barcelona, han sido pioneras en el proceso de desconcentración de las áreas metropolitanas y de colonización de enclaves suburbanos. Durante los últimos años, el área de influencia metropolitana de las grandes ciudades se ha ampliado, generando transformaciones en la morfología de la segregación elitista. Este proceso ha ocurrido en el contexto de un modelo de crecimiento particular -donde la construcción y las transformaciones territoriales jugaban un papel muy relevante-. En esta comunicación, se analizan los cambios en los patrones, morfologías y dinámicas de la segregación de las clases más altas en las regiones metropolitanas de Madrid y Barcelona.

La comunicación tiene un carácter eminentemente cuantitativo y emplea una operacionalización multicriterio de la segregación residencial, aunque los grandes grupos de ocupación tienen un papel destacado. Se presta también atención a las diferentes escalas en las que se produce la segregación de las clases altas (municipal e inframunicipal). Así, en la comunicación se analizan datos del censo 2001 estableciendo con precisión su morfología y evolución. Además, se exploran las posibilidades de su actualización a partir de los registros de la seguridad social, de las rentas medias municipales y de datos derivados del padrón continuo.

Esta comparación de la segregación de las clases altas en las principales metrópolis españolas, permite analizar hasta que punto las tendencias generales de convergencia entre las metrópolis tienen su correlato en una distribución diferencial de las élites; ponderar el papel que juegan las dinámicas de segregación interna y de desplazamiento hacia municipios elitizados de la periferia metropolitana en las estrategias de diferenciación residencial; y anticiparía indicios tanto sobre el papel que juega la segregación residencial elitista en la difusión urbana, como sobre su articulación respecto a los ejes de movilidad.

Agua, vulnerabilidad e injusticia ambiental en México

Asentada en una cuenca endorreica, la ciudad de México ha sufrido históricamente problemas relacionados con el agua (inundaciones, escasez, hundimiento) que, sin embargo, ha podido enfrentar gracias a su posición económica y política central en la escena nacional. Esta misma posición ha permitido la formación de un sistema altamente complejo y frágil de manejo ambiental, además de particularmente injusto. Tal injusticia se expresa dentro de la zona urbana en la forma de una desigual distribución de servicios y riesgos, como hacia el exterior, mediante procesos de extracción de recursos y transformación ambiental que vulneran los medios de vida de los habitantes de las cuatro cuencas involucradas en el sistema de abastecimiento y disposición de agua del que depende la ciudad y su zona metropolitana. A partir de una revisión de los desastres relacionados con el agua en los últimos cuarenta años, así como de las políticas y conflictos disparados por la creación y distribución de riesgos, el trabajo busca dar cuenta de la producción de una estructura de vulnerabilidad social cuyo rasgo principal es la exclusión sistemática de amplios sectores de la población en la toma de decisiones, y la aplicación de tecnologías monumentales que refuerzan estrategias de control que minan las condiciones para un mejor y más justo manejo ambiental, al tiempo que exacerbaban los riesgos que enfrenta la ciudad como un todo. Este análisis busca fundamentar la idea de que existe una relación indisoluble entre seguridad y justicia ambiental, por lo que la construcción de un sistema social y ambientalmente sostenible de gestión del agua tiene como condición necesaria la consideración de los derechos, demandas, prácticas y racionalidades de actores históricamente excluidos.

Les échelles de l'action métropolitaine en matière de lutte contre le changement climatique en France

L'engagement des métropoles françaises dans les politiques de mitigation et d'adaptation en réponse au changement climatique se décline à travers des plans climats territoriaux non contraignants qui présentent l'inconvénient de devoir s'articuler avec d'autres documents d'urbanismes conçus pour d'autres usages. Il s'ensuit un casse-tête administratif qui se complique en raison de la décentralisation qui confère des compétences élargies aux communes. Il s'ensuit qu'il est très difficile de s'entendre sur une stratégie commune à l'échelle des agglomérations en France. En dépit de ces difficultés, le mérite des plans territoriaux climatiques demeure. Il sert d'orientation générale pour différents acteurs à l'échelle d'un territoire. C'est cet enrôlement que nous souhaitons aborder à travers la théorie de l'acteur réseau. Alors que les principaux travaux sur l'action des métropoles en matière de changement climatique portent sur les échelles des politiques publiques et les outils dont disposent les métropoles, notre investigation se propose de compléter cette approche par les différents relais susceptibles de découpler ces politiques. Nous explorons les synergies que les métropoles sont susceptibles de générer à partir de la mobilisation des acteurs impliqués sur leur territoire. Ces alliés sont disponibles partout où de nouveaux marchés de l'emploi sont disponibles. Notre étude s'appuie sur le réseau des conseillers en environnement, réseau fort de 20 ans de pratiques et disséminé sur l'ensemble du territoire français. Les éco-conseillers conseillent les communes ainsi que l'ensemble de leurs partenaires publics et privés. Ils sont au contact des institutions publiques (comme l'éducation nationale et les centres hospitaliers universitaires), des acteurs privés (agriculteurs, petites et moyennes entreprises, etc.) et des organisations non gouvernementales comme les associations de citoyens volontaires du climat. L'élargissement de l'action métropolitaine à ces différents acteurs vise une cartographie des politiques de mitigation et d'adaptation au changement climat sous l'angle de la théorie de l'acteur réseau.

What's behind social and environmental risks?

What are the conceptual and practical significations of the social and environmental in current expressions like "social risks" and "environmental risks"? This question frames the conceptual and pragmatic exploration proposed in this communication. The empirical observation of social and environmental disasters shows that the representation of the collective involved in such disasters matters more than the nature of the perturbation at works inside the collective. Social disasters as environmental disasters as well affect humans and non-humans. Both cases are the result of the collapse of an inherited arrangement made out by humans and non-humans. Reversely, the language operates a tangible distinction and inflexion in the way the collectives represent themselves somewhere during the twentieth century. From the moment a new expression is available, it becomes necessary to choose between both existing expressions. The choices made by the collectives indicate how they represent themselves. Following this reasoning the difference between a social risk and an environmental risk steps first in the conscious that collectives have about their associations with non-humans and the networks they form with them. It is not a positive distinction. This proposition confirms the thesis of the symmetric anthropology according to which the "Moderns" think different from the others societies. They hide that they build associations with non-humans who commit them beyond what they identify as society. Once the Moderns have realized that their world is wider and more complex as imagined the real problems start. They have to learn to live in a world which seems suddenly and brutally open for entities the existence of which we had until then denied otherwise proclaimed that we contained them. Dealing with this new complexity starts with the evaluation of the inherited rules and norms through a new frame.

La gestion définit l'ordre dominant des communications dans les organisations. Qu'en est-il des communications lorsque les discours et les pratiques de gestion sont majoritairement inspirés d'approches critiques – c'est-à-dire d'approches se proposant comme alternative à l'ordre dominant? Sans entièrement répondre à cette question, cette communication présente une compréhension des dimensions normative, méthodologique ainsi que des effets de pratiques de gestions inspirées d'approches critiques dans diverses organisations publiques de santé brésiliennes. Notre analyse repose sur des données issues de trois recherches ethnographiques auprès de personnes impliquées dans la création et la cogestion d'espaces de communication organisationnelle critique. D'abord intégrées par le mouvement de la Réforme des institutions psychiatriques, ces pratiques de cogestion d'inspiration critique fondent aujourd'hui l'organisation des services de première ligne du Système public de santé (SUS) de plusieurs municipalités du Brésil. Les résultats de nos recherches relèvent que bien que ces pratiques reposent sur des finalités critiques – favoriser la démocratie institutionnelle et l'émancipation des sujets impliqués dans la cogestion (gestionnaires, professionnels, citoyens-usagers) – sur le plan méthodologique, elles utilisent les mêmes dispositifs participatifs mis de l'avant par les approches pragmatiques et utilitaires de la Nouvelle gestion publique. Cette indistinction méthodologique entre des pratiques de cogestion d'inspiration critique et d'autres d'inspiration néolibérale pose de nouveaux défis pour

Career mobility of anatomical pathologists from the public to private sector in KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa

The aim of this paper is to assess the reasons for and extent of the mobility of anatomical pathologists from the public to the private sectors. The literature on South Africa's health care workers is dominated by a focus on clinical practitioners. As a result, the work and careers of non-clinical medical specialists such as anatomical pathologists has been ignored. This paper represents the first study in South Africa into the careers of Anatomical pathologists. In 2011, in-depth interviews were conducted with 70% of the population of anatomical pathologists in Kwazulu-Natal. My fieldwork reveals that firstly Anatomical Pathologists are considered the invisible backbone of the health care system, remain in short supply nationally, and have preference to work in the private sector despite salaries being equitable between sectors. Secondly an examination of career pathing possibilities for these specialists in the public and private sectors reveals reasons for this mobility. These reasons include managerial styles, autonomy over career development, work flexibility, and greater long term financial rewards. Thirdly I contend that the nature of the work performed by anatomical pathologists requires their careers to be managed differently from clinical medical specialists. Fourthly I suggest that South African studies on medical doctors needs to distinguish between laboratory medical specialist and clinical medical specialists for more effective career policy interventions. Fifthly I suggest that the divide between public and private sectors with regard to anatomical pathologists is not useful and needs to be examined more critically. Finally I argue that South African industrial sociology, which has traditionally focused on work and occupations in the manufacturing sectors' needs to be more inclusive of the studies of professions and occupational groups in the services sector.

Skill, gender and race: Shaping the labour market for chemical and anatomical pathologists in KwaZulu-natal

The aim of this paper is to assess the ways in which skill, gender and race shape the labour market for anatomical pathologists and chemical pathologists in KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa. In 2011, in-depth interviews were conducted with 11 anatomical pathologists and 9 chemical pathologists in KZN. My first finding is that even though both specialities are an outcome of equivalent years of training, the diagnostic work of anatomical pathologists is dependent on diagnosis by 'eye'. The diagnostic work performed by chemical pathologists is more technologically dependent and less dependent on interpretation by 'eye'. New technologies have not deskilled the interpretive work of anatomical pathologists but are perceived to have deskilled the work of chemical pathologists. The value of interpretation by sight instead of machine is reflected in the higher salaries paid to anatomical pathologists. Secondly, the labour market for anatomical pathologists is dominated by men, whilst the labour market for chemical pathologists is dominated by women. The increasing role of technology in routinizing the work of chemical pathologists has resulted in the profession enjoying more working time flexibility. This is cited as an important reason by women for choice of the profession. Intersecting with skill and gender in shaping the labour market is race. African doctors do not view laboratory specialities as offering quick occupational returns. This is compounded by racism in the sector. This is an important contribution to understanding how skill, technology, gender and race intersect to form labour markets of highly skilled professionals.

Conflicto y solución de conflictos entre jóvenes. Diferencias y semejanzas de la relación cara a cara y en internet

Nuestra comunicación se basa en un estudio mediante cuestionario a jóvenes (13-18 años) de Madrid realizado en 2010. Hemos pretendido estudiar la percepción del conflicto y sus vías de solución desde la comparación de los conflictos en Internet con los conflictos cara a cara.

De los datos se pueden extraer algunas conclusiones provisionales. Los adolescentes están muy conectados: más de la mitad se conectan muchas o varias veces al día. Los jóvenes perciben muy poco control parental: en 3 de cada 4 casos los padres no preguntan ni controlan lo que sus hijos hacen en Internet. Los adolescentes perciben prácticamente igual la interacción cara a cara y la virtual, como medio para expresarse.

En cuanto a las posibilidades de conflicto, perciben como muy semejante Internet y la comunicación cara a cara para insultar: les resulta ligeramente más fácil en Internet. Hay más adolescentes que declaran haber insultado cara a cara que en Internet a amigos, conocidos, compañeros y familiares. Cuando se trata de insultar a desconocidos aparece ligeramente más fácil insultar en Internet.

El trabajo aporta datos para abrir una reflexión crítica sobre si las relaciones de los jóvenes a través de las redes sociales facilitan o impiden los conflictos y sus soluciones.

Es frecuente que los ciudadanos dispongan de un correo electrónico a través del cual hacer demandas a los responsables públicos o que los gobernantes faciliten un espacio en la web o en las redes sociales donde poder interactuar con los ciudadanos directamente. Las ventajas de estas herramientas son ampliamente comentadas por los responsables políticos cada vez que se inaugura uno de estos servicios.

Sin embargo, estas herramientas –incuestionablemente necesarias– pueden generar una desmovilización de las agrupaciones que canalizan, las quejas y generan grupos de ciudadanos que agrupados tienen más fuerza. Esta comunicación plantea el riesgo de que el desarrollo de la comunicación directa ciudadano-gobernante pueda generar una caída de los movimientos asociativos y, lejos de favorecer el empoderamiento de los grupos sociales, haga a los ciudadanos más vulnerables por dejarlos solos ante el poder. Estaríamos –en terminología de Robert Putnam– ante un nuevo déficit de capital social.

Biographical experience of women with cancer

The paper discusses results of multidisciplinary research project realized in Riga Stradins University in which sociological investigation is allocated an important role alongside medical, genetic and biological research. The sociological research tasks are to investigate changes in quality of life, psychological and social problems after diagnosis of breast cancer or hereditary genome mutation, choice of risk decreasing activities, evaluation of social support and other social aspects.

The analysis of biographical interviews with hereditary breast cancer gene carriers from different typological groups (different age, both healthy and ill with breast cancer) is part of this research. Diagnosis of breast cancer or inherited breast cancer gene is a life break essentially changing attitude to the body as a value, to the identity, to the life style. This life break brings women to reevaluation of the life and to turn to searching of causation in the past, by analyzing their place and their role in the past events. The informants seem to have found explanation of many personal problems and their present illness in their own attitudes to their body. In cases of oncological diseases or in cases of inherited gene mutation of breast cancer women search help and consolation in different religion streams, alternative medicine, psychological support, considering that positive sense could be the base for the recovery of the body. The sense is considered as an active factor shaping the individual and the total world.

"Bodies that matter": Analyzing biographies as embodiments of the discursive

In this paper, I will discuss biographical research from the perspective of sociology of body and embodiment. I will firstly show how the question of the meaning of bodies and the idea of embodied biographical knowledge emerged during the interviewing and analyzing process. Secondly, I will discuss with the help of case study vignettes and interview sequences the nexus of discourses and their different embodiments in biographical narrations. Thirdly, I pose the question what kind of theoretical challenges the notion of discursive embodiment poses to the method of biographical interviewing in particular and to the biographical analysis in general and what kind of new ways of researching, writing and presenting biographical research should be followed from this.

The modern migration policy of Russia: Problems and necessary directions of perfection

The Russian Federation has become one of the leading immigration receiving countries based on absolute number of immigrants. It is possible to identify two principal causes that determine immigration to Russia. The first is internal: the Russian economy has developed in a relatively successful way, demands for expanding the labour force have increased and relatives of Russians who formerly lived in the USSR are now living in CIS countries. The external cause of immigration to Russia lies in the fact that Russia has potent demographic resources nearby. China, India and the Central Asian states represent this potential. At present these countries are home to nearly half of the world's population. In this article the modern migratory situation in Russia is considered. The major factors defining migration are analyzed. The analysis of labor migration, educational migration, migration of compatriots, internal migration is given. Recommendations about perfection of a migratory policy in interests of demographic and social and economic development of Russia are offered.

Differences in leisure activities between older and younger Finns

As in many other industrialized societies, the proportion of the older population segments is constantly growing in Finland. We are currently witnessing strong generational differences regarding consumption and leisure activities between age groups. On one hand, younger population segments are increasingly spending their free time on the Internet and using the new information and communication technologies. On the other hand, there are more and more senior citizens who prefer spending their time on many of the traditional leisure activities such as reading, watching television and gardening. The aim of the paper is to provide an overview of the Finns leisure activities in the 2000s. We argue that a systematic comparison of leisure activities between younger and older population segments gives us significant information for understanding of some of the key features of the ageing societies. The empirical part of the article consists of the results of two nationally representative mail surveys conducted in 2010 and 2011. The first survey data (n=542) represent Finnish citizens aged 60 to 79. The second survey data (n=908) represent citizens aged 15 to 64. A total of 20 comparable leisure activity items were used in both of the survey questionnaires. In the analysis, we take a look at the generality of different leisure-time activities between age groups. We also ask whether or not the respondents' leisure-time interests are connected to other socio-demographic characteristics. The results indicate that, on average, Finnish seniors have many leisure activities when compared to some of the other age groups. However, it also seems that participation in certain leisure activities tend to decline as people grow older.

Disincorporation and belief crisis on officership: The case of the Military Police Academy of Ceará

This paper discusses the deinstitutionalization of the Military Police Academy ('APM', from its original acronym) General Edgard Facó and its effects over the disincorporation of a military habitus within the training of Military Police ('PM') officers in state of Ceará, in Northeastern Brazil. For over decades (1929-2008), the APM was responsible for framing a hexis of the body for cadets through rituals of military institutions. The APM shut-down in 2008 soon revealed a belief crisis on this military model of internal social control, which affects the reproduction of personnel and officers as a corporate group. This analysis is based on the data from fieldwork research the authors conducted between the years of 1998 and 2000, furthermore new source documents were added, as the research was resumed in 2010, gathering newspaper stories and articles and interviews conducted after the school was closed, in order to recover the social memory of a decade (1998-2008).

Gender, sexuality, society/culture and HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa: The case of Nigeria

Sexual activity poses great risks for the reproductive health of people particularly where sex education programmes are not widely available. In sub-Saharan Africa, the advent of HIV/AIDS epidemic has heightened these risks especially amongst youths and women. In Nigeria for example, the prevalent rate is 4.5% and 35% of the infected are youths, while 68% are women. In the absence of sex education programmes, the Africans understanding of their gender and sexuality remain dominated by societal/cultural conceptions of gender and sexuality which place the male over the female in power relations. The unequal power balance in gender relations that favours men, translates into an unequal power balance in heterosexual interactions, in which male pleasure surpasses female pleasures and men have greater control than women over when, where, and how sex takes place. The focus of this paper therefore is to identify and discuss the different ways in which the imbalance in power between women and men in gender relations narrows women's sexual independence and expands male sexual freedom, thereby increasing women's risk and vulnerability to HIV/AIDS in a sub-Saharan African Country, Nigeria.

Universal declaration of human rights and cultural diversity in Nigeria

This paper seeks to assess the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) vis-à-vis the cultural diversity in Nigeria. This will be done at the macro-level; meaning that the provisions of the UDHR will be examined as they relate to rights of Nigerians as peoples rather than as individuals. The paper will therefore begin by examining critically the extent to which the UDHR is universal and relevant to rights of Nigerians as peoples. In view of this it becomes imperative for the paper to first of all identify the genuine rights of Nigerians as culturally diverse groups. The paper will do so by locating Nigeria historically within Africa and the globe. If the identified genuine rights of Nigerians are not accounted for in the UDHR, where are they accounted for? Are they accounted for in for examples the African Charter on Human and Peoples Rights, 1958, or the Nigerian Constitutions? The paper will conclude with the discussion of the extent to which Nigerians enjoy the identified genuine rights of Nigerians as peoples. This will be done vis-à-vis the Nigerian political and socio-economic context of Nigeria.

Viejos pero buenos barrios populares: Cuando la antigüedad no es decadencia, de gonzalo caceres y francisco sabatini

La ponencia analizará el desafío urbano que enfrentan muchos barrios populares auto-producidos desde hace medio siglo en las ciudades chilenas. ¿Cuál desafío? Fraseado en una pregunta general: ¿De qué modo han capitalizado los barrios populares pericentrales la cambiante geografía de oportunidad de la ciudad? Según su situación de segregación residencial, y la mutación de ésta a través de los nacientes procesos de gentrificación y otros factores, hay nuevas pero desiguales posibilidades de progreso material, de acceso al trabajo y los servicios, o de movilidad residencial. El artículo hará mención de experiencias donde se ha mantenido y hasta reforzado la identidad barrial pese a la relocalización de nuevos residentes de ingresos superiores al promedio. Los barrios populares suelen ser objeto de severo cuestionamiento. Incluso cuando han conseguido una afiada integración morfológica, la sospecha respecto a la idoneidad ética de sus habitantes se reproduce bajo la forma del prejuicio. De así necesitarlo, la sociedad urbana puede manufacturar sus preconcepciones hasta convertirlas en estigma territorial. Cuando se produce dicha transición, es muy probable que los fenómenos de "guetización" sean difíciles de evitar. A diferencia de lo que piensan muchos renovadores urbanos que confunden desarrollo parsimonioso con obsolescencia inexorable, los barrios populares son mucho más que un recipiente inmovilizado, una fotografía envejecida o una historia pasiva. La planificación urbana aparece desafiada para controlar los procesos expulsivos que muchas gentrificaciones parecieran incoar. Forjar una ciudad heterogénea pero cohesionada no es una utopía. Un camino para formar una nueva geografía social es la "gentrificación sin expulsión".

El trabajo resume las principales conclusiones de mi tesis de maestría. El tema general es la reforma estructural del sector de hidrocarburos en Argentina implementada entre 1989 y 2001, mediante la desregulación del mercado y la privatización de la empresa estatal Yacimientos Petrolíferos Fiscales (YPF).

Desde la perspectiva de la Ecología Política se analizó el modo en que se produjo la transición de la concepción del petróleo y gas como "recursos estratégicos" hacia su consideración como simples mercancías exportables o commodities. La primera acepción formaba parte del acervo de la ideología del nacionalismo petrolero y su predominio durante décadas se correspondía con un determinado régimen de acumulación capitalista a escala nacional, denominado industrialización por sustitución de importaciones, y una forma de Estado interventor/productor, que controlaba la actividad a través de YPF.

A partir de la dictadura cívico-militar de 1976, ese régimen fue desmontado a favor de un patrón de valorización financiera y primarización de la economía, marcando el inicio de la hegemonía neoliberal a nivel nacional. Su consolidación a través del gobierno de Carlos Menem significó el desplazamiento definitivo del nacionalismo petrolero y desde el Estado se operó el pasaje discursivo hacia la mercantilización del petróleo y gas.

Por tanto, el objetivo general es comprender de qué manera se realizó la transformación de la concepción predominante de los hidrocarburos durante la desregulación y privatización de la actividad petrolera. A tal fin, utilizamos una metodología cualitativa con el respaldo de otras investigaciones de tipo cuantitativas que dieron cuenta de aquella transformación. En términos específicos, fueron indagadas tanto las representaciones de los principales actores políticos y privados, así como las valoraciones alternativas de actores opositores con el fin de evaluar el grado de conflictividad en el proceso de imposición de la representación mercantil.

Education, knowledge and democracy: taking freire and bourdieu to the Moroccan academic field

Building on Freire's thinking of critical pedagogy and Bourdieu's theory of social reproduction the aim of this paper is to shed lights on the meaning of democracy, knowledge and education for Moroccan students from different social classes and academic disciplines on the one hand, and to assess their cultural and social awareness of the ongoing development policy and global issues, on the other.

Because of the demand for skilled manpower after the independence the first and second educated generations were integrated almost automatically in labour market of State institutions and its subsidiaries. Lately in the course of the last two decades or so this market has become saturated or very selective. Many students from lower classes with modest educational cultural capital with poor training and skills find themselves unemployed especially in some fields of social sciences, humanities and even national sciences (e.g. biology).

As it can be expected the middle class and moneyed stratum do not experience this process in the same way. In order to preserve their distinction and power (hegemony), they use their position and economic disposition by enrolling their offspring in the best educational institutions (e.g. private or foreign French, Spanish or American schools) instead of the overcrowded, poorly staffed and pedagogically inefficient public Moroccan universities. The social reproduction is directly or indirectly is assured among the elite. It goes without saying that this state of affairs gives rise to a deep malaise in Moroccan society and provokes feeling of resentment and disillusion and raise an awareness of the meaning of democracy and knowledge among the students. Although this study concentrates empirically on Moroccan society it will emphasise issues that are thematically common to all Southern Mediterranean countries.

Individuals vs parties: Changes in the political cultures of Italian younger politicians

In the last few decades the political situation in Italy has gone through deep changes. As far as younger generations are concerned, if during the 80's Italian studies (Cavalli et al.) registered a drop in youth attention towards politics and a renewed evaluation of the private sphere, in the 90's and the first years of the new Millennium what seems to be a deep process of changes has started to take place. Sociologists have started to wonder whether young people are retreating from politics or if they are simply activating new forms of participation. The paper will analyze political attitudes and values both of young politicians and of young people who have not chosen politics as an important part of their lives. The first results show us that the national political bribe scandal (Tangentopoli) in the early '90's, the Berlin wall crack, and the new International and Italian political asset has had a deep impact on both groups and on both political sides, making us speak of a generational bond (Mannheim).

Since the 90's younger generations have started to look at politics with growing contempt. Even those who have chosen politics as an important part of their lives and to candidate themselves, seem distant from political parties. The political socialization is growingly carried out by agencies other than parties or trade unions. We will analyze the implications and effects of this new political culture on the government of local institutions.

The glocality of political cultures

As Meyrowitz pointed out back in 1985 and again twenty years later (2005), every experience is eminently local. Nonetheless, new information technologies change our perception of time and space. Traditionally, the forming of political identities and cultures passed through local practices and face to face debates. But with the development of the mass media and Computer Mediated Communication (CMC), every local experience or indeed, political issue, can be shared at a local, national and transnational level, as have efficaciously pointed out the recent video's and blogs from Iranian, Libyan and Egyptian rebels.

Although participation through CMC does not always/often entail greater involvement of citizens in the decision making process, mass media and CMC strongly influence the ways citizens perceive the power in charge, reduce its "sacredness" and promote new actors proposing new issues for the local as much as the global political agenda. Making citizens feel they too, can be political actors. Influencing what they know, what they feel and how they evaluate politics: the three dimensions of a political culture, according to the classic Almond and Verba theorization. Allowing local, national, transnational political cultures to meet and confront. In short, new information technologies contribute to the formation of new interest groups, lobbies, activists, development of ideas and projects that can be local as much as global (Sassen 2008), while at a more general level, help the development of a more global public opinion exercising its influence on local, national and transnational political institutions, working at the making of a down-top agenda. So, while global economic dynamics weaken the decision capacities of governments within the nation-states (Beck, 1999), this enlargement in the geography of civil society seems to represent the growth of a global public sphere (Habermas). A slow and uncertain process, though.

"Because I do not want to be a burden – also beyond my death" – Results of a qualitative interview study on funeral decisions

To arrange the funeral for a deceased relative has been a traditional task of family members. However, today more and more elderly organize their burial matters on their own. Furthermore, they increasingly choose an anonymous grave, which means a burial in a community grave on a cemetery without any individual inscriptions in most cases.

Recent studies find that the absolute number and the share of anonymous burials are strongly increasing: Today, more than half of all funerals on cemeteries are held anonymously in some German regions. Therefore the questions arise, why this takes place and which motivations drive the individual decision for an anonymous burial.

In this study, guideline oriented interviews with people who want to get buried anonymously have been conducted in this study. First analysis reveal very interesting aspects and patterns of elderly's decision making: They are often afraid of getting a burden for their family – especially if problem of grave care arises because this often means lots of work for the next-of-kin in Germany, especially when relatives are geographically dispersed. So the decision for an anonymous grave is regarded as a strategy for relieving the next-of-kin from the duty of grave maintenance. However, it also often comes to conflicts within the family about the funeral decision when the relatives prefer a traditional grave as a place to mourn. So why do elderly people decide for an anonymous grave? And what does this decision imply for the role of older people within the family? By the qualitative interviews it is possible to understand the decision-making-process of the individual more deeply and thereby to answer these questions.

Silent narratives: Exclusion in the biographical research process

Biographical narrative methods are increasingly popular ways of understanding both personal and public identities in sociological research. Yet, fundamental questions about the informant that the biographical process favours and the informant who is excluded by the biographical process are not always adequately addressed. Drawing on narrative interviews in two contrasting contexts with a wide range of informants, this paper examines the relationship between biographical understandings of selfhood/identity and attitudes towards a range of differences including those of gender, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation. Exploring the context of the informants' childhood and their earliest memories of recognising someone as 'different' from them allows for deeper understanding of who has been recognised as the 'self' and how this shifting and intersectional self is reflexively articulated at different points in the life course. The study reveals important differences in the ways that various prejudices and discriminatory attitudes towards a range of 'others' are justified through personal narratives of exclusion and discrimination. However, a comparison of the narratives of informants living in Poland with those living in the UK revealed an important caveat which exposes how the biographical process itself privileges certain subjects (and experiences of exclusion) over others. Whereas those interviewed in the UK found a certain comfort in articulating their biographical histories, the same methods generated anxiety from many of the Polish informants. The process of biographical storytelling is frequently held up as a universal and egalitarian way of understanding how people make sense of their identities. Yet the employment of alternative methods to explore the discomfort generated by the telling of life stories in Poland raises questions around the ethics of biographical evocation and discursive and methodological privileging in ways which are not always recognised in scholarship around biographical processes.

The attack on Latina/o human rights in the United States: Theoretical and methodological challenges

Latina/os are the fastest growing racial/ethnic group in the United States. The Latino population has more than tripled in the last three decades. They now account for one of every two persons added to the U.S. population. Further, it is projected that the Latina/o share of the U.S. population will increase from 16% in 2010 to 30% in 2050 while that of the white population will decline from 65% to 46%. It is this divergent demographic future that has led to the rise of policy initiatives to halt Latina/o immigration and to apprehend and deport undocumented Latina/os.

This increasingly hostile environment has threatened Latina/o basic human rights. They are viewed as an invading threat that does not belong in this country. The antagonism against Latina/os is driven by racism and a fear that they are encroaching on the comfortable space where whites have been advantaged due to their whiteness.

Despite attacks on Latina/o basic human rights in the U.S., there is an absence of human rights concerns in research on Latina/os. This dearth reflects the U.S. practice of granting rights on the basis of citizenship rather than on the mere basis of being a human being. Nonetheless, attention to human rights issues affecting Latina/os has increased after 2001 with the heightened criminalization of immigrants and militarization of the border.

This paper has several goals. First, we provide an overview of the theoretical perspectives and sociological toolkits that scholars have employed in the study of Latina/os. Second, we provide the historical context in which whiteness became an asset for U.S. citizenship along with the racialization of Latina/os. Third, we overview the contemporary context in which Latina/os live. Finally, we conclude with a discussion of the sociology of Latina/os and its potential linkage to a human rights perspective.

The blind flâneur

It is not without good reason that both, sighted and blind Flâneurs, carry a cane. Like Walter Benjamin has elaborated, strolling people do not have a defined destination. Strolling is an equivalent to faineance, to just walking around with a distance to people and things. And in order not to lose contact to the ground completely, the Flâneur uses his cane.

So the sighted Flâneur and the blind Flâneur share an identical situation. However, they clearly differ in their form of appearance.

For a blind flâneur, urban space is constituted through a blind way of walking, the blind style of perception. Soundscapes, smellscapes and the footing in the ground open The city as a landscape close to the body as an instrument of sensually enjoying and perceptually controlling the environment.

The sighted Flâneur enquires on the encountered pedestrians' physiognomies visually.

the blind Flâneur enquires on steps and voices. Brief conversations with strangers are important.

Benjamin has described, how the sighted flâneur walks incognito amidst the anonymous crowd in order to observe others more easily. Most of the time he is hidden in the crowd and for this reason becomes a sort of invisible man. This gives him a certain feeling of being invincible.

In contrast, the Blind Flâneur is not invincible. The crowd is invisible for him. The blindman's cane makes visible.

Following Simmel, the sighted Flâneur represents a typical product of modern individualism. He remains invisible and silent.

In contrast to this, the Blind Flâneur occasionally becomes a speaker. Strolling is less a game of being visible or invisible but more of audibility and speech. His individuality is aimed at the exchange with strangers.

Is this a new form of individualism?

An interactive mode of individualism that could characterize modern visualism too?

Clase política en Argentina

En este trabajo el autor aborda una serie de cuestiones teóricas y metodológicas relativas a una investigación empírica sobre clase política y profesionalización en Argentina. Por clase política se está haciendo referencia aquí no tanto a un concepto teórico, sino a una corriente de investigación de sociología política que estudia sistemáticamente las carreras políticas del personal parlamentario, o más en general, del personal electo (diputados, senadores, gobernadores etc.). Importantes investigaciones a partir de la Segunda Guerra Mundial demostraron que, más allá de ciertos casos particulares, en Europa Occidental el tipo de partido burocrático de masas modeló el perfil profesional de los electos. Sus principales características son la existencia de una burocracia centralizada, pautas de validez universal para el reclutamiento político y la apelación a una subcultura política (socialismo, catolicismo, liberalismo, etc.). En Argentina, y en general en América Latina, los partidos históricamente han carecido de burocracias centralizadas producto, por un lado, a la presencia de liderazgos caudillistas poco propensos a favorecer pautas institucionales, y por el otro, a la autonomía de las entidades territoriales. Conforme a estas últimas características, en Argentina se pueden identificar tres tipos de perfiles profesionales de políticos: a) los políticos de aparato, cuya carrera sigue pasando principalmente por las estructuras locales de los dos principales partidos con arraigo nacional (el Justicialismo y el Radicalismo); b) los políticos provinciales, cuya carrera se restringe al ámbito provincial y; c) los políticos independientes, que es la más novedosa y se caracteriza por la apelación al público general, y carecen de soporte de estructuras partidarias estables. El autor se concentrará principalmente en este último perfil profesional, el cual en los últimos años creció notablemente como consecuencia de la desarticulación del sistema político tras la crisis del 2001.

Niñez, violencia y exclusión en los medios gráficos

Este trabajo presenta parte de los resultados de una investigación sobre la construcción de los discursos acerca de las violencias en el ámbito escolar en los medios gráficos, y sus efectos sobre la doxa criminalizante. Los modos en que la prensa escrita construye la nominación violencia escolar como parte de una agenda mediática no son meros instrumentos de conocimiento sino que generan efectos de realidad: produciendo y reproduciendo representaciones e imágenes sobre la escuela y los sujetos que la habitan.

Desde una perspectiva disciplinaria de la Sociología de la Educación y a través de una trama teórico-empírica, se procura conocer cómo se construyen los discursos en una agenda mediática donde las notas sobre Violencia y Escuela predominan, mientras que las de Mortalidad Infantil o Situación de Calle son escasas. Las fuentes oficiales suenan hegemónicas frente a las voces de la sociedad civil y la de los propios niños y niñas. Las crónicas relegan a las investigaciones y el uso de términos peyorativos hacia los niños – principalmente menor- se ve muy arraigado.

En base a la recopilación y categorización de las noticias de medios gráficos de La Plata, se han analizado los siguientes ejes: la forma de presentar a la niñez y juventud, el reconocimiento de la de los derechos plenos de la niñez y la adolescencia, la contextualización de la noticia, el uso de fuentes, entre otros.

Los medios de comunicación transmiten información, pero también producen imágenes y prácticas cargadas de representaciones estigmatizantes que permanecen ocultos. Por lo cual es relevante el propósito de este análisis para edificar una alternativa teórica y empírica frente a las visiones hegemónicas judicializantes y estereotipadas sobre la infancia y la juventud.

Global publishers? New skills, practices and representations of publishers as opposed to a global publishing industry

Argentina's publishing industry has undergone profound changes since the 1990's. In particular, the configuration of the publishing field has changed by the acquisition of the publishing companies by transnational corporations. In parallel, the advent of the Internet and digitization has caused a number of changes in modes of production, marketing, distributing and consuming books. In this paper we analyze the characteristics of the "Global publishers," meaning that the new editors should deploy a range of skills and practices that distinguish them from older editors. Case analysis will take as publishers Siglo XXI, Eterna Cadencia and Editorial Funesiana, as representatives of three different editorial types. Our goal is to analyze the paths and actions of editors to observe how they manage an editorial venture, considering the changes that the emergence of information technologies and communication imposed.

Social investment, children's rights and neo-liberal policy: Balancing competing notions of the child in early intervention activities in the East Kimberley, Western Australia

In Australia, as elsewhere in the developed world, neo-liberal governments have turned to social investment in human capital (Giddens 1998), rather than direct provision of economic maintenance, to address inter-generational poverty. Since 2000 the Australian federal government has funded a Stronger Families and Communities Strategy through a competitive contracting regime preferentially to non-government organisations partnering with local community organisations to provide a range of early intervention activities designed to ameliorate disadvantage among isolated families (Kenny, 2002). Since 2005 in the East Kimberley region of Western Australia this has included playgroups and centre-based early learning and care, family support services, and arts-based activities for a largely Indigenous Australian population. Save the Children Australia (SCA) has been the facilitating partner for these activities with community partners including Indigenous community organisations, health services, and councils. This government investment in the early years has been accompanied by increasing regulation of children and parents, culminating in policies linking welfare benefits to school attendance in some regions. These policies raise questions about the rights of children and their families, in particular the positioning of children; as 'beings' in the present or 'becomings' in which children are considered "a-social, not-yet-social, in the process of becoming social and therefore in need of being made social" (Alanen, 2004:3) as increasing focus is placed on children's education and employment futures. Save the Children has established a strong international reputation as an advocate for children's rights and asserts its aim "...to give every child a safe and happy childhood". In this paper, collaboration between university researchers who have evaluated the East Kimberley activities for almost six years and SCA staff with detailed knowledge of the activities, we review SCA's struggle to meet the contractual obligations of government, whilst blending good community development principles and the rights of the child.

The development of knowledge and technology transfer in Russia: Challenges and opportunities

The increasing role of knowledge and technology modernization of the economy, together with the increased speed of trends and mechanisms of S&T activities are the major vectors causing radical shifts in Russian economy. These were predetermined by general requirements of development of the information society in which new knowledge and technologies led to increasing competitiveness and become key factors of economic growth and innovation activity. Patents being at the same time a form of presenting knowledge which is commercially significant for innovation activity and a unique source of technological information allow measuring, analyzing and evaluating economic performance and, as a result, rendering more valid decisions.

While patent data demonstrate there were no substantial changes in S&T activities, commercialization of technologies and all the more tech catching-up in Russia happened at a faster pace, allowing for economic growth and increase of R&D financing in the pre-crisis decade. As for S&T activities and commercialization of knowledge and technologies in Russia these areas developed independently. Separate approaches to problems of stimulation of IP creation, on the one side, constitute major hamper stones for both developments. This causes isolate processes of development of knowledge and new technologies from the real requirements of manufacturing. IP are generally created not for specific user but for an abstract one and ultimately stay unclaimed both for production and market use. More over the vast majority of R&D results in the country are still created by research organizations and higher education institutions incorporated as state-owned federal-level institutions whose rights and responsibilities are defined independently and are not subject to civil laws and budgetary restrictions.

The presentation will show key issues, identifying by statistical analysis. Measures and mechanisms of development of knowledge transfer in Russia will also be specified.

Student perceptions of the "just world" of the school: Impact on future career and civic behaviors

Dispositions and motivations toward future adult life are crystalized during adolescence, and one of the key agents in this process is student experiences in the school. Adolescent students can be very sensitive to the differential treatments of teachers toward them and their fellow students, particularly with respect to fairness and justice. In many respects, their perceptions of the way adult society works is influenced by the way their school and classroom work. To this extent, fairness and justice in classrooms is comparable to a civics "hidden curriculum". Using the data from the Longitudinal Study of Australian Youth (LSAY), this paper analyzes the school and classroom justice perceptions of the 1998 Year 9 cohort of a representative national sample of students (N= 9289) and the extent to which these perceptions uniquely affect civic behavioral dispositions (such as trusting government, volunteering and political engagement), future university attendance, and entry into the job market by 2008. The justice scale includes seven items relating to fairness in grade allocation, teacher attention giving, teacher listening, and student feelings of comfort and security. The importance and implications of perceptions of fairness and justice in school contexts is discussed with respect to future individual level attainments and civic behaviors, and the impact of these justice perceptions on future civil society.

"Göçmen Konutları": The wealthy ghettos of the metropolis

During Zhivkov regime, the assimilation policy of Bulgaria resulted in the expulsion of about 360.000 Turks from the country in 1989. Those people of Turkish origin were welcome by the republic, being offered residence in different parts of the country or being allowed to settle down with relatives who had immigrated before 1989 and witnessing the construction of satellite towns in metropolitan cities like İstanbul. But this was not the case for their Turkish neighbours, which forced them to dwell in those satellite towns or turn back to Bulgaria immediately after the fall of Zhivkov regime and the policy change of the government. As the metropolitan cities keep growing immensely in population, new satellite towns have been built around those immigrant towns and the satellite towns of the Turkish immigrants from Bulgaria have turned out to be ghettos for the residents of the surrounding satellite towns. How have the immigrants adapted and been adapting themselves to the Turkish republican way of life? How did they come together once more in those satellite towns and how did this gathering affect their experiences of Turkey? How do they cope with the experience a ghetto life in satellite towns? The answers to these questions are to be found in an ethnographic field research among the immigrants residing in the "Göçmen Konutları" site in Başakşehir-İstanbul and the data to be presented in this paper has been collected among both the immigrant groups and the "indigenous" groups, as the immigrant groups call them, residing in this area.

Participación ciudadana móvil en jóvenes en condición vulnerable en Colombia

Esta ponencia espera explorar el grado de apropiación y el modelo de participación ciudadana, a través de la telefonía celular, en los jóvenes en condición de vulnerabilidad, registrados en el Sistema de identificación de beneficiarios potenciales para los programas sociales (Sisben) en los niveles 1 y 2, habitantes de Colombia. Para tal fin, se aplicaron, en el primer trimestre de 2010, 383 encuestas aplicadas en el Distrito de Barranquilla (Colombia), los cuales ayudaron a la ponderación de los resultados para toda Colombia, a partir de los registros existentes en el SISBEN de la población de estudio a nivel nacional. Los resultados que se esperan exponer indican que a pesar de que gran parte de estos jóvenes están en posesión y hacen un uso personal de teléfonos móviles, la participación social y relación con organizaciones sociales es incipiente. Se concluye explicando que la participación se da aún en escenarios tradicionales y que el modelo comunicativo predominante entre los jóvenes vulnerables es el de receptor pasivo.

La presente propuesta de ponencia, parte del trabajo iniciado en 2011 "Participación y relaciones sociales desde los líderes de opinión online de Twitter en América Latina y Medio Oriente", realizado por los proponentes, desde la Universidad del Norte. En él se busca analizar como es construida la participación y las relaciones sociales entre los usuarios Top20, más vistos en los países seleccionados como caso de estudio en América Latina y Medio Oriente. Al partir esta propuesta de un trabajo ya iniciado en 2010, la hipótesis central que parte esta propuesta es que "las redes sociales virtuales están incidiendo en la promoción de nuevos movimientos sociales, a partir de la generación de un nuevo modelo de participación y relaciones sociales desde estos escenarios virtuales". Esta propuesta parte, como resultado de la búsqueda de escenarios académicos que permitiesen actualizar y extender los resultados obtenidos en el proyecto "Participación y relaciones sociales desde los líderes de opinión online de Twitter en Colombia, Venezuela e Irán", realizado en 2010, en el que se confirma el modelo de flujo de comunicación propuesto por Jensen, en el que la formación de nuevos líderes de opinión online parece estar condicionados por aspectos ajenos a los avances TIC.

The ideas of God, good and evil in the refigured yoga practices in metropolitan area of Buenos Aires City (Argentina)

Yoga is a widespread therapeutic option; it is the most popular among the oriental rooted medicines. Is accepted and recommended by biomedical doctors like a complementary medicine. Currently, in a context of alternatives therapies offer, yoga appears like one of the disciplines which certain individual uses at least once in their ways of health search. The variety of options, cost and modality of the practice, the appropriation of dissimilar groups, the proposal of a delicate physical exercise, the compatibility that users find between their system of beliefs and the proposals of this discipline with the possibility of enjoying their benefits without adopting a new life-style, has positioned the practice of yoga as a popular choice and possible way of initiation in other searches associated to the context of the New Age. From the point of view of the social actors, yoga is understood as a medicine that includes very diverse practices. The process of appropriation of the Eastern practices, has implied a phenomenon of re-meaning of the main concepts and Eastern structures of thought - aura, chakra, atman, karma, dharma- in terms of values, categories and western experiences of the religions and philosophical currents, those that add essential dichotomies to these conceptions like good and evil, sin and punishment, spiritual and material, radically transforming the Eastern knowledge. In this opportunity, our interests focuses on investigate the slight knowledge of God, Good and Evil, that emerge from such appropriation processes that cross the yoga practices, conceiving it like a totality, in the context of the alternative practices and the phenomena of New Age. The present paper is based on field work's material from extensive and open interviews to users and specialists of yoga in Buenos Aires, as well as from observation and participant observation in different yoga's centers in period 2003-2010.

Living between two societies: Japanese women's experience in China

Economic relations between China and Japan have been growing since the 1980s, and an increasing number of Japanese are now going to China in search of a larger market. We tend to regard men as the primary migrant, but a number of women are going abroad for various reasons. In Japan, women are expected to marry a breadwinning husband, concentrate on domestic chores, and care for children. The strict gender division in workplaces and families has made them go abroad, recently to China.

Based on my own research since the mid-1990s, this study examines Japanese women migrants' sense of achievement and their anxieties about the future. They quit their jobs in Japan after working for a few years and found more-satisfying positions intermediate between Japan and China at Japan-related companies in Chinese big cities.

Many of them strongly intended to return to Japan before turning thirty, believing that being any older would make it more difficult to find a job and to marry. However, their stays in China tended to be longer than expected. Growing older, they had to cope with their sense of instability from living abroad caused by, for example, their anxiety for the future, their lack of social security, and their guilt at having abandoned their aged parents at home.

Some of them married local Chinese men and decided to stay in China for a while. However, they felt it became more difficult to return to Japan with a family, and they worried about their children's education and their own lives after retirement. This study also discusses how female Japanese migrants negotiate these problems and share their information among friends, who have the similar situations. That's why they eagerly make friends in a graduates' association, in children's schools, or in the neighborhood to create a network.

Professions, democracy and marginality: Orthodox medicine and complementary and alternative medicine

This paper considers how far professional groups in modern liberal democratic societies themselves form democracies, particularly in relation to groups of practitioners defined as at the margins of orthodoxy. It is illustrated with particular reference to health care - and specifically the position of practitioners of complementary and alternative medicine in the professional pecking order. The ideology of professions is typically that they are collegial groups, consisting of communities of equals serving the public good. However, it is argued that persisting hierarchies of income, status and power both within and between professions suggest that such groups may be operating in an undemocratic manner - as epitomised by the case of health care in the Anglo-American context. This is exemplified most starkly by the relationship between orthodox medicine and marginal health professional groups at the edges of orthodoxy. An analysis of the group interests involved from a neo-Weberian perspective indicates that professions may be far from democracies when it comes to decision making - and also raises issues regarding the extent to which professions serve the public interest.

Temporary labour migrants' experiences of working conditions and social protection in Finland

Finnish immigration policy was quite restrictive until the 1990s. Nevertheless, immigration policy has been loosened up and since then, and immigration to Finland has been on the increase during the last two decades. Furthermore, temporary labour migration has accumulated lately. In this new situation different institutional stakeholders have expressed diverse standpoints. For employers -both on the national and the transnational level - the opening up national labour markets has entailed new possibilities of making profit. Some trade unions have raised concern of social dumping of working conditions by the use of migrant workers -especially by migrants staying only short periods in Finland. The role of the state is more ambivalent than that of employers/trade unions. A best case scenario is a "triple win situation" in which the host country, the sending country, and the temporary labour migrant benefits from the process.

In this paper the focus is on the temporary migrants' experience of working in Finland. The results show that temporary migrants face particular problems regarding working conditions and access to social protection. Information of recruitment, working rights, the Finnish taxation system, and of the Finnish social security rarely reaches the labour migrants. This is partly due to migrants' lack of Finland-specific knowledge but also due to their weak bargaining position in relation to the employer. However, working in Finland is a way of raising living standards for migrants coming from countries with lower wages such as Russia or Estonia.

Our data consists of 50 semi-structured interviews conducted among cleaners, bus drivers, and seasonal agricultural workers. We have also conducted virtual ethnography by analysing Internet-forums where migrants discuss work related issues. Additional data comprises of background interviews among different societal actors and court decisions of cases where temporary migrants' rights have been undermined.

A paradoxical reconciliation: The headscarf issue as a search for social justice and democratization

The number of women who prefer to cover their heads in the public sphere has dramatically increased in the last two decades in Turkey while also both the meaning and the style of wearing a headscarf have significantly multiplied. It is no longer just a matter of piety, nor does it constitute a strong challenge to the secular regime, but it continues to be a matter of democratization, social justice and Islamic accommodation. This paper examines how and why wearing a headscarf continues to be a fault-line between the ideals of democratization and the republican project of modernization. The former promised the entailment of the individual freedom of expression, whereas the latter gave priority to the secularization of the public sphere before anything else. Considering explicit and implicit reflections of the headscarf controversy on women's social position in the society, it focuses on the questions of women's agency, representation and civil rights in the face of the emergence of diverse women's identities sharing similar demands for freedom of expression but having different understandings of women's rights and equality.

The enactment of anger in the sandal divination among the Turkana, pastoralist of northwestern Kenya

This paper aims to discuss the socio-cultural functions of emotion both as an index of memories and as a resource of ethics, presenting a case study of the sandal divination among the Turkana, pastoralist in northwestern Kenya.

The Turkana regard the anger (angoit) for a dangerous emotion causing misfortunes or calamities. They would visit a sandal diviner, sensing the anger of adversaries behind their unusual experiences. A diviner throws a set of sandals on the hide, asking questions and reads the configuration of sandals as the answers. Sandals lead a client to evoke the memories of conflicts with familiar persons: friends, family members, kin or affine. A client finally specifies whom he offended. Then, he begins to narrate and enact the episodes accusing of the adversary's offense; "it was I that got angry". This paper focused on the enactment of the conflicts with the adversary in the familiar relationship. We found the enactment of episodes in twenty-four divinations out of fifty-eight by the video analysis. A client finally came to recognize both himself and adversaries were mutually in anger. The results of a divination were transmitted to the adversary family, for a diviner advised a ritual of reconciliation done by both sides. The cognition of the mutual anger made it possible to inhibit acting out of aggression and live together with anger.

The anger in the divination enables the Turkana to scan familiar relationships, to evoke the conflictual memories with specific others and to take an action for maintenance. It is the embodiment of social relationship. The linkage between emotion and ethics has developed according to the Turkana nomadic life of high mobility in the wide semi-desert area. We proceed to a comparative study among societies of different life forms.

Social-environmental responsibility: State, market and work in the sucroalcooleiro sector of the ribeirão preto/SP region

Currently, Brazil is characterized as one of the largest producers of sugar and alcohol in the world. The 2008/2009 crop production reached 572.64 million tons of sugarcane. The sector in the region of Ribeirão Preto / SP, has the most developed forms of technology and organization of production, and is a center of national ethanol production. The restructuring process initiated in the 1990s has brought to rural workers precarious working conditions, with high rates of productivity, combined with unemployment of workers. We emphasize the intensive mechanization of cane cutting, and from the year 2000, changes in ways of organizing production, caused by debates about environmental crisis, the search for alternative energy sources and sustainable development. In this sense, the sector is to incorporate environmental responsibility programs as a way to reintegrate workers in manual harvesting of sugar cane, unemployed by mechanization. The practice of Social-environmental responsibility is present in the business environment in general, and also is arising in the alcohol sector. Discussed in a perspective quite endogenous, especially the areas of administration and business management, we aim to enter the practice of environmental responsibility in its wider context, placing them in a process that has legitimized the possibility of a "social economy" and strengthening the idea "solidarity", based on the division of responsibilities between government, third sector and market. This perspective of analysis is necessary since the emergence of such practices goes along with changes in contemporary relations between capital and labor and the consequent reorientation of trade union practices and strategies. We observed the appropriation of the discourse of environmental responsibility on the part of unions and investigate if such means of action constitutes a viable alternative to the massive unemployment of workers cutting cane.

Auto-segregación de las élites en santiago, Chile: De la fragmentación identitaria a la fragmentación espacial

A largo de los siglos XIX y XX las élites en Santiago se concentraron espacialmente en ciertos puntos de la ciudad. Si bien su localización iba variando, el desplazamiento se realizaba por el conjunto: gran parte del grupo social migraba, por ende las familias de altos ingresos mantenían su concentración en el espacio. Esta alta concentración espacial de las élites comenzó a variar a partir de los años 1980's cuando algunos hogares comenzaron a desplazarse hacia comunas periféricas como Huechuraba o Peñalolén, o bien, a retornar hacia el centro de la ciudad, o directamente a optar por localizaciones rurales como Colina o Calera de Tango (Sabatini & Salcedo, 2011). El presente trabajo se pregunta por las condiciones materiales y culturales que hicieron posible la dispersión territorial de las élites. La hipótesis central que se plantea es que hoy en día existirían solidaridades y lealtades basadas en identidades que exceden a la simple pertenencia a una clase social. Así, la dispersión territorial de la élite sería el producto de la fragmentación valórico - cultural que dicho grupo social ha experimentado (y no sólo consecuencia de la extensión de infraestructura de transporte y su consiguiente mejora en conectividad). De acuerdo a esto, el trabajo posee dos objetivos principales: (1) Explorar las distinciones al interior de la élite santiaguina en términos culturales y de ciclo vital de los hogares, ligando los distintos sub-grupos con una determinada localización y estilo de vida urbano; y (2) Dar cuenta de los procesos -nacionales e internacionales- tras el surgimiento de la fragmentación de este grupo social.

Metáforas del sufrimiento laboral

Estudiar el sufrimiento en el trabajo es una tarea de primera importancia, no sólo por la relevancia teórica del problema sino también porque nos permite reflexionar sobre los mecanismos subjetivos de la reproducción social, en particular, sobre la transformación conceptual y política del trabajo, que ha dejado de interpretarse como un derecho para convertirse en un privilegio. En una sociedad donde sólo unos cuantos tienen trabajo (así sea inestable, precario), el sufrimiento psíquico es considerado como un mal menor e incluso como algo "normal", toda vez que a fin de cuentas, trabajar se ha convertido en un privilegio. Y los privilegios no se cuestionan, no se critican, por el contrario, se "gozan". En este escenario, el management tiene prácticamente campo abierto para actuar con total impunidad, sabedor de que las posibilidades de resistencia frente a sus embates pueden ser fácilmente desguazadas, toda vez que la acción política se debilita cuando se defiende "privilegios", y no derechos, de trata.

El trabajo enfatiza el análisis de las metáforas con las que se enfrenta el sufrimiento y/o malestar laboral. Este encuadre ofrece al menos tres grandes posibilidades de análisis: a) En primer lugar, permite recuperar las voces y expresiones concretas con las que las y los sobrecargos expresan su situación laboral, específicamente el sufrimiento; b) en segundo lugar, el enfoque centrado en las metáforas del sufrimiento posibilita el análisis -a contraluz por así decirlo- sobre las mismas metáforas que fundamentan las prácticas de gestión de las empresas contemporáneas, sobre todo la de la guerra; c) Por último, la focalización del análisis en las metáforas del sufrimiento laboral nos permite "des-psicologizar" el estudio, esto es, trascender la perspectiva exclusivamente psicológica del problema para instalarnos en una dimensión propia del análisis organizacional, desde una perspectiva socioclinica.

La construcción del dato en el análisis organizacional: Una reflexión desde la investigación del turismo de aventura en México

En este trabajo se exponen algunas reflexiones de índole metodológica sobre la investigación -en curso- titulada El clúster ecoturístico de Jalcomulco: la responsabilidad social de los emprendedores y las redes sociales en la generación de empleo en un contexto rural. El objetivo de la investigación apunta a dilucidar cómo ha sido posible que en un contexto económico orientado al sector primario, se haya logrado impulsar con éxito una importante oferta de empleo en el ramo del turismo de aventura, al punto de que el modelo de negocio del agrupamiento empresarial de Jalcomulco (Veracruz, México) es punta de lanza a nivel mundial en este sector de la actividad turística. La proposición principal de este trabajo es que el eclecticismo metodológico en las técnicas de acopio de información aporta mayor densidad y profundidad al análisis organizacional, en la medida en que el dato se construye desde diversas perspectivas. La encuesta, la entrevista a profundidad, el análisis de redes sociales y soportes visuales como la fotografía y el video se ponen en juego en esta investigación. La multireferencialidad en la construcción del dato es de enorme relevancia, por cuanto nos permite no sólo establecer diálogos entre la información acopiada sino también, y más importante, instaurar en la investigación pautas de emocionalidad, sensibilización, reflexión y análisis que sólo se pueden generar al alero de determinados dispositivos metodológicos. No se trata sólo de cruzar información, sino de establecer diversas disposiciones emocionales, afectivas e intelectuales para enriquecer la investigación. Consideramos que esta forma de ver, de encarar, la investigación va mucho más allá de la mera elección metodológica cuantitativa-cualitativa puesto que lo que busca es promover o facilitar disposiciones intelectuales, emocionales, estéticas, afectivas, lúdicas, críticas, etc. que se traduzcan en la posibilidad de construir datos desde diversas miradas, con diferentes enfoques y bajo emocionalidades diferenciadas.

Networks and structuration processes

Proposing here the concept of active reticular structure, I suggest that complex, large-scale structuration and change processes cannot be understood without analyzing the role of networks articulating human actors and corporate actors that succeeds in imposing a model, which then locks the paths of change. Beyond the initial active network, a new structural configuration emerges, which, by limiting available choices, renders the model increasingly constraining under the action of actors and followers. In this sense the network becomes an active structure.

I will give two inter-related examples of active reticular structures. The first one show how the interfirm Auto-Oil-Rubber network under the leadership of Alfred P. Sloan, President of GM and Pierre S. DuPont, his predecessor, played the bus, automobile and highways against railways and electric tramways giving birth to a gigantic active reticular structure structuring our material civilization at the global scale. The second refers to the active reticular structure of fossil fuels.

This analysis leads to an understanding of (a) the initial structuration process, often put in place in a context of rival practices between diverging network configurations where flows of various types are organized and circulated; (b) the resultant of this structuration process engaged by the predominant network, which gradually imposes its hegemony and prestige, by configuring concepts, models, actions, adapted goods, services and infrastructures, calling for the adherence of a large number of agents and becoming more stable through the reproduction of circuits and flows, except if a crisis arises to alter or halt this reproduction process; (c) the local or regional, national and international expansion process associated with an increasing number of actors and followers, who through the extensive reproduction of practices strengthens the model thanks to hegemony thereby acquired, a model that becomes constraining for a lack of concrete alternatives.

The quality of life concept in Jurerê internacional territorial development

To understand the progress of nations isn't a recent task, scholars of distant dates were concerned with this mission. The understanding that particular aspects of the places are crucial factors in their success of its development, revealing the importance of the territorial notion. Thus, the territory appears as a central element of some economic sociology approaches that understand the development through the analysis of the territories. In front of the latest concept of territorial development, this research intent to understand the formation of an internationally known territory: Jurerê Internacional, in the north of the island of Florianópolis (Santa Catarina, Brazil). Jurerê assume a distinct status beside conventional beaches because of its quality of living pattern. The aim of this study was to investigate the historical process of setting the territory of Jurerê Internacional and to identify the notion of quality of life for its residents. To this end, we analyzed the neighborhood newspaper that is bimonthly published by the Association of Residents of Jurerê Internacional (AJIN), considering samples of 2001 and 2011, comprising an interval of ten years. Through the cross-sectional analysis performed in this study, the concept of quality of life that emerges can be summarized in two broad categories: order and tranquility. To sustain these categories, the AJIN directs several actions to promote discipline, safety, preservation of culture, preservation of the space, actions of partnerships and performance of the state. Finally, we find that this is a dense and complex territory where diverse interests are manifested, being the defense of the privileged stronghold a common goal. Jurerê Internacional was formed to serve the interests of an economically privileged minority. This characteristic suggests a form of highly endogenous development as evidenced by exclusiveness required by the actors. We can only ask: development for whom?

Narratives about illness by military police officers in Ceara

The present study analyzes symbolic categories elaborated by military police officers taking leave of absence for psychological assistance, aiming to understand how these social actors create meaning on the process of illness in relation to their work. We investigate the trajectory of these police officers, taking health into account as a thread of narrative. Furthermore, we discuss the process of treatment provided by the military police institution until the readmission to working activity. Those narratives are grounded on police officers' everyday lives, based on morally produced categories such as humiliation, shame and fear. Such representations may point out to a reality socially and historically constructed, with roots in the processes of idealizing the context of work, which in some cases may generate psychological suffering. Officers under medical assistance consider that their work offers unhealthy conditions, as expressed in discourses of denouncement, through which they present themselves subjected to exhausting routines associated to physical exhaustion, stress and suffering, besides the risk of death involved with the practice. These aspects inflict on psychological damages, at times even permanently, which in severe cases have led to suicide. Such a pressure on the body, and the building up of the self under this pressure of exercising duty, may ignite the appearance of a symptomatology, leading to serious health problems, especially related to mental health such as depression. In other cases, these pressures are used to justify violent or illegal acts. In this sense, this paper is based on fieldwork conducted at the facility responsible for the assistance of military officers taking leave of absence for health treatment, with in-depth interviews with these social actors in the context of interaction with the medical staff inside a clinic.

Las tensiones de la igualdad en las empresas recuperadas

Uno de los fenómenos emblemáticos de la acción colectiva de inicio de la Argentina del siglo XXI refiere a la recuperación de empresas por sus trabajadores, conjunto heterogéneo de procesos en los cuales empresas en crisis son controladas y puestas a producir por sus trabajadores (Rebón: 2007).

En su sociogénesis el proceso encuentra su principal elemento estructurante en la crisis del comando capitalista sobre las unidades productivas, en un contexto social de crisis generalizada.

La recomposición económica y política a partir 2003 no implicó la clausura del proceso. Pese a la reversión del contexto de crisis que constituyó su sociogénesis, el proceso, aunque con menor intensidad, se ha extendido a nuevas unidades productivas (Rebón y Salgado, 2009; Programa de Trabajo Autogestionado, 2010; Programa Facultad Abierta, 2011). Por otro lado, las empresas recuperadas en el nuevo contexto han mostrado una importante continuidad y sostenibilidad productiva (Rebón y Salgado, 2009). La experiencia ha sido eficaz en evitar el cierre de las empresas y el desempleo de los trabajadores, conformando en origen empresas más equitativas y democráticas que las fallidas. Ahora bien, a la par de esta capacidad de mantenimiento de la fuente de trabajo y de sostenimiento productivo es menester preguntarse por las transformaciones en el carácter socio-productivo de estas experiencias, en sus potencialidades transformadoras y sus limitaciones estructurales. ¿Cuáles son las dimensiones a tener en cuenta para pensar ese carácter? ¿Qué transformaciones se observan luego de 10 años de las primeras experiencias de recuperación? La presente exposición focaliza sobre el análisis de las transformaciones en una serie de dimensiones que se consideran centrales para dar cuenta del carácter socio-productivo: las formas y mecanismos distributivos y el ejercicio de la función de dirección.

The impact of job quality and pay on the exit-voice behavior of French employees across different unionized settings

In the Hirschman's theory, the concepts of quality of product and the price of product have a central place. This theory states that individuals who are not satisfied with the quality of product are more likely to voice. In contrast, individuals who are more concerned with the price of product are more likely to exit. Insofar, most of the research papers using Hirschman's exit-voice theoretical model in the labor market tried to explain the phenomenon of turnover in relation to job satisfaction or job tenure. However, they did not stress the attention on testing the effect of exit-voice strategies in relation to job quality. The communication is grounded on a study whose aim is to explain why individuals choose either to leave the firm (exit), or to stay and express their dissatisfaction (voice). It follows a longitudinal perspective to predict the exit/voice strategies of individuals for a middle stretch of time in the labor market system in France. Hirschman's assumptions about quality and price will be employed in order to examine under which conditions French employees working in firms are more likely to exit, and under which conditions they are more likely to voice. Moreover, it discusses the traditional view of unionism as a form of collective voice and focuses on the situation in France. For the purpose of analysis, the current paper uses French REPOSE surveys which provide information about the occupation of employees, their history of salaries, the main motivation of individuals of participating in collective action, and the perceived role of unions. The relevance of studying job quality and pay in relation to the exit/voice strategies across different unionized settings are strongly supported by the first findings.

Interacting mechanisms between general psychiatry, forensic psychiatry and the prison systems and their influence on admission rates

Alongside great advantages, the shift from hospital based to community mental health care has also caused problems, e.g. a high frequency of involuntary re-admissions to psychiatric hospitals. To analyse whether or not the process of deinstitutionalisation in general psychiatry might have gone too far, studies are needed that cover general psychiatry, forensic psychiatry, and penitentiaries and analyse the interdependencies among these sectors.

We combined epidemiological and service utilization data from three recent European studies that explored legal frameworks and practices of involuntary treatment in general mental health care, the care of mentally disordered offenders in forensic care and the care of mentally ill inmates in the European prison systems.

Time series from several European Union Member States suggest that intrastate civil detention rates remained more or less stable during the 1990s, although on varying levels across countries. Admissions to forensic psychiatric facilities have increased during the same period. Data on the mental state (or on rates of psychiatric morbidity) in European prison populations are hardly available – aside from the prison suicide rate. Cross-sectional data from selected countries suggest that changes to the legal framework in one sector may considerably affect admission rates in others.

Better national data-bases and more international studies are needed to analyse the linkage between sectors and to identify inappropriate detention or patient shifting, as pathways to these sectors are strongly affected by legislation and the overall frameworks of national health care and criminal justice systems.

Professional identity and gender

Autobiographical and life history research provides a holistic framework of understanding the relation between societal institutions and individual lives. But how can we avoid to 'individualize the individual', i.e. abstract the individual from his or her life context? This paper will offer a life history approach focussing on societal experience and ambivalences of individual life experiences with a special view to the gender dimensions of professional work and professional identity. Examples are drawn from empirical studies of general practitioners, nurses, engineers and teachers. It is argued that a detailed interpretation of life stories enables an understanding of the ambivalences and dynamics in the identity processes, and an interpretation of an autobiographic case from research into engineers' career and life experience is being presented to illuminate this point.

The foundation of professional identities in life experiences

The authors have studied biographies and life histories in two different ways, aiming at the same objective: To understand how professional identity building is founded in personal life experience in its societal context. Our approaches have been developed in widely different cultural and theoretical contexts, and our paper will explore this background by contrasting similar research interests. One approach has focused on autobiographies of teachers/educators in their social and historical context, methodologically aware of the temporal and narrative nature of memory, looking for the way in which narrators have developed their personal and professional identity in this context. The other one has interpreted accounts of professional experience and learning, with a focus on the psycho-societal aspects of collective professional discourses (in-depth hermeneutics). Our paper will present the main features of each approach, and discuss their relevance for professional education and learning. A potentially common denominator in the interpretations in the form of key concepts (comprensión escénica, scenic understanding respectively) will be considered theoretically.

Ethnic integration, or spatial segregation? Negotiating technical expertise in the making of the Shemlan master plan in Lebanon

In 2008, a Master Plan (MP) for the Shemlan region (in Lebanon) was approved as the statutory framework organizing the built environment. Within a historically conflict-ridden context between Maronite and Druze communities (1975-1990), and Shiite and Druze communities (May 2008), the MP focused on zoning for land use and building ratios.

This paper investigates the complexity of overlaps and intersections between technical expertise and political interferences, and the ongoing negotiations between the two in the MP's production process. Findings indicate that planning initiatives meant to consolidate post-war reconciliation between Druze and Maronite communities reified the emerging conflict between the Shiite and Druze ones. Planning practices became part and parcel of a continuous and evolving conflict, instead of effective tools for promoting ethnic integration. In parallel, private initiatives unrelated to the master plan, in particular, a "Peace Park" and a higher education institution in the area seem to have tackled ethnic diversity with a more subtle understanding.

The research builds on a comparison with similar case studies in other contexts such as Bilabao, Belfast and Johannesburg. Characterized by a general alignment between central state, local agencies, and planners, attempts for coherent processes of "ethnic mixing" have taken place. Unlike such contexts, Lebanon is a model of a weak, fragmented central state. Central planning agencies, local agencies, municipalities, and private political and professional actors do not necessarily agree on, let alone promote, a single vision and goal.

The paper builds on 8 months of fieldwork (May- December 2010), 35 interviews with dwellers of the region, bureaucrats at public planning agencies, planners, and members of political parties. This data is accompanied by an investigation of the 2 MP proposed alternatives and a discursive analysis of local newspapers' reports published between 2002 and 2008, the period during which this planning exercise took place.

The world of our models: Making traffic simulation models work as problem-solving devices

Ateneo de Manila University is one of the major traffic generators and attractors which contribute massive peak-hour daily traffic along a major road in Metro Manila, Philippines. One of the core problems is the increasing demand generated by Ateneo which exceeds the supply during rush hour. The key to solve this particular traffic problem, therefore, is to reduce the volume of car traffic generated by Ateneo along the major road by letting the internal Ateneo road network – and not the external road network along the major road – shoulder the effect Ateneo-generated traffic. Prior to execution, his traffic management scheme required the development of certain "models of the world" such as pedestrian simulation models and flow matrices computing actual (instead of predicted) flow on various areas of a network facility. This paper examines the "world of the models" in order to detect the nature of the interfaces between science and society; in particular, between university-based knowledge production and utilization (by the university itself), and between scientific models and the fluid structure and active agency of individuals.

Entre pasado y futuro. Las memorias de lo/as oficiales del ejército argentino

La temporalidad de la memoria de lo/as oficiales del Ejército Argentino no se reduce a las interacciones que establecen con un pasado de violencia y autoritarismo, que resulta marcadamente controvertido para la construcción de la memoria institucional de la fuerza, sino que se proyecta y se prolonga también hacia el futuro. Ubicar temporalmente la memoria de lo/as oficiales en actividad, quienes en su mayoría ingresaron al ejército después de 1983, significa hacer referencia al espacio vivo que se produce en la intersección entre las experiencias transmitidas por las generaciones anteriores, las condiciones del presente en su vínculo con la sociedad de la que son parte y las expectativas futuras de dignificación y reconocimiento de la profesión militar. En tal sentido, el propósito de esta ponencia será identificar los sentidos y representaciones de futuro a través de los cuales lo/as oficiales del Ejército Argentino incorporan el pasado institucional al presente de su actividad profesional. Sea como obstáculo o como posibilidad, como final o como principio, como fijación o como transmisión, como secuela o como legado, como repetición o como elaboración, como abuso

o como aprendizaje, lo/as oficiales del Ejército Argentino construyen su memoria colectiva entre pasado y futuro.

Educational inequality and social mobility in Argentina

A mediados del siglo pasado con el estructural-funcionalismo se comenzó a difundir la sugestiva afirmación que en la tipología de las sociedades industriales modernas la posición social de los individuos no estaría mayoritariamente influenciada por el origen social (adscripción) sino que estaría adquirida principalmente por el individuo mismo durante su trayectoria vital (adquisición o logro).

Sin embargo, posteriormente la evidencia internacional fue convergiendo paulatinamente hacia la idea de que entre las diversas formas de la desigualdad social, la desigualdad de oportunidades educativas, junto a la desigualdad económica, son las más refractarias al cambio y las más insensibles al desarrollo de las sociedades modernas industriales. Esto podría ser todavía más importante para el caso de muchos países de América Latina y especialmente para la Argentina en donde hay una creciente evidencia de que más allá de algunas mejoras, se sigue manteniendo una desigualdad económica mayor a la media mundial.

Dentro de este marco se analiza, con datos de la EDSA para la población urbana Argentina mayor de 18 años, la influencia tanto del origen como del logro educativo para llegar a la actual posición social a través de variadas técnicas como la estandarización de marginales con sus respectivas tasa de ingreso y salida como también el ajuste de distintos modelos log-lineales para captar la estructura de la desigualdad educativa.

La medición del desarrollo social a partir de un enfoque de derechos

Una parte importante de los actuales estudios sobre el desarrollo se orientan hacia una representación del progreso humano asociado al concepto de "calidad de vida" ampliando la mirada clásica sobre el "bienestar". Pero este avance resulta insuficiente cuando se consideran de una perspectiva histórica que el desarrollo humano no tiene límites y que su construcción social tiene como protagonistas a los propios pueblos y sujetos que disfrutan o sufren sus consecuencias. En este contexto, el trabajo que se presenta para su discusión propone un significado histórico objetivable –aunque relativo– al concepto de "desarrollo social" a partir de un enfoque de derechos sociales, a la vez que presenta una experiencia concreta de medición multidimensional del mismo para el caso argentino.

Beneath the model: From "Developing Nation" to "Emerging Market," deal by deal

In recent decades, Mexico has shifted, in tandem with much of the rest of the global south, from a "developing nation" obligated to its national citizenry to an "emerging market" obligated to its transnational investors. Transnational currency markets are one of the sites in which these shifts are being enacted, and in this talk I trace the processes through which complex, masculinized national/transnational subjects are hailed, as well as the impact of their emergent selves on the markets they inhabit. The talk focuses on the alternately frantic and boring daily life of the Latin American currency-trading desk of a major transnational bank I call Globank where these processes become visible. The desk is the physical hub of a set of fiber optic spokes entering all the major Latin American capitals, creating an outpost of "Latin America" in New York. Its referent is not Latin America as it is lived however – embodied, heterogeneous, internally incommensurable – but Latin America as a financial market – composed of disembodied, commensurable units. Recapitulating this process, traders on the desk emerge as hyper-masculine and nationally marked – selves incited and then commodified for market utility. Globank strategists have managed to create a vibrant, marked, highly masculine and "Latin" social universe, organized for an unremarkable goal – profit. The ethnography delineates these processes, thus illustrating how a global assemblage is made and its consequences for both the people who populate it and the world(s) their actions constitute in turn.

Migrant women contribution to urban informal sector business in Mumbai

Abstract. Tamil women from places like Salem, Villipuram, Ullandurpettai, Tirunelveli in Tamilnadu a southern state of India, who were migrated to Mumbai more than 45 years before and subsequently, are in control of this profession. Over the years this small household business and caste-based occupation spread over in sizes, but significantly it has not lost its exclusive Tamil character, because most of the participants are Tamil women. Examples from rags to riches are galore in this informal sector business, which has helped for their socio-economic development. The mothers prepare the gajra in the platform and their young daughters sell these in the ladies compartment of the local train.

There are examples of women who initially came to Mumbai and started this business and have been quite successful in producing highly educated grandchildren and at the same time retaining the family tradition of selling flowers (gajra) by daughter-in-law are exciting notes. This study is based on empirical research carried out in Mumbai. The study has been devoted to acquire the reason of the heir migration, to acquaint with the socio-cultural pattern and the strength of these women belonging to specific caste groups to be in this trade for such a long time despite changes. Some of them have been able to provide a decent life to their children whereas some are still struggling.

Exclusión: La visión de los actores sociales

La exclusión y la injusticia social en el Perú se han acentuado debido a una política económica neoliberal concentradora de recursos y de poder. Los medios de comunicación y la publicidad de las grandes corporaciones promocionan el consumismo, presentándolo como un mecanismo de inclusión y hasta de movilidad social. No obstante, la incorporación al mercado o el tipo de consumo que se promueve no garantizan la salida de la pobreza ni el desarrollo humano; más bien disfrazan y ocultan realidades económicas de actores sociales que es necesario visibilizar.

Lo que queremos presentar en esta sesión es la experiencia de trabajo de Iniciativa Social Blanco y Negro (ISBN), una asociación que desde el 2006 realiza talleres fotográficos en poblaciones en situación de pobreza, discriminación y/o exclusión. Su finalidad es producir información visual que permita dar cuenta de la desigualdad social existente en Perú. A este efecto, entrega cámaras fotográficas a diferentes actores sociales para que documenten su realidad. La difusión gráfica de estas realidades permite generar conciencia gradual de la situación de vulnerabilidad, riesgo e injusticia social en la que viven. Conciencia que se trata de promover tanto entre los actores sociales productores de imágenes, como entre los espectadores de las exposiciones fotográficas y videos que ISBN realiza. Asimismo, se promueve entre la población el uso de las imágenes producidas para fortalecer acciones de participación ciudadana; o para visibilizar la diversidad cultural que en muchos casos sufre discriminación. La experiencia de ISBN está referida a diversos actores sociales: promotores de salud, indígenas awajún, adultos mayores, jóvenes con quemaduras, educadores medioambientales, pobladores urbanos marginales. Lo que se pretende presentar en esta sesión es cómo el uso de la fotografía y una metodología de co-gestión en los talleres pueden generar o fortalecer una acción ciudadana de participación y de cambio.

Democracia y leyes antiterroristas. El control social sobre los discolos de la democracia Argentina post-dictatorial (1984-2011)

Cada período histórico se construye según las pujas persistentes entre los diferentes actores sociales, éstas moldean contextos sociales, políticos y económicos particulares.

Simultáneamente, la gubernamentalidad adquiere las especificidades necesarias y suficientes para conducir las conductas dentro de los marcos que establece el orden social dominante.

En este sentido, con la apertura democrática Argentina desde diciembre de 1983, los diferentes gobiernos se abocaron a la tarea del control social sobre los discolos por medio de la legalidad como estrategia de reafirmar la vocación democrática, de sostener la restauración institucional y de minimizar cualquier riesgo de desviación de los sujetos y de la protesta social.

Nos valemos de la noción de archivo como estrategia para el análisis de las Leyes Antiterroristas prescriptas por los Gobiernos post-dictatoriales. Entendida como el conjunto de discursos efectivamente pronunciados, que continua funcionando y que se transforma a través de la historia, esta herramienta permite establecer sus múltiples relaciones y hallar sus regularidades.

Trabajamos a partir del Decreto Nacional 83/89 firmado por el Dr. Raúl Alfonsín, luego del asalto al Regimiento de Infantería Mecanizado 3 "General Belgrano" con asiento en La Tablada por parte de militantes de Movimiento Todos Por La Patria en enero de 1989, continuando con el Decreto Nacional 327/89, atravesamos las distintas leyes que los sucesivos Gobiernos instauraron hasta llegar al proyecto de Ley del 13 octubre de 2011 firmado por el Dr. Julio Alak, Ministro de Justicia, y el Dr. Anibal Fernández, Jefe de Gabinete.

Haciendo uso de la legalidad institucional el orden social se prepara para contener las protestas sociales que genera este modelo económico cada vez más inequitativo -a pesar de los buenos discursos-.

Memoria y memoriales. Las baldosas en Argentina como expresión de las memorias resistentes

Algunos miembros de las Asambleas Barriales nacidas al calor de la lucha callejera del 19-20 de diciembre de 2001 en Argentina, entraron en contacto con organizaciones preexistentes y fundaron, durante el año 2005, "Barrios x Memoria y Justicia".

Desde el seno de la ciudadanía, en torno a la figura de los luchadores populares muertos y desaparecidos, se tejieron redes sociales, se recuperaron espacios públicos, se recuperaron sus historias de lucha y de vida y crearon dimensiones propias e innovadoras de memoria colectiva.

Reflexionando sobre la pugna entre las diferentes memorias y la musealización de los DDHH se rescata aquí la hechura y colocación de Baldosas en la Ciudad Autónoma de Buenos Aires como construcción de una novedosa forma de expresar la memoria desde los ciudadanos y de visibilizar a los militantes populares de los años '70.

A pesar de la instauración de una fuerte memoria oficial con grandes espacios destinados a la apropiación de la historia reciente, la cuestión estética y arquitectónica de las memorias resistentes da lugar a la presencia de la ausencia en el ámbito público de lo cotidiano.

Con una estrategia cuasi etnometodológica participamos en la hechura y colocación de Baldosas para explorar su funcionamiento, a su vez, los diálogos informales permitieron conocer los acuerdos y discrepancias que dieron origen a los textos sintetizados en las Baldosas y el análisis de los dos libros que editaron nos facultaron a comprender la historia procesual de cada grupo que conforma "Barrios x Memoria y Justicia".

Minorities' integration process: French case analysis

This work aims to demonstrate a minority's integrative process to a new state, nation, and society. Based on the adaptation of Ager and Strang Conceptual Framework for Migrants, this work proposes a new conceptual arrangement capable of analyzing the integration of newcomer groups already settled, considering, therefore, their subsequent generations. The French case is addressed as exemplary for the application and comparison of these two arrangements. In the first moment, the economical nature of migration, the establishment of the group in temporary and distanced housings, and their non-intention of setting in France, characterized the way the group was received and perceived by the host society. With the end of the Migration Program in 1974, the Muslims workers decided to settle at the hexagon, constituting a new minority. As France traditionally assimilates, formally and substantively, foreign populations inside the nation in a two-generation-space, the second and third generations necessarily would be totally French. Although the jus solis guaranteed the formal assimilation, providing the citizenship that connected citizens to the state; the substantive assimilation was not achieved. This non-integration could be perceived by the political decentralization and lack of legitimate political representativeness, by the high unemployment rates and criminality, and by the low educational level of this specific group, when compared to the host population. The political and socio-economical marginalization is intensified by the non-identification of the group with the values of French nation. Hence, Islam starts to be culturally appropriated by those who was not feeling completely bonded to nation and by those feeling discriminated by society. Therefore, the integrative trajectory of Muslims in France follows three belonging standards: citizenship with the state; national belonging perception with nation; and tolerance with society. Through the developments of these foundations, it is possible to identify potentialities and pitfalls towards a minority's integration.

Formas de interpelación sobre el pasado reciente: El "día nacional de la memoria" en el ex centro clandestino de detención mansión seré-atila

El presente trabajo forma parte de una investigación en curso sobre el proceso político-institucional y social de constitución de un lugar de memoria en el predio donde funcionó el centro clandestino de detención conocido como Mansión Seré-Atila durante la última dictadura militar en Argentina (1976-1983). Una de las preguntas que guían dicha investigación refiere a las formas bajo las cuales los actores sociales involucrados en la construcción de la memoria social sobre la dictadura buscan interpelar a la sociedad. A través del análisis de un caso, como es el programa institucional de memoria desarrollado en Mansión Seré, intentamos responder a esta cuestión, indagando en los discursos y las prácticas que los diferentes actores despliegan en él.

En este trabajo nos proponemos analizar, desde una perspectiva etnográfica y retomando el concepto de "situación social" (Gluckman, 1987), uno de los eventos realizados anualmente en el predio, con motivo de la conmemoración del "Día Nacional de la Memoria", cuya fecha señala el último golpe de Estado. Ese día los operadores del programa de memoria y otros actores vinculados a él y convocados para la ocasión, organizan diversas actividades que van desde visitas al ex centro clandestino, homenajes a los detenidos desaparecidos, proyección de películas sobre la temática, hasta una maratón. Consideramos que este evento es un escenario interesante para indagar sobre la problemática planteada puesto que en él confluyen prácticas de rememoración, conmemoración y transmisión a través de las cuales los actores vinculados al programa construyen formas de interpelación sobre el pasado reciente. El objetivo es comprender los sentidos que sostienen cada una de esas prácticas.

Testing social theory with a survey experiment: Simmel's stranger and social distance

Simmel's conception of the stranger as someone objective, reliable, and to whom individuals are willing to disclose their secrets has long influenced the practice of survey research: interviewers are almost always "strangers" to the respondents. This idea, however, has never been experimentally tested and is at odds with a large body of research that suggests that intimacy, truth-telling and trust are all more likely to happen when individuals know each other, and strangers are the usual victims of deception. The same can be said about other longstanding practices in survey research that are based on the idea that reducing social distance between interviewer and respondent – e.g., by matching them on gender, race, place of residence – will improve data quality. Here, too, there is almost no experimental literature to shore up methodological claims.

We tested these assumptions by means of a carefully designed experimental survey in the Dominican Republic in the summer of 2010. We systematically randomized interviewer assignments so as to produce interviews that allowed us to control for the type of pre-existing relationship between interviewers and respondents. Most of the questions asked were similar to standard questions typically asked in social surveys. Other questions were introduced to allow for validity checks. Overall, the questions in the instrument ranged from relatively innocuous to very sensitive.

Results are mixed. We find evidence for and against the Simmelian view and the emphasis on reducing social distance. Our study gives us the opportunity to test long-held assumptions about social interaction in data collection settings, and thus challenge established sociological practices. We discuss the implications of these findings for both survey research and social theory in general.

Mental fitness for dementia patients: Can it work?

This is an exploratory study translating research into a program designed to maintain mental fitness in a population of assisted living residents who have mild cognitive impairment (MCI) or mild dementia. The participants did not live in a secured perimeter environment; they were struggling with managing in an assisted living environment. The program, called Circle of Friends, is a structured 7-day-week, 8-hour day activity provided by dedicated activity leaders especially trained to conduct 6 research-based domains of mental workout. Domains include: 1) Practice Organizing Ideas; 2) Learn Something New; 3) Exercise Long Term Memory; 4) Exercise mind/memory simultaneously through word games; 5) Exercise mind/memory/body movement (such as dancercise) simultaneously; 6) Analytic thinking and math problem-solving. All Mental Fitness protocols emphasize speed-of-processing, are novel and involve a mental "stretch." Three communities in the Belmont Village company were selected, based on quality of activity leader skill. Twenty-nine residents participated in the study. Selection of residents was based on daily attendance and achieving at baseline a Folstein Mini-Mental (MMSE) score of 18 to 28 and a score of 9 or higher on the Clock Drawing Test (CDT) (Below 18 indicates dementia). At baseline and at 6 months, residents were given the MMSE and the CDT. Our preliminary finding was that out of 29 full time participants who completed the program, 20 out of 29 maintained or improved on the CDT (ie, only 8 lost more than 1 point); 21 out of 29 maintained or improved on the MMSE. Thus it was concluded that the Circle of Friends program was able to sustain mental fitness over a six months period for residents who are in the mild to moderate range of dementia and at high risk of decline. All residents in the sample were able to continue living in the least restrictive environment.

Prohibición y transgresión en la obra de bataille. El problema del crimen y el criminal

La presente ponencia se propone abordar los desarrollos teóricos de Georges Bataille, problematizando la paradójica relación entre lo prohibido y la transgresión, a fin de poder dar cuenta del lugar que ocupan el crimen, el criminal y las reacciones sociales que suscitan dentro de su dispositivo conceptual.

Bataille se inscribe dentro de una tradición de autores que postulan la necesidad de una exclusión radical para la fundación de todo orden social. Es decir, que todo conjunto social para ser tal debe apartar y mantener a distancia determinados procesos, conductas, objetos, afectos e individuos, construyéndolos como lo completamente otro de sí. Las prohibiciones operan dentro de este esquema como el límite último de lo social, instituyendo como violencia al anverso lógico del orden. La violencia, sin embargo, nunca puede ser erradicada. De allí que la prohibición no pueda ser separada para Bataille de la transgresión: ambas categorías conforman un núcleo.

Así, el crimen podría pensarse como un tipo de acontecimiento de aquella violencia que rompe el tejido sociosimbólico y el criminal como un punto de imputación de los antagonismos y los afectos que se debieron instituir como exteriores para la conformación del orden.

A través del análisis del corpus bibliográfico, buscaremos explicitar las categorías sociológicas fundamentales y sus relaciones lógicas, a fin de poder aprehender la íntima relación entre cultura y crimen en la perspectiva batailleana, tan influyente en el pensamiento criminológico contemporáneo, en particular en el campo que ha sido denominado Criminología Cultural.

Social policy on health in Chile, for poor women

This paper presents part of the results of a quantitative study with secondary data held in Chile in 2010 and 2011, in a community with high poverty levels located in the capital of the country. It is noted that in Chile there is currently 15.1% of poor and is the country with the most unequal income distribution of countries of the OECD: the lowest income group (decile I), received 1.1% of country's growth in comparison with the highest income group (decile 10), which receives 42.3%. The research was aimed at evaluating the implementation of a Social Policy Program called "Chile Grows with You (CHCC)," designed to reduce inequity and vulnerability from birth until the age of four years, in mothers who belong to 40% poorest in the country.

The total number of cases studied was of 1656 pregnant women, attending their prenatal care assistance in care centers of the health public network of the Pudahuel town. The results allow to point out the existence of a great vulnerability into expectant mothers and their families, lack of precision and integration between different public records that establish the indicators for access to the benefits, as well as the difficulties in focusing the program to support the increase the equity from a human rights perspective

Diagnostico comunitario participativo "barrio pujol" una mirada de las prácticas discriminatorias en la adolescencia

El presente trabajo se enmarca dentro de la Residencia Interdisciplinaria de Salud Mental Comunitaria de la localidad de Puerto Madryn. La tarea que nos propusimos fue realizar un diagnostico comunitario participativo en el área de influencia del Centro de Atención Primaria de la Salud René Favaloro, en el cual nos desempeñamos actualmente, con la finalidad de orientar acciones a futuro.

El enfoque de la Ley Provincial y Nacional de Salud Mental establece como línea de acción de todas las intervenciones, el trabajo con y desde la comunidad para la promoción, prevención y asistencia en acciones de salud. Desde este paradigma se privilegia un abordaje que no se centre en reparar aquello que pueda leerse como patológico en un sujeto o grupo, sino la promoción de elementos preventivos y protectores de la Salud Mental. Es decir que las acciones se centraran en los aspectos vinculares y comunitarios, entendiendo que el lazo social es el eje principal de la salud mental (E. Galende: 1991).

A través de una metodología cualitativa, nos propusimos hacer un análisis de las prácticas discriminatorias de los y las adolescentes en un barrio marginal de la ciudad, con una importante proporción de población migrante de países limítrofes, donde el ser migrante está asociado a una pertenencia étnica, de clase y a una forma de ocupación territorial siempre marginal. El objetivo final de este trabajo es echar luz sobre la forma en que se desarrollan estos vínculos de manera tal de poder trabajar sobre ellos a través del fortalecimiento de prácticas de inclusión e integración buscando contrarrestar y prevenir los efectos negativos que esta dinámica pueda generar sobre la subjetividad de esta población.

How can we create more democratic futures

This paper starts from the assumption that the current political culture of European democracies is not altogether consistent with the democratic ethos understood as openness to differences. From this assumption, the question that guides this paper is, how to configure a system/process of education that instead of being defined in terms of universality, identity and certainty is configured according to the values of singularity, otherness and possibility? How to reconcile the values of singularity, otherness and possibility with the creation of a sense of community, both of which should be taken as aims of formal educational processes? In order to respond to these questions we analyse the syllabus of specific subjects taught at primary school level of two European countries (Spain and UK) and show the correlations between the contents of the syllabus, the values that define them and the dispositions they foster. The last part of this paper makes concrete suggestions of changes to the syllabus considered, and show the probability to develop dispositions consistent with the democratic ethos, in comparison to its initial diagnosis.

Investigating power and democracy

The first of two investigations of power and democracy were conducted in Norway from 1972 to 1981. The final report appeared in 1982. It was initiated by the Norwegian parliament. The investigation was led by sociology-professor Gudmund Hernes and was inspired by, at that time, recent American sociology and game theory and based on Max Weber's definition of power. The report focused particularly on the increased power of mass media and organized interest groups and on how the state was split into sectors where the negotiating parties had more common than conflicting interests. This was called the theory of "the segmented state". The second investigation was also initiated by the Norwegian parliament, named the "investigation of power and democracy" and ran from 1998 to 2003. The investigation was led by professor of political science Oyvind Osterud. Osterud was working in the tradition of the well-known Norwegian political sociologist Stein Rokkan. Another central actor in the investigation was sociology-professor Fredrik Engelstad. They found that the most important change of power relations in Norway was that democracy as a formal system of decision-making was retreating. What happened in the formal political channels got less significance. Public reform movements and mobilizing mass-parties were weakened.

These themes will be the topic of my paper. As a central work of clinical sociology in Norway it will be viewed in the context of clinical sociology in the country

What do the SSRI pills do? Users experiences of antidepressants at the crossroads of bodies, minds and medicine

This paper explores the experiences of users of SSRIs, the antidepressants that were launched in late 1980s and early 1990s. The focus is on the experiences and understandings of how the pills work, from the users' perspective, put in dialogue with current theorizations of the body and the mind.

The starting point is the tensions that understandings of depressions opens, as it is on the one hand a psychiatric/psychological/mind problem, on the other that it is diagnosed and recognized to a large extent through bodily signs and behaviors, such as not eating, not sleeping, crying. It is also today mainly a problem that is treated by SSRIs/pills, with the popularized idea that SSRIs work through changing the body, the chemical balance in the brain. Theoretically I will draw on Nikolas Rose's conceptualization of the Neurochemical self, as well as Elizabeth Wilson's effort to build models that opens up for interactions and fluidity between mind, brain and body. Through the interviews I will tentatively explore how the body and biology figures in the experiences of the users of SSRI.

Analytically I will suggest that even when users' experience the drugs to work, their experience is characterized by instability, uncertainty and unpredictability. This in relation to how the pills work, if they work, if something has changed, and what has changed, as well as why change has occurred. The imagined clarity of biological explanations are nowhere to be seen.

Finally I will make an effort to place the experiences of the users in a wider societal context: what kind of subjects are they becoming and how does that relate to normality and pathology?

My study is part of the larger project AFTER THE SUCCESS WITH THE NEW GENERATION ANTIDEPRESSANTS: EXPERIENCES, PRACTICES, DISCOURSES AND CHANGES OF THE SELF.

Inequidades en mortalidad materna por departamentos en Colombia para lo años 2000, 2005 y 2008

La salud de las maternas es uno de los ocho Objetivos del Desarrollo del Milenio, donde se planteó la disminución de la mortalidad materna en un 75% desde 1990 hasta el 2015; meta que no ha sido alcanzada. En los países en desarrollo, entre estos Colombia, se presenta el 99% de los casos. El objetivo de este estudio ecológico es describir las inequidades en mortalidad materna a partir de la evaluación del exceso de riesgo por departamentos colombianos, comparados con las mejores Razones de Mortalidad materna (RMM) del mundo, para tres años.

Se calcularon las RMM para todos los departamentos Colombianos y para todas las causas de mortalidad para los años 2000, 2005 y 2008. Se describieron las principales causas de mortalidad materna en Colombia y se calculó el exceso de riesgo a través de la Fracción Atribuible (FA), comparando cada departamento con la mejor RMM del mundo.

Para estos años en cada departamento colombiano las peores RMM estuvieron entre 100 y 1000 por 100.000 nacidos vivos y las mejores entre 10 y 100, mientras que la mejor del mundo estuvo entre 1 y 10. Las principales causas de mortalidad materna en Colombia, para estos años fueron: otras afecciones obstétricas no clasificadas y trastornos hipertensivos del embarazo, parto y puerperio. Se encontró un exceso de riesgo en la mortalidad materna para todos los departamentos mayor al 90% para los años evaluados.

La gran brecha existente entre departamentos Colombianos y entre Colombia y los países desarrollados en las RMM, evidencian una clara inequidad en salud, dado que estas muertes son innecesarias, evitables e injustas. Esto implica la necesidad de generar estrategias para disminuir la inequidad a partir de las políticas sanitarias en salud materna.

The late entrance of Brazilian social sciences into the biodiversity conservation debate

This article intends to describe the insertion process of Brazilian social sciences in the environmental debate and, more specifically, in the discussion on biodiversity conservation. It aims to demonstrate the primacy of natural scientists in the initial construction of the field, outlining some explanations for the abstention of the social scientists in this first period. Following the process of incorporation of social sciences into the debate, this article tries to show the main contributions of anthropology, sociology and political sciences to the matter, and to map the debate in the Brazilian academic context. At last, we introduce the expectations of the main authors in the debate about the future of social research in the nature conservation field.

Steps towards an understanding of financialization's impact on Brazilian cities

An unprecedented connection with financial markets has characterized Brazil's real estate markets in the recent years, as a range of institutional and regulatory reforms have been implemented with the aim of turning the urban built environment into something closer to a financial asset. One side of these developments has been the possibility of securitizing mortgage debts by standardizing contracts and protecting lenders from default risks. The state's role in promoting a market for mortgage-backed securities in Brazil is undeniable, even though the market itself is still incipient when compared to other countries. But the other, and equally important side of the picture, has been the growing (and unprecedented) number of large developers issuing stocks and bonds in Brazil's stock exchange from 2005 on. This paper aims to discuss some of the consequences of this process by looking, first, at how access to financial markets has allowed real estate developers to expand vigorously in the past five to ten years, opening new branches and establishing joint ventures in major metropolitan areas across the country. Secondly, we attempt to understand how this increased interpenetration of financial and real estate markets has promoted huge changes in major cities in Brazil by encouraging large-scale developments such as multifunctional projects and gated communities. A key theoretical conclusion seems to be reasonable in the light of this study: as finance has flooded the real estate circuit with return-seeking money, developers have engaged in ambitious, and sometimes risky, ventures to increase their revenues and boost their profits in order to please their shareholders. The recent property boom in Brazil has been, therefore, mostly beneficial to financial investors, especially foreign-based. This is consistent with theories that have been dealing with the financialization of the capitalist economy.

In the middle of the story: Reflecting on feminist theory, epistemology, and practice in engaging gender non-conforming persons on the Cape Flats communities of South Africa

This presentation will reflect on the ways in which feminist theory and epistemology may both enable and disable reflexive research practice when engaging gender non-conforming subjects, specifically women, who reside on the Cape Flats of post-colonial South Africa.

Very little research has been conducted on the Cape Flats in the Western Cape of South Africa, and there are similarly minimal accounts of feminist engagement with the Cape Flats' communities of South Africa. Although most persons in the Western Cape, and concentrated on the Cape Flats in particular, are raced as 'coloured' (of mixed racial ancestry spanning over approximately the last three hundred and fifty years) and predominantly working-class, these communities and the persons who inhabit them, have generally not been the subject of research in current South Africa. As both insider and outsider to the Cape Flats, where racial, class, and gender dynamics operate in complex and often contradictory ways, I am interested in reflecting on the multiple ways in which my position as a feminist researcher in a specific space within the post-colony, raced as 'coloured', both allow and disallow an articulation of experience by gender non-conforming subjects, women in particular, who live on the Cape Flats. How is feminist theory and epistemology useful in this specific engagement? What does the space, between insider and outsider, allow for feminist practice? And how, in this 'in-between' space occupied by a feminist researcher, liaising with subjects as authors of their lived experience, is feminist theory made?

Asistencialismo y salud en el marco de las políticas sociales dirigidas a personas mayores en Chile: El caso del programa vinculos (Servicio Nacional del Adulto Mayor, 2008)

El imaginario social exagera los atributos negativos de la vejez, degradando a las personas mayores. Respecto a lo físico-cognitivo, se han desarrollado una serie de imágenes que los discriminan por no responder fielmente a los patrones de agilidad (física y mental) y juventud imperantes en los tiempos actuales, relacionando a la vejez con la incapacidad, la precariedad y el deterioro. El paradigma de la desvinculación social -como postura teórica e imaginario social- estigmatiza a las personas mayores bajo el supuesto de que su retiro es funcional tanto para la sociedad como para ellos, presión bajo la cual asumen la pérdida de vitalidad y el corto periodo que les resta por vivir. La sociedad obliga a abandonar una vida social productiva, no siendo esto, en ningún sentido, un proceso inevitable o deseado. Bajo la creencia que son inherentemente inactivos-dependientes, dicho paradigma actúa como una mera justificación para ocultar el trato asistencialista-paternalista que el Estado tiene frente a ellos. Las personas mayores suelen ser consideradas una "carga social", lo cual explica el exclusivo énfasis en políticas de seguridad social y salud. Esta última -con el único objetivo de prevenir la generación de enfermedades crónicas que significarían enormes costes para la salud pública-, pretende mantener las capacidades funcionales de las personas mayores mediante la promoción de "estilos de vida saludables"; tendencia fuertemente transmitida también en aquellos Programas diseñados para el desarrollo de otros tópicos. La ejecución del Programa VÍNCULOS demuestra ser parte de dicha inclinación al poner por sobre sus objetivos formales, el desarrollo de un "activismo" centrado en la "vida saludable" y el entretenimiento, desdiciendo el rol protagónico de la persona mayor organizada, en la producción creativa de su propia intervención en salud.

Imaginario sobre la vejez de jóvenes universitarios: Un estudio comparativo entre alumnos de medicina, psicología y trabajo social (Universidad de Granada, España)

Todo imaginario social se define a partir de los elementos que constituyen el tiempo y espacio social en el que se encuentra asentado.

La valoración de la juventud por sobre la vejez se ha radicalizado en nuestros días. En una sociedad basada en el trabajo-consumo, el concepto productivo-joven domina, y todo aquello que encierre el peligro de alejar a los individuos de su potencial físico y mental, es considerado una enfermedad.

Existe un temor generalizado por envejecer ("gerofobia"), basado en la supuesta improductividad, dependencia, y deterioro físico-cognitivo de las personas mayores.

La subvaloración social que sufren las personas mayores en función de este imaginario, se traduce en su exclusión social. A nivel personal, las afirmaciones estereotipadas contenidas en el imaginario se convierten en profecías autocumplidas en las vidas de las personas mayores, situación -cuyo no cuestionamiento- garantiza la repetición conservadora de lo instituido.

Considerando los efectos negativos del imaginario, es indispensable concertar esfuerzos en pos de un cambio social que elimine la discriminación y permita la participación activa de las personas mayores.

La presente investigación pretende dilucidar el tipo de imaginario (negativo/positivo) de los alumnos de licenciatura, cuya eventual salida laboral es el trabajo con personas mayores desde una perspectiva "Bio-Psico-Social"; alumnos de Medicina, Psicología y Trabajo Social de la Universidad de Granada, España, durante el año académico 2011/12.

El estudio, haciendo uso de un cuestionario de diferenciales semánticos que aborda a las personas mayores desde las perspectivas: biológica-sanitaria, psicológica-conductual y social-relacional, establece interesantes diferencias entre los alumnos según disciplina estudiada, lo cual permite llegar a importantes conclusiones y reflexiones referentes a la postura que estos jóvenes tienen frente a las personas mayores, y cómo esto puede repercutir en las condiciones de vida de este grupo etario en el futuro.

Saberes expertos y participación ciudadana en conflictos medio-ambientales en Latino América

Cada vez con más intensidad, la sociedad civil reclama tener mayor participación en políticas públicas y en la toma de decisiones que las afectan directa o indirectamente, especialmente en temáticas vinculadas a la actividad industrial y más aún cuando ésta conlleva impactos ambientales y para la comunidad. En estos escenarios, nociones como "sociedad" y "ambiente" se presentan interrelacionadas, dando paso al surgimiento de nuevas caracterizaciones, conceptos, problemáticas y movimientos en el ámbito de lo "socioambiental".

Por otra parte, es indudable que existe un incremento de controversias en relación a materias científicas o tecnológicas que exceden a las comunidades usuales (expertos científicos y tecnólogos) y que este aumento adquiere una especial configuración en el escenario Latinoamericano.

Interesa el llamado "giro participativo", que alude a como la academia teoriza acerca de la irrupción de la ciudadanía en temas científicos, pero fundamentalmente nos interesa analizar y comprender la construcción de estrategias y posiblemente de saberes expertos por parte de la ciudadanía para constituirse en una voz privilegiada en estas temáticas.

Tomaremos casos de estudio que involucran a aquellos conflictos con más incidencia en el debate sobre lo ambiental en la Argentina y Chile.

Interesa analizar el papel de los expertos en la construcción del reclamo que realizan asambleas ciudadanas enfocadas en problemáticas ambientales, indagando cómo se relacionan saberes expertos y sociedad civil.

El conflicto por el uso de los recursos hídricos en la cuenca del río napo (Ecuador y Perú)

El objetivo de este artículo es analizar el conflicto por el uso de los recursos hídricos en la cuenca del río Napo en los territorios de Ecuador y Perú. Para tal, está basado en fuentes documentales y en entrevistas con líderes de los movimientos sociales de los dos países, que son discutidos con la literatura acerca de la gestión transfronteriza y la del conflicto socioambiental.

Esta cuenca es compartida por dos países que ya estuvieron en guerra por territorio. Sin embargo, hoy se encuentran iniciativas de cooperación en las zonas de frontera entre los dos países. La integración sur-americana también hay visado el mejoramiento de los transportes entre los países, contribuyendo con la cooperación.

El río Napo es un afluente del río Amazonas, y su origen es en Ecuador y flui para el Perú, donde desagua en el río Amazonas, cerca de Iquitos. Este río es muy importante para el transporte fluvial, regulado por el Tratado de Comercio y Navegación entre Ecuador y Perú. En la cuenca del Napo hay varias áreas protegidas, como el Parque Yasuní en Ecuador, pero también hay muchos lotes de concesiones petroleras. La explotación del petróleo en Ecuador especialmente, pero también en Perú, dejó un camino de contaminación de los recursos hídricos, en la Amazonia. Esta contaminación es una fuente de conflictos con las poblaciones indígenas que viven en la región. Además, en esta región hay el proyecto de hidrovia del río Napo, uno de los proyectos de la IIRSA, que visa mejorar el transporte del continente.

En texto apunta que las tensiones tienen origen en las distintas evaluaciones de la naturaleza de los grupos sociales involucrados en la cuestión.

Y indica las relaciones de fuerza entre los actores que determinan las decisiones sobre el uso de los recursos hídricos.

Collective action on natural resources: The participation of rural communities in the management council for the environmental protection area of Guaratuba

This paper aims to discuss the relationship between the rural communities from the Southern bay of Guaratuba, Parana, and the Management Council of the Environmental Protection Area of Guaratuba, an instrument for public environmental management institutionalized by the process of implementation of this Conservation Unit. The spatial arrangement for use and management of natural resources prescribed by the Management Plan has not contemplated the internal rules of the community concerning the control and use of the resources. The Management Council of this Conservation Unit, taking for granted its democratic, participationist and deliberative basis, would be the next step towards the inclusion of these subjects in the public arena of negotiation. Through documental analysis and direct observation of the participation of these communities in the Management Council, however, it's possible to say the collective action is linked to historical territorialization processes constituted before the creation of this Environmental Protection Area.

Limits of the new social movements theory to comprehend the environmentalism of the poor: A brief tematic overlook

This presentation raises questions for the post-materialist analysis of the New Social Movements Theory for understanding the (re)emergence of social movements from less urban and less industrialized Southern societies. In the Brazilian rural context, these movements highlight the new statute of the so-called Traditional Peoples and Communities. The text is empirically based on the political struggles of the social movement known as Articulação Puxirão de Povos Faxinalenses in the state of Paraná, which resembles some of the political initiatives of organized indigenous and peasant populations in countries such as India, Mexico and Kenya. It was produced as a response to conflicts and controversies concerning ecological distribution. We thus attempt to identify the contributions of the environmentalism of the poor or of political ecology to this perspective, as suggested by Martinez-Alier, Ramaschandra Guha, Boaventura de Sousa Santos and Enrique Leff, as a possibility for new epistememes derived from new practices with great significance to the recent social transformations underway in Southern countries.

Traditional sociability as modernity: Critical reflections on some conceptions of "traditional" sociability in Brazil

When we speak on modernity some basic concepts come up, for example, well-established boundaries between public and private, free and rational individuals to act as they please and the rationalization and efficiency of the most distinctive institutional frameworks that make up society. These are basically some key ideas that underpin the concept of modernity sociologically, although contemporary studies show that in the West such proceedings were not historically developed with completeness and accuracy. Anyway, it was with this narrow and provincial conception of modernity that interpretations and analysis on the institutions and Brazilian sociability were performed, so that the diagnosis often resulted in the negativity of national modernity for non completion of those conceptions guiding. Aiming extend the sociological dimension of the concept of modernity, basing it on a concrete historical process, we aim at the way understood as traditional sociability, more specifically those in which there was the presence of a free man and dependent on the Brazilian slave society, to related and entangled with modern institutions and some imaginary, so to only exist through them. Relations which prevailed all kinds of domination and submission and that not had reference explicit to rules institutional or moral between formally free men before demonstrating a pre-modernity or a unconcluded modernity in Brazil, shows a proper configuration of modernity that cannot be understood with only the nation as a guiding methodology and those key ideas of the concept of hegemonic and Eurocentric modernity. Thus, from the Brazilian experience, to understand more fruitfully modernity and its settings in non-Western and peripherals societies is need to resize critically and extend the epistemological foundations of the concept.

Gender mainstreaming in police and apparel companies in Tamil Nadu for human resource development and improving organizational effectiveness

Need for gender mainstreaming in Apparel companies in Tamil Nadu for human resource development and improving organizational effectiveness.

The efficiency and effectiveness of any organization depends on the optimum utilization of the Human Resource in the organization. Presently with this objective there has been a converted move in India to provide for 33 ½ % reservations to women in government sector employment. This move and the large intake of women in other organisation poses several pertinent questions with regard to gender bias, right organization climate affecting the optimum utilization of the women employees for achieving the objectives of the organizations and fulfillment of the needs of the women. Gender equality is an integral part of human rights that aims to promote the full participation of women and men in society.

Since the introduction of liberalization policies in 1991 there has been considerable growth of export earnings in Apparel companies with its advantage in low production costs, abundant resources of raw material and unskilled /skilled labour forces.. The Apparel in India boom facilitated the setting up of production units that employees skilled and unskilled labour of which 80% are women workers. The phenomenal growth of use of female labour is being observed. Nevertheless women are in fact under - represented in managerial jobs although they are over presented in the sewing, finishing and packaging sections.

With an objective of integrating women employees into the mainstream functioning of the organization, the descriptive and cross sectional study was conducted on a sample represented by women workers in Apparel companies in Tamilnadu.

Data were collected, analyzed and the findings resulted in making recommendations to address the various intervention that needs to be taken for mainstreaming of gender in Tamil Nadu for Human Resource Development and thus improving organizational performance.

Sea risk and refuge areas. Analysis of the governance process and public participation in the decision of the refuge areas in Spain

The main purpose of this paper is the study of maritime risk controversy and the governance process, using the analytical tool ANT we will try to map the controversy on the establishment of refuge areas for ships in distress in Spain. Using a Qualitative Analysis of the ten discussion groups conducted in the project (Ref. CSO2008-00 324) we analyze the differences of the risk perception between the population of the atlantic and the mediterranean areas and the solutions proposed by the stakeholders involved in the decision process.

On the 25th of April, 2007 the European Parliament agreed the modification of the directive 2002/59/EC which establish that Member States should draw up measures to give refuge to ships in distress in their ports or in any other sheltered areas in order to limit the consequences of accidents at sea. The directive indicate that Member States should compile previous information about possible sheltered areas on the coast. The previous information should include a description of the physical, environmental and social characteristics of the places and the means and facilities available to assist the ships that had an accident or those which are fighting against the consequences of a polluting spillage.

We understand that the Directive of the European Union about Refuge Ports opens a new controversy in the context of maritime security, the importance of social aspects when it comes to determine the shelter areas or ports of refuge in Spain is nowadays one of the biggest problems to apply this Community Directive. The solution of the problem, the informatic program PRISMA announced by the Ministry of Public Works in Spain in February 2011, will be well received by the population as representing a protocol in emergency situations. But this program does not take into account the specific regional demands.

Aspects of inequality in Brazil: Cases of socioenvironmental injustice in Fortaleza – Ceará

In societies under the capitalist system, the access to goods and services differs according to social strata, mainly in Latin American countries. Such inequality becomes apparent when the focus lies on the situation of housing. Studies about the growth of Brazilian cities indicate that the housing areas addressed to high-middle class and to lower class are not equally spread, especially in areas of great real estate appreciation. In Brazil, urban problems are an expression of environmental injustice, since they are produced within a setting of power relations and struggle, which favors social inequalities. Under the perspective of social theory and the symbolic comprehension of space in socio-environmental conflicts taking place in the city of Fortaleza, Ceará, Brazil, this research aims at analyzing how socio-spatial inequalities play out in low-income and high-middle class housing in areas of environmental vulnerability. The analysis is based in a comparative study of two cases located in the Papicu neighborhood: the favela Pau Fininho and the gated community Village San Carlo, which were built in the 1980s and are both deemed irregular in socio-environmental aspects. Considering the local history of urbanization, we will shed light on social and environmental contrasts as features of a reproduction of inequality. This study demonstrates the existence of long-lasting urban problems which, related to social and political limitations, add up to the situation of socio-environmental injustice and socio-spatial inequality in this Brazilian city. The right to the city and to environment as well as the improvement of urban replanning remain the greatest challenges for reaching a sustainable and equal society.

Dry law in Belo Horizonte: Evaluation of the profile of the drunk driver

Traffic accidents kill many people in Brazil. Thus proposed laws that could contain high levels of violence in traffic between the laws highlight the new traffic code and Prohibition(11.705/08), which brought major changes in the level of alcohol allowed in the blood of drivers Brazilians.

In this sense the aim of this paper is to analyze the profile of drivers caught driving drunk in traffic inspections of traffic in the city of Belo Horizonte / Brazil in the year 2011. The methodology was based on the collection of information contained in police reports (BO) produced in the years 2010 and 2011 - occurred when the inspections and interviews with the creators of the campaign to curb the transit of drunk driving drivers. It is noteworthy that in Brazil, drunk driving is a crime, but no victim. In this case a moralizing aspect of social order to be able to control drunk drivers. It is known that 95% of drivers who drive drunk are young and male

30 years later - From access to housing to consolidation of housing settlements: Revisiting the case of Recife, Brazil

Housing deficit has been addressed by the markets and by government policies worldwide. Since public policies are the means that has been used to address this issue, they have become crucial to partially ensure access to housing to the low income population. Most governments went through a phase of denial of the problem, followed by the adoption of actions for the removal of poorly constructed homes. Thereafter, policies were adopted towards direct provision of new housing units, later perceived as ineffective in targeting the poorest. There was a shift in this paradigm from top-down to bottom-up approaches. It is noteworthy that this housing issue suffers interference to a greater or lesser extent, of different ideologies and interests ranging from the capital expansion in three levels: internationally, nationally and locally. The Brazilian case, for example, is influencing as well as been influenced by Latin American experiences. From what can be observed today, it is possible to claim that most governments have become more tolerant to people's initiatives to housing themselves, looking for alternatives towards the regularization of land tenure and the improvement of housing conditions to ensure the necessary framework for the permanence of residents in already occupied settlements. This paper expands this debate by providing evidence from a case study in Recife, Brazil in dealing with these issues over the last thirty years.

Juventud y trabajo en la agroindustria cañaviera de alagoas (Brasil)

El estado de Alagoas, en el Nordeste de Brasil, fue recién elegido en una encuesta como titular del peor Índice de Desarrollo de la Juventud (IDJ) del país. Eso significa que el público más joven de aquel espacio se encuentra en graves dificultades en las áreas de educación, trabajo, seguridad, salud, etc. En este contexto se destaca la industria cañaviera local, que a pesar de haber disminuido su participación en el PIB (Producto Interno Bruto) del estado en los últimos años, sigue siendo el sector que emplea a más personas de las zonas económicamente menos desarrolladas, como la "Zona da Mata" y el "Sertão" de Alagoas. Para muchos jóvenes - especialmente los que tienen un elevado déficit educativo - la entrada en la producción de este sector es la única alternativa para construir una carrera sentada en garantía de los derechos laborales. Sin embargo, si por un lado la usina de azúcar y alcohol pone a disposición de los jóvenes algunas ofertas de empleo - en su mayoría en las zonas rurales - y no requiere una rigurosa formación académica y técnica, por el otro hay un marcado deterioro de las condiciones de trabajo, las que provocan un alto desgaste psicofísico de los trabajadores. Así, el estudio aquí presentado intenta captar los significados que los jóvenes construyen de su trabajo en una industria que sigue siendo sinónimo de precariedad y sobreexplotación de mano de obra; sigue intentando detener a sus percepciones y demandas más allá del mundo del trabajo, que implica la comprensión de su relación con el medio familiar, escolar y otros dotados de carácter socializador. La metodología consiste en entrevistas semi-estructuradas con los jóvenes - niños y niñas -, miembros de la familia y los empleadores de las ciudades de Alagoas (Brasil) Teotônio Vilela e Água Branca.

Limites e possibilidades da governança da Água - O caso da bacia hidrográfica da Billings

O conceito de governança compreende a ação conjunta do Estado e da sociedade civil na busca de soluções e resultados para problemas comuns. No entanto, nessa relação os conflitos são latentes, pois entendemos que a noção de governança da água inclui não só aspectos de gestão, mas também aspectos sociais bem como questões políticas que envolvem poder e conflitos, justificando, portanto, a apropriação dos conceitos gramscianos de Estado e sociedade civil para subsidiar nossa análise. Assim, ao partirmos das Leis Estaduais nº 9866/97 e nº 13.579/09 como exemplos da busca pela institucionalização de um novo modelo de gestão das águas, em especial no que diz respeito aos órgãos colegiados e participativos da Bacia Hidrográfica do Reservatório Billings, bem como da noção de governança da água e dos conceitos gramscianos de Estado e sociedade civil, procuraremos lançar um olhar crítico acerca da adoção deste novo modelo de gestão das águas, pois acreditamos que embora elas representem um aumento da possibilidade da participação social, também fazem parte de algumas medidas adotadas no âmbito de uma reforma neoliberal do Estado brasileiro

Young female engagement in delinquency in south Brazil: Biographic and visual narratives

Young female engaging in delinquency in south Brazil: biographic and visual narratives Hermílio Santos (PUCRS, Brazil) hermilio@puers.br This paper analyses the interpretation of "life-world" of young females with direct experience with violence, i.e., that committed offences. It analyses how and why female adolescents are engaged in the "world of crime", exploring not the elements usually discussed in the sociological literature concerning this issue – that means, the objective conditions of life of those youths –, but the subjective interpretation of the actors on the social context (analyses of the life-world). In opposition to the post-structuralist approach, that do not recognize to the subject any relevant role on the knowledge that could be obtained of the reality, the paper is based on biographic and visual narratives, and analyzes: a) how these youths narrates and interpret their biographies; b) the subjective mechanisms of meaning construction on the life-world, with special attention to the experience with violence, and c) the forms of subjective foundation on the belonging to their life-world. Here biography is understood as the description made by the individual themselves, of processes and experiences that extended through the life, that means, written or oral presentation of history of life. In this sense, biographies and biographic trajectories are not purely individual phenomena, but social ones, since they are made of specific sequences of isolated actions among the possible actions in the social world. The biographic narrative offers important elements for the analysis not only on the narrators life, but especially on the connections between the individual and his group or community, considering however that any narrative is an interpretation based on a specific biographic situation, according to Schutz. In this sense, the access to the experiences accumulated and consolidated in their biographies permits the analysis of the subjective interpretation of the actors.

Precarious and informal work of street scavengers in Fortaleza, Brazil

The crisis of unemployment and the emergence of recycling industries has favored an increase in the number of trash scavengers in large urban centers, in associations or private junkyards, small-scale businesses, first links of the recycle chain. In the city of Fortaleza/Brazil, around 9 to 10 thousand people work as street scavengers. The aim of this study is to understand the working conditions of associated as opposed to unaffiliated scavengers working in private junkyards and to identify the impact of this activity in the health conditions of these informal workers in a precarious activity. The qualitative method consisted of interviews, focal groups and ethnography. The scavenging work consists of collecting recyclable materials in the streets, empty lots or dumpsters of houses and apartment buildings. The average daily earnings are very small and the extreme poverty of these workers is obvious. In relation to health, workers report back pain, traffic accidents, infections and injuries. However, associations can be a way to give the workers a sense of identity and inclusion. Although the scavenging activity remains an informal, unsecured and precarious work in both organizations, associations can promote a process of "symbolic deprecariatization", which can be beneficial to street scavengers and a model to workers in informal precarious activities.

La violencia escolar

El estudio de la violencia en la escuela presenta algunos retos para los que proponen su análisis sociológico. Estos desafíos son los principales aspectos de la definición conceptual del término violencia, las diferentes formas presentadas por el fenómeno, así como la multiplicidad de factores que pueden interferir con la producción. Por lo tanto, este estudio tiene como objetivo determinar que los actos considerados violentos dentro de la escuela por los diferentes actores involucrados en este espacio y entender sus significados. La preocupación que guía la producción de este trabajo es que algunos actos considerados violentos pueden perturbar la escuela y su crecimiento, actuando sobre los actos de proceso de enseñanza-aprendizaje, por lo tanto, en el logro educativo de los jóvenes y la calidad de la educación. El escenario elegido para la investigación fue una escuela estatal, que se encuentra en las tierras bajas de Nilópolis del Estado de Río de Janeiro. Centrado la atención en dos clases de segundo grado de la escuela secundaria y observó la dinámica de las relaciones que se proporcionan en el interior de la escuela. Estas dos clases se eligieron a este nivel y grado, ya que más se escucha las quejas de la 1ª y 2ª grado de la escuela secundaria.

Food as an identity mark between Italian immigrants and their descendants in the south of Brazil

At this presentation we aim to analyze the role of food for the Italian descendants that migrated to 'Rio Grande do Sul' at the beginning of the century. From our point of view, food is used as an identity symbol and its abundance is associated with prosperity. In the south of Brazil, European immigrants settled in small colonies, that even under the Brazilian policies' parameters, it aimed to reproduce the European peasant model. The colonization process in the mountain region of Rio Grande do Sul state begins in 1875, while the colonization process in the central region, in 1877-78. These immigrants were mostly poor Catholic peasants. This family migration was marked by the expectation of the Cucagna, a land where salamis grow on trees and the conquest of wealth would be a matter of time and some work. That is, apart from rising socially and becoming land-lords, these populations wanted food, and in abundance. Food is a process that depends on family and collective work organization, specially among peasants. For the case of Italian descendants in Rio Grande do Sul, the difference does not rely only in the food's choice, but mostly in the constant confirmation of abundance of food and great variety of dishes. We believe that the emphasis in abundance represents the prosperity and the wish to perpetuate it, but it also works for a cultural differentiation. It is important for us to understand the preservation of an Italian cuisine such as grostoli and fortaia, as well as the replacement of some typical peasant dishes, such as minestra, by other more identified with the urban culture, such as capeletti soup. On the other hand, we also observed the incorporation of typical Brazilian dishes, such as barbecue grill and a hybridization of Italian and Gaucha cuisines, such as galeto (cockereel).

The progressive democratization of higher education and the challenges to social closure of legal professions

The present paper aims to contribute to the articulation between the graduates' transition studies and the sociology of professions, starting from the analysis of the restructuring of policies, labor markets and the higher education democratization that, in different ways, shape the professions and career paths of Law graduates.

In the last three decades, university education expansion, particularly in Law area (known to be highly selective in terms of social class), both in terms of courses and vacancies number, allowed the widespread access to higher education, greatly increasing the relative and absolute volume of these graduates. Simultaneously, there have been profound recompositions of labour markets and occupational structure in legal professions, changes which are associated with the emergency of economic markets globalization, such as the growing of salaried professionals and the emergence of law firms, the privatization of sectors formerly under state domain and the spread of atypical forms of employment, visible in progressive flexibility and job insecurity. Considering these scenarios, we try to reflect about the ways in which different actors, such as State and Law professional groups, historically associated with social and economic privileges, a specialized body of knowledge, autonomy and professional exclusivity, experience and respond to these changes and reconfigurations. In other words, we try to understand how higher education democratization affects the monopolistic strategies of legal professions.

This reflection will benefit from the confrontation of different sources of analysis and its preliminary results: analysis of statistics and indicators about the evolution of graduates; content analysis of institutional and political documents that take into account these changes and trends and the strategies promoted to face them.

With this paper it is expected to foster a broader theoretical discussion about the contexts and challenges faced by legal professions, while attending to the specificities of the Portuguese experience.

Familia (s): Las distintas prácticas de la "solidaridad" en el mundo contemporáneo

La familia es cada vez más objeto de la atención de los científicos sociales por la diversidad de formas que se desarrolla, así como su importancia como un valor social y moral. Partiendo el principio de que todo fenómeno social, situado en una determinada tiempo y el espacio, debe ser entendido a través de una dimensión relacional con otro fenómeno o evento social, quiere decir que hay un análisis de las formas de sociabilidad en las familias sin tener en cuenta las influencias de carácter político, social, económico y cultural de la sociedad. La familia en el contexto contemporáneo se configura como una geometría variable y elástica. Cuando se presiona por el cambio social, adquirirán una pluralidad de los intercambios sociales y entre generaciones cada vez más complejo, que abarca no sólo el espacio de la casa, sino también el espacio de la calle (vecinos, instituciones, etc.) En este contexto, este estudio pretende analizar la correlación entre los cambios sociales en la sociedad contemporánea y sus huellas en los arreglos familiares diferentes de las dimensiones sociales de género, clase, raza / etnia y edad de generación / ampliar el horizonte en busca de nueva discusión marcos interpretativos en la dialéctica de la vida social. Desde esta perspectiva, nos encontramos con que la vida política, económica y social como el proceso de globalización, la reducción del papel del Estado en garantizar los derechos sociales, las relaciones laborales precarias y la falta de políticas públicas causar cambios significativos en las familias de la sociabilidad, en la que los ancianos surgen en este contexto como sostén de la familia, el proveedor de la generación más joven, así como cambios en el desempeño de roles sociales en su organización, los vínculos sociales y emocionales y tensiones intergeneracionales que penetran a través del tiempo.

The AfroDigital museum: Art works, citizenship, and technology

This paper is about the creation of the AfroDigital Museum, a national project that aims to question and overcome socially embedded classifications and hierarchies. A broad consensus seems to have been reached in Brazil that Afrodescendants have the right to reparation and justice. A digital media offers new opportunities since information forgotten by traditional institutions for archiving and displaying art works, documents and collective memories can be quickly recovered, reproduced and made available to a wider public. This paper's objective is first of all to analyze the artistic potential of a digital museum. The paper will evaluate aspects that are very often assumed to be inherent to the language of digital media. Aside from the restriction on access faced by poorer sections of the population, the text will point out the limits imposed on creativity, interactivity and communication. Despite all these aspects, the paper will analyze how digital museums have allowed new experiences which are potentially different from those provided by traditional museums. The second point to be explored concerns the relation between art works and the emergence of social movements that fight against discrimination. Identities are always constructed and perceiving how actors and motivations can be represented in such constructions is essential to evaluating the development of digital museums.

Civilizing process and political struggle: Violence, emotional control and political participation in the information society

This paper discusses changes in contemporary forms of political participation, linked to information and communication technologies, particularly the prospect of emotional control and mitigation of violence in the forms of political protests in Brazil of the XXI century. Performs a reflection on these changes as the civilizing process of contemporary politics in the light of conceptions of political theorists such as Bernard Manin, Jurgen Habermas and the concepts of tecnificacion and civilizing process and the sociologist Norbert Elias. Discusses how the flash-mob, performative protest, criticism on social networks, the polish and smoothness of the parliamentary debates arise as a counterpoint to strike, to picket the invasion, the march. Considers the tendency of a less violent political action, more emotionally controlled, finally, more civilized, as the prospect of formation of new modes of consciousness and political action.

Information society, public policies and the social management of the subjectivity

The subjectivity of contemporary subjects have now more market and political value. Companies profit from invested advertising with the main target (or "good") being individual and collective subjectivity. Governments also benefit through a series of public policies that aim to tell a better quality of life and an inclusion in a supposedly "new" society. The 'other side' is the constant feedback, with the "political profit" increasingly present. The objective is to understand how governments and private companies appropriate individual and collective subjectivity for earning their characteristic profits in the current context of cognitive capitalism, from the traditional financial profit to the power and political profit, having the discussion about citizenship and democratic participation as a great backdrop for the affirmation and perpetuation of public policies aimed at "inclusion". Among the issues that I intend to expand, I emphasize a reflection about situating subjectivity in the information society. I start from the assumption that institutions increasingly aim the subjectivity of contemporary subjects, whether public or private. I also assume that the public policies of digital inclusion are presented in two ways: 1) reaffirm the common sense of social inclusion, citizenship and improved quality of life, 2) make a profit with the political policies toward "inclusion". Such initiatives are presented as power ideological instances that promote an effect of repetition and constant feedback of their own policies, outlining a scenario in which these "initiatives" are "always necessary" and "always promote" inclusion, appropriation, citizenship etc., having the social management of subjectivity as central to the "success" and multiplication of these programs. For the theoretical framework, I mobilize authors as Guattari (2000), Foucault (1999, 2006), Mattelart (2005, 2006) and Pasquinelli (2008).

Are social rights knocking on the door or are there new forms of regulation of poor women? The new welfare service in Brazil and its recipients

Poor women, especially mothers, have historically been target of regulation from public power so that they can discipline the rest of the family as collaborator of the state. In Brazil, welfare system has recently been organized to permit its universal and continuous access, breaking its tradition of offering punctual services. In this sense, three levels of social care services have been established based on the level of complexity of social vulnerability. The purpose of this paper is to analyze what is called "low complexity services", whose target is composed by poor families living in areas classified as "highly or very highly vulnerable" in a social point of view, as well as women's role to carry out this new approach to population that traditionally has been excluded from social rights. In a local level, assistance offices have been set and a social work team established to attend registered families, including home visits by street level caseworkers. In the Brazilian city of Sao Paulo, the service is outsourced to NGOs, which implies a blurring of the boundary between public and private and impacts on its users according to the characteristic of each organization. A case study about a protestant organization that, as partner of the municipality of Sao Paulo, implemented a family assistance program reveals how this new policy leads, at least locally, to the (re)production of "deserving poor" and "undeserving poor" categories. In this sense, in the context of modernization of social policies in the country, the access to social rights seems to paradoxically go on a par with a new form of regulation of poor people and, ultimately, to lead to a production of new form of inequalities between welfare recipients, women in the majority of cases.

Women autonomy and social policy: Community, religion and new welfare programs at São Paulo, Brazil

In Brazil, welfare system has recently been organized to permit its universal and continuous access, breaking the tradition of offering punctual services. In addition, systematic cash transfer programs have been implemented as one of the principal instrument to fight against extreme poverty. The consolidation of social policy in the country has led to a massive entrance of the poor in the category of welfare recipients, especially women. They are effectively target of Brazilian new welfare services which are essentially family based, what in general rely on women's disposition to care for family. Thus, rather than being recognized as an independent moral agent, poor women are viewed as strong ally of the state, so that social programs can be successful. This mean to provide women with normative action-guiding principles which are often translated as "helping their autonomy". The purpose of this paper is to analyze, in a local level, how those familist/normative new welfare programs have penetrated in poor women's everyday life and how they articulate them with their traditional sociability like community relationships and religious (especially neo-Pentecostal) practices. Ultimately, the study ought to reveal, from the standpoint of feminist ethics, the conflict between those programs and other strategies used by women to pursue autonomy. We take as case study clients of social assistance and health care programs living on the outskirts of the municipality of São Paulo that we have researched over two years, based on ethnography and analysis of life history.

The right of autonomy: Gender and social justice in democratic societies

The emergence of demands from different social movements in recent decades, elicited a reflection within the social sciences about how such claims could be set out. The universalistic content of republican principles is faced with the plurality of values which emanate from the claims of such movements. This is the ground where specific policies are formulated to promote women's autonomy; one of them is the entry into the labor market. If the relation between employment and female autonomy is far from been clear, we mobilize in this article the Rawlsian argument for social justice as a fertile analytical resource to thinking about how such claims may be dealt with in democratic societies.

Cultura energética y comportamiento organizacional. Dos estudios de caso en instituciones universitarias

La ética ambiental ha ido ganando presencia en las instituciones universitarias en los últimos quince años especialmente. En el marco de asunción progresiva de la responsabilidad social y bajo criterios de sostenibilidad, las universidades han ido incorporando a sus estructuras organizativas unidades especialmente dedicadas al diagnóstico y gestión ambiental. Este proceso es generalizado y se ha vinculado con lo que podemos entender como una aprehensión organizacional de la importancia de la responsabilidad social corporativa en el seno de las organizaciones y una progresiva expansión de las tesis conservacionistas y eficientistas. Otra cuestión es hasta qué punto las actuaciones impulsadas en el entorno universitario han coparticipado en la generación de una cultura y conciencia energética en sus comunidades y en el entorno en el que ejercen su función.

Para abordar los principios que sustentan esta política energética universitaria y sus efectos, la comunicación profundiza en contextos socioculturales, políticos y económicos muy diferentes. El primer caso que se presenta es el modelo de gestión de la cultura energética del Instituto Superior Minero Metalúrgico de Moa (Cuba) partiendo de la labor realizada desde el Centro de Estudio de Energía y Tecnología Avanzada. El segundo se centra en el modelo de la Universidad de Zaragoza, (España), a partir del análisis de la política energética, canalizada como en la mayor parte de las universidades públicas españolas, a través de las denominadas "oficinas verdes". En ambos casos, conservación del ecosistema, eficiencia y sostenibilidad son los principios incorporados al comportamiento organizacional universitario con el objetivo de trasladar un renovado concepto de energía no solo como recurso sino fundamentalmente como valor limitado.

La recuperación del ciudadano en la política cultural local

Uno de los rasgos más característicos de la política cultural local de los ayuntamientos españoles desde su conformación al inicio de la transición democrática española ha sido la progresiva usurpación del papel del ciudadano por parte de las instituciones públicas y la implantación de una política cultural que olvidaba precisamente a aquel que discursivamente aparecía como la razón de ser de la acción política en materia cultural: el propio ciudadano. Este se convierte no en sujeto creativo y participativo sino en simple demandante de oferta.

El objeto de esta comunicación es profundizar en las estrategias que en el marco aragonés, en concreto desde el ayuntamiento de Zaragoza (España), se están poniendo en marcha para recuperar al ciudadano, fomentar la cultura democrática y la democracia en cultura.

El análisis estructural de la organización pública local, de las políticas diseñadas y de los actores culturales y sus flujos relacionales, nos permiten analizar el papel que ha jugado la ciudadanía hasta fechas recientes y el cambio que recientemente se está animando. Este proceso de "vuelta a la sociedad civil" tiene sus antecedentes más relevantes en el proceso de participación ciudadana que se desarrolló con motivo de la celebración de la Exposición Universal de 2008 y ha culminado con el diseño de la Estrategia cultural Zaragoza 2010-2020.

La comunicación describe la sociogénesis de un proyecto participativo que es básicamente la narración de un proceso transformador de la propia política cultural local de la ciudad de Zaragoza, ahora inmersa en la revisión del renovado papel que debe jugar la ciudadanía.

Corporate elite organizations and the legitimization of carbon markets: An analysis of the environmental policy-planning network 1996-2010

Carbon markets represent a case in point for the study of the organization of neoliberal markets. Like any market, they have been created and are being regulated by a variety of public and/or private organizations interested in their effective functioning. Carbon markets rely on a specific discourse, corporate environmentalism, according to which environmental destruction is best avoided through market mechanisms and the privatization of environmental goods. It is this discourse that asserts the legitimacy required for the creation and continued functioning of carbon markets.

This paper considers environmental corporate policy groups, such as the World Business Council for Sustainable Development and the G8 Climate Change Roundtable, as sites of production and dissemination of corporate environmentalist discourse on which carbon markets ultimately rest, and looks at the corporate-policy network in which they are embedded. I first present results from a repeated cross sectional analysis of the links between environmental policy groups and the world's 500 largest corporations between 1996 and 2010. Using a judgement sample of major policy groups, I discuss the evolution over time of these organizations' structural network position relative to individual corporations, the different sectors of industry they belong to and the geographic location of their headquarters. I then present a discourse network analysis that examines the main conceptual categories used by the sampled policy groups to support and legitimize carbon markets, and establish a parallel with the corporate-policy network's structure.

This analysis sheds light on the process by which market-legitimizing discourses are constructed. It reveals the major sectoral and geographical lines of fraction between firms, according to their interests in carbon markets. Moreover, it emphasizes the crucial role of environmental policy groups in mediating between the contradictory interests of global corporate elites by developing a response to the climate crisis founded on the expansion of market mechanisms.

Gender equity in policies supporting paid work and caring responsibilities. An intra EU comparison

Three dimensions of policies appear particularly relevant in shaping the institutional context in which men and women in families negotiate their division of responsibilities:

a) the degree to which policies allow women with family responsibilities to remain in the labour market, thus being independent of another person's income, notwithstanding their care responsibilities; that is, the degree to which they allow women to be both "commodified" and "defamilialised" in their ability to provide for themselves, for example through the provision of services (defamilialised decommodification of care work) and leaves (decommodified supported familialism);

b) the degree to which policies acknowledge caring for dependent family members (children, dependent adults, frail elderly relatives) as an activity giving entitlement to financial support in its own right (decommodified supported familialism), for example through care leaves and allowances, and care-linked contributions towards old-age pensions;

c) the degree to which policies support men's taking up of care responsibilities, for example whether fathers are entitled to parental leave and whether there is a reserved quota for them (decommodified supported familialism for men).

Based on the newly developed Multilinks Database on Intergenerational Policy Indicators, which includes all EU27 countries plus Norway and encompasses a variety of measures and policy areas, different policy ap-

Ruptures and continuities in practices of the consolidating of old peripheries

The urbanization processes in Brazilian cities is still marked by the reproduction of inadequate housing and land irregularities, yet we have witnessed different dynamics in the past thirty years. Since the 1980s, there has been a decrease in the growth rate of peripheral areas, accompanied by the growth of slums in urbanized areas. In face of the complexification of the forms of urban irregularities, terms such as "slum" and "irregular settlement" start to become insufficient, being substituted by the general denomination of "squatter settlements". On the other hand, there have been significant achievements in terms of legislation and public policies toward social justice in cities.

This paper seeks to examine and compare public policies intended to the urbanization and regularization of irregular settlements in the periphery that took place between the 1950s and 1970s, and those aimed to squatter settlements during the 1990s and 2000s. In the first part, we will analyze the institutional changes within the public administration after the advent of new institutional frameworks and tools for urban planning, in the wake of the approval of Federal Constitution (1988) and the City Statute (2001).

Then, based on the confrontation of empirical cases from those two periods, in São Paulo metropolis, we shall present the hypothesis that upgrading and regularization of squatter settlements, when not accompanied by instruments of regulation and control of land use, despite some advances, tends to produce similar outcomes. The effectiveness of the policies in the reduction of urban inequalities and the integration of such areas in the city, are then compromised. Finally, we underline the importance of these reflections in face to increasing investments in squatter settlements upgrading and regularization policies, in the Growth Acceleration Program (PAC) in Brazil.

La actividad científica en la universidad Argentina: Un marco para el análisis de los efectos de la política científica sobre la actividad del investigador

A nivel internacional, desde los años noventa, se ha señalado que estamos frente a nuevos modos de hacer y gestionar ciencia. Algunos autores han teorizado sobre la "ciencia posnormal" (Funtowitz y Ravetz; 2000), otros, sobre una ciencia académica y una ciencia "posacadémica" (Ziman, 2000); otros, han despertado encendidas discusiones al presentar la idea de una nueva ciencia no sólo guiada por la búsqueda de la verdad sino también por su aplicabilidad y utilidad, y al sugerir dos modos de producir conocimiento, un "Modo 1" y un "Modo 2" (Gibbons et al. 1994). De manera categórica, los tres enfoques coinciden en señalar el fin de un período clásico en la manera de hacer y gestionar la ciencia y el comienzo de un escenario en el que las demandas y los controles sociales sobre los resultados científicos son mucho más fuertes (Jiménez-Buedo, 2009); tanto en los países desarrollados como en desarrollo (Krishna, 2000).

Así, en América Latina, también se señaló la emergencia de grandes transformaciones en los "modos de producción" de conocimiento, (Sutz, 2001; Dagnino y Tomas, 1999; Vessuri, 1999; Kreimer, 2006). No obstante, no se ha indagado lo suficiente sobre los efectos de la política científica sobre los resultados científicos. Este trabajo busca proporcionar un aporte en este sentido, proporcionando un marco analítico que permita abordar el tema del impacto de la política científica en la actividad de los investigadores universitarios. El análisis se centra específicamente en los efectos que provoca el sistema de incentivos y recompensas que regula la actividad de los mismos, constituido por la serie de instrumentos que reglamentan el acceso diferencial de los mismos a diversos tipos de recursos,

Artist movements to legalize loft living in soho in the 1960s and 1970s

This paper examines artist movements for legalization of living in old light-industry buildings (lofts) in SoHo in New York City in the 1960s and 1970s. Some artists started to live illegally in the lofts in SoHo from the late 1950s and created communities there. Then artists' groups, such as the Artist Tenant Association, SoHo Artist Association and Artist Against the Expressway, initiated movements for changing the zoning resolution in New York City in order to have the right to live safely in the lofts. In 1971, artist movements accomplished their goal and then the artists' district within the SoHo manufacturing zone was constructed.

Scholars, such as Charles Simpson and Sharon Zukin, have previously examined the processes of artist movements in SoHo; however, they did not closely follow the social mobilization processes in chronological order, focusing on multiple social relationships around the artist groups. Utilizing mainly archival materials, such as minutes and correspondence of artist groups, and magazine and newspaper articles, this study explores the processes of artist movements for amending the zoning resolution.

Currently, scholars and urban policymakers have been focusing on artists living in a city area due to their economic, social and cultural values (e.g. creative cities). In the case study of SoHo, artists' social movements were successful. Ironically, however, artists consequently lost their right to live in the lofts because institutionalized artist living in the lofts led to the opening of the loft housing markets and artists had to move out as a result of a rise in rent costs. This paper will explore the possibilities for artist movements and artists' right to live in cities by focusing on the light and shadow of artist movements in SoHo.

El movimiento de solidaridad al pueblo latinoamericano en Japón

En Japón, han existido varios movimientos de solidaridad al pueblo latinoamericano.

Después de la revolución cubana, muchas personas y organizaciones prestaron atención a la nueva práctica social en los países latinos. En los años setenta, aunque el movimiento izquierdista se debilitó en Japón, las corrientes de solidaridad civil no se han desaparecido; ellos se esforzaron por construir nueva relación con los pueblos, especialmente en los países centroamericanos como Guatemala, Nicaragua y El Salvador. Sus metas eran no sólo ayudar las vidas duras de los pueblos, sino que también averiguar la situación social de esas regiones y cambiar la relación desigual de este mundo.

El levantamiento del Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional en 1994 dio un impacto fuerte en estos movimientos en Japón; mucha gente comenzó a mostrar interés al problema de los pueblos indígenas. La idea de los Zapatistas, que han demandado el mundo más justo, se ha compartido por muchas personas y las cooperativas de diversos tipos que antes no habían interesado en los movimientos latinoamericanos.

En mi ponencia, quisiera presentar la historia y las actividades del movimiento de solidaridad en Japón, y analizaré las causas y las relaciones en esta tendencia social.

The community of society: Some notes on the ubiquity of the notion of community in the theory of society of Niklas Luhmann

The formula of the distinction between community and society that Tönnies established in Gemeinschaft und Gesellschaft in 1887 turned out to be, in many aspects, foundational of one of the most important ways in which sociology explains social reality. By taking different shapes, it acquires centrality in the works of Durkheim, Weber, Simmel, Parsons and the members of the Chicago School of Sociology -among others-, turning the notion of "community" into an essential tool for sociological theory. Apart from this, the semantic malleability of the term has allowed it to take a place of relevance in the broader spectrum of the social sciences. This is why community is not just a sociological concept (if it ever was), but a term of reference, be it descriptive or prescriptive, of general use for social thought.

However, in these authors, the distinction community/society refers to a historical passage, as much as it refers to certain and diverse modes of interpersonal relations. ¿Which is it, then, the specificity that the term community has? ¿What distinguishes it from the specificity of society? Or, in any case, ¿how is it defined, what place does it take, what role does it play, this concept, idea or notion of community, within the (or any) theory of society? In this paper we will try to answer these questions within the theory of Niklas Luhmann. Our thesis is that, between the general descriptive use that Luhmann makes of the term "community" and the brief references of the autodescription community/society, it is possible to retrace a path that has already been travelled in many directions by sociology.

Confronting climate catastrophe: The south African climate jobs campaign

South Africa hosted the 17th UN-Conference of the Parties in December 2011 to address the climate crisis facing the world. South Africa is the 13th highest carbon emitter in the world, with a firm commitment to invest in the largest coal fired power stations in the world. The abundance of coal in South Africa, predicted to last for 200 years, also makes this an easy policy choice for government. At the same time, South Africa has high levels of structural unemployment. This is estimated at 40% and has been worsened in the context of the global economic crisis with 1 million jobs being lost in the period 2009-2010. In response progressive civil society established a campaign platform to reduce carbon emissions and address high unemployment through the creation of climate jobs. This paper traces the emergence, role and politics of the '1 million climate jobs campaign' in South Africa. It brings into view the alliances amongst civil society organisations (trade unions, climate justice ngos, academics and grass roots anti-capitalist movements), the capacity built for the campaign and the strategic practices of the campaign. Moreover, the paper highlights the impact, consequences and limits of the campaign before, during and after COP17. Central to the argument of this paper is how emancipatory political practice evokes utopian discourse to incite a new political imagination as part of counter-hegemonic engagement with 17 years of neoliberalisation in post-apartheid South Africa. The '1 million climate jobs campaign' in South Africa is an example of rethinking visions of work, the politics of production and climate justice from below.

Trade unions and the worker cooperative alternative in South Africa:

Post-apartheid South Africa has experienced a rapid growth in cooperative development. In 1994 there was an estimated 1300 formally registered cooperatives. Today there are over 30 000. This quantitative growth in cooperatives is largely the consequence of the Black Economic Empowerment (BEE) policy push by the post-apartheid government. This paper explores two issues. First how the policy of Black Economic Empowerment constructed a discourse which prevented the emergence of radical worker cooperatives in the mainstream. Second, it explores how trade unions have attempted to utilise the worker cooperative alternative to advance a transformative approach to union strategy and challenge BEE from below. In this regard the paper explores three case studies of trade-union linked worker cooperative development. The contexts explored are different: worker cooperatives in the context of university restructuring, an attempted buy out of an enterprise by a union as part of establishing a worker cooperative and finally an attempted take over of an insolvent factory by retrenched workers. The case studies point to the experiences, challenges and lessons learned for transformative union practice in the context of neoliberal restructuring and global capitalist crisis.

Coverage of social capital and utility function of actors involved: Toward a clearer understanding of functions of social capital

Social capital is an attractive, but confusing concept. Although scholars as well as policy makers and practitioners refer to the concept expecting that it will perform some functions for the improvement of society. However, there are some arguments on social capital that are seemingly contradictory to each other. James Coleman, for example, argues that closed networks among parents of high school students enhance their social capital, while Ronald Burt points out that open networks (networks rich in structural holes, borrowing his terminology) increase return of investment of entrepreneurs. Another example of contradictory arguments on social capital is that Alejandro Portes and his colleagues study negative effect of social capital on members of ethnic community, while social capital in general is highly appraised for its positive functions for society.

Why do we witness these contradictions and confusions in the conceptualization of social capital? I would argue that utility function of actors involved and coverage of social capital should be clearly defined to avoid the confusions. Parents of high school students have a different utility function that that of entrepreneurs. Social capital of an ethnic community does not extend beyond its borders, while other types of social capital such as generalized trust cover the whole society. In my presentation I will elaborate this idea referring to empirical findings in Japan as well as in other societies, which would contribute to the clarification of the concept of social capital and the clearer linkage between social capital and rational choice.

Japan's climate change media coverage and politics

Climate change is environmental issue which people cannot see or sense directly. Consequently, media coverage will often play a significant role for the progress and stagnation of its politics. An international research project COMPON will therefore analyze both media and politics and these interactions.

We handle Japanese case and found the differences of article types by publication, categorized by both of primary topic and regional scale. Asahi mainly highlights local problem and Asia, and also emphasizes the importance of changing culture. Yomiuri provides domestic news related economic interests. As an economic newspaper, Nikkei focuses on national policy-making discuss, and economic and energy related issues.

We calculated articles proportion by primary frame. The proportion of policy-making frame was more than half, and especially 66% in 2009. We suppose that this ratio was bigger than any other countries. Instead, "science and technology" and "civil society" categories were remarkably less than 5%.

The annual frequency of climate change articles by publication shows four peaks in 1997, 2001, 2005 and 2008. 1997 is the year the Kyoto Protocol was adopted. 2001 is the year the US withdrew from the Protocol. 2005 is the year this Protocol was enacted. The rapid increasing number after 2007 and declining after 2008 is a common trend with other countries.

We checked which organizations have strong influence on climate change debate using by the DNA's Co-Occurrence algorithm. The result reflects media's cognitive map on the influence of each organizations related. It shows that Japanese government and business individual companies are major players of the climate change policy making. Whereas we found any political parties or major NGOs are not major key players. The weak influence of political parties and politicians is very specific to climate change policy making process in Japan.

High-flying scholars: An empirical study on the decision-making process of scientists using smart pills to enhance performance

Precise question: Pharmaceutical cognitive enhancement (CE) – the use of prescription medication to enhance performance without medical necessity – seems to be on the rise. Little is known about the decision process why people take cognitive enhancement medication. In order to fill this research gap, we set up a decision model in accordance with Rational Choice Theory (RCT). In this model, four classical RCT-decision parameters (benefits, cost, probability of success, probability of detection) and the impact of social norms were considered.

Methods/Data: We conducted a web-based survey consisting of a sample of 1,064 randomly drawn scientists of four German universities.

Results: There was clear evidence that scientists would increase their intake of brain doping medication if they expect higher net-benefits of CE use. An increase of internalized norms against CE use decreases the likelihood of consuming CE medication. There were also indications of three different decision-making patterns. One pattern refers to the rational deliberation of utility and normative beliefs separately (no norm-utility interaction). A second pattern is identified for subjects with a strong internalization of social norms against CE use, leading to a discount of potential benefits (negative norm-utility interaction). In the third pattern, subjects show a high probability of CE use when their net-benefits were increased by a stronger presence of normative influences against CE use (positive norm utility interaction).

Implications: Results suggest that our theoretical approach for describing the determinants of brain doping is valid. One important insight of our results can be derived from the effects of social norms within the decision to use CE medication. Our results also imply preventive means to cope with negative consequences of cognitive enhancement (e.g. by highlighting side-effects).

Learning and (de)alienation in social movements: Considerations from two case studies on anti-poverty community organizing

In the face of globalized capitalism there is evidence that people from various socioeconomic and cultural backgrounds are coming together in new ways to challenge injustice and organize for social change. While every social movement has its unique set of dynamics, there is a potential common thread that can be attributed to the social agents involved in each instance. Each scenario takes place in a particular community in which people have become estranged from their basic human needs and, as a part of globalized capitalism, established a degree of dependency on institutions that are significantly alien to the respective communities. Fundamental to both the problem and the action individuals and groups take in response to it are the dynamic practices, relations, mediations and experiences of human alienation and de-alienation.

For participants in two recent case studies on anti-poverty community organizing, there is evidence of a link between participation in social movement activity and understanding alienation. What were the key artefacts that helped motivate them to participate in the unique manner that they did? How did their participation engage them in new understandings of their communities and ways to overcome conditions of poverty and feelings of powerlessness? What emerges from the narratives of participants is a distinct interest in engaging in activities that provide a sense of empowerment and hopefully contribute to overcoming alienation.

Through a preliminary analysis of their biographies and stories, this paper demonstrates how an understanding of how they overcame distortions of their basic human needs allowed for more positive and effective organizing activities.

"International reports and the reform in education: Reflections on learning"

The reflections on the nature of the Subject brought by philosophy, critical sociology and psychology, in view of the so-called crisis of modernity in contemporary culture, have produced a critical reading of pedagogical propositions about individual training in the globalized society. In the process of examining the generating matrices of pedagogical models on student's collective and individual training, these reflections reveal that the hegemonic concept of training today, in spite of having placed students, their learning and their development at the core of educational concerns, is actually distant from the proposal of educating human beings. Despite the much disseminated concept of training for self-determination and autonomy of the individual, we are before a reductionist concept of training as far as the current system of education is concerned. In other words, nowadays training finds itself deeply affected by other constraints (Flickinger, 2009, p. 65) and far away from any commitment to the roots that have founded its modern concept, which lay back to the ethical connotations of paideia and the expectation of achieving the ideal of self-determination through "bildung". Thus, despite the claims in favor of training for freedom and individual autonomy, this is not the case. This paper critically examines the reasons that defined the centrality of students and their training in international reports which have also influenced reforms in Brazil. It seeks to understand the attempts for reform and their project of training, by means of examining how the perceptions and reactions vis-à-vis the world are organized and how the conceptions of "self" and subjectivity training are proposed. Since the student as an individual has occupied a prominent place in contemporary educational thought, the projects related to his/her training have been in the middle of conflicting views that yield to contradictions within the very process of training.

Global meanings and narratives shared in the local context

The research project aims to analyse the role of transnational social relations in conceptualizing Europe. I assume that the meanings attributed to Europe are shaped by the social context and interactions: the European identity is socially constructed in everyday life. Since the start of the European integration, many theoretical and empirical approaches have focused on the study of the EU, Europe and the European identity: Neofunctionalism, Institutionalism and Constructivism. Structuralist and comparative approaches look at quantitative data from cross-national surveys. "Post-national" analysis use new empirical methodologies to emphasize the European dynamic dimension and, according to them, identity is a "reflexive" social construction and a concept "detached" from territory.

The empirical part of the project takes aim at catching the meanings, definitions and narratives of Europe shared by people, which contribute to the construction of the European identity. The main conceptualizations of Europe will be linked to some "types" of European identity. For this purpose, a sample of "common" European citizens and their social networks are analyzed. Because of the active involvement of the Tuscan region in the EU, the selected case-study is the social relations' network of teachers-students-parents in some secondary schools located in Tuscany. Some of these schools took part in international cooperation projects and their teachers and students are involved in transnational networks of social relations.

The Islamic veil in the western countries: Human right or sign of separation?

Aim of this paper is to explore the real nature of the Muslim veil: is it a fundamental right that reveals female identity or is it just a barrier that increases cultural separation? And how contemporary democracies should manage this issue moving on boundaries between private and public sphere?

The paper will be divided into three parts. The first part will concern basic assumptions of a symbol, as an 'invisible reality-force that reveals itself only through effects' (Limone 1997: 31).

I will devote the second part of my paper to the Muslim veil as a religious symbol, starting from the interpretation of Koran verses.

The third part will concern a socio-legal analysis of French legal system about the right to wear the veil in public spaces, in order to understand if the veil is a human right or a sign of cultural separation among races. I have chosen this country because it is a strong example of legal system that does not recognize the veil as a potential human right.

The question can be put in these terms: should we say that Western democracies are not able to protect and implement human rights in a context of reciprocal recognition? In a multicultural society the inclusion of every form of life that has rights consists of the recognition for everybody to have "the opportunity to grow up in the world of cultural heritage and to have his or her children grown up in it without suffering discrimination because of it" (Habermas 1994: 131-132). The possibility for the Muslim veil to be a fundamental right will depend on socio-political will to create a space of sharing, where everybody, adopting the behaviour of reciprocal solidarity, can argue the reasonableness and validity of his/her own claims, trying to justify them for their universalization.

Same problem, different motivations: A comparison of Quebec City's and Genoa's multiscalar responses to climate change

Cities are becoming key actors in tackling climate change effects. Mitigation and adaptation initiatives relying on multi-scalar perspectives and resources are being planned at the local level.

Though it is increasingly said that cities can be models of efficiency in this field, there is a need for more accurate knowledge about local administrations' motivations to integrate adaptation and mitigation objectives to planning. What encourages a city to plan measures in order to adapt its organization to climate change? To what extent is a city involved with other scales of government to mitigate climate change effects at the local level? Local administrations' practices offer insight on how environment and society interact and on how they respond to the climate crisis.

In this paper, we report on two cases, in two different contexts, in order to analyse how local institutions aim at taking into account the idea of an ecological rationality in their decisions. The first case presents the adaptation planning process in Quebec City, Canada. The second one concerns a mitigation initiative in Genoa, Italy.

Our first results indicate that the socio-political, cultural and institutional context plays an important role in orienting the decision to integrate either adaptation or mitigation objectives. In Quebec City, the adaptation initiative was essentially motivated by economic goals and a certain local culture of participatory process. In Genoa, the resources the European Union offers to local administrations for mitigation projects, coupled with a strong and interventionist local state explain why and how the city realised its innovative Sustainable Energy Action Plan. In different ways, these two cases illustrate how a variety of stakeholders and scales of government interact when it comes to planning actions to tackle climate change at a local level.

Social movements and digital media

Even in the first few weeks of the so-called "Arab Spring" in January 2011, digital media were identified as being essential instruments for organizing the political protests in the Middle East and North Africa. Yet digital media had already started to play a political role as arenas of discourse in which topics such as democracy, minority rights, gender and religion could be debated at least two to three years earlier. A critical online public sphere arose which had a transregional and global focus right from the start, as reflected in the self-image of one network actor when he explained: "In real life I'm a Saudi guy living in Saudi Arabia. But online I'm multinational, I'm multigeographical". This lecture presents the results of a study entitled "Communicative publics in cyberspace" investigating digital platforms which had been initiated in the Arab world, which is also where most of the contributions come from; this analysis is backed up by interviews with network actors and bloggers from Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen.

Following the concept of Nancy Fraser's transnational public spheres (2007), we analysed the normative legitimacy and the efficiency of the communicative authority of digital arenas of discourse in the Middle East, identifying which political practices led to social movements in the digital sphere and which characteristics of digital media contributed to helping digital arenas of discourse turn into places where political resistance can develop.

Consuming history consuming culture in XXI century Spain: The case of gernika /guernica

Notwithstanding the increasing wave of studies on the divided memories of the Spanish Civil War and its aftermath, the emergence of the new museum industries and their by-products -- commemorative exhibitions, guided tours, diverse forms of info-tainment and pedagogy -- as well as their impact on the making of memory through cultural tourism and leisure, popular culture and consumption have been scarcely explored in the Iberian peninsula. My paper addresses these issues by focusing on the modern museum infrastructures and their dynamics at the "centre" and "peripheries". The case studies chosen are the commemorations of the 125th anniversary of the birth of Pablo Picasso, and the 25th anniversary of the arrival of the Guernica in Spain, both celebrated by mega-exhibitions jointly held at the Prado Museum and the National Museum Reina Sofia Art Center in Madrid in 2006, on the one hand, and the 70th anniversary of the bombing of the Basque village of Gernika celebrated at the modern Interactive Museum for Peace in Gernika-Lumo in 2007, on the other. Thus, the paper addresses: a. how and why the politics of representation and display embedded in such "recuperation industries" bring the past back; b. the ways in which practices that range from youth Graffiti contests and informal internet forums to leisure and learning activities highlight fluctuations of the debates on memory -- as these trickle into the public sphere through less official and more experiential ways at the individual and group level. By elaborating on the critical literature on museums and its debate on the notion of governmentality, the presentation aims to discuss the disturbing manipulation of politics and aesthetics embedded in consuming Gernika/Guernica at the new millennium, specially as younger generations are targeted as audience.

Expulsión de extranjeros, defensa social y universidad (Universidad de Buenos Aires de principios del siglo XX)

En 1902 se sancionó en Argentina la Ley de Residencia como respuesta de las clases dominantes a las huelgas y al anarquismo que percibían como un peligro al orden social. En ese contexto, los aspirantes a graduarse de la Facultad de Derecho y Ciencias Sociales de la Universidad de Buenos Aires escribieron tesis que se introducían de lleno en el debate que suscitó la mencionada política de expulsión de extranjeros.

Partiendo de dichos documentos, escritos entre 1899 y 1907, veremos cómo la preocupación por la homogeneización de la sociedad y la asimilación e integración de los inmigrantes se tradujo en el delineamiento de estrategias de normalización y la paralela construcción de una anomalía. La ideología de la defensa social, presente en las tesis ya sea como justificación o como crítica a la política de separación de los extranjeros peligrosos, dará cuenta de la matriz positivista en la edificación de políticas contra los "perturbadores del orden" en los comienzos del siglo XX. El objetivo de este trabajo será, entonces, realizar un análisis del discurso presente en el campo académico acerca de la manera en que se concebía la otredad en términos de amenaza.

Nombrar el exceso. Transformaciones en las denominaciones médicas de la obesidad

La posibilidad de reconstruir las diferentes representaciones sociales asociadas a un fenómeno social se relacionan con el modo en que se denominan a los agentes involucrados en este. Por ese motivo el presente trabajo ahonda en diversas definiciones médicas para la obesidad que surgen desde finales del siglo XX hasta la actualidad. El mismo se detiene sobre aquellos rótulos presentados como autoevidentes indagando sobre las justificaciones científicas. A partir de este análisis se reconstruyen las imágenes metafóricas del cuerpo en las estas que se asientan. El material empírico surge del trabajo de archivo realizado sobre diversas publicaciones médicas y científicas presentes en el período estudiado (por ejemplo: Viva 100 Años, Jornada Médica, Orientación médica y La prensa médica argentina). La elección de una período extenso habilita la presentación de diferentes hitos retóricos que plasman la transformación del modo en que la medicina teoriza sobre el exceso, en el contorno corporal y en los hábitos de los pacientes. Como resultados el trabajo da cuenta de la emergencia de una problemática social con una marcada responsabilidad individual, aspecto comprobable a lo largo de las diversas genealogías de la obesidad que realizan las publicaciones elegidas. También se reconstruye el rol que la medicina se atribuye en la definición e intervención dentro de esta problemática. La alarmante descripción de la obesidad como enfermedad epidémica y masiva, aparece como una situación que se agrava en forma creciente y es capaz de justificar diferentes decisiones políticas académicas (por ejemplo la necesidad de la especialidad nutricional en Argentina en 1928). Finalmente el trabajo muestra que el tratamiento clínico de la obesidad se halla afectado en lo esencial por el consenso científico relativo al carácter de los agentes que se ven afectados por ella.

Intergenerational transfer of money and services in France, Germany, Denmark and Italy

With the aging of the population in Europe the question of intergenerational transfers of both time and money become a significant area of study. This also raises the question of those who have no living adult children. Where do they fit in with transfers and services? Albertini, Kohli and Vogel (2007) analyze international transfers in the first wave of Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE). They restrict their sample to transfers only for the older adults who have an adult child. The findings of the authors confirm that substantial transfers occur and "there is a net downward flow from the older to the younger generation". In examining welfare regimes the finding is that in wealthier countries money is most likely to be transferred to children and in poorer countries services are more likely to be transferred to children. Thus, there is a further need to ask the question: "What else is going on that might enhance our understanding of these transfers in different welfare regimes?"

We will use a different methodological approach as well as a deeper examination of the employment status of those women in the SHARE samples who are below retirement age. What are the consequences of older women workers in the mix of transfer of services and money? What happens to those without children? This question is very important in Germany with its high level of those in this generation who are without children. Are there within household transfers? This question more important in Italy where many households have two adult generations.

We will use the cross-national analysis from the second wave 2006/2007 of the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE). The countries to be studied are Denmark, Germany, France and Italy and represent different European welfare regimes.

Increasing social capital in the Netherlands

In the Netherlands, issues related to social capital feature prominently on the political agenda. There is a general feeling and belief that social cohesion in Dutch society is eroding. This goes together with a shift in political behaviour: an increasing popularity of populist parties such as the 'Party of Freedom' (PVV), and a growing concern about the impact of Islam and non-western ethnic minorities on Dutch society. This paper provides an overview of the findings of Statistics Netherlands' research programme on social capital. First, a framework of social capital will be outlined which consists of three dimensions: (1) participation; (2) trust; and (3) integration. Second, developments in participation and trust over the past 20 years will be presented. These findings are based on various large-scale surveys (e.g. the Labour Force Survey based on some 900,000 cases and the Permanent Survey on Living Conditions based on 360,000 cases) and on population registers in which a wide range of information on the Dutch population is available, such as gender, age, ethnicity, disposable income and regional variables. Third, differences in social capital between subpopulations are discussed.

Results show no decline in social capital in the Netherlands: social contacts with family and friends increased, and this is also true for social and institutional trust. Volunteer work, informal help and political participation were stable. There are, however, large differences between subpopulations: the lower educated and minority groups participate less and show lower trust levels. Certain religious groups, on the other hand, show higher levels of social capital. In addition, a clear regional divide is demonstrated. Furthermore, similar patterns between subpopulations and regions reveal when comparing various indicators of wellbeing, such as life-satisfaction and happiness.

Theory and methodology of sociotechnics : A non-aristotelian topics

Sociotechnics and its methodology will be put into the framework of recently developed Technosciences.

Understanding of >technics< within sociotechnics proves in Third Millennium as fundamentally different from that of Second Millennium. Former >hardware< has become somehow replaced by that, what we presently understand under Software, i.e. technics has changed into proceedings based on information. This requires a new methodology, too. This new methodology presents as non-Aristotelian topics to be presented. Aristotelian topics are space related, while non-Aristotelian topics are time-related. It doesn't matter any longer in our Third Millennium what is going on around positions, but what happens in-between them, i.e. group processes matter. Like architects help to construct buildings and landscapes, sociotechnicians will be educated to help cooperatives and citizens initiatives to define their goals and piloting their way through the jungle of already existing institutions.

Coastal change in Portugal: Community perceptions, social justice, and democratization

The Portuguese coastline is increasingly vulnerable to flooding and erosion. Changes in rivers and estuaries due to dredging and damming, and stronger storms and rising tides are continually removing sand from beaches. Yet 80 per cent of the Portuguese population lives on the coast, so there is expensive property development such as ports, roads, houses, tourism facilities, and businesses. This is the result of cultural fascination with the coast, plus major tourism related transformation. Yet planning controls on these coastlines are inadequate to stop further settlement, even in risk-prone areas.

Coastal communities nowadays face both coastal change and economic uncertainty. Their homes and livelihoods are at risk and they are on the front line of mitigation and adaptation to coastal change. This paper is based on three case studies in coastal Portugal. It presents the results of both a representative survey of local populations and focussed interviews with targeted stakeholders (including fishermen, businesses, non-governmental organisations, neighbourhood associations).

It will analyse how they perceive and conceptualise risk, how they are being involved in planning and decision-making, and how they envisage the defence (or abandonment) of their neighbourhoods.

The evidence collected reveals the locationally varied responses to adaptation strategies, to new approaches to community based participation and funding, and to the scope for transformational change in coastal politics. It also addresses the dynamics between lay and scientific knowledge on coastal change. The paper covers the shifting sociology of coastal communities, innovative approaches to financing adaptation, emerging issues of social justice, improved forms of democratic communication, and engagement between researchers, communities and policy makers in the redesign of coastal management in the face of medium term accommodation to economic and coastal change.

Protentions as structures of selection in social systems: The role of anticipated futures in the case of a scientific innovation

Anticipated futures play an important role in processes of innovation. The social sciences can focus on the systemness, the contextual nature of these futures. This presentation aims to discuss an evolutionary approach to innovation according to the systems theory of Niklas Luhmann and focuses on the importance of protentions in the phase of selection.

In the first part the concept of protentions as specific structures of social systems is presented. According to Alfred Schuetz in social actions there are protentions as anticipated futures shaping plans and intentions. From a systems theoretical perspective you can see firstly that these positive or negative prospects depend upon societal logics like the scientific production of knowledge or economic production of value, specific markets, organizations or other contextual settings. Secondly you can describe the specific role of these structures in the process of innovation. After the systemic construction of variation, protentions as structures of the specific system are of crucial importance for the selection of these.

In the second part this theoretical understanding of protentions is illustrated by a case of radical innovation in catalysis-basic-research. This process began on the meso-level of a single research organization, depending on the specific organizational protentions in the phase of selection. At the end it was an important innovation for the whole research on catalysis, which can be described as a result of anticipated futures in this scientific field. This example shows how important specific structures according to systemically anticipated futures are in the enduring process of re-production in social life.

Spatiality, materiality and the process of innovation in a regional cluster: The case of an irritating experiment in a structuration-theory-perspective

The following argument is based on the understanding of social constitution as enduring intersection of presence and absence presented in the writings of Anthony Giddens. Humans are emotionally and physically involved in the bodily production of and production in presence. At the same time they (as competent actors) have the possibility and responsibility to draw on contextual properties that are not physically present at the concrete moment. Both aspects of social life are constitutive for and intertwined in tangible processes and can be separated from each other just analytically. These notions open the perspective for constitutive effects of spatiality and materiality on the enduring flow of nows. The bodily process of production in presence is shaped by non-human elements, like spaces, technical equipment or symbols, like Andrew Pickering and Bruno Latour show. On the other hand the co-presence or presence-availability of other actors plays an important role. All these elements are not constitutive on their pure materiality, but on their structured enactment in social processes.

Based upon this conception of structuration in the second part the case of an irritating experiment in basic research on catalysis is presented. It illustrates how spatiality and materiality of the embedded situation in the regional cluster is shaped by absent totalities of competent actors at the same moment as these totalities are shaped through the process themselves. In the end organizational structures, routines of experimenting and theories of catalysis-research have changed. These transformations cannot be adequately understood without referring to the spatial and material context which is present to the actors. In this story of an innovation we can see the enduring co-constitution of the physical properties of time-space and the contextual knowledge competent actors use to act in these complex situations.

Challenges of global modernity

The aim of this paper is twofold: first, to lay out the contours of a conception of modernity that is both globally applicable and sensitive to local particularities; and second to reflect upon the consequences of the breakthrough of global modernity, which marks the end of western hegemony. Drawing upon a broadly Parsonian-inspired typology, the proposed conception of modernity distinguishes four dimensions of modernization: modernization of social systems, modernization of cultural systems, modernization of personality systems, and modernization of the body. Far-reaching transformations in all four dimensions are discernable on a global scale. The ways in which modern developments manifest themselves can vary though: between world regions, countries, cities, towns, but also within any such entity. The paper suggests to tackle differences expressing themselves in various settings by tailoring research methodologies to the reference problems for which the respective differences matter. As for the end of western hegemony, it means, amongst many other things, the demise of the center-periphery division that characterized the world order before the global breakthrough of modernity.

Correspondence of new work requirements with vocational training in cross-company alliances in the German metal industry

In recent decades, fundamental changes of societal, economical and entrepreneurial structures have taken place. Modern forms of work organization like autonomous teamwork, an intensified international and intercultural collaboration and the necessity for cooperation beyond the barriers of companies have consequences for the adaption of these new work requirements into modernized curricula within Vocational Educational Training (VET). In this perspective the presentation will deal with results of a recently finished research project on „Inter-company Learning Alliances in the German Metal and Electrical Industries“, which function as a new path to secure the supply with a highly qualified work force.

Given these changes, many enterprises consciously pursue an innovative Human Resource Management that also comprise an intensification of own initial vocational training. What is a rather new phenomenon in Germany is that this initial occupational training sometimes takes place as collaboration in vocational and further training. According to our case studies in the metal and electrical industries cross-company learning alliances can provide modern qualifications and skills which are necessary for the adaptation of new work requirements: Within these collaborative training alliances we observe an identity of modern, holistic training contents with anticipated work demands and future changes in production and work processes. By autonomous processing of production orders, the apprentices are empowered to train their ability to solve problems and to work independently. From an organizational perspective, the apprentices learn in large, heterogeneous, interdisciplinary and cross-company teams. Their methodical and social competences like the ability to work effectively in a team, project management, flexibility and the capability to self-organize are strengthened. All in all, the specific advantage of learning alliances regarding the changes in the German production and innovation model is that it obtains qualifications and competencies that are necessary to meet future requirements in working and production processes.

'Boss of your own belly' - The creativity of the social protest for women's social justice in Sweden during the 1970s

The social protest or the 'repertoires of collective action' (Tilly 1978) has taken various expressions in the history of social movements. There is a continuity in the creativeness, using culture, art and other performances in the social protest for social justice as well as new actions devised in response to changed circumstances (Tarrow 1998, West & Blumberg 1990, Roseneil 1995, Zald 1996). The importance of studying emotions and creativity in the study of social movements has not least been argued from scholars studying feminist movements (Ferree & Miller 1985, Ryan 1992, Taylor & Whittier 1999).

When the news about the emergence of a women's movement in the late 1960s was spread in media, it was not unusual that the focus was precisely on the creativity in the actions performed by women activists.

In this paper I want to contribute with some historical examples of creativity and emotions in the collective actions organized by women activists throughout Sweden during the 1970s. Questions are raised as: In what way were the demands of the movement expressed via music, street art, and theatre? Were these protests effective? Did the activists build their strategies on their historical predecessors or did they emerge from a spontaneous creativity?

The purpose of this paper is to show in what way the importance of creativity in the social protest has for the reception of the ideas and demands of the movement beyond the members themselves and sympathizers. I argue, in accordance with Barbara Ryan (1992), the importance of ideology and symbols in the feminist mobilization and engagement. With a deeper empirical study of the range of the creativity in the social protests we can hopefully get a better understanding of the 'repertoires of collective action' that we see emerging from women activists in the Middle East today.

Do income inequalities impair an individual's life satisfaction? – Dismantling an empirical artefact

Sociologists expect economic inequalities to be detrimental to subjective experiences of well-being, e.g. life satisfaction and happiness, but research into the issue remains inconclusive. The inconsistent results may reflect the individual researcher's selection of (a) the geographic unit, (b) the indicator measuring inequality, and/or (c) the specific (sub-) population.

This paper calls for the theoretical reflection of the methodological choices made by researchers analysing the impact of income inequality on life satisfaction. Referring to approaches in social cognition theory that propose social perceptions as influential mechanisms (thereby bridging the macro-micro gap), we assume to find the impact of income inequalities on life satisfaction to be greater within smaller regional units where the polarization of income differences is especially high. We expect upper and lower income groups to be equally vulnerable to these influences, albeit for different reasons.

The analyses are based on data from the German Socio-Economic Panel Study (SOEP) from 2005 and 2006. We estimate the impact of income inequality on life satisfaction using multi-level regression models, and we differentiate between different geographic units (federal states (Nuts1), planning regions (ROR), district level (Nuts2)) using different measures of income inequality (Gini-Index vs. 90/10 Ratio) for specific subpopulations (e.g., upper vs. lower income groups).

A first set of analyses yields ambivalent findings on the effect of income inequality on life satisfaction. Next to east-west-differences, the Gini-Index proved to be one of the most important predictors for life satisfaction at the federal state level. However, no significant effects were reported for income inequality at the district level, neither for different inequality measures nor for specific subgroups. These findings encourage future research to probe the causal mechanisms underlying the contextual dependencies of well-being, e.g., social trust, perceptions of the legitimacy of income inequalities, and social comparison processes.

How detrimental are income inequalities to the human mind? Analyzing the protective functions of social justice perceptions in Germany and Chile

How to distribute scarce resources is a divisive topic. On the one hand, liberalists justify income inequality using principles of economic freedom and competition; on the other hand, egalitarians disapprove of social hierarchies based on economic power relations and favor distributive procedures based on equality and need. This paper asks how detrimental income inequalities really are for the individual, judging its value by its impact on life satisfaction experiences. Unlike most studies in this field, it focuses on the perceiver (the individual) and tries to understand how the larger societal processes of (in)equality become subjective accounts of well-being, paying close attention to perceptions and judgments on social justice.

Using data from the International Social Justice Project (2006), this study considers whether the distribution of monetary resources in Germany

(N = 3,059) and Chile (N = 890) – two highly diverse societies in terms of income inequality – makes a difference to an individual's life satisfaction. Using structural equation modeling, the paper analyzes the mediatory nature of social justice perceptions, i.e., perceptions of the legitimacy of others' incomes, social attribution patterns, and social mobility.

The results verify the mediatory function of social justice perceptions. If people perceive societal conditions to be unjust, they are also less satisfied with their own life. This holds surprisingly only for upper income groups. Perceptions of social mobility are, however, especially important for the life satisfaction of lower income groups. This paper concludes that income inequalities do not hurt individuals per se, but only if the individual perceives them as illegitimate. However, perceptions are often biased and judgments are often a product of self-interests and culturally induced preferences which need further theoretical and empirical consideration.

Cuttings one's own path and becoming a part of something. On professional identities and fragmented working biographies

The paper examines the development of professional identities under conditions of discontinuous working biographies. Two examples are presented, which illustrate the interplay of structural conditions, collectivity and individualism in the course of professional socialisation.

For professionals in the media sector, my first example, it is as necessary as it is also difficult to build a consistent working identity. Most professionals work for a long time in diverse projects for different employers and therefore acquire general experiences and broad qualifications. Otherwise you have to develop a unique specialized profile, to receive visibility in a highly competitive market. On this background identity building has to be understood as a process of permanent active reflexion and cutting one's own path and becoming part of a professional community.

Doctors, who decide to work for the drug industries, which is my second example, do not have to fight with insecure existence. There functional role within a pharmaceutical company is usually fixed. But they also have to build a new professional identity, which integrates the medicinal background and new managerial responsibilities. - Comparing these two empirical examples, some theoretical conclusions on professional identity building will be discussed.

Childrens' expected income consequences and fertility behavior in cross-national comparison

Declining fertility has turned from blessing to curse after the end of industrial society, and, for a number of reasons from cultural heritage to welfare state financing, post-industrial societies struggle to understand and potentially to reverse the decline in the number of babies born.

One general argument relating to the decline in children is related to the negative income effect of children: Especially for women, raising children needs resources which could be used either in investment processes in human and social capital or directly in the generation of income and consumption (Becker 1981). Individuals are proposed to contrast their expected economic situations with and without children: the difference between both is a cost which is compared with the utilities derived from having kids.

This choice situation is interesting for researchers and policymakers since the difference between the economic situation with and without children is the subject of a number of policy measures from family allowances over tax deductions for childcare and publicly offered childcare to policies for gender-equality. However, although empirical research has used a number of methods to measure and understand fertility and its relation to diverse policy measures, studying this general argument in its two sub-aspects mentioned and in a comparative framework is yet a gap in the literature.

It is a question especially interesting for comparative research since both sides of the research question are of interest in comparing welfare states and the behavior of their citizens: Is fertility influenced by income differences, is it influenced uniformly over time, societies, and individual characteristics? What interactions exist between fertility and the expected income consequences? Does the effect on disposable income count alone or are the effects on other parts of the income likewise or even more important?

The paper addresses these questions based on Luxembourg Income Study data.

Three equilibria and two waves of change: A short model of modernity, 1750-2030

Motivated by transition parallels in changes (e.g., global shifts or rising inequality), we ask whether modernity's growth trajectory can be seen as producing not two but three equilibria.

We take four arguments from the actor-oriented theory of institutions (North 1990) and model growth as an increase in the number of strategies and informations about these strategies. In the conventional games which are the base of discontinuities in institutional change, individuals take their immediate experiences on individual or organizational level as natural focal points. However, growth and swelling information make easy focal points suboptimal, and optimality proceeds towards more abstract levels. In the sequence which is defined by the existence of transaction cost, focal points for defining institutions move from the individual level in the pre-industrial phase to the organizational level in the industrial and to the institutional level in the (still emerging, more than 40 years after Bell 1977) post-industrial phase.

Using additional assumptions about the nature of relevant institutional fields, we can derive a grid which allows to understand a lot of institutional innovation in the past, present, and immediate future, from Romantic Love to not-yet designed schemes of computerized voting.

Forking digital inclusion: The development of LibreOffice and the document foundation

In this paper, I explore the development of LibreOffice and The Document Foundation (TDF) as a project designed to promote digital inclusion. The project seeks to eradicate the digital divide and promote civic participation by providing free, universal access to LibreOffice as a suite of what project participants call "office productivity tools." By supporting open document formats and open standards, the project fosters conditions for LibreOffice users to share and control the documents they create. The paper is divided into three sections. First, I analyze the power relationships between the OpenOffice.org community, Sun and Oracle that gave rise to the creation of LibreOffice and TDF in September 2010. I analyze the process of forking OpenOffice as an example of Free Software community participants defending digital inclusion against corporate actions that could have undermined the open nature of the project. Second, I investigate the growth of the project since September 2010, exploring the contributions from independent community volunteers as well as company-sponsored developers. I highlight the importance of language for the process of digital inclusion by probing The Document Foundation's goal of preserving native languages by encouraging community participants to translate, document and support LibreOffice in their native languages. Finally, I assess the strengths and limitations of the strategy of forking for the broader project of developing digital inclusion and the digital commons. I focus on the dynamic relationship between Free Software communities, corporations and markets. Data for the paper include interviews with founders of The Document Foundation and members of its Steering Committee, as well as The Document Foundation Blog and the information technology business press.

Social and moral norms in the laboratory

Norms involve a shared understanding about what one ought to do in certain situations. Social norms involve observation by others and external sanctions for violations, while moral norms involve introspection and internal sanctions; our design attempts to disentangle their effects in the laboratory. In this study, we first develop a simple model of individual preferences that incorporates moral and social norms. We then consider an allocation decision made by a dictator dividing a fixed sum within a three-person group, where we create a shared understanding by providing advice from subjects' peers who have no financial payoff at stake. In a 2x2 design, we vary whether such advice is given, as well as whether behavior is observable, i.e., the choice made is publicly divulged to the other participants in the experiment. This design allows us to explicitly separate the effects of moral and social norms. We find that people's choices are in fact affected by a combination of observability and the shared understanding. Our design allows us to explicitly show that social norms play a role in participants' decisions. The results are outside the realm of standard social-preference models; in particular, these are silent regarding whether a choice is made public.

Afro-indigenous subjectivity as an art of survival: "I am black, Indian and when I get angry I come out of the devil"

Ethnicized, racialized, gendered and sexualized constructions of subjectivity in Afro-indigenous Costa Rican women come alive in a complex and conflictive field of tensions between perceptions of the Self and the Other. In a context of national politics based on Whiteness and clearly separable identities, the question of "Where are you from?" may not only be asked out of curiosity by unknown people on the streets, but also from doubting family members, skeptical neighbors or institutions. It confronts Afro-indigenous women with paradoxical situations of being visibly unseen and with questions of belonging concerning family and communal membership, as well as Costa Rican citizenship.

In this paper I refer to three Afro-indigenous women's biographies. Based on fragments of narrative interviews, I will focus on how these women handle the tensions inherent to this questioning. Which psycho-emotional body language do they develop to answer the complex power relations? Creativity is needed and decides about how intersections of indigeneity, blackness, gender and sexuality are articulated explicitly and implicitly. Theoretically the analysis is nurtured by queer feminist and de/postcolonial approaches. The presentation is part of my doctoral thesis in advanced progress on subjectivities and social imaginaries of Afro-descendent and indigenous bribri women in Costa Rica that I am writing at the University of Costa Rica, in the Doctoral Program 'Estudios de la Sociedad y la Cultura'.

Researching Afro-descendent and indigenous women's lives in the tropics. Knowledge productions at a crossroads

Black and Indigenous knowledge productions are echoed by international academic research. However, the hierarchy between academic and non-academic knowledge produces not only histories of knowledge but also of silence. Cultural taboos and stereotypes and epistemic violence structurally inherent to academic institutions might hinder processes of decolonizing occidental presuppositions of superiority and practices of systematic fragmentation. The fact that knowledge systems are declassified as oral traditions in order to translate them in readable goods, evidences capitalist logics of property and commodification that objectify especially Indigenous and black women.

Departing from this fundamental critique and out of solidarity with my research participants I decided to do my PhD in Costa Rica. But instead of leaving dilemmas and contradictions behind, they came much closer. My positionality is marked by complex relations of power, multiple imaginaries and conflicting interests. In this paper I will draw attention to these paradoxical tensions, by bringing together experiences of black and Indigenous women with my own experience.

Activation without work? The sanctioning of jobless youth by employment services in Germany

From "Welfare without work" to "Activation without work" – that is how the neo-liberal transformation of European welfare states is characterised from a critical sociological perspective. A core problem of activation strategies not only in Germany is that they are one-sided: They concentrate on the jobless benefit recipients and their assumed individual deficits, while neglecting the creation of jobs providing sufficient income. In Germany unemployed younger than 25 years are defined as a special target group regarding the participation in activation measures. In order to integrate them into the labour market, they are also subject to more sweeping sanctioning regulations. Contrary to a stepwise reduction of the financial benefit for older clients, benefits for unemployed younger than 25 years are reduced by 100% for mostly three months after the first neglect of duty. In case of repeated failure within one year, the payment for housing and heating is cancelled in addition.

In our presentation we would assess the consequences of the sanctioning rules against young jobless welfare recipients. Our questions are: Can social inclusion (in terms of integration into the labour market) be achieved with the threat and imposition of sanctions? Or does financial pressure rather lead to more social exclusion, material and subjective? To answer these questions, we present some main findings of quantitative research as well as our own qualitative research. We analyze narrative interviews with sanctioned young jobless as well as semi-structured interviews with case workers in employment services. In addition we examine the counseling records that have been compiled about the young people.

Ethnic capital, social capital and immigrants' labour market integration in Germany

For the case of Germany, the role of immigrants' social networks for their structural assimilation is still debated controversially. Empirical findings are far from conclusive, and contradictory theoretical expectations are discussed vividly. On the one hand it has been argued that under certain conditions lacks of resources specific to the receiving country can be compensated by ethnic resources or result in potentially beneficial segmented assimilation pathways. On the other hand, a strong embedding in immigrant groups may constrain immigrants' advancement in the receiving society, because co-ethnics may not be able to provide crucial resources. A particularly strong networking culture within an ethnic group could imply fewer relationships to majority members. Thereby ethnic communities could represent a 'mobility trap'.

Against this background, data of the so-called stage 8 "Adult Education and Lifelong Learning" of the National Educational Panel Study (NEPS) in Germany are analyzed. For several immigrant groups, esp. immigrants from the former Soviet Union and Turkey unemployment durations are investigated. Competing risk event history models are applied to account for several (potential) reasons why people may succeed to escape unemployment. Furthermore, Cox regression modelling is modified to meet the peculiarities of multiple unemployment spells.

Results show that ethnic networks do not hinder immigrants' job search per se, but that they are generally rather harmful, because co-ethnics are often in lower social positions. Consequently, ethnic networks typically can give access to less social capital than those of majority group members. Since a comprehensive social capital instrument has been included in NEPS, the role of ethnic and social capital can be tested more directly than in many other studies. In particular, socio-structural and (ethnic) compositional aspects of social capital as well as access to relevant resources are differentiated.

Democratizing futures: Radical imaginaries, police repression, and public engagements of the occupy wall street movement

Wall Street has been a prime target for popular protests ever since it had become a center of capitalist power and symbol of inequality. Yet most protests never made it into the news. Why then did the attempt on September 17, 2011 avoid oblivion and morph into a broader movement with branches in over 1,500 cities across the USA and abroad? How were activists able to invoke a coalition of the "99%" and put demands not only for socio-economic justice but also for participation onto agendas that had been dominated by budget shortfalls, tax cuts, and terrorism? How were free spaces created for experimenting with democratic alternatives? How did the groups of different cities resist varying forms of repression? How did different media forms and strategies shape the engagement with publics? How did the movement draw inspiration and mesh transnationally with other efforts for participatory reconfigurations of governance and economics? This paper explores the early history and prospect of the movement by tracing the interaction between grievances, micro/macro contextual opportunities and constraints, network capacities, and communicative practices. Multi-method focus on the experience in select cities shows not only enormous local variation but also varied modes of connecting sites of struggle. The paper concludes with a discussion of options for future action.

Territorios disputados. Movilización política y procesos de institucionalización en niveles locales de gobierno (Argentina, 1997-2011)

Esta ponencia sintetiza los resultados del proyecto de investigación "Movilización política y gobierno local: Un análisis comparado de las relaciones entre las organizaciones territoriales y los municipios en el Gran Buenos Aires, 1997-2005" ejecutado entre 2008 y 2011 por el Grupo de Estudios sobre Protesta Social y Acción Colectiva del Instituto de Investigaciones Gino Germani y financiado por la Universidad de Buenos Aires. El proyecto analizó la relación entre lamovilización y las transformaciones del régimen político de gobierno; concretamente, el vínculo entre las organizaciones territoriales y los gobiernos locales en un contexto caracterizado por el doble proceso de territorialización del conflicto social y la descentralización del estado nacional. Para esto se realizaron entrevistas a funcionarios locales, dirigentes de organizaciones sociales y análisis de un programa social impulsado por el ministerio de Desarrollo Social. Entre las conclusiones se sostendrá, por un lado, que ambos procesos complejizaron el campo estratégico de la política local a partir de a) el surgimiento y consolidación de organización territoriales con capacidad de movilización y recursos, y b) un cambio en la política social reorientada a un perfil productivista. Por otro lado, demostraremos que pese a la convergencia de esos procesos y al incremento de la capacidad estratégica de los actores informales organizados en la consecución de recursos derivados de la política social en el plano local, este fortalecimiento organizativo no condujo a una mayor institucionalización; sino que se vio limitado en sus posibilidades de participación y representación democrática en los niveles locales de gobierno por una sobredeterminación de la disputa entre aparatos partidarios y gobiernos locales por el control electoral de los territorios y para la reproducción de sus respectivas burocracias.

What will be the fate of Mexico, a nation dependent upon a declining hegemon?

What is the fate of nations that are satellites of declining hegemon? What does the future hold for Mexico--an economy closely tied to the United States? Between 1947 and 1967, the United States enjoyed global hegemony. That position was supported by its superiority in production. Mexico has always had close economic ties to the United States. NAFTA, implemented in 1994, left it very open to trade and capital flows. As the United States began its hegemonic slide in the 1970s, it embarked on numerous paths to ameliorate its profit crises. One was offshoring, and by the 21st century, China was a desired destination for trade and direct foreign investment. The rise of China is seen in its growing market share of global exports. China has also garnered the investment confidence of market raters e.g. A.T.Kearney FDI Confidence Index and received a higher volume of foreign capital flows. This dual feature of U.S. hegemonic decline—loss of dominance and turning to an emerging market for offshoring—have negative consequences for Mexico. Numerous researchers have pointed out the detrimental effects, especially in fields of high tech and manufacturing assembly. One would expect however, that Mexico, because of geography and NAFTA, would have a comparative advantage in the agricultural sectors. I investigate the case of garlic. China has become the largest producer and the largest exporter of garlic. And even this little bulb has displaced Mexico's own garlic trade with the United States. The thing about globalization is that if you blink, you miss it (South Africa Finance Minister 2003).

Childhood in Kyrgyzstan – Social practices in private and public spheres and their relation with democratic values

In a research project conducted in Kyrgyzstan, social practices of families and children were studied in two spheres: the public and the private domain. It has shown that a rather „traditional“ idea of private- and family life exists: Relations between family members are described in terms of functionality and reciprocity, containing high expectations regarding actual as well as future obligations – Participation of children in the private domain takes place only within this structure, and children in general seem to enjoy and value this functional inclusion; they are proud of their own share of duties and responsibilities in the household, and in self-descriptions children demonstrate their „fitting-in“ with familial expectations. A participation that goes beyond this hierarchically structured collective is not promoted by families. This is due to several reasons one can only guess about, including e.g. a lack of trust in public structures, reliance on family networks, re-ethnisation of culture, economic hardship and geographic isolation. The promotion of children's „democratic“ participation is rather, one could argue, part of the responsibilities of public and educational institutions. A lot of effort is expended to promote this function of educational institutions - especially by international organisations and NGOs with a rather „universal“ and „modern“ vision of childhood and the child as actor (or as political subject). This paper discusses the social practices of families and educational institutions in Kyrgyzstan, their respective advocates, and their relation with democratic values. Theoretical models drawn from modernization theory, addressing a modern society's promise of inclusion and emancipation of all social groups (Eisenstadt 2007, Witrock 2005), will be used to interpret the above mentioned issues.

Forms of the European Spring: The No Tav movement

Within the "European spring", the No Tav movement in Susa Valley - the struggle against the construction of the high speed railway line connected to the UE corridors - is theoretically as well empirically worthy of consideration. It has behind itself a long work of organization, experiences, mobilization that represents in the Italian as well as European panorama an important although little known political factory of cooperating subjectivity constitution. This struggle has got as main features: direct action and self-organised spontaneous intervention, without the support of predefined traditional structures, a crescendo of cooperation of "simple" individuals basically left without those traditional forms of belonging typical of the old cycle of social movements. It creates its own ties in a horizontal network able to get the most of individual resistance and the skills of each, and to enhance them. It seeks decision-making mechanisms, deploys multiform activities. At the same time, it produces a body of information and searches for unity within the heterogeneity of the participants, their visions, individual backgrounds not belonging to a homogenous social group, nor with predefined common perspectives, creating relationships and producing something which until a few days before would have seemed to them incredible.

The No Tav movement has also elaborated a language and raised issues far beyond its specific mobilization: the theme of another possible model of development, production of new relations and commons, and the claim against the debt economy. All in all, it shows some features that are emerging on European scale, in particular with the M15 movement. Our analysis combines a class-composition and co-research approach with the attempt to compare the No Tav movement with the framework of the "new social movements" analysis as well with regard to the theme commons/new enclosures.

Scepticism, selectivity and subjective wellbeing: Political interests and survey measures in the UK

This paper presents, as an illustrative case study, the UK Government's 2011-2012 endeavours to monitor social progress in the UK. The Coalition Government commissioned the Office of National Statistics (ONS) to develop appropriate well-being measures. This case study illuminates the conflicting interests and compromise positions that have been manifest in the development and implementation of the survey measures. The study relies on three main sources: 1) the evidence that was presented to ONS to help the design and development of the survey measures; 2) newspaper coverage of the national quest for wellbeing measures; and 3) the presentation of initial "findings" and caveats concerning their interpretation. The paper argues that selectivity issues plague the UK's national endeavour to address social progress and the well-being agenda. These selection effects help promote a pronounced scepticism amongst the press and wider public. The question is then raised as to whether policy measures could influence people's conceptions and evaluations of social progress and wellbeing, and whether such policy efforts would be beneficial and desirable. The case study has relevance far beyond the UK, and we consider how the European Social Survey may face similar challenges as it seeks to introduce societal wellbeing measures, across Europe.

Lovely enchantments and romantic rituals – Romantic love and religion

Throughout the 18th and 19th century, in the first phase of capitalism accompanied by social developments related with processes of rationalization of our social world we have been facing the social devaluation of religions and religiosity in the Western world, a slow process of disenchantment of our individual and social life with crucial consequences for our inner (well-) being and for the moral universes as the basis for our interactions with others. From our point of view this is just half the story: Forms and elements of our religious life continued and continue to play a crucial role in modern capitalism outside of what we understand as the religious field.

Following the ideas of Collin Campbell (1987) and Eva Illouz (1997) we have analyzed romantic love relationships as one of those dimensions wherein religious-like practices and forms of enchantment continue to play a crucial role and wherein the modern subject finds sense and meaning for his individual and social life, outside the iron cage.

It is by celebrating romantic consumption rituals (like going to the cinema, in a restaurant or going on a honeymoon trip) that we live our sacred moments wherein we web our life to the life of our partner. It is through the creation of personal love myths that we transform our passed everyday life or the moment we met with the beloved other into something special, something sacred that we could not have or could not have had with any other person. It is through the distinction between normal and special, between profane and sacred moments that we web our life to the life of our partners.

We have tried to explore this topic empirically. Therefore, we have interviewed 45 people and have analyzed their autobiographical interviews.

Virtually in love - online rituals of couples

The Presentation will explore rituals in long distance, or partially long distance love relationships. Analysing these rituals I will look at how we connect and relate with our partners using new communication technologies, the ways we use and perform our body and emotions for the performance of liminal online rituals, and some of the consequences of these rituals for couples who cannot adapt to the necessities of the new environment.

This project follows the idea of Eva Illouz that love relationships have contributed to the developments of capitalism at least from the beginning of the 20th century onwards. Cinema, restaurants, beauty products, luxury, and gifts they all became important for the successful performance of romantic rituals. Latest social developments and the increased use of ICTs have transformed these rituals of love. Consumption and rituals of love are still related to each other but in a different way. Instead of consuming a movie or a product together the couple has to perform a seduction wherein both have to transform themselves into an visual object of consumption for the Other. Just if the other still comes to your presentation the relationship continues. The attempt to perform oneself on the screen, negotiating between the needs and desires of the self and the other, being honest, desirable, sexy and authentic at the same time, demands a strong management and regulation of the self, a rationalisation and controlled performance of emotions.

For my research I have carried out 30 autobiographical semi- narrative interviews with people having a long distance or having had a long-distance love relationship.

Is the south 'Brazilian'? The public realm in urban Brazil through a comparative lens

The reconfiguration of urban politics in Brazil over the past twenty-five or so years has attracted widespread scholarly attention. 'Participatory budgeting' and related institutions and procedures have provided for new forms of participatory and deliberative democracy, transforming the local public realm. At the same time, popular struggles over land and housing have generated what Holston's calls 'insurgent citizenship': new understandings and forms of citizenship, not as in abstract terms but in practice, realized through the performance of claims by active citizens on other actors, groups or institutions. In many accounts, including Holston's, these changes in Brazilian cities are represented as the most visible examples of changes that are widespread across the 'urban peripheries' of the global South, including (especially) in South Africa and India. Recent scholarship on the diversity of urban politics and society across Brazil and Latin America suggests that the 'Brazilian model' is less readily replicated than its proponents believe (even within Brazil). A comparative perspective suggests that, in a variety of settings, the strengths of political society – in terms of both redistribution (of resources and dignity) and co-optation – inhibit the emergence of a public sphere along the lines of the "Brazilian model". Social and cultural differences, especially with regard to status hierarchies, may also inhibit as much as inspire radical challenges to urban governance.

Pathways to universalism: Latin American experiences with social insurance and social assistance in comparative perspective

The recent striking expansion across Latin America of two forms of social assistance - conditional cash transfers and social pensions - represents a new approach in that region to the challenge of universalizing social welfare and social citizenship. From the 1940s until the 1990s, it was generally imagined that universalism would be achieved through expanded coverage of contributory social insurance programmes, in terms of both risks and population. But when social insurance programmes ran into fiscal difficulties, targeted social assistance seemed to offer a more "efficient" as well as politically attractive alternative, albeit one that entrenches both fragmentation and stratification within public provision. This paper considers both the former and more recent Latin American pathways toward universalism from a more global perspective. It compares these pathways to the diverse pathways followed by different welfare regimes in the global North, and to alternative pathways followed in other parts of the global South. It is easily forgotten that Latin America was not the pioneer in social assistance programmes in the global South: social assistance programmes based on the British model were replicated, with modifications, in selected British dominions and colonies (including in the Caribbean) from the 1920s, were briefly recognised as an important element of "social security" by the International Labour Organisation in the mid- and late 1940s, and have re-emerged strongly on the policy agenda in the past twenty years in other regions, including especially Africa and South Asia. The second half of the paper examines the comparative politics of different pathways to universalism, and the political obstacles on these pathways.

La genealogía de la (in)seguridad como objeto de conocimiento de las ciencias sociales en la Argentina contemporánea

El objetivo del presente trabajo es reflexionar en torno a la emergencia de la (in)seguridad como objeto de conocimiento de las ciencias sociales en la Argentina contemporánea. En el escenario actual, signado por la proliferación de discursos sobre la "inseguridad" que demandan políticas de "mano dura" y "donde suenan y resuenan voces de imponer la ley y el orden" invocando la necesidad de políticas de "tolerancia cero" (Pegoraro, 2003), es urgente reflexionar sobre las maneras en que se construye y define la (in)seguridad en las ciencias sociales. Las estrategias de construcción del objeto pueden ser una herramienta de crítica de las estructuras materiales y simbólicas del orden social vigente, siempre en lucha con otras producciones de sentido que buscan consolidarlas. Delinear este recorrido implica apuntar la indagación hacia la proliferación de sucesos a través de los cuales se ha formado el concepto, es decir, reflexionar en torno a la constelación de prácticas que han sedimentado en las realidades que la prácticas cognitivas llama (in)seguridad. Multiplicidad de prácticas a través de las cuales, gracias a las cuales, contra los cuales, se va conformando y dando espesor a la (in)seguridad como objeto de las ciencias sociales. Proponemos poner especial atención a las disputas y tensiones en y entre tres campos sociales como son el campo de los medios de comunicación, el de las organizaciones de la sociedad civil y el político, fundamentalmente en torno a las figuras de "gatillo fácil", "maldita policía" y "las fuerzas policiales desbordadas, con las manos atadas". Diversos elementos que se mantienen en su dispersión y que, en su heterogeneidad, le imprimen su singularidad a los diversos sentidos que asume la (in)seguridad en ciencias sociales.

Estigmas, temor e inseguridad en la periferia de la ciudad de La Plata

A partir del trabajo de campo etnográfico realizado en Puente de Fierro, un barrio segregado y estigmatizado la periferia urbana de la ciudad de La Plata (Argentina), el presente trabajo indaga el papel del miedo, los estigmas y el sentimiento de inseguridad en la dinámica cotidiana de los residentes de ese barrio.

La indagación nos colocó ante una situación paradójica, que cuestiona el sentido común, a la que podríamos denominar "el temor de los temidos". En efecto, a la vez que espacios como Puente de Fierro y sus residentes son estigmatizados, temidos y evitados, el miedo y la inseguridad estructuran una cotidianeidad conflictiva en quienes allí habitan.

Con la finalidad de mostrar la polivalencia de los miedos, los estigmas y la inseguridad en la vida cotidiana así como sus efectos en las relaciones sociales (y con) la periferia urbana, el trabajo se detendrá en tres espacios/acostamientos privilegiados: las prácticas socio-espaciales de los residentes y la experiencia de la estigmatización; la implementación de una política de seguridad ciudadana en el barrio por parte del gobierno de la provincia de Buenos Aires y los conflictos que la misma suscitó; y los debates desarrollados entre los participantes en una asamblea barrial acerca de las causas y las acciones a implementar acerca de la inseguridad.

Clase, género y capital social

En el presente trabajo se plantearán algunos interrogantes e hipótesis de investigación en las cuales el capital social tiene un papel central como variable explicativa de las oportunidades y recursos disponibles para que los individuos puedan acceder a posiciones de mayor poder, ocupaciones con mayor prestigio y lograr una movilidad social ascendente. Se postulará que el capital social puede funcionar como mecanismo contrario a los de cierre social, al construir horizontes de expectativas y creencias y sobre todo, al brindar información sobre oportunidades, contactos y servicios que permiten el aprovechamiento de oportunidades. En el caso de las mujeres, el concepto de "techo de cristal" ha dado cuenta de la invisibilidad de los mecanismos de relaciones sociales que las limitan en sus posibilidades de ascenso laboral poniéndolas en desventaja con respecto a los varones.

A partir de la revisión de literatura sobre capital social y su relación con la movilidad social ascendente y las desigualdades de género, se intentarán mostrar los primeros avances en la construcción de un objeto de estudio que procura hacer foco en la relación entre la estructura social y el nivel meso-social.

Reflexiones metodológicas sobre imágenes de clases sociales

El presente trabajo procurará reflexionar sobre el abordaje teórico-metodológico de las percepciones de clase social de los sujetos en la vida cotidiana. A partir de la centralidad del consumo y los estilos de vida en la producción de las identidades de los sujetos, la identidad de clase también puede ser indagada a partir de las imágenes que se forman con dichos consumos y estilos de vida.

Los estereotipos de clase en relación a los cuales se clasifica a los otros y al sí mismo, pueden indagarse mediante imágenes de personas de diferentes clases. El uso de fotografías o videograbaciones en la investigación como disparadores para preguntar a los sujetos acerca de cómo clasificarían a los otros respecto a su clase social, permite conocer más acerca de qué aspectos son tenidos en cuenta en las atribuciones que se realizan cotidianamente, las cuales constituirán el marco de referencia a partir del cual se responderá a la pregunta acerca de a qué clase social consideran que pertenecen.

En este trabajo presentaremos algunos resultados obtenidos a partir del uso de fotografías en entrevistas semiestructuradas, los cuales permiten avanzar en la reflexión en torno a las ventajas y limitaciones de su uso para elicitación de respuestas de los entrevistados que alcancen otros significados relativos a concepciones de clase social, que pueden no emerger mediante otras técnicas, especialmente la de encuesta, permaneciendo ocultas diversas nociones bajo una misma respuesta.

In this paper I will focus on the importance of space and place as conditions for strengthening children's possibilities for participation: 1. What are the understandings about children and childhood that are reflected in the material space or the stage set for talking with children in child protection services? 2. The material environments as conditions that will hinder or promote the children's possibilities for participation. The empirical basis for the discussion is the research activities in the project Professional Practice and the Participation of Children, conducted at Oslo and Akershus University College, in cooperation with two child protection centres in Oslo. Plight of the aged population in rural India: Care and support implications

The demographic scenario in India implicates that the longevity is increased over the years. Sequel to this life expectancy the percentage of aged population has been tremendously increased paving the way for policy and program implications. India being conventionally marked by traditions and value based social life got struck up in the event of the compulsions of structural changes and functional compromises in social institutions like family and community which has disturbed the continuity of tradition based value oriented social life. Consequently, the disintegration of joint family, separation of couple, inappropriate care to children, and self dependence of individual, parochial tendencies penetrated into social institutions. All of these have affected the care and support forth coming from aged towards young and vice versa. The victims of these changes are obviously the aged persons who were previously identified with family now pushed to the institutional care and support homes outside family. The children remain affected in the absence of aged person's familial care and support while they were in family once.

This paper is an outcome of an empirical research conducted in a selected district of south Tamilnadu with cross sections of old age people and children of various age groups. The findings of this study shows that there is increasing need for cohesion, understanding, accommodation with all age p/groups in family in larger interest of promoting harmony, prosperity family based homely feeling within the framework of individual care and support. The children longing for nurture by their natural parents and grandparents seen to reflect certain abnormal and disorder in their personality and behavior. The policy of the aged and acre and support programmes which remain in paper should be translated into action programmes in the letter and spirit.

Mediation in South Africa: Practice and Training

This paper will follow a two-thronged approach: Firstly a brief exposition and assessment of the need, extent and significance of mediation in South African society will be given and secondly, based on the first, the extent and appropriateness of training of mediators in South Africa will be discussed. The goal will be to try and ascertain whether training and practical societal needs in South Africa match as far as mediation is concerned. To achieve this, a brief exposition of South African social dynamics in political, economic and kinship contexts will be given to paint a picture of the extent to which a need for mediation exists or not. Secondly the extent and content of training of mediators in South Africa in both tertiary institutions as well as non-educational contexts and will be sketched. In so doing it is hoped to make a case for extending the availability of mediation services in South Africa in general and introducing a course or courses in mediation in the Department of Sociology at the University of South Africa in particular.

The social media dimension of migrants transnational practices: Participating in the Argentine elections 2011 from abroad

The ubiquity of the Internet challenges us to review migration and development and transnational participation approaches. In particular, the increasing use of Social Media, the various forms of media content created by end users and publicly available (Kaplan and Haenlein, 2010), is not only complementing newspapers, radio and TV programmes as the main source of information but also becoming a common denominator in migrants' transnational participatory practices. Concurrently, migrant associations, as well as private and public institutions are also adopting Social Media. The ways in which society and state common interests are connected and intertwined are becoming visible through the virtual sphere. We are to explain how the widespread use of Internet and Social Media in particular, is reshaping the formal and informal ways in which migrants relate, exchange information, organize and participate in the processes of social change and development of their origin country.

This paper will focus on the case of Argentine migrants' Social Media practices in the months running up to Argentina's national elections of October 2011 and immediately thereafter. It will define what their Social Media practices are, and how they take place, with a special attention to the information, connection, cooperation and collaboration aspects of cross-border initiatives. Based on interviews and online and off-line participatory observation mainly in Spain of Argentine migrants that are active in social networking sites, the results will allow us to give an account of the relationships between Social Media practices of migrants and those of the nation-state to promote ties in an electoral context. Moreover, the results are to give indications of the basis upon which to develop a framework to explain, understand and address the role and effect of migrants' transnational participation in the network society era.

Movimientos sociales y bienes comunes naturales

En las últimas décadas, los conflictos sociales en torno a los bienes comunes de la naturaleza se han vuelto en América Latina y el Caribe cada vez más numerosos y significativos dentro del escenario de la contestación social.

El ciclo de movilización y acción colectiva que movimientos sociales con novedosas características han venido protagonizando en la región desde mediados de los 90' han cobrado una progresiva relevancia y visibilidad nacional en la última década cuando los procesos alcanzan capacidad destituyente, tanto a nivel nacional como regional poniendo en cuestión la legitimidad del neoliberalismo en un ciclo de resistencias que se continúa hasta los conflictos sobre el rumbo de los procesos de cambio y en torno a las alternativas al neoliberalismo y los modelos que se han denominado pos-neoliberales.

La ponencia aborda la relación entre estos procesos de movilización particularmente alrededor de los bienes comunes de la naturaleza y la matriz económica extractivista exportadora en curso; las diferencias que se plantean entre los distintos proyectos societales formulados en los últimos años y las características que signan la emergencia y acción colectiva de los movimientos sociales constituidos alrededor de estos conflictos. Sobre ello, el texto analiza las tensiones entre los diversos sujetos sociales que protagonizan estos antagonismos así como sus prácticas colectivas y los horizontes que se desprenden en la actualidad de sus programáticas y demandas en el marco de la profundización de los efectos del cambio climático.

Contextualizing gentrification: A comparative study of Madrid and Buenos Aires

Neoliberal urban policies have altered the contemporary structuring of metropolitan areas in North and South Global cities. The recapture of central areas in the city by wealthy tenants, by the tourism economy and by other leisure activities is a key consequence of this process. This phenomenon, combined with the eviction of poorer households, is usually addressed by the term gentrification. Our purpose is to characterise gentrification discourses in Spain and Latin America by contrasting two central cities such as Madrid and Buenos Aires. This paper analyses the powerful logics of private and public interventions causing gentrification in urban areas, and confirms that gentrification in Spain and Latin America varies substantially from the process observed in the Anglophone world. Both examples serve as a base to understand how neoliberal urban regimes intend to transform the central city in a highly segregated, commercialised and economised space by different ways. It highlights the necessity to have a conceptual appropriation and contextualisation of the term within this specific geographic framework. As a result, this paper develops insights into emancipating and challenging debates of the gentrification discourse reconsidering and re-politicising gentrification through two cities of Spanish and Argentina.

Between assimilation and survival: Laz community in Turkey

This paper analyzes the challenging ethno-cultural recognition and revival attempts of Laz ethnic community in Turkey. The autochthon Laz community mostly lives in the Northeastern region of Turkey and through historical and contemporary waves of migration spread out to Western towns and metropolises. The Laz-speaking population has been assimilated into the Turkishness through the systematic Turkification policies by the Turkish nation-state that historically denied the existence of non-Turkish ethnic populations and defined all under the Turkish identity. Today the Laz language is recorded as "at risk of extinction" by UNESCO. In Turkey, the limited recognition of ethno-cultural rights observed in the last years has been largely achieved by the long-term struggle of the Kurdish movement. However, the political and armed conflict also deepened anti-Kurdish sentiments, and the resistance against ethno-cultural demands. The growing efforts of the Laz activists to keep their language and culture alive are similarly challenged with negative responses both within the Laz people and society at large. The growing visibility of Laz ethno-cultural activities exposes Laz activists to the nationalist antagonism and warning. The majority of Laz community refrains from speaking up identity-related demands believing that these efforts would strengthen "separatist" groups and divide the national Turkish identity. Under these conditions, where struggling for collective rights and recognition bear the risk of exclusion from Turkishness, the assimilated identities resist against the efforts for recognition and revival. This paper offers an analysis and discussion of the factors that explain why and how assimilated ethnic communities resist against the efforts for collective rights and recognition and whether it is possible to reverse assimilation looking at the Laz people in Turkey. The study is based on the analysis of historical setting, interviews with community members -including oral history- and review of debates on print and social media.

Elderly and computer: The Russian regional perspective

This paper explores computer literacy among elderly in the case of Russia (This project "Elderly People and Computer: the Volgograd regional perspective" is funded Russian Foundation for Humanities). There has not been much literature among Russian sociologists on how old people interact with computer systems and use them in their every-day life. Ageist views have typically held that older people are poor, frail, and resistant to change. Ageism can be a considerable factor affecting the adoption of new technologies by elderly. I undertook a two-year sociological study aimed at revealing and explaining a real life computing. I describe and discuss the nature of home computer use in terms of Actor Network Theory (ANT). I argue that the terms "trial" and "socio-technological assemblage" are useful tools for describing practices in which older people create new everyday life by adopting computer.

I then turn to feminist technology studies, which offer feasible conceptual frameworks and methods for exploring the production of technology as a point of political leverage. I consider ageism and technology as having a reciprocal influence on one another. Series of in-depth interviews reveal how older Russians are becoming a part of the computer communities. Older people living in Russia have high literacy level in general terms as the phenomenon of "Soviet educational project". I uncover and explain the importance of several interaction barriers, such as cognitive load, relationship with other relatives who can act as "warm specialists", media discourse of aging in Russia.

The modernist association of technology with youth translates into everyday experiences of age, education and the design of new technologies. I suggest coining the term "technoageism" to describe the cultural animus against people on the basis of their years.

Oral health and immigrant status among agricultural workers in South Florida: A qualitative study

Objectives: This qualitative study based on ethnographic interviews explores oral health knowledge and attitudes, the understanding of oral health related issues, susceptibility to dental diseases, the link to overall health and accessibility to dental care among a group of adult non US born Latino migrant workers in South Florida.

Methods: Data were collected through ethnographic interviews with a diverse Latino origin population that included Mexican, Ecuadorian, Venezuelan and Salvadoran agricultural-migrant workers in the Homestead/ Florida City. A convenience sample of 14 participants was selected to participate in the qualitative interviews. Interviews were audio-taped and transcribed. Themes were identified and then categorized for subsequent analysis.

Results: Seeking oral health care was driven by the manifestation of acute and/or painful oral problems, discomfort, and uncontrolled infections. Even though in most cases severe oral health complications were encountered, study participants preferred to use traditional remedies (e.g., garlic, peppermint, etc) to avoid a visit to the dentist. The lack of dental care coverage is a direct contributor to their decision to not seek oral health care. This study also indicates lack of understanding the seriousness regarding the relationship between systemic diseases (i.e., diabetes, heart diseases) and oral health.

Conclusions: Oral health has been ranked as one of the major health problems faced by migrant and seasonal farm workers, as well as one of the unmet needs in farms workers health services. Oral health deficiencies are having a significant effect on their general health and the ability to carry out normal activities. The study suggested that the combination of lack of dental knowledge, lack of access to oral care and poor preventive oral health habits created a significant dilemma for this population. In light of their migratory life-style, dental health education efforts should place more emphasis on self-care and self-monitoring among this population.

Mecanismos intergeneracionales de inclusión y exclusión. Un análisis desde la perspectiva de los destinatarios de las políticas sociales

Se presentan los resultados de una investigación de corte cualitativo realizada a través de la técnica de historias de vida, que indagó en las trayectorias de reproducción de la pobreza en contextos de exclusión y vulnerabilidad en tres generaciones de residentes en asentamientos de larga data y su vínculo con las políticas sociales.

Partiendo de las hipótesis de que en contextos de exclusión existen estrategias de supervivencia que tienden a consolidar la reproducción de la pobreza, y que en contextos en que las familias cuentan con mayores activos, la política social puede ser un instrumento de integración, la investigación buscó dar respuesta a las siguientes interrogantes: ¿las políticas sociales promueven transformaciones tendientes a la integración social de las familias, o por el contrario generan dinámicas que ponen obstáculos a dicha integración? ¿Bajo qué condiciones pueden operar distintas políticas para la generación de "círculos virtuosos"?

Se concluye acerca del tránsito inconcluso de enfoques y políticas sociales desde la perspectiva de los sujetos destinatarios: las políticas no parecen promover ni el emprendurismo, ni la ciudadanía, sino que se constituyen en tanto estrategias de supervivencia y contención material. Finalmente, se discute en qué medida las innovaciones conceptuales en torno a los conceptos de vulnerabilidad y exclusión social, así como los cambios de enfoques en las políticas sociales, han implicado transformaciones en los mecanismos de reproducción de las desigualdades sociales.

The discourse on knowledge and innovation. Rethinking professionalism

Discourse on knowledge and innovations seems to draw new challenges in professions and professionalism. The production and discourse on professional knowledge opens new directions for research on sociology of professions. The legitimization of scientific knowledge and, particularly of discourse on knowledge, seems to have strong connections with the idea of that this kind of discourse, that emerges from a social scientific discipline forms truth objects and future guidelines. In line with Foucault's analyses, it is precisely the disciplinary power of scientific discourse that shapes post-industrial society. The passage from industrial to post-industrial society was accomplished by means of change in the value and status of knowledge. Knowledge has always been an important element in terms of innovation changes, but in the current context a novel element arises: its commercial and economic character. This new status of knowledge places knowledge discourse in a political arena, where interest groups struggle over its articulation. The economic value of knowledge redefines its nature. The discourse knowledge is present in many new occupations such as management consultants, information technologists or computer engineers, which shares the same label of "knowledge workers" with traditional scientific professions such as physics, biologists or physicians. The power relations between groups are being redefined and renegotiated in the new knowledge discourse. From this point, we should expect certain changes that this new discourse triggers in professional regulation and new forms of professionalism.

Changing academic grant writing practices (1955-2005)

The paper addresses the question of how academic grant writing practices have changed over time. As public investment in research has stagnated, it has become necessary for academics to seek alternative funding sources for their research. Consequently, external funding has gained importance in the academic world, affecting both individuals and research organizations. Although existing scholarship offers a critical understanding of the working mechanisms of funding schemes and of their attendant evaluation procedures, little is known about the actual practice of writing grants. "Changing Academic Grant Writing practices" is a qualitative, longitudinal study of research proposals and funding program documentation in Germany from 1955 to 2005. Nearly all existing research focuses on a single facet of research funding; and this study seeks to counter this too-narrow approach by examining the institutional embeddedness of grant writing. To this end, we shall consider academic grant writing as an interactive performance framework that includes the funding agency, the peer reviewer, and the researcher. Our theoretical framework combines institutional logics and performance theory. Institutional logics shape worldviews by providing relevance structures and frames for constructing issues, problems, and solutions. As such, they supply a repertoire of legitimate arguments for academics in search of funding, who project their "ideal selves" onto their proposal, highlighting the characteristics they deem to be of particular value or worth in a given setting and at a given moment. At the same time, this study shows that the argumentative repertoire for what constitutes quality research has changed over time. Our content analysis thus shows an increasing tendency towards the standardization and rationalization of application guidelines and proposals from 1955 to 2005. This paper, in addition to providing innovative insights into academic work practices, expands the institutional framework by focusing on the interactive nature of social change in the science system.

On the so-called "new middle class citizens" as the powers of the changing capitalist system

There appear billions of new working and consuming citizens in the early 21st century world, mainly in East Asia and South Asia. These so-called new middle class citizens are the producers of goods and services necessary for capitalist society and consumers of such goods and services. Such working and consuming power grows in step with capital accumulation, forming a very important component of support for the global capitalist system, together with the financial and corporate powers and citizens of the West. How can we understand this emerging power bloc from the perspective of changing the world capitalist system?

Modern world history, including the Bolshevik experience, has clearly shown that it is impossible for manual workers and peasants to carry out the great historical tasks completely. The important point here is that the development of capitalism creates not only a mass of manual workers but also a growing number of service and office workers, and many consuming citizens who usually have higher levels of education and administrative skills. Further, they have, in many cases, higher self-consciousness and morals as residents in modernized societies. Even though they have appeared initially as supporters of capitalism, through their work directly and through consuming their own products indirectly, this paper argues they will, sooner or later, be betrayed by capitalism itself and become aware of its contradictions, through experiences of defeat in severe competition, heavy debts, unexpected unemployment, etc. Moreover, the experiences of wars, associated with activities of maintaining and spreading the capitalist system, may awaken citizens to the realities of capitalism's problems.

L'Ethnographie comme méthode de comparaison internationale « par le bas ». le cas des ateliers de tôlerie chez Renault en Argentine, en France et au Brésil

Les questions que pose la comparaison internationale sur des données quantitatives sont absentes lorsqu'elle porte sur des données qualitatives. Cette communication porte sur les problèmes posés par la mobilisation de l'ethnographie lorsqu'elle vise la comparaison internationale. A quel point la comparaison terme à terme est possible ? Ne rend-t-elle pas les objets incomparables en les associant à ce qu'ils ont de plus spécifiques ? Comment dépasser la comparaison terme à terme sans écraser les données issues des interactions ni introduire des explications exogènes ? Est-il nécessaire de construire une comparaison inter-nationale ?

J'analyserai ces problèmes en m'appuyant sur une recherche menée en 2004/2005 sur les usages de la formation en entreprise. Cette comparaison internationale par le bas comporte une ethnographie dans trois sites industriels du même constructeur automobile dans trois pays. Dans chaque site le protocole d'enquête a été rigoureusement le même. Je me suis fait embaucher comme ouvrier pendant quatre mois et j'ai mené des entretiens biographiques.

Les résultats sont les suivants. La formation a été standardisée. Ses objectifs sont la préparation des ouvriers pour le travail et pour leur promotion. Cependant les objectifs n'ont pas été atteints et les effets de la formation sont hétérogènes : partout les apprentissages sur le tas accroissent les performances ouvrières mais la formation produit des effets variables d'un établissement à l'autre.

Le site argentin attend des projets qui le redynamiserait. La formation est une activité supplétive qui elle organise la mise en attente du personnel.

Les intérimaires du site français sont privés de formation mais les statutaires y participent lors de projets particuliers. Par exemple pour obtenir un avancement. La formation facilite la gestion duale de la main-d'œuvre.

Dans le site brésilien la formation accompagne les recrutements pour sélectionner la main-d'œuvre et assurer sa stabilité.

Ma communication analysera comment compare-t-on ces résultats.

Colonization, alimentary habits and the symbolic construction of Teuto-Brazilian ethnicity

Foreign colonization in southern Brazil began in 1824 and produced what Leo Waibel would call "insular communities" that were culturally different from the rest of Brazilian society. European immigration was of interest to the Brazilian State, especially if it led to colonization based on family-owned small properties. This was one of the manners used by the Brazilian State to settle public lands up to the first decades of the 20th century.

The cultural systems that resulted from this territorial occupation process have certain common elements (resulting from colonization policy and from adaptations to the new habitat), but also present differences stemming from the immigrants' original cultures and nationalities. The result has been the formation of ethnicities which persist to the current day. Alimentary habits are among the elements which are used as markers of cultural differences, even when quotidian life is more generally characterized by practices that are shared with other Brazilians. Food can take on symbolic meaning, however, instrumentalizing cultural identities that are appropriated as a positive sign of self-identification, or used in a jocular and stereotyped fashion in different contexts of social relations.

In the present article, I analyze the use of culinary techniques that are adjusted to the habits and lifestyles of the descendants of German immigrants in southern Brazil, observing the disharmonies contained in the affirmations that these techniques express ethnic belonging. My analysis takes in certain situations of conflict, rooted in the history of immigration, and the aspects of symbolic ethnicity linked to the concept of "authentic food" which can be seen today in both quotidian life and in the ethnic festivals which take place in the cities of southern Brazil that are understood to be "German colonies".

Turkish migrants' organizations in Germany - Remittances and humanitarian aid before and after 2011 van earthquake

Various studies examined the aims, activities, functions and structures of Turkish migrant organizations in Germany. However, there is hardly any study on the role of these organizations in the flow of remittances to Turkey. There is even a complete silence when it comes to the role of these organizations in the humanitarian crises in Turkey (e.g., 1999 Gölcük Earthquake 1999 and 2011 Van Earthquake). Hence, it is not clear, how humanitarian crises influence the trends of these organizations in transferring remittances.

This paper aims to fill this research gap by systematically and empirically studying three Turkish migrant organizations in Germany (Islamic Community Milli Görüş: IGMG, the Federation of Alevi Community: AABF and Muslims Help: MH) and their activities in Turkey before and after 2011 Van Earthquake.

First, it shows that some of these organizations have been playing an important role for Turkey by attracting and transferring collective remittances; supporting specific religious, cultural, and/or political movements; providing social and financial assistance to their counterparts and other local partners; contributing to the development of Turkish civil society by communicating ideas, values and practices; and/or promoting peace or conflict. Second, it illustrates that some of these organizations also started collecting donations for relief and reconstruction aid after 2011 Van Earthquake. Last but not least, it discusses why these organizations have different attitudes towards collective remittances and play differing roles in 2011 Van Earthquake.

By using organizational sociological approaches, this paper argues that the activities and strategies of these organizations differ due to their differing organizational characteristics and member interests.

Ideologies in motion: Gender-segregated buses in Tehran, Iran

This paper is based on a broader research project which includes 3 case studies of gender segregation -- women-only parks, segregated buses, and soccer stadiums -- in Tehran, Iran to offer a contextual analysis of segregated spaces and their implications for women.

Since its establishment in 1979 the Islamic Republic of Iran has attempted to segregate the public spaces of the city along the gender lines. Soon after its establishment beaches, university classrooms, and buses became segregated and women's entrance into spaces such as sports stadiums where men's sports matches were held was prohibited. These practices are often lumped under the all-encompassing term 'gender-segregation' and are considered to be part of the State's project of Islamization of public spaces. In this paper I will focus on public transportation (particularly buses) in Tehran to challenge the unidimensional theorization of gender segregation practices and demonstrate the various meanings that have been associated to the production, expansion and usage of the segregated bus space in Tehran, Iran. Drawing on my ethnographic research conducted between 2008 to 2010 and the data collected through archival study and interviews with the City and government officials I explore the ways in which 'religious' and 'secular' values have merged to create particular spatial arrangements in the buses. I contend that segregated spaces, as all other spaces, are socially produced and enable/disable different kinds of subjectivities.

Constructing political spaces: Experiences of the Uttarakhand women's federation, a rural women's movement in India

This paper will examine the experiences of the Uttarakhand Women's Federation (UMP), a rural women's movement organised around a diverse set of issues in the hill villages of Uttarakhand, India. Drawing on focus group discussions and semi-structured interviews from 14 villages conducted in 2009, I will explore the formative processes of the women's groups at the village level since the mid 1980s as well as the process of forging a state-wide movement over a period of two decades. I will attempt to identify the strategies, which enabled the creation of spaces for deliberative decision-making for women and then explore how women have subsequently used this space in contingent ways. Identifying commonalities and differences across villages, I will illustrate how this process has cumulatively enabled the formation of a fluid collective agenda at the state level, articulated explicitly in recent years through their active participation in electoral politics.

The absence of an explicit ideological frame in this instance often critical to projecting and identifying a unified, coherent movement focuses attention on the actual practices and interactions of women with each other through these groups, mediated and shaped by the organisations involved. I will attempt to show how the strategies of mobilisation in this instance were cognisant of the inherently political nature of development and were directed towards forging critical collective consciousness, not charting a coherent path of change. Finally, I will analyse the content of these interactions, practices and strategies of mobilisation, focussing on how differences and conflicts that arise at multiple levels -within the village community, between women and network of community based organisations, with state institutions and officials-are negotiated. This process makes visible the contradictions of the development framework, where collective action by women around immediate struggles and needs cumulatively also outlines an alternative but fragmented vision of change.

Conflict resolution, language and proverbs: An African perspective

As repositories of traditional wisdom and morality proverbs and axioms form an important part of conflict resolution, language of justice, and transmission of cultural and ethical education, particularly for the younger generations.

Being non-prescriptive and non-dogmatic, proverbs and axioms tend to be situational and contextual in nature and arise only in particular circumstances. That is why conflictual and dis-harmonious situations are not only accepted as an inevitable part of life but are even sought and valued by Africans as they become sites for the transmission of language of justice, cultural knowledge, and for community participation.

Since group solidarity and harmony are primary values in the African tradition offenders are not excluded, through individualised punitive measures (as in modern judicial systems), but are re-inducted back into the group through verbal devices and oral strategies. The aim is to create reconciliation between the offender and the offended. Proverbs, with their deep practical wisdom, elegant language and complexity of thought perform this role without in any way damaging the dignity and self respect of the persons concerned.

Using material from creative writing (like Chinua Achebe and Ama Ata Aidoo) and from philosophical treatises written by Africans (such as those by Kwame Gyekye, Kwasi Wiredu and several others) the paper will explore and analyse the use of linguistic devices used during litigation, or for resolving conflicts, thereby also transmitting religious and moral values – that eventually aim at retaining and enhancing group solidarity.

Changing attitude of society towards old age homes in Mumbai, India

The population of the elderly people is growing all over the world. India is not an exception to this. Today 6% of world population is of over 60 years. With the advancement of medical science, public health care services, and technological development, the longevity of the people of people is improving and as a result the number of aged person is increasing. However in the process of urbanization, industrialization, modernization, pauperization, globalization, and migration, the traditional joint family system is declining to form a nuclear unit. Gradually the next generation becomes individualistic and self centered. Changes are taking place not only in kinship ties but also in parent child relationship, which puts them in different worlds.

The fast changing life style has increased the number of elderly people who live alone. Globalization has resulted in a number of youth staying abroad. Indian culture insists on care of the elderly people, who live alone. But day by day the life in urban metropolitan cities is getting more and more complicated. With the increase in number of elderly people, their health care has now become an issue of concern not only for the close family members but also for the whole society. The changing attitude of society towards old age homes in India is of recent origin. The academic institutions like Universities need to intervene and bring about desirable changes in the life of these senior citizens.

The main focus of this paper is to examine positive attitude of urban people towards old age homes. It also aims to find out the needs of the elderly people residing in Mumbai.

Addressing the regulatory gaps in the relocation of Alaska natives: A case study of Kivalina, Alaska

Through a case study of Kivalina, Alaska, this paper explores the gaps in U.S. policy for relocating Alaska Natives due to climate-induced impacts. There is currently no policy in place—within the United States or internationally—for the resettlement of communities facing permanent displacement from climate change. And in the United States there is no lead agency in charge of relocating displaced communities, despite several U.S. government reports stating that at least four Alaska Native villages, including Kivalina, must be resettled due to erosion from warming Arctic temperatures. This leaves government agencies in charge of assisting villages like Kivalina, such as the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Army Corps of Engineers, who are responsible for helping ensure Kivalina's safety but are not empowered to innovate new procedures and holistically address what is an unprecedented problem: climate change. In exploring the problems facing Kivalina, this paper argues for: 1.) close communication between communities and government agencies to determine when relocation may be necessary, and 2.) greater flexibility around existing, relevant policies and procedures, which can help inform 3.) implementation of a protocol specifically designed for those displaced by climate change, to prevent disaster before it occurs.

Multiple or solitary social identities? A reconstruction of narrative identities of members of Muslim voluntary organizations in Switzerland

Voluntary associations such as parties, trade unions, employers' associations, professional groups, sports clubs, cultural associations, churches or charities are an integral part of modern and democratic societies: As civil society bodies they intermediate between state and individuals and bridge their divergent interests (see Tocqueville or Putnam). Using Georg Simmel's metaphor of "intersecting social circles" (Kreuzung sozialer Kreise) (1968 [1908]), one could argue that volunteer associations help the individuals break through the boundaries of their primary groups (family, kinship, tribe, etc.) and reach for other social circles, thus developing higher degrees of social identity complexity (Roccas and Brewer 2002).

Applying the method of reconstruction of narrative identity developed by Lucius-Hoene & Deppermann (2004) our study tries to find out if membership in Muslim voluntary associations in Switzerland has any impact on the complexity and development of social identities of the interviewed members, and, if yes, if this associational affiliation fosters multiple or solitary social identities.

Reconstruction of narrative identity is a specific form of narrative interview adapted to the requirements of qualitative identity research and can be regarded as a major step in a lively process of methodological development, which was triggered, among others, by Sampson's (1993) groundbreaking work Celebrating the other: A dialogic account of human nature.

After delivering a short description of this method, the paper discusses the strengths and weaknesses of this method when applied to religious voluntary associations.

Intercountry adopted children from Korea: Their status as modern diasporas and their new identity as the facilitators in the globalized societies

Many studies have discussed Korean Diasporas who can be regarded as pre-modern diasporas, but very few of these studies focus on the intercountry adopted children who can be regarded as modern diasporas. These two kinds of Korean diasporas keep relationships with their homeland, Korea, in different manners. Pre-modern diasporas are treated as second class citizens in their residential countries whereas the intercountry adopted children, as a type of modern diasporas, are treated as first class citizens in their residential countries while keeping in touch with Korea by being the facilitators between the countries.

The burden of this presentation is to show a new form of identity emerging from the modern Korean diasporas. In particular, first I would like to find out, through interviews with the Korean adoptees in Sweden as well as the adoption organizations, how they see their relationship with their homeland Korea and Sweden. The result showed that, while the old generation of them regarded themselves as Swedes, more and more young generations are involved in the activities to build their identity as Korean. This is because Korea, which is emerging as a technologically, politically and economically powerful country in the global society, has been supporting those adoptees to maintain a relationship with their homeland. Because of the internationalization goal, Korea seeks to expand its influence in the global market as well as to enrich its own society. They need facilitators who have the international background and culture to fulfill the goal. Through the emerging trend, the adoptees have been involved as the facilitators not only between Korea and the residential country, but even beyond. These situations have led the adoptees to discuss how they could build "Global Korean Adoptees' Identity," which differs from the identity as merely Korean or Swedes.

Global impact and changing local reality: Understanding of overweight and obesity in Japan

The public consciousness of overweight and obesity has emerged and grown in Japan. The national health insurance system has started annual obesity check-ups for adult citizens. Yet, Japan's obesity rate, for example, is not necessarily high in East Asia and among the post-industrial societies. How have overweight and obesity become social issues in Japan? How do Japanese cultural values and social structures shape their reality and understanding of fatness and related health problems? Drawing on an original data set of news reports, this paper examines how national context shapes the definition of obesity and understanding of this health issue in Japan. Article counts show that obesity is the second, after smoking, frequently introduced health topics in national newspapers. Reporting on obesity often relates changing lifestyles and dieting habits to "Euro-Americanization," typically in a negative way. Despite that, analyses show that information on obesity, healthy dieting, and weight loss industry flows from the United States, Europe, and international organizations into the Japanese media. I interpret these results based on the extant literature on obesity and health in globalization, legal consciousness, and research on social stratifications.

Irregular migrant citizenship: Domestic workers negotiating social citizenship rights

Migrant domestic workers contribute to societal well-being in the societies of both their residence and origin. However, being citizens of the emigration country participating in an unofficial channel of labor migration, their own needs for care and support have been difficult to meet in practice as in the case of Philippine domestic workers and nannies in Germany. Rather than heralding the incongruence between territorial presence and state membership as an indication of "postnational" membership, or rendering irregular migrants invisible as citizens, I wish to locate their paradoxical positions in migrant citizenship. More specifically, given the embeddedness of migrants in multiple states and locations, I argue that the positions of Filipina and Filipino domestics are mediated by their 'irregular migrant citizenship'. Irregular migrant citizenship refers to the situation of those migrants who are citizens of a country in which they do not live, i.e. the Philippines, and live as irregular migrants in a country of which they are not citizens, i.e. Germany. I highlight two aspects: firstly, I pay attention to the irregularity of their migration status which has been indirectly shaped by the Philippine state's aggressive deployment policy. Secondly, I look at migrants' experiences in the society of residence, thereby aiming to connect the emigration and immigration contexts. I examine the ways in which Philippine migrant domestics' limited access to social provisions in Germany are connected to their irregular migration status. However, despite the state curtailment of migrants' access to social rights, they build alternative forms of care for themselves and their children at both local and transnational scales: the migrants realize some elements of their social citizenship rights through activating their ethnic networks as well as increasingly, non-ethnic, local activism consisting of politically engaged social workers and health professionals and municipal offices.

Handling democratic systems: Daily functions of police, courts and local councils in rural Uganda, Eastern Africa JSPS Nairobi Research Station

Key words: indigenous institutions, partial use/divert of democratic systems, pushing back resolutions, rural Africa

How democratic systems work in pre-industrial societies like rural Africa? A number of ethnographies of social anthropology compiled interpretations of indigenous institutions or social norms which are effective in the scenes of decision making in each society --- some researchers called them as "bureaucracy" or "gerontocracy". Today, international development agents evaluate these indigenous institutions and utilize them for local governance in many African countries that promoted de-centralization as a part of their democratization. Although it is easy to say this phenomenon as exploitation of indigenous institutions by global policies, the local people will also utilize and divert those "democratic" systems partly, sometimes they try to connect up to their indigenous institutions. In many cases, such they don't have ultimate power for sanctions tend to do that, but they will not entirely included in that democratic systems. The core of this kind of their art is "coping with uncertainty by pushing back resolutions". They utilize outer power which belongs to those democratic systems to handle their disputes and other matters on the one hand, while on the other they keep the matter problematic, remain the agenda on their own hands to be discussed anytime in future. I will clarify this kind of art by the case description of a peasant society in Uganda.

Mobility patterns of researchers

Changes in the structure and priorities of funding research and educational activities are accompanied by restructuring of the labour market for scientists, including new requirements to their mobility, both on national and international levels. The research pursues the following objectives: firstly, to operationalize the concept of social mobility, separating it from directly observable relocations; and secondly, to build a structural model explaining results of measuring mobility.

The analysis of Russian researches' mobility was based on the data collected within a monitoring survey career of doctorate holders undertaken in 2010. This study is a part of an international project "Mapping of Careers of Doctorate Holders" initiated by OECD. A multi-step stratified sample was used, with respondent quotas based on gender, age, research field and geographical area. Total sample size was 3,450 people (doctorate holders).

The analysis identifies major trends in the professional area (inter-sectoral, institutional, international etc.); secondary employment; and changing specialisation of researchers' social shifts. A conceptual model of researchers' social mobility is proposed. It was empirically established that mobility within the analysed sample conforms to Pareto's Law. To explain mobility from the sociological point of view, a scientific capital model was built, describing emerging social characteristics of researchers.

The results reveal connection between mobility patterns and various social characteristics in the scientific community as well as its dependence on researchers' scientific capital.

Study of skills for innovation in the large-scale survey

The identification and measurement of skills necessary to allow the development of a knowledge based economy and a faster pace of innovation, became a serious challenge to a sociologist. Until recently, research on the innovative skills and innovative behavior simulation was based on the analysis of respondent attitudes and psychological testing. Such an approach, however, is in contradiction with the task to measure competencies required by labour market and studies of different types of activity during education and training. Instead, the research setting requires a methodology enables large-scale surveys for measuring the levels of skills by the acquisition of relevant skills. We suggest a methodology to study skills for innovation, designed to conduct survey on formalized questionnaire. The model of the study includes six groups of skills (technological competences, informational skills, managerial skills, marketing skills, entrepreneurship, communication skills) and personal qualities (creativity, leadership, energy, self-confidence, the risk propensity, tolerance). At the same time we revealed the factual participation and the role of respondents in different stages of the life cycle of innovation: from the generation of new ideas to the innovation implemented. Based on the survey (involving 2290 respondents, employed, with vocational or higher education, participating in a panel survey RLMS) we constructed profiles according to the responsibility level, and the role in the innovation process and set of skills.

Mobility of Filipino nurses: Interviews in Australia and the Philippines

The Philippines had 7.2million Filipino migrants all over the world in 2005, a predominant outsourcing country of nurses [1]. Ease of international health migration is intensifying ethical concerns where developing countries lose some of their best qualified health workers to developed countries. The purpose of our Australian Research Council (ARC) Project with Partner Organisation; Queensland Health (Australia) was to build an ethical and sustainable model for health professional recruitment to Australia, with a case study of nurses from the Philippines, ensuring fairness to the individual nurses, the source country and the recruiting country. Interviews were conducted (and recorded) with Directors of Nursing, nursing peers and Filipino qualified nurses (n=15) in Australia, & focus group discussions were conducted with key informants in the Philippines (n=18). Content and thematic analysis were performed. Findings highlighted challenges with the English language for Filipino registered nurses and several felt they were employed in a lower position to that of their skills. Key informant results revealed concerns surrounding standard of nursing education in some areas and the interest of government officials to create an ethical form of bilateral agreement or process for nurse recruitment to Australia. The Philippines receives remittances from Filipino nurses working abroad which in turn benefits the government and many families. Significance of the study was timely with the release of the WHO Code on International Health Personnel Recruitment in the context of the Millennium Development Goals. Ethical and sustainable health workforce agreements between source and recruiting countries will enable fairer recruitment and integration of global health workers.

Polish women in the British labour market: Experiences of de-skilling and re-skilling

This paper will discuss employment experiences of Polish women in the United Kingdom (UK). The research found that women seemed to have experienced occupational downgrading i.e. women worked in lower level occupations in the UK in comparison to the occupations they held in Poland. Moreover, women experienced de-skilling, as despite having high level skills and qualification, they worked in occupations requiring low level skills.

Higher education qualifications from Poland or good language knowledge played little positive role in women's experiences overall. Women experienced barriers on the UK labour market i.e. some did not have their rights satisfied and experienced unfavourable treatment at work in a form of discrimination and bullying. However, some women acquired higher level qualifications in the UK and as a result their situation appeared to change for the better. Re-skilling i.e. getting new skills and qualifications appeared to have improved their situation. They were then more likely to work in higher level occupations and more likely to have positive experiences.

This paper shows that although Polish women in the UK seem to have a high level of human capital (including both high level qualifications and very good English language knowledge) they seem to be disadvantaged in the labour market in terms of type of work performed and general employment experiences. The migration context is additionally important as Polish women in the UK as the EU citizens have an unrestricted by immigration rules access to the labour market and educational system, so they have an opportunity to freely change employment and acquire new skills and qualifications and some research participants did so. However, despite that women still experience a 'double disadvantage' connected with their migrant and gender status in the UK.

Social structure of the information society

A basic concept of every society since the advance of sociology by Conte, is its social structure. The industrial, modern society has a very clear hierarchical structure. Bell has demonstrated in his epic work "The coming of the post industrial society" that changes are imminent. His central theme was expressed about and constituted around the passing of the character of the working forces between the industrial and post industrial society. Essentially, his deliberations were centered around the changes of the social structure that the information society (in his words, post industrial) is about to maintain.

Researches about the changes of the social structure of the information society has not been undertaken in a large and obvious manner. Never the least the manifest social movements, the financial and economic crises, as well as a deterioration of democratic praxis and political activities of large group of people, before all in Europe and Northern America, has in a more that palpable manner demonstrated that fundamental changes of the social structure of the developed societies is in the making.

The paper will thrive to show that the nascent change are already present and functioning. It shall try to demonstrate some thoughts about this changes and shall attempt to propose a wide-ranging elements of the budding elements of the social structure of the Information society.

This broadly sketched attempt will on a broad-spectrum level be related to the confrontations in and among societies. The changes of the social structure of the Information society shall be seen as an important factor of those confrontations.

Housing movements in cities of Southern Europe: From 'the right to property' to 'the right to the city'

The paper is based on PhD research material about the discourse and role of recent housing movements in cities of Southern Europe. It will present a parallel analysis of housing movements that have emerged during the last decade in Italy (Rome and Florence), Spain (Barcelona and Madrid) and Greece (Athens and Thessaloniki).

Given the specificities of the Southern European context (familistic welfare state, weak state housing provision, homeownership as the hegemonic social ideology for access to housing, construction as an economic motor) housing movements have not been very common, with few exceptions, and even less since the mid 70s'.

However the effects of the gradual neoliberalisation of urban space production, multiplied by the recent consecutive crises on national and international level (construction bubble in Spain 2007, Subprime Crisis in US 2008, World financial crisis, (public dept) economic (and political) crisis in EU since 2010) have brought the housing question again into the fore. Liberalisation of the credit market, property market speculation, escalating housing costs and the erosion of alternative mechanisms for the provision/production of affordable housing together with the general impoverishment of societies are leading to an emerging housing crisis.

The paper will present recent mobilisations and focus on the discourse produced. Drawing from the theory of urban movements, it will use frames and framing processes as an analytical tool in order to understand the framing of the 'right to housing' within the socio-economic, political and cultural context of each country/city. When and how are housing rights consolidated into a concrete demand? What are the perceptions and ideologies related to housing identified in the specific housing struggles? Themes like the 'right to property'; the right to just redistribution or the 'right to the city' will be traced within the movements' discourses and actions.

Categorías profesionales y las prácticas integrativas y complementarias

La Organización Mundial de la Salud (OMS) estimuló la incorporación de las prácticas integrativas y complementarias (PIC) en los sistemas nacionales de salud de sus países miembros principalmente a partir del documento Estrategias 2002-2005. En Brasil, en el año 2006 fue publicada la Ley 971, que implanta la homeopatía, la medicina china/acupuntura, la fitoterapia y la medicina antroposófica en la Atención Primaria del Sistema Único de Saúde (SUS). El objeto de este resumen es analizar la práctica de las PIC atribuidas a las categorías profesionales y busca contestar a la pregunta: ¿quién puede hacer qué dentro de las PIC en Brasil, en la Atención Primaria? La metodología es cualitativa y los métodos usados son la revisión de la literatura y al análisis documental. Se concluye que hay básicamente tres categorías de atribuciones de las PIC: 1) las PIC que solo pueden ser aplicadas por una única categoría profesional con formación superior; 2) las PIC aplicadas por varias categorías profesionales de formación superior; y 3) las PIC empleadas por múltiples categorías profesionales, de formación superior y de nivel mediano

Health professionals' perceptions on the use of integrative medicine for cancer patients at the clinics hospital of the State University of Campinas, Brazil

The National Cancer Institute (INCA) is a branch of the Brazilian National Health System (SUS) which treats around 120 million people. In 2011, more than 500 thousand new cancer cases arose and although the bill on the National Policy for Integrative and Complementary Practices was approved in 2006, integrating homeopathy, medical herbs, acupuncture and thermalism into the SUS, the oncological field has not been reached by these practices yet. The purpose of this paper is to discuss the perceptions of the health professionals working at the cancer unit at the Clinics Hospital of Unicamp on the application of Integrative and Complementary Practices (ICP) to cancer patients. Thirty two out of 47 health professionals were interviewed between August and October 2011 to find out what they think about the application of ICP to cancer patients and which ICP they would suggest. All except one professional were in favor of employing ICP for cancer patients at the hospital and four categories emerged from the analyzed data: a) patients need more than just chemo and radiotherapy; b) acupuncture should be applied to help ease the pain; c) by using ICP patients would feel well taken care of; d) patients should be referred to a ICP service outside the hospital. The interviews are the first stage of an ongoing project to implement ICP in the cancer unit and jump-start the discussion of ICP in the cancer field in the country. Among the most cited practices, acupuncture, reiki, medical herbs and yoga were mentioned.

Psychosomatic health, gender and working conditions in science. A comparative study of male and female scientists in Mexican public universities

Neoliberal politics have restructured organizational culture of Mexican public universities and have changed working conditions of fulltime professors. Researchers perceive ongoing authoritarianism, limited access to institutional resources, lack of distributive justice, weak support structures, and leaderships' reluctance to recognize academic achievement of staff. At the same time labor unions have lost importance as mediators in conflicts between organizations and scientific workers. Individuals who suffer from ongoing interpersonal conflicts with colleagues, superiors and students, symbolic mistreatment and managerial arbitrariness feel themselves often abandoned and vulnerable. High levels of work stress and tension influence negatively health status. This is particularly the case of female and young scientists who observe higher levels of health complaints.

This study measures psychosomatic health status of 733 fulltime university professors (all belong to National Research System) from 29 Mexican public universities. Health status is correlated to organizational culture, and personal and professional characteristics of individuals (gender, age, seniority, academic capital, disciplinary adscription).

Data were gathered by an electronic survey. Organizational culture is measured by 34 items (alpha de Cronbach = .973) exploring 5 areas: recognition, support, participation, distributive justice and leadership style. Health status scale (Lickert type) measures the intensity of 5 psychosomatic complaints during the month immediately before data collection (alpha de Cronbach = .907). ANOVA and regression analysis are performed.

High levels of institutional exclusion from decision making, weak institutional workers' support structures, high institutional reluctance to recognize scientific achievement and/or poor levels of distributive justice generated higher psychosomatic disorder levels. Women and young academics (age 30-40) had significantly more health problems than males and older staff. No significant correlation was observed between psychosomatic health and scientific discipline, job category and marital status.

Fue una vez: Un análisis comparativo de las representaciones de la infancia brasileña en las obras de Monteiro Lobato y Mauricio de Souza

Marcel Mauss señala en sus ensayos antropológicos la necesidad humana de clasificar, como una forma de organizar cognitivamente el mundo que está en su vuelta. Bajo esta perspectiva, la percepción del tiempo y las generaciones se encuentran en una posición de gran preocupación en la clasificación compartida que utiliza la sociedad occidental moderna. Con base en estos supuestos, las categorías generacionales, pensadas desde una perspectiva comparativa histórica cultural, se convierten en un ejercicio de análisis de los cambios sociales y sus valores. En este contexto, el análisis, por ejemplo, de la categoría infancia en la sociedad brasileña, a través de publicaciones para niños muy importantes en dos períodos distintos, como el de Monteiro Lobato y Mauricio de Souza, podría convertirse en un elemento importante para una investigación de esta orden. El propósito de este trabajo es examinar cómo la infancia se retrata en estas publicaciones, a través de sus autores, como documentos importantes que podrían aclarar los elementos culturales presentes en la manera que viven y piensan la gente en el cotidiano.

Politics are biographical. and gendered. Life stories of dropouts from the far right

The right-wing scene in Germany represents a very dangerous and to a lot of people threatening political context. Yet again and again people devote their energy to the right-wing bodies of thought and translate it into action. Both men and women. A few of them back out of the scene after a certain period of time.

Research up to date allows the conclusion that turning towards the far right and also turning ones back to it does not happen merely by coincidence. Different biographical patterns of action are associated with entering and backing out of the right-wing scene.

Based on case reconstructions of biographies of dropouts from the far right, collected by biographical narrative interviews, I want to illustrate this theory. The question at hand is, however, in which formation we find the association of biographical and political circumstances. In order to answer this question, I present selected biographies which demonstrate personal experiences and stories that had lead to "becoming a neonazi" – and also to dropping out of the scene after a certain while. An outstanding role plays the family. Concluding, I would leave to discuss to what extent life courses differ as a result of gender and at which point gender dimensions are of particular relevance.

El actual crecimiento del mercado residencial en Brasil y sus impactos en el precio de la vivienda

El actual crecimiento del mercado residencial en Brasil ha reconfigurado muchas ciudades en el país. Movimiento visto por muchos como la gran posibilidad de acceso a vivienda, también se identifica como una prometedora frente de inversión de capital. El aumento de escala en la producción de vivienda no ha significado una reducción de sus precios, al revés: el crecimiento de la oferta ha sido acompañado por un incremento en sus precios. Hay muchas especulaciones sobre este fenómeno. Algunos dicen que resulta de la presión ejercida por la demanda reprimida, que tuvo su capacidad de endeudamiento ampliada por la elevación efectiva de su renta, consecuencia del aumento de los puestos de trabajo formal y de la masa salarial, y el fácil acceso al crédito – con bajas tasas de interés y plazos más largos. Otros argumentan que se sustenta en el aumento de los costes de construcción, el crecimiento de los salarios de los trabajadores de la construcción y la escasez de mano de obra calificada, y la incapacidad de la cadena productiva de la construcción en satisfacer las demandas actuales. Otra parte dice que se debe al aumento de los precios de la tierra y a la relativa escasez de suelo urbano. Además, hay quienes afirman que resulta de la demanda por una mayor rentabilidad para atraer a los inversores del mercado de capitales y a la imposición de altos Valores Generales de Venta para la valorización de los precios de mercado de las empresas, después de la apertura de capital del sector. Frente a estos argumentos, procurase comprender la lógica y las estrategias del mercado residencial brasileño a través del análisis del comportamiento de los precios. Y, así, contribuir para la construcción de nuevos paradigmas para la lucha por el derecho a la vivienda y a la ciudad.

Democracia, participación popular y experiencias de autogestión en Brasil actual

El artículo problematiza la relación entre Estado y sociedad en la democracia contemporánea, y discute el significado político de las experiencias de autogestión actuales. Después de más de dos décadas de apertura política en diversos países latino-americanos, esas sociedades mantienen altos niveles de desigualdad socio-económica, pobreza y violencia, que indican sus límites en la construcción de sociedades efectivamente democráticas. En Brasil y en otros países de América Latina, en los años 80 y 90, son creadas diversas organizaciones económicas colectivas, que se denominan autogestionarias: fábricas y empresas recuperadas por los trabajadores, cooperativas y otros emprendimientos de carácter asociativo, de prestación de servicios, producción artesanal e industrial, en diversos sectores, en el campo y la ciudad, por mujeres y hombres desempleados, en vías de perder sus empleos o en ocupaciones precarias e informales. Esas experiencias surgen en un contexto de reestructuración productiva, relacionada a las transformaciones tecnológicas, la mundialización y financiarización de la economía y a las consecuentes mudanzas y precarización en el mundo del trabajo. En el ámbito político, surgen en un contexto de revisión de proyectos políticos revolucionarios, a partir de la experiencia del llamado socialismo real, y de la crítica a modelos centralizados, burocráticos e autoritarios. En ese texto, busca-se tratar del tema de la autogestión en el debate sobre política y participación, por una perspectiva teórica que amplia el concepto de política e investiga la relación entre producción y democracia. Con base en el debate académico crítico sobre los significados y límites de las experiencias participativas, la mirada histórica sobre la participación popular y el análisis de algunas experiencias actuales, busca-se destacar la relevancia de las experiencias autogestionarias en el contexto de disputa de los sentidos de la democracia.

Optimistic students: Occupational expectations of migrant youth in comparative perspective

This paper advances the research on migrant adolescents by comparing the occupational expectations of migrant and non-migrant students in 15 countries. Using the PISA 2006 survey we compare four categories of students: 1) non-migrants, 2) the second generation migrants who speak the host country language at home, 3) the first generation migrants who also speak the host country language at home, and 4) the ethnic migrants who speak their ancestral language at home. In previous studies, migrant youth have been found to perform less well academically than non-migrants in many of countries participating in PISA surveys. However, we find that these underperforming students have higher occupational expectations than the non-migrants, and the ethnic migrant students have the highest expectations of all. This latter pattern holds across all fifteen countries after controlling for differences in parents' SES, gender, and students' academic ability. Drawing on the literature of marginal status we put forward an explanation for these patterns, and point to directions for future research.

Cinema and social sciences: Between the dead times and the critical thought images

To revisit sequence of images from some essay-films connecting justice, violence and construction of memory, allows - in its critical and reflexive effects -, the comprehension of some aporetic dimensions around the "social question" and its representational forms in Brazilian cinema nowadays. Justice, from Maria Augusta Ramos, and Prisoner of Iron Bars, from Paulo Sacramento, both inserted as non-fictional films, were exhibited in 2004. Awarded in many national and international festivals, they raised a strong public debate about social inequalities, violence and (in)justices. A comparison with a recent fiction film – The Tenants, from Sergio Bianchi, 2009, is suggestive to emphasize analysis of two important dimensions for social sciences, relating aesthetics and politics. 1) The theme of naturalization of daily violence (and its symbolic dimension), inside a process of normalization of barbarism, with emphasis on the spectacularization of violence constructed by television media, between others. 2) The theme that connects image-in-movement, movement of history and memory, and its critical configurations, as an important counterpoint in relation to a cinematographic production in recent times, through a "cordial cinema" – and its dead times –, ruled by a dualistic vision of social problems, erasing the perspective of "dialectical image", core of reflections of Walter Benjamin.

José Martí y las raíces del pensamiento latinoamericano

José Julián Martí Pérez, El Maestro, El Delegado, fue un gran pensador cubano que veía en la independencia de su patria el comienzo de la verdadera independencia continental. Preso político y exiliado desde los 16 años, pasó la mayor parte de la vida lejos de su amada Cuba. Sin embargo, la distancia no disminuyó el ánimo de su corazón y la causa de la independencia fue la pelea de su vida.

Cuba libre serviría a dos propósitos inmediatos. En primer lugar, ser un prototipo para otras repúblicas de Hispanoamérica, ya que se constituiría una nación autóctona, con raíces plantadas en suelo latinoamericano y marcada por un proceso histórico único. En segundo lugar, detener la marcha imperialista estadounidense, pues la condición de colonia favorecería las acciones estadounidenses en el continente pela puerta antillana. De la aguda percepción de la política exterior de EE.UU., con los legisladores y los periódicos difundiendo ideas de cuan natural sería extender sus operaciones hacia el sur del continente, un lugar de raza mixta degenerada, Martí concibió un plan audaz de la defensa, una demarcación de la identidad continental de manera distinta. En las jóvenes repúblicas, los componentes hispanoamericanos son naturales, esenciales y culturalmente distintos.

El movimiento nacional dirigido a la liberación, no sólo la independencia de Cuba y Puerto Rico - islas gemelas -, pero también abogó por la transformación de la realidad socio-económica de las otras repúblicas de América, que aún sufren de los males heredados del colonialismo español. La liberación de las Antillas del dominio colonial sería un primer paso hacia la segunda independencia, ahora del imperialismo estadounidense. Este trabajo pretende analizar la obra de José Martí y mostrar cómo la misma se puede insertar en el contexto del pensamiento latinoamericano que llegó a ser consolidada en el siglo XX.

The paper I propose here intends to discuss the theme of citizenship in contemporary Brazil. Based on the analysis of a selected group of texts, it identifies two basic conceptions of citizenship: One more concerned with the problem of social inequality and the other emphasizing the process of citizenship construction by social movements. My thesis is that both conceptions maintain an ambivalent relationship with T. H. Marshall's model of citizenship while leaving almost untouched the notion of social citizenship, which is Marshall's main contribution to the subject. And, lastly, the paper concludes that this omission is precisely what makes difficult the formulation of a critical conception of citizenship adequate to Brazilian reality.

Alienation theory and ideology in dialogue

The formulation of an alienation theory sets a clear rupture between Marx and the German idealistic philosophers, as it unveils the possibility of new theoretical investigations. The concept of alienation comes forth as Marx defines labor as a central element of social life. Accordingly, this concept expresses four aspects of human condition, especially in capitalism: (i) men's alienation of nature, (ii) alienation of their own activity, (iii) alienation of human kind and (iv) alienation of each other. In this case, we can conceive alienation as not just a material condition, but also one related to conscience. Due to this perception, this article focuses on debating the potential relationship between alienation, as a specific human condition, and ideology. In our understanding, ideology is a historical representation of men's social and political structure and relations, that influences human actions, especially in cases of social conflict. As a kind of representation, ideology plays a fundamental role in the making of conscience, and as such we expect to understand whether it contributes for the development of the alienation process or for the end of it. Despite their tight bonds, we consider alienation and ideology as two different concepts and, although we hope to expose their relation, it is important to clarify the existent differences, once it contributes to rethinking their possible current relevance.

Affects and the struggle for recognition: The nacional street population movement in Brazil

Will the composition originated between the life experience and the struggle for recognition be motivated by survival interests or will there be another dimension, present in the struggle for recognition that escapes most of the empiric researches in the social sciences?

The aim of this article is to try to understand how the disrespect experience, anchored in the affective life experience has subsidized the impulse for the social resistance, more precisely, for a struggle for ethic, juridical and identity recognition.

Emblematic case, the "Praça da Sé Massacre", occurred in the city of San Paulo/Brazil, in August 2004 and where 15 people were brutally attacked, demonstrates harshly how the disrespect experience made plausible the identification and union between similars living in the streets, through the living of pain. Simultaneously, it functioned as a promoting fact of an effective struggle for recognition and political claims which culminated with the constitution of the National Street Population Movement in Brazil.

This articulation between the population living in the streets and social organizations has been trying, through the denunciation of the complete absence of public policies, to make evident how the entanglement of several exclusions has been central to the creation of a controlled population which is only a contingency to the neoliberalism: either necessary, as precarious labour, either completely disposable.

Thus, re-subjectivized from a critical perspective, and with a rebellious repertoire consubstantiated in the claim of a positively replaced identity, the new people in the streets organized in a collective movement, find in the struggle for recognition a singular form of reinterpretation for the affective, juridical and solidary dimensions in the long path for the social emancipation.

Women in the streets and affections: Revisiting the debate on the "affective turn" in feminist theory

The feminist practices have contributed, throughout its history, to destabilize categories unquestioned by modern science. The various forms of oppression as well as the diversity of struggles, spaces, and ways of creating these women, their multiple affiliations and silences to which they were relegated to serve as a catalyst for the emergence of a new body of theory that questioned, through the living experience, universalism, essentialism and Eurocentrism. Studies in the political culture of the emotions were written with depth and rigor and the patriarchal structures of modern science were put in check by intense debate. However, it seems to us that even after several advances and the underlining of a complex theoretical framework, the question of objectivity and, therefore, the idea of a supporting reason; even as they appear to be revised and reinterpreted, continue to be rejected by the studies presently named "affective turn". "The" modernity was questioned, but not the modern practices that persist on informing our speeches. The affective turn, despite being critically striking the deal with the inherited conceptions of modernity, fails by not proposing its transformation.

Thus, the aim of our paper is, through a discussion to dialogue with recent studies that represent the "affective turn" in feminist theory, a proposal to recover the affections of the political philosophy of Baruch Spinoza, while arguing about the need for overcoming the modern legacy and to release our practices and policies from the yoke of "objectivity". Therefore, we propose the (re)meeting of Spinoza's philosophy and feminist theory with the struggles of these women, leaders of a movement of people in the Brazilian streets, where the affections are already commonly understood as continuous variations of our ability to exist and as a place to expand our power of action in the world, living, thinking and feeling, inseparably.

Enclaves del poder sub-nacional y procesos de democratización en Medellín, Santa Cruz y Guayaquil

El objetivo de esta ponencia es comprender la influencia de las élites regionales de tres países andinos (Colombia, Bolivia y Ecuador), en los procesos de democratización local. Haremos referencia a la influencia que el Grupo Empresarial Antioqueño (Medellín), el Comité Pro Santa Cruz (Bolivia) y la Junta Cívica del Guayaquil (Ecuador) tienen en los procesos democráticos y en la consolidación institucional de estas ciudades durante los Gobiernos de Alvaro Uribe, Evo Morales y Rafael Correa respectivamente. A la luz de la teoría del poder sub-nacional (Edward Gibson) intentaremos explicar el papel de las élites regionales en la construcción de un modelo propio de desarrollo muchas veces contrario al centro. Nos preguntaremos en este sentido ¿cómo esto afecta la consolidación de la democracia local? y ¿cómo los regímenes territoriales distribuyen el poder entre los actores políticos en un sistema territorial nacional? Para responder a estas preguntas tomaremos en cuenta dos dimensiones de análisis: lo intergubernamental y lo inter-regional. La primera se refiere al grado de centralización o descentralización que existe entre los gobiernos nacionales y sub-nacionales. La segunda hace referencia a la distribución territorial de los derechos y prerrogativas entre las unidades sub-nacionales, por ejemplo, entre los diferentes estados o provincias, y como estas influyen positiva o negativamente en el desarrollo de la calidad de la democracia local. Así, intentaremos explorar no solo una vía de análisis vertical del centro a lo local, sino una vía horizontal que nos permita entender las distintas consecuencias, variantes y actores que entran en juego en las distintas políticas territoriales adoptadas bajo la influencia de estas élites.

Women in poverty: Intergenerational experiences

The democratization of Brazilian society has made great progress in the public sphere, since the end of the dictatorship, in 1985. In the meantime, there has been little progress in the democratization of the private relationships such as family and gender. Here, inequalities persist mostly for poor families with low levels of education. Sociological texts indicate that poor women bear the largest responsibility within the family: from domestic economy, childcare, to daily survival strategies.

The objective of this text is to understand and analyze the female generations in relation to male domination, marriage, sexuality and child care, in the context of poverty and violence (domestic and urban violence).

In one research in a favela de Rio de Janeiro, although a young woman interviewed had many more opportunities to develop a symmetrical relationship with her partner, the atmosphere of crime and material desire facilitated her to act as a property of her partner.

This context is a challenge for the present social relationship in modern institutions such as the family, and poses some questions that the text will try to answer: women of three generations, who live in a poor context, with low levels of education, and their enormous difficulty to escape of the fatality of poverty, and also of male domination.

Libre mercado, desregulación y centralización: La neocolonización industrial de la patagonia chilena

Desde una perspectiva histórica, la Patagonia chilena (Región de Aysén) ha sido tradicionalmente un territorio aislado y en constante colonización. Durante las primeras décadas del siglo XX el Estado chileno fomentó su ocupación mediante el otorgamiento de gigantescas concesiones de tierras a sociedades ganaderas. En el mismo período se generó una colonización espontánea por parte de familias de pioneros que buscaban tierras para asentarse libremente. Estos debieron luchar por década contra el Estado, el aislamiento y la falta de recursos para conseguir el reconocimiento legal de aquellas propiedades.

Una nueva etapa comienza con el actual modelo económico adoptado por Chile desde los años ochenta, el cual ha fomentado la planificación de proyectos privados en la región, pero ya no de particulares o familias, sino de corporaciones que buscan la explotación de los vastos recursos naturales existentes. La neocolonización industrial de este territorio se ve representada hoy en día por grandes y polémicos proyectos hidroeléctricos en tramitación.

La lógica de la actual neocolonización de la Región de Aysén puede explicarse a partir de dos características de la estructura político económica chilena.

- La centralización en la toma de decisiones (privadas y gubernamentales) característica del modelo republicano chileno.
- La más reciente desregulación de las inversiones privadas y la planificación orientada por la rentabilidad de los proyectos.

El contexto bipolar de centralización y desregulación de la iniciativa privada ha provocado la emergencia de movimientos de oposición a estos proyectos, sustentados principalmente en la defensa del medio ambiente. Pero esta oposición también demanda una mayor participación en la toma de decisiones (descentralización) y una mayor planificación y supervisión en las estrategias de desarrollo (regulación). En resumen, el conflicto socioambiental emergente visibiliza las falencias de la actual estructura política económica del país, entregando asimismo perspectivas sobre el desarrollo futuro de la democracia chilena.

The Brazilian child and childhood in images and representations between years 1880 and 1940

The aim of this study is to observe the circumstances and spaces of the representations concerning child and childhood in Brazil between 1880 and 1940 years and from this observation, we intend to analyze the central position of the children in the Brazilian social field. The iconography produced by the transition from 19th century to 20th century is important to place childhood in a fundamental historical period for the formation of the Brazilian nation, in which there is a strong inter-relation between race, identity and State-nation. The choice of this period and the work with iconography are the sources in which we seek to understand the plurality of the social construction of the contemporary childhood. The fieldwork in museums and school collections in some Brazilian States especially emphasizes the images that present black children, assuming as reference the debate in the field of the sociology of childhood. Under several aspects, we understand as difference the variability that constitute the experience of the early children as social categories of analysis, such as gender, race, ethnicity and sexuality, considering specificities of the historical process and of the Brazilian social field. Such discussion associates themselves to the debate concerning the contingent construction of the childhood whose notions of differences mark, in the time and space, the forms of living, representing and defining the childhood, consisting itself, therefore, as a plural category. The work is articulated with the social studies of childhood in a socio-anthropological analysis, observing the reference points of the Sociology of childhood's field.

Black flight: Racial shuffling in American metropolitan areas

"Black Flight," or the rapid geographical mobility of African-Americans in US metropolitan areas, has received scholarly attention mostly as the return migration of African-Americans to cities in the American South (Frey, Berube). In addition to this black inter-metropolitan mobility, there is evidence of intra-metropolitan movement. In line with Chicago School theory, urbanists have conventionally described this movement as "black suburbanization," focusing on outward movement from the "inner city" to the periphery. However, at a time when middle class whites and immigrants are moving into the central city, racial dynamics in metropolitan space are more complex than simple outward movement. Levels of racial segregation have largely persisted even though there is a lot of shuffling and churning going on. Blacks are still more residentially segregated from whites than are Hispanics or Asians, but average neighborhood segregation has decline for blacks between 2000 and 2010. Areas thought of as "hyper-segregated ghettos" were depopulating as African-Americans left, making room for new immigrants. Black and white gentrifiers are restoring older properties or rebuilding on vacant lots. Thanks to housing vouchers, even low-income African Americans are relocating within central cities, although they usually move to other nearby poor, largely black neighborhoods. This paper analyzes newly released data from the 2010 US Census and the 2000 Census to identify new patterns of "black flight" in American metropolitan areas and their relationship to white middle class and immigrant movements.

Actitudes hacia la lengua maya y sus hablantes en la ciudad de Mérida

En Yucatán, México, hablan maya 537,618 personas, lo que constituye el 27.4915% de la población estatal, mientras que el 13% de la población de la ciudad de Mérida, capital del estado de Yucatán, habla la lengua maya.

Las actitudes hacia la lengua maya y sus hablantes son diversas y contradictorias, ya que la gente dice que la maya tiene valor, prestigio, función, es importante hablarla para visitar las comunidades que la usan, pero cuando se trata de los hablantes nativos son evaluados como pobres, humildes, de escasos recursos, sin educación, pero si aprenden español adquieren mejores oportunidades y si fueran trilingües de maya, español e inglés, dado el contexto turístico de la zona, entonces son considerado como valiosos.

Así, el objetivo de este trabajo es identificar las actitudes hacia la maya y los hablantes de esta lengua en la ciudad de Mérida, Yucatán.

La teoría mentalista afirma que se detectan las actitudes en la mente y la conductista señala que se obtienen en el medio, presentamos los datos con técnicas de las 2 posturas, por lo que se obtuvieron de entrevistas semidirigidas, observación indirecta y la técnica del matched-guise.

En el contexto de actitudes hacia la maya y sus hablantes en su relación con el inglés y el español, retomamos el modelo de Ecología de Presiones, según Terborg (2006), para explicar que las actitudes de los hablantes se originan en el estado del mundo que representa la situación que se creó hacia la lengua maya en los últimos 10 años.

The concept of loss in transnational migration

Most societies define their immigrants in terms of gains (economic, professional, survival, etc...), rather than in terms of losses (emotional). Dominant contemporary ideologies view immigrants as people who take advantage of the resources in the host society rather than as people who have left a whole world behind – home, friends and family – and who need to reconstruct their lives. This paper will shed light on this other side of migratory stories. By means of a qualitative study we shall highlight and attempt to conceptualize 'loss' in transnational migration. What is loss? What does it really mean to miss the births and funerals of family members and the birthdays of loved ones, and to be far from close family during illness and other major life events for reasons of geographical distance and the economic limitations that go with transnational migration? What do people lose during their migratory experiences and how can we make sense of these losses sociologically and psychologically? In our work we interrogate the terrain of "loss" and transnational migration and ask how this dimension helps us to better understand migratory stories as lived experiences.

Visual discourses of the University of Santiago de Chile: Higher education advertisement, wall paintings and graffiti

Trying to capture the contemporary idea of the university, the neoliberal or entrepreneurial university have become common labels to depict the growing marketisation of universities worldwide. Discussing the relationship between the neoliberal and the public university and the increasing colonisation of the public sphere by neoliberalism, discourse analysis has mostly focused on qualitative interviews, media reports and policy documents. Visual culture, however, has mostly been neglected as a source of discourse. This is even more surprising as Higher Education advertisement, graffiti and wall paintings can provide us with rich insights into contemporary ideas of the university. The paper investigates two forms of visual discourses of the university and how they relate to each other: Higher Education advertisement in public transport and wall paintings and graffiti in and around universities. I discuss this based on a visual ethnography I carried out in Santiago de Chile in 2010. At the center of my discussion is the question of how the neoliberal university has even occupied visual culture and leaves less and less space for alternative formats. The theoretical and practical implications shall be discussed. Finally, the research will be challenged by the latest developments of the Chilean students' movement that sparked a revival of alternative visual discourses of the university, looking beyond Higher Education advertisement.

Survey methodology and gender political inequality: Are imported questions undermeasuring women's activism in the global south?

This paper aims to contribute to a critical assessment of the potential and limitations of one of the most widely used methods - survey methodology - in the quantitative study of gender political inequality. Instead of merely replicating questions designed for American and European contexts, I developed a theoretical and empirical critique informed by feminist epistemology. I argue that national context, social class and gender shape different modes of informal civic and political activism in the global south that traditional question design - geared to the more formal card-carrying modes of participation - fails to measure. Additionally, drawing on the understanding of the cognitive aspects involved in the construction of shared meanings – the correspondence between the intended meaning (by the investigator) and the interpreted meaning (by the respondent) – I designed, tested and applied questions that allowed the respondent to perceive as legitimate response - and thus report - a wider range of civic and political actions. Feminist epistemology and the cognitive aspects of survey methodology provided the theoretical and methodological framework for the design of the new questions. The findings, although empirically limited to the universe from which the sample was drawn, have implications for the use of survey methodology in the study of gender political inequality in contexts in which more informal modes of political participation are more prevalent. Since the results show that the social class of the respondent is another factor related to the validity of the measurements, I suggest that the implications of our findings are not limited to the global south, but might apply to the study of women's political and civic activism, especially among the working class, in the global north as well.

Presupuesto participativo y sus efectos sobre la sociedad civil en el caso de Porto Alegre

Este trabajo propone una investigación sobre las dinámicas asociativas existentes en el Presupuesto Participativo (PP) en Porto Alegre. Los estudios previos sobre este tema indicaron la variable, acerca de la existencia de una tradición asociativa en Porto Alegre, como condición para la consolidación del PP, sin mirar con profundidad, después, cuáles son las implicaciones y efectos que esta consolidación ha generado dentro de la sociedad civil. Análisis recientes sobre el PP revelan una paradoja, que establece el problema sociológico de la investigación: hay datos que apuntan a un fortalecimiento de las asociaciones comunitarias (por ejemplo, el creciente número de asociaciones de vecinos de Porto Alegre durante la década de 1990 y la creencia de los propios participantes que el movimiento de la comunidad se fortaleció después de la creación del PP), mientras que un tercer dato indica una lectura opuesta, que revela una disminución en el porcentaje de los participantes del PP, vinculadas en cualquier organización, desde 1995, hasta hoy. Este contexto se deriva posiblemente de una multitud de factores, asociados o no a el PP. En un estudio que trata de explicar los factores vinculados a el PP, se verificarán las siguientes hipótesis: a) nuevas formas de reclutamiento en las reuniones se intensifican, sobre la base de las relaciones de patronazgo y clientelismo, lo que puede facilitar la cooptación del movimiento y b) una nueva forma de acción colectiva se configura sobre la base de la noción de redes, diferenciándose de las organizaciones formales. Enfoques teóricos alternativos al modelo normativo de la sociedad civil, como es el caso de las contentious politics, indican un camino fructífero para explicar cómo se forman complejas redes sociales en la actualidad. Son limitados, sin embargo, para pensar en las consecuencias negativas de las relaciones de dependencia a la autonomía de las asociaciones civiles.

The governmentality of governance and governability in indigenous communities in Chile

In the last few decades, the social sciences as well as international organizations and national governments have introduced the concepts Governability and Governance in an attempt to better capture the complexity of State-Society relations and improve public policy, respectively. As these terms have increasingly become part of our vocabulary, they have also increasingly structured our perspectives and defined public policies. The present paper uses the governmentality framework to analyze the use of these two concepts in the "conduction" of indigenous demands in Chile for autonomy and sovereignty in the last 20 years. We argue that, for this particular case, the two terms have emerged as complementary strategies: the State uses repressive force to protect private property and maintain "governability" in indigenous territories, while it also offers greater "cultural awareness" and "participation" through new governance-type arrangements. Using discourse analysis of official documents and interviews with Mapuche leaders, we analyze the influence that these two terms have had in controlling the demands while also obstructing resolution of the conflict.

Sociocybernetics and hierarchical systems theory - Philosophical foundation and methodology

A prominent concept in sociocybernetics is hierarchy as part of systems architectures. Founded in the 1960ies by M. Mesarovic and his coworkers, the approach was used in several simulation studies, e.g. the second world modeling experiment for the Club of Rome. It was that endeavor that gave early experiments in systems changes a basis, e.g. those performed by H. Bossel. He applied the concept to the question how the future energy system might look like. Several layers were distinguished e.g. that of the technical level but also that of the norms guiding the valuation of the systems functioning (supply guarantee, for example).

The most interesting part of the concept is how the interaction between layers is described and conceptualized. In systems theory the approach to "living systems" by J.G. Miller already dealt with such "cross-level" hypotheses.

A firm possibility to give the approach a solid fundament is to proceed from philosophical explorations. Nicolai Hartmann's philosophy could provide such a fundament. He developed an ontology comprising several layers (or levels of ontological description) with a distinction between culture and nature in a first step, and a refinement with a distinction between soul and mind in the sphere of culture and organic and anorganic aspects in the sphere of nature. However, the concept is a non-dualistic one: all the mentioned aspects could appear in the different phenomena. Therefore, also human beings or societal systems show properties associated with different ontological descriptions.

The concepts introduced above are discussed according to applications to society-environment-interactions, especially in the field of technological changes (e.g. the energy sector).

Psychological traits, routine activities, and activity fields as causes of crime

Past research has established that environmental adversity fosters a cluster of psychological traits (low self-control, hostile attribution bias, cynical view of conventional morality) that, in turn, increase the probability of crime. Presumably, these psychological characteristics are criminogenic because they increase the probability that individuals will interpret everyday events and circumstances in a manner that legitimates, justifies, or requires a violent or antisocial line of action. These definitions might involve, for example, a perceived threat, slight, or injustice that requires a forceful reaction. This hypothesis was tested in the present study. In addition, we posited that the nature of the activity fields within which individuals conduct their routine activities influences the probability of antisocial situational definitions and crime. High risk areas characterized by low social control, high deviance, and acceptance of the street code were expected to promote definitions conducive to crime. These antisocial definitions are viewed as a nature consequence of the routine activities and personal interactions that are part of the culture of such areas. Finally, we expected that psychological characteristics interact with activity fields to influence the probability of antisocial definitions of the situation and crime. Psychological traits were expected to be strong predictors of antisocial definitions and crime when routine activities were conducted in high risk neighborhoods whereas these characteristics were expected to show only a small association with deviant definitions and crime when routine activities take place in low risk areas (low crime and street code, high collective efficacy). These predictions were tested using structural equation modeling and longitudinal data from a panel of approximately 700 young African American adults residing in the United States. The analyses provided strong support for the study hypotheses and suggest that personal traits as well as social environmental strains and opportunities must be taken into account in explaining criminal behavior.

Planning for children and families using a rights framework

Despite the rhetoric around strengths-based practice and empowerment, many professionals working with children and families use a deficit approach: assuming that if they identify and 'fix' the challenges the family are facing the family will become strong. In this paper I present the result of a research programme operated over many years focused around planning frameworks for community work with children and families. The research has been undertaken in many different phases with students, families and professionals. The majority of the work has been undertaken using action research, with multiple cycles of reflection, implementation, evaluation and re-reflection resulting in the development of a planning model for community-based work with children and families. This approach is based on a rights framework thus enabling a genuine engagement with family and child strengths as the basis for planning.

Differential effects of aging in place on disability among black and white elderly

The black health disadvantage, including old-age disability, is well-known and persists over the life course, although it is smaller in the older population. In non-metropolitan areas, as in the U.S. as a whole, health disparities between African Americans and non-Hispanic whites begin to emerge in early adulthood and continue to widen through middle age. Both race and place of residence play a role in shaping health status and disability, and some would argue that these effects are cumulative in a way that ages African Americans prematurely, resulting in greater functional limitations and disability. The aim of this paper is to analyze the differences between African Americans and non-Hispanic whites in their functional limitations and disability for persons age 65 and older. We pay special attention to place in terms of metro-nonmetro and South-non-South region. Both aspects of residency are important for examining race differentials in disability because of the historical experience of African Americans is different in the South than the remaining regions; there are also different experiences of blacks and whites in metro and nonmetro areas. The paper first reviews recent findings on the disability gap at the national level and related health black-white health differentials. We then link the "weathering" hypothesis to the emerging theory of cumulative disadvantage which will be our theoretical frame for the analysis of black-white differentials in disability. Third, we develop and test a model that first brings in race and residential characteristics in terms of region and metro status. The analysis builds on an earlier descriptive paper in which we detail the importance of metro status and region for the incidence of disability of blacks and whites, as well as the different ways those residential characteristics affect the two races. We use the disability concepts measured in the 2009 American Community Survey.

Differential population response to poverty in rural areas and its consequences: Regional comparisons in the United States and Germany

The purpose of the present paper is to examine the population response to poverty and unemployment in different regions of Germany and the United States. In Germany, many counties in the northeastern states of Mecklenburg-Vorpommern and Brandenburg experienced substantial population losses after unification, reflecting high rates of unemployment in those areas. All projections point to a continuation of this trend. In the United States, two of the three poorest regions are the lower Mississippi Delta and the Texas Borderland. Despite similar poverty conditions, the population has decreased over several decades and now remains stagnant, whereas the Borderland experiences substantial population growth through both net migration and natural increase. The paper discusses reasons for why in some regions, population declines in response to unfavorable economic conditions and grows in other regions with similar conditions. In addition, the paper addresses the implications of these responses for infrastructure and institutions (e.g. schools, medical services, and public administration).

Understandings from the process: How can PV affect the agency of women?

The aim of this paper is to explore the link between Participatory Video (PV) practice, its use as a research method and its impact on women's agency, while focusing on the sustainability of such agency. The paper is based on my ongoing PhD research, which is being conducted with long-term PV initiatives of two NGOs, working with women on gender issues in Mumbai and Hyderabad (India). The link between PV in practice and PV in research emerges from my professional field experiences with PV, and its use as a research method now.

In this, I draw on Amartya Sen's Capabilities Approach to investigate if women's participation in PV can build their capabilities to engage in bringing social change. Data gathered suggests that working with their own local communities through video-making, often encourages women to assume leader-like positions. They start exercising their agency in several ways, like, negotiating power relations within their community, presenting their views through videos, establishing dialogues in public screenings demanding resources for communities, and even advocating for their rights.

However, this building and exercising of agency is often restricted by several factors, like, limited participatory nature of the process, reduced engagement with communities, lesser opportunities for expression, inability to network and finding opportunities to fulfill personal aspirations, and constraints stemming from project boundaries. In such a case, sustainability of participant agency, and of the process itself, may become questionable. This paper looks into what kind of implications does this analysis have on the use of PV within research. In conclusion, the paper argues that for PV processes initiated to build the agency of participants for engaging in social change, both in practice and in research, there is a need to critically evaluate such aspects before assuming the process to be inherently 'empowering'.

Social dynamics about the mass incarceration in Sao Paulo

The prison population in the State of São Paulo, Brazil, has marked increased over the past 15 years. If by mid-1990 there were around 50 prisons currently are 150 prisons, mostly in small towns, concentrating 30% of all prisoners in the country. This paper is based on works of participant observation and interviews with significant prison everyday life actors. It covers the changes in the dynamics of small cities who received prison units, especially the moral conflicts between residents and prisoners' relatives who come to cities to join them or visit them. The prison expansion is characterized by a policy of decentralization and mass incarceration, though focused on crimes against property and drugs, young men from urban peripheries of large cities. Shared between prisons officers and the inmates, management of prisoners occurs in a peculiar way, allowing the identification of different positions occupied by inmates. Such sharing is given in general plan of relationships, ranging from conflict controlling even the actions of "correctional treatment", as is the case of educational policy, which education monitors take part of a socially differentiated group that constantly negotiates the execution of their work with both prison managers and prisoners organization. At the same time, the constant movement of prisoners and their family through prisons to urban neighborhoods led to the dissemination of conduct codes by these spaces. The conclusions points to the recognition of new personages in the prisons' dynamics: such education monitors, such inmates relatives, these personages assume to perform "prison treatment" tasks, delegated formally or informally, also assuming the performance of rules and moralities that govern life in prisons nowadays.

Doing biographical analysis in a transnational context. Reflections on biographical research, transmigration and ethnography

In the interdisciplinary field of migration studies, the biographical approach is well suited to empirical investigations of transmigration processes because it offers us a way of empirically capturing the diversity, complexity, and transformational character of migration phenomena and of reconstructing them through biographical analysis. The biographical research perspective offers a promising way of responding to the methodological challenge that the notion of transnationalism brings into the field of qualitative empirical migration research.

Through the methodological use of narratives and case reconstructive procedures, it is providing methodological tools to overcome the nation state perspective as 'natural unit of the analysis' and the 'methodological nationalism' (Wimmer, Glick Schiller 2003) of migration research. However, doing biographical analysis in a transnational context challenges the methodological debate in biographical research because it questions the key theoretical as well as methodical assumptions of biographical analysis and it shows the need to link the biographical with the ethnographic perspective in the field of transnational migration studies.

In my paper I will discuss and reflect up the methodological challenges that arise when doing biographical research in a transnational context. The reference point of my considerations is my empirical study about transmigration processes among the younger generation of working migrants in Europe.

Nationalist interventions into Bosnian/Croatian/Serbian in the 1990s and today

The present paper analyzed new Bosnian/Croatian/Serbian (ethnic standards of Serbo-Croatian) words introduced in the early 1990s partially as a part of the wave of ethnic nationalism. The first source of data was a corpus of approximately 44000 new words used as the material basis for Šipka (2002), collected from various newspaper corpora in 1999. The status of these new words is then analysed using the newspaper corpora from the late 2000s. This case study of 1990s lexical changes in the three variants of Serbo-Croatian points to the role that conflicting ethnic identities play in shaping the lexicon. While ethnic identity cannot be disregarded as a factor of external language history, its omnipresence in the political realm does not translate into an equipotent role in the sphere of language functioning. Multiple other layers of identity and various other historical currents (such as technological, socio-cultural, lifestyle changes, etc.) also shape the lexicon. In the overall picture of the 1990s, lexical changes and ethnic identities are just one of many contributing factors. Moreover, as demonstrated in the analysis of Bosniak lexemes, the intention of using new words to create ethnic identities is not implemented in the practice of real-life texts. The new words, contrary to the original political intention, turn into markers of conservatism within one ethnic group rather than a distinctive feature of that particular ethnic group toward the others. At a more general level, the results presented in this paper offer additional evidence for a high complexity of the interplay of societal and linguistic factors, thoroughly elaborated in Fasold (1984).

Secular state x spiritualized knowledge: Reflections on the practices of traditional midwives in Brazil and its rightful place

In Weberian terms modern science is marked by the "disenchantment of the world", where the predominance of reason. Thus the so-called scientific knowledge is dichotomous in relation to knowledge of the tradition, whereas the second is imbued with spirituality, religion and magic. Then locate the conflict between secularism and the modern state of knowledge of the tradition of midwifery in Brazil. The secularism of the state is based on the bureaucratic model and rational. While religion permeates all processes in the tradition of Midwives, constantly use these magical-religious justifications to perform maneuvers, prayers during childbirth, beliefs, herbs in the care of the mother and the newborn. This struggle is reflected in the current situation of Midwives in Brazil. There are in this country around 60 000 Midwives today. The State recognizes the Midwives in fact, but not of law. Recognizes when they offer training. But law does not recognize as the craft of midwifery as a profession is not regulated. The 7531 Bill of 2006 was moving in Congress for this purpose, but in September 2010 the project was withdrawn for political purposes.

The socioeconomic status of Traditional Midwives is most often poverty. About 80% of the universe of traditional midwives in Brazil are illiterate. Although the reference to midwives in the communities which they live and often play the role of the state itself, in regions where the state can not reach, for example, in some communities in the Amazon region with regard to care for pregnant women they do not yet have a rightful place in Brazil.

The office of the Midwife is not illegal, but it's not legalized. The midwives working in the name of tradition, are working to benefit society, but not recognized as such by the State.

Sustainable development report: From management tool to civil society corporate management democratic issue, the case of red puentes, a Mexican CSO

In this communication, we would like to highlight how the Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) provides management tools that retrieve on citizenship mobilization to become a management issue democratically debated and appropriated by citizens. To attain this goal, we would base us on the case of Red Puentes, a Mexican CSOs red, which enters the negotiation with firms to debate its social responsibility through the evaluation of its sustainable development reports, trend that can help to solve some of the matters that the current crisis is making salient, sharing the decision power regarding firms' behaviors.

Presenting the management tools of the CSR, we would like to point out, by the way of a many years long participant observations, how citizens are appropriating themselves the CSR management tool and the performativity of the stakeholders theory to get into relations with firms that are publishing public sustainable development reports. Doing so, this case highlights how do citizens are opening a democratic debate regarding firm's activities, through the acknowledgment process of management tools that illustrates the sustainable development evaluation monitoring led by Red Puentes Mexico.

In a larger extent, this paper propose to investigate the field of possibilities for citizens to make the firms activities debate more democratic by the appropriation of management tool that derives from market devices as is CSR and the sustainable development reports understood as market strategies device. This civil translation of CSR seems to be able to speak about new social movements' field in order to democratize the economic activity and its relation with civil society.

Social practices of establishing certainty in child welfare case work: A single-case study

Reflective and narrative practices in social work have primarily been studied as individual processes. The social aspects of sense-making and processes of establishing certainty have gained little attention. I argue in this paper that social work, as practiced by frontline child welfare workers, to a large extent is a social practice. The individual social worker executes important tasks throughout a child welfare case. This work and the knowledge on which this work is based, is embedded in and developed through social practices of interaction with other social workers in an on-going process. This paper is based on a study of one child welfare case. It studies the trajectory of this case from initial investigation and 9 months on to a decision. It explores the activities revolving the case from the standpoint of the responsible case workers as these take place in the social context of a local Norwegian child welfare office. I analyze how the complexity of the case is ordered in the network of activities pertaining to the structured and unstructured procedures of case work of Norwegian Child Welfare Services.

La razón de la violencia. Un análisis de la revista Cristianismo y revolución en la Argentina de los años sesenta y setenta

Numerosos estudios se han abocado a analizar el uso sistemático de las armas que hicieron diversas organizaciones político-militares en la década del setenta en Argentina (Montoneros, Fuerzas Armadas Peronistas, Ejército Revolucionario del Pueblo, Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias, etc.). En ellos, suelen citarse los elementos que explican la extensión de la violencia y su aceptación como recurso de intervención en la arena pública: la persistente matriz autoritaria que signó al país desde sus orígenes; la irrupción y circulación de ciertos acontecimientos internacionales que promovieron cambios societales de tipo estructural (la Revolución Cubana, el Concilio Vaticano II, la Revolución Cultural China, el Mayo Francés); la difusión de la teoría del foco en América Latina; etc. Ahora bien, ¿cuál es el significado que adquirió la violencia para estos grupos armados? ¿Cuáles eran las características que ésta imprimía a la acción política? ¿Se trataba de un medio escindible de los fines que perseguía? Sobre la base de estas preocupaciones, la ponencia explorará la significación que la revista Cristianismo y Revolución (editada desde septiembre de 1966 a septiembre de 1971, y de importancia primordial para la conformación de numerosas redes de militancia), presentó acerca de la violencia y la política. Las distinciones que realiza Hannah Arendt sobre la violencia, la política y el poder serán insumos fundamentales para nuestra indagación.

Performing art in the Palestinian artistic scene: Contemporary creation or form of mobilization?

The Palestinian art is well known for its close relationship with Politics and often, being a Palestinian artist means being a Palestinian activist and that, especially among young artists. Palestinian art is also characterized by its contemporary aspects and dynamic vitality, which is relevant when we see the development of the installation or the performing art among young Palestinian artists. The evolving of this medium is very symptomatic of a society in search of identity and definition, in a context of conflict and occupation.

The study will focuses on the field of the installation and performing art made by the young Palestinian artists, living in West Bank and Gaza. It will analyse the contents itself and signification of this artistic field. It will adopt a diachronic perspective, starting in the 1990's, when this kind of art emerges among activist Palestinian artists and will cover this field until nowadays, when this form of art has been democratized among young artists (but is it the same among the audience?) How could we define the link between performing art and Politics in the context of Palestinian artistic and political scene of conflicts? Performing art without a political content is possible or is it supposed to stay political? What is the reception of this medium among the Palestinian audiences?

As a PhD candidate in urban anthropology currently resident in Jerusalem and working in the French Cultural Center that aims at promoting Palestinian art, my research interest is on politics and art and I have both direct and easy access to the location, the neighbors direct testimony as I speak Arabic and of course the Palestinian art scene.

Social justice in the European union context: Opinions on the tax-revenue allocation among national elites

In the 2007 and 2009 IntUne project, members of political and economic elites in 17 EU countries expressed their preferences with regard to the relative amount of individual taxes allocated on regional, national, and European levels. On the basis of these data the index reflecting just distribution was validated and used in cross-national analysis in order to test specific hypotheses about macro and micro determinants of tax preferences. The main macro variable pertains to democratization that divides EU into the old EU countries and the new EU countries. The results show that elites in less democratic countries of Central and Eastern Europe propose, on the average, lower taxes on European level than elites in the old EU countries. Moreover, among members of elites in the former type of countries opinions regarding the EU level of taxation are less differentiated than opinions on the same matter among members of elites in latter countries, even if other variables are controlled. On micro level, those who express stronger EU attachment tend to allocate for EU higher proportion of tax revenue than those who express weaker EU attachment. The pattern of the relationships changed between 2007 and 2009, mainly in response to the beginning of economic slowdown. The implications of these findings for social-psychology theories of social justice are discussed.

Clashing epistemological beliefs?

Research points at the relative importance of program coherence for initial education for the development of professional competence (e.g. Grossman et al., 2008). It is frequently being reported that professional education and professional practice is out of step, however. The development of students' perception of coherence between theory and practice and classroom teaching and placement is not just a question of integration and connection between the various parts of curriculum. It may also be a question of clashing epistemological beliefs between students, college teachers and placement supervisors (Joram 2007).

In this paper, students, college teachers and placement supervisors in nursing, teaching, pre-school teaching and social work are compared. Important questions are: 1) To what extent are links between classroom teaching and placement emphasized. 2) To what extent do the epistemological beliefs differ between students, college teachers and placement supervisors? Data are drawn from surveys among students as well as college teachers and placement supervisors in nursing, teaching, pre-school teaching and social work.

Preliminary results suggest that school-teacher students and nursing students experience a lower degree of coherence between theory and practice compared to the other student-groups. School-teacher students experience a lack of coherence in both classroom teaching and in the placement, whereas the nursing students' experience of a lack of coherence is especially prominent in classroom teaching. School-teacher students' perception of a weak coherence corresponds to their teachers' assessments. College teachers in the teacher education are more critical towards what is emphasised in students' placement periods than teachers in the other programmes. Teacher education teachers also reported having difficulties in using the students' placement-experience productively in their classroom teaching. Research based knowledge and research methodology is considered more important both by students and college teachers in nursing, but placement supervisors are relatively sceptical about what is emphasised in nursing classroom teaching.

Governance of liquid neighbourhood communities and their relation with stakeholders in Amsterdam

This paper discusses the fluid characteristics of contemporary communities in an ethnic-pluriform neighbourhood (Indische buurt) in Amsterdam East. This area has been critically analysed by the use of participant observations and semi-structured interviews with professionals, community members and stakeholders. The development of these communities was initiated with the creation of the Timorplein Community which is a network of social and economic entrepreneurs, societal organisations and creative residents. Meetings between community members have led to the development of common grounds, but have also encouraged initiatives outside the Timorplein community. As a result new fluid communities were formed and organised in relation to a specific theme or interest.

The new communities developed when the welfare organisations in the urban district suffered bankruptcy and the local authority privatised the welfare activities. The contract was awarded to a welfare organisation with the most economic bid and as a result closed down several welfare activities and neighbourhood centres which has been accompanied by a shift from supply-led to demand-led welfare. In this context one would expect changing attitudes between stakeholders, especially public sector organisations, who still conduct themselves in a traditional way which is reflected in, for example, a well-developed organisational structure and a SMART (Specific, Measurable, Achievable, Realistic and Time-bound) approach. They assume that new communities have a solid form, but these liquid communities focus on the process of networking and organising as opposed to the creation of a final product.

The dynamic between different stakeholders show how the new communities – with their own inclusion and exclusion mechanism – try to redress the balance of power with public and private sector stakeholders. This in turn implies a rethinking and rearranging ways of organisation cultures, policymaking and service delivery including participatory processes.

"Boys with the toys". Hegemonies of men over reproduction: Bio-medical childbirth made in Czech Republic

The paper reflects the RC call to "attempt empirically and critically explore men's involvement in reproduction". The goal is to explore (consistent and changing) masculine hegemonies in reproductive medicine in the Czech Republic, a Central European country with totalitarian experience (1948 – 1989). The Czech medical context is highly developed with a biotechnological approach to human reproduction eliminating debates about potential alternatives, not to mention practices; it is paternalistic and strongly gendered. Structures of power relations and masculine domination in the arena hinder the expected democratisation of gender relations in the arena of human reproduction. Despite recent significant changes in assessment of men's involvement in human reproduction, and in bringing more gender justice to the field, critical approach to potential challenges these processes bring is adopted in the paper.

The paper concentrates on the dominant biomedical approach to childbirth (event studied at length by sociologists, social anthropologist as well as feminist scholars). It elaborates ideologies and practices as represented in recent articles from Czech obstetric/gynaecological journals and in presentations at annual conferences of the national OB-GYN Association. The intersection of professional and gender hegemonies as well as biomedical authoritative/expert knowledge (Jordan; Foucault) is questioned.

The paper poses a critique of a simplistic rhetoric stressing approaches to men's involvement in reproduction as a lack of both action and power. It argues and elaborates the omnipresence and power of men in human reproduction, particularly at childbirth. Theoretical inspiration comes from CSM (Critical studies on men and masculinities) approaches, and Foucault's governmentality and biopolitics. The critique acknowledges, though, the discourses as well as practices at childbirth that may and sometimes do challenge the existing masculine hegemonies, and illustrates the (lack of) challenge on empirical data from the Czech context (fathers' presence at childbirth, feminisation of medical care etc.).

"To leave or not to leave" migration and quality of life: The case of female refugees in South Africa

South Africa's relatively smooth transition to a new democracy in 1994 heralded it as a beacon for many asylum seekers and refugees from the rest of Africa. Seventeen years later South Africa is one of the largest recipients of applications for asylum and refugee status in the world. Although South Africa does not provide refugee camps, refugees and asylum seekers have freedom of movement, the right to work and to basic social services within the country. Access to these basic necessities is compounded by the high levels of poverty and unemployment for its own citizens. The ensuing tensions results in social problems and flare-ups of xenophobia attacks on the foreigners. Refugees and asylum seekers left their homelands in search of a better quality of life in South Africa for themselves and their children. This paper will shed light on a comparative qualitative study conducted amongst a group of refugee women from The Democratic Republic of the Congo, Burundi and Zimbabwe with regard to their views on the quality of life in South Africa. From their narratives, South Africa is not the country they had imagined it would be; instead it is fraught with unemployment, poverty, inequality, corruption and as foreigners, they have been targets of xenophobia. These pervasive conditions impact on the quality of life and the wellbeing of the refugees and their families. The narratives from the women from the DRC and Burundi indicate that life back home was much better than their current situation. For the Zimbabwean refugees, South Africa offers more opportunities. Torn between leaving and staying, this paper will shed light on what does quality of life mean to the refugees and the ways in which they attempt to improve their quality of life in South Africa.

Transnational forced migration and negotiating the confusing terrain of contrasting emotions: The case of female refugees in South Africa

Emotions infuse nearly every aspect of human experience, social interaction and interpersonal relations. Within the context of transnational forced migration, this paper seeks to gain a better sociological understanding of how a group of refugees in South Africa perceive their emotional wellbeing, how they make sense of their social world from an emotional point of view and how they negotiate these emotions. The discussion is based on a comparative qualitative study done in South Africa among Congolese, Burundian and Zimbabwean female refugees. In the paper specific attention is paid to the intrapersonal emotional ambivalence that emerged from the respondents' narratives; how these emotions relate to their challenging life experiences as refugees; and how they negotiate these contrasting emotions within the context of their familial network (or lack thereof) in their new host country. Particular reference is also made to the role children and religion play in respondents' perceived emotional wellbeing and how it relates to a sense of being and belonging in the host country. In addition, all the refugees in this study had to manage emotions related to transnational familial ties. On the one hand, the respondents experienced an acute sense of family separation – especially in cases where some women left young children in the care of grandparents who remained in their home country. On the other hand, respondents felt a sense of responsibility towards their kin who were left behind in the country of origin which found specific expression in feeling an obligation to provide financial support. Yet, due to economic constraints, few respondents had the means to provide family members with any form of financial assistance. This in turn had emotional repercussions. Against this background, the paper concludes by reflecting on the interplay between negotiated emotions and individual resilience.

Unfree labour, law and imperialism

Within mainstream theorizing, industrial agricultural capitalists are perceived to be freed from national state constraints owing to the hyper-competitiveness of contemporary migration. However, agri-capital remains deeply embedded within conditions and relations of labour unfreedom. The deep reliance of agri-capital upon unfree labour renders it beholden to the politico-legal interventions of states, sending and receiving. The critical challenge is to deepen understanding of the work law does to legitimize, discipline and regulate migrant labour within the hierarchical and uneven logic of the nation-state system and global capitalism; and, in so doing, to examine ways in which workers and their allies have pressed these contradictions to seek a break. Through a case study on seasonal agricultural workers in Canada, the paper situates unfree labour within a political economy of law analysis attentive to primitive accumulation and "new" imperialism, and resistance. In the latter respect, the analysis engages with recent interventions from Tom Brass and David Harvey.

Drugs and leisure activities among Eastern European young people

Smoking and alcohol use among Latvian 15-16-year-olds have traditionally been among the highest in Europe as shown by the international comparative study ESPAD (European School Survey Project on Alcohol and other drugs).

Results from the most recent data collection round in 2011 suggests cannabis use among students in Latvia has significantly increased – nearly one in four 15-16 year old students has smoked cannabis at least once in their lifetime.

At the micro and meso levels cannabis use is partly explained by lack of meaningful leisure-time activities, relations in family, perceived risks and substance use among friends. On the macro level indicators of social capital such as subjective well-being and social trust in society are found to be correlated with substance use.

In this article, by using ESPAD data from several Eastern European countries, multi-level analysis, indicating factors that influence cannabis use both on individual and country level are discussed.

A systemic approach to crime and deviance

Luhmann does not seem to have handled the issue of crime directly, but left clues. Following this line, we can relate it to at least three interrelated factors: functional differentiation into subsystems, evolution and inclusion / exclusion.

With the differentiation into subsystems, what is functional to a specific subsystem, may not be for others. For example, is not functional for the development of a market economy when competition problems are resolved with violence, but is functional to explore the environment, people and commit illegalities as tax evasion, because from this economic point of view, the laws are irrational and illegitimate. "False" theories about the crime can be used by the economy and create an entire industry of security; politics can scandalize to lead to changes in laws; mass media can focus on capital crimes and thus increase the sensation of insecurity. The resolution of problems of a subsystem can lead to violations in other subsystems.

We can focus on the evolution and understand crime as "variation". So, could explain why crime is not directly linked to poverty and inequality, but to change processes, such as impoverishment. Environmental changes stimulate new selections, occurring in all spheres of life, regardless of the level occupied in the economic hierarchy, politics, etc.

Each subsystem has its own criteria for inclusion and exclusion, but this criterion may appear in the most general level of society. Inclusion and exclusion appears in Luhmann as "supercode". So, be excluded from a system is being deleted from the others. To have no residency makes impossible to enroll children in school. Thus, begins to create networks of favors and benefits contacts that begin to operate parasitically, generating their own mechanisms of inclusion and exclusion, sometimes resorting to illegality, being joint ventures between politics and crime.

Technological initiatives in the Brazilian public sphere fostering mechanisms of social and digital inclusion

This article presents the results of a research carried out to analyze the use of innovation for enhancing interaction between the Brazilian State and society, based on an interorganizational, public and virtual network. The research was carried out during 2010 regarding a Ministry of Planning project called the Brazilian Public Software.

The public software selected was i-Educar, developed by members of the City Hall of Itajaí in the Brazilian State of Santa Catarina. After its release, it is a tool that can be built by all interested members of society. The software aims at managing information of the educational system of a certain municipality. In doing so, paper use is reduced as well as the time searching for information. Duplication of archived documents tends to disappear. It is also observed an increase in the quality of the relationship between citizens and public organizations. The initiative tends to develop public services and increase its qualities.

Social Network Analysis theory and method were applied. To attain quantitative results, an extensive questionnaire was made available to the i-Educar's community during a three-month period. The questionnaire contained closed questions to the users of the software, in order to perceive social transformations made possible with the introduction of this new technological tool. To attain qualitative results, semi structured interviews were conducted to identify the perceptions of the creators and coordinators of the public software.

The results indicate new forms of political participation and social inclusion using the Internet, fostering the expansion and consolidation of participative democracy in contemporary societies. It is possible to perceive several social and political bottom-up movements that are reshaping the Brazilian public sphere. These changes tend to develop a strong sense of citizenship among individuals and at the same time tend to foster transparency and social accountability in public organizations.

From the individual feelings of injustice to the collective struggles: Challenges to the theory of recognition

Axel Honneth has set himself the task of finding a new theoretical language with which the current political demands may be justified in the context of a critical theory. This fundamentation is supposed to expose which normative expectations are, and which are not upon the the different aspects of social life. Honneth defined the concept of recognition as the generative core of this language, around which he developed his approach. The relations of recognition are given for each individual as a normative expectation to begin with – as an expectation that he can legitimately have, but that he also has to fulfill for others. One central question is, how can he take note of it, and then assume it as a right and as a duty for himself? This approach has as its premise the natural development of an autonomous, emancipated individual. On the basis of an empirical research conducted in the context of poverty and violence we question this premise and his evolutionary conception of modern societies. But if the relations of recognition are to be the central form of social relations, then this theory must reconstruct the necessary learning processes that have to take place as part of the socialization, through which each individual assumes the expected basic attitude of recognition for himself and lets it become a habit. Can – and if yes, how can – social movements contribute to such learning processes, specially in contexts where recognition is denied? The text argues that they can achieve what in the movement research is described as framing: through democratic discussions in the public sphere, people learn to interpret their situations in a new way and to develop alternative projects or utopias – and so provoke other members of society to rethink about their own attitudes.

Has the future remained in the past? Experiences of disrespect and the utopia of autonomous life projects

In this paper we report results of an empirical research in contexts of poverty and violence. Asking women involved in a social policy program called Pronasci (National Program of Public Security with Citizenship) to speak about their life stories, our research group recurrently collected reports of disrespect to the integrity of the body. These reports were often accompanied by the conviction of having been morally injured, but this consciousness seldom mobilizes indignation toward consistent reactions such as a struggle for recognition or resistance together with other people suffering from the same humiliation. It seems that many of our interviewed women instead of being working out an autonomous life project, they had their future pruned somewhere in the past. This affect their relation to self in different spheres. The text is an attempt to dialogue with the theory of recognition, as formulated by Axel Honneth, in peripheral contexts.

Xapolhim's concrete steps: An artist-flâneur challenges the "shock of order"

Xapolhim, a poet, graffiti artist, musician, and anarcho-punk activist, utilizes interactive street art practices to challenge gentrification and the violent urban reforms of Rio de Janeiro's "Shock of Order" campaign. As local government privatizes public space, expels residents from their homes, and severely restricts the city's vibrant networks of street life, Xapolhim's artistic productions stimulate creative encounters between Rio's urban space and people who inhabit it. Drawing on the work of Michel de Certeau, this article examines Xapolhim's trajectories through the city as artistic actions in their own right and his artistic actions as "microbial practices" that encourage the collaborative exploration and resignification of public space.

The article views the "Shock of Order" initiative as a spectacular codification of space and social relations. Using Guy Debord's Society of the Spectacle, it analyzes the production of an urban environment whose inhabitants are relegated to receiving passively the new "order" imposed on their city, a literal and metaphoric cartography that seeks to reduce spaces and social practices to easily understood and controlled forms. As a counterpoint, the article presents collaborative artistic creation – as understood by Augusto Boal and Nicolas Borriaud – as a potential key for reclaiming agency and understanding the city's complexity. Xapolhim's artistic production, therefore, serves not only as a challenge to the newly established order, but also as a breeding ground for transgressive forms of social contact and the construction of temporary communities.

As local government attempts to permanently transform Rio de Janeiro in anticipation of the future mega-events, Xapolhim's artistic practices privilege a temporary understanding of community, as in Hakim Bey's "Temporary Autonomous Zones" and Joseph Roach's "behavioral vortices." These groupings, however impermanent, stimulate in their practitioners a complex social memory that fuses present action with past experience, thereby challenging the forceful implementation of an "ordered" future.

Los orígenes sociales de la violencia. La estructura agraria en Chile, Colombia, Guatemala y Paraguay en la coyuntura de los años cincuenta

Después de la segunda guerra mundial, el campesinado apareció como un actor importante en las revoluciones de tipo socialista del denominado Tercer Mundo (en China como en Cuba). Esto mismo se vio reflejado en la academia, con la publicación de estudios histórico-comparativos hoy emblemáticos (Moore, Wolf, Scokpol, Tilly), enfocados en los cambios estructurales. En América Latina, y sobre América Latina, los estudios se han concentrado en países específicos, postergándose los análisis comparativos y las generalizaciones.

El objetivo de esta ponencia es analizar de manera comparativa los orígenes sociales de la violencia política y social en los espacios rurales de América Latina, poniendo el foco, en particular, en la articulación entre los terratenientes, los campesinos, el Estado y la violencia en la formación de la América Latina moderna. Asumimos, como hipótesis de trabajo, una afirmación de Cristobal Kay, quien sostiene que una explicación de la violencia rural está más vinculada a la institucionalización exitosa de conflictos y al desarrollo y permanencia de las instituciones y prácticas democráticas (que a la reforma agraria como precondition de una sociedad estable). Intentaremos sostener empíricamente esta hipótesis a partir de la propuesta analítica de Karl Polanyi en La gran transformación, donde el autor presenta una visión de cambio histórico de gran escala y comparativa, con preponderancia de lo social como factor explicativo, y en la cual es central el análisis institucional (de instituciones concretas).

La ponencia estudia los casos de Guatemala, Colombia, Paraguay y Chile, inspirándonos en la estrategia comparativa utilizada por Polanyi, esto es, poniendo el foco en las diferentes expresiones en las que aparece el mismo o similar problema: la violencia política y social rural en la coyuntura abierta en los años cincuenta.

Communicative acts which promote new masculinities. Overcoming hegemonic masculinity in the work-place

Scientific literature has emphasized how the reproduction of hegemonic masculinity has led to several social problems, such as gender violence, criminality or bullying (Connell 1987, 2005, 2006; Kimmel 2000, Messerschmidt, 1993, Bourdieu 1998). Labour inequalities are not an exception; in fact there are several findings about the influence of this model in cases of sexual harassment suffered by women in the work-place (Mackinnon, 1979; Thomas & Kitzinger 1997; Wise & Stanley 1987). However, there is a lack of research and analysis about the processes for overcoming the problems caused by hegemonic masculinity in the work area. In this paper we will present evidence of these processes of overcoming derived from the research project entitled Impact of communicative acts on the construction of new masculinities funded by the Spanish Ministry of Science and Innovation, in the Research and Development Programme (2010-2011), and led by the University of Barcelona. The research illustrates the influence of communicative acts on the promotion of new masculinities, far removed from the hegemonic one, which are based on values like equality and solidarity. One of the case-studies carried out in the project focuses on the world of work. So, we will present some data about how specific communicative acts can favour the recognition and visibility of new masculinities in the work-place, specifically in a Small and Medium-sized Enterprise and a health-related organization. The aforementioned research project shows the link between communicative acts based on desire – including verbal and non verbal ones - and new masculinities; and at the same time their usefulness in the prevention of gender inequality.

José María Pérez Gay: A bridge between German critical thinking and Mexico

José María Pérez Gay is one of the most lucid mexican essayists who can not go unnoticed when making a balance on the possibilities of Latin America's contemporary critical thinking. His lucidity might be based on the fact that his intellectual sensibility was forged when making contact with the European critical culture, more specifically, German and Austrian. Pérez Gay's most important work can be read as an effort to reconstruct the milestones of the Central European thinking and history by interlacing the political-cultural facts with the manifestations of the philosophical and literary conscience of Germany and Austria. Throughout his work, Pérez Gay revises among other authors, the work of Herman Broch, Karl Kraus, Joseph Roth, Elias Canetti, Robert Musil, Hannah Arendt, Walter Benjamin, Jürgen Habermas, Peter Sloterdijk. He reads them with a framework that tries to understand the transformations propelled by the Nineteenth and Twentieth Century, and that not always favored a coincidence between the promises of reason, civility, peace and freedom. As a background of his work we find the breaking of the Nineteenth Century European world, the moral crises of modernity, the attempts of democratic construction and the catastrophe that totalitarianism and intolerance meant.

This paper aims to tryout an interpretation of some of José María Pérez Gay's work in order to explore the roads of his intellectual sensibility and the perspectives that are offered to critically analyze the Mexican and Latin-american present.

Personal and collective memory making in the world wide web - History from below?

One thesis about memory in the web is that the relation between personal and collective memory work is modified because of the typical online offerings of the Web 2.0 such as video platforms, forums, blogs, or social networks. While actors in classical institutions such as museums, archives or mass media are less recognizable as individuals, they act on the web on the micro level in interpersonal processes of interaction. Therefore they can have effects on the macro level through specific conditions of interaction, production, and reception. In my paper I discuss these exchange processes by presenting results of a case study.

First, I will present the theoretical concepts. In order to determine the relation between personal and collective memory processes in the World Wide Web I apply the term 'online discourse'. This approach is based on the assumption that memory cultures are manifested by different communities in social discourses. By inserting their interpretation of the past into a discursive arena, they (re-)produce online memories.

Second, I will present the methodology of how to analyze these different levels of discursive memory making. Therefore I analyze a concrete online discourse – the debate about the trial of John Demjanjuk, who is accused of Holocaust-related war crimes. Actors such as Demjanjuk's family, lawyers of other involved parties or political communities enter the discursive field. Based on this case study I develop a mixed method approach: To analyze the products of memory work as well as the production itself I combine the research program of Wissenssoziologische Diskursanalyse with ethnographic methods such as qualitative interviews with members of these different communities, and participant observation during the production of online products. Both levels of the investigation are connected by the rules for collecting and analyzing data of the Grounded Theory.

To struggle for workers' identity: The resistance of Jiashu workers

A group of older women workers in the contemporary labors' resistance movement are struggling for a "worker" identity. Called "Jiashu Workers"(Jiashugong ¼"ÈÖ¹±), they range in age from 60 to 90 and all are grandmothers. Previously, they worked as temporary workers, engaged in unskilled heavy labor, as "housewives" in the factories in which their husbands worked. The label "Jiashu Workers" was first established in the late 1950s by the government; the initial aim was to solve financial difficulties of male workers and their families, with the wife's work at the factories regarded as a kind of sideline employment. However, some of the Jiashu Workers worked for decades in these factories. When the market-oriented reforms began in the 1980s, these women were the first to leave the factories for "leave for rest" (IÈNø Tuiyang), but this was not called "retirement," because the government did not recognize them as workers and did not grant worker's labor relations. To the present time, some of these elderly women only receive a few hundred Yuan each month in subsidy payments from the factory, but cannot receive a pension or health insurance, which are the most urgent needs of the elderly. Since the 1990s, they have been fighting for the status and identity of "workers." This research is based on interviews with Jiashu Workers in state-owned construction company in Beijing, to analyze their daily struggles and their organizing of collective action.

Environmental policy making in a time of crisis

How is today's global financial crisis, stretching for more than four years and spawning broad, grassroots political responses, affecting the institutionalization of environmental reform in the advanced economies of Europe, North America, and Japan? For decades, social theorists have developed a narrative of the continuous evolution of environmental institutions and reforms. Are those institutions and reforms now threatened by financial and political crisis? Is environmental sustainability neglected once more as states default on debt obligations, public and private institutions declare bankruptcy, and governments fall? Or, rather, does respect for environmental quality remain a universal value, deeply rooted in global and national culture, buttressed by well established laws, institutions, and organizations, and by civil society itself? Are there opportunities, as well as challenges, for the ecological restructuring of societies in the current crisis? Examining the recent history of environmental policymaking in Europe, North America and Japan, this paper addresses the empirical foundations of such questions, as well as implications for scholarship on environment and society in the 21st century.

Visibility versus the visible: How desires for social recognition shape protest aesthetics

Visibilidad (visibility) was the common idiom I heard during ethnographic fieldwork with lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (LGBT) activists in São Paulo, Brazil. The politically strategic and even intimate desire to be seen by an often as-of-yet undefined other provided an uncharacteristic node of consensus among otherwise ideologically diverse LGBT activists. In this paper, I examine the intersection of two distinct social moments of vision and visibility held together in acts of protest. First, I consider how the discourse that developed around visibilidad informed activists' strategies and sensibilities around street protests. Building off of participant observations of activist meetings before and after political actions, I argue that protesters planned to be seen and recorded as objects of political dissent in ways that recapitulated their own conceptions of social visibility and recognition. Debates over the use of signs, props such as rainbow umbrellas, and circulating through built environment were always intermingled with broader discussions of why it was important to be visible. Second, I examine the circulation of photographs of protests as they entered the news cycle. I combine media analysis and interviews with photographers and journalists who recorded protests. I pay special attention to divergent claims of who produced protest images—the activists who conceived of and modeled dissent versus the journalists who photographed, framed and distributed images. Finally, I argue that these tensions of visibility need to be understood within the act of protest itself. Conducting a formal analysis of several protests I attended during fieldwork, I explore how vision functioned within a wider protest sensorium (including aural, tactile, and even olfactory protest tactics). I conclude by arguing that acts of vision in protests always operate alongside ideologies of visibility, and call for integrated analyses of the two social phenomena.

Fighting exclusion in Latin American education

Through the past forty years, Latin America has been subject to a drastic process of reform of its public life. Guided by the World Bank and the OECD, most countries have applied extreme measures to impose a market oriented perspective in all public policies. The proof that something is clearly not working is that, notwithstanding the raise in public budgets after the severe structural adjustments during the seventies and eighties, the region has become the most unequal of the world. Contrasting experiences in education show that exclusion has proved to be not only the source of aggravating needs, but also the place where alternatives can be originally experienced. Our paper will try to exemplify this contrast by commenting both what exclusion means and the new models of education being tested after it in Mexico, Bolivia, Venezuela and Brazil.

We will take into account that both the urban periphery and the rural populations, particularly in zones where original peoples reside, have not received any benefit from the market-oriented education, but rather, that they have been excluded even from statistics, in order that governments can prove that objectives asked for in the Millenium Goals can be reached. However, creative and critical work in the poorest communities show a different perspective of what can come out when education relies more in assuring the success of survival strategies, and at the same time, making full use of traditional knowledge, cultural identity, memory and will of the members of these communities.

Inseguridad y sociedad civil: El caso de las organizaciones de víctimas

En este trabajo nos proponemos estudiar tres Organizaciones de la Sociedad Civil actualmente en funciones en la Argentina que se configuran en torno a la figura de la "víctima" de lo que cada una de ellas define por "inseguridad". Haremos hincapié en el tipo de interpelación al Estado que realizan y las soluciones que proponen a este llamado "problema". Así, intentaremos matizar la hipótesis de que a partir de la interpelación al Estado en busca de soluciones, la sociedad civil, a través de estas organizaciones, simplemente contribuiría a la legitimación simbólica de la aplicación progresiva de políticas públicas de tipo retributivo, mostrando cómo algunas también pugnan por la aplicación de políticas sociales de tipo correccional, entre otras. Asimismo, estableceremos relaciones entre estas posturas y la construcción discursiva de la inseguridad que cada una de ellas lleva a cabo a través de sus prácticas. Ello nos permitirá dar cuenta de un amplio abanico de las formas en que estas organizaciones contribuyen (o no) al "gobierno de la (in)seguridad", así como de la lucha simbólica en la que participan en cuanto "agentes morales" (Cohen, 2002) por la definición de cuáles son los problemas a tratar en la agenda política y el tipo de políticas públicas que contribuyen a legitimar o cuestionar. Así, podremos aproximarnos a un análisis de los diferentes modelos de control social, que no sólo no son mutuamente excluyentes, si no que a veces conviven uno junto al otro en la misma sociedad.

Entre la sociedad industrial y la sociedad del riesgo: El reto teórico de la sociología latinoamericana

Según Ulrich Beck, en la globalización la sociedad industrial es reemplazada por la sociedad del riesgo en el sentido de que los beneficios de la sociedad industrial son sustituidos por males o daños.

Si bien es cierto que Beck expresa que las diferencias de clase no desaparecen en la sociedad del riesgo e incluso entre más abajo se esté en la pirámide social mayor son los efectos negativos de los riesgos (el pobre es más vulnerable a los eventos climáticos extremos, por ejemplo), difícilmente podamos sostener que en América Latina la lucha por la apropiación de bienes que caracteriza a la sociedad industrial haya sido desplazada por la lucha por la no-apropiación de los males o riesgos de la sociedad post-industrial o sociedad del riesgo (Beck, 2008: 19).

En otras palabras, los conflictos de clase, étnicos y de género constituyen el motor en sociedades como las latinoamericanas donde predomina la desigualdad, a diferencia de sociedades como las europeas, entre otras, en donde la brecha de la desigualdad social se ha reducido.

En este contexto de desigualdad, los riesgos –ambientales por ejemplo- no hacen sino acrecentarla.

Esta ponencia se propone reflexionar acerca del reto que tiene la Sociología latinoamericana: cómo articular un cuerpo teórico articulado que dé cuenta de una realidad que presenta rasgos de sociedad industrial (con fuerte presencia de sociedades rurales) y un rápido advenimiento de la sociedad del riesgo.

Calentamiento global, gestión ambiental y migraciones ecológicas

La ponencia plantea un nuevo enfoque de gestión ambiental desde el cual analizar los daños ecológicos relacionados con el calentamiento global, principalmente el fenómeno de los desplazados ambientales.

Para ello se parte de que los riesgos ambientales son globales y que por lo tanto un análisis centrado en los Estados-nacionales no puede dar cuenta de ellos, siendo necesario recurrir a una "mirada cosmopolita".

Se insiste en la necesidad de sustituir el principio del que "el que contamina paga" por otro basado en la "modernidad responsable" (Beck), según el cual todo proyecto o iniciativa humana debe demostrar a priori que no va a producir daños ambientales irreversibles.

La individualización en el trabajo: Reflexiones desde las narrativas identitarias de trabajadores Chilenos

Se ofrecen reflexiones acerca de las dinámicas de construcción identitaria observables en trabajadores chilenos en el marco de las prácticas concretas de empleo, gestión y organización de las empresas. Corresponden a resultados de la investigación Fondecyt (Proyecto N° 11090154) "Escenarios del trabajo contemporáneo en Chile: un acercamiento a la construcción de subjetividades en nuestra sociedad". La investigación ha contemplado dos estudios cualitativos, uno que sistematiza las prácticas de empresas en cinco sectores de actividad (frutícola, municipal, alimentación colectiva, pesquero y financiero) y otro centrado en las narrativas identitarias de los trabajadores de esos sectores.

Se han clasificado configuraciones típicas de trabajo –los escenarios del trabajo- a partir del análisis de tres dimensiones imprescindibles de poner en relación para caracterizar las exigencias y ofertas de reconocimiento a los sujetos en situación de trabajo: la situación de empleo, las prácticas y discursos asociados a la gestión de personas (o de recursos humanos) y la lógica de diseño y organización del trabajo. Los escenarios del trabajo refieren a principios de eficacia en el trabajo o exigencias fundamentales que la empresa hace a sus trabajadores, que finalmente determinan los espacios de inclusión y reconocimiento que la empresa ofrece a sus diferentes tipos de trabajadores.

El trabajo analiza el impacto de estas condiciones estructurantes del trabajo sobre los procesos de construcción identitaria que realizan los sujetos en el trabajo entendidos desde los trabajos de Claude Dubar (1991, 1992 y 2000) y Mats Alvesson (2002, 2006, 2008). El análisis pondrá atención a las tensiones subjetivas que se activan en torno a las transacciones del sujeto con su entorno acerca de las identificaciones deseadas y disponibles. Reflexiona además sobre las formas en que se manifiesta la individualización, la fragmentación y el dinamismo de las construcciones identitarias propias al trabajo contemporáneo, en el contexto de otras constataciones latinoamericanas.

Hunger, social classes and the city

According to official figures, between 2004 and 2009 there was a reduction in the number of people facing food insecurity in Brazil: from 72 million (approximately 40% of the population) to 65.5 million (approximately 35% of the population). This reduction is directly related to income redistribution policies implemented during this period. However, it is necessary to question whether these advances have not been shy in the face of very real possibilities that puts our time and what are the guarantees of continuity of these advances for the population living dramatically different processes related to the deterioration of power in the country. To address these questions we must consider that the finding of the existence of hunger is not enough: it is necessary to understand what explains this phenomenon.

We understand that geography can contribute in the construction of an understanding the phenomenon of hunger. This work is based on the contributions from the Brazilian geographer Josué de Castro, whose work deals with the drama of hunger in Brazil and the world between the 1940s and 1970s. His conceptualization of the phenomenon of hunger, as well as the way he explains this phenomenon considering the relationship between man and the environment, open important perspectives for the understanding of hunger.

Then we try to understand the phenomenon of hunger nowadays: this approach seeks to make a critique of current income redistribution policies through the study of nutrition of the urban working class. Our hypothesis is that it is not possible to understand and overcome hunger without considering at the same time the division of labor and the spatial differences in access to urban.

Challenges of ensuring human rights and human dignity and placement of print media in Pernambuco

This paper is proposed to discuss the influence of journalistic media in the universalization of human rights and the denial of them in the contemporary study and analysis of reports from the newspaper Diário de Pernambuco, during the military dictatorship in Brazil in the 1960s. The discussion developed here considers the present denial of rights is opposed to the principle of human dignity which is enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Federal Constitution of 1988.

The Declaration contributed relevantly to the incorporation of the fundamental principle of human dignity in the constitutional system of Brazil, through the Federal Constitution of 1988. Inaugurating the "lawful dimension" a new era of democratic life, based on human rights, to deny the dictatorship, to revive freedom, but fails to attack effectively the social and regional inequalities, pledging to build a society without exploitation, or humanly emancipated.

Human rights are understood as a whole "universal" and "indivisible" of people's rights and of humanity and in Brazil, the denial of these rights, as we do not face satisfactorily the "social question", represents a setback that does resurface interpretations of rights, that are related to the period comprising the first six months of military dictatorship. In the analysis of the newspaper of Pernambuco, one realizes that deny the inequalities arising from the exploitation of one class over another, denying, as the need to eliminate exploitation and achieve equal rights, considering the human dignity principle.

Thus one of the challenges for the twenty-first century is a struggle for human rights and socialization of wealth, but only after we ensure that these struggles at the level of real recognition of human dignity, provided that the Declaration of Human Rights and the Charter of 1988, surpassing the interpretation of human rights during his dictatorship.

Hibridación y "malandragem" en la construcción mediática del autor

En la canónica obra de Bourdieu, "Las reglas del Arte", se estudian las trayectorias de autores como Baudelaire o Flaubert. La consagración de los escritores aparece fundamentada en la autonomía del campo literario la preeminencia de los capitales específicos, lo que permite la intervención política del "intelectual" (encarnado en Zola). El modelo de Bourdieu, situado geográfica e históricamente, resulta problemático para observar la trayectoria de ciertos escritores contemporáneos, especialmente al abordar el mercado de los bienes simbólicos y las industrias culturales. Como apunta Canclini, las categorías de la modernidad pierden sentido, al difuminarse las fronteras entre "lo culto", "lo popular", y "lo masivo". Apoyándonos en los conceptos de "hibridación" (Canclini) y "malandragem" (Antonio Candido y Roberto DaMatta), intentaremos superar las limitaciones de este modelo para observar las trayectorias de dos singulares escritores brasileños: Chico Buarque (1944) y Ferréz (1975). El primero, exitoso compositor de la llamada "Música Popular Brasileira", comienza en su madurez un proyecto literario relativamente autónomo a las canciones, consiguiendo simultáneamente gran éxito de ventas y reconocimiento crítico. El segundo, reivindicando la llamada "Literatura Marginal" y con trabajos en la música hip-hop y la televisión, inició su carrera como "narrador de un universo particular", pero incrementa su reconocimiento como escritor literario al enfatizar la dimensión ficcional y creativa de sus novelas, al tiempo que firma con una editorial potente. En ambos casos se dan relaciones ambiguas con industria cultural y crítica canónica, siendo relevante tanto la obra como la presentación mediática de sus biografías. Propondremos también como la intervención política de su "crítica social" no es tanto fruto de su autonomía, como parte del proceso de consagración. Presentaremos algunas de estas aproximaciones como resultado provisional de la investigación en curso para el título de maestrado (UFRGS).

Educational policies and democratic administration of education in Brazil: Between managerialism and paternalism

This paper presents the results of a study that analyzes the administration of Brazilian public basic education, comparing it with the guidelines and models mentioned in educational policies. From a historical series (1995-2009), the study builds the profile of school principals and the management processes adopted in public schools, using the databases of the Brazilian Department of Education. Following, the paper uses these profiles to confront the propositions of the Brazilian educational policies for hiring and training school principals. With reference to the literature on education democratic administration, and the relationship between politics and power in the educational environment, the paper concludes showing that, despite the educational policies point to the need to establish more democratic models, still prevails in the conduct of Brazilian public schools strong marks of a new managerialism disconnected with educational preoccupations or an old patrimonialism model.

Economía solidaria en Brasil: Un movimiento social, político y cultural

La Economía Solidaria (ES) en Brasil es movimiento social, político y cultural que se ha forjado más allá de una forma alternativa de generar ingresos y empleo, en una propuesta de organización social basada en la solidaridad y la cooperación, su rol de reivindicaciones va junto a la igualdad de género, la autodeterminación, la agroecología, el movimiento de cultura libre y la emancipación de las relaciones laborales. Resurgió en la década de 1990 en medio de las reformas de liberación que promovieron la precariedad de las condiciones de trabajo, tuvo gran influencia con la creación en 2003 de la Secretaría Nacional de Economía Solidaria (SENAES), parte del Ministerio de Trabajo y Empleo (MTE) que es el órgano de gobierno que irradia las políticas públicas de fomento a los emprendimientos solidarios, y del Consejo Nacional de Economía Solidaria (CNES), espacio para la participación de los actores sociales en la formulación de políticas. En 2011, el gobierno propuso el Proyecto de Ley (PL) 865, que propone la transferencia del CNES y la SENAES del MTE para la Secretaría Especial de Micro y Pequeñas Empresas creada por este PL, que originó una amplia movilización de actores sociales de la ES, que lo repudiaron y reivindicó que el Estado reconociera las diferencias en la ES en relación con la Micro y Pequeñas Empresas (Pymes), sobre todo en los principios (teniendo en cuenta que las Pymes caen en la lógica de la competición capitalista) y que la mantuviera donde estaba, hasta que otro espacio más adecuado sea garantizado. Resultado de la gran movilización, los legisladores eliminaron del PL las disposiciones sobre las políticas de ES. El objetivo del trabajo es analizar como el proceso de oposición a las interferencias del gobierno fue un área fructífera para la construcción y afirmación de la identidad de la ES.

Deviant behavior at university: Punitive minds and paradigm relations

Social facts related to the university student behavior were the core aspect of this research. Our questions are directed, in a first moment, to the western and liberal model of political organization, built around a representative democracy, which is characterized by undeniable appeals from media, financial and electoral systems, among many others. In a second moment, however, linked to the first one, the research focus in a possible predominance of political and educating speech that preconizes the existence and the expansion of, hierarchical bureaucratic organizations which intends to legitimate the belief in a superior expertise, monopolized by politicians, scientists, policy, media elites and, mostly, by the law. This paper points out the new social phenomenon that provides alternatives to the imposition of a prohibitionist paradigm for the solution of conflicts. In an opposite way, this research intends to clarify the effective existence of non-criminalized and community based mechanisms of crime control, actually present on global network ideas. Based on power decentralization principles, participatory democracy and social movements engagement to resolve conflicts, these mechanisms shows up solids alternatives to the determinist belief on a weak and impotent State which was told, for a long time, unable to handle crimes or any social deviant behavior.

Current Rural Education has been effectively carried out for a decade, taking the National Conference for a Rural Basic Education in 1998 as a landmark. It integrates the workers struggle for the accomplishment of a social right – education. It also takes for granted the concept of emancipatory education, in terms of Mészáros, put against the concept of excludent education that ignores the rurality of Brazilian territory. Current Rural Education is opposed to the previous model. It is constructed collectively by workers and, in an increasing national movement, it has been enhancing educational projects, partnerships, governmental segments engagement as well as the need of curricular changes, especially in higher education.

Evaluación de los programas destinados a egresados del sistema penitenciario: Un estudio del presp

El objetivo del presente trabajo fue discutir el alcance de los programas de apoyo a los egresados del sistema penitenciario en el Brasil, centrándose en la experiencia del Programa de Inclusión Social de Egresados del Sistema Penitenciario (PrEsp) en el Estado de Minas Gerais. Este estudio pretende contextualizar el trabajo del PrEsp como parte de una Política de Prevención del delito en el mencionado estado. El PrEsp tiene como objetivo acoger las personas que pasaron por la privación de la libertad proporcionándoles buenas condiciones para la reanudación de su vida social después de haber pasado por la cárcel, mediante acciones de promoción de la ciudadanía para los ex reclusos. Fue hecho un análisis de los resultados obtenidos por el PrEsp en 2010, refiriéndose específicamente a las acciones que están dirigidas para la formación profesional e inserción en el mercado laboral, así como un examen de las tasas de re-entrada en la prisión para los ex reclusos que han pasado por el programa en 2010. Los datos concernientes a las acciones, alianzas y proyectos ejecutados por el PrEsp se obtuvieron mediante la coordinación del programa. Los datos de re-entrada en la prisión fueron obtenidos mediante una encuesta en los Tribunales Penales de las ciudades estudiadas y el INFOPEN del Ministerio de Justicia con las personas inscritas en el PrEsp en 2010. Los resultados obtenidos señalan que existe una contribución para la inclusión social de ex reclusos, principalmente en las acciones de preparación profesional, mas aproximación con las instituciones asociadas, participación en grupos de promoción de la ciudadanía e inclusión en el mercado laboral a través del una propuesta prometedora para la obtención de un empleo formal para el ex recluso. De esa manera, investigaciones preliminares encontraron bajas tasas de re-entradas en la prisión en las ciudades estudiadas, donde el programa actúa.

Christian religious life and LGBTs identity

The hegemonic view on sexuality, based on the gender binary man/woman and the naturalization of heterosexual desire, has been the subject of inquiry in different segments of society and academia. In the field of religion, some theologians and christian leaders have delivered a speech about the legitimacy of deviant sexuality from traditional religious morality. Inclusionary Theology, based on the historical-critical reading of the Bible, is founded on the assertion that all that make up human diversity have free access to God, allowing LGBTs people to exercise the Christian faith and experience their sexuality.

The church Comunidade Cristã Família Athos, located in Brasilia, is one of the churches in Brazil that utter the inclusionary theology, proposing the elimination of stigma against sexual diversity. The Community came from the union of religious Christian homosexual who have become unwelcome, even excluded from their former churches. The rituals performed in Athos concern about that sadness caused by the trajectory of exclusion not only familiar and social, but religious, always stressing, through songs and sermons, as the faithful are accepted and loved by God, and expressing the possibility of healing the heartbreak through inclusionary religious experience.

The purpose of this exhibition is to analyze the process of compatibility between religious life and LGBT identity in the Community Athos, watching the reinterpretation on biblical grounds to rework discourses on Christian morality and same-sex marriage. Reinterpretation wich argues that the Christian God is that of unconditional and fully love, God that never condemn the sincere, true-hearted same-sex affection.

Análisis de discurso crítica en las clases de español como lengua extranjera: Una lectura del prejuicio

Uno de los papeles de los docentes es hacer con que sus alumnos puedan crecer de forma crítica en sus conocimientos. Hay varios teóricos como el suizo Jean Piaget y el brasileño Paulo Freire que demuestran tal forma de ver y vivir la educación: el primero pone para la pedagogía la necesidad de hacer del discente un ser autónomo en sus capacidades intelectuales y morales, así como el segundo, que dice en su obra, entre tantas cosas, que la educación tiene el deber de libertar y todas las condiciones para hacerlo con los que están bajo su mirada. Este trabajo tiene el objetivo de demostrar que, utilizando los fundamentos del Análisis de Discurso Crítica, se alcanza una condición eficiente y eficaz para despertar los alumnos a una nueva manera (crítica) de mirar en el medio social y en el local en que viven: es una perspectiva crítica del hacer pedagógico. Nacida de una epistemología que mira el lenguaje como instrumento también de mudanza social, no limitándola a la comunicación o solamente a una estructura abstracta, el Análisis Crítica de Discurso, de una forma interdisciplinar, puede ser esencial para trabajos en las clases. Hay, acá, un relato de experiencia en lo cual alumnos de la disciplina de Lengua Española, aprendiéndola como lengua extranjera, una vez que son alumnos brasileños, miran la realidad bajo una lectura crítica de ella, haciendo con que las cosas sean miradas en una nueva perspectiva. El trabajo realizado en las clases habló acerca de las diferentes formas de prejuicio, como homofobia, prejuicio contra negros, extranjeros, mujeres y otros. En esa propuesto los alumnos hacen una lectura crítica del asunto y trabajan con perspectivas que no conocían antes, despertándolos para el respecto y el convivio social en armonía con los que son diferentes de si.

Transición a la democracia y política penal

En este trabajo se aborda cómo se estructuró durante la primera etapa de la transición a la democracia en Argentina un modo de construcción de la política penal que mantuvo este campo más allá de la competencia entre los partidos políticos en el juego democrático y, por ende, aislado y protegido del involucramiento directo o indirecto del público. Este modo atribuía un lugar central a la voz de los expertos –académicos formados en el ámbito del derecho y operadores de la justicia penal-, en diálogo con los políticos –tanto del Poder Ejecutivo como Legislativo- y colocaba, en consecuencia, como su instrumento preferencial a la creación de la ley penal. Este modo de construcción de la política penal es caracterizado aquí como “elitista”.

Este artículo también pretende mostrar cómo durante el primer gobierno democrático, las iniciativas de política penal generadas de este modo tuvieron, en general, una orientación liberal. Se estudian aquí, a su vez, cuáles fueron las condiciones que hicieron posible esta inicial orientación liberal de la política penal y cómo es posible explicar la evolución de la punitividad observada a lo largo de este período.

Desde mediados de los años 1990s, en el marco de una creciente politización del problema del delito, se fue construyendo una tendencia hacia una elaboración “populista” de la política penal. La interpretación de este surgimiento del “populismo punitivo” y sus implicancias requiere una más acabada comprensión del momento precedente a partir del cual se diferencia y articula el presente. El presente trabajo puede resultar una contribución que tenga por objetivo reconstruir las formas y orientaciones de la política penal en los primeros momentos de la transición a la democracia en la región.

En este trabajo se aborda una experiencia concreta de reforma penitenciaria producida desde el año 2008 en la Provincia de Santa Fe. En ese momento una nueva gestión gubernamental lanzó un plan de política penitenciaria “progresista” que se estructuraba a partir de cinco principios claves que se colocaban intencionalmente más allá del modelo correccional que ha atravesado la historia de las prisiones argentinas y santafesinas, pero también del modelo incapacitante que se presenta en muchas jurisdicciones como una alternativa estratégica. En este marco, en particular se intentó reconstruir radicalmente el rol de los profesionales de las ciencias humanas y sociales que trabajaban en las prisiones santafesinas en el marco de los Organismos Técnicos Criminológicos, a partir de un proceso complejo de discusión con este tipo de funcionarios penitenciarios, que derivó en un Protocolo de Intervención. Este trabajo presenta una indagación del funcionamiento efectivo de los EARS a partir de una encuesta que combinaba preguntas cerradas y abiertas realizadas a una muestra representativa de las personas privadas de su libertad en todas las prisiones de la provincia de Santa Fe. A partir de la voz de los presos intentamos recoger una fotografía acerca del grado de avance efectivo de este esfuerzo por reformar este segmento de la institución penitenciaria. The use of traditional medicine and complementary and alternative medicine by type 2 diabetes patients as a marker of social distinction in Brazil

Drawing on Pierre Bourdieu's theory of cultural capital and social distinction, this paper will analyse patterns of social differentiation and cultural distinction in Brazil's health care system. The paper is based on research which seeks to understand the extent to which the use of Traditional Medicine (TM) and Complementary and Alternative Medicine (CAM) by type 2 diabetes patients is related to social distinction. The data come from in depth interviews conducted with eighty type 2 diabetes patients in public (40) and private (40) diabetes clinics in Brazil. Interview transcripts were analysed to explore how patients' social class location shaped their perceptions of heterodox treatments. It was found that the choice of heterodox treatments appears to be related to social class. For instance, middle and upper class patients tend to choose TM and CAM mainly within the private health service while working class patients tend to use TM within the public health service. It will be argued that class differences in the use of TM and CAM can be analysed as markers of social distinction in Brazil. According to Bourdieu's theory of class distinction, taste (in this case, choices of TM/ CAM treatments) is one of the key signifiers and elements of social identity. This research attempts to contribute to the much needed understanding of the relationship between cultural practices and social class position in medical sociology.

Juridificación y conflictos ambientales

El Rol de la Defensoría del Pueblo en la juridificación de conflictos ambientales: el Caso de la Cuenca Matanza Riachuelo.

Los conflictos ambientales son en esencia territoriales, distributivos y políticos (Mele, 2003; Merlinsky, 2010; Sabattini, 1997) ya que ponen en juego no sólo el uso y manejo del recurso natural sino también el control sobre el territorio. Los conflictos ambientales generan una fuerte colisión entre el espacio económico y el espacio vital (Sabattini, 1997). Hoy se encuentra en plena vigencia la centralidad del espacio y su relación con lo social, principalmente por la emergencia del fenómeno de la urbanización y lo que implica esta transformación del espacio (Lefebvre, 1974).

Según Azuela la juridificación del conflicto es el proceso social mediante el cual los conflictos son re-significados cuando son llevados a la esfera del derecho (Azuela, 2006). Existen distintas formas de juridificación: la administrativa, la judicial (Azuela, 2006), y la actualización local del derecho que se refiere a que los actores acuden a instituciones tales como: los tribunales locales con competencia, a organizaciones no gubernamentales que puedan activar su causa y a defensorías locales y nacionales para que puedan invocar las leyes ambientales en defensa de la causa que promueven (Merlinsky, 2010; Mele, 2003).

Las Defensorías del Pueblo se constituyen de esta manera como una instancia privilegiada a la cual recurrir en caso de conflictos ambientales ya que presentan una instancia institucional para la participación de los actores en conflicto a través de la juridificación y la generación de las condiciones para la formación de arenas de deliberación.

El objetivo de este trabajo es analizar el rol de la Defensoría del Pueblo de la Nación Argentina en la juridificación del conflicto ambiental de la Cuenca Matanza Riachuelo por la remediación de un bien ambiental que abarca la región metropolitana.

Marx, class, and alienation: Dialectical enhancement without evisceration

Since the publication of The Communist Manifesto in 1848, Marxist theory has developed as a tension between the dichotomies of structure and agency, variously expressed as body/mind or economics/politics or economic class/relative autonomy of the state as well as many other parallel dichotomies. At the extremes we find a kind of extreme economic determinism that was often the object of Marx's criticism and we find a kind of extreme psychological determinism that too was the object of Marx's derision. Attempts to reconcile the two aspects of Marxist thought have sometimes taken the form of an eclectic patching together: "it's a little of both." Marx's (and others') method of dialectics as expressed in material relations offers a way to understand how exploitation of labor, defined much more broadly and deeply than just "wage exploitation", remains the root of oppression, rather than oppression as some kind of free-floating psychological characteristic. Understanding class as a relationship rooted in exploitation broadly defined is not the same as diluting the concept of class with terms such as "social class" or adding in factors such as income, race or gender in ways that dilute the exploitative genesis of oppression. The concept of alienation, defined more broadly than wage exploitation but less broadly than generalized oppression or sadness, is a valuable bridge between the macro class-economic processes and the micro personal-psychological processes. It is possible, and necessary, to explore the complex ways that culture and ideology generate oppression distinct from "wage exploitation" while still maintaining the core of Marx's concept of class as based on exploitation of labor (control of one human's activity by another). Dialectical analysis provides a way to understand how the one grows out of the other, not identical, but yet connected.

Interpretive reading of the Palestinian security prisoners' representation

This paper is trying to analyze the construction of "security prisoners representations" in images of public relations pamphlets of the Israeli Prison Service.

In doing that I follow Walter Benjamin's investigation of the textual and visual representations that a separation between them constitutes in modern era as a mechanism of control (Azoulay, 2006). In this case, the visual representation of the image is the only representation of the penal colony security prison, when the silence of the voices of the prisoners take place.

In addition, the author relies on Roland Barthes (1977) and its critical discourse on the visual representation. Where the dimension of connotation presents itself as denotation and thus mythologizes and naturalizes the visual message in the eyes of the recipient. I shall discuss the analysis of image's different signifiers and the meanings that emerge from them. Meanings that create a dominant- hegemonic discourse on the one hand, and the fact that they can be read on the other critical-subversive reading.

In this work the author wants to show that the photographs from the security prison exist and are not used only to discipline, punish and supervise the penal colony, but also serve the discipline of the public's consciousness. On the other hand it seems that the very practice is itself problematic, and once the pictures came out into the world they have multiple dimensions of interpretation.

The history of this work go far beyond the world of academic life. This work is an expression of one's life story, as it expressed the existence of an abstract group. This is an auto-ethnography of the writer, in a total institution of the Israeli security prison.

Identity and socialization within an established field: The case of physicians in Italy

Identity and socialization are symmetrical concepts. Identity includes the capability of a subject not only to recognise themselves (externalisation of subjectivity), but also to be recognised by others (internalisation of objectivity), that is each individual socializes by internalizing external values which make themselves socially identifiable. Identity is then a result of reciprocal recognition and the identity of the ego is possible only thanks to the identity of the other who recognizes me. No one is able to build his/her own identity independent of other people's recognition and when this occurs this will be a segregated identity. Empirical examples of this situation can be found in the initial stages of the formation of collective players, children at a certain developmental age, subjects in marginal counter-culture and in sects. The duality of the concept of identity can be expressed empirically analysing the findings of a research based on semi-structured interviews with forty doctors from Southern Italy and distinguishing the choice of medicine (motivations, calculations, specific events, natural dispositions and so on, which can all lead to internalization of social pressure, that is to socialization) from what is under a doctor's direct working experience (patients, techniques, emotions, action, physical skills, variety, research and analysis, all indications of externalisation of subjectivity). Finally, socialization will be connected not only to shared educational credentials, professional training, working culture, membership within professional associations, but also to familiar background.

Notas sobre medianeras y vecinos: Representaciones audiovisuales sobre las relaciones y los conflictos en el espacio urbano

En la última década hemos vivenciado una transformación en el paisaje urbano de nuestras ciudades. Transformación, que no ha sido ajena a los discursos audiovisuales. Varias películas de ficción argentinas han retratado las relaciones humanas mediadas por el espacio que habitan: sus vínculos afectivos y sus conflictos. Estos films representan los múltiples procesos culturales que se presentan en la vida cotidiana de las urbes contemporáneas con un particular punto de vista.

Muchas de estas producciones, se han realizado desde la perspectiva del diseño audiovisual ligado a las economías creativas. Puesto que han sido financiadas no sólo por medio de institutos oficiales sino que han recibido subvenciones de organismos asociados a polos de diseño emergentes.

Asimismo, cada vez es más frecuente ver como las Ciencias Sociales han ido incorporando y desarrollando distintas metodología de análisis de datos a partir de producciones audiovisuales. Toda mirada sobre un acontecimiento es política, es decir recorta desde su propia subjetividad el hecho representado. La realidad no puede estar separada de las mediaciones que tenemos para entenderla, observarla, contarla.

Por ello, esta presentación tomará tres films, El amor. Primera parte (2004) de Alejandro Fadel, Martín Mauregui, Santiago Mitre y Juan Schnitman; El hombre de al lado (2009) de Mariano Cohn y Gastón Duprat y Medianeras (2010) de Gustavo Taretto para hacer un análisis sobre la representación de las transformaciones urbanas, la producción desde la cooperación y el proceso de diseño audiovisual. Estas películas aportan una mirada a la problemática de la imagen de la ciudad, la división socio espacial y al modo que su renovación va modificando - y tensionando - las relaciones entre sus habitantes.

Video cartografías: Audiovisual practice and poetics for representing reality

This presentation seeks to examine technological poetics studying the different approaches to produce discursive forms using video as a field of experimentation for representing reality. The use of this medium as a resource has a no pre-established formats. This phenomenon creates new pieces that can be watched on a screen or that can require displacements and intervention from its viewers, as performatic installations that involve space, data capture and editing on real time where actors become producers. It can be found that the representation of society, with its politics, economics and cultural complexities, it is a recurrent theme of these video-productions that not always are made by professionals.

For addressing any productive practice, we take the Greek concept of Techne, proposed by Vilem Flusser, from which derives the word technology. The machine it is offered to the Subject like an open system in which s/he can find the possibility of action and redefinition of the worlds where s/he lives. It is important to understand this relation between representation, poetry and technique from different theoretical angles, such as audiovisual design, poetics strategies and media circuits.

This paper opens questions about strategies that relate documentary practices with new forms of expression. For doing this videopoetry will be taken as a key genre of analysis, since embodies specific resources that allow to study symbolic expression of technologies and re-signification of footage. This presentation will analyze examples of Argentinean artists Ivan Marino and Carlos Trilnick but also how poetry it is used on film narratives to create identity, for example Balnearos, a documentary directed by Mariano Llinás.

Videopoetry can be considered as a medium of representation for a landscape of issues concerning discourses around technological poetics and reality, where creative processes and power can be examine.

Phenomenology as method in the sociology of religion

This paper outlines a rigorous phenomenological approach to the study of religious experience. Based in the work of Husserl, Schutz, and Giorgi, it separates experience as it presents itself to consciousness from culturally generated interpretations of this experience. This allows the sociology of religion to expand its investigatory range, especially while studying those religious events not dominated by conceptual thought. These include the sociology of meditative experiences and the unfolding of rituals in time, among others.

The paper accomplishes three things. First, it outlines a protocol for capturing subjective experiences—including their interpretive elements—then distilling them to identify their essential and non-essential characteristics. Second, it describes the result of one such investigation: into the experience of time in Catholic Worker rituals, which focused on how that experience sustains its participants' sense of community and commitment to socio-political struggle. Third, it distinguishes this empirical phenomenology from other self-described "phenomenologies" that muddy the relationship between religious experiences and theological interpretation. Such phenomenologies fail to focus on experience-as-lived, most often by conflating experiences with the conclusions that people draw from them.

Alternative food networks and environmental citizenship in Czechia

Retail transformation and changes in shopping styles are an inseparable part of the transition processes in the post-communist countries. Shortly after the revolution, multinational retail companies markedly reshaped consumption landscapes and Czechs quickly adopted "western" modes of shopping behavior represented in big shopping trips to out-of-city hypermarkets, higher use of cars when shopping, shopping as a leisure activity etc.

Juxtaposed to the "mall" of the Czech Republic, there is a newer movement away from mass shopping towards smaller and greener forms of shopping. Some consumers rebuild lost social relations while shopping in farmers' markets or in specialized shops. If this represents a new countertrend spreading in the urban environment of the biggest Czech cities, may this behavior indicate that contemporary Czech consumption patterns are shifting to the more ethical and green lifestyles in developed societies including vegetarianism, organic food consumption, farmer-to-consumer marketing etc.?

FMs are a relatively recent phenomenon in Prague, Czech Republic. Their opening was met with great enthusiasm and consumers flooded to these markets. People shopped at FMs mainly because they believed that food purchased there was fresher and better tasting than food from regular stores. The second most common reason for shopping at FMs was the local provenience of purchased food. The fact that purchased food is Czech made is also important. Thus, after a "hedonist" phase of alternative food networks emergence, Czech people started to mobilize as environmental citizens and consumers of the "right", the local, products. Thanks to activities of many environmental movements and activists they learn about social and environmental risks of mass consumption. This paper focuses at evidence of ongoing shift to develop new pro-active approaches to consume in more "greener" and "healthier" style and describes further activities of citizens in the forms of box-scheme shopping, aims to revive community supported agriculture etc.

Social justice and the centralisation of governance in the Australian metropolises; A case study of Melbourne

Notwithstanding Australia's robust economic performance both prior and during the global financial crisis, the nation's metropolitan areas have become forces of division rather than shared opportunity for ordinary citizens. The prodigious, low density spread of the Australian metropolis is creating communities of divergent aspirations and diminished social mobility. To a large degree, these patterns can be attributed to structural economic change, characterised by powerful centripetal tendencies within high value added, 'knowledge intensive' and globally linked industries. However, reforms in metropolitan governance have also played a part. As evidenced in Melbourne, most Australian cities have seen a steady centralisation of planning, infrastructure and development facilitation functions into State Governments, the only constitutionally recognised sphere of governance in Australia besides the Commonwealth (federal) government. This has been driven both by a belief that State control would render urban planning more 'democratically accountable', and a national push to rid the Australian economy of unnecessary red tape. The upshot is that metropolitan communities effectively have no voice for their collective will. Many urban policy initiatives and investments that may have blunted or mitigated some of the socially adverse features of the modern economy have been foregone or implemented in a desultory manner. Moreover, these foregone opportunities to foster a more compact and connected metropolis have, somewhat ironically, diminished human capital accumulation to the detriment of Australian productivity and competitiveness. Reinstatement of a metropolitan governance forum, with its own democratic mandate and fiscal capacity, to operate separately from, but in co-operation with, State and local governments, is likely to be necessary if the trends in social division and lost productivity in the Australian city are to be reversed.

Whiteness, social order and heritage leisure: Reconstructing England through the national trust

In the summer of 2011, the streets of London and many other cities and towns in England were the sites of unrest, in which multi-ethnic, young working-class Englanders looted their local shopping centres for cheap trainers, wide-screen televisions and cigarettes and alcohol. At the same time in the countryside of England, the members of the National Trust – the multi-million member charity set up to own, manage and preserve built heritage and landscapes in England and Wales – continued to visit stately homes, where they admired antique furniture and ate cream teas (Jenkins and James, 1994). This research paper uses the National Trust as an empirical case study for a wider theoretical discussion about the role of heritage leisure in preserving and reconstructing elitist social identities and power relationships in these turbulent times of globalization, commodification and neo-liberalism (Roberts, 2011). Although some of the research data will be ethnographic field work, I will focus on the National Trust's public documents, including its magazine and website, to provide a semi-otic account of the symbols and myths tied up in such material. I will argue that while the National Trust itself attempts to reach out to inner-city youths, people from working-class and minority ethnic communities, the people coveted by the National Trust's marketing belong to an exclusively white England that is situated in the imagined past of the glorious British Empire.

A review of Caribbean population and housing census experience

Countries of the Caribbean region have jointly undertaken population and housing censuses since 1960. Earlier censuses were done individually, some dating back to 1844. Because of population size disparities, economic status and scarce financial resources, census data began being collected on a regional basis using the long-form. The Caribbean Community (CARICOM) organizes and oversees the census-taking process which is constituted to foster collaboration on matters of trade, economic and social development among the 15 member countries of the region. The population and housing census is a major decennial event whereby countries collect data using a core set of questions to which additional core items appended as in accordance with their data needs. Both large and small countries have had to face the rising cost of census-taking but because of the necessity for detailed data at regional and individual country levels, censuses have been undertaken without fail. This paper discusses issues regarding the conduct of the census using the long-form and considers alternative ways of deriving census data using design-based and model-based sampling approaches.

"Por una vida mejor": Los discursos de resistencia de la inclusión de la variación lingüística en la educación formal como lenguaje práctica social (Fairclough, 2003) y de practica discursiva como proceso de producción, distribución y consumo textual (Fairclough, 1992), investigamos la relación entre discursos de la oposición al gobierno, del propio gobierno, de los expertos en lenguaje y en educación y de los no expertos. Los datos fueron recorridos en documentos disponibles en la internet (sitio del MEC y otras instituciones, periódicos etc.) y del proceso judicial. Para observar cómo los discursos de los expertos en educación y lenguaje se relacionaron con discursos de los no expertos (políticos, juristas, periodistas etc.) recorrimos a la visión de que los procesos de producción y interpretación son socialmente restringidos en sentido duplo: por las estructuras sociales efectivamente interiorizadas (normas y convenciones) y por la práctica social, siempre normativamente creativa, como son los cambios resultantes de la práctica discursiva (Fairclough, 1992), sí como en autores como Bakhtin, Foucault, Luhmann y otros. Lo que hasta ahora hemos observado es que para promover inclusión no es suficiente buenas ideas ni el apoyo del gobierno, pues la resistencia a la inclusión de la lenguaje popular en la educación, pues hay que mirar los preconceptos presentes en el elitismo culturalista.

How the Catholic church's involvement in politics has affected religiosity in Spain and Poland – Cohort and period perspective

The aim of this study is to compare how the Catholic Church's involvement in politics under authoritarian rule in Spain and Poland impacted post-transitional religiosity in those countries. The Catholic Church was a key political actor during the Franco regime and communist rule in Poland. However, the nature of its political involvement in each case was quite different: while in Spain it legitimised the authoritarian regime, in Poland Church membership represented a form of resistance to the Communist rule.

My analytical strategy is twofold. Firstly, I identify the differences in levels of religiosity among different cohorts socialised during the authoritarian regimes and the democratic periods. Secondly, I analyse how religiosity has varied in both societies over approximately twenty years after the end of the Franco regime and the fall of Communism in Poland. I analyse several surveys carried out by the Spanish Centre for Sociological Studies between 1975 and 1998. I use data from the Polish General Social Survey covering 1991-2008. The main statistical method is a logistic regression. I analyse the change in marginal effects on the probability of church attendance over time and over cohorts.

Results show that differences in the political positions of the Catholic Church had varying impacts on religious practice. Cohort analysis in Spain reveals that since the late 1950s each generation entering early adulthood has been significantly less religious than previous one. Period effect analysis shows that the religious change was especially intense during the political transition in the late 1970s. The analysis for Poland indicates a moderate shift toward secularization in the 1960s cohort. Nevertheless, this trend did not continue in the following two generations (1970s and 1980s) due to increasing social and political conflict. In addition, there is no general period effect in the first phase of the political transition.

Patterns of civic participation across europe

The civic participation are strongly related to research and analysis of social capital. The main goal of my presentation is to make an attempt at answering three main problem questions:

1. What is the general level of civic participation in Europe?
2. What different types of civic engagement might be distinguished in Europe on the base of trust level and civic participation level?
3. What are the main determinants of trust and civic participation?

In other words, which of the below listed models explaining the differentiation of civic engagement (Socio Economic Model; Social Capital Model; Attachment Model, Rational Choice Theory Model, Civic Voluntarism Model; Socialization Model) is best fitted to explaining the changeability of the European societies' civic engagement?

Civic participation is understood similarly to behavioral approach (Patte, Seid, Whiteley, 2003) as an activity that is executed by the actions of citizens in the public, political and associative spheres. Such understanding of civic participation enable distinguishing some patterns of civic engagement on the base of civic participation level. It needs to be stressed, that civic engagement is understood as combination of trust and civic participation.

The presentation is based on the European Social Survey result's carried out in the years 2002- 2010.

Riesgos psicosociales en profesionales de la salud pública en Chile

Introducción: Los procesos de reforma de la salud pública en Chile han significado profundos cambios en la organización y las condiciones del trabajo de los centros sanitarios. Esta ponencia analiza el ambiente organizacional y las condiciones de trabajo como factor de riesgo psicosocial de un grupo de profesionales de la salud pública examinando sus asociaciones con sintomatología psicofisiológica. Asimismo se reporta el modo como estos profesionales vivencian los cambios.

Métodos: Estudio no experimental transversal y descriptivo. Se aplicó una encuesta (14 escalas, 1 inventario y 15 preguntas abiertas) a una muestra de conveniencia, intencional y estratificada (n=190) de profesionales de enfermería y medicina. Se realizó un análisis estadístico utilizando el software SPSS 17.0, y un análisis de contenido con el software Atlas-ti.

Resultados: La reforma y reorganización empresarial de la gestión en hospitales es percibida como necesaria y generadora de oportunidades, y al mismo tiempo una nueva fuente de riesgos, incertidumbres y amenazas. Se observan diferencias significativas en la percepción de estos cambios entre profesionales de medicina y enfermería. Respecto al malestar psicofisiológico las enfermeras presentan mayor nivel de malestar que los médicos (p=0,000). Encontramos correlaciones negativas y significativas entre malestar psicofisiológico y condiciones de trabajo (-0,418 p=0,000) clima social (-0,395 p=0,000), satisfacción con la organización (-0,337 p=0,000) y bienestar psicosocial (-0,267 p=0,000). Un 21 % de la varianza de malestar se explica por condiciones de trabajo, el bienestar psicosocial y la adaptación a la organización.

Conclusiones: La experiencia laboral de estos profesionales se caracteriza por el carácter ambivalente con que viven los cambios. Existen relaciones entre la alta prevalencia de sintomatología psicofisiológica y las actuales condiciones organizacionales y del trabajo de los profesionales de la salud pública. Una mejor conducción del proceso de modernización de la salud requiere atender a las dimensiones y riesgos psicosociales en el trabajo.

The reproductive labour of care: A case study of migrant women working in Italy

The feminization of immigration for the domestic sector is not a new phenomenon in Western European countries. However, in Italy, a relatively "new immigration country" in the Mediterranean basin, the characteristics of women involved in the migration process are new.

This paper examines the social, cultural and economic structural forces that promote the "ideology of women's domesticity" for reproductive labour, which encourages the migratory processes of women. By understanding the status of migrant women of different ethnicities, classes and origins, it illustrates how care and domestic work shapes inequality and vulnerability.

Moreover, it reveals how the social, economic and political transformations that have occurred in Southern Europe, and in Italy in particular, have helped to create both a demand for and a supply of female (im)migrant care workers, while immigration policies have sustained the immigration flows through quota slots for entry. Thus, the analysis of domestic work is focused on the nexus of gender, care and migration processes.

In this paper, I argue that to explain the living and working conditions of domestic workers in Italy and the "transnational care chains" that have occurred in the families left behind, one has to look at simultaneous structural factors of the Italian welfare state, gender relations, the structure of the labour market and the international division of reproductive labour. By sustaining a "cheap" care system through foreign labour forces, the Italian welfare state relies on the availability of migrant women to work as caregivers.

Global society making: Transnational occupation with sociocracy and sociodiplomacy

More articulated alternative projects of just social organization from local levels to the level of global society are emerging out of the most recently undertaken protestations. The Occupy brand of contestation practices is distinctly productive in that vein.

Apart from the alternative project for equitable intrasocietal organization the Occupy actors have articulated the principles for nonhegemonic international society and just global society. So far the articulated alternative one comes close to already theoretically sketched sociocracy in respect to its very reason and substance as well as prescribed why and expected how to reach this form of just social organization.

On the other hand the construction of global counter-hegemonic social project similar to the locally assembled sociocratic one was less expected. The obstacles of cultural and language differences, barriers of exclusive national identities, the executive's near-monopoly on governing international affairs and if not outright hostility than vocal silence of mainstream global media on global occupy movement and "worldwide occupations" are suspected to thwart their trajectory to assembling transnationally any viable global counter-project. Contrary to such wisdom "G20 Statement from Occupy London", published by OccupyLx on November, 2 2011, has offered the beginning of a dialogue in assemblies around the world on alternative global project through collaborative partnership for developing common vision. Thus, global occupy movement relying on diplomatic power, as an ability to get consent by offering others what they want, how and when they want it, has ventured into sociodiplomacy. It is the global society constitution through diplomatic power sourced from the widest possible inclusion (99%), respect for every societal entrepreneur (since society is the only too big to fail), disintermediation and personal accountability, collaboration in proposing, dialoguing and developing vision of social alternatives, in assembly built consensus on rules and decisions and partnership for making and taking actions.

Identidad, oficio y cuerpo: El caso de los tatuadores y perforadores profesionales de la ciudad de Santa Fe

Identidad, Oficio y Cuerpo: el caso de los tatuadores y perforadores profesionales de la ciudad de Santa Fe.

Este trabajo es el resultado de la tesina de Licenciatura en Sociología de la Universidad Nacional de Litoral. Se enmarca en la tradición de la sociología del cuerpo y analiza procesos de consumo cultural vinculados a la estética corporal. El referente empírico son tatuadores y perforadores profesionales de la ciudad de Santa Fe.

Los objetivos propuestos son: indagar las concepciones sobre el cuerpo de los sujetos que realizan modificaciones corporales; conocer el significado de dichas prácticas para quiénes las realizan; qué "cuerpo" construyen esas prácticas; y que otros hábitos de consumo cultural poseen quiénes ejecutan estas prácticas.

La estrategia metodológica es cualitativa. Las técnicas de recolección de datos fueron las entrevistas en profundidad a los sujetos y la observación participante en locales comerciales de la ciudad.

Las vertientes principales se dividen en dos líneas fundamentales sobre la base de períodos sociales, que a su vez se subdividen en función de la nacionalidad. Los primeros aportes sobre la cuestión corporal son de M. Mauss, E. Durkheim, G. Simmel, I. Goffman, N. Elias, P. Bourdieu; luego, los "teóricos de la modernidad" y el cuerpo, con A. Giddens, U. Beck, S. Lash; y finalmente los aportes en torno a la cuestión identitaria y estilos de vida: F. Barth y A. Giddens. Se propuso una utilización pragmática y sinérgica de los aportes teóricos en función de su potencialidad heurística.

Los principales descubrimientos son: las concepciones y prácticas corporales de ejecutantes del oficio del tatuaje y la perforación; la relevancia de procesos macroestructurales como la globalización, destradicionalización e individualización, que estructuran tanto el oficio como los consumos culturales restantes; y las fronteras identitarias que resulta de los estilos de vida, en base a los dos procesos mencionados.

Pinhole: Uma experiência com crianças pequenas

A proposta de trabalho a ser apresentada tem como objetivo compartilhar os resultados de uma oficina de fotografia artesanal realizada com crianças de 5 a 12 anos no assentamento do Movimento dos Trabalhadores Sem-Terra, MST, localizado em Franco da Rocha, grande São Paulo. Esta proposta foi desenvolvida como parte dos trabalhos do grupo de estudo Sociologia da imagem - estudos sobre desenho e fotografia (CNPQ).

A técnica artesanal de captação da imagem conhecida por pinhole, buraco de alfinete, é marcada por não fazer o uso de lentes. Por meio de um pequeno orifício onde a luz do sol refletida é registrada em papel fotossensível as crianças experimentaram a fotografia como processo de investigação.

Explicar a propagação retilínea da luz no espaço e a fixação invertida da imagem no papel não são tarefas fáceis, por isso consideramos a caixa escura uma ferramenta importante para o entendimento do processo de produção das fotografias, sobretudo no trato com crianças. Deste modo, pensou-se a oficina de pinhole não apenas como algo pragmático, mas reflexivo e desalienante exatamente por desvelar a produção de imagens fotográficas. Tal condição apresenta a fotografia não como finalidade, mas como processo investigativo tanto da técnica quanto das representações do espaço/tempo.

A técnica do pinhole exige da criança uma relação de estranhamento com o meio, isto é, a escolha do objeto a ser fotografado e o tempo de captação da imagem proporciona a criança um estado de reflexão: do ambiente em que está imersa, da sua relação com o tempo, da sua concepção de representação e por fim do seu poder de decisão. O processo de captação da imagem aconteceu em três etapas, todas elas "experenciadas" pelas crianças – sensibilização e construção das caixas escuras, ida a "campo" para escolha e captação da imagem e revelação das fotografias em laboratório.

Methodological issues with interpretative comprehension of social actions: Analyzing interaction with contemporary art objects

How do we as sociological observers comprehend from methodological point of view the meaning of what has been occurred? This question has been associated for a long time with understanding and grasping the motives and reasons of agent for her or his action. This is considered to be the preliminary point of interpretative method. Usually, theoretically and methodologically it is traced back up to the later works of Max Weber, especially to his introducing chapters of 'Economy and Society'.

These presuppositions hold well if one does sociological work within common frames of everyday activities, e.g. interpreting day-to-day actions. Nevertheless one faces with considerable methodological problems if tries to provide a reasonable account of agent's motives and reasons for the action in the situations breaking out of our typical experience of everyday life. I am going to refer to the issues concerning describing and explaining the flow of social actions through the sociological analysis of an example of such out of everyday frame activities. Under consideration is the case of people's interaction with objects of contemporary art at the biggest Russian open-air festival 'Archstoyanie'.

The detailed analysis of methodological issues intends to discover insufficiency of the interpretative approach outlined above. One can hardly provide any reasonable account of agent's motives here and the meaning of social actions remains either incomprehensible or indistinguishable from other types of common social actions and therefore inadequate to this particular situation.

My claim may be stated in a following way. Comprehensive description and explanation of social action presupposes not hermeneutic grasping of motivational aspects of behavior, rather it must be associated with recognizable situational occurrences making this description an appropriate one. The latter includes assembling the whole picture out of pieces of social events and material settings as well.

Open-source education

The intellectual property regime in the US complicates education reform, hindering policy's ability to establish alternative systems that provide more affordable education while expanding global access to knowledge. The strong IP system, through inflexible "fair use" practices and stringent publishing/licensing rights for education-related content, locks the US into an inadequate institutional model that dates back to the industrial revolution. More specifically, the current IP regime (1) deprives low-income individuals (particularly global partners in LDCs) from accessing and fairly using content for instructive purposes; and (2) obstructs more active collaboration among the academic community while depriving scholars with resources and technologies that may be used to extend the frontier of knowledge. Ergo, it is likely that the unwieldy IP system stifles innovation and human capital. Previous studies demonstrate how technology, open-sources, and "crowd-sourcing" can be utilized to provide higher-quality education that is more diverse, more affordable, more personalized, and more convenient. Evidence from earlier works that investigate open-source computer software and file sharing illustrate the efficacy of new, open-source social practices, specifically transforming production, sharing, and distribution of information. The organizational structure and innovativeness of these networks often outperform their industrial model equivalents. Concomitantly, the US has largely transformed into a knowledge-based economy. Although these jobs demand a creative, collaborative labor force, scholars contend that the proprietary system cripples creativity and collaboration. Together, these shifts compel policy makers to begin testing open-source systems in education on a larger-scale. Consequently, the author outlines an intermediate open-source model based off a more progressive institution: charter schools. This early model may serve as intermediate phase, allowing policy experts to collect more information about the strengths and weaknesses of collaborative-based learning systems; positive results will likely depend on the courts embracing a more generous judgment of fair use and the continuation of user-generated, academically-friendly licensing.

Panhandling and information acquisition in Miami

Panhandling and street vendors are often used to describe socio-economic conditions in the less and least developed regions of the world. It is not frequently considered as an activity that characterizes urban life in the developed world; yet many urban residents in the developed world routinely experience one or another style of panhandling on a daily basis. A common development in urban areas, panhandling continues to increase with the economic downturn, impacting major cities suffering from high rates of unemployment. This is particularly the case for Miami, a city which has greatly experienced the present global downturn manifested in high unemployment as well as a high home foreclosure rate. As the panhandling trend continues to increase in highly visible areas of the city, their presence has led to modifications and expansions of anti-panhandling laws, however the changes in legislation are not always disseminated to the panhandling community. The consequences of breaking the laws include being arrested, fined, or imprisoned, thus it is important for the panhandling community to understand their rights and restrictions; yet many remain uniformed and vulnerable to imprisonment and fines. To understand the ways by which panhandlers obtain information about laws and resources an ethnographic study was conducted in which panhandlers were observed at two popular panhandling sites in Miami-Dade. The observations indicated that a social hierarchy existed among panhandlers and brief interviews revealed that those higher in the hierarchy tended to be more knowledgeable about community resources and laws and had improved self-efficacy. Recurring themes of drug use, mental health, self-shame, and mistrust of philanthropic agencies emerged as important factors in homelessness among panhandlers. It would be beneficial to explore these relationships in detail in order to determine effective ways to disseminate information among panhandlers which could lead to increased self-efficacy and perhaps lifestyle changes.

Going local: Environmental governance and calls for local democracy at jumbo pass and the tobeatic wilderness area

Social movement and world society literatures argue that activism is increasingly becoming transnational, if not global. However, recent literature on environmental governance and local citizenship argues otherwise. Instead, it finds that the "local" is valorized. We examine the ways in which environmental movements make use of "the local" as they mobilize against the proposed Jumbo Glacier Resort development, British Columbia, and Off-Highway Vehicle Use in the Tobeatic Wilderness, Nova Scotia. Using data from interviews with core environmental activists, environmental organization websites, and content analysis of media coverage, we explore why activists seek local governance and use local tactics. These cases show that the appeal of the local is rooted in the scale of the environmental problem, the potential for successful mobilization in the local context, and demands for more open structures of environmental governance.

Umbanda in the city: Magic, mysticism and the mass appeal of a uniquely Brazilian religion

In Brazil, urbanisation and religious change are two closely linked phenomena. In the early 20th century, as Brazil moved into a new era of urban development, industrialisation and concomitant migration, Brazilian religiosity also underwent significant transformation. An explosion of new and syncretised spiritual forms appeared in city centres, and disseminated throughout urban Brazil.

One of the most conspicuous and meaningful new religions to emerge from this era was Umbanda, often accredited with being the first truly Brazilian religion. Intermingling facets of Catholicism, Spiritism and Candomble, Umbanda integrates into its religious cosmology and pantheon diverse symbols of national identity and significance, and has a tendency to be concentrated in urban locales. In a society still marred by corruption and extreme disparities between rich and poor, Umbanda represents one of Brazil's most egalitarian spiritual denominations, permeating all echelons of Brazilian society and encouraging participation among Brazilians of diverse backgrounds, regardless of age, sexuality, gender or ethnicity.

My research among urban Umbanda communities this year has suggested that Umbanda's appeal and prevalence throughout Brazilian cities can be attributed to several salient factors. The democratic ideals that infuse its ideology, its ardent beliefs in charity inherited from Brazilian Spiritism, and its emphasis on magic, mysticism and distinctly Brazilian aesthetic mean that Umbanda holds appeal across distinct social groups. It speaks to those afflicted with problems; seeking cures and resolutions to hardships often associated with the challenges of urban living, but also to those seeking a sense of identity, transcendental meaning, and re-enchantment in the bustle and confusion of the quotidian.

Families caring for assisted living and nursing home residents with dementia: Does setting matter?

While family caregivers are recognized as playing an important role in the provision of care and oversight of residents in assisted living (AL) and nursing home/long-term care (LTC), the diversity in patterns of family engagement and caregiver well-being across the two settings is not well understood. Given potential differences in the availability/type of staffing and in the residents' cognitive/physical functioning, families of AL residents with dementia may be more involved and more burdened than those caring for LTC residents.

Drawing on a longitudinal study conducted in the Canadian province of Alberta, the extent of family engagement and caregiver well-being in both AL and LTC settings are examined, taking resident and facility characteristics into account. Comprehensive baseline and 1-year follow-up assessments were conducted on 1,089 residents of 59 (designated) AL facilities and a stratified, two-stage random sample of 1,000 residents within 54 LTC facilities. A total of 627 AL and 708 LTC residents had a documented diagnosis of dementia. In-person interviews were completed with 974 AL family caregivers and 917 LTC family caregivers at baseline, with 1-year follow-ups completed where possible. Among these caregivers, 582 of the AL caregivers and 650 of the LTC caregivers were caring for a resident with dementia.

Family engagement was measured with a series of questions related to visiting, caregiving tasks, perceived involvement in the life of the facility, and financial costs to caregivers and/or residents. Caregiver well-being was assessed by the Caregiver Reaction Scale (CRA) (Given et al., 1992) that examines five domains (disrupted schedules, financial problems, lack of family support, health problems, and the impact of caregiving of the caregiver's self-esteem).

The results revealed both similarities and differences in family engagement and caregiver well-being across the two settings, highlighting the complexity in care arrangements. Implications for future research are discussed.

"Power and violence are opposites": Reflections on a self-delusion of political thought in light of slavery

Hannah Arendt's famous juxtaposition of power and violence appears radical, but a closer look reveals it to represent only an extreme expression of an idea widely shared in political thought: While violence is usually understood as a means to power, its exercise is commonly held to be an alternative that is only in place where the power relation as such is deficient. Analyzing the experience as well as the system of slavery I argue that the common view neglects that violence can be constitutive to certain forms of power. After having discussed this constitutive dimension of the relation between power and violence, I conclude by highlighting the relevance of such an analysis for our understanding of contemporary society.

Ethnic tolerance and intolerance in Russia: Current issues and trends

Russia is a multiethnic society. According to All-Russian census conducted in 2002, there were 192 ethnic groups in Russia. However, not all citizens are satisfied with the existence of so many ethnic groups in Russia. For example, according to a 'Public Opinion' Foundation Poll conducted in 2007 only 37% of respondents think that existence of many ethnic groups in Russia has more benefits for the country, 35% think it does more harm and 28% don't know. Recently, active migration processes from Central Asia and Caucasus as well as a growing number of Muslims have been observed in Russia. On the one hand, migration helps to improve demographic situation and compensates for a lack of workforce at the job market. On the other hand, it increases greater competition for the job market, involves distribution of the local territorial resources and causes ethnic tensions. It also arouses much discussion on the forms of teaching migrants with poor Russian language competence, socio-cultural adaptation and other social problems. Concomitantly, ethnic relations of Russian people with migrants vary by the ethnicity of the groups. For example, the study of the Lithuanian minority in the Kaliningrad Region of Russia conducted by Lomonosov Moscow State University within the frames of the international FP7-SSH ENRI-East project funded by the European Commission in 2010 showed a high degree of ethnic tolerance by Lithuanians and Russians towards each other, very few cases of confrontation, active assimilation processes of the Lithuanians in that area and mutual cultural interpenetration. There is also a decline in anti-Semitism in Russia. The survey carried out by All-Russian Centre for Public Opinion Research showed that only 3% of Russian people declared themselves to be anti-Semites in 2010.

Integrating ecological perspectives in environmental sociology: Progress and future directions

Environmental challenges continue to highlight the need to break through traditional disciplinary boundaries to better understand complex relationships between social and ecological systems. Issues such as climate change illustrate that we can no longer ignore the biophysical in our studies of society. However, scholarly work that attempts to breakdown the academic divide between nature and society has remained marginalized within sociology. In their 2000 article in the Annual Review of Sociology, Michael Goldman and Rachel Schurman reviewed work that theoretically engages relationships between nature and society and hoped that from this work a new sociological imagination would emerge. Over a decade later, I explore similar work published since their article was written, identify promising approaches to integrate social and ecological perspectives, and assess sociology's progress toward bridging the nature/society divide. I argue that while progress has been made, sociology still has much to learn from work in other disciplines. For example, research exploring social-ecological systems emerging from the natural sciences illustrates promising approaches that apply new concepts and frameworks to better understand how to mitigate and respond to environmental change. A growing number of ecologists have published work recognizing that they can no longer ignore the impact of humans in their study systems and are grappling with new challenges in their work. I will examine how sociologists have integrated ecological perspectives into their work and how social and natural scientists may find common ground for future research. As we face increasing environmental challenges, sociologists that can incorporate ecological knowledge into their work and collaborate with natural scientists will be in high demand. Within environmental sociology, we must engage with new concepts to help us understand social-ecological systems and how we might reshape relationships to result in better social and environmental outcomes.

From toxic tours to growing the grassroots: Critical pedagogy and youth empowerment in community development

Structural inequalities in American public education are inextricably tied to deep-seated patterns of racial and economic segregation. Children in poor neighborhoods are less likely to have the household resources, neighborhood institutions, or school amenities necessary for a good, challenging education. In response, a growing number of organizations have launched initiatives to simultaneously revitalize neighborhoods and improve public education, emphasizing youth participation as an essential component in their efforts. We draw upon ethnographic data from two such organizations to examine their practice of place-based critical pedagogy in community development. We focus on how they engage marginalized, "hard-to-reach" youth via (1) experiential learning, to counter high-stakes testing models and cultivate a sense of ownership in the local community, and (2) empowered deliberative action, in contextualized ways. The strengths and weaknesses of these organizations' efforts have implications for other groups of marginalized youth engaged in community development, especially in their attempts to pursue hybrid models of youth empowerment and community development and to achieve long-term sustainability and scale.

Los niños y las niñas migrantes latinoamericanos en la escuela Chilena. Etnografía en el patio de recreo de recreo: Jugando y tensionando identidades nacionales

La investigación de la cual da cuenta la ponencia buscó desdibujar los límites de las disciplinas y comprender desde las ciencias sociales el complejo vínculo entre la infancia latinoamericana y los movimientos migracionales.

El objetivo general de esta investigación fue describir el espacio social en el cual se articularon los discursos de las identidades de la población infantil, a partir de la interacción entre niños/as hijos/as de inmigrantes y niños/as chilenos/as en la Escuela República de Alemania, durante el segundo semestre del 2009.

Este primer trabajo de investigación, permitió dar cuenta, desde un análisis socio-histórico y cultural de la realidad social, de la escuela como escenario donde se re-producen discursos de la modernidad; de las interacciones de los niños y las niñas, caracterizadas por relaciones de dominación (género, raza-etnia, nacionalidad), y de la identidad como construcción social donde se configuran procesos de diferenciación (nosotros/los otros) que generan relaciones de desigualdad y reproducen los discursos dominantes de la realidad chilena.

La identidad chilena se habría construido con un fuerte referente europeo, ilustrado y moderno, dada la inmigración blanca (europea), que habría sido uno de los elementos constitutivos de los discursos identitarios de la actual sociedad chilena moderna y exitosa; tratando, adicionalmente, de mantenerse distante de los países andinos, deslegitimando la diversidad cultural propia de sus propios territorios. Por otra parte, el componente indígena, negado y ocultado en este contexto vuelve a ser tensionado con los movimientos migracionales de origen latinoamericano.

De manera que la "voz propia" de la otredad latinoamericana, la visibilización de su realidad social incorporada en los niños y las niñas inmigrantes de la región, permite problematizar elementos señalados como esenciales de las identidades nacionales y devela los discursos hegemónicos en los cuales se han configurado los actores latinoamericanos en los últimos cinco siglos.

Displays of crime victimization in criminal justice organizational settings

This paper analyses how individuals present themselves as crime victims and interact with criminal justice agents in organizational settings. The study relies on observations done through the daily life in a number of settings in the Greater Brasília metropolitan region: a) civil police stations; b) law-court forums, and c) one Public Safety Council (CONSEG) meeting. Based on such records, the analysis aims to understand the obstacles that arise in the observed encounters. Preliminarily, it is possible to conclude that such obstacles refer to alienation of participants from interaction – a deviance of participants' attention from the process of communication towards: a) formal aspects of encounter, referring to standards shared within criminal justice bureaucratic network; b) the victims, in connection to aphasic emotional states they display; c) the victims, due to demographic profiling by officers, who resource specially to gender, economic class and age categories.

Is mass society a threat to representative democracy? Revisiting David Riesman's theory of the other-directed character

Since Montesquieu, representative democracy has been based on the idea that interest groups form parliaments through competitive elections, and majority coalitions legislate in favour of their supporters. Declining electoral participation, rise of non-interest based right-wing parties, contingent coalitions, personalized electoral success and scandal-driven media presentation of politics indicate a fundamental crisis in representative democracy. Mass society theories that flourished after the Second world war, still current in political diagnostics of advanced liberalism, predicted a decline of representative democracy on the basis of homogenisation of mass consumption societies. Alluding to pre-war experiences, the mass society threat was seen to involve totalitarian rule combined with highly organized bureaucracy serving the interests of elites, especially the military industrial complex. This paper examines the underlying presuppositions of mass society theory, and argues that the homogeneity argument is insufficient to fit the realities of advanced liberal societies. Following David Riesman, it is emphasized that the other-directed character grows from unstable interest group identities, but its most important determinant is not sameness but agency and therefore difference. To have agency is to orient oneself to others as a self, as unique, separate and autonomous subject. This is vindicated by trends in public administration since the 1980s, which stress citizens' self-control, autonomy and partnership with the public sector rather than conformity and authoritarianism. Instead of interest conflicts, political disputes arise around contradictions between difference and autonomy in societies where agency is a fundamental principle of justification. Universal autonomy requires homogeneity but agency stresses difference and uniqueness.

Deconstructing and reifying "Asian" and ethnicities in Asia: Exploring HUGO pan-Asian SNP consortium's work

Over the last decade, advances in work in human genomics in Asia have been rapid and expanding. In 2009, the HUGO Pan-Asian SNP Consortium, an international research team led by Edison Liu of the Genome Institute of Singapore, mapped genetic variation and migration patterns in 73 Asian populations, with data coming from 11 Asian countries: Japan, Korea, China, Taiwan, Singapore, Thailand, Indonesia, Philippines, Malaysia, Thailand, and India. The main results – that "there is substantial genetic proximity of SEA [Southeast Asian] and EA [East Asian] populations – were published in Science (The Hugo Pan-Asian Consortium, 2009). In other words, the publication highlighted genetic "similarity" among Asians. In this paper, drawing on document analysis and in-depth personal interviews with key human geneticists in Singapore and in Japan who participate in the Hugo Pan-Asian Consortium, I explore the role of ethnicities in the HUGO Pan-Asian SNP Consortium's genomic work at different stages. Three findings are highlighted: (1) ethnicity was used as a proxy for genetic diversity in the DNA sampling, (2) ethnicity was significant in facilitating collaboration of labs between different nation-states in Asia, and (3) the "findings" of ethnic differences genetically potentially allows pharmaceutical companies to enter the markets of various nation-states in Asia. This paper suggests the HUGO Pan-Asian SNP consortium's work simultaneously undermines and reifies the biological bases of the social notions of race and ethnicity.

Pronatalist policies in the context of a liberal familial welfare system in Asia

In the context of the rapidly declining fertility that comes with modernization, what might be the shifting roles of state and family in caring for children? This paper attempts to answer this question by drawing on the conceptual framework of "liberal familism", and semi-structured personal interviews and focus-group discussions with Singaporean citizens regarding their views, opinions, and lived experiences with respect to the state's population policies aimed at encouraging childbearing among citizens.

Major findings include that current incentives are perceived only as short-term benefits with very limited effects, as interviewees consider childbearing a long-term commitment and want more direct and universal state subsidies (particularly in the realm of education). At the same time, respondents remain convinced that their own family members would be the best caregivers for young children, and that the unavailability of such informal support hinders positive childbearing decision-making. While the second demographic transition in Europe has been theorized as a function of individualization, life-style choice, and transformation of intimacy, this paper suggests that the persistent low fertility in Singapore despite its pronatalist policies is remarkably a function of the liberal familist welfare regime and the underdeveloped role of the state in care provision.

Poverty eradication and women's empowerment: A sociological setting of social capital & self-help groups

This paper synthesizes the theoretical issues and debatable questions arise from the critiques of the concept of development and substantiate with the field data. Attempts have been made to highlight the complex and often paradoxical assumptions behind policies and programmes of development in the perspective of social capital and the SHG that provides a practical introduction to the task of applying Women in Development (WID) and Gender and Development (GAD) frameworks followed by microcredit strategies. Drawing on the socialist-feminist perspective, the GAD approach argues that women's status in society is deeply affected by their material conditions of life and by their position in the national, regional, and global economies. The fundamental objectives of any development programme are to accomplish gender equality and gender justice. The economic growth impact is not uniform across countries. Development through the SHG became an alternative innovation in meeting the credit needs of the poor in general and poor women in particular in order to enable them to cross the threshold of poverty by exploiting economic opportunities that they can perceive. Development theorists hold that the SHG represents the process by which "social capital" as distinct from financial assets, machinery, land and other resources has now become critical for development. The social capital theory advocates that women are stronger in bonding, and the self-help group mechanisms are well-built among women. The SHG serve as social collateral and are together accountable for day-to-day business of the SHG-the mechanism of poverty eradication. The women members of the SHGs resemble more with the contrastive explanation of the social action offered by the feminist economists that is the model of non-deterministic multi-dimensionality and relatedness in which both material and non-material motivations drive human behaviour. This framework is also referred to as the "empowerment approach" or "gender-aware planning" for poverty eradication.

Public-private partnerships and micro health insurance schemes in India: A sociological perspective

This paper is an attempt to look at the socio-economic features, and health seeking behaviours of the lower income group and their involvement in the functioning of the micro health insurance schemes. The model micro health insurance as a mechanism of social capital is examined its strength to create a good "health for all". In other words, it focuses on the importance of public (government) intervention to create a feasible health care systems with the partnership of private both for-profit and non-for-profit sector, so that, the micro health insurance schemes profitable for the vulnerable sections of society. More precisely, practicable schemes for better health can be created by the intensive involvement of public and private, by which willingness-to-pay for health can be possible by the lower income groups. Despite increasing acknowledgement that social capital is an important determinant of health and overall well-being, empirical evidence regarding the direction and strength of public-private linkages in the developing world is limited and inconclusive. An increased contribution from the community has been identified as an important financing option. To date, however, there has been little systematic documentation or analysis of experiences with different health financing methods. Currently, the health sector is unable to meet the growing needs of the population and is severely financially constrained. The study estimates the impact of the program on trust and cooperation in rural communities. It is important to emphasize that the study does not separate the direction of causality between trust and cooperation. The analysis treats both aspects of social capital equally in the impact study public and private inter-linkages for better health facilities of the Indian society.

The language of human rights: Construction of memory and attitudes toward torture in contemporary Argentina

The process of democratization after the last military dictatorship in Argentina (1976-1983) has been influenced by human rights organizations' relentless efforts to bring about truth and justice and to keep the memory of human rights abuses alive. A key goal of these efforts is to ensure that state-sponsored atrocities (including torture, disappearance, and appropriation of children) are "never again" committed. Human rights advocacy and protest have permeated public discourse and influenced different democratic governments' policies and initiatives (e.g. promoting human rights education, creating special commemoration days, joining the international convention against torture, bringing accused perpetrators to trial, supporting the creation of sites of memory, and sponsoring various cultural events). These actions and the ideologies that emanate from them contribute to the discursive context in which human rights violations are interpreted by individuals in contemporary Argentina.

This paper examines the importance of the language of human rights in shaping memory about the dictatorship and informing attitudes toward torture in Argentina. The analysis is based on twenty in-depth interviews (part of a broader cross-national study conducted during 2007-2010) with adult men and women from across the political spectrum in Argentina, who were members of diverse civic, religious, political, non-profit, and community organizations. No matter the political orientation (from the most radical to the most conservative), all of the interviewees condemned torture. Yet the language and frames they employed and the narratives surrounding political events varied. These accounts expose the conflicted terrain of memory construction: the rhetorical work of making sense of individual biography in relation to a disturbing political past, efforts to reconcile personal ethics and concrete responses to human rights abuses, and the persistence of core ideological values and discourses, some of which do not always smoothly fit with current expressions of human rights support and condemnation of torture.

Politicization or continued quiescence?: The Fukushima nuclear disaster and the labor movement in Japan

This paper examines the Japanese labor movement's responses to the nuclear disaster at the Fukushima Daiichi Power Plant, focusing on inter-union debates over the nuclear energy issues, and on the influence of anti-nuclear social movements on the labor movement.

The nuclear disaster has activated the anti-nuclear energy movements to an unprecedented degree. Many protest meetings, demonstrations, and sit-ins were held all over Japan, mobilizing relatively large numbers of people by the standard of Japanese social movements.

Compared to social movements, the response of the labor movement, particularly the mainstream Rengo, was ambiguous, because it has avoided serious debates over the nuclear energy issues among its affiliates. Rengo's affiliates are divided between a pro-nuclear energy group (consisting of the unions of electric power companies and those in manufacturing industries) and an anti-nuclear energy group (mainly consisting of the unions of public-sector employees, teachers, and transportation workers). This division of opinions makes it difficult for Rengo to come up with a clear stance on the issues of nuclear energy and future energy policies in general. The paper examines the logics behind two groups' arguments for and against nuclear energy, and how Rengo reconciled the different viewpoints. The paper also examines the influence of the anti-nuclear movements on labor unions, particularly those in the anti-nuclear energy group. The latter unions may become politicized and become critical of the Rengo leadership for not taking a clear position on the issues.

Although a future prospect of the Japanese labor movement is not clear at this point, the paper argues that the politicization of the labor movement is a likely outcome as workers and their family members become increasingly aware of serious economic and public-health consequences of the nuclear plant disaster.

Locating climate controversies: Mapping climate change policy network in India during 2007-2010

In today's world, humankind is facing the toughest challenge of climate change. Over the years, international protocols, from Kyoto to Cancun, failed to attain the desired consensus on climate change governance. Moreover, a strong debate is gradually surfacing on the pattern of future climate governance models between developed (Global North) and developing countries (Global South). Under growing international pressure in the recent past, India has taken some important steps towards climate change governance to address domestic level problem particularly during 2007-2010.

With this backdrop, the study investigates how is social network structure (composition of actors, power relations within the network) associated with policy positions related to India's climate change during 2007-2010? Moreover, the study examines the degree of differences in the structure and content of national policy and networks output related to policy outcomes with particular reference to National Action Plan on Climate Change.

The theoretical perspective of the study follows environmental governance along with epistemic community approach and organizational state perspective in particular. The study is based on qualitative methodology and the main data collection methods were in-depth interviews of key informants, literature review of policy papers and content analysis of newspaper and web articles.

The study concludes that there are several long-term, unsolved governance issues which hinder the potentials of the national climate change action plan. The overall governance crisis involves inadequate participation of actors, top-down approach of policy making, disputes between different actors and stakeholders, and poor policy and law enforcement guidelines.

Édition indépendante, espace publique et transition politique au Chili

Ce travail porte sur la manière par laquelle le monde de l'édition constitue un révélateur du type de transition politique vécue au Chili à partir de 1990, en dévoilant ses tensions, ses ambiguïtés et ses espaces de possible. Depuis P. Bourdieu[1] que l'édition constitue un espace de luttes entre agents qui entretiennent différents rapports avec le pouvoir. Il s'agit d'un carrefour qui nous permet d'observer différents aspects de la vie sociale : l'éducation, les politiques publiques du livre et de la lecture, les différents degrés de régulation de la circulation des biens symboliques, les droits d'auteur, l'internationalisation de la production éditoriale nationale, tout en renvoyant finalement au problème de la très forte inégalité d'accès à la culture, et en particulier à la lecture, pratique culturelle légitime par excellence.

Les transformations des vingt dernières années à l'échelle mondiale, caractérisées par le retour à la démocratie (dans beaucoup des pays d'Europe de l'Est et d'Amérique Latine) sur le plan politique et par des phénomènes d'intensification des échanges au niveau économique, ont généré un nouveau paysage dans le champ de l'édition caractérisé par une recomposition de l'espace éditorial international[2]. Ce marché évolue dans le sens d'une concentration croissante des différentes marques entre les mains de quelques consortiums. Nous voudrions ainsi analyser les stratégies de promotion des processus d'élaboration de politiques culturelles publiques menés par le secteur de l'édition indépendante au Chili au cours des dernières années. Il s'agirait de faire apparaître les rapports et les conditions qui rendent possible ces liens entre marché, Etat et agents culturels dans un cadre mondial de globalisation éditorial.

SYNNOTT, Anthony* (Sociology of the body; men's studies, synnott@alcor.concordia.ca)

Being, having and doing: Theorizing and living bodies

We are our bodies. We have our bodies. We do our bodies. This is axiomatic and our starting point. It also constitutes our bodies as subject, object and project; or, in another terminology, self, other and action. Certainly we may be more than our bodies, but we are, never the less, embodied. This trichotomous shamrock theory of the body is also unitary since since we are, have and do our bodies continually and simultaneously, and we only have one each.

With this practical framework we explore some of the principal sociological, and other, theories of the body: Sartre on the body as self, and Goffman on its presentation; again, the emergence of Social Psychology and Disability Studies debated the relation between body and self. Second, Descartes on the body as object, machine, and his mechanism has been foundational to bio-medicine until the essay by Engel(1977) on the need to develop a sociopsychobio-medicine and the rise of Medical Sociology; this conceptualization has also been developed by some feminist authors on the objectification of female bodies and critiquing the male gaze, and more recently on the self-objectification by women. The body as project was argued particularly by Giddens and in a different way by Bourdieu, Bromberg, but also by de Beauvoir (on beautification), Foucault (the production of the docile body) and Butler on performance. Featherstone has worked on body modification.

The intersectionality of body with gender, race, class and ability is also a matter of interest in creating very different social constructions of the body. Furthermore, the body fights back: what the body does to us is as critical as what we do to our bodies: our bodies age us and eventually kill us. This is the triumph of the object over the subject, whatever the project.

Networks, public, and governance in transition to bioeconomy: Turkish case and co-production of knowledge

Biotechnology is gaining more and more importance within the increasing interest on economical investment. Although this kind of economical activity requiring intensive knowledge became mainly widespread in North America and Europe, we can say that developing countries are getting more and more articulated to this network of knowledge. Turkey making an important progress in the field of economy in recent years is one of these countries. An official document "Vision 2023" aiming to map out the economical development in future gives high priority to production of knowledge on life sciences. It especially focuses on the use of biotechnology on the field of health and the creation of an independent economical activity depending on genetics and molecular biology. On the other hand we can state that regulations are limited and insufficient in policy level, and they come from behind the scientific and economical efforts. This development carrying some controversial issues like the status of living entity is not yet the part of public discourse, and this causes unawareness of society on the proliferation of these technologies. Some keep distance; some are enthusiastic towards these new economical activities. In this sense, the themes of production of new knowledge, governance, and public participation in the matter of instrumentalisation of life sciences through the technology intertwine in Turkish case. The purpose of this session is to show how different areas interrelate with respect to new knowledge and its use in economy through the Turkish case. The reflections of the document "Vision 2023" will be analyzed in the light of numbers from Turkish economy, and some controversial issues in the public discourse, approaching to genetic knowledge from an ethical perspective will be discussed within the dynamics of production of scientific knowledge in national level.

Transformation of body and subjectivity in transition from molar language to molecular language: Pre-natal diagnosis and medical gaze on female body

Medical technologies shaping the body are not only effective material tools, but also the means and techniques of transformation of the notions like self, subject, body, society or social. For example radiology made huge impact on the diagnoses of illnesses, but on the other hand it affected deeply the transformation of health institution, the relationship of individuals with life and health, and as a result, social relations. Today, we can talk about a change on very nature of these technologies creating new realities, not concrete or actual, but rather virtual and probabilistic. Virtual realities are not a matter of statistical inference, of pure deduction like that of old technologies; but its truth is an outcome of formal modeling, pre-programming, and digitalization. The goal of these technologies is simply to control as perfectly and seamlessly as possible all conceivable outcomes in advance. Here, it is determined not only an organic, total change in body, but also every little difference in molecular level. All technology of body is translated from molar language to molecular language. In this sense, it is not simply based on principle of efficiency, but of 'pre-efficiency'. Pre-natal diagnosis is the best example of this shift. It is not only a useful tool for preemption of diseases, but also a technique showing this shift from molar to molecular. By operating on female body, it changes the mode of subjectivity of women. Through this technology, institutional medical gaze gains transparency onto the female body. It affects the relationship of women with their body and identity, in this sense it identifies a new paradigm for responsibilities, rights, and obligations in contemporary society. The aim of this session is to show with specific cases how pre-natal diagnosis transforms the subjectivity, and particularly women's perception of life and world.

Visual imagination: An important competence of a sociologist

In the current phase of modernity the visible and hence observable surface of social life has become significantly enriched. Both the iconosphere (purposefully created images) and the visual sociosphere (the visual manifestations of social events) provide the opportunity for descriptive observation and explanatory interpretation, unravelling deep meanings, regularities and mechanisms of society. Hence the visual imagination becomes an important skill for every working sociologist, and not only for the representatives of a specific subdiscipline of „visual sociology“. By visual imagination I mean the skill of linking the sociological concepts, models and theories with their empirical, visually accessible denotations and connotations. This involves double, two-directional translation: (a) of sociological ideas into their concrete, observable manifestations in social life, and (b) of surrounding images and visual representations into sociological ideas. The first direction involves searching exemplification of concepts, models and theories of sociology in visual evidence (either existing iconography, or created by the sociologist e.g. by taking photographs). The second direction involves interpretation of images in sociological terms, unravelling their sociological meanings and relevance. I distinguish seven types of such interpretation which are described in the paper. The training of visual imagination is an important part of the methodological education of sociologists. For five years I have been leading a seminar and a laboratory where I apply several pedagogical strategies for that purpose: sending students to the field with sociologically defined photographic assignments, asking them to illustrate selected sociological texts with photographs, to interpret existing photographic resources (press photography, photo exhibitions, private collections, travel albums etc.) in various ways, but always in sociological terms, to select photographs particularly rich in sociological meaning and write an essay describing what the student perceives etc. These assignments are always followed by class discussions. In the paper I summarize my teaching experiences in detail, with illustrations.

Money, time and space: Intergenerational functional solidarity in a comparative perspective

Intergenerational transfers of money, time and space are important characteristics of parent-child relationships and manifestations of functional solidarity. Previous research reveals substantial differences in the prevalence of functional transfers to adult children in European countries, raising the question of connections between private and public intergenerational solidarity, between family support and welfare states. Apart from individual characteristics and family structures, especially institutional factors are important determinants for understanding different support levels both in regard to giving and taking. To date, the single types of solidarity have predominantly been analysed separately. Yet, a joint analysis of money, time and space transfers is essential in order to find out (1) whether the different forms of functional solidarity are substitutes or complements and (2) to identify different support patterns between and within countries.

Using the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe the impact of micro-, meso- and macro-structural factors in 14 countries (from Sweden to Italy, from Ireland to Poland) is investigated. On the basis of theoretical and empirical multilevel models, we pay special attention to cultural-contextual structures, focusing on welfare state transfers (like social and family expenditures) and other macro indicators (like GDP, non-marital births). The empirical analyses indicate that parents in familialistic and low-level service countries such as Poland, Italy and Spain predominantly support their adult children by providing living space, whereas in less familialistic and more generous welfare states such as the Netherlands, Denmark or Sweden parents rather provide time and monetary support. Moreover, our results reveal that the provision of living space substitutes time and money transfers. The latter, however, do complement each other: children who receive time support from their parents often get monetary help as well. Also, we find considerable gender differences when investigating influences of welfare states for private intergenerational solidarity.

The Swedish policies of mental health care as shown in collaboration

Ever since the de-institutionalization took its beginning in Sweden in the middle of the 20th century, the Swedish policy has been one of integrating persons with mental illness and/or disability in the surrounding society. In this, the responsibility for this client group's everyday life were put on the municipalities and the social care in contrast of earlier being the sole responsibility of the health care. During the 1990's, the individual's right to influence one's own care and life was strengthened in law and has since then been one of the major tasks appointed from the government to the mental health care. Further, there has also been a strong encouragement and a statutory for the organisations in mental health care (consisting of the social care and the health care) to collaborate to meet the client group's often-complex needs. To implement the policy of collaboration and of the clients' independence and autonomy, the government is steering through laws, policies, and recommendations. One of the recommendations is to form strategic collaboration councils with members from the concerned organisations.

This paper contains material from a study on strategic collaboration councils in psychiatric care. A part of the study will result in a thesis. The strategic collaboration councils studied are an interorganisational collaboration wherein managers from different organisations meet and discuss the strategic work round their joint client group: persons suffering from mental illness or disability. The material consists of a quantitative part wherein the participant members answered a questionnaire. The qualitative part consists of observations of the collaboration councils' meetings during one year as well as interviews conducted with the participants. In this paper, concern is given to what kinds of tasks, originated from the government, are assigned to the collaboration councils. How are the tasks handled and do the councils actually collaborate around them?

Two worldviews about human information and knowledge systems (HIKS). Towards an open knowledge democracy for global sustainability governance

Worldviews about the nature, purposes, and dynamics of Human Information and Knowledge Systems (HIKS) affect the nature, intended transformations and dynamics of global Social-Ecological Systems (SES) as well as our capacity to learn from and adapt to them. Modifying the core assumptions about HIKS –and the attendant practices related to these assumptions– is of paramount importance for the emergence of transformative pathways toward sustainability in research, education, and policy. In this paper, we identify and characterise two general ideal-type worldviews on HIKS and their relationships with SES within the contemporary Western science, education and policy domains. One worldview understands information and knowledge systems as abstract constructions which evolve in a closed, ahistorical, and social-ecologically disembodied space. Under this worldview, the integration of different forms of knowledge demands their reduction to a single form of representation. The other worldview understands information and knowledge systems as operating in an open space composed of multiple, diverse patterns of hybrid social-ecological practices and configurations –inevitably embedded in specific social-ecological contexts. We argue that the open, but socio-ecologically embodied worldview, is necessary to support a societal transformation towards a knowledge democracy capable to support global sustainability governance. We base our points by using the insights obtained in the following international projects: 'Global Systems Dynamics and Policy' (GSDP; www.gsdp.eu), 'Responses to Environmental & Societal Challenges for our Unstable Earth' (RESCUE; www.esf.org/rescue); 'Vision of Research & Development for Sustainable Development' (VISION; www.visionRD4SD) and 'Knowledge, Learning, and Societal Change: Finding Paths To a Sustainable Future' (KLSC; www.proclim.ch/4dcgi/klsc/en/newstyp?klsc-news).

Electoral conflict and the maturity of local democracy in Indonesia: Testing the modernisation hypothesis

There has been a rapid rise in the use of electoral processes to legitimise governments and Indonesia is not an exception. It is expected that elections provide a predictable and rule-bound method for channelling conflict constructively, reducing the need for political stakeholders to opt for violent alternatives. Ironically, widespread electoral violence has recently occurred in electoral processes in countries such as East Timor, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, Nigeria, Ethiopia, Kenya, and Zimbabwe. Indonesia could be added to the list, albeit with a lower scale of violence mainly found at the local level elections. It has been argued that electoral violence, to a large extent, remains a relatively under-researched field.

This paper constructs an electoral hostility index for 282 local direct elections (Pilkada) of district heads during 2005–07 and examines the socio-economic determinants of local democratic maturity in Indonesia. There are 67 Pilkada (out of 282) categorised as having medium, high or very high levels of electoral hostility. The picture is dominated by hostilities directed towards the local elections commission after voting day. The large sample quantitative analysis employs ordered logistic regression. The results show some evidence in support of the modernisation hypothesis in the context of Indonesia's local democracies. Higher Pilkada hostility or less mature local democracy tends to be experienced by districts with lower income, higher poverty incidence and less urbanised. The results also imply that democracy cannot be deepened in the absence of economic development.

Youth and social security coverage in Brazil

Despite still being a young country, starting a process of aging, the spending on social security in Brazil as a proportion of PIB is high, such as more demographically mature societies. Some researchers justify the high cost of the pension system as reductor of two factors: (a) the distributive character of the Brazilian social security, being instrumental in reducing individual and family poverty, and (b) the broad scope and coverage of its pension system. In fact, the effectiveness of security as a reduction of poverty was relevant until 2002, but lost efficiency thereafter. On the other hand, analyzing the data available in National Household Sample Survey (PNAD/IBGE), it turns out that, children, youth and young adults have low pension coverage directly and are also the groups most affected by poverty and extreme poverty in Brazil. The low coverage of these groups is one of the reasons why the instrument has lost force in the fight against poverty and extreme poverty. Given these issues, the research aims to contribute to the debate on the Brazilian social security system, pointing the way forward for the construction of specific public policies for children, youth and young adults in Brazil.

Perspectivas de la producción de conocimiento en recursos hídricos y la relación entre los organismos científico-tecnológicos y sociedad civil

El siglo XXI es presentado muchas veces como el siglo del agua o, incluso, como el de las guerras por el acceso a las fuentes de agua dulce. Esto parece tomar cada día más importancia debido a la desigual distribución natural y social de ese bien esencial para la vida, así como a su creciente degradación y contaminación. En ese escenario, la democratización del acceso al agua potable, las posibilidades de desarrollo tecnológico en torno al agua y la exposición poblacional a la contaminación, van a estar sumamente condicionados por los conocimientos técnicos en torno a los recursos hídricos, su correcto aprovechamiento, tratamiento y preservación así como a la interrelación que se logre entre dichos saberes y la sociedad civil. El rol de los organismos científico-tecnológicos será central para una gestión democrática de los bienes naturales, en especial el agua, y la relación que esos organismos entablen con la sociedad civil, así como su grado de dependencia del mercado, se convertirán en elementos fundamentales para analizar los futuros conflictos ambientales. La difícil relación entre la construcción de conocimiento, el mercado y la intervención del Estado se torna sumamente importante a la hora de analizar conflictos sociales por el agua, ya que el conocimiento científico se ve condicionado por diferentes factores y la relación entre "expertos" y la sociedad civil, en muchos casos, se presenta como lo que algunos autores han denominado "controversias socio-técnicas". El objetivo del presente trabajo es proponer un debate crítico de estas relaciones entre ciencia, Estado y sociedad en relación a los Recursos Hídricos y analizar sus implicancias actuales y perspectivas futuras.

Is life satisfaction same as happiness as the indicator of policy-making?

Now many political leaders focus more on subjective well-being as alternative to GDP than ever before. However, happiness studies often use life satisfaction to be interchangeable with happiness as a subject well-being indicator. Moreover, Helliwell and Putnam (2004) said that the 'life satisfaction' measure seems marginally better than the 'happiness' measure for the purposes of estimating the effects of relatively stable features of social context. It may lead to the fact that the OECD, the European Union, United Kingdom and Bhutan apply life satisfaction rather than happiness as their subjective well-being indicators. However, Kahneman and Deaton (2010), for instance, stated that "high income buys life satisfaction but not happiness". This leads us a question if life satisfaction is better than happiness as the indicator of policy-making.

We conducted small group interviews in seven regions and cities in Japan to examine if notion of life satisfaction and happiness are conceptually same. As a result, happiness claims relationship with family (including parents and children) and friends more. However, life satisfaction refers to individual issues and economic aspects such as income and job. In particular, Cantril's ladder life satisfaction is much connected to job. Our multiple regression analysis supports these results. Because political attention to subjective well-being aims at seeking alternative to GDP, measurement to correlate strongly with material condition is less meaningful for policy making. Our result reveals that happiness is more proper measurement for alternative to GDP than life satisfaction for policy purpose.

Would you trust the pension system?

Studies on social capital often suggest that trust towards administration and the trust towards political system are connected to the level of generalized trust (i.e. trust towards other people). It has also been stated, that the level of trust is higher in Nordic countries where the social security system is universal – comprehensive, developed and complex – maybe more so than in some other Western countries. Thus, it is a known fact that at the beginning and the end of their life span, people typically consume more than they produce. This results in a deficit, which is covered by direct and indirect reallocations of income from the working-age population. The Finnish pension system is based on the pay-as-you-go principal and partial funding. It is mainly the working population that pays for the benefits of the retired population. Each generation thus receives funding for their pensions from the younger generation.

Drawing on a nationally representative data (N = 2495) that was collected by the Finnish Centre for Pensions during the summer of 2011 this paper explores the trust towards the Finnish pension system. The set of data allows analysis on how the Finnish pension system is seen through the eyes of Finnish citizens. The data provides a unique insight to the differences in how different people relate to the system in terms of their background. This paper outlines differences in trust according to gender and age but also socioeconomic factors such as education, occupation and income.

Economic crisis and Brazilian immigrants in Japan: The role of social inclusion policies for immigrants

Social inclusion and integration of immigrants into the host society has drawn much attention among policy makers and immigration scholars. Citizenship and welfare policies for immigrants should be considered when it comes to social inclusion of immigrants in settler societies. Such discussion has focused on citizenship and welfare policies for immigrants in North American and European countries, whereas few studies did so in Asian countries, some of which are regarded as recent countries of immigration such as China, Japan, Korea, Singapore, and Taiwan. While in the postwar period, welfare states appear to control the market economy, globalization has weakened the state control for market economy. In the 21st century, we are faced with frequent economic turbulence that results largely from globalized financial market uncontrolled by welfare states. American debt crisis that started in 2007 have affected economic conditions across the world, leading to negative outcomes in employment among immigrants. Japan started to accept a large number of immigrants from other countries in 1980s, whereas citizenship and welfare policies that help immigrants integrate into the mainstream society are lacking because the Japanese government has regarded immigrant workers from foreign countries as temporary residents rather than permanent settlers. Nevertheless, many contingent workers including immigrant workforces were dismissed in 2008 because demand for products in the export-oriented manufacturing industry shrank rapidly. The Japanese government had to cope with a massive increase in the unemployed. This made the Japanese government initiate a kind of active labor market programs for unemployed immigrant workers. This study focuses on the integration programs for unemployed Latin American workers run by the Japanese government. Although I find some moderate changes in policies for immigrants after this economic crisis, I investigate whether and to what extent this policy changes contributed to improvement in socioeconomic marginalization among Brazilian immigrants in Japan.

Institutional arrangements and social capital: Brazilian immigrants in Japan and their chances for upward mobility

Previous literatures on immigration have highlighted the important role social capital of immigrants played in international migration and in adaptation into the host society. American immigration scholars emphasized the importance of bonding social capital with coethnics and families. Some immigrant groups establish ethnic enclave, where immigrant entrepreneurs are spatially concentrated, and they provide newly arrived immigrants with jobs and training opportunities. In contrast, several immigration scholars in Europe suggested that the manner in which immigrants deploy different forms of social capital depends on institutional context in which immigrants are incorporated. For instance, in Sweden, as citizenship and welfare policies for immigrants provide unemployed migrant workers with a sufficient amount of information and resources that help them get a new job, immigrants do not need to rely on social capital. In addition, bonding social capital may not help immigrants living outside the ethnic enclave and ethnic economy. In several countries where a small proportion of immigrants are entrepreneurs, bridging social capital with the mainstream population plays a greater role in connecting immigrants to useful information in the larger society. This paper focuses on Brazilian immigrants in Japan because little is known about the role of immigrant's social capital in different institutional settings outside North American and European countries. Institutional characters specific to Japan include the increasing segmentation and polarization of the labor market between the primary and the secondary sector. Japanese Brazilian immigrants have been incorporated into the highly unstable, temporary employment sector controlled by labor dispatching agencies, while citizenship and welfare policies for immigrants are lacking in Japan. Given these institutional contexts of Brazilian immigrants in Japan, I examine whether and to what extent different forms of social capital such as bonding and bridging affect the likelihood of transition into the stable employment sector.

The problem of order of urban subcultural groups: A case study of Japanese sex industry and a shopping center organization in mid-Tokyo's amusement district, Kabukichō

The aim of this paper is to approach "the problem of order of subcultural groups", derived from Claude S. Fischer's "Subcultural Theory of Urbanism", by analyzing a shopping center organization in Mid-Tokyo's amusement district, Kabukichō, which is the most famous city in Japan for accommodating a number of sex industry shops. "The problem of order of subcultural groups" can be summarized as the problem of how urban society, consisting of various subcultural groups, can avoid collapsing despite its presence within a highly unstable situation. Therefore, Kabukichō, a kind of "red light district", can be an appropriate case to explore the problem of order of subcultural groups for among various subcultural groups sex industry is doubtlessly not least "unconventional".

For this purpose of this study, the following methods were adopted: (1) interviewing members of the shopping center organization, shop-owners, officers of the local government and the police, (2) participant observation in various activities such as meetings and patrol activities of the shopping center organizations and (3) surveying official/unofficial documents and statistics.

It was found that the shopping center organization in Kabukichō has dualistic organization, consisting of both "The Shopping Center Promotion Union" and "Chō-kai-s (communities of shoppers)". Under dualistic organization, the shopping center organization has dual membership criteria and activity zoning. And each member of the organization treats sex industry shops in diverse manners from complete tolerance to severe intolerance. The organization has a Janus-like nature to it, which is to say, a nature that mediates between the sex industries and the local government that tries to avoid them at any cost. Because of its dualistic organization, the shopping center organization can achieve a very delicate balance between various actors under the situation that Kabukichō accommodates many sex industry shops.

Los rituales del cuerpo: Resignificando la vejez a través del danzón en la ciudad de México

La presente investigación responde, en términos de relevancia al envejecimiento progresivo de la población mundial. El objetivo principal es dar cuenta a través de un trabajo etnográfico de la influencia que el baile como práctica cultural tiene sobre los cuerpos así como de su potencial para revertir percepciones negativas de la vejez entre los sujetos practicantes. El estudio entra en diálogo en una dinámica de 'inversión posmoderna' que sitúa las identidades en el cuerpo y a una multiplicidad de técnicas corporales, performances estéticas y rituales así como prácticas de cuidado y salud de los cuerpos que caracterizan a la sociedad contemporánea. A través de una etnografía desde la experiencia de los cuerpos en adultos mayores buscamos comprender desde una perspectiva fenomenológica la aceptación y el disfrute que los sujetos expresan en relación a un cuerpo envejecido a partir del baile como práctica específica. En términos metodológicos se incorporan planteamientos de la etnografía urbana por su potencial para captar la dinámica del cambio cultural desde la experiencia y las prácticas de los sujetos. Para tal efecto tomamos como referente empírico al danzón por el tipo de interacciones que genera en el aspecto colectivo y en el individual por sus efectos en las prácticas corporales.

Participación ciudadana, revueltas árabes e indignados, en el cambio social Primero Argel y Bahrein. Siguió Túnez, Egipto, Jordania y Marruecos, Yemén y Siria. En Omán e Irán, sus gobiernos enfrentaron manifestaciones de ciudadanos contra el régimen. Enero 2011 marcó la irrupción de una revolución ciudadana con características globales. Cuatro meses después, el 15 M, en otra parte del mundo, los "indignados" irrumpen en la Puerta de Sol en Madrid. ¿Qué está pasando aquí? Muchas movilizaciones se definen genéricamente como revueltas democráticas, pero otras articulan demandas sociales específicas, contra la avaricia y la corrupción: "Europa de gentes no de mercaderes" rezaba una consigna.

El objetivo de este trabajo es en primer lugar reflexionar a raíz de estas movilizaciones globales, el papel de la ciudadanía como objeto de estudio y como concepto teórico, en la formación de procesos revolucionarios. Por un lado, debatirá algunas visiones sobre la ciudadanía neoliberal (Fukuyama y Huntignton), que caracterizan la naturaleza democrática y neutralidad ideológica de los movimientos ciudadanos en Oriente Medio. Así, desplazan, a veces arbitrariamente, el carácter de clase de estas revueltas en la formación de proyectos sociales de ciudadanía alternativos. Por otro lado, enfoques de izquierda radicalizada desdeñan aspectos culturales de la revuelta y la lucha por libertades democráticas de ciudadanos a la que caracterizan despectivamente como "occidentalizada".

En contraste, este trabajo se propone, en segundo lugar, reflexionar la construcción social de la ciudadanía resultado de un proceso complejo, cultural y político, plenamente conflictivo, erigido en procesos desiguales y combinados de lucha de clases, conflictos étnicos e ideológicos, y distintas experiencias de penetración imperialista. Esto mostraría lo que Fukuyama dice no poder entender: "¿Por qué la yesca de la dignidad ultrajada se encendió repentinamente hoy y no hace diez años antes, y por qué la conflagración se extendió a unos países árabes y no a otros?"

Nationalization, modernization and 'reductive media'

Globalization can be characterized by processes in which people, things, money and information move freely on a worldwide scale and as a result countries and people become homogenized and also differentiated. In the formation of a nation-state, there took place processes analogical to globalization. People, things, etc. moved on a nationwide scale and domestic regions and people became homogenized and also differentiated (e.g. regional division of industries, formation of social classes). The whole processes can be called 'nationalization'.

Nationalization has almost been used to mean 'nationalization of industry'. However, by regarding it as a much more comprehensive one as above, we would be able to understand the formation of a nation-state much more accurately. Globalization can be now served as a mirror to understand 'nationalization'.

It's also important to differentiate 'nationalization' from 'modernization'. A. Giddens considered that modernization is based on 'disembedding'. However, the problem is how to conceptualize 'local contexts of social interactions' where people were embedded. Simply speaking, they can be thought as 'existences'.

Accordingly, disembedding can be thought to separate people from various 'existences' in which they have been embedded for a long time. Modernization is a process in which 'existences' no longer determine 'actions', but 'actions' regard 'existences' as means and/or obstacles. In other words, 'predominance of actions over existences' has led us to modernization.

Why did 'predominance of actions' take place? The answer can be prepared by introducing the concept of 'reductive media' (violence, religion, money, science, environment, etc.) which reduce 'existences' to something.

These reductive media have been conflicting or allying with each other. 'Predominance of actions' has advanced through such conflicts and has been accelerated by the dominance of money and science as reductive media.

By utilizing concepts of 'nationalization' and 'reductive media', we can picture history much more comprehensively.

Questionable theoretical statements on racism

In theory of sociology, ethnology, social anthropology has developed a well-established postulate of the fact that a person defines their ethnicity on the cultural opposition to the "I-They" or "We-They", i.e. in fact, to a man identified himself as a Russian, he is obliged to oppose the "other" or Jew, or a Georgian, etc. Obviously, this initially quite reasonable binary opposition, today is absolutely not corresponds to the actual practice.

In order for a person to identify with a particular ethnic group, do not need a someone to oppose. The ethnic identity is shaped by human interaction with the bearers of a particular culture, community, group, in which he is, as a result of the fundamental communication with other systems, institutions, communities and groups. Not necessarily the other ethnic group, it could be any other social institutions. For example, the state.

Moreover, the current opposition can be attributed to the position of a racist nature. If a person is a priori "programmed" by contrast, it means that it will always refer to "their" best and the "other" worse.

Perhaps this is a theoretical proposition generated a series of negative developments, which are fixed in the modern world, more and more:

- 1) The phenomenon of ethnophobia;
- 2) The myth of "ethnic exclusivity";
- 3) The program of "ethnic purification".

The task of the modern sociology – is overcoming of such understanding.

Art worlds in transitional societies: An actor-network theory (ANT) perspective on art and social change in China

Actor-Network Theory (ANT), a theory most closely associated with the study of science and technology, has potential theoretical and methodological applicability to the sociology of art. ANT posits that both human and non-human actors (such as artifacts, technology, and documents) possess agency, and argues that their interactions shape action and meaning. This study examines how ANT can contribute to an analysis of the development of commercial art galleries in mainland China. Examining the interactions among China's growing networks of artists, dealers, collectors, galleries, and art in the context of rapid social transformation and economic reform, it highlights the role that such networks play in the demolition of socialist-era spaces and meanings, as well as their contribution to discourses and practices of creativity in the global economy. By providing a framework for studying how the new art world networks emerge and evolve, an ANT approach can expand conceptualizations of art and creativity during periods of rapid social historical transformation. At the same time, the paper highlights some of the limits in previous attempts to use ANT to study social phenomena and suggests ways to remedy these deficiencies while preserving the insights of the approach for the sociology of art.

The concept of the working class and China's social stratification

This paper investigates the emergence and the meaning of the concept of the working class in China. The paper first traces the various meanings and the usage of the Chinese character gong工 (labour) in both ancient and modern China. Given such a background understanding, the paper discusses and compares China's social stratification in the past and the present, with an emphasis on the continuity as well as the discontinuity of the artisan class in the ancient China and the working class of the present. It is hoped that such a sketch of the conceptual place of the working class in China's social imaginary could help us better understand the status and the situation of the working class in Chinese society nowadays.

German parliamentary elections 2009, participation outcomes, and proposals for the future

Five German leading parties and their coalitions are evaluated from the viewpoint of direct democracy. For this purpose, the positions of the parties on over 30 topical issues are compared with results of public opinion polls. The outcomes are summarized in the party indices of popularity (average percentage of population represented) and universality (percentage of issues with majority representation). The selection of issues and the information on party positions are given for the last Bundestag elections 2009.

It is shown that the election winner 2009, the conservative CDU/CSU, has a quite low representativeness (ranked fourth), whereas the most representative is the left party die Linke which received only 11.9% votes. It is concluded that voters are not very consistent with their own political profiles, disregard party manifestos, and are likely driven by political traditions, even if outdated, or by personal images of politicians. A possible explanation is that the spectrum of the German political landscape has significantly shifted to the right, whereas voters still believe that the parties represent the same values as a few decades ago.

Taking into account the results of the study, some modifications to the election procedure are proposed to bridge approaches of representative and direct democracy. It is suggested to introduce the third vote in the form of 'sample referenda' with voters' Yes/No opinions on several important issues from party manifestos. It meets the existing logic of the German two-vote system: the first vote for a person, the second vote for a party, and the third vote for party profiles, so that the considerations are getting to be more conceptual and less personified.

Sociology of art and comparative civilisation

Some trends in recent sociology of art have sought a rapprochement with styles of analysis characteristic of art history. This paper seeks to develop the dialogue between the sociology of art, art history and social theory by proposing a genuinely synthetic research programme in comparative historical sociology of art. I develop the framework for this programme by staging two dialogues, first between the art historian Heinrich Wölfflin and the sociologist Max Weber, then between the sociologist of art Robert Witkin and the social theorist Shmuel Eisenstadt. I argue that far from being the arch formalist of stereotypical sociological critiques, Wölfflin developed an incipiently sociological orientation to art, which had certain affinities with Max Weber's cultural sociology. Robert Witkin's account of the relationship between style and social structure emerges out of the same critical idealist tradition as informed the work of both Wölfflin and Weber, but gives it a strongly Durkheimian twist which is at once a strength and a weakness. By returning to that critical idealist tradition, and synthesising Witkin with the strongly Weberian comparative civilizational approach of Eisenstadt, I seek to formulate a conceptual framework for a strong comparative historical sociology of art which could bring some analytical rigour to the confused field of 'World art studies'.

Power, resistance, and mobilizing affect through art: Barrelism of Chandraguptha Thenuwara

This paper examines the significance of visual culture as a mode of resistance to state power. Works of art function to naturalize, as well as expose and undermine the powerful constructions of reality by hegemonic powers such as the state. To illuminate the nature of subversive power inherent in visual activism, this paper analyzes the works of Chandraguptha Thenuwara, a leading Sri Lankan artist, who takes war and violence in Sri Lanka as his subject matter. It explores the ways in which his art mobilizes affect and makes us recognize our complicity in "militarization," thus invoking resistance to violence and injustice. Thenuwara has coined the term, "barrelism," to describe his distinct form of artistic practice that serves as a mode of resistance to the coercive images of war deployed by the state. Claiming that the barrels used by the military are dominating the landscape around us and obstructing our view, Thenuwara has strived to capture the reality of current situation in Sri Lanka in his "barrelscapes." His art serves to unmask the violence of war that is made invisible by a hegemonic nationalist discourse deployed by the state and a coercive form of media censorship operating within the country. In using the paraphernalia of war such as barbed wire, camouflage, and barrels as art, Thenuwara seeks to denaturalize and defamiliarize these objects, which have become a part of everyday reality, asking the viewer to interrogate his/her relationship to the reality constructed by the powerful ideology of militarism of the state that naturalizes a violent militaristic solution to the conflict. Thenuwara is thus asking the viewer to confront and resist a powerful construction of war that the militarization of society has normalized with the aim of achieving social justice.

Industry, occupation and income inequality in global cities and rural area

The aim of this paper is to consider the theory of Saskia Sassen from her work The Global City regarding relationship between industry, occupation structure and wage inequality and to test her hypothesis on the case of prefectures in Japan. According to this hypothesis, as an effect of globalization, industries such as professional services, IT and banking grow in global cities, while the secondary industry related to middle class decline. Furthermore, these industrial changes give rise to the expansion of both upper (managers and professionals) and lower service occupations (sales and services), and this consequently increases the wage inequality in the global cities. Although she rarely address any other regions but global cities, extending this hypothesis would imply that Tokyo is more de-industrialized, the bipolarization of service occupations and hence also wage inequality is higher than in other regions. Using the census data and Basic Survey on Wage Structure, we test the applicability of this hypothesis on Japan.

Both surveys are conducted every 5 years and we use data for 5 rounds for years 1985 to 2005. We use Gini coefficient for respective prefectures and years as indicator of wage inequality and use this as dependent variable in so called hybrid method of fixed and random effects model. By doing so, we can estimate the effect of time varying predictor variables (the share of industries and service occupations) but also the effect of global city as a time invariant predictor of wage inequality.

Although longitudinal data needs to be analyzed yet, analyses of 2005 data have not shown strong support for Sassen's hypothesis. This might suggest that growing inequality as a result of de-industrialization and bipolarization of service occupations is not characteristic for Tokyo when regarding also the development in other regions of Japan.

State sovereignty and changing migrant profiles in Japan

It has been often argued that globalisation of migration challenges state sovereignty all over the world since mid-1980s. Such globalisation seems to be strengthened further in diversification of migrant profiles especially. But, the hypothesis of sovereignty challenge may fit Western world well rather than other areas. This paper will focus on an East Asian country, Japan, to reconsider the hypothesis of challenges to state sovereignty in terms of migrant profiles. Japan retains a dogma of no introduction of unskilled workers from abroad and acceptance of skilled immigrants only. But recently it has experienced some novel issues in migration against the dogma. Firstly, Japan began to introduce nurses and care workers (so-called care immigrants) to fill labour shortage for reproduction. Secondly, it allows Japanese companies to accept workers from Thailand after flood gave huge damage to Japanese factories there. Thirdly, in the serious recession triggered by Lehman Shock, a large part of Japanese Brazilians and Peruvians are unemployed without going home and having chances to receive assistance from the Japanese government and are becoming 'settlers'. Finally, Japan will introduce a new 'Residence Card' system instead of the former foreigner registration system, which may be able to create tougher surveillance system over various kinds of immigrants. Accordingly, Japan holds new migrant profiles such as care immigrants, unskilled migrants, settlers, etc. But, it elaborates policy measures like the 'Residence Card' system against the diversification of the profiles. This Japanese case reflects resilience of state sovereignty even in the situation of challenges of migration to state sovereignty.

Understanding violence and anti-violence work in the context of immigration and diversity

This paper discusses the various forms of violence that immigrant women of diverse ethno-cultural backgrounds experience in their daily lives in the Atlantic region of Canada and assesses the impact of such violence on the women, their efforts to cope with it, and their experiences with social services. The research was accomplished by utilizing a combination of qualitative methodologies aimed at maximizing diverse immigrant women's participation and at incorporating community input into the research and interpretation of the findings. It involved the participation of immigrant women and service providers in five Atlantic Canadian cities. In addition, the research aimed at capturing the experiences of the professionals who attempted to support the women.

Starting with a broad framework on violence, violence in the family, in the workplace and in the public arena are being explored, from the immigrant women's own perspectives. The paper also focuses on the ways in which immigrant women interface with, and are constructed by social institutions such as settlement, social, criminal justice, employment, and education services when it comes to issues of violence; the ways that immigrant women may be victimized in these settings, particularly in the context of institutional and systemic factors pertaining to gender, class and race/ethnicity; and the individual and collective strategies that immigrant women resort to in order to cope with, or resolve, this violence in their daily lives and in the longer-term. The paper underscores the need to conduct anti-violence work with immigrant women in ways that are culturally sensitive and do not end up victimizing the women.

Nature corporation. The role of social actors in the production of green consumption in Brazil, through the gaze of a rhizome

The postmodern society is showing changes in its habits and styles of consumption in recent years, influenced by the paradigm of environmental sustainability. In this context, the discussion of this new paradigm involves a complex network of social actors made up of companies, media, NGOs, government and civil society, all of them in a new configuration.

This "network" tends to be configured through a rhizome, by which all influence each other by means of mutual assemblages, for the development, creation, control and production of the look of a "green consumption". Thus, Nature begins to link itself to the consumption's logic, through the system Ecological Power. Therefore, Nature is produced as life, and also capital or "consumer good". In other words, a "new product market" on the contemporary panorama.

The present study aims to reflect the participation of different social actors in the production process of the green consumption market in Brazil, through the logic of a "green rhizome". Through the development of this new market, consumers, companies, media, NGOs and government have been organizing focusing in the production of a "green power", which circulates within this rhizome, in which nature is commodified according to a logic of rhizomatic and immaterial capitalism.

The methodological research is based on a qualitative study, through the analysis of bibliographical references, documentary research and field research in the Brazilian market.

The research results indicate that the social actors affect and control each other, producing the idea of an "Ethos" environment, which is expressed through the strategy of "ethical profit." This strategy is articulated as a Ecological Power, which sets the concept of nature as power's object (according to the deterritorialized conception of the non-place) and consumption's object, capitalizing the nature, making it profitable and with a value of socially powerful.

Violence and literature: The novel of cruelty in Latin America

The age of late modernity has shown an increasing crisis of social control and policing, as an expression of a worldwide social crisis. In this context, it is possible to distinguish various narratives about violence, drug dealers, and violent crime in the contemporary societies. So, the hypothesis of this paper is to present a new genre in crime fiction, called "the novel of cruelty", which show a main structural transformation of narrative, although incorporating some trends from the classic detective fiction. To verify this hypothesis, we will analyze some novels published in Latin America countries, since the 1990's, particularly from important Authors: Carlos Fuentes, from México; Fernando Vallejo and Jorge Franco, from Colombia; and Ruben Fonseca, from Brazil. We will discuss how the characters, the plot, the political actors, including the State, and the new forms of violent crime - such as international trafficking of drugs and people, sexual violence, corruption and so on - are figurate by such novels. This analysis of several literary expressions around Latin America can lead us to discuss the existence of a social representation in contemporary society based in violence as a social pattern.

Mobilization for Climate Justice: When South Fights North

From the nineties on, when the risks of global warming were acknowledged by the United Nations, climate change has become one of the most important themes in the international agenda. Two decades later, however, the responses given both by governments around the world and international agencies are perceived to be clearly insufficient. In this context, Bolivian President Evo Morales, proposed in January 2010 the creation of a Climate Justice Tribunal in the United Nations, as part of the Movimiento Mundial de los Pueblos por la Madre Tierra. In April, President Morales helped to organize the First World People's Conference on Climate Change and the Rights of Mother Earth in the city of Cochabamba, a kind of a counter summit to the Climate Change Conference of the United Nations held in Copenhagen, Denmark in 2009. Whereas this later conference proved a debacle, Cochabamba represented a milestone in social mobilization. This paper examines the movement for climate justice in Latin America, with special emphasis on the Mexican case. Theoretically it aims at exploring the re-politicization and particularly the judicialisation of social mobilization, and its implications for democracy. I will examine the various conceptions of justice and legality underpinning the Movimiento and will try to understand the implications of the judicialisation of social mobilization in terms of Cohen and Arato's politics (politics of inclusion, influence, identity, and reform). Although in studies and discussions on justice, more and more attention is being paid to the phenomenon of judicialisation, that is, the growing recourse of social actors to the courts, in the field of contentious politics we still need to investigate more.

How to escape a technocratic culture of risk?

A risk doesn't exist until it has not been built. Several ways to build risk can be identified, which correspond with different cultures of risk. In France, the prevalent technocratic culture relies on a paradox. While experts express the risk they claim to reduce it. They put the public away from the risk by pretending to control it. Another culture of risk would begin to accept the risk as an essential part of the modern constitution. It can't be fully controlled by science or technology. So its construction cannot be the only fact of experts. Accepting the presence of irreducible risks leads to organize a social scene of risk. Thus, managing a public policy of risk begins by a policy of "concernment" that aims the constitution of a Public. Risk, as science and technology, has to enter in democracy. However, social dialogue about a "situation at risk" can lead to dead ends. The sense of this democracy must be questioned. Indeed, asking to participants what is the level of risk they accept is not enough. The debate can be skewed by the perceived utility of risk-taking or by the fact that negative effects will only be felt in the long term. Similarly, saying that the scene must allow the emergence of various alternatives, each with a different level of risk, but contributing to a common goal is not satisfactory. The temptation to choose the way minimizing the risk-taking may be strong, whatever its efficiency. But above, the issue of finalities is not part of the debate. In a modern society where risk is everywhere, the issue of goals, their desirability is one of the most important, essential in the assessment of risk and its acceptability.

Discriminación a migrantes en el poder judicial: El encuentro con el otro a través del derecho al uso de la ciudad Teniendo en cuenta que la convocatoria a la presente sesión invita a reflexionar sobre el lugar que las migraciones tienen en el espacio urbano y las interrelaciones entre los habitantes de la ciudad, esta ponencia expondrá algunas de las conclusiones que surgen de nuestra investigación en el proyecto de programación científica UBACyT[1].

Del acercamiento al campo tomaremos las entrevistas realizadas a miembros del poder judicial que indagan en las representaciones sociales que los nativos construyen acerca de los migrantes externos.

Nos preguntamos ¿cómo es percibida la relación entre la propiedad del territorio y los migrantes? ¿Se privilegian algunas poblaciones en el acceso al derecho de la tierra? ¿Cómo incide esa relación sobre otros derechos?

El objetivo será rastrear aquellos preconceptos que evidencian que los nativos se ven amenazados por el uso que los migrantes, en especial los de países limítrofes, hacen de la ciudad.

Nuestra hipótesis es que la sociedad argentina privilegia la propiedad privada sobre otros derechos sin tener en cuenta las circunstancias habitacionales, las consecuencias físicas, de desarrollo y de identidad que esto conlleva para los habitantes de los sectores más marginales de la Ciudad; sobre todo cuando a esto se suma el factor de ser inmigrante. Entendemos que en las representaciones de los miembros del poder judicial el espacio/territorio no sería concebido como un lugar de encuentro e integración de culturas y sujetos sino como un terreno donde se disputan otros derechos que definen, por su parte, quiénes son ciudadanos con derechos y quiénes no y donde, finalmente, se refuerzan fronteras que segregan socio espacialmente a los migrantes limítrofes reproduciendo así formas de exclusión social.

Right to the city: A concept in dispute

The diagnosis that the right to the city has become a catchphrase to address a wide range of issues related to the experience of living in cities is often combined with the idea of the loss of specificity of the concept. In addition to it's vagueness, the loss of it's potential critical core is also denounced as an effect of it's institutionalization in national laws and official programs from international organizations such as UN-HABITAT and UNESCO. This diagnosis was synthesized by Margit Mayer: the right to the city has undergone the transformation "from protest to program".

Assuming that this diagnosis is right, my concern is less to denounce this process as a misrepresentation of Lefebvre's le droit a la ville, but rather to question how this transformation occurred. For that, the origin of the use of the term 'right to the city' in international forums is my starting point to analyse how the formulations of the concept as a "new social contract" or as a "right to urban citizenship" point to a dispute of interests anchored in a specific social arrangement. The vagueness shouldn't be interpreted here as a lack, but as constitutive of a political agreement.

I'll narrow my analysis to the first two institutional discussions in which the right to the city appeared: the round-table Towards a city of solidarity and citizenship held by UNESCO in 1995 as a preparation for HABITAT-II and the discussion of the proposals during the City Summit in 1996. I'll try to demonstrate the attempts to turn the right to the city into an operational concept are part of a broader strategy to legitimize additional intervention powers to the city's local authority in order to reconcile market economy and a minimum standard of social development, a role previously played by the Welfare State.

Social justice initiatives: Community development projects

The proposed paper will examine the operationalization of social justice through the community intervention strategies by the Canadian Catholic organization for development that operates sustainable development projects in Africa, Latin America and the Middle East and involved with humanitarian crises.

In the past 43 years, the organization provided $575 million dollars to finance 15,800 projects in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Middle East. Projects include peace building, human rights, agrarian reform, education and community development. The goal is to work with all peoples and NGOs to improve their dignity and living conditions. The Canadian International Development Agency provides funding to the organization which is also a member of Caritas Internationalis – a federation of 165 Catholic development organizations in over 200 countries. In 2010 and 2011, the social justice initiatives include bottled water free zone in support of partners in countries with little or no clean fresh water; and compassionate democracy in East Timor Leste as the people struggle to maintain a fragile democracy as a new nation free from colonial oppression.

Actions by members of the organization include

- Monetary donations and fund raising
- Volunteering and active participation in democratic causes
- Letter writing campaigns
- Partnership with NGOs
- lobbying of multinationals and government agencies

Questions the paper will answer

- Is it only religions organizations that can achieve social justice based on solidarity?
- Is the most effective model of development utilized to achieve social justice?

Since the paper is within the context of clinical sociology, Max Weber's conceptual framework of mechanical and organic solidarity will be put to the test in the qualitative analysis of the projects in developing countries and emerging economies in selected areas of Africa, Asia and Latin America

Transgenderism and health policy in Canada

This paper explores the health care policies governing sex reassignment surgery across the Canadian Provinces as mandated under the Canada Health Act that guarantees the principles of universality, portability, accessibility, and not for profit. This review is conducted within the domain of mental health issues because GID (Gender Identity Disorder) is recognized as a medical condition by the Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association based on Standards of Care of Gender Identity Disorders. Transsexualism is recognized as a psychiatric disorder by the American Psychiatric Association and World Health Organization. It is noted that SRS (sex reassignment surgery) is the recommended treatment for transsexuals who cannot live their original sex and gender role.

So, why focus on Health Policies? The head of the Clinical Sexology Program at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, argues that as an effective treatment for a specific mental disorder, sex reassignment surgery SRS is as deserving of public funding as any other psychiatric treatment. As contributing and productive members of society, transsexuals and their families should be treated with equity and fairness by the health care system. Can their rights be guaranteed by health care policies across the country? Or is it dependent upon a health capability paradigm with goals of a just society? Investigations reveal that in some provincial jurisdictions, lack of funding has resulted in the delisting of SRS from the health coverage and given a very low priority. For example in Ontario, where the Gender identify Clinic began in 1969 at the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry in Toronto, patients were sent to this clinic and their surgery paid for by the Ontario government until October 01/1998 when the funding was terminated.

Identity, emotion, memory in the structuring the moralities of migration

This paper discusses the emotional sphere that both motivates and mediates mobility and the everyday lives of migrants. The paper is particularly interested in the survival circuits of irregular migrants, such as temporary migrant workers, asylum seekers and trafficked persons and the moralities that guide migrants' transactions and knowledge systems alongside those of the native born. Are the moralities that guide migrants as newcomers and noncitizens distinct from those that guide citizens or the native born? In turn, what is similar and what is distinct in how the emotional spheres of attachment and devotion, or of shame and humiliation are experienced by newcomers. Migrant workers, asylum seekers and other temporary or illegalized migrants may borrow or rent documents that allow them to have a presence in the official economy, to open bank accounts, to send remittances home, or to access medical care. Many of these activities are survival strategies of vulnerable individuals where migrants engage in sub-altern channels as 'survival circuits' that may well by-pass official regulatory systems. The paper draws on the theorization of human vulnerability as well as transnational understandings of citizenship to argue that new knowledge of the migrant experience ought not to be considered relevant only to newcomers, but rather offers more generalizable guides for all persons as sharing in vulnerability.

Governance, women, and the new Tunisia

This paper will consider the important events and challenges as they pertain to female governance in the "New Tunisia", resulting in part from the recent elections of National Constituent Assembly charged with writing a new constitution. The analysis will focus on the role women played in the election process, including women's participation the interim government (January 2011-November 9, 2011) and political parties, followed by an in depth examination of the recent debates and actions that have since emerged among various factions which, for many citizens, appear to threaten the Tunisian women's longstanding, cherished freedoms. The principal research question asks, "In light of the recent election results in Tunisia and the increasing presence of conservative factions in Tunisia, how are Tunisian women responding to a possible threat to their most cherished freedoms guaranteed in the Code of Personal Status?"

The study will integrate several investigative approaches: historical narrative of factual events, participant observation (from both researchers), interviews with male and female candidates for the constituent assembly, and careful review of the ongoing actions and activities of women's groups and societal challenges since October 23, 2011, which in turn, may lead to significant change in the role Tunisian women will play in their country. The paper will conclude with recommendations as to what women in other countries in the MENA region may need to consider to ensure their civic engagement and civil rights as democratic change continues to move across borders.

Fernando pessoa: The literary construction of a Portuguese modernity

Because at times Fernando Pessoa' poetry sings the emergency of a new era and at others expresses the frustration that emerges from the impossibility of capturing the past into the present an incautious reader may consider it as one marked by an inner divide. This dual direction, contradictory only in appearance, holds the very notion of Modernity that can be found in the work of this poet, which is also precisely the specific element of a Modernity thought in Portuguese terms. Thus, the formulated poetry presented by Pessoa is able to unite the presence of a past that cannot be uprooted from the Portuguese cultural life and a literary renovation project that considers it the vanguard literature at the moment. Correlate to this literary formulation, the work of this poet reveals a notion of Modernity that turns both to the past as a symbolic dimension to be reaffirmed in a Modernity project, and to the future as a moment when a renovated Portugal can be crystallized. However, this Modernity project is not divided by an inner tension between its different temporal fragments. At stake is the improvement of a specific notion of Modernity that needs the fabric of a lost time to affirm the urgency of the new in such a way that is only by rearticulating the past that the future can be reached. Therefore, this communication aims to present the intricate aspects of this specific formulation of Modernity.

La información y el patrimonio inmaterial: Una propuesta de la ciudadanía digital

Este debate es parte de una investigación que ha llevado a cabo y se establece como parte de la formación doctoral de la UFMG / MG y su objetivo es aprender a dar acceso a la información y el trabajo de la educación sobre el patrimonio basada en el análisis de las políticas públicas en educación y la cultura establecidas en Brasil, tras un proceso de democratización del país en el siglo XX. Es una investigación que tiene como objetivo reflexionar sobre la interrelación entre la información y el patrimonio cultural intangible con el fin de demostrar la viabilidad de una ciudadanía digital, teniendo en cuenta la relevancia del tema y las cuestiones relativas a la equidad para la preservación de la identidad de los grupos sociales. Basada en el entendimiento del patrimonio cultural y la información como inseparables, la idea es demostrar que las dos cosas en conjunto, permiten la construcción de una ciudadanía cultural anclado en garantizar los derechos a la información y la cultura, junto con el potencial que las nuevas tecnologías traen porque sólo puede pensar en la ciudadanía dado la posibilidad de habilitar esta tecnología. En la sociedad contemporánea, Touraine (2007), los movimientos sociales son cada vez más débil, tiende a desaparecer y las relaciones se están estableciendo a través del uso de nuevas tecnologías para acceder a la información. En este contexto, al igual que la ciudadanía cultural, basado en los derechos culturales (Chauí, 2006) que pone en escena en la sociedad contemporánea, la cultura popular y tradicional; la ciudadanía digital dirige el foco a la instrumentalización de los individuos y grupos sociales con el fin de aumentar las posibilidades de acciones relacionadas con la democratización del acceso a la información sobre patrimonio cultural inmaterial.

Rap en Santa Maria (Brasil): Hacia una comprensión contextual del habitus del hip-hop

Este artículo se originó a partir de una etnografía realizada entre jóvenes productores de hip-hop en la periferia de la ciudad de Santa Maria, en el sur de Brasil. Pretendo mostrar cuales son las formas que este estilo cultural se presenta dentro de una serie de particularidades. En este caso se analiza cantantes de rap que gradualmente comenzaron a participar de esferas institucionales de un programa social del gobierno del estado de Rio Grande do Sul en la escuela del barrio. La investigación sugiere que desde el hip-hop hasta el contacto con estas esferas del ámbito escolar, los jóvenes crearon una forma de portarse propia de este contacto, directamente relacionada a lo que se conoce por Actitud del hip-hop. Este término es utilizado por los productores culturales para designar su forma de entender el mundo y actuar sobre él. Desde una perspectiva de los estilos de vida de Pierre Bourdieu (2007) hay una posibilidad de entendimiento de los grupos sociales a partir del concepto de habitus. Este concepto es la combinación de un sistema de clasificación y ordenamiento del mundo con un sistema generador de prácticas. Así, es posible comprender el resultado de la interacción entre escuela y jóvenes rappers a partir del habitus propio al hip-hop que esta investigación reveló ser la Actitud del rapper, es decir, el sistema generador de prácticas y el sistema clasificador de las prácticas. Además se objetiva explicar cómo funciona la transformación en la vida de estos cantantes, que en un primer momento son consumidores del estilo musical y a través de un proceso gradual se vuelven productores culturales. El artículo no propone que la Actitud del Hip-hop sea entendida como esencia del estilo, sino de forma histórica. Esto significa que ella se manifestará de acuerdo con su contexto.

La lucha contra la violencia contra la mujer y la atención primaria de salud - Reflexiones desde el programa de agentes comunitarios de salud en Brasilia (DF-BR)

En este texto se presenta los resultados de la investigación realizada junto a los Agentes Comunitarios de Salud (ACS), que atuan en la ciudad de Núcleo Bandeirante (DF). El objetivo fue analizar la actuación de estos frente a la violencia doméstica contra la mujer, identificando se: a) las demandas relacionadas a la violencia doméstica contra las mujeres dirigidas a las y a los ACS, b) las acciones de las y los ACS delante de las familias donde hay violencia doméstica contra las mujeres y c) las actividades desarrolladas para la prevención de estas situaciones.

Fueron entrevistados (entrevistas semi-estructuradas) veintisiete ACS de la Regional de Salud del Núcleo Bandeirante. Además se utilizó fuentes secundarias y la observación directa del trabajo diario de las y los ACS. El estudio fue presentado al Comité de Ética en Investigación (DF).

Los estereotipos y roles tradicionales de género, difundidos y compartidos por los usuarios y los equipos de ACS tienden a naturalizar la mayor parte de las formas en que se manifiesta la violencia de género. Esto hace que el ámbito de la intervención (posible y deseable) se limite a las situaciones que pueden afectar a la integridad física de las personas. Pertenecer a la lógica del PACS que los agentes compartan la realidad y los valores de la población usuaria. Por lo tanto, este aspecto, sin embargo, realmente importante para el establecimiento de la relación entre profesionales y usuarias, es simultáneamente, un obstáculo, cuando se trata de la forma de percibir y actuar contra la violencia. Frente a esta situación es necesario no sólo acciones sistemáticas y adecuadas de formación, que apoyen nuevas formas de acción y control sistemático de este trabajo. También se hace urgente el desarrollo de iniciativas en el sector de salud que van más allá del PACS.

Welfare reform and its limits in Singapore

In recent years, the Singapore state—which continually insists, “we are not a welfare state”—has stepped up on its efforts to deal with issues of healthcare, education, support for care, retirement and even unemployment. Much of this has been in response to demographic changes as well as political pressures. The paper evaluates the possibilities and limits of recent reforms. It looks to the promising aspects reform—growing recognition of the importance of child and elderly care services outside the home, for example—before turning to examine the limitations. I argue that many of the limitations stems from the state’s continual commitment to the notion of the “family as first line of defense” and state support as last-resort solutions for those without families. The paper will show that this framework sets important limits not only to the type of changes made to welfare policies, but also has consequences for reinforcing inequalities, and for shaping conceptualizations of citizenship in Singapore society.

Institutional response to emerging challenges of climate change in urban India: A case of planned city in foothills of Himalaya

Cities in Himalayan foothills are likely to face crucial challenges due to unpredictable implications of climate change. The changes in hydrology, precipitation patterns, fast melting of glaciers, flow of seasonal rivers and rivulets has resulted in flooding many cities and towns in Northwest India.

Chandigarh, the first planned city of Northwest India having second highest population density after Delhi had faced drainage related problems due to very heavy rains and overflowing and choking of its drainage systems. It is evident that climate change is putting pressure on city governments for devising knowledge based innovative tools to cope with the emerging challenges of climate change.

The Municipal Corporation of Chandigarh has introduced certain innovative adaptation practices to enhance the level and quality of urban infrastructure and services and involve citizens in local governance and sanitation to cope with the challenges of climate change. This paper describes the initiatives of Chandigarh Municipal Corporation towards the institutionalization of climate adaptation practices in the city. Some of the initiatives include: augmentation of drainage system, solid waste management, setting up a waste to energy plant, saving energy in street lighting and water distribution, environmentally friendly transportation infrastructure, revitalization of green belts, parks, roundabouts and other greenery enhancements and housing and basic services for the slum dwellers.

Self-development and plurality of self for Japanese youths: An analysis of undergraduate students from a perspective of interpersonal skill gap

In this study, we examine effects of a plurality of self on youth's self-development and a disparity of the effects among Japanese youths.

To discuss above issues, this study consists of following two parts.

First, we review some youth studies of the transformation of self-identity in Japan and demonstrate "multiple-self" being corresponded to the plurality of self. It is emphasized that the plurality does not mean lacking coherence and being unstable. Using a questionnaire survey data of undergraduate students in Japan, we show this difference.

Second, we examine a diversity of the plurality that is advocated by some previous studies. Though this plurality that is often recognized as a resource for self-development to tackle fluxes in the late modernity has been seen as young generation's forte, it is important to note whether this is valid for all young people or not. If that is not valid, it is necessary to think a following question; for what type of youth, what kind of and how much effect exists? We examine this with the use of aforementioned data. Major findings of our analysis are summarized below: In regard to youth activity in self-development, the finding in the previous study—that the plurality of self has a positive effect on self-development—is supported by most analysis models. However, we conclude that the shaping of values as diligence in self-development varies among young people.

Youth's self-development is a matter in their trainability on employment. However this trainability is thought to be involved not only in the job but also in the previous steps to it, for example, home environment, schooling, youth culture and friendship. Therefore we focus on the undergraduate students near simultaneous recruiting in the Japanese society and on the diversity of them in the point of interpersonal relationship and skills for it.

Discursos del pasado que aceleran la muerte de las lenguas indígenas de México

Hay muchos factores que influyen en el desplazamiento de las lenguas minorizadas. Uno de los múltiples factores son las actitudes negativas hacia estas lenguas. Éstas son reflejadas en discursos que aparecen como estereotipos en la conversación. Algunos de estos discursos han pasado a la historia y se reconocen como discursos que discriminan, especialmente después de una reflexión colectiva que parcialmente ha superado los valores negativos del pasado. Sin embargo, es común que estos mismos discursos sobrevivan en el lenguaje de un número reducido de personas. Es extraño que las personas que aún están sufriendo las consecuencias de mencionadas actitudes sean las mismas personas que emplean el discurso discriminatorio del pasado. En México, por ejemplo, durante el siglo pasado se ha relacionado a la ignorancia y el atraso con las lenguas indígenas. Nuestro propósito en esta presentación es demostrar cómo las actitudes del pasado aún se están reflejando en el discurso actual de algunos hablantes de las lenguas indígenas, circunstancia que sin duda acelera la muerte de las mismas lenguas.

La ponencia sistematiza los resultados de tres investigaciones desarrolladas en Ciudad de Buenos Aires, Conurbano Bonaerense y Ciudad de Córdoba sobre la situación de la escolarización de los adolescentes y sobre las iniciativas dirigidas a revertir procesos de exclusión mediante cambios en el régimen académico de la escuela secundaria. En primer término, se presentará una tipología de poblaciones que potencia las posibilidades que brinda la información estadística para caracterizar dinámicas estructurales y contribuir de este modo a un mayor conocimiento de los procesos de exclusión educativa. En segundo término, se presentarán los resultados de tres estudios que analizan iniciativas de política educativa destinadas a la atención de la población adolescente, en su concreción a nivel local y en sus relaciones con las trayectorias educativas de sus destinatarios: los Centros de Escolarización de jóvenes y adolescentes (CESAJ) de la Dirección General de Educación Secundaria de la Provincia de Buenos Aires; las Escuelas de Reingreso del Ministerio de Educación de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires, y el Programa de Inclusión/ Terminalidad de la educación secundaria y formación laboral para jóvenes de 14/ 17 (PIT 14/17) del Ministerio de Educación de la Provincia de Córdoba. El análisis que se presentará procura destacar los puntos críticos en el proceso de escolarización, las formas específicas que toman los quiebres en las trayectorias escolares cuando se los analiza en el contexto local de los grandes conglomerados urbanos, y las posibilidades y límites de los cambios de carácter pedagógico para revertir las situaciones de exclusión educativa. Entre los aportes conclusivos, se destaca la contraposición entre la cultura sectorial del sistema educativo, cuyo enfoque de desarrollo y de gestión responde a un funcionamiento vertical y jerárquico, y la necesidad de establecer formas precisas y perdurables de intersectorialidad con otras organizaciones que conviven en el mismo territorio.

The race and the nation: Discourses and narratives for a national identity in Nina Rodrigues e Gilberto Freyre

The construction of Brazilian national identity crossed the story without the so-called revolutions or social disruption. By investigating the formation of national identity is possible notice that it's already being produced by writers of Brazilian Romanticism as José de Alencar, who sought to relate the national character with indigenous peoples of Brazil. The Guarani, Iracema and Ubirajara are examples of narratives intended for a construction of national character. In this way, many intellectuals were concerned, especially after the Abolition of Slavery (1888) and the Proclamation of the Republic (1889), in erecting a national history, as well as people who could represent the nation of Brazil. Under the perspective of European racial-logical theories, the Brazilian intelligentsia consolidated a new outlook of Brazil, which fed not only racism, but explained the conditions of economic backwardness, cultural and social development through the racial and biological characteristics of the population. The delay, the colonial situation, as well as the marginalization of social groups - such as blacks, mestizos and Indians - are not substantiated by the story of three centuries of economic dependence, but by the conditions of bio-psychological development of the Brazilian people. The objective of this paper is to analyze the discourses and narratives that sought in the late nineteenth century the formation of a Brazilian national identity, based on the idea of three races (white, black and Indian). In this context we will analyze two intellectuals who thought Brazil and ethno-national question: Raimundo Nina Rodrigues - editor of the Archives of Psychiatry in Buenos Aires and vice president of the Society of Legal Medicine of New York - in his book The Human Race and Criminal Liability in Brazil (1894) and Gilberto Freyre, with his job Casa-Grande &

Slaves (1933), the basic reference in national and international collective imagination to understand the formation and identity of the Brazilian people.

How to make a career in leisure: The case of the professionals of the outdoor sport tourism

Our research is interested by the career of the professionals of the outdoor sport. More exactly, we try to comprehend processes of creation and development of companies of this sector. Indeed, as mention it many authors, these last ones have difficulties in their economic growth, owed for example to a lack of skills of the professionals in the sector of the management.

For this study, we realized fifty three semi directive interviews and ethnographical observations of companies in the department of Aveyron (Aveyron is a rural department situated in the South of France).

First of all, the meditative data show that the career of the professionals classically consists of three stages. Indeed, before they become manager of a small company of sport tourism, the professionals were, at first, passionate followers of outdoor sports, and then, sport instructors.

Moreover, our analysis reveals that, although the passion constitutes the main lever to create a company of outdoor sport tourism, it becomes an obstacle to the long-lasting development of businesses. The actors indeed have to diversify their skills and their networks beyond the sports sphere, in the sector of management, by the intermediary, for example, of trainings or work experiences.

The framing of obesity in France: Between a sciences war and coalitions

The fight against obesity is a public health issue in France since 2001 with the establishment of the National Nutrition and Health Program. As in all activities of expertise, the collective definition of the problem is a major issue. Current works in science studies have shown how this activity, prior to the implementation of public policy, was the target of many social actors as scientists, politicians and laymen as well. She then makes the subject of much debates whose pronouncements reveal different "world views" involved in the framing of obesity as a health problem. Other studies also show that all collective mobilizations cannot necessarily become visible and perform at a more political level to ensure that their knowledge equip public policy. By taking support on a corpus consisted by newspaper articles, "gray literature", interviews and ethnographic notes taken at various scientific events, our communication is helping to light this process of "politicization" of the knowledges, the passage of the science to the action, the theory to the practice. In particular, we identify co-construction effects between various scientific disciplines but also between the "confined" scientific area and the public space. They embody two main forms of knowledge translation in public action mechanisms. The first one, carrying a "scientific and managerial" vision, juxtaposes the biomedical sciences and the management and communication sciences. The second one, partisan of a more "critical" point of view, combines knowledges from psychiatry, psychology and sociology. These dynamics give us then information about the evolution of the tensions which originally structure the mobilization space of the obesity management according to a nutritional perspective.

Prácticas y discursos transnacionales en el movimiento "comunidad y liberación"

Esta presentación procura analizar la relación entre la forma organizativa del movimiento "Comunidad y Liberación" y la constitución de prácticas y discursos transnacionales por parte de sus participantes. Si por un lado se entiende que la modalidad organizativa específica que adopta se encuentra marcada por la doble exigencia de sostener la expansión geográfica y numérica del mismo y a la vez mantener una unidad de discurso y de práctica (Zadra, 1994), por otro lado se contempla que este arreglo institucional constituye también una red de contactos y vínculos que tanto facilita como genera desplazamientos, migraciones y formas de sociabilidad y de vivencia de la fe que no se restringen a las fronteras nacionales ni permanecen circunscritas en el plano meramente local o interlocal. Teniendo estos factores en cuenta, de lo que se trata es de reflexionar sobre las prácticas y discursos transnacionales concretos que la estructura del movimiento crea, facilita o alberga por parte de sus adeptos, incluyendo ahí principalmente las formas de movilidad a través de fronteras y regiones y la conformación de vínculos y redes de relaciones más allá de cada comunidad local. Estas reflexiones parten de los apuntes de un trabajo de campo que viene siendo realizado en el movimiento Comunidad y Liberación desde 2009, en Santa Fe - Argentina y Florianópolis - Brasil.

Time constraints on leisure activities

During the last two decades, the importance of leisure behaviour has occupied the attention of researchers demanding for more study in this area. Among these studies, the examination of leisure activities vis-à-vis the time factor as a result of some empirical contributions has made significant impacts on the conceptual and theoretical understanding of this area.

This paper reports the findings of an urban-based empirical study which assessed the impact of time constraint in particular on leisure activities. The study is undertaken in a Hindu populated City of Kanpur, India the population of which is approximately five million. An interview-administered questionnaire designed for this purpose questioned the extent of constraint due to time on leisure activities on respondents. The respondents were asked about their previous and current leisure activities on the basis of which a comparative structure was designed. The respondent sample size was one hundred fifty, out of which 25 were female and the remaining male. The lower middle and upper middle class were included, depending upon their levels of income.

It was convened that time constraints intervened more frequently on a day-to-day basis in general leisure activities. Further study shows, however, that leisure restrictions are not confined to low-participation individuals, but also effect the more active who are more conscious of being constrained than those who participate less. The study also establishes that time constraint is not the only factor for low leisure participation levels, but has to be seen in context to other constraints also. The limitations of this study have been funding and small sample size.

Ayurvedic healthcare in India: An alternate to allopathy?

Ayurveda is a holistic healing science which comprises of two words, Ayu and Veda. Ayu means life and Veda means knowledge or science. So the literal meaning of the word Ayurveda is the science of life. Ayurveda is the traditional medicine of India, which originated here over 5,000 years ago. Ayurveda emphasizes re-establishing balance in the body through diet, lifestyle, exercise, and body cleansing, and on the health of the mind, body, and spirit. Ayurvedic medicine is particularly effective for metabolic, stress related, and chronic conditions. Treatments are also very helpful in relieving the effects of surgery and debilitating treatments such as chemotherapy.

Allopathy is based on major 3 steps: hypothesis, experimentation and observation and finally the theory or the conclusion. In today's world, allopathy follows a methodological approach towards diagnosing and treating patients. However, Ayurveda comparatively takes a long period of time to cure, whereas in most of the cases allopathic treatment cures the diseases within a short span of time. Although the negative side in allopathy treatment sometimes may cause side effects, but no such side effects can really be found in Ayurvedic treatment. Now days, many doctors those who are practicing allopathy even suggest many Ayurvedic medicines for their patients. Ayurveda removes the root cause of the ailment.

The main objective of this paper is to examine the people's choice of health care provider in the form of Ayurved vis-à-vis Allopath. A sample of two hundred participants has been taken, who had been witnessing both Ayurvedic and Allopathic treatment during their lifetime. The City of Kanpur, which happens to be the biggest populated one of the state of Uttar Pradesh in India has been taken as the field of study. A Hypotheses is drawn wherein Ayurved gets an upper hand to Allopathy.

Conceptual shift in leisure patterns of the youth as a result of economic furor

In the 1930s, John Maynard Keynes wrote that within a hundred years 'man will face with his real, permanent problem – how to use his freedom from pressing economic cares, how to occupy his leisure. What has since transformed from the times of Keynes is the conceptual move in leisure paradigms resultant to the economic turbulences. Leisure patterns all over the world are changing due to evolution of our society from an industrial age to a post industrial age. The forces of change are economic, political, environmental, social & demographic.

The research analysis suggests that underemployment has caused significant changes in individual's life styles and leisure interests. The analysis was carried out through interviews conducted across the Kanpur city with a sample of 75 respondents belonging to the age group of under 35. The reasons for such shift has been that educational systems currently focus on preparation of work rather than preparing individual's for both work and leisure in their lives. Due to the economic constraints, the systems are unable to provide work, and as the educational institutions stress on work focus, hence the vision towards leisure is totally neglected. The political agendas too lack an understanding and appreciation for the value of leisure on the over all well-being of the individual, i.e. the youth vis-à-vis the community. As a result of financial turmoil, less jobs are available, and the youth are fighting die hard for survival in this competing arena. As a consequence to this, they do not find both the time and resources for outdoor leisure activities, given the constraints. This is resulting into enhancement of leisurely activities at home, such as watching television, playing cards, doing time pass household works etc. The outdoor leisure activities are thus reduced due to which there is social elusion.

Discriminación y reconocimiento de los inmigrantes en Santiago de Chile: Una tipología de la aceptación y el rechazo al extranjero

La ponencia que se propone tiene por objeto mostrar los resultados de una investigación realizada en la Región Metropolitana (Santiago de Chile) sobre los límites del reconocimiento y la discriminación que ejerce la población nativa hacia los inmigrantes provenientes de Argentina, Perú y Ecuador. El estudio titulado "Discriminación y lucha por el reconocimiento en el proceso de incorporación de los inmigrantes Argentinos, Peruanos y Ecuatorianos a la Región Metropolitana" cuenta con financiamiento de FONDECYT por los años 2011 y 2012. En la primera etapa se aplicaron y analizaron 10 grupos de discusión a cinco estratos de chilenos segmentados por nivel de ingreso e intensidad de la relación con los inmigrantes latinoamericanos. El análisis permitió identificar cinco posiciones subjetivas diferenciadas por las condiciones que imponen a la aceptación y al rechazo de esos colectivos extranjeros en Santiago. Lo cual constituye la base para caracterizar los factores que influyen en la emergencia de manifestaciones explícitas de rechazo o en la perpetuación de una discriminación latente. Paralelamente a partir del análisis se reconocieron algunos elementos en común a estas posiciones, lo que constituye un aporte (necesario de profundizar) a una definición general de los límites y los alcances que los santiaguinos, imponen al reconocimiento de los inmigrantes latinoamericanos.

Interaction of national and transnational factors in elder care policies: Constructing a conceptual framework

Since the 1990s in several European countries, such as Germany, Austria, Luxembourg, Belgium (Flanders), Spain or Estonia as well Asian countries, such as e.g. Japan or Korea new elder care policy were introduced. The shape of policy-making processes can be explained by the interplay of national conditions related to the policy field of elder care embedded in welfare state policy development in general, and demographic and societal change on one hand and different modes of cross-border influences on the other.

In the focus of the paper is the construction of a theoretical-conceptual framework for the analysis of the interaction of national and transnational factors based on a combination of different research strands. It draws on theoretical-conceptual approaches related to international comparative welfare state research, i.e. on social care and social policy change in general, in order to define the logic and dynamics of the policy field embedded in welfare state developments. In addition, new-institutionalist approaches with their emphasis on the interplay of ideas, interests and institutions are used to exam the policy processes. Finally, concepts of policy transfer, policy diffusion and policy learning are combined to analyse transnational processes. Developments in Asian as well as European countries are used as empirical basis for the construction of the conceptual-theoretical framework. The empirical part draws on research findings on the role of national and transnational factors in the process of policy-development in the different countries and available statistics.

The processes of policy-making and policy-transfer in and between European and Asian countries have already been analysed on case study basis. In contrast, conceptual approaches for a more systematic analysis of national and transnational factors and their interplay are only at the beginning.

Age-grade gap, a serious Brazilian educational problem

Talking about education in Brazil leads us to some questions extremely important: inequality of opportunities - an element that segregates individuals at school and in society- inside a system that, based on hegemony, maintains a stable appearance, however destabilize lives when adopt the code of privileged social group, denying the basic individual rights to the unprivileged one, such as: literacy at the right age, access to reading, to knowledge, to an attractive and a good education, that corresponds to individual and group necessities, according to the realities where different people are inserted, in order to avoid the continuation of an educational and a social very serious problem, created inside school: age-grade gap. Besides some researches have shown Brazil has increased in registration for basic school and worked to correct school flow, we also know, considering our reality, that this kind of correction not always happens at an efficient form, this is, some individuals are promoted to a regular grade without basic knowledge, this is, most of them are functionally illiterate. So, we need to construct and project a non excluding Brazilian kind of school and educational policies, based on the ideas developed and worked by Paulo Freire: dialogue, popular knowledge and freedom.

Key-words: Brazilian school-inequality-age-grade gap- popular knowledge

The literature on trade union revitalization: An example of an alliance between researchers and labour movement

An abundant literature on "trade union revitalisation" has developed over the recent period in the United States. This literature intends to analyze and often prescribe ways of trade union renewal or revitalization. It is the product of relations of collaboration between a new generation of trade union leaders and academics, as well as of struggles of competition inside the academic field in the context of the decline of the study field of industrial relations. The cooperative relations which academics entertain with supposedly revitalizing trade unions have an impact on the research agenda. Indeed, the literature on union revitalization tends to rely on the construction of two supposedly homogenous types of trade unionism. On the one hand, business unionism, supposed to act as an institutionalized pressure group that is isolated from social movements whereas, on the other hand, the renewed trade unions are supposed to be led by new elites and to be engaged in learning processes from social movements. In our contribution, we discuss this evolutionist conception of trade union development with its division between "old" and "new" trade unionism. We also examine the importance that part of the union revitalization literature attributes to resources imported into trade unions by new leaders. Finally, we discuss the question of the uses made of the revitalization literature in the struggles of competition between US trade unions, and in the legitimation/delegitimation of certain kind of resources.

Migrant worker organizing and labour law in Canada

Temporary foreign worker programs, sometimes termed 'guest worker' programs, are a growing phenomenon in the contemporary global economy. While there is a wide scholarly literature outlining conditions of labour exploitation within guest worker programs, the dynamics of labour organizing amongst migrant workers and their allies are less widely examined. This paper explores the terrain of labour organizing amongst migrant workers in Canada, focusing specifically on recent efforts to secure freedom of association rights by migrant farmworkers in the Seasonal Agricultural Workers' Program (SAWP). The paper first presents an overview of patterns of temporary labour migration to Canada and then outlines the general conditions of employment experienced by workers in the SAWP, which include long hours and low wages, as well as exemptions from many basic labour standards. Moreover, as seasonal farmworkers they have historically been denied rights to unionization and collective bargaining. The paper then examines a legal challenge undertaken by migrant farmworkers in the SAWP and supported by the United Food and Commercial Workers in attempt to secure freedom of association rights. The paper explores the 'limits and possibilities' of this legal strategy, and concludes by situating this struggle within the broader context of both the expansion of the Temporary Foreign Worker Program in Canada and the global expansion of guest worker programs.

Culture, freedom and economic development: An analysis based on the concept of social capital

The look that guides this work lies in the perception of that culture (or cultural factors as values, belief systems, political systems, and confidence, for example) affects economic development, which has generated several studies, in a scenario in which consideration of the impact of cultural characteristics on the performance of a society can not be neglected. If education, social inclusion and citizenship issues have been considered important to the discussions about public policy and education, for example, is articulated in different ways, the same can not be said about the importance of culture to national development. In this context, with the emphasis on the intersection between the literatures involving freedom and / or cultural factors (exclusive or not) economic development, this proposed analysis can be seen as a contribution to the discussion about the importance of institutions for economic development, seeking to consolidate theoretical and interpretive perspectives, as well as the analysis of relationships and social processes pertaining to the cultural and economic, of the focus on culture and social capital. Craving this challenge, it is proposed from the epistemological debate about culture and economic development, review and discuss the theoretical approaches on culture, equity, freedom and economic development, as a privileged strategy for the design of cultural determinants associated with economic development potential in Brazil. The importance of this project is explicit, so, the approach and understanding of relevant issues of culture and social processes underway in the current state of Brazil's economic development, contributing to the discussion about a major challenge for the country, which is the paradox between the high levels of technological development and productivity presented in recent years as opposed to social crises arising from economic disparity and social conditions.

Leaving the stethoscope behind: Public health physicians and the spectre of the 'real' doctor

Medicine has often been viewed as a relatively homogenous grouping of professionals and prestige hierarchies within medicine itself and the implications of these hierarchies for individual and population health have been underexplored. Medicine has been subject to increasing levels of specialisation over the last century. With the advent of specialisation, hierarchies have emerged. Public health medicine is distinct in two connected ways from most other forms of medical specialisation; firstly, it is predominantly non-clinical and secondly, its concern is with populations, rather than individuals. Public health medicine challenges the relationship at the heart of biomedicine – the individual physician/patient encounter and it has relatively low prestige amongst the specialties. This low status persists in spite of the awareness that addressing the wider determinants of health, which is the task of public health, is crucial to improving population health overall and reducing health inequalities. In the face of this subaltern position within medicine and drawing on interviews with public health physicians this paper will investigate how doctors make sense of the transition into public health medicine and how they understand their positioning once they are within the specialty. Three key themes will be explored; futurity, loss and role perception. The subaltern positioning of public health medicine within medicine as a body of knowledge elucidates the ways that hierarchies among medical specialties may not serve the best interests of either individual or population health or the reduction of health inequalities.

Ambivalence and distinction in young people's perceptions of risk

This paper discusses research conducted at three very different schools in Australia: an expensive private school; a public academically selective school; and a public school in a low socio-economic area. Using this data, the paper analyses young people's perceptions of risk through the lens of and by bringing together social theories from Bourdieu, Bauman, Foucault and Beck.

Firstly, using the work of Bourdieu, the distinctions between how young people with differing levels of social and economic capital perceive, define, engage and deal with risks will be discussed. The data highlights how habitus diffuses risk, both real (experience) and perceived (discourse). In this regard, class needs to be understood and maintained as a central concept to understand how risks are mediated.

Secondly, the paper discusses young people's attitudes towards two distinct future risks: on the one hand, their perceptions of achieving their individual ambitions, on the other, their perceptions of the future of the world, particularly in terms of environmental issues. The data is analysed as a disjuncture between these issues where the positive perceptions of achieving ambitions are rarely linked to their pessimistic visions of societal collapse. This is discussed in regard to social theories of ambivalence and governmentality.

In conclusion, the paper will further contribute to the debate in the Journal of Youth Studies about Beck and inequality by making some theoretical suggestions as to the future direction of youth sociology. Specifically, by interlinking notions of habitus, governmentality and ambivalence to the complex ways risks are negotiated, we can endeavour to better understand the contours of inequality in reflexive modernity.

Cosmopolitan class? Cruise ship training and employment in South East Asia the transnational relationally of class inequality

Beck has challenged those interested in social class to step out of the limits of methodological nationalism to investigate how inequality works on a global level. This has sparked debates in a number of sociological fields, including youth sociology, over the very vitality of class as a productive sociological concept in an increasingly interconnected and cosmopolitan world.

By investigating young people who train and work on international cruise ships, this paper discusses transnational class relations and speaks to the many issues that Anglo-European theorising about recent social change describes. The international cruise ship industry is a microcosm of the globalised labour force and has been described as 'globalisation on the sea'. Balinese youth relatively high in cultural capital are being targeted by the cruise ship industry as service workers. Many are choosing this work rather than attending university. While the pay is slightly higher than what is available locally, the costs of training, agents and transport to ports see the workers virtually indentured to their employers. Families get loans to pay for training and it may take up to 4 years before the young people start to make anything.

This paper discusses this phenomenon through the lens and synthesis of several theories relevant to youth studies. These include the way personal choice and the negotiation of risk engage with global governmental discourses (individualization, consumerism); the increasing transnational relations of class inequality, where in this instance the middle class Balinese young people who often have servants in their own home, then pursue a career serving the mostly Western working class on holiday; and, can Bourdieu's theoretical toolbox – habitus, symbolic violence, forms of capital and hysteresis in particular – maintain vitality outside the confines of the nation state or does Beck's methodological critique consign it to the dustbin of zombie category?

Stakeholder theories and the dynamics of an inclusive labor market

When it comes to analyzing the labor market potential for inclusion of vulnerable workers such as people with mental illnesses or physical disabilities, a number of theories focus on the importance of the political or institutional framework of the welfare state underpinning such a potential for inclusion. Less attention is paid to the elbowroom vulnerable groups themselves are able to carve out in the labor market. Therefore this paper proposes to seek inspiration from stakeholder theory in order to analyze the legitimacy, power and urgency of claims raised by vulnerable workers in the eyes of corporate managers. This analysis is inspired by the principle of 'who and what really counts' – a principle coined by one of the founders of modern stakeholder theory, Robert Freeman, to denote the fact that only some groups and only some claims will receive attention from corporate managers.

This paper proposes a novel use and extension of these theories based on a specific analysis of the actions and attitudes of companies (public and private) when it comes to hiring, retaining and caring for employees belonging to vulnerable groups in the labor market. More specifically, the aim of the analysis is to investigate what power, legitimacy and urgency company managers ascribe to four groups of actual or potential employees: Workers with small children, seniors, workers with mental disabilities and workers suffering from mental illnesses. Furthermore we will seek to analyze how these perceptions affect corporate actions when it comes to hiring, retaining and caring for these groups. Data wise, the analysis will be based on a survey to a representative sample of Danish companies distributed during autumn 2010.

Opiniones, expectativas y evaluaciones de la población chilena sobre la inclusión y exclusión social de los adultos mayores. Insomios para una política pública

El sostenido y progresivo aumento de la población mayor en Chile nos enfrenta a múltiples interrogantes asociadas a la celeridad y complejidad de este fenómeno. Una de éstas tiene relación con el limitado conocimiento que se dispone sobre los mecanismos que favorecen o dificultan la integración social de los actuales adultos mayores, fundamental para la calidad de vida y bienestar de esta población. Los resultados de dos encuestas nacionales nos han permitido identificar opiniones, expectativas y evaluaciones asociadas a diferentes modalidades de inclusión y exclusión social de las personas adultas mayores, en tanto estas observaciones configuran las tendencias que siguen estos procesos y que afectan su integración social. Los resultados dan cuenta de una falta de preparación, a nivel personal y como país, para enfrentar el envejecimiento poblacional, junto a una importante tendencia a la generación de expectativas de soluciones colectivas, principalmente de carácter político-estatal para asumir los desafíos que acompañan a este cambio demográfico. Esta tendencia se asocia a una percepción limitada respecto de los recursos que los propios adultos mayores pueden tener para favorecer su inclusión social, percepción generalizada que finalmente puede retroalimentarse a través de los efectos de una profecía auto cumplida que termine limitando el desarrollo de capital psicológico en estas personas. Ahora bien, a partir de los análisis también es posible delinear estrategias a nivel de política pública para manejar los efectos no deseados de estos cambios socio-demográficos, tanto en nuestro país como en otros países de la región que atraviesan por similares modificaciones en su estructura poblacional.

Technology's paradox: Theorizing digital media and young lives

This paper examines the social impacts of digital media technology on youth; its paradoxes, points of resistance and reproductive tendencies. The place of digital media in the complexity of youth transitions over time is under theorized and studied. The use of digital media is well documented such that young Canadians are now among the most wired in the world (Media Awareness Network, 2006) and media claims suggest a revolutionary character of digital media in democratic participation and educational outcomes of youth; as a crucial force in the rhetoric of 21st century learning, the Arab Spring protests of the Middle East and the London Riots. Young people are posed as "The Millennials", "The NetGeneration" and/or Digital Natives" by virtue of immersion in ubiquitous digital media that mimic cyborgian experience (Tilleczek & Srigely, 2011).

But, what does this matter to young people's everyday lives? Many young people remain at intersections of marginalization by social class, region, ethnicity and culture and span the digital divide. And, there are conscientious objectors and full-on digesters of digital media. This paper provides possibilities for examining the impacts of digital media on young lives across the response/use spectrum and how it comes about via the paradoxical impacts of digital media on young lives over time. For whom and how do digital media augment and/or make problematic transitions?

How is digital media involved in agency, resistance and constraint? Is an emerging digital capital arising? If so, how are young people using it to negotiate transitions over time? This paper provides theoretical directions arising from conversations across sociology, philosophy and media studies. It outlines emerging literatures and points to the dismissive and adult/state-centric responses to the social and political phenomena that comprise digital cultures and digital media technology impacts on youth.

Youth, digital media and social inequality

This paper presents a conceptual synthesis of current literatures on the ways in which digital media allow/negate reproduction and resistance in educational and social inequalities for youth. With a focus on intersections of inequalities (socioeconomic status, age, culture, ethnicity, region) and social reproduction in education, the paper provides theoretical and methodological ways forward to understand and further examine the place of digital media in young lives. Arising from a SSHRC-funded project in emergent youth-attuned international methodologies in youth digital cultures, this paper focuses on how sociology and education can better help to position and hear marginalized young people as they converse about and negotiate digital technologies and cultures. With a focus on Aboriginal, immigrant newcomers and impoverished youth, the paper provides an overview of the evidence of the range of the digital divide and young people's place in it. How are social inequalities related to the digital divide for youth? How is age placed as a critical and ongoing category of inequality in the digital divide? Is the digital divide a useful conceptualization of social reproduction and resistance of youth to digital media? Is it possible for youth to turn digital media into spaces of real resistance and social justice? The paper draws on hundreds of current, international literatures to address these questions and provide theoretical and methodological directions.

Organizing informal workers: Challenges and opportunities for formal trade unions in five countries

UCLA Institute for Research on Labor and Employment

The global ascendancy of neoliberalism has brought with it the growth of informal employment. Informality tends to disarm trade unions, both because informal workers lack legal rights and because they lack market or structural power. There are successes in organizing informal workers, ranging from India's SEWA to US immigrant worker centers, along with domestic worker and street vendor associations world-wide, but most arise from community-based organizing with little union involvement. Some unions have recognized the importance of organizing informal workers, and there have been important experiments in joint action. But such experiments remain limited, and much union activity around "informal" work involves policing the boundaries of existing unionized work, focusing on subcontracting and the like, rather than more individualized, fundamentally informal forms of employment. On the whole, organizing informal workers remains a continuing challenge for trade unions.

This paper will offer a comparative survey documenting what the existing literature tells us about how formal unions have or have not interacted with or participated in organizing informal worker organizing in five countries: Brazil, China, Mexico, South Africa, and the USA, focusing on key examples of notable successes and failures. The five countries have several shared features: all are large countries in which formal unions had significant power in an earlier epoch; all have neoliberalized; all have seen significant growth trends in informal employment. There is also a key contrast: China, Mexico, and USA have weak unions; Brazil and South Africa have strong unions. The paper is designed to be programmatic as well, asking the question, "What kind of collaborative, comparative, fieldwork-based research would be most effective in advancing our knowledge of this issue?"

Nuclear economics: Evaluatory epistemologies and the shaping of Chile's energy market

The Chilean energy market has been widely recognized as one of the most extreme cases of neoliberal deregulation. As such, it complies with what an abundant literature on the macro-impacts of neoliberalism in Latin American politics and economics has signaled. However, how neoliberalism – as a set of specific techniques and forms of knowledge – has reshaped the organization of the Chilean energy market – and economic markets in the region at large – is still an understudied subject.

In this article I examine the failure of the Chilean nuclear program in the mid 70s as a way of understanding the reorganization of Chile's energy market under a new neoliberal rationale. To this end, I focus on one key dimension of this reorganization: the practical instauration in this market of a new evaluatory epistemology, i.e. a new set of epistemic references to authoritatively evaluate (economic) things. Specifically, the case of the Chilean nuclear program – and its dismissal by the newly arrived regulators – point at the emergence of a new form of expertise in this market (the economist as the ascendant scientific expert) mobilizing a new bundle of evaluative criteria (efficiency and comparative cost analyses).

Finally, the paper suggests that the failure Chilean nuclear program operated as an early experiment to test – and perform – the benefits of the adopted neoliberal framework. Thus the nuclear program became itself a key entity in the enactment of neoliberalism at large in Chile.

Resisting and accepting: Hybrid epistemologies in the GMO controversy in Chile

There is a growing interest in understanding how different actors in the GMO debate produce, justify and mobilize evidence in the face of the 'unknown unknowns' put forward by this technology. Moreover, recent work in the STS field has highlighted the role of non-expert knowledge and concerned groups in contesting the evidentiary basis of regulatory processes. In this sense, there is an ever-increasing interest in understanding how non-scientific actors – for example anti-GMO groups or non-industrial farmers – create and legitimize an 'evidential culture'.

In this paper we analyze the case of the emergent controversy over GMOs in Chile. Based on in-depth interviews and document analyses, we specifically examine how a key sector in the debate – organic and small farmers – constructs and frames its evidences regarding GMOs, what type of trials they mobilize, and which political strategies are fleshed out.

Our preliminary findings suggest a very particular epistemic configuration, one that we call hybrid epistemology. On the one hand, organic and small farmers claim forms of knowledge and evidence-making that are external to the scientific system. Specifically, they base their evidence production on two forms of knowledge: experiential and dialogical knowledge. On the other hand, they reconcile the contentious nature of their knowledge with a more technocratic and strategic approach. Characterized by notions of transparency, 'hard data', market operability and consensus-building, this technocratic and strategic approach prevails in the public debate and discourse. Finally, our work points at the specificity of the Chilean public debate over GMOs. While in developed countries organic and small farmers are usually characterized as representing contentious positions against GMOs, the strategy used by these groups in Chile does not openly contest the legitimacy of science as the basis of the decision-making process.

Ageing and employability - The influence of personal circumstances and individual factors

European labour markets are facing an ongoing demographic transition, namely the ageing of the working population. Meanwhile, many countries established several pathways to early retirement. As a consequence, employment rates of older workers became comparably low in Europe. To remain competitive, the European Employment Strategy has set the goal of raising the employment rate of older workers by enhancing their employability.

Although concepts of employability are often discussed, they are rarely operationalized. Regarding the ageing workforce, the term employability is regularly used in the context of further education and lifelong learning as well as in the context of health. However, according to current research, present concepts of employability consist of further dimensions. Besides health and education, work experiences, personal and family circumstances, individuals' attitudes and leanings as well as national policies and the economy need to be considered.

This study examines employability of different age groups in Germany. It can be shown that many dimensions of employability are of diverse influence to different age groups. At a higher working age, too little emphasis is given to personal circumstances and individual factors.

The study is based on the German household panel study "Labour market and social security", conducted yearly since 2007. Individual data can be linked to household and partner data. (<http://www.iab.de/en/befragung-gen/iab-haushaltspanel-pass.aspx>)

Privatization processes and institutional inequalities in health systems - Historical patterns and recent reforms in Argentina and El Salvador

Analysing the different cases of El Salvador and Argentina the paper shows how social inequalities in the access to health services have historically emerged and asks why major political actors took few initiatives to reduce them. It shows further that mechanisms of privatization, including user fees, health packages and privatization of health services have been very similar in both countries and increased existing social inequalities.

While upper class members can easily access good medical treatment in both countries, poorer groups are confronted with huge access barriers. Argentina normally seen as one of the "pioneer countries" (Mesa-Lago) establishing social security has a similar high stratification as the "exclusionary system" (Filgueira/Filgueira) of El Salvador.

The paper shows that health policy reflects social and political power relations and can be understood as an area of social conflict including struggles and compromises between different social groups. Structural paths were settled in the beginning of the 20th century, when the first institutions of social protection were built. During the following decades more groups of the population got access to health care – but different reforms rather institutionalized inequalities than overcoming them, because they did not touch the interests of influential social groups.

In both countries critical junctures (Collier) in the years 2001-2003 produced a shift in political power relations that had a direct impact on the health sector: a large social movement against health privatization in El Salvador and the vast political and economic crisis in Argentina. The paper discusses up to which point a turn towards more equality oriented health policies can be observed afterwards.

The paper draws on recent literature on health reforms and social policy in Latin America. The case studies are informed by field research and expert interviews being part of a doctoral thesis in Political Science concluded in 2011.

La regulación del servicio doméstico y del cuidado en Argentina y Francia. la articulación del trabajo y la familia en las clases medias profesionales

En la última década se han observado cambios importantes en la regulación de las actividades vinculadas al servicio doméstico, tanto en Argentina como en Francia. En Argentina, en el año 2000, se dicta el Régimen Especial de Seguridad Social para empleados del Servicio Doméstico que amplía las posibilidades de acceso a prestaciones en materia de salud y jubilaciones para las asalariadas. Cinco años más tarde, se implementa un programa de formalización del empleo doméstico, que implicó un impulso importante a la regularización de las actividades del sector. En Francia, desde 1987 el Estado promueve la contratación de servicios personales a través de distintas formas de exoneración fiscal. En 2005, con la creación del nuevo cheque de empleo y servicios se simplifica la contratación de servicio doméstico y del cuidado, acompañándola de las correspondientes exoneraciones fiscales.

El objetivo de esta puesta en perspectiva de la regulación del servicio doméstico y del cuidado en dos países cuyos Estados de bienestar tienen desarrollos muy diferentes, es analizar la manera en la que la legislación promueve una forma específica de resolver la conciliación trabajo-familia para las mujeres de clases medias.

En efecto, pese a los desarrollos disímiles de los Estados de bienestar en ambos países, se observa un mismo principio de base que podría enunciarse como la privatización del conflicto trabajo-familia. En este sentido, la responsabilidad de la resolución de dicho conflicto es transferida a los hogares y pasa por la contratación privada de una trabajadora doméstica. Esta transferencia implica importantes diferencias de clase en las formas en que se gestiona y se resuelve la articulación trabajo-familia.

La cuestión del canon en la literatura Argentina. Un campo cultural abierto en dos

Uno de los núcleos problemáticos que se dibujan con mayor nitidez al sumergirnos en el mundo de las letras argentinas es el de la cuestión del canon. A juzgar por la intensidad de los debates y el extendido interés que suscita entre críticos literarios, intelectuales y escritores, la preocupación por el canon, la problematización de quienes ocupan o deberían ocupar un panteón de la literatura nacional, representa una cuestión medular para los que protagonizan la vida literaria argentina. La noción de canon, la idea que postula que debe haber un conjunto de nombres u obras que deben preservarse y destacarse para salvarlas del flujo incesante e indiscriminado tendiente a la desdiferenciación al que empuja la proliferación de escrituras, se nos presenta como una doxa compartida, como un sentido común incontestado con arreglo al cual se fijan posiciones. El canon, en tanto idioma específico del espacio literario, representa el eje en torno al cual se articulan tradiciones, intereses y tendencias en conflicto.

Los debates que se organizan alrededor de la idea de canon que vamos a analizar aquí son una prueba de cómo se pegan a la problemática del canon un conjunto de discusiones de amplio alcance que, si bien refieren a cierto estado del campo y a las relaciones de fuerzas que allí se establecen, también se caracterizan por reflexionar sobre el estado de una cultura.

La investigación que proponemos presentar se realizó sobre la Revista Ñ (suplemento de cultura del diario Clarín), y consistió en el relevamiento, sistematización, procesamiento y análisis de todos los documentos, publicados desde el surgimiento de este suplemento (4/10/2003) hasta la última edición del año 2010, que retoman la discusión del canon para el sistema literario argentino.

Los desafíos en la re-estatización del servicio de agua potable y saneamiento en el área metropolitana de Buenos Aires

En la década del 90, la prestación de servicios de agua potable y alcantarillado en Argentina se vio afectada por la instauración del modelo neoliberal que alentó su privatización. Uno de los casos más controvertidos de este proceso fue la concesión de la empresa Aguas Argentinas S.A. encargada de abastecer de agua y cloacas al gran parte del Área Metropolitana de Buenos Aires (AMBA), donde hasta entonces habitaban cerca de 9 millones de personas.

La falta de cumplimiento del contrato y la crisis económica que vivió el país en el 2001 agravaron la situación de la empresa, generando el quiebre de la concesión y la re-estatización del servicio a través de la creación de empresa estatal Agua y Saneamiento Argentinos S.A. (AySA) en el año 2006.

La nueva gestión debe afrontar importantes desafíos: un atraso histórico en la inversión, la multiplicación de usos informales sin acceso al agua y saneamiento y una gran inequidad socio-espacial en la expansión del servicio. Como resultado de esta situación, en el Área Metropolitana de

Buenos Aires viven cerca de 3 millones de personas sin servicio de agua potable y 6 millones sin acceso a desagües cloacales.

En este artículo buscaremos describir la situación de agua y saneamiento en el AMBA en las últimas décadas, contrastando la gestión privatizada del servicio durante los 90; con la gestión estatal iniciada en el 2006. Intentaremos analizar cuáles son los principales desafíos que debe afrontar la gestión actual en relación a su financiamiento y a la demanda social.

Para responder a estas preguntas, se trabajará con un enfoque que incorpore técnicas cuantitativas y cualitativas y que permita complementar el análisis de los datos censales con los resultados obtenidos de entrevistas en profundidad realizadas a diferentes actores vinculados a la gestión del agua y saneamiento en la región.

Pharmaceutical and Italian health service among consumption and social construction in Italy

In this paper we retrace with a historical changes in the use and prescription of drugs and how this change fits within the new systems of health. The drug should be seen as social and as a cultural product (Fainzang, 2006; Tognetti Bordogna 2007) it is a good explanatory of the health behaviours of individuals and closely related to the cultural model of health and illness in a given society.

The drug is a complex object, as product of social practices varied over time, from context to context, whose significance goes well beyond its curative function (Tognetti Bordogna, 2009; Conrad, 1992).

The pharmacology, pharmacotherapy, production, demand and consumption of drugs represent different aspect of a reality, social and care, ranging from the purely scientific aspects to the cultural and existential (Busfield, 2006).

In today's society, it is well-rooted belief, rightly or wrongly, that you can not feel good without taking drugs.

It makes no sense to speak of prescriptive measure if not integrated with concepts of matrix sociological, anthropological and philosophical. The drug is more than just a tablet or vial, is something inanimate becomes a useful aid that fits within the doctor-patient relationship.

In the paper we will analyze in sociological perspective, the consumption of drugs in relation to the practices and in relation to the Italian Regional Health Systems, considering how and whether the consumer can change in relation to the organizational model of the Regional Health Service (Tognetti Bordogna, 2010).

After an analysis of major sociological approaches to the study of the drug retrace the historical evolution and the succession of the idea of drug in Italy and then dwell on how, and if, the different regional health systems weigh in on the organizational prescription and in taking the drug, based on data from secondary sources.

Derechos humanos y relaciones internacionales entre Italia y Argentina durante la dictadura militar (1976-1983)

The paper is the conclusion of a research about relationships among countries when in one of them are in course flagrant offenses against human rights. The specific frame concerns international relation between Italy and Argentine during the last military government.

Analicemos la complicidad internacional y específicamente la reconstrucción de las relaciones entre Italia y Argentina durante el período de la dictadura militar. La importancia del vínculo de sangre entre estos países, así como los lazos culturales, comerciales políticos y económicos abren un interrogativo sobre el comportamiento de Italia frente a una de las dictaduras más cruentas e inhumanas del siglo XX.

En esos años Italia mantuvo e incrementó las relaciones comerciales con Argentina. Nunca concedió refugio ni asilo político a los exiliados que escapaban de la dictadura. La embajada italiana en Buenos Aires cerró sus puertas para evitar que se llenase de refugiados como había ocurrido en el vecino Chile. En Italia son los años de oro de la Logia Masónica P2 y de Licio Gelli.

Este último había construido su poder entrelazando relaciones entre Italia y Argentina, en particular primero con Juan Domingo Perón y José Lopez Rega, para pasar después con la dictadura a través del almirante Emilio Massera y el general Suárez Mason, todas estas personas resultan regularmente inscriptas a la Logia.

La Comisión parlamentaria italiana que indagó la P2, en sus conclusiones señaló la necesidad de proseguir el trabajo en el campo internacional. Esta investigación se ha esforzado por dar algunos pasos en esa dirección.

The international circulation of researchers and their influences on scientific practices in Brazil: A case study by the human genome research center

The article has as its point of departure the study of the Centro de Estudos do Genoma Humano (Human Genome Research Center), located at the Universidade de São Paulo, to analyze the impacts and influences of the international circulation of researchers on scientific practices in Brazil. This work is part of the area of sociology of science that investigates the relationship between the process of institutionalization of science and the study referred to alterations of concrete scientific practices, encompassing patterns of research, agendas, broadcasting of the results and formation of new researchers. International mobility is treated in its two dimensions: the process of institutionalization of the laboratory in question – the conditions of its creation, its organizational arrangement and the relationship with other human genetic laboratories – and its effects on concrete practices of scientific activity.

The article is based on a qualitative study (qualitative interviews, observation in the laboratory and consultation to document sources) investigating the contents of this international movement, from the more institutional experience, such as graduate school abroad, to more informal mobility, such as participation in seminars and other forms of exchange of short duration. This study helps understand the effects of these temporary migrations in personal and professional accomplishments, career paths, as well as changes in their research practices and establishment of international research networks.

To discuss these issues, we start from the empirical study of the Human Genome Research Center. Cutting the discussion to a specific area of knowledge and to a specific institution is necessary, because the scientific activity can not be treated uniformly, there are different configurations according to the knowledge area, institution, etc. We seek to understand how the general trends of the internationalization of science are expressed in a national context and in a specific area of knowledge.

Es la universidad una garantía de futuro? Los efectos de la educación superior en licenciados de sectores populares

En este trabajo, busco analizar las trayectorias sociales de universitarias y universitarios de clases populares de Bogotá, con miras a indagar las modalidades de inserción social resultantes de la educación universitaria, en un contexto socioeducativo selectivo y excluyente.

Los hallazgos muestran que el bajo capital cultural de estos jóvenes los lleva a concentrar acciones para el mejoramiento de habilidades escolares, como aprender a escribir o hablar en público, con lo cual deben duplicar sus esfuerzos académicos. En tal sentido, deben atravesar un costoso proceso de adaptación a la universidad y, además, compensar sus desventajas escolares, aunque esto implique renunciar a acumular capital social, susceptible de ser movilizad o en el momento de ingresar al mercado laboral.

Muchos de los entrevistados no habían ejercido ocupaciones vinculadas con sus licenciaturas. Sin embargo, valoraban la cultura adquirida en la universidad, reafirmando el carácter "moralizante" de la educación pero criticando su capacidad como garantía de mejores trabajos y remuneraciones. Con base en estas experiencias, es posible pensar que la universidad permite formas de inserción social que divergen de las propias del modelo clásico de movilidad social ascendente, debido a que el paso por la universidad de los entrevistados se dio a la par con la transformación del mundo del trabajo y los sistemas educativos, manifiesta en la flexibilización laboral, la segmentación de currículos y formaciones y la disminución del valor relativo de títulos y diplomas, lo cual representa una refutación a los postulados meritocráticos como mecanismo de acceso a determinadas posiciones sociales. Además, su origen social los situó en un lugar desventajoso ya que suplir una serie de diferencias culturales de clase que operan como desigualdades educativas y que inciden en la distribución de capital económico, cultural y social.

Interracial unions and fertility in Brazil: Are there differences when couples are racially mixed?

In this paper we assume a relational perspective (based on Bourdieu's idea of habitus) on couple's fertility decision. We assume that the couple's number of children is an outcome of an interaction process based on each partners' habitus. Desires, expectations, and incorporated/embedded social practices are daily negotiated and the fertility strategies are formed within the union. Interracial unions are unique interactions because they make possible the negotiation between individuals with distinct habitus in terms of family formation and, consequently, fertility strategies, which may become different from their social origins when negotiated with his/her spouse.

Comparing the number of children between interracial and same race couples, using Brazilian Census data for the year 2000, we found that mixed race couples have different fertility from same race couples. More important, they have fertility in between the two racial groups of the spouses, this result indicates that these couples have an innovative reproductive behavior, in which each spouse contributes with about 50% on the decision process. Considering the potential asymmetry between the racial groups, the results show that the darker partner has a slightly lower decision power on fertility, after controlling for women's education.

In this article, we propose an innovative theoretical approach for couple's fertility decisions. We understand fertility as a result of adaptive strategies (assimilation or innovation), resistance (or rupture), or selectivity process in terms of interracial couples formation process. This framework, usually used for analyzing changes in fertility strategies of migrant women, seems to be useful for a better understanding of fertility behavior of interracial couples.

Análisis comparado de trayectorias académicas de varones y mujeres. Un estudio de casos múltiples en la universidad pública de Uruguay

En la ciencia académica el ideal de trayectoria "normal", marcada por la progresiva acumulación de reconocimiento y autoridad, juega un papel central en la forma en que los científicos viven y evalúan su trabajo. Sin embargo, este ideal no se adapta de igual forma para varones y mujeres. En tanto que, las trayectorias académicas no deberían ser entendidas únicamente a partir de los méritos objetivos contenidos en los currículos, sino que las mismas se construyen en la interacción de múltiples roles. Esto es especialmente relevante para el análisis de las trayectorias académicas de las mujeres, dado que las características de la labor académica (como la entrega personal, las largas e intensas horas de trabajo, y las expectativas de reconocimiento, entre otras) interactúan de manera particular con la asignación de roles a partir de la división sexual del trabajo.

Tomando como ejemplo los casos de ingeniería en computación y biología en la universidad pública de Uruguay (UdelaR), este trabajo analiza qué características tienen las trayectorias académicas de los/as investigadores/as, cuán heterogéneas son entre varones y mujeres y cómo influyen diferentes trayectorias familiares. Asimismo se analiza la existencia de cambios generacionales, así como las principales barreras de género percibidas por investigadores/as y las estrategias utilizadas ante ellas.

La presentación, en primer lugar, avanza en la discusión conceptual sobre la noción de trayectoria académica "normal" y en la construcción de un marco teórico que articule aportes de los enfoques de ciencia, tecnología y sociedad, sociología de la ciencia y de género. En segundo lugar, se combina el uso de técnicas cualitativas y cuantitativas para contextualizar y reconstruir de forma comparada las trayectorias académicas y familiares de varones y mujeres. Por último se discuten las limitantes del abordaje y se proponen posibles líneas de investigación y recomendaciones a la política de ciencia y tecnología.

Future orientations and economic success: Empirical analyses informed by the theory of planned behavior

Drawing on the theory of planned behavior, this paper examines the role of psychological determinants for Poles' economic success, above and beyond the traditional determinants of occupational achievement. I expect that peoples' outlook on the future – in terms of perceived opportunities and threats, or their general perception of times to come – has a lasting impact on their economic accomplishments, understood here as attaining higher income and/or privileged class membership. I analyze this relation over time, considering that the current status (S_t) is an additive function of future orientations (F_{t+1}) and earlier status (S_{t-2}). The Polish Panel Survey POLPAN provides the data for my analyses. In this survey, a representative sample of adult Poles was interviewed in 1988 and re-interviewed in 1993, 1998, 2003 and 2008. Methodologically, I use (a) lag variables in OLS and in logistic regression for particular time-points, and (b) cross-sectional time-series analysis that accounts for autocorrelation and multicollinearity stemming from the hierarchical structure of panel data. Results support the main hypothesis in this study: consistently, thinking confidently about the future has positive effects on earnings and on belonging to the privileged social classes. This impact is substantive and statistically significant when prior income and social class, demographic characteristics, and education are controlled for. The results are robust under the specification of models in cross-sectional and panel regression forms.

The political context of discrimination in Europe: Assessing trends on the basis of the European social survey (ESS)

In Central and Eastern Europe, discrimination of ethnic minorities became more salient after the fall of communism, as society embraced party pluralism and freedom of speech. In light of the recent hostility toward minorities in both West and CEE countries, it has been argued that the surge in right-wing politics and nationalism more so than the recent economic world crisis, are fuelling discrimination. This paper uses the European Social Survey (ESS) to examine trends in discrimination from two points of view, and with respect to two different groups of people: in the first group are those who feel discriminated against because of their ethnicity, while the second group is comprised of people who espouse xenophobic attitudes. Our analysis covers over 20 European countries in the period 2002-2010. The main research questions are: Controlling for ethnic composition in each country, is feeling of discrimination more prevalent in countries with stronger xenophobic attitudes than in countries more tolerant to outsiders? To what extent do political factors influence both the feeling of being discriminated against, and intolerant attitudes, beyond economic factors? Multilevel regression analysis on the ESS data provides the statistical means to examine the effects of country-level and individual-level determinants, and their interactions, on feeling discriminated and on xenophobic attitudes through time. Political and economic variables at the country level include index of democracy, index of ethnic representation in parliaments, index of right-wing sentiments, index of consumption level, and index of income inequality. On the individual level we focus on perception of governmental functioning and one's evaluation of personal standard of living. The analysis demonstrates how these variables are related to xenophobic attitudes, controlling for national, ethnic and religious allegiances. At the end of the paper, we discuss theoretical implications of our findings for analysis of democracy and inequality in Europe.

Effects in local areas of global justice movement: Anti-G8 protests in Japan, Okinawa in 2000 and Hokkaido in 2008

This presentation aims to investigate the effects of summit protests in Japan. Anti-G8 protest is the one of global justice movements; however, it is held in a limited space within a certain period of time. Therefore summit protests have an impact on the interested local residents.

My research chooses two areas in which anti-G8 summit protests occurred. These two places are Okinawa and Hokkaido. Summit protest in Okinawa was held in 2000 and Summit protest in Hokkaido was held in 2008. In these protests, residents play an important role in civil action. My study shows that the activists in Okinawa mainly constituted networks with foreign activists. On the case of summit protest in Hokkaido they were able to create partnership with domestic activists because local residents think other Japanese protesters as model but activists in Okinawa had anticipatory for activists in other area in Japan.

Okinawa residents regarded themselves as a "sufferer" because they were forced to set up a lot of military bases among Japanese regions. On the other hands, Hokkaido residents considered themselves as rural inhabitants. Each local resident had collective identity and participated summit protest. The differences in their civil actions are based on local residents that constitute a portion of the activism network in these localities. Recent researchers also described protesters in summit protests constitute networks. My research adds to this argument and concludes that constituted network depends on the dispositions of local participants.

The notions of "art of life," "art of agriculture," and "art of beauty" are some of the principles of salvation in a Japanese New Religion called Sekai Kyusei Kyo (SKK) which is known in Brazil as Igreja Messianica Mundial do Brasil. In SKK, salvation regards not only to spiritual realm but also to this world focusing especially on Nature theme and daily life. Previous studies of SKK (Clarke, 2008) point out the need of elucidating its contribution to a new vision of the environment and the economy, based on a harmonic and sustainable way of dealing with natural resources. Derechos humanos e iglesia católica en el contexto de las elecciones presidenciales de Brasil en 2010

El contexto empírico de este trabajo son las elecciones para la presidencia de la república ocurridas en Brasil en octubre del 2010 y el posicionamiento asumido por la Iglesia Católica por medio de sus representantes y organismos institucionales en la polémica, durante la campaña electoral, en torno al Tercer Programa Nacional de Derechos Humanos. A partir de ese contexto, buscamos trazar el trayecto histórico de la posición asumida por la Iglesia Católica frente a los Derechos Humanos en Brasil, mostrando como la institución ha dejado de protagonizar su defensa y promoción a medida que nuevos actores y causas sociales relacionadas con los derechos sexuales y reproductivos fueron incorporados en la matriz discursiva de los Derechos Humanos. Así, si en el periodo de la dictadura militar la Iglesia Católica estuvo identificada con las fuerzas sociales progresistas al denunciar la tortura de presos políticos y las causas estructurales de la pobreza, en el contexto democrático, su posición ha pasado a identificarse, sobretudo, con las fuerzas conservadoras de la sociedad, a medida que su acción política pasó a concentrarse en la lucha contra la incorporación de las cuestiones de género en la agenda del movimiento de defensa de los Derechos Humanos, especialmente aquellas que afectan el campo de la moral sexual. De acuerdo con lo que buscamos presentar, la Iglesia católica dejó de privilegiar la defensa de los Derechos Humanos desde el campo político, en que los sujetos del derecho eran los presos políticos y los pobres, y paso para el campo de la sexualidad y de la ley natural, en que los derechos del embrión, traducidos en términos del derecho a la vida, y la defensa de la familia heterosexual adquirieron centralidad.

Participacion de las organizaciones de la sociedad civil en el proceso de democratizacion en córdoba, Argentina periodo 1983/ 2010

La activación y ampliación del campo de las organizaciones de la sociedad civil (OSC), en Argentina, desde 1983 en adelante, expresa uno de los componentes propios de las relaciones sociales del periodo de transición de la dictadura a la democracia. Si, en el marco del proceso de democratización se analizan los modelos de desarrollo en pugna, las crisis sociales económicas y políticas del periodo, podemos distinguir tres momentos: 1983/1989; 1990/2001 y 2002/ 2010. En cada uno de estas fases, varían los significados atribuidos a la participación de las OSC.

Se transforma el sentido democratizador por parte de las organizaciones inscriptas en el espacio de la sociedad civil. Por momentos predomina una perspectiva despolitizada sobre el rol de las OSC, en otros se propicia la re politización de la sociedad civil en general. Aunque ambas perspectivas con frecuencia se yuxtaponen y configuran un espacio de debate y disputa sobre los espacios a ocupar, el carácter autónomo de las organizaciones, los niveles de articulación y alianzas y lo sectores sociales que se movilizan.

Se presenta un estudio de casos sobre las trayectorias de participación sociopolítica de OSC de la ciudad de Córdoba, Argentina, en cada uno de los tramos considerados, a los fines de establecer los aportes y desafíos de las experiencias asociativas en el proceso de democratización.

La participación de las OSC, se analiza: en las relaciones con el Estado; sus articulaciones y alianzas en el campo de la sociedad civil; la conformación de los grupos y referentes y en relación a los significados éticos y políticos del proceso.

¿Se avizora cambio sustantivo respecto de la construcción política de la democracia? ¿Esta dinámica de participación asociativa de las OSC contribuye a la incorporación de los intereses y de la participación popular como contenido de la democracia real?

Intergenerational solidarity and care of older people: Linking families and bureaucracy in context

This presentation examines how the intersection of family and bureaucracy affects intra- and inter-generational solidarity between older persons and their family caregivers. It is conceptually based on Shanas and Sussman's typology of dimensions of linkages between bureaucracies and primary groups. Within a large multi-phase study of home (domiciliary) care workers, elderly clients and family carers in Canada, we analyze interviews with 24 dyads of older people receiving home-based health and social care, and their informal caregivers (i.e. spouses and daughters). This allows us both to identify different forms of solidarity in family relations, and to explore how complex systems of care (linking families and both private and public sector workers) influence this solidarity.

Our analysis of the dyad's routines of care found that despite the use of private and public services related to the provision of in-home health and social support, solidarity between older people and their family caregivers is not weakened. On the contrary, it remains strong due to the contingent characteristics of the formal home care system. The role of the family is essential to provide and negotiate key aspects of client's care that are not addressed by the formal care system. In this context, private bureaucracy complements both client's self-care and family care, serving to compensate for the inconsistencies of the services received.

Although our analysis is based on data from Canada, our reflections include a comparative stance that takes into account how the presence of bureaucracy (both public and private) differentially affects the solidarity between older people and their families. While Canada has a strong presence of bureaucratic institutions, in which the welfare state plays an important role, in other countries like Chile, characterized by its neoliberal policies, the role of the bureaucracy is still marginal and family solidarity almost the only alternative.

Movimientos sociales: Revisitando la categoría identidad desde un enfoque espacial

Nos interesa en este trabajo discutir las identidades sociales y políticas (Giménez, 1996) configuradas alrededor de los movimientos sociales, pensando en su potencialidad analítica desde un enfoque espacial.

El concepto de lugar (Agnew, 1987) remite a configuraciones subjetivas de sentidos de apropiación y pertenencia, refiere al espacio definido y entendido en términos identitarios que, en estos casos, son identidades sociales y espaciales en un mismo movimiento. Por su parte, el concepto de territorio (Sack, 1986; Raffestin, 1993; Fernández, 2005) permite pensar en el poder y el control de un determinado espacio, marcando sus límites y la posibilidad de entrar y salir del mismo; remite a relaciones de fuerza, conflicto y disputa que nos ayudan a pensar la configuración de identidades políticas.

Proponemos analizar las prácticas espaciales (Lefebvre, 1974) de los movimientos sociales a través de los conceptos de lugar y territorio que suponen una herramienta para pensar las configuraciones identitarias sociales y políticas de los mismos. A través del análisis de dichas prácticas analizamos los procesos de significación, de asignación de sentidos sociales que transforma el espacio en un lugar, en torno del cual se producen y recrean identidades sociales. Asimismo, nos interrogamos acerca de las formas mediante las cuales un espacio o un lugar se territorializa, se politiza y supone la transformación de una identidad social en una identidad política con inscripción territorial.

Media representations of migrant care workers in Swedish daily newspapers

This presentation will depart from the debate on migrant care workers found in the literature on international migration as well as in research on elderly care. The latter often depicts these workers as the solution to the recruitment needs that this welfare sector is facing while the former problematizes, among others, what the 'migrancy of care' entails. The presentation will depart from a project that explores the way in which ethnicity- and migration-related issues have been discussed in the media debate on elderly care in Sweden. The data is constituted of all articles published on this subject between 1995 and 2010 (all in all 118 articles have been analyzed; this presentation will primarily focus on the 56 that focus on migrant care workers). The analysis shows that ethnicity- and migration-related issues are discussed differently depending on the elderly care actor that is in focus. Care recipients with migrant backgrounds have often been described as a burden to this welfare sector while migrant care workers seem to be regarded as an asset even when their skills are being implicitly questioned. The presentation addresses, in other words, the paradoxical way in which daily newspapers 'construct' migrant care workers. As such, it contributes to the ongoing debate on media representations of ethnic 'Otherness' in general and migrant care workers in particular.

Understandings of ethnic 'otherness' in need assessment practices

This presentation departs from the research gaps that exist in the debate on institutional categorization as far as the implications of ethnic 'otherness' are concerned. There is also a gap in the manner in which such understandings affect the political economy of care and there is also a lack of research on the intersection between ethnic 'Otherness' and old age. The project upon which this presentation is based departs from all of these debates and focuses on need assessment practice within the context of Swedish elderly care. As such, it aims to contribute to research on images of old age as these are constructed through welfare sector practices. At stake are the following research questions: do understandings of cross-cultural care interaction and ethnic 'Otherness' affect the manner in which need assessment processes legitimize and restrict access to certain elderly care services and if so, how. The data for this project is comprised of focus group interviews with need assessors (a total of 60 have been interviewed) as well as a total of 200 need assessment journals. The findings suggest that need assessors' understandings of ethnic 'Otherness' do affect the need assessment process and that alternative elderly care services are being designed as a result of it. Need assessment practices differentiate between older people with migrant backgrounds and those who belong to the ethnic majority population. As such the findings suggest that need assessors' understandings of old age differ depending on which social positions elderly people 'inhabit'. The presentation will contribute to the debate on institutional categorization and how lack of an awareness of the implications on ethnic 'Otherness' influence power differentials in old age.

The use of the body image as a strategy for engagement in social media

The use of digital communication networks has been a key strategy in activist events involving demonstrations all over the world. Its utilization was evident in the media's repeated publication of pictures taken on demonstrators' mobile phones during the actions that have overthrown heads during the Arab Spring in 2011. In those countries, social network websites and mobile communication devices (phones and notebooks) were widely used in the organization of participants and in the recording of the events.

Given the importance of the image in the contemporary society, it is intriguing to observe the way it was threatened by activists in the cases mentioned above. Images created by mobile devices can be highly meaningful to the audience. Besides their power in fulfilling emergency needs, substituting mass media broadcasting where it cannot or doesn't want to be, they are invested with a high symbolic value able to activate new waves of mobilization.

In this work, it is intended to analyze these images taking into account the way the body is used to create them and how it is represented in order to provoke engagement. Since the use of social media in protests caught the attention of the press and broadcasting media in 2009, during demonstrations in Iran against the reelection of the president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, it can be noticed a strong connection between the contents circulating through these tools and the body. In Tunisia, Egypt and Libya the same is observed with a series of strategies connecting the body image with participation by means of communication technologies.

Technophobia and ambivalence to the information and communication technologies (ICT) and its impact on the digital divide. Empirical evidence and theoretical discussion

Within the social sciences there is some consensus in explaining the emergence and development of the digital divide from social variables (such as education and age), or psychological variables (such as perceived usefulness or difficulty attributed). However, low attention has been given the role of negative (technophobia) or ambivalent social representations about technology in general, and ICTs in particular, in the process of incorporating these technologies in everyday life. Our paper will show the precise mechanism that these technophobic or ambivalent social representations intervene in processes of individual appropriation of Information and Communication Technologies (ICTs). Without denying the relevance of sociodemographic and psychological usual variables, the paper will highlight the importance of such social images about the technoscience in the genesis and development of the digital divide. Finally, we will consider the consequences of this new explanatory approach to the use of ICT and the digital divide has for the processes of social exclusion in contemporary information and knowledge societies. In the theoretical discussion we will provide empirical evidence from a study about Spanish citizenship which have used both qualitative methods (with in-depth interviews and focus groups) and quantitative methods (using a representative survey).

Riesgos, desastres y procesos electorales en México

Los desastres desencadenados por fenómenos naturales o por humanos generan catástrofes que alteran la vida cultural, económica y política de un lugar determinado. Por lo general, develan las contradicciones del sistema y sus debilidades. En el ámbito electoral, han sido detonantes de la caída de gobiernos, del cambio en las preferencias electorales y se han usado como botín político.

Las teorías acerca del comportamiento del votante reconocen que una contingencia en tiempos de elecciones puede cambiar el rumbo anunciado por las tendencias electorales. Newman y Sheth (1987) a finales de los ochenta definieron que las contingencias eran uno de los cinco factores que influyen en la decisión del votante, junto con asuntos políticos, características sociales, imagen del candidato y el valor que la ciudadanía diese al cambio o la continuidad.

De tal manera que inundaciones, terremotos, huracanes o accidentes industriales, entre otros, pueden generar situaciones donde la respuesta de las autoridades, así como la postura de los diversos actores políticos influyen sobre las simpatías del ciudadano y orienten su decisión durante la jornada electoral. Múltiples casos sirven de ejemplo.

Los desastres y la vulnerabilidad social son, además, asuntos importantes en la administración de México. En este caso, instituciones públicas como Protección Civil dan cuenta de ello. Los avances que los gobiernos federales, estatales y locales han logrado en la materia son grandes, sin embargo, aún son insuficientes. Hay un largo camino por recorrer y muchos desafíos por enfrentar. El manejo de emergencias y desastres tiene muchos retos por delante y omisiones que atender.

El presente trabajo se plantea de cara a las elecciones presidenciales en 2012 en México y tiene como objetivo analizar los discursos electorales de los candidatos con referencia a los desastres, el manejo de emergencias, la mitigación del riesgo y la reducción de la vulnerabilidad.

Ethnic identity patterns in rural Turkey: Life histories of lazi and Hemshin women

In Turkey, the development of a national polity and the accompanying acceleration of modernization and of capitalist social relations established a new national culture and society, which has affected even the most remote areas of the country. However, despite this trend toward a greater uniformity, local traditions and local loyalties still retain a vitality that is seldom fully appreciated.

The Lazi and the Hemshin people are known as two neighbouring people of the eastern Black Sea region. With their histories, pasts, cultures and economic lives, and also with their mutual relationships stemming from their status as neighbours such as tension/solidarity, conflict/competition, these two neighbouring people of the region are living a fairly closed life. These aspects of their lives are constantly affecting and defining their present.

Lazi and Hemshin women are subjected to a multi-layered exploitation within the framework of the life conditions, experiences and patterns determined by historical-political-economic-social conditions. This multi-layered exploitation mechanism has come into being, continues to be and is reproduced by the positioning of the patriarchal system, the socio-cultural restructuring of the society in the process of nation-state building and the gendered property-work relations in rural life. The reproduced gendered work relations in rural life manifest themselves through the fact that women are the main labour force in the agricultural production and housework.

This study, by following the narratives of these women that are full of life experiences neglected from the official history, attempts to make a critical revelation of the social history of Turkey with an emphasis on how the Lazi and Hemshin women have told their life-stories in the context of conflicts and alliances in socio-political history of Turkey, of poverty, of oppression in gendered agrarian relations.

Euro-orphans or nobody's children - the door open to exclusion

'Euro-orphans' are defined as children whose parents have emigrated due to economical reasons and left their children behind. Some are cared by grandparents, siblings, other relatives, neighbours or left by themselves. At present, the social policy does not employ a term 'euro-orphan', and accordingly there is no social policy intervention towards this group of children. According to estimates, in Latvia, in 2011 there are about 8000 euro-orphans, which is more than the number of children officially defined as orphans or social orphans.

The paper is based on a study of Euro-orphans in Latvia based on document analyses, expert interviews and interviews, and use of art project.

The paper analyses various age groups of euro-orphans – younger school age (7-10), preadolescents (11-13) and teenagers. The younger children seem to find it easier to accept the absence of parents. Pre-adolescents and teenagers suffer the most. It exhibits in various ways – and the most visible are poor success at school, might fall into a bad company, using alcohol and drugs and starting criminal activities. Invisible harm is depressive mood, living a fragmented life 'from call to call' or from 'visit to visit' or 'when leaving my home country and start new life'.

The author will describe different models of substitute parenting and the role of various agents that decreases the risk of social exclusion of those children.

Social and vocational integration of youth leaving residential care

In ex-socialist countries tens of thousands of children and youth still live in social institutions (orphanages), although majority of them have alive biological parents. After turning 18 they must leave the orphanage and start independent life, in many cases without appropriate education, practical skills and adequate cultural and social capital. That is the main reason of risk of social exclusion. The author attempts to explain the main risks of social exclusion for care leavers and points some important steps that should be taken to lessen the risk of social exclusion of those young people and discuss necessary political interventions to improve the inclusion of care leavers.

The analyses is based on the data from a research Inclusion of Youth after leaving institutional care (EU PROGRESS Programme) in five countries (Latvia, Bulgaria, Romania, France and Italy). Study is based on expert interviews, interviews with young people leaving care, focus group discussions with care leavers and policy analyses in all five countries.

Excess mortality among clients in alcohol treatment in Latvia: A record-linkage study

Introduction. Alcohol consumption is among the leading factors for mortality and morbidity worldwide. It has been estimated that around 4 percent of deaths globally are attributable to alcohol use with the highest proportion of deaths attributable to alcohol seen in Eastern Europe (more than 10%) and Latin America (around 8%), while the lowest – in Africa. One way of analyzing mortality is through record-linkage studies.

Objective. The aim of this study is to investigate mortality and causes of deaths among clients in alcohol treatment in Latvia and possible socio-economic factors and mediators.

Study design. Individual level data on clients in public alcohol treatment in Latvia from the Patient REGISTER DAtabase (PREDA) were linked with the General Mortality Register (GMR) based on a unique personal identifier. Directly standardized mortality rates, standardized mortality ratios and survival probabilities were calculated for different age and gender groups.

Results. Over the period of 2000–2011 a total of 42,894 unique individuals were treated for problems related with alcohol intoxication, dependence or psychosis, of which by the end of follow-up 7,496 had died. The highest mortality rates and lowest survival probability was among clients who have received treatment for problems related with alcohol psychosis, while the lowest mortality – for clients with less severe alcohol problems. The most common cause of death was ischemic heart disease (ICD-10 I20-I25), followed by cardiomyopathy (I42), and liver diseases (K70-K77).

Conclusions. This study suggest record-linkage studies are a valuable tool in analyzing mortality in Latvia as analyzing only aggregate cause-specific mortality rates might be under-reporting of alcohol-related mortality. By taking into account high mortality rates among most severe alcohol treatment clients evidence-based alcohol policies and treatment services should be introduced.

The effects of web-based and paper-and-pencil questionnaire administration in school surveys on substance use

Introduction. For more than a decade social researchers have been looking into employing computerized instruments in school surveys, which have traditionally used paper-and-pencil (P&P) questionnaires.

Objective. The aim of this study is to investigate differences in responses to questions about tobacco, alcohol and drug use between two modes of questionnaire administration: web-based and paper-and-pencil.

Study design. A total of 691 students aged 14-17 in 32 classes in Riga city were randomly assigned to one of the two modes of questionnaire administration. The questionnaire used for 2011 data collection in Latvia within framework of the European School Survey Project on Alcohol and other Drugs (ESPAD) was tested. The questionnaire included questions about substance use (use of tobacco, alcohol, cannabis and other drugs) as well as questions about leisure time, attitudes, risk perceptions, etc. The differences in results between the two modes of questionnaire administration were tested by logistic regression.

Results. All but a few substance use prevalence rates were found to be higher among respondents of the web-based questionnaire but none of differences was found to be statistically significant after controlling for cluster effects, age and gender.

Conclusions. This study revealed that computer administered surveys are feasible in school settings in Latvia. The higher reported substance use prevalence rates for web version of the questionnaire, although not statistically significant, makes us cautious about recommending changing from the traditional P&P mode, especially for surveys with trend data. Web-based questionnaire was very well perceived by respondents as well as by school administration, which is crucial to consider in the future in the light of decreasing response rates. As reduction in costs of web-based as compared with traditional surveys is considerable, it would make studies more affordable, especially in countries with limited resources.

Addressing the impact of globalization, poverty and women's labor force participation: Three case studies

As aspect of economic liberalization and globalization has been the deregulation of labor markets accompanied by the informalization and feminization of work. While more women around the world are part of the paid labor force, many of these jobs are outside of the formal, regulated labor sector. This informalization translates into many working women lacking social and legal protections. The same trend has also been accompanied by the feminization of poverty as more women work for very low wages and under hardship conditions.

This paper will examine the effects of globalization and the confluence of the women's movement on women's labor market participation in low-income and non-Western countries. Specifically, the paper will concentrate on the experiences of women caught between Western ideologies that view women's labor as self-empowering and the realities of globalization that force women to work outside of the home under sub-standard conditions. Moreover, many of these women struggle with gender constructs that emphasize their roles as wives and mothers and not as primary breadwinners. In many cultural contexts, working women must negotiate their new roles with men who are not supportive of their external employment and yet, are dependent on their wives' incomes. The paper will then move towards discussing and analyzing several programs in India, Bangladesh and Burkina Faso in Africa, that have successfully helped train women to work outside of the home and have also provided them with skills that teach self-empowerment, networking, and role negotiation. These case studies illustrate that while globalization has further exacerbated hardship conditions for women, there are also opportunities that can be capitalized and expanded on.

The ethnic project: How racial fiction buttresses ethnic factions

The United States has a system of racial hierarchy with the white racial category at its apex, black at its nadir, and several other categories in between. Most people in the United States hold racial and ethnic positions at the same time. (Those who do not ethnically identify have been sociohistorically incorporated as fully "white" or "black," the only two racial categories that tend to link ethnic erasure with racial adaptation.) Wealth-holding men seeking to protect their power created whiteness and used it to coopt poor European contract (indentured) laborers who might otherwise have joined with enslaved Africans to threaten to overthrow the wealthy's power.

The U.S. racial system has shaped the inclusion of other groups since, and to this day pervades all U.S. social relations. Each group of "ethnics" – from native Americans through the "newest" arriving immigrant group – has been subject to the dictates of racial incorporation. Generally speaking, racial inclusion has meant subjugation to the bottom of the hierarchy, but some groups have managed to raise their racial status over time. This status-raising occurs not because of the benevolence of the dominant racial group, but because the status-raising group used their social agency in particular ways. Moreover, I argue, all racialized ethnic groups have similar desires to raise their racial status, but not all groups have equal power to realize those desires. My paper will present a theory of "ethnic projects," or the process by which group agency carries out a quest for racial uplift. I will also theorize about the elements of ethnic projects that account for group success or failure in their ethnic project, using various U.S. ethnic histories as case-study evidence.

Rebeldes del maguey: Rituales de interacción en el punk toluqueño

Una de las voces disonantes juveniles más vitales lo ha sido el punk mexicano, que se ha expandido en varios nichos matris del país. Especialmente para implantarse entre jóvenes de las clases populares y de origen indígena, tanto en las ciudades como en los pueblos y comunidades pos-rurales del país. Muchos de estos jóvenes han encontrado nuevas formas de protesta y resistencia en los colectivos anarco-punks, otros más deambulan en las formas expresivas y alternativas de los géneros musicales post-punks y otros tantos se quedaron varados en los problemas de las drogas del sistema que tanto cuestionaron. Sin embargo, se puede encontrar todavía que aunque la cresta del movimiento punk ha pasado, muchos de sus protagonistas y adherentes continúan buscando formas nuevas de expresar su luchas contra el consumismo alienante y las formas autoritarias de control y manipulación políticas del mundo contemporáneo, sea a través de proyectos que utilizan el fanzone, el video o cualquier otra forma de expresión que permita ventilar la contracultura punketa.

Es lo que las experiencias colectivas, musicales y generacionales de Desahogo Personal y Orines de Puerco, llenas de encono y mordacidad, representarían para el movimiento punketo hardcorerero del Valle de Toluca. Las dos agrupaciones arriba mencionadas son las pioneras de una historia musical del punk en Toluca, pero sus consecuencias pueden considerarse para el aspecto popular-anarquista que da contenido al punk como fenómeno sociocultural.

Como réplica del punk inglés y neoyorquino, el punk mexicano contiene tanto raíces musicales como sociales en la historia de su recreación hacia principios de la década de los ochenta. Se destaca también por su origen popular y urbano, tanto de origen proletariado o suburbano, como por su contagio y extensión en jóvenes cuyo origen étnico y campesino les ha hecho llegar tardíamente al movimiento y manifestación política radicalizada.

The rationalization of academic work

The academic profession is often characterised as an occupation that enjoys high levels of intellectual freedom, autonomy, and collegial governance. However, means-ends rationalities—enacted in New Public Management (NPM) and taking shape in standardised performance appraisals—are externally imposed and internally incorporated in higher education. This process of rationalization has been occurring globally, although at different rates in different countries. Procedural and formal rationality is used to justify the practices of NPM. Accountability, objectivity, and justice generate criteria for evaluating the competences of academics and the legitimacy of knowledge production. I will argue that rationalized performance appraisals render academics not only controllable, but also “knowable” and, ultimately, “useful” or “deviant.” Accordingly, the foundation of academics’ professional autonomy is challenged in the rationalized and disciplined environment. Although this may well be novel in university settings, such practices and social norms are becoming institutionalised as they are embedded and embodied in social relationships and face-to-face interactions. This creates new social classifications and thus constructs identities, desires, aspirations, beliefs and emotions. According to Ian Hacking ways of classifying became possible in industrial bureaucracies and are the result of a recent democratization of some social sciences. New ways of classifying people open up spaces for new kinds to emerge. These kinds are new ways to be, and new options to choose, this is new ways to choose who one is. Identity and autonomy are, in this sense, interrelated. Drawing on work of Foucault and Goffman, the paper will explore the ways in which Hacking’s concept of looping effect might occur in an academic environment. Therefore, it will problematize: how academics have been “made up”; how the academic profession is being remodelled by the global process of rationalization; and, the impact this rationalization has on academic professional autonomy and identity work.

La acción en el espacio público: Mujer y trabajo

Esta ponencia tratará de abordar alguno de los elementos para comprender la construcción del significado de la cultura política de las mujeres en el marco de un discurso que considera como “invisibles” por un lado, las contribuciones y apariciones que han hecho las mujeres, tanto en el espacio privado del hogar, como en el mundo político, social, económico, artístico, cultural, científico, etc., o sea el espacio público, la esfera pública.

Problematizar teóricamente el concepto de visibilidad del trabajo de las mujeres, así como la emergencia de su visibilidad, sobre los modos, el discurso, las formas jurídicas, las posibilidades políticas y las restricciones de acceso al mundo educativo y laboral por parte de las mujeres, adquiere vigencia en torno a la relación de “existencia pública”, de “aparición política”, del trabajo, la labor y la acción política de las mujeres que trabajan en México

Al politizarse género y cultura, son importantes las nociones de especificidad cultural, que señalan a las mujeres como portadoras simbólicas de la cultura, identificando paradójicamente la diferencia cultural que con la sola mención de la existencia de un ámbito determinado del comportamiento de las mujeres, hace que prevalezcan ciertas prácticas sociales y formas de relativismo cultural radical que, en nombre de la diferencia, niegan a la mujer sus derechos humanos fundamentales y por ende sus capacidades.

Si bien hombres y mujeres son, en términos de igualdad, y con base en la cualidad humana de ser distintos, creadores y productores de la cultura en sus sociedades; es paradójico que las mujeres, en lo general, tienen escasa y en muchos casos, ninguna libertad para comunicar su propio yo, para tomar iniciativas, para actuar, para expresar tanto en la acción como en el discurso su posibilidad de presentarse a los otros como diferentes, pero “... Iguales como seres humanos”. (Arendt, 1993:201).

Children’s participation in school: An analysis on decision making competences and children’s citizenship

Children’s participation in co decision making processes in particular settings such as school is a crucial element to consider the possibility of a childhood citizenship. Contemporary debates on citizenship argue the need to rethink private and public spheres and underline the need to take into account lived experiences and an extended view beyond formal rights and duties perspectives. To consider them as citizens, therefore, we must be able to see them as political subjects with specific political action carried out in everyday life settings. Children’s competences to co decide, to create rules and to analyse different options can be seen as an important question to argue on children’s citizenship. Moreover, if school are viewed as a particular setting of political socialisation where children are able to display political competences on collective life, citizenship can be there studied. However complexities in such contexts must be pointed out, namely on power relations, alliances and interdependent relations between children and adults, as well as opportunities and structures made available for children’s participation to be put in place. On analysing them, complexities and tensions can be observed suggesting that children’s participation and citizenship is contextual and must be seen in a wide spectrum of possibilities and constraints. The research was carried out in an elementary school with children aged 6 to 10, analysing participation experiences such as school assemblies, where children could be seen as co deciders in school life and in the class room. Using an ethnographic approach and carrying out interviews and specifically designed activities with children on participation in school, results will be discussed from a sociology of childhood theoretical background.

Religious movements and the debate on the law projects that intend to criminalize homophobia in Brazil

This paper aims to bring up the results of part of my doctoral research, which intends to investigate the place of religion in Brazilian politics. For this presentation, I analyzed the religious discourses that emerged from the confrontation between religious parliamentarians and their religious leaderships and the social movements that struggle for the sexual minorities rights, such as the lesbians, gays and transsexuals. The law project (PL 122/2006) was under discussion in the chamber of deputies since 2006 proposing, mainly, the criminalization of homophobia. Since then, evangelical and catholic parliamentarians have resisted and avoided their votation, not without raising a debate and critical campaigns against it. Their main argument has been about their fear of losing the religious freedom, especially in talking against homosexual practices. During the last presidential elections in Brazil, the main candidates, Dilma Rousseff (PT) and Jose Serra (PSDB) were compelled with some religious groups to not carry on that discussion. On the other hand, there were the social movements for sexual minorities rights, claiming for the future government support. The arrangements that each candidate made during that period and, especially the elected president Dilma Rousseff, will be presented alongside her public positioning on that issue during 2011. In the last months, that project was archived and, in replacement, another one (PL Alexandre Ivo) was proposed. All the debate available (newspapers, reports, site on the internet) concerning these issues and discussion will be brought to the best understanding on that phenomenon.

New fathers and mothers in Europe and their (old) division of labour

The paper derives from a comparative research about Work-Care balance, "Workcare" conducted in seven European countries (United Kingdom, Italy, Portugal, Hungary, Poland, Austria, Denmark) under European Framework Programme 6.

In particular, it utilises a body of 110 in-depth interviews (a substantial part of which addressed to both partners of a couple) - collected from parents of 5 to 12 children - to illustrate how persistent cultural differences are in the construction of both what "work", on the one side and "appropriate care", on the other one, is meant to be in the mix between family or informal and market or public resources.

If we want to take seriously the idea that contemporary well-being in an Adult Worker dual earner/dual carer society depends more on re-conciliating work requests and care burdens of both parents, the history of how the exigencies of two different careers and the decisions about childbirths have been managed in time becomes crucial, revealing what is taken for granted in different countries and therefore constitutes the background of the division of domestic work. These indications top up almost spontaneously in the rich narratives we collected and underline how different may be what is considered a high quality family life, a fair division of unpaid work and an acceptable work-life balance in dual earner (or one-and half) couples with children who already experienced non-family childcare. On the other hand, all this may be compared with the result of more traditional tools measuring the division of labour (forms filled and drawings), something we also proposed to our respondents. Anyway, it emerges clearly how important it is to have care work duties publicly recognized, also in terms of a right to enjoy childcare, which is of paramount importance in moving towards gender equity, also in "new fathers" families.

Features of child food insecurity after the 2010 Haiti earthquake: Results from a longitudinal random survey of households

Background: Recent commentary on the health consequences of natural disasters has suggested a dearth of research on understanding the antecedents to victimization. We assessed data on child food security from a two-wave panel survey of Port-au-Prince, Haiti residents conducted just prior to and six weeks after the January 2010 earthquake.

Methods: Using random Global Positioning System (GPS) sampling, we interviewed 93.1% (N = 1732) of the original 1,800 households interviewed in 2009 in the six week survey after the earthquake. Respondents were queried with regard to mortalities, injuries, food security, housing, and other factors for them and their households. Researchers sought to understand the antecedents to child food insecurity after the quake.

Findings: Findings suggest that several household characteristics were associated with food insecurity for children. School attendance of children before the quake, prior chronic/acute illnesses in the household before the quake, poor living conditions, remittances from abroad, primary respondent mental health, and histories of criminal and other human rights violations committed against family members prior to the quake were shown to be associated with food insecurity after the earthquake. Earned household income was only associated with one of the measures of food insecurity.

Interpretation: Food insecurity for children was common after the quake. It appears that those households vulnerable on multiple dimensions prior to the quake were also vulnerable to food insecurity after the quake. Remittances from abroad were one of the leading protective factors against food insecurity. Reconstruction and redevelopment should focus on ameliorating potential vulnerabilities to poor outcomes in natural disasters because Haiti is well known for the potentiality of both hurricanes and earthquakes.

Overtime's impact on well-being in four East Asia societies

The issue of working conditions and worker rights increasingly becomes a major concern in public policy as extraordinary long working hours with severe impacts on workers' health and other well-beings all the more reflect the "dark side" of miraculous economic performance of East Asia. Based on the East Asian Social Survey data collected in 2008, the empirical findings show that in Japan the professional class experienced long grueling work hours compared to lower-grade workers. China as a reversed image of Japan in this aspect exemplifies a critical case of transition economy, in which lower-stratum workers can hardly earn enough even by excessive overtime. This outcome appears to show this class' self-exploitation as a way of realizing profits in this region (except Japan). Finally, cautions should be used in predicting that contract workers, in contrast to their permanent counterparts, work longer hours. In Japan, their consideration of life style might be a factor that they do not prefer extra hours beyond the legal standard. Yet in South Korea and China, contract workers are mostly "full-timers" that have to work longer to compensate their low wages. In this aspect divergence in overtime might represent different motivations for the four neighbor countries. This study additionally assesses overtime's impact on level of happiness. As expected, Taiwan and China observed a significant negative effect of overtime (this relation is slightly attenuated in South Korea). In Japan, as it is those occupying higher social positions that work longer, their well-being is not necessarily threatened by overtime. These cross-cultural differences further assert the need of comparative analysis of national contexts of overtime and wellbeing.

TSAI, Yu-yueh* (Academia Sinica, free123@gate.sinica.edu.tw)Gene as a metaphor: The geneticization of aboriginal identity in Taiwan

In the 1980s the government of Taiwan began to support the development of biotechnology. Since the 1990s, there has been an increasing number of researches in different fields devoted themselves to evaluate the genetic attributes of Taiwan's aboriginal people from the perspective of biomedicine. More and more, the aboriginal minority has been biomedically represented in terms of their presumed genetic features. Constructed by a variety of sources such as government-supported research projects, professional journal articles, mass media, and suchlike, this discourse about the aborigines' genetic attributes comprises three sub-discourses which focus on 1) the particular genetic origin of aboriginal illness and health, 2) the genetic basis of aboriginal identification, and 3) the genetic particularity of the aboriginal people as a buttress of the idea of Taiwanese nationality.

I argue that there has been a "selective affinity" between genetic research and identity politics as a result of the rapid development of biomedicine in global scale. This phenomenon can be found in countries with different cultural and political backgrounds. My research takes the Taiwan case as an intriguing variant and tries to answer the following questions: What is the complicated relationship between genetic discourse and identity politics in Taiwan? What is the particular historical development and social mechanism that has led to this complicated relationship and how? What are the viewpoints and interests of different parties involved in the debates about the relationship between aboriginal genetic attributes, health, ethnic identification, and nationhood? What are the sociological implications of the geneticization of Taiwan's aboriginal identity in terms of the study of ethnic politics?

Problems of youth integration into the social and political life are always actual and important. The population ageing and the young people wish to leave the country make the authorities to draw their attention to the youth. The political process determining the youth policy at the Putin's age includes political reforms of non-democratic nature at the background of weak and underdeveloped democratic institutes (such as political parties, mass media and NGOs), centralization of the power and forming the soft authoritarian regime with abridged rights of the federal subjects and abolishment of governor's elections and adoption of the new electoral law, as well as returning to the archaic imperial and military rhetoric.

This sociological research shows that the young people's consciousness is not more progressive and modern in the political sphere. They are infected with the virus of revanchism and they are sorry about the end of the empire and dreaming of a strong state. The youth electoral activity's level is less than 12%. The youth absenteeism may be explained by the low standard of life, no effect of the political activity and political ignorance along with the low level of the political culture and emotional alienation from the authorities and high barriers for the youth in politics. And at last, the young people don't see any existing political parties, which are able to defend their interests.

We analyze different forms of the youth political and civil activities within political parties, pro-Kremlin, ecological and radical and forbidden organizations.

The social protest, which gained unprecedented public support and extensive media coverage, is portrayed as a seminal event in the history of Israeli society. It began in a protest of the younger generation against the high cost of housing in Israel and continued with a call for the establishment of a new socioeconomic order. The leader of the protest was an anonymous twenty-five-year-old student.

The present study focuses on the image construction of the protest leader – Daphni Leef – in the online press in Israel (July-September 2011).

The corpus of research on women's media representations reveals that symbolic annihilation is employed in the representation of women (Tuchman, 1978), which is manifested in absence of representation or in limited, distorted, and negative representation.

Exclusion and inclusion practices are frequently employed in the coverage of women acting in the public space. Women politicians receive less coverage than men, and aspects irrelevant to their position are emphasized in their representation, such as appearance, family status, and emotionality.

The term 'frame/framing' refers to a frame the media imposes on reality together with the meanings each community accords its narratives (Gamson, 1989; Reese, 2001). Gendered framing refers to the propensity to relate political stories in masculine terms of conflict and power. The coverage of women leaders treats them as 'outsiders', as 'pioneers' and agents of change. In some cases this element can contribute to the image of women leading protest organizations.

The present study discusses the elements of gendered framing (Norris, 1997) and whether it was employed toward the leader of this protest.

TSOBANOGLU, George* (University of the Aegean, g.tsobanoglou@soc.aegean.gr)Assembling the social as governing capacity building

Institutional Capacity Building remains a local prerogative in the development process and is determined by two sources. The first concerns the problem of institutional supply. Countries which have been dramatically moved towards integrated public market regulations (BRICS) have adapted to global networks. New "social institutions" have been formed to regulate labor reproduction based on territoriality and information based accounting practices (for inflation). Distribution networks as new "organizational" regimes control production. Countries such as Greece, with strong patronage politics, may seem to lack the required "state institutions" and civil society organizations to coordinate socio-economic exchanges to enhance the value chain in the EU system.

The other issue concerns the already embedded institutions which may be an obstacle to new ones. The way external and internal actors are articulated, in a usually asymmetrical politically relationship, may define the future of "redundant" institutions. Usually developing regimes define a legal plateau whereby the nominal and the effective refer to law and to social assemblages as administration. However such social assemblages to be constituted require local partnerships and the social economy to become the centre in state policy. A pro-poor capacity building constitutes the elemental driver for a social assemblage essential to steer sustainability. Usually socially undemocratic regimes rule by means of poverty governance by imposing to the excluded a system of private trade of their basic needs (health, education, transport). As a result of political patronage, Greece formed administrative silos which neither communicate horizontally nor cooperate among themselves.

This paper will focus on Greek labor and its organizational status in an advanced European Union. We will focus on two issues of key importance for social assemblages; the health system and the local rural development process.

Greek higher education institutions (HEIs) and European Union drivers: Some observations on organisational changes

Since the 1960s successive Greek governments have increased investment in universities, TEIs, and distance education (Hellenic Open University) with both general and targeted funding expanding the range of programming and institutions. Some of the obvious benefits have been: improved access; attracting back to Greece higher quality academics, significant economic benefits locally/regionally from direct, indirect spending; greater social mobility; improved life long learning opportunities; commercialization of research (such as FORTHnet); and improvements in linking universities to knowledge economy and engaging communities. Also, since entering the EU, Greek Universities have benefited greatly from access to various infrastructure, research and 'community' funds which have enhanced their role in expanding public benefits.

Some of the differences in the educational performance and general success of HEIs in meeting societal needs between Greece and the rest of Europe are a result of the differences in investment per student (with Northern European institutions investing anywhere from 2 to 5 times the amount in Greece). Other significant differences include organizational issues (with Greece amongst the most centralized bureaucratically). Closely related, there is less diversity in teaching and research programs particularly in arts/social sciences and less emphasis on strategic roles attached to HEIs for social and economic development. The current monetary crisis represents a unique challenge for these organizations as they seek autonomy and a new relation to the "market" for skills and jobs.

Rebuilding the life after disaster: The case studies of immigrant women in Tohoku

This study analyzes the process of rebuilding lives of the immigrants after the Great Japan Earthquake. The earthquake and subsequent tsunami caused huge damages to Japan, especially in the Pacific coast areas in Tohoku region and changed every part of lives for the people residing in the area. It affected not only Japanese nationals, but also the immigrants there.

Realizing multicultural conviviality has been recognized as one of the social issues in Japan, especially in metropolitan areas and industrial cities that have been more culturally diversified by incoming of the immigrants. However, Tohoku region, which has smaller number of immigrants, is lagging far behind in grappling with this issue. There, the female immigrants who married Japanese nationals characterize the immigrants' composition of Tohoku region. They tended to be invisible because they reside dispersedly in different towns or rarely had their own organization (Lee 2011). However, the earthquake consequently urged some of the female immigrants to organize themselves, and this is the case for the female Filipino immigrants in Miyagi prefecture in Tohoku. Although the Filipino women initially organized themselves in order to support each other in receiving the aids, they are now in the attempt to rebuild their lives by themselves through gathering social resources. Utilizing the data of interviews and participant observation, this study demonstrates the process of forming the Filipino immigrants organization, and considers the possibility and constraints in their attempt to rebuild their lives in the social context of Tohoku after the disaster.

Professional competences – one of democracy characteristics in academic capitalism

Democracy during the epoch of the academic capitalism is shown in freedom of labor mobility. On the one hand this freedom in choosing supports a competition of national systems of vocational training. On the other hand national differences in the field of culture, economy and politicians conduct to the formation of certain distinctions in interpretation of professional competences. The main line of globalized vocational training is rapprochement of the labor market requirements and the maintenance of educational programs.

These positions have laid down in a basis of study of a problem: how much education influences the professional communication of working migrants, example - experience of working migrants in Russia and France.

Russia is included more and more intensively into global economy. The tendency of struggle against an illegal labor market and formation of conditions for development of legal labor migration was outlined. Created attractive conditions for investment of the foreign capital in the country involve migratory labor waves on the enterprises of Russia and abroad. If ten years ago speaking about professional communication efficiency meant to speak about the linguistic issues, mastery of language and cultural differences, now there is a necessity to study the problems arising in professional communications, the qualities of vocational training based on discrepancy.

Problems:

1. To reveal methodological bases of concept «internal professional communications» for sociological measurement.
2. To define approaches and criteria of an estimation in concept «efficiency of internal professional communications».
3. To reveal specific features of national vocational training of working migrants.
4. To reveal the competences of communication needed for effective work of migrants in the foreign environment.

As a conclusion: efficiency of professional communications defines degree of democratization of educational processes in the conditions of academic capitalism.

El movimiento de mujeres zapatistas – Una perspectiva poscolonial hacia las políticas de inclusión y el concepto de la democratización

En América Latina las luchas de mujeres han contribuido a procesos de transformación política y social primero en los movimientos sociales y después dentro de los proyectos de democracia del estado nacional (Lamas 1992; Molyneux 2007; Schild 2001). En muchos casos se excluyó de estas luchas feministas a las mujeres indígenas ó se volvieron sujetos de programas de las políticas de género y de desarrollo que se referían a un proyecto occidental sin considerar prácticas locales y específicamente situadas (Hernández 2008).

Las políticas de las mujeres zapatistas en Chiapas/México deben ser consideradas como ejemplo para la articulación de subjetividades a lo largo de ejes poderosos de la exclusión social. Su marginalización múltiple no sólo resulta de su diversidad étnica y su posición económica, sino también desde su posición dentro del orden de género patriarcal indígena.

Las exigencias que pronunciaron las mujeres zapatistas en la ley revolucionaria de mujeres, tienen que ser consideradas como la formulación de necesidades específicamente situadas para la participación política y la justicia género-específica. Esta justicia está posicionada dentro del proyecto político de las y los zapatistas para la creación de estructuras egalitarias y comunitarias como el "mandar obedeciendo".

En nuestra aportación reflexionamos sobre la política y estrategia de las mujeres zapatistas en el marco de la teoría poscolonial. Con esto intentamos diseñar un concepto de democracia incluyente que no esté vinculado en el Estado. En lugar de ello, presentamos la „repolitización de la práctica social“ (Santos 1998) como base de un acercamiento de lo „político“, donde se tematiza lo político en el contexto de prácticas cotidianas socio-culturales para la adquisición de nuevas subjetividades políticas (Escobar, Alvarez, Dagnino 2001). Enfocamos el significado de ejes de diferencia que influyen interseccionalmente en la articulación de prácticas de inclusión así como las exigencias y realización de políticas de descolonización.

Ethnography of interpretation

The ethnography of interpretation.

The paper presents a project that focuses on activities of interpretation of visual data. Not only in sociology but also in other disciplines and also in occupations and vernacular fields the interpretation and analysis of videos is a everyday practice. E.g. policemen try to understand footage from crime scenes or sports trainers analyse the mistakes of their teams. This paper shows how those video analysts generate meaning based on video data, how they use specific technology and how those practices can be compared to video analysis within social science. (By comparing it, the video-ethnography becomes self reflexive, this is a starting point where science studies can start to think about its own interpretive practices.) The research shows how the participants produce meaning by reconstructing the video material using their body movements as devices for reenactments, how they highlight and frame certain details on screen and how they generate meaning by bringing it into narrative order. Interpretation is understood as a communicative process, that can be understood by an ethnography that focusses on communicative actions. Methodologically the project combines a "focused ethnography" that will be discussed with the analysis of video recordings of certain key events such as joint data sessions.

Reflexive videography

During the last decades videography has become a well established method for studying social interaction in a variety of contexts. Based on conversation analysis and ethnomethodology it has mainly been used to study workplace interaction, but recently also applied to other fields such as religious phenomena or everyday communication. First introductory texts have been published and the methodological basis is set. However, for novices learning videography still a very complex endeavour, because this form of analysis is based on what one can call tacit knowledge.

This paper explains how especially collaborative data-sessions, which are at the heart of the process of video analysis are a complex social interaction on their own. The talks aims at reflecting the researchers practices of interpreting visual material, analysing and generating knowledge. To be able to study those processes in detail, sequences of analysis are themselves filmed and taken to scrutiny. By this, the observer is able to reconstruct not only the methodical steps, but also other practices such as highlighting certain elements, working with gesture and reenactment of perceived visual forms as well as the use of technology in detail. The aim of this complex analysis is to take self reflection of the researcher and the production of knowledge serious, and by this to generate what can be called reflexive methodology development. By this, methods can not only be developed, but also be understood and taught in a new way.

"Efectos de las políticas de transferencias condicionadas de ingresos sobre los procesos de escolarización en las principales áreas urbanas de la Argentina (2007-2011)"

La infancia y la adolescencia constituyen un grupo estratégico que debe considerarse prioritario en toda política de desarrollo. El criterio de "máxima prioridad para la infancia" postula que los niños deben ser los últimos en perjudicarse con los errores de la humanidad y los primeros en beneficiarse con sus aciertos, forma parte de una ética que promueve el desarrollo integral (Unicef, 1990, 1992; OMS, 1989). En este sentido, se considera importante la aproximación, para el caso argentino, a la magnitud, alcance y profundidad de las políticas de transferencias condicionadas de ingresos (pensiones de contributivas y asignación universal por hijo) para lograr mejoras efectivas en la calidad de vida de los niños, niñas y adolescentes, particularmente en lo referente a las oportunidades de inclusión social a través de la escolarización. Para efectuar el análisis se utilizarán los microdatos de la Encuesta de la Deuda Social Argentina (EDSA), del Programa del Observatorio de la Deuda Social Argentina, (UCA), para el período 2007- 2011.

Damming the Black Sea region: Justice, local movements and struggles over water

This paper examines social and ecological costs of the Hydro Power Plant (HPP) in Savsat, the Black Sea Region, Turkey. In recent years, HEPs have started to be built in many regions of the country, mainly in Black Sea Region. Black sea region has potential for hydro development because of its mountainous environment and fast flowing rivers. The local people living in the project areas and many non-governmental organizations (NGO) protest these projects and do not want them to be built because of the environmental and social consequences of the projects. The government authorities stated that the current water potential of Turkey was not utilized and thus Turkey had to export more energy from abroad. In this paper, the meaning of ecological destruction for different classes or population categories will be examined, emphasizing the process of "selective victimization" and benefit. The arguments are based on information gathered through interviews with 53 local people in the project area, NGO representatives, headmen, and representatives of state officials and reviews of websites, newspapers, and other documents relevant to dam policy in Turkey. It is concluded that these local populations are bearing a disproportionate share of the negative social and environmental "externalities" or consequences of the project because of class, ethnicity, and gender considerations, i.e., environmental injustice. In much of the developing world, access to natural resources such as rivers, forests, etc. is being restricted by the transformation of commonly-held lands (the commons) into "capitalist private property".

Socio-spatial restructuring in istanbul and the changing segregation and exclusion patterns

This paper aims to show the effects of dominant neo-liberal economic policies and subsequent urban policies in leading to a major socio-spatial restructuring in Istanbul and changing segregation and exclusion patterns especially after 1990s. Although economic globalization have had different implications for different countries due to place-specific factors, it is also possible to find surprisingly common economic and political measures especially within developing countries. In Turkey, the radical transformation from import substitution under state direction towards export-oriented policies after 1980s has had dramatic socio-spatial repercussions in major cities of Turkey, especially Istanbul, which has always been the most important city in Turkey owing to its location advantages and historical role in the national economy as well as its influential place in the region.

Istanbul appears to be a laboratory that reflects the current trends in economic and political spheres and a clear picture of the changing socio-spatial structures of segregation and exclusion. Since the mid 1990s, the vision of Istanbul as a center of international finance, service and tourism guides the new urban policies, which are mainly based on encouraging the development of real-estate and construction sectors by increasing the urban rents. Development of big urban projects in the form of office blocks, hotels and shopping malls as well as luxurious housing estates has become the priority for municipalities, big construction firms, and development agencies. Consequently, the importance of urban areas with high rent-gaining potential has increased, leading to intensifying pressure on the housing areas of low-income working population that constitute the labor force of industrial establishments and the growing service sector. It is observed that the new urban policies ignore social policies and the constant reality in urban restructuring is the displacement of disadvantaged segments of population and the creation of gated urban spaces distanced from the urban poor.

Post-reform Russia: Rethinking recent democratization lessons

The past twenty years of modern Russian history have been marked by profound changes in the country's political life. But despite the extent of these changes, post-Communist Russia can still be described as a society "in transition", the prospects for the democratic evolution of which are by no means certain. Among the main obstacles to the development of democracy in Russia, the finger is pointed not only at the country's leaders but also at society itself, which has apparently been disappointed in democracy. However, research over recent years indicates that the situation concerning democracy in Russia and its acceptance by the country's population is not as straightforward, unequivocal or hopeless as is sometimes imagined.

First of all, a significant number of Russians adheres to many democratic values and institutions. At the same time over the past decade social and political practice has, to an extent, changed Russians' ideas regarding the importance of the various components of democracy.

Russians clearly distinguish normative ideas on democracy from what is actually happening in Russia. Moreover, the main claim against the version of democracy being implemented in Russia is its lack of effectiveness.

When we talk of the effectiveness of democracy, it is important not just to measure it as an institution but also to measure the level of public trust in the authorities and social institutions. This is a much wider phenomenon with many more variables: the nature of the political regime, the influence democratic institutions have over politics, the dynamics of growth and quality of life, the extent of corruption, genuine guarantees of human rights and civil liberties etc. Together these have long been relatively successfully identified within the format of public opinion as "the workings of democracy". Most Russians (72%) are not satisfied with how democracy works.

Girls, adult and older women, and family violence in immigrant communities: A multigenerational approach

Worldwide, girl children and women of all ages are subjected to violence in the family context. At the same time, feminists are also gradually addressing women's violence against one another, exemplified by maternal abuse of children and violence between adult and elderly women, exemplified by relational violence between mothers- and daughters-in-law. Based on a small-scale qualitative study of adult female survivors of child abuse, intimate partner violence, and elder abuse in two immigrant communities (Tamil and Punjabi) in Toronto, Canada, this presentation will raise the following questions: Who are the abusers and who are the victims in these communities? What are the intergenerational power relations that result in violence between different generations of women? How do the women themselves interpret/explain the causes of violence? How do the women explain the role of their own communities and/or the role of the receiving society, in causing or preventing violence? How do the women interpret their own roles as violence victims and/or aggressors? What suggestions do the women have for helping victims of family violence? Because of the scale of the qualitative study, there are no definite answers offered, but a discussion of the results will open up further avenues for addressing this important social problem, including the intergenerational aspects of it. At the same time, the complexities created by the immigration context will hopefully open up more discussion related to the lives of racialized immigrant girls and women.

Uses and appropriation of public spaces by the foreign population. The case of Madrid

The importance of public spaces as central elements in cities is because these areas are seen as places of human relation, social gathering and exchange, where groups with different interests converge.

Through the study of both the differentiation of types of usage and the intensity of the relationships that take place in these public spaces by individuals based on their nationality (Spanish / foreign), provides a differentiated position between these groups in the analyzed scenarios. On the other hand, analysis of greater freedom of action and the self-management capacity of these spaces in the case of foreigners and the "passivity" of the group formed by the locals in the areas analyzed.

To achieve this goal, four public spaces in Madrid (Plaza de Tirso de Molina in the neighborhood of Embajadores, Plaza de Olavide in the neighborhood of Trafalgar, San Diego Boulevard Bridge Vallecas and Pinazo Square of San Cristobal de los Angeles) are thoroughly analyzed through qualitative research techniques such as observation and in depth interviews.

The results obtained show the existence of certain features associated with the appropriation of public spaces by the foreign population in both quantitative (intensity of relationships) and qualitative (types of usage of the space) through differentiated participation strategies in the spaces by the different groups that were analyzed.

Transboundary governance and individualized responsibility

Climate change is today conceptualized as the most salient environmental problem. At the same time, climate change is an emblem of transboundary and complex matters that traditional regulation and control systems many times fall short in managing. The nation-state is no longer seen as the centre of policy making. With environmental problems understood as transboundary matters, deregulation of the market, and parallel processes of globalization and individualization new forms of governance have emerged. Parallel with international negotiations and conventions, organizations and individuals are addressed as drivers of climate change mitigation. Increased attention is paid to greenhouse gas emissions from everyday life activities, such as transports, recreational activities and what we eat and wear. In this course, actors increasingly are addressed by regulatory mechanisms that appeal to the free will, implying an individualization of responsibility. We can see various ways of discursive steering, aiming at changing both peoples' actions and their way of thinking. We can also see a number of individual responses to this kind of discursive steering, conscientiously and freely trying to make changes in everyday life. This focus on individual choices raises questions concerning three aspects of agency. How can individual actors make rational and well informed choices concerning complex processes in an overloaded market? How free is the free choice in a world with social and social material structures, and norms? What does it mean when agency is conceptualized as reflexive and responsible consumption? This paper critically analyses these aspects of individualized responsibility in environmental politics.

The neighborhood revitalization policy in Chile: What influence from France and the United States in terms of the role of state and civil society?

In the last decades, one of the Chilean governments' priorities has been to reduce the housing deficit. They have made major progress but the quality has reached a crisis level. As a result, Bachelet's administration (2006-2009) created the New housing policy to improve the quality and social integration, including the first neighborhood revitalization program (Quiero mi Barrio), which demands a new role for civil society: it creates a Neighborhood Council for Development.

Where does this policy come from? How was it created? What is the influence of French and American neighborhood revitalization experiences in the formulation of this Chilean urban policy, particularly regarding to the Neighborhood Council for Development? In other words, how the French and American state models –which are very present and in constant conflict in Chile when formulating public policies– affect the formulation of this urban policy and the role given to civil society organizations (CSO)?

In a first research's phase, key informants who participated in the formulation of this policy, give their assessments in terms of participation, empowerment, and the influence of foreign models in the construction of this policy, as well as his thoughts around the Neighborhood Council for Development. In a second research's phase to come, I will address the role of CSO through case studies of two neighborhoods in Santiago, in order to observe the actual role of CSO in the revitalization, particularly the role of the Neighborhood Council for Development.

Wedding and Family Photographs as the Carriers of Cultural Memory and Cultural Change in the Post-Republican Era: Istanbul Case

Although the date of the invention of the camera is recent, visuals are important parts in the life of people. A photograph progresses its journey in the life of the people strengthening its position despite the changes in the cultural climate and the changes in the methods of photographing and storing. A photograph belongs to the past from the very moment of its being shot. This feature is the main reason of its relationship with cultural memory. Thus, individuals and cultures looking at the photographs may, if they so wish, recall the past with visuals and accompanying narrations. This process is an active meaning generating process and helps families who are the meeting point of individual and social areas and modern cultures owning the collective feeling of 'us', to determine the objectives, wishes and needs of the cultures they belong to. In other words, the past is remembered or forgotten in accordance with objectives, needs and wishes and also reconstructed today. Photographs, which are the carriers of cultural memory, also reflect cultural changes.

The aim of this research is to evidence the relationship between cultural memory and cultural changes through wedding and family photographs. Through this study, carried out among post Republican families having received upper, upper middle and middle class establish the relationship between the photograph and cultural memory and focuses on the way of individuals and cultures store, remember their important moments and how they transmit them to next generations. It also focuses on the understanding how cultural changes are reflected in the photographs.

Acción colectiva juvenil y transición democrática en el Ecuador: Formas asociativas juveniles en el gobierno de la "revolución ciudadana"

Durante las tres últimas décadas, la sociedad ecuatoriana ha experimentado distintas formas de movilización social agenciadas por diversos actores cuyas trayectorias y demandas se inscriben en un contexto caracterizado por una crisis persistente del sistema político y de sus instituciones. Dicha crisis, estrechamente vinculada a los cambios y transformaciones de orden económico producidos desde los primeros años de la década del setenta del siglo pasado, ha sido procesada de diversas maneras por grupos más o menos organizados de la sociedad en los que la idea de cambio social ha estado presente a través de prácticas y discursos que los han identificado como una particular forma asociativa.

Crisis de representación, expresada sobre todo en descrédito del sistema de partidos, atrofias e hipertrofias gubernamentales, así como una descomposición generalizada del sistema de la administración pública, constituyen vectores desde los cuales puede plantearse un conjunto de problemas que están a la base de tales manifestaciones y que, inevitablemente, refieren al carácter histórico de las relaciones entre estado y sociedad en el complejo proceso de configuración de la nación ecuatoriana.

En tal contexto, las formas asociativas juveniles han jugado un papel de primera importancia desde la perspectiva de la acción colectiva. La participación e incidencia política, frecuentemente soslayada en periodos anteriores al del gobierno de la Revolución Ciudadana, ha sido crecientemente reconocida y los canales de participación juvenil se han ampliado y diversificado desde 2007 cuando Rafael Correa asume la conducción gubernamental del Estado ecuatoriano. Tal reconocimiento político se reafirma con la aprobación de la Constitución del Buen Vivir en septiembre 2008. No obstante, y pese a que las agregaciones juveniles dicen sentirse reconocidos como sujetos de interlocución por el Estado, abren nuevos frentes de demandas y expectativas que configuran nuevas fuentes de conflictividad en la difícil y prolongada transición democrática del estado ecuatoriano.

Focalizamos nuestra atención en dar cuenta de las transformaciones en cuatro campos de la producción cultural - la música, las artes visuales, las editoriales y las redes de internet - a través de las experiencias y miradas de actores juveniles que emergen como centrales en una ciudad como la de México, D.F.

Los jóvenes explorados son los denominados trendsetters (Urteaga, 2011) –que otros autores y sobre todo los mercadólogos denominan milenials (Mediartketing, 2011), o sea quienes desarrollan estrategias creativas y redes culturales dentro de las lógicas de interactividad entre el arte, la educación y el aprendizaje continuo, así como dentro de las dinámicas sociales de producción y difusión cultural que se encuentran en proceso actual de transformación y reconstrucción. Es decir, proponen tendencias innovadoras en el desarrollo social y cultural haciendo uso de diversos conocimientos, capacidades y tecnologías, generando nuevas necesidades de aprendizaje, conexiones sociales, productos culturales, estilos de vida y de trabajo.

Whistleblowing and ubuntu: The influence of national cultures on whistleblowing intentions

A number of studies have highlighted the importance of considering the impact of national and cultural differences on their employees' perceptions of and responses to wrongdoing. Most of these studies employed the four distinctions developed by Hofstede (1991) in his theory of international cultures. These are

- (i) Power-distance: The extent to which employees would feel comfortable to approach and/or contradict their superiors. In a large power-distance culture, power is centralized with subordinates being expected to comply with instructions without questioning and contact initiated by management.
- (ii) Uncertainty avoidance: A culture with high uncertainty avoidance fears ambiguity and is likely to emphasize rules and procedures for all situations in order to achieve predictability.
- (iii) Collectivism/Individualism: In this type of culture people stress the importance of being a member of the group and group achievements. The benefits of the in-group are prioritized even at the expense of the individual.
- (iv) Femininity/Masculinity: A feminine culture values relationships, cooperation and security rather than financial success and advancement.

Each of these distinctions is related to the individual and organizational tendencies to blow the whistle; the expression of perceptions of wrongdoing; fear of retaliation for whistleblowing and the expressed likelihood of blowing the whistle. This paper analyses the extent to which it could be argued that national cultures influence whistleblowing intentions and perceptions in a multicultural South Africa, especially with regard to the adherence to ubuntu.

El problema de la individualidad en el pensamiento del último Lukács

La individualidad no es entendida por Lukács en la Ontología del Ser Social y en los Prolegómenos como un dato humano originario, sino como una categoría que se constituye también históricamente, sobre la base de una "determinación recíproca" con la genericidad. Se trata también de un proceso extremadamente lento, incluso, de las propias relaciones sociales, para que el problema de la individualidad pueda aparecer, no solo como un problema real, sino también universal. Además, "el verdad desarrollo de la individualidad es un proceso altamente complejo, cuyo fundamento ontológico está formado por las posiciones teleológicas de la praxis con todas las circunstancias, pero que no tiene él mismo, en absoluto, carácter teleológico". En fin, estamos ante un proceso que se desarrolla tanto en el sentido objetivo como en el subjetivo, de superaciones de la formación alienada de la personalidad, es decir: "debido a la praxis, el ser humano, que se forma en una multiplicidad cada vez más variada, se enfrenta con una sociedad [...] en que no solo se desarrolla la encarnación objetiva de la genericidad, tornándose cada vez más variada en muchos aspectos; pero al mismo tiempo coloca múltiples y diferenciadas exigencias al individuo humano prácticamente activo en ella". Vale decir, en un punto determinado del desarrollo de la sociabilidad, hay una multiplicidad casi infinita de decisiones alternativas que el individuo singular de la sociedad se ve constantemente instado, o incluso compelido, a tomar, dada la diferenciación y complejización de la sociedad en su conjunto. Es importante destacar que, al referirse a la convergencia o divergencia entre desarrollo social e individual, todo indica que Lukács no concibe la formación de los individuos humanos como meros productos mecánicos del género; caso contrario, se apagarían los trazos específicos del ser social, y quedaría solo la relación natural muda entre especie y ejemplar

Sociologism and sociology: Cognitive styles of sociological explanation

Recent debates in sociology of scientific knowledge (SSK) and science and technology studies (STS) drew attention to the one of the most crucial sociology's axiomatic assumptions – Durkheimian imperative of explaining "Social by Social". Since this classical statement becomes problematic social sciences have to deal with the radical epistemological claims and proclamations: from declaring "the end of the Social" (by B. Latour) to announcing "the death of the Method" (by J. Law).

However it's too easy and too tempting to label such claims as "post-modernist gestures" or as "ungrounded revisionism" (S. Fuchs). Radical epistemology made the move that should not be ignored or neglected. In response to epistemological criticism we need to find a new basis for understanding sociological explanations as explanations sui generis. The power of these explanations, as I'll try to prove in my brief presentation, is based not on infallibility of statistical measurement neither on striking convincingness of empirical data. Sociology's ability to provide convincing explanation of phenomena (framed as "social" and consequently "requiring sociological explanation") is guaranteed by its own cognitive style: a set of cognitive operations that determine not mere constructing specific sociological narratives but our ability to see things sociologically (H. Garfinkel).

The notion of cognitive style defines sociological explanation as the kind of "cognitive work" with its own mechanics: operations of demarcation ("... the knowledge as a social phenomena should be distinguished from physical and psychological characteristics of knowledge producers"), relevance attributions ("psychology and physics are irrelevant to the proper study of knowledge"), conceptualization ("social knowledge is social product") and, finally, reduction ("the infrastructure of academic community explains why that specific knowledge being produced").

Disney in Latin America: Visualizing the new generation of global children's television

Since its inception in 1923 as a small cartoon studio, Disney has flourished into one of the top 6 global media conglomerates. Practically inventing the concepts of synergy and convergence in a global setting, Disney industries have maintained an active and profitable presence in Latin America. This paper explores the contemporary presence of Disney in the media and ethno-scapes of major cities, such as Buenos Aires, Santiago, Bogota, etc. Because of its global marketing strategy Disney has been at the forefront of including national regions and ethnic characters and actors into its children television programming. Granted, these efforts have often relied on simplistic and sometimes offensive stereotypes. However the recent effort to reach out to ethnic audiences without offending the implicit white mainstream have resulted in a range of programming and Disney stars who can be potentially coded as ethnic yet are light enough to pass as white. Many of these programs and stars—such as the High School Musical trilogy and actors such as Selena Gomez and Demi Lovato—are widely advertised and circulated in Latin America. This paper explores the deployment of these shows and actors in the cityscape—though bill boards, product placement, and ubiquitous Disney products in papelerías, clothing stores, and drugstores—to mention just a few of the locations where Disney branded products are sold. Through an addition of the new ambiguous ethnic to the classic Disney fantasy product, this global conglomerate manages to remain current and profitable in the changing global city.

Gated 'downtown': Class collision and gentrification in the post-renovation city

City centers – like gated communities – have been a major concern of urban planners and academics during the last decades. In many aspects, these two urban phenomena resemble each other. For instance, the literature dealing with gated communities is prone to emphasize their potential to cause disruption of the urban road system as these cover extensive plots of land where access is restricted. In addition to making the city less permeable, this form of spatial segregation is commonly paralleled by some form of social exclusion, especially in third-world cities. By the same token, city centers contain a distinctive urban lay-out, filled with old, often run down urban structures, that act in the same way. Modernists cried out for urgent need to rescale city centers. Both areas have been the focus of much development in recent years. Although city centers have had more government investment while gated communities have come out of private investments, both have been market oriented. In the former case, redevelopment takes place for business, tourism as well as residential purposes. Much of these investments have been gentrifying and have changed the way life takes place downtown. This paper aims at discussing the variety of ways public policies have targeted downtown, 'gating' them so that the poor is increasingly kept out of the area. Drawing on Neil Smith and David Harvey, the paper will refer to renovation projects, as the Bicocca-Pirelli, in Milan, the Miguel Bombarda Hospital, in Lisbon, the Nova Luz Urban Operation, in Sao Paulo, the Recife Antigo, and the Ribeira Urban Operation, in Natal.

Música e indumentaria, formas de relación juvenil

América Latina no escapa de la moderna sociedad líquida en donde el consumismo usa los medios de comunicación masivos, especialmente la música, como medio publicitario, para estimular las identificaciones de los jóvenes que podemos ver expuestas en su indumentaria, cabello y accesorios. De este modo, los medios globales proponen también looks personalizables que generan diversos estilos de vida que se convierten en formas de comunicarse y relacionarse con el otro y el mundo. Esta sociedad líquida, esta caducidad sistemática de estilos de vida y formas personales de expresión en América latina y el mundo aparecen como síntomas de una autonomía enajenada, pero aún así, existe un requisito de elección libre e individual para cada joven. Para el desarrollo de este trabajo se recurrirá a aspectos teóricos de Zygmunt Bauman, Gilles Lipovetsky, Rosana Reguillo y Germán Muñoz.

Regímenes de bienestar en Corea del Sur y México: Actores e instituciones contrastantes

Esta ponencia propone una comparación de los regímenes de bienestar en Corea del Sur y México (en diálogo con los análisis de Esping-Andersen, Gough y académicos latinoamericanos y asiáticos).

En una primera dimensión (instituciones), se destacará que México inició la construcción de instituciones de seguridad social más tempranamente que Corea del Sur; aunque este país ha avanzado en la generación de instituciones con carácter universal, mientras México ha estancado el desarrollo de sus instituciones de seguridad social. Ambos países han sido dinámicos recientemente en el incremento de los gastos sociales, aún más en el caso coreano; aunque la dirección de los gastos sociales ha sido diversa de acuerdo a los desarrollos institucionales contrastantes. México cuenta con un sistema incompleto, segmentado y estratificado de seguridad social (formado a partir de los años 40 del Siglo XX), y un nuevo sistema de protección social para los pobres (formado especialmente a partir de los años 90 del Siglo XX). Corea del Sur, que inició más tardíamente con enfoques también de segmentación (a partir del empleo formal), ha desarrollado ulteriormente sus instituciones de bienestar (a partir del proceso de democratización, 1987) en una perspectiva de universalización (salud, pensiones y protección ante el desempleo) y con fuerte presencia del sector privado en la provisión de servicios de salud.

En una segunda dimensión (actores sociales), se destacará que en México no se ha consolidado una coalición en pro de una ciudadanía social, sino más bien una coalición conservadora favorable a mercantilizar las instituciones sociales y a administrar cuidadosamente los limitados beneficios para la población pobre; y que en Corea se ha ido consolidando una coalición pro-bienestar con enfoque universalista (ciudadanía) en oposición a la antigua coalición pro-crecimiento (aún fuerte) que identifica a la política social con prioridad menor frente a la inversión en el crecimiento económico.

Digital inequalities and vulnerability among internet users

The proposed paper addresses issues related to the "second-order digital divide", i.e. inequalities in Internet usage, once the access barrier is overcome. In a first step, the concepts of digital competences and digital vulnerability are highlighted. The second step is based on empirical investigation carried out in Belgium, through biographical interviews of Internet users between 20 and 60 years old, in 2009-2010. It draws a typology of Internet users' profiles and trajectories, describing the motivations, the diversity of usage framework and the dynamics of engagement of users. The third step explains how the constructed typology can explain the development of digital and/or social vulnerability and the consequences in terms of inequalities and social justice. The presentation may be either in English or Spanish or French.

Diversification of careers of knowledge workers: A european perspective from the Works Project

The proposed paper focuses on diversification in careers and occupational trajectories of knowledge workers. In many discourses on the emerging knowledge-based economy, knowledge workers are supposed to "concentrate" a lot of changes in work and to be a paradigmatic example of new work patterns. The paper mainly relies on the empirical findings of case studies of knowledge-intensive occupations carried out in the European WORKS project (2006-2010). The first section clarifies the concepts of careers and occupational trajectories. It also addresses the theoretical debate concerning organisational versus boundaryless careers and specifies to what extent this theoretical debate concerns "knowledge workers". The second section summarises some relevant empirical findings concerning the diversification of careers and occupational trajectories, within four occupational groups: researchers in IT, dress designers, software professionals, managers in logistics. The final and concluding section highlights the key issues of the diversification of careers and trajectories of knowledge workers, in terms of career development and labour market organisation. The presentation may be either in English or in Spanish.

Neighborhood mix and social attitudes: The intersections of class and ethnicity in a northern English city

To examine the role of social and ethnic mix in shaping attitudes towards difference, this paper presents findings from a survey conducted with 1,500 inhabitants of Leeds, a multicultural city in the north of England. Through the deployment of cluster analysis, the survey respondents were selected from 8 types of neighbourhoods (all with varying degrees of social and ethnic diversity) and asked about their everyday encounters and feelings towards social difference. To complement this quantitative data, and to explore some of the issues in further depth, 90 qualitative follow-up interviews were also conducted with survey participants. Although our findings suggest a clear correlation between living in ethnically diverse neighbourhoods and tolerance of ethnic difference, attitudes were also mediated by class and perceived competition for increasingly scarce resources. To illuminate the complex intersections of class and ethnicity in the contemporary city, we draw on both the "contact hypothesis", which has tended to posit that proximity between different ethnic groups is a potential vehicle for improved intergroup relations, and "threat theories" which in contrast suggest that proximity can exacerbate tensions. Finally, we link these findings to the topical debates regarding the current remodelling of the British welfare state. Specifically, we discuss changes to housing policy and its potential implications for intergroup relations in years to come.

Education in poverty contexts, the role of parents' participation in public primary schools

Access to primary education is an essential element for addressing social inequalities in developing countries around the globe. Nevertheless, in places like Mexico (with high per capita income and high inequality) deficient schools, particularly in poor areas, have shadowed the accomplishments of universal access. Thus, questions that have been traditionally a concern within developed economies, regarding the quality of teaching methods, infrastructure and the education system in general, have become a crucial issue in development policy discussions in the South. This paper analyzes one element that has the potential to improve the overall performance of the schooling system: family participation in school-centered communities. There are different theoretical models that explain the participation of families in education, mostly drawing evidence from the US and Europe. This paper builds on this area of sociological theory in order to identify different typologies of parents' participation within the Mexican context, specifically in public elementary schools in the city of Monterrey, Nuevo León. A case study is presented from ethnographic data (spanning a school year) and in depth interviews to parents in one primary school situated in a marginalized area. A profile of parents' participation is identified, as well as the circumstances of such participation. Furthermore, the contextual characteristics of the participant parents are analyzed in comparison to those who do not participate. Thus, a contribution is made to the broader sociological literature regarding parents and their role in children's schools, as well as the communities they form in poor areas. Finally, some conclusions are made regarding the study's findings and their relation to social development policy options in Mexico.

Network of scientific knowledge as a tool for sustainable development in disadvantaged regions through renewable energy sources

La ponencia que aquí presentamos trata de abordar como una redistribución de la ciencia y la tecnología puede ser un buen instrumento para el desarrollo de regiones económicamente atrasadas. Consideramos que las energías alternativas pueden servir para dinamizar zonas que no han sido tomadas en consideración y valoradas para el desarrollo integral del entorno.

Cierta dejadez de las instituciones es en muchos casos la principal fuente del escaso avance científico-tecnológico y, por supuesto, económico de una determinada zona, área o región, que indudablemente necesitan una red de conocimiento científico basado en la cooperación. Es decir, regiones modulares idénticas estén conectadas mediante medios de transferencia de conocimiento. A la hora de analizar la situación es necesario desarrollar cierto nivel de concreción. De otro modo, deben evaluarse los diferentes aspectos característicos y que potencialmente puedan ayudar al desarrollo económico tecnológico de la misma.

Nuestro análisis parte de un núcleo central, la ciencia-tecnología, sobre ella concurren todos los demás factores. Es necesario una correcta visión de los instrumentos tecnológicos, pero para ello necesitamos conocer de qué fuentes partimos: un centro científico tecnológico cercano, un instituto de investigación, una universidad etc. Asimismo, también es fundamental conocer las características de explotación energética: corrientes marinas, cuencas fluviales, viento, energía solar, etc., con qué fuerza de trabajo se cuenta existe, y cuales son sus cualidades, empresas del sector, y cuál es la visión de explotación de dichos recursos. Todo ello se ensamblan en un modelo de exposición de ideas, con el objeto de extraer una interpretación que nos permitan establecer un modelo explicativo y de conocimiento para el desarrollo de la zona, área o región.

La propuesta que aquí se presenta es un modelo teórico-práctico de desarrollo científico-tecnológico ajustado a la realidad socioeconómica de un espacio determinado. No obstante, dicho modelo extensible a cualquier región de Latinoamérica.

Trabajo y dignidad humana: Aportes para una sociedad igualitaria

Los presupuestos teóricos que cobijaron gran parte de las investigaciones sobre el trabajo humano, proponiendo una relación necesaria entre inserción laboral e inclusión social encontraron el escollo de los procesos de segmentación social que tienen a la exclusión como uno de sus polos. La reflexión teórica de los cientistas sociales se vio compelida, por el inédito contexto, a una revisión del rol atribuido al trabajo en la constitución de las relaciones sociales, originando una suerte de ruptura "en" y "con" los modelos teóricos clásicos. Un mundo en el que el trabajo puede ser escaso, discontinuo o degradado en sus condiciones lleva, pues, a cuestionar la subsistencia del orden que, se suponía, estructuraba a las sociedades occidentales a partir de la centralidad simbólica otorgada a ese trabajo. En este contexto teórico adquiere particular relevancia la resignificación del trabajo humano desde el ámbito de los derechos humanos. Desde el "derecho al trabajo", en su expresión más genérica, hasta la "oportunidad de ganarse la vida" que consagran distintos tratados del Derecho Internacional de los Derechos Humanos han sido fuente para el reconocimiento efectivo de derechos de los sujetos en situación de trabajo, tal como lo refleja la jurisprudencia reciente de nuestro país y del ámbito internacional. En el presente trabajo nos proponemos indagar el contenido y alcance del concepto de "trabajo digno" -presente en el sistema jurídico internacional- desde la óptica de los órganos llamados a interpretar los instrumentos que regulan los derechos económicos, sociales y culturales. Pretendemos dar cuenta de la potencialidad que ésta noción conlleva en la construcción de sociedades igualitarias.

Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1942) and was invited subsequently to teach in Sao Paulo at the Escola Livre de Sociologia e Política where he remained for 16 years. He is known as the exponent of the First Chicago School of Sociology in Brazil through the emphasis on empirical work, the translation of articles related to that « school », the emphasis on community studies, urban ecology and the way a city should be studied. To what extent was Park's idea of a city as a laboratory taken over by Brazilian sociologists? How did Brazilian scholars address the issue of race and ethnic contact in the city, and how did Park's ideas, via Pierson, contribute to shape the debate? To what extent were the urban ecology ideas diffused among Brazilian social scientists? How were community studies undertaken? In this paper I shall try to tackle these questions by dealing with the urban literature and the race relations literature in Brazil in the period 1940-1970.

Media narratives: Constructing the mapuche subject

Today indigenous movement in Chile challenges the mythical view of a homogeneous society, and situates the politics of recognition at the core of the public debate. The indigenous movement problematizes not only the contents of the national imaginary but also the narratives constructed to describe that national imaginary. The present paper analyzes the Chilean mainstream media discourse on indigenous people, particularly the Mapuche, emphasizing the preferred framing strategies. The paper argues that the Chilean mainstream media proposes contradictory images of the Mapuche. On the one hand, the Mapuche are presented as a symbol of the past, of our common origins and of our lost connection with nature. But on the other hand, the Mapuche are also portrayed as aggressive, conflictive and deviant in the news. The idealized historical Mapuche is constructed as the symbol of the mestizo origins of the nation, while the living Mapuche is depicted as a deviant actor who is threatening the social order. The result is a paradoxical media narrative on the Mapuche: while the historic figure is revered, the present figure is demonized. Alternative media outlets (from radio to online newspapers) supported by Mapuche organizations provide alternative perspectives that challenge mainstream frameworks. As a result, an extended universe of discourse is conformed, where symbolic struggles over the power of naming are constantly being reenacted.

'Defeated amnesty laws: Standing between impunity and accountability, Uruguay opens up the wounds of the past.'

In the aftermath of state terrorism amnesty laws have been used to try to quarantine the past by entrenching impunity in law thereby preventing victims seeking justice and recognition and pushing reconciliation off the agenda. While transitional justice strategies challenged impunity by demanding accountability amnesty has remained part of the equation for political stability, the just in case precaution.

The Uruguayan case is especially interesting because amnesty laws were reaffirmed by two referenda in 1989 and 2009. The paper will analyse the impact of repression under the light of the recent dismissal of the amnesty laws by the Uruguayan executive. Have the ontological status of past and present changed after the abolition of these laws? Do we need to call for a new historical ethics where the continuing presence of the past should be taken seriously, instead of being treated as merely metaphorical? These and other ethical questions around the topic of human rights, remembering, forgetting and the weight of history will be analysed.

Imagining the future of Greenland

Greenland is a community facing rapid industrial development. For example an aluminium smelter with a capacity of minimum 360,000 tonnes per year is planned, and in September 2010, 12 oil companies applied to search for oil off the coast of Greenland. This is compared to the fact that Greenland is a relatively small community of 56.000 inhabitants and a fragile arctic ecosystem. An urgent question for the Greenlandic politicians and public is how to make this development a sustainable one for the Greenlandic society?

In Greenland, many decisions need to be taken which may have great consequences, and this paper seeks to explore scenario development as a tool for opening up a dialogue and for decision makers and the public to think about development in a structured way. The paper thus takes an empirical and practical approach in reporting a case study of the use of futures thinking and its possible application in a Greenlandic context.

The study presented in this paper takes an approach of building a set of scenarios for development in Greenland. The scenarios are made with input from Greenlandic stakeholders in three steps

- 1) Asking stakeholders what parameters they find are the most important for the development of Greenland till 2050.
- 2) Describing 4 scenarios based on the input, using a matrix approach.
- 3) Asking stakeholders to comment on the realism and content of the scenarios and their relevans for the Greenlandic situation.

For the study presented, it has been chosen to rely much on the insight and values of local stakeholders. Previously scenarios have been made for Greenland; however, these have been based on natural science with little input from stakeholders. This leads to a discussion of value-rationality, and what may be the benefits and disadvantages of basing scenarios on values and stakeholders?

The development of a social capital index for the Netherlands

In the Netherlands there is an increasing demand for statistical information related to social capital. Current information at Statistics Netherlands describes aspects of social capital separately instead of integrating information into an overall statistic. Because social capital is a multidimensional concept covering different aspects traditional methods, such as factor analysis, could not be used. The social capital index developed in this paper is comprised of two main dimensions based on a theoretical framework; (1) participation and (2) trust. Each consists of three subdimensions related to (a) social relations, (b) organisations, and (c) politics. The index has two main objectives: (1) monitoring social capital and (2) comparing subpopulations. The index is based on the Permanent Survey on Living Conditions 2009, administered by Statistics Netherlands, and includes 7560 respondents of 12 years or older. This is combined with registration data of the population. A set of core indicators related to the six subdimensions was determined. A Structural Equation Model (SEM) with Partial least squares (PLS) has been used as the estimation method to generate the index. This method enables formative measurement models and does not rely on strict data assumptions. In PLS the score of each latent variable or dimension is estimated by optimizing the exact linear combination of the indicators. This maximizes the explained variance of the construct. Various additional analyses, such as bootstrapping, have been conducted to ensure the model is robust and reliable. Results show that the elderly (65 years and older) and the lower educated lag behind in social capital. Groups with higher shares of social capital are: young people (12-25 years), highly educated people, and Protestants. In addition, the social capital index is significantly and positively related to perceived health and well-being demonstrating nomological validity of the index.

Conflict and consensus among elite economists in the state: Network structures and competition for influence in Mexico and Argentina

Economists occupying high-level positions in state bureaucracies play an important role in shaping macroeconomic and financial policies in Latin America and other developing countries. However, the nature of this role varies cross-nationally. In this paper, I illustrate and explain the very different policy-making dynamics in two countries, Mexico and Argentina. In Mexico, macroeconomic policy-making has been based on consensus, conformism and cooperation among bureaucratic elites in central banks and finance ministries, a majority of whom hold advanced degrees in economics. In Argentina, in contrast, despite the prevalence of similar professional backgrounds, policy-making has been conflictual, competitive and characterized by an absence of intra-elite dialogue. The proximate explanation for these differences is the varying structure of the professional networks of bureaucratic elites. Using data on the network ties among bureaucrats in Mexico and Argentina from 1982 through 2010, I show that Mexican elite networks are more cohesive than their Argentine counterparts. The structure of these networks, in turn, is explained by the different party structures, bureaucratic recruitment and promotion mechanisms, and patterns of elite competition for policy influence in these two countries. In Mexico, the one-party state existent during roughly 70 years created fertile conditions for the emergence of a cohesive bureaucratic elite. Remarkably, however, this elite became independent of the partisan conditions that helped create it, and was able to continue to assert its control over key bureaucracies following the demise of the Institutional Revolutionary Party in the 2000 elections. In Argentina, alternation of power between both parties and intra-party factions, as well as recruitment practices based on the concept of the "economic team," have given rise to a fragmented elite network. By illustrating these political, organizational, and network dynamics, this study contributes to the sociological understanding of professional knowledge as a form of political power.

The absent consumer values in the marketisation of European public services: Results of a cross-national citizens-survey

For the past 20 years, the EU has embraced the belief that 'marketisation' will improve public services. This approach assumes that citizens act as consumers. The theory goes that 'choice' is (partly) introduced as a response to the new attitudes adopted by modern citizen-consumers.

This European policy perspective formed the framework of a citizens' survey carried out in six countries (Austria, Belgium, Germany, Poland, Sweden and UK) on 3 public services (postal services, local public transport, and electricity) in 2007-2008.

In the paper the survey results are presented about whether citizens adapt these consumer attitudes towards the public services in question.

The main results can be summarised as follows. The choice paradigm is not a general attitude. The results indicate that more citizens are pushed to acknowledge choice by preceding reforms rather than consumers demanding, 'choice'-based reforms. The critical consumer paradigm of 'choice' is furthermore socially and paradoxically 'biased'. Throughout the study clear social demarcations were detected between 'haves' (higher educated, bigger income and higher professional status) and 'have nots' (lower educated, lower income and lower professional status). People which show the lowest satisfaction with the services also show the least interest in choice behaviour and practice.

The paper concludes that the modern 'citizen-consumer' who expects and demands 'choice' from these public services is still largely a policy fallacy, especially at the lower ends of society. At the more abstract level of economic theory, we can also read the results as a cry for safeguarding the public nature of these services. The public nature then seems to be less a question of state involvement or state ownership but much rather lies in these services' immanent character: They have to be publicly available and universally guaranteed without much private consumer decision making.

"El cuidado social y las políticas públicas. su incidencia en el empleo, la formación y cualificación de las trabajadoras en el cuidado en domicilio de dependientes: El caso barcelonés y montevideano."

Todas las sociedades deben dar respuesta a la demanda de cuidados que tiene una parte importante de la población que se encuentra en situación de dependencia y requiere de la ayuda de otra persona para realizar las actividades básicas de la vida cotidiana. En países como España y Uruguay, las familias y, en particular, las mujeres del hogar, son claves en la provisión de cuidados de familiares, bajo la modalidad del trabajo no remunerado. La existencia de una política pública que incorpore prestaciones de cuidados, puede promover sociedades más equitativas a nivel social, de género y generaciones, donde el derecho ciudadano a dar y a recibir cuidados pueda ser efectivamente garantizado. Dado que gran parte de personas adultas dependientes optan por vivir en su domicilio, la demanda de cuidados en domicilio es cada vez mayor. La ponencia analiza la relación entre la formación y el empleo de cuidados en domicilio realizado por trabajadoras contratadas por empresas que ofrecen el servicio en Montevideo y Barcelona. Se analizan las diferencias formativas de las trabajadoras, como resultado de estrategias de acceso al empleo, condicionadas por la existencia de una regulación pública que exija una formación específica en cuidados. Se abordan las diferencias formativas como estrategias adoptadas para adquirir las competencias necesarias para desempeñarse en el empleo. Por último, se analizan diversos enfoques conceptuales de la cualificación y su vínculo con las competencias específicas asociadas a este empleo.

[1] Se utiliza la noción de dependencia adoptada en el Consejo de Europa, Resolución (98) 9, del 18 de septiembre de 1998, que la define como "el estado en que se encuentran las personas que, por razones ligadas a la falta o pérdida de autonomía física, psíquica o intelectual, tienen necesidad de asistencia y/o ayudas importantes a fin de realizar los actos corrientes de la vida diaria".

An ordinal IRT model for the circular analysis of affect and emotions

The analysis of affect and emotion is full of circular models (e.g., Plutchik & Hope, 1997). During the last years I have developed a method for analyzing polytomous data as representable along the circumference of a circle. This is an ordinal Item Response Theory model for the circumplex, based on previous ordinal IRT models for the cumulative scale (the Mokken scale, Van Schuur 2011) and for the unfolding scale (Van Schuur 1993). The model for dichotomous data was presented in Mokken et al. (2000). It gives measurement scale values of items and subjects, and goodness of fit measures for the whole scale, for individual items and individual subjects. I would like to present an application of this method to the study of affect and emotion.

Results of the first (2009) wave have been disseminated in papers for ECPR and ASA workshops (e.g., Van Schuur and Voerman, 2010). Changes in party membership between 2009 and 2012 are expected. About 30% of non-members said that they might be willing to donate money to a party without becoming a member, about 25% of potential members were classified as having a high probability of becoming a member, and, equally about a quarter of former members indicated that they might become a member again. Among the present members approximately 10% indicated that they might leave their party. This panel study attempts to show what has happened in the last three years, and which characteristics of the respondents in the 2009 study are the best pre-

Captain America and Simon Bolivar: Symbolic boundaries and political subjectivity in Venezuelan young adult interviews

Contemporary media and scholarly coverage of Venezuela often focuses on how or whether Venezuelans support or oppose Chávez and if the president merits this support. This paper asks a different set of questions about young adults, symbolic resources and political subjectivity in a polarized society. I interpret Venezuelan politics from the point of view of a demographic whose political experience is exclusively within the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela: the country's young adults. Like many nations outside of Europe and North America, Venezuela is a demographically young country, with almost half the population under thirty. Young adults, children or adolescents when President Hugo Chávez Frias was first elected, crystallized their worldviews through the symbols and experiences presented to them in a highly politicized, polarized society.

Young adults are almost never considered as complex political subjects. This paper turns focus to how young adults use the symbolic resources of culture to interpret and act in the Venezuelan political field. Through talk about their emergent experience with the social and economic changes instigated by the Chávez administration, young adults craft nuanced understandings that defy easy categorizations. In interviews about their political participation, creative activities, consumption practices, and relationship issues, the young adult participants in this research interpret themselves as citizens seeking respect and belonging. Furthermore, they describe and enact their ideas about legitimate, moral participation in Venezuelan society. Young adults made conceptual distinctions in their comparison of appropriate and inappropriate political action. Drawing from symbolic resources, their narratives offer worldviews that maintain or contest institutionalized social differences, particularly around questions of who legitimately belonged to the nation. The paper uses data from 60 qualitative interviews conducted in 2008-2012 in Mérida and Maracaibo, Venezuela.

Visual techniques in the Dutch criminal justice system

The development of technical devices, specific software and new media has resulted in the omnipresence of the visual, in daily life as well as in the courtroom. Photographs and X-rays have been introduced in the criminal justice system and now videotaped confessions or testimonies, computer animations and simulations find their way. In court, visuals are used as powerful rhetorical tools, both by the public prosecutor and by the defense. This development can be seen in the USA, UK and in the Netherlands alike. Most empirical research on the consequences of visuals compared to textual (or verbal) descriptions with respect to recollection, emotional affect, standards of proof and rates of condemnation has been done mainly in the USA and UK.

However, the criminal justice system in the Netherlands is very different from the system in common law countries: it is more inquisitorial in nature. Cross-examination is unknown: the judge asks questions during the trial and has an active truth-finding role. Jurors are not used, but only professional judges. Also, Dutch criminal proceedings are characterized by their written nature; the dossier consists of all documents from the police, experts and the defense. Recent developments, such as the digitalization of the dossier, enable adding (more) visuals, which in turn can be looked at by the judge, defense and prosecutor simultaneously during trial. These developments may change the character of the Dutch criminal justice system revolutionarily.

This paper gives an overview of the state of affairs on the production, contents and use of visuals in the Dutch criminal justice system. Furthermore, the implications of the increase of visual techniques and material in the communication and decision making process in Dutch criminal courts is discussed.

Discourses of sustainable development in Latin America: Trajectory and diffraction of a global discourse

En el contexto de la globalización, la idea de un desarrollo sostenible se impuso como referencia internacional desde los años 1980. Paralelamente, la difusión mundial de la noción da lugar a recomposiciones diversificadas según los lugares, las situaciones y la inserción en las relaciones globales. Así, los actores pueden apropiarse de la noción de manera singular según el contexto sociocultural, político, económico y medioambiental. Si la aparición de la noción de desarrollo sostenible puede ser históricamente situada, el discurso que deriva de su difracción global es necesariamente híbrido. Nuestra propuesta consiste en describir y analizar estas formas particulares de recepción y reformulación del discurso medioambiental global por el examen del "discursos experto" latinoamericano.

Históricamente, los trabajos sobre los discursos ambientales se centran en la bipolaridad Antropocentrismo >< Ecocentrismo como marco tipológico que se aplica de manera Indiferenciada a toda sociedad. En América Latina, en la esfera científica, la pluralidad de discursos ambientales es difícil a desentrañar sin un desvío por las teorías del multiculturalismo (posmodernismo, poscolonialismo, etc.). Así, al nivel de esos "discursos expertos medioambientales », las especificidades regionales pueden ser analizadas añadiendo al debate clásico una dimensión crítica complementaria que apunta a repensar los legados de la modernidad y las relaciones internacionales en situación de globalización. Más allá de la dicotomía Antropocentrismo/Ecocentrismo, algunas versiones de los discursos ambientales latinoamericanos se presentan como contra-posiciones al universalismo moderno y al eurocentrismo.

Esta contribución propone explorar este cruce del discurso medioambiental y de las teorías multiculturales en América Latina a partir de los trabajos algunos autores latinoamericanos y sobre todo considerando la aparición del Sumak Kawsay (« vivir bien ») como principio guía para un nuevo régimen de desarrollo de las sociedades.

Por último, nos referiremos a los posibles traducciones institucionales de los discursos expertos, así como a sus perspectivas futuras.

The present and future of a sensuous sociology

Sociology and anthropology's cultural and bodily turn is witnessing the fast growth of new subfields of study such as the sociology and anthropology of the senses. Whereas the study of the body has enjoyed tremendous growth over the past decade and a half and has perhaps by now reached maturity, the study of the senses is only recently coming into its own with the recent publication of the peer-reviewed journal The Senses and Society, and the production of a few interdisciplinary readers, as well as the publication of a handful of foundational scholarly essays and monographs. Still absent from the field of the sociology of the senses, however, is a focused and comprehensive research agenda. In bridging cultural/qualitative sociology and cultural/humanistic anthropology we argue for the need to blur boundaries which, in this field, are particularly weak due to the ethnographic scope of much research. Serving both the sociological and anthropological constituencies at once means bridging ethnographic traditions, cultural foci, and socio-ecological approaches to embodiment and sensuousness. In our presentation on the present and future research agenda of a sociology of the senses we make the case for the merit and promise of not only focusing on the senses as a research subject, but also on adopting sensuousness as ontological and epistemological elements, that in, on adopting a sensuous approach in its own right.

A latin americanist, proto-environmentalist master frame in the current cycle of environmental protest in Latin America

The sociology of social movements has neglected for some time the cultural aspects involved in these processes. Lately, however, the study of these aspects has attracted the attention of scholars. My work is connected to his trend. I intend to analyze a master frame—that is, a recurrent framing—on natural resources that has re-emerged in the current cycle of environmental protest in Latin America. I traced the origin of this master frame to the early decades of the XXth century, in journalistic and literary pieces written by intellectuals loosely linked to leftist networks. I called it “neocolonial counter-discourse on natural resources”. It has a narrative matrix with four crucial elements: a natural resource; an exploited local group related to this resource; a foreign, imperialist actor; a local accomplice. The story that links these elements is one of extreme exploitation: key words recurrently used are “saqueo” (sacking), “depredación” (depredation), “expolio” (pillaging). It is an injustice framing which may be considered proto-environmentalist, and became a master frame widely used in Latin America in subsequent cycles of protests. It is also Latin Americanist and anti-imperialist.

I will explore the presence of this master frame in current environmental protests in Latin America, particular against mining (open pit, uranium, lithium), GM crops, and forestry and the pulp and paper industry. I am particularly interested in two aspects: its use in processes of frame alignment between social movements in different Latin American countries, facilitating the construction of regional and transnational advocacy networks and coalitions; and its function in helping in the construction of political opportunities on international and transnational levels.

La cuestión de la prostitución en el debate sobre la ley de trata de personas en la Argentina (2008-2011)

Las maneras de concebir la cuestión del tráfico de mujeres han variado en las últimas décadas en las instancias internacionales de acuerdo al peso específico que han logrado en este debate las campañas desarrolladas por distintas organizaciones feministas, las organizaciones que defienden los derechos de las trabajadoras sexuales, y las presiones que han ejercido distintos actores gubernamentales y supranacionales involucrados. La aprobación del Protocolo de Palermo en el año 2001, tanto como la sanción de la ley antitráfico por parte de Estados Unidos en el año 2000, han tenido importantes consecuencias en la legislación Argentina. Así, a partir del año 2008, viene dándose un fuerte debate en relación a la creación y modificación de los instrumentos jurídicos existentes para reprimir y prevenir la trata de mujeres con fines de comercio sexual. El objetivo de este trabajo es describir y analizar los debates políticos en torno a la cuestión de la prostitución a partir de los debates parlamentarios sobre la ley de trata desde el año 2008 y sus proyectos de reforma hasta la actualidad. Es de mi interés mostrar cómo, en un contexto de migraciones transnacionales crecientes y de feminización de los flujos migratorios, el debate político actual sobre la trata de mujeres en la Argentina remite a un conjunto de viejos temas ligados a la cuestión de la prostitución femenina, reactualizando tanto el siempre complejo debate al interior del movimiento de mujeres sobre su definición como explotación o trabajo, como las posiciones de rechazo moral hacia la misma. Por otro lado, me interesa abordar y analizar las posiciones y los argumentos a través de los cuáles en este debate emerge el sistema penal como herramienta privilegiada para la protección y promoción de los derechos de las mujeres.

La experiencia de acción colectiva en la vila acaba mundo: Una reflexión sobre la construcción de conocimiento

En este trabajo se consideran los movimientos sociales como productores de conocimiento, en tal sentido, se discute la formulación dinámica de códigos culturales en el cotidiano de las poblaciones involucradas en acciones colectivas, más allá de los aspectos institucionales observados. Con ese objetivo, se realizó un análisis de la organización y de las movilizaciones de los moradores en la Vila Acaba Mundo, localizada en Belo Horizonte – Minas Gerais (Brasil).

Para esto, es necesaria una reflexión epistemológica que permita la incorporación y el diálogo con otros saberes, como el popular y el colectivo, en la producción de conocimiento. Se pretende comprender cómo las prácticas y los significados construidos por lo moradores, en su historia, contribuyen a la localización de elementos emancipatorios, en el sentido de la superación de las condiciones sociales hoy existentes.

Se muestra fundamental el estudio de los y con los movimientos sociales, entendidos como espacios privilegiados en los cuales son construidas identidades, significados y posibilidades; basadas en la experiencia práctica, concreta y cotidiana, para la trascendencia del presente. Para el objetivo propuesto, son necesarios dos procedimientos: (1) tener la disposición para un diálogo crítico con los movimientos, esto es, la consideración de los mismos como sujetos productores de un conocimiento legítimo, pero no necesariamente correcto; (2) Articular ese esfuerzo con una mayor contextualización económica, política y territorial, a partir de la utilización de una mirada teórica crítica, a fin de visualizar mejor los vínculos intrínsecos entre los procesos locales y las dinámicas globales y vice versa. Además, es central abrir nuevas miradas, flujos y movimientos del presente, sin considerar los fenómenos estudiados de forma estática, sino como procesos de construcción y abiertos. En este marco, fue necesaria la adopción de una metodología cualitativa de investigación, combinando diversas técnicas, como: observación participante, entrevistas semi estructuradas y grupo focal.

Cycles of protest in Curitiba: Mobilization structures and collective action repertoire in two cases in Curitiba

Conflict as an object and key of interpretation of urban phenomena is a theoretical analyses category that articulate a set of laboratories and research groups members of Rede de Observatórios de Conflitos Urbanos, also integrated by the Observatório de Conflitos Urbanos de Curitiba. The events that express conflicts (according the common methodology applied) are described and classified according to conflict's object, kind of manifestation, involved agents (mobilized or claimed), location, the date of occurrence, supporters and research source. This form allows relating the classification categories as a whole, but does not contribute to the identification of sequences of events linked to one same conflict or even the analysis of the dynamics of the conflict from their individual events. The objective of this study is to demonstrate the importance of considering networks linking categories in the records of conflictive events, helping to improve the analysis of mobilization structures, the behavior of social movements and changes in their collective action repertoire. In this sense, it is also important to understand how the extent changes in the political institutions contribute to the expansion or weakening of collective actions. Thus, on one hand, understanding the processes of mobilization requires a look inside the collective actions for the manner which claim's arguments and justifications are constructed. On the other hand, we must broaden our gaze to the context in which these actors are embedded, ie, for the opportunity structures and political constraints. To illustrate the proposal, two cases occurred in the Metropolitan Region of Curitiba (Brazil) linking various manifestations of a single object of conflict will be analyzed: an occupation in the Fazendinha neighborhood in 2008 and the expropriation and eviction of the community of Itaquí.

Eyes wide shut: Sexual practices, subjectivities and conjugalities couples practicing swing

This research investigates the sexual practices, the processes of subjectivation and the conjugalities through the practice of swing in the municipality of João Pessoa, city in State of Paraíba – Brazil. Swing is the practice of sexual relations between married couples, where there is exchange of partners among other types of erotic performances conferred by the couple. Since the exchange of partners, the relationship between persons of the same sex, the relationship with more than one man or, with more than a woman. How is the initiation of couples in the swinger and how to confront the deviant condition that seem to occupy in society? How the body interferes in the establishment of relations with other subjects? What kind of contribution their marital relationships can make to the reflection on the new and old models of conjugalidade? Therefore, from the study on the practice of couples exchange, deals with the changes and stays in benchmarks conjugality present in the culture contemporary. Supporters of a practice allegedly considered liberal, behavior and speech of such couples allows the reflection on the construction of the men and women in Brazilian society. In times where classifications as a family, the roles of father and mother and the notion of sexuality defy the boundaries of genre, it is inevitable to ask what is be man and woman within a relationship, in a world which says that you can do anything, but is not obliged to anything.

Russian politics modernization: A sociocultural approach

The intent of this paper is to draw attention to some correlations indicating that some aspects of sociocultural differentiation in contemporary Russian society are reactions to the process of its modernization. These aspects are reflections of the contradictions in the society resulting from the clash of sociocultural features that are normally associated with different stages of historical process of social modernization. Social modernization means a transition from traditional society to modern society. Technological changes are at the core of the process of this transition. The politics modernization means a transition from politics of traditional society to politics of modern society. This work is based on the understanding of culture following the lines laid out in the works of L. White, P. Bohannon, A. Montague etc, and defined, loosely, as a system of non-biological regulators of human behavior. Culture adapts human behavior to environment. The adaptation has temporality. The main contradiction arises from the inertness of cultural regulators that fail to keep up with the faster, and ever increasing in speed, processes of technological and social modernization. Just a few generations ago the majority of Russian population was rural, lived in the countryside environment and was engaged in natural-subsistence economy. Their culture corresponded to the low-level technological environment characterized by manual labour. The process of modernization has changed economy and other sides of environment in just a few dozen years, leaving the cultural adaptors far behind. People experience conflict with impacts and challenges of modernization such as market economy, new models of division of labour, changes in gender roles and relations, etc. There are a number of groups with different levels of culture modernization and different reaction to continuation of modernization. We can see culture stratification and contradiction among the groups belong to different periods.

La tradición campesina en proceso diante del socioambientalismo y de la agroecología en el caso Brasileño

Este estudio resulta de investigaciones realizadas en el Programa de Posgrado en Ciencias Sociales de la Universidade Federal de Pelotas/Brasil. Bajo una perspectiva sociológica, tiene como finalidad principal la discusión en torno de la agricultura basada en la agroecología como un mecanismo de reproducción de una tradición campesina en el caso brasileño. El desarrollo y la discusión se dan a partir de los marcos teóricos alrededor de la génesis de la ecología de Brasil, la introducción del ecologismo en el medio rural y las interfaces entre el socioambientalismo y la reproducción de una tradición campesina de la agroecología. El trabajo está estructurado de manera que después de la introducción, tenemos tres momentos posteriores, en un primer llevamos en consideración los elementos socio-políticos del ambientalismo en Brasil. En un segundo, trabajamos sobre el tema de la introducción de las cuestiones ambientales en las zonas rurales. Y, en un tercer momento, discutimos acerca de algunos de los usos del concepto de campesino y su relación con la definición de agroecología, como una ruptura paradigmática. Como conclusión, presentamos algunos elementos de la agroecología como un espacio configurado de una reproducción de la tradición campesina en una dirección positiva. Palabras clave: Agroecología; Campesinado; Socioambientalismo.

Political values of the local political class in Russia

The theme of my paper is designed to reflect the transformation of political values of the local political class in Russia and its new role in contemporary policy. The new role of political values in contemporary policy could be seen in many countries. I am interested to research the attitudes of Russian people to democracy, social movements & parties, human rights, how they see the "special Russian path", what they think about the political development in Russia. On the one hand political values play the most effective & important role in transformation of political culture. The knowledge of political values & the choice by each political actor of its own model of political culture is a necessary condition of its political socialization. On the other hand political values may impose a new model of political life & political design at local & national levels. For example the change of the attitudes of the local political class to the protest movements & the opposite parties could essentially influence the political situation in the regions. The unification of political values of different social strata and political levels creates a new cultural infrastructure decreasing gap in quality of politics in various regions of the country. It's difficult to over-estimate the importance of such unifying ideas in political culture of the local political class of Russia. My paper describes & analyses the evolution of political values & their contribution to democratic policy making in interrelations with political situation in Russia in times of globalization.

The main goal of my research is studying correlation between political values and political situation. This subject was evaluated on theoretical & empirical backgrounds. My paper analyses how the transformation of political values influences political situation in Russia. It's a case study with using data from different surveys.

Derechos humanos y violencia política en la Argentina

Esta ponencia examina las formas que asumen las disputas en torno al pasado reciente en la Argentina a partir del análisis de un caso empírico: el Monumento a las Víctimas del Terrorismo de Estado, un homenaje público y oficial a quienes fueron asesinados o continúan desaparecidos como consecuencia del accionar represivo del Estado. La sanción de la ley de creación de este monumento supuso el no reconocimiento de una segunda iniciativa presentada por la minoría que proponía la creación de un Monumento a los Caídos, en homenaje a "todas" las víctimas de la violencia política de los años 70s, incluyendo a las llamadas "víctimas del terrorismo". Colocando el foco en el análisis de las distintas instancias parlamentarias en las que se debatieron ambos proyectos, (dos sesiones parlamentarias y una audiencia pública) analizaré cómo los debates parlamentarios a favor o en contra del Monumento se instituyeron en verdaderas arenas de disputa en torno a interpretaciones divergentes sobre el pasado reciente y sobre los límites de las nociones de víctima y DDHH. Identificaré las categorías claves que fueron invocadas en las distintas intervenciones a favor o en contra de los dos proyectos, las representaciones que le están asociadas y daré cuenta de la manera en que se construyen las distintas pretensiones de reconocimiento del carácter legítimo de las víctimas - las victima del Terrorismo de Estado vs las víctimas del terrorismo – y los recursos a los que se apela al intentar otorgarle a dicha categoría un contenido exclusivo. Mostraré la "gramática" moral que articula estas disputas, los principios de legitimación que son interpelados en el marco de este combate discursivo y el lugar decisivo que tuvo la intervención del Estado en la instauración de un límite a las pretensiones de reconocimiento de las llamadas "víctimas del terrorismo".

Derechos sexuales y reproductivos: Análisis de las racionalidades emergentes en torno a la donación de gametas, la subrogación de vientres y las modalidades de fecundación extracorporal

Los avances de la biomedicina nos instan a reflexionar sobre los cambios y continuidades en torno a la sexualidad y la reproducción en el contexto de la reflexividad contemporánea. La donación de gametas masculinas y/o femeninas, las técnicas de fecundación producida por fuera del acto sexual, fuera del cuerpo y/o con la participación de terceros reconfiguran el imaginario sobre el cuerpo, la sexualidad y la reproducción.

En el marco de estos grandes debates, el presente trabajo se propone como objetivo general explorar los entrecruzamientos de las distintas racionalidades definidas por Claudia Bonan (2003) en las representaciones sociales en torno a estas prácticas. Para el abordaje de las temáticas propuestas se trabajará con datos secundarios, relevados de comentarios de lectores de Clarín vertidos en artículos periodísticos referidos al tema y publicados en el sitio web de este periódico entre los años 2009 y 2011.

Las preguntas-clave que vertebran el presente trabajo son: ¿Cómo se ponen en juego las racionalidades estatal, biomédica y emancipatoria en los discursos sobre las prácticas de donación y recepción de gametas? ¿Qué continuidades y rupturas introducen estas prácticas en la racionalidad hegemónica sobre la sexualidad y la reproducción? ¿Deben incluirse estas nuevas prácticas y realidades en la agenda de los derechos sexuales y reproductivos del feminismo?

Quality of life: Its past and its future

Is life getting better? The founding father of sociology, Auguste Comte, thought it is. Yet most later sociologists rather think that life is getting worse and this negative view has become ever more dominant, as appears in a count of words in sociological abstracts.

Empirical research on quality of life took off in the 1970s. A look at the available data shows a clear upward trend. We live ever longer and also longer in good health. Subjective life-satisfaction is also on the rise. This appears in an analysis of time-series in the World Database of Happiness. Together that makes that we live now longer and happier than ever before in human history. This stunning rise in level is accompanied with a steady decline of inequality in quality of life.

This begs the question why so many sociologists fail to see the obvious. One of the answers is that sociologists tend to think of quality of life as access to scarce resources, which is part of a wider tendency to look at presumed conditions for a good life rather than on the actual outcomes of life. A related answer is that much sociological research is instigated by vested interests, eager to equate their product with the good life. In this context it is also worth noting that many sociologists earn their living exploiting social problems and for that reason may not be too open for good news.

What about the future of quality of life? The number of happy life years will probably continue to rise, unless ecological disasters take place. Sociologists will still persist in their focus on social problems. In that way they will probably contribute to the progress for which they have a blind eye.

Rebuilding the pre-Hispanic religiosity in an urban area: The case of the urban Sikus' bands in Buenos Aires

The emergence of the first urban sikuris' bands, which can be traced to late S XIX, was closely related to the performances of such ensembles in the Andean traditional religious celebrations of Catholicism. At the present time, the relationship between Catholic devotion and these bands is preserved in the small populations of the Andean region of Bolivia, Peru, north-western Argentina and northern Chile. On the contrary, in the context of the current processes of re-ethnization, the sikuris' bands of large cities have not only lost the strong bonds with the Church, questioning its role during the Spanish conquest, but adapted and recreated pre-hispanic beliefs and appropriated Eastern concepts, notions and ideas of the sacredness disseminated and reformulated by the New-Age movements. I will explore and analyze the contrasting narratives that dispute the "religious authenticity" among the members of siku's bands in Buenos Aires.

Representations of teenagers about middle school, the world of work and politics

High school and work world are still facing all different social actors in general and educational in particular, in a renewing historical context of politics inside the national scene.

This essay aims to:

1.- Describe youth representations about the work world.

2.- Understand youth representations about high school.

3.- Compare different social representations between two groups of students: those who actively serve inside student centres and those who do not.

This research project is based in the social representations theory. The planned design refers to an exploring-descriptive study of youth regarding high school, work, the relationship between both, and politics. Surveys and interviews have been carried out to a sample of 395 students living in CABA and Great Buenos Aires districts. Some conclusions we have reached are:

- First of all, our sample students attempt to visualize the need for having higher academic level requirements, in opposition to a widespread opinion sustaining their lack of inclination to hard work, steadiness, etc.

- In five years time, almost all of them visualize themselves being studying and working simultaneously.

- They are also perfectly aware of workmen rights; this issue could have been invisible in some other historic time.

- The subgroup of students with active militancy show a greater emotional maturity: they acknowledge school shape them as persons, for labour, and also as citizens. Besides, this group presents a greater present and past labour experience (higher reality criteria)

- Apparently, their posture regarding politics reflects an incipient repolitization process.

Bullying at secondary school: Analyzing the profile of the aggressor

School violence causes physical and mental harm on students; moreover, professors point out to the violence like one of the actions that more interfere in the teaching, not alone because the class is interrupted, but for the anguish and the desire of abandoning the school on the part of victims. This paper seeks to identify the prevalence of victims and aggressors and the predominant type of violence among teenagers enrolled in public secondary schools in the metropolitan area of Guadalajara, Mexico and particularly, to analyze the factors associated to psychological and familiar profile of the adolescent aggressor. This is a cross-sectional, analytical study. The information was gathered by questionnaire applied in school to 1706 students between January 2009 and December 2010. The sample design was random and multistage. Logistic regression model was used to identify factors associated to be considered an adolescent aggressor. Furthermore, sociopathies were assessed through the Eysenck test. Results reveal that around 24% of students can be considered victims, while about 10% can be considered aggressors; the most common type of aggression was verbal, followed by physical violence. The conjunction of factors such as familiar violence, friends with criminal record and sociopathies has a synergic effect to encourage a teenager to become an aggressor. CONCLUSIONS: The presence of family violence conditions, sociopathic characteristics and the social path of the teenager are factors associated with the aggressor's status. Thus, psychological and familiar profiles are key elements to identify timely the adolescent aggressor in secondary school and search for appropriate strategies to change this behavior.

Demographic changes, social inequalities and child health in Latin America

INTRODUCTION: America Latina—a region known for its social disparities—is currently experiencing a profound demographic and epidemiological transition. In such sense, this paper seeks to analyze the relationship between social inequalities, demographic changes and child health in Latin America; METHODS: Information about population and health was obtained from diverse official sources; different statistics like ratios among extreme socioeconomic groups or countries (ordered in quartiles according to Human Development Index 2009) were calculated to quantify the difference in health indicators among countries or in selected countries. RESULTS: Despite the observed population aging in recent years, this study reveals that the population under 15 years old in Latin America in 2030 will be only slightly lower to the existent in 1990; furthermore, child population's will be increased in poorest countries of the region. Data reflects large differences in health indicators: in 2008, infant mortality rate in quartile of the poorest countries almost triplicate the rate of the richest quartile; inside each studied country, notables differences related with poverty are also observed: in all the cases, the infant malnutrition rate or the <5 mortality rate are much higher in poorest population's quintile than in the richest quintile. CONCLUSIONS: The above-mentioned aspects evidence a dramatic inequity in child health -related to social disparities-, something more relevant since in absolute terms, Latin American population <15 will maintain similar levels in next decades and that in the poorest countries -or in the poorest regions in each country-- child population's will be higher.

Marx and criminology

This article aims to address the work of the founders of Marxism, Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, in order to analyze their contributions to the study and the approach of the criminal matter, a social problem of great importance and in which the Marxist perspective analysis and approach remains unexplored.

The objective pursued is to combine the theoretical bases of marxism that are necessary to support the construction of a systematization, absent until now, of the Marxist tradition about the "criminal matter" in order to reconstruct, a definition of criminal act and the underlying conflict from the historical materialism approach, to analyze the link between production systems and the control—conflict pair, and to report a Marxist theory of criminal law, with the final aim of map out guidelines for a transforming criminal programme.

The report will highlight the traditional law on deprivation of basic needs of workers (1842), the critique of the ideology of private law (1843), questioning the penalty in response to a free will of those who make a crime (1853), assessment of crime and creation of the bourgeoisie (1859), the functionality of the offense for the preservation of the capitalist social structure (1862), the original appropriation of communal lands in the beginning of the capitalist system (1867) and formal and uneven character of law as proposed equal treatment in unequal conditions (1875). Urban inequalities and segregation in Montevideo

The Paper illustrates the interrelationship between urban inequalities and segregation in Montevideo. The analysis is based on an atypical city in Latin America that despite its past "Welfare State" background, during recent years, has been inserted in the context of restructuring, privatization and social inequalities. On this regard, it is an interesting "case study", to integrate for comparative analysis.

The research findings presented contribute to the analysis of social processes, considering trends from statistical data and analysis, as well as the perception and images of the city from the local actors, related to the "subjective construction of the city". Both perspectives are necessary to study the fragmented social and spatial map. The analysis shows that Montevideo and its Metropolitan Area configure a heterogeneous society, which includes neighborhoods and areas with specific patterns and dynamics.

Although Montevideo is not a global city, it is interesting to remark - as shows comparative research -, findings that indicate an increase in social inequalities within the urban space, with a heterogeneous social structure and an increase of middle classes in the peripheral areas (Taschner, Bogus 2001, Preteceille, Cardoso 2008, Leal, Veiga 2008, Koch, Valdes 2008).

The trends show that both poor and upper classes are established in homogenous social spaces, while the middle classes are scattered throughout the city. This reflects the influence of economic restructuring and labor changes, new family roles, cultural and consumption patterns, which induce diverse stratification cleavages, particularly among the middle classes, and their spatial differentiation. In the case of Montevideo it is found that both social indicators analysis and qualitative study match these trends. In sum, this Paper will examine the social composition of urban segregated areas and its changes over time, reviewing the role of global forces in these socio-spatial transformations.

Mortalidad neonatal en Colombia (2000-2009): Causas, tendencias e inequidades

La cuarta meta del milenio es disminuir la mortalidad de menores de cinco años, se calcula que cerca del 50% de la mortalidad en este periodo se presenta en neonatos, disminuir las inequidades permitiría que esta meta se logre y no atenderlas aumenta la brecha entre regiones. El objetivo de este estudio ecológico es describir las inequidades en mortalidad neonatal a partir de la evaluación del exceso de riesgo por departamentos en Colombia comparado con la mejor tasa a nivel global, así como analizar las principales causas y tendencias.

Se calcularon las tasas de mortalidad neonatal temprana, tardía y total por departamentos por año y acumuladas en el periodo 2000-2009, y por causas para el año 2005. El exceso de riesgo se calculó a partir de la fracción atribuible comparando entre departamentos y el país con mejor tasa de mortalidad en el mundo. Se compararon los perfiles de causas de mortalidad entre Colombia y el país de referencia.

La tasa acumulada de mortalidad neonatal acumulada de Colombia en el periodo evaluado fue de 10,2 muertes por mil nacidos vivos. El peor departamento tiene 2,5 veces la tasa de mortalidad comparado con el mejor del mundo. Las fracciones atribuibles para todos los departamentos siempre superaron el 78%. La tasa de mortalidad neonatal disminuyó en 39%, el peor departamento fue Choco que disminuyó 9%, y el mejor Caquetá que disminuyó el 61%.

Las principales causas de mortalidad neonatal temprana fueron los trastornos respiratorios, seguidos por complicaciones obstétricas y malformaciones congénitas, las cuales son prevenibles. Al comparar a Colombia y sus departamentos con un referente externo se encuentra un exceso de riesgo muy elevado. Durante el periodo 2000-2009 Colombia presentó disminución de la tasa de mortalidad neonatal, sin embargo esta se presentó de forma desigual entre regiones, aumentando la brecha.

Mapping regional science production to build research agendas

Most popular indexes to measure science production growth come from Derek de Solla Price old proposals (but valid) about volume and citation counts. These kinds of measures are important to understand impact of scientific production in mainstream. Nevertheless, Scientometrics and Sociology of Science haven't paid enough attention to local and regional indexes about scientific growth to discover tendencies and rebuilt local and regional research agendas. This paper proposes 4 kinds of indexes to explore possibilities of scientific development: interdisciplinary index, development of thematic issues (consistency, variation capacity and innovation), invisible college development, and collaboration. Two methodological processes are featured: first one related to creation of data bases different from Scopus and ISI products, a necessary practice to make visible most of production not included in them; second, indexes specifications that could be used mapping regional or local scientific developments.

Here is presented a developing research program build by Social Networks and Actors Research Group at the Universidad de Antioquia, specifically developments in our project "Scientific and Technological Knowledge available in Antioquia's Department, 1990-2010", funded by FUNLAM and UdeA.

Meaning understood as juxtaposed networks of communications

Meaning as emergent phenomena is composed by two kind of constructive processes according to Luhmann's SST. One of them is related to personal experience: memories and choices experienced by conscience. Other is related to cumulative social experience as a horizon of possibilities to choose. These choices make possible communication. This work presents an exploratory model to depict meaning as a process of cumulative experience enacted by signs or information organized in networks of communications. These networks are possible to be enacted by two analytical principles: distinction and aggregation. Aggregation identifies groups of communications by co-occurrence of forms, signs, information or some kind of marks. These groups are organized in time and could be considered as emergent cause they appear, vary, stabilize and disappear according with complexity and circumstances of communication events. Distinction enables a differentiation analysis. This could be understood as a process of validation: Not all co-occurrences and aggregation forms could show emergent meaning, but different kind of signs or information juxtaposed in those groups make possible identify emergent codes and all and new communication forms as signs of distinctions.

This two principles and social network analysis as tools to make maps of networks of communications is justified by an emergent kind of analysis that go beyond hermeneutics and classical phenomenology. This kind of analysis tries to unveil configuration of meaning in larger sets of communications (documents, papers, electronic writings, etc). In this way, meaning exploration as maps of past communications could be structured by these theoretical principles and use of social network analysis.

Social-Democratic parties on the post Soviet space: Trends and prospects

Political and economical transformations in the Commonwealth of Independent States were followed by forming of the party system, which is considered as the condition of democracy. Nevertheless, evolution of political regimes on the post soviet space has lead to the appearance of so-called "façade democracies" and new authoritarian regimes.

Stability of democratic system is provided by the presence of three minimum important segments of political spectrum: liberal, central and left.

Social-democratic and socialists parties has played important role in the forming of social oriented market economy and democratic political system in West Europe. During democratic transit in Central and East Europe social-democratic parties were also successful and became the important part of new political system.

As for the post soviet countries, forming of social democratic parties by the model of West and Central Europe was not possible according to a number of reasons.

Stability of democratic system is provided usually but the presence of three minimum important segments of political spectrum: liberal, central and left.

We analyze the process of forming and evolution of social-democratic parties in 8 post soviet countries: Azerbaijan, Belorussia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kirgizstan, Moldova, Russia, Ukraine.

According such criteria, as quantity of members, peculiarities of organizational structure, participating in election, contents of ideology, role in political life, we can sort out three periods of developing of the social-democratic parties. First period (1991-1995) can be described in the terms of fragmentation of left part of the political spectrum and of it socialist wing in particular. Second period (1995-2005) can be characterized by searching of ideology and electoral base. Third period links with essential changing of the parties positions in some countries and increasing of their roles in political life. It supposes good results during parliamentary election and let us make conclusion about prospects for the future .

Encounters with violence: A living archive

Half torn portraits of missing people forcefully disappeared (desaparecidos) still remind inhabitants of the city of Guatemala of an ill-resolved internal conflict. These informal memorials are now silent witnesses of a new era of violence: one surpassing previous number of deaths turning the country, once again, into a human-eating monster.

Making use of photography's ability of arresting time this project seeks to start a dialogue across time blurring the distinction between past and current experience of violence and turn it into a visual narrative of the present. In this sense Encounters with violence: a living archive seeks to actively engage with traumatic forgotten narratives – mostly unresolved – while at the same time document on new ones and thus create a bridge between memory and present. It seeks to create a living archive of collected encounters with violence. In this sense living archive aims to strengthen the collective memory – breaking an oppressive culture of silence – confronting traumatic past and present violent experiences.

Each portrait speaks of an encounter with violence - directly or indirectly - and of how irregular warfare erodes everyday life. For this the project not only records testimonies but attempts on making them visible asking participants to include their statement as an integral part of the picture.

Integral to the project is the idea of the researcher as an activist of memory raising questions and blurring the distinction around intervention, participation and research. At the same time it will explore new possibilities for visual sociology and means of healing and remembrance.

Finally the project seeks to challenge the concept of post-conflict associated with newly democratized countries and critically analyze the aftermath of traumatic events and the normalization of violence.

Postneoliberalism: An emerging radical consensus in Latin America

The evident legitimation crisis and imminent demise of the neoliberal model based on a Washington (now Davos) Consensus has given rise to a new consensus on the need to bring the state back into the national development process in the search for a more inclusive form of development, a new development paradigm designed to save capitalism by giving it a human face. This paper argues the need to move beyond this mainstream post-washington consensus in support of an emerging radical consensus within a network of Latin American social movements.

A triple view on trade-union activism: Cause, individual and organisation

Current challenges of trade union activism are due to changing contexts and actors (changes in industrial models and organisational practices, globalization, crisis, durable mass unemployment, generational divide, changes in the labour force with an increased participation of women, higher levels of education, mobility, individualisation processes, weakening of institutions...) and to the diversification of the forms of social commitment (the model of traditional bodies versus the model of new social movements).

The communication is based a research conducted with trade union activists in Belgium. This research mobilised one hundred trade unions activists through a participative research methodology (group analysis). The analysis is inspired by an interactionist approach that looks at the same time: at the social characteristic of activists; at the causes that mobilised individuals; at the organisations that welcome, select, train and sort individuals. The key hypothesis is that, if the context matters, becoming an activist is also the result of the conjunction between the readiness of a person's, an interest in a cause and the relationships that will set up between individuals and an organization or a group. The communication we will discuss activism and union renewal through this interactionist perspective.

Generations at work and social cohesion

Work has always been and remains a powerful integrator in society. It gives place, duties and rights, and distributes individuals on a scale of social prestige. Work is still a key element in the inclusion/exclusion process within societies. However, over a long period the sense of work has changed for individuals. It has become more diversified and is now a matter for high expectations, at different levels – instrumental, social, symbolic – that do not replace each other. In post-industrial societies, work and identities remain strongly intertwined despite a progressive distance vis-à-vis work. Work remains a social integrator but it no longer has a hegemonic value. It supports the building of identities but through a more polycentric conception of existence in which other values (such as the family) play a similar role. Moreover, the gender models of relationship to work appear less opposite in the new generation of workers. There is a generational component in all these changes, both in the subjective meaning of work and in its objective conditions (status, trajectories, security), unfairly distributed among age groups, and men and women. Moreover, there is also a significant generational differential as regards educational levels, although these generational differentiations do not unavoidably lead to divisions in social cohesion. Work is a concrete and symbolic place where different conceptions of work, existence and social ties meet but do not collide. However, in the future, we can suspect that a continuing discrepancy between work and life expectations and the nature of places available in society could become more threatening for social cohesion. The communication is based on a European study conducted under the 6th Framework Programme of the EU and coordinated by P. Vendramin.

Graffiti as a social struggle for recognition: A comparative perspective between Rio de Janeiro and Berlin

Based on the critical theory of recognition as well on empirical research realized with graffiti writers in Rio de Janeiro and in Berlin, the paper attempts a comparative analysis of the role of Graffiti movement in making of social practices of recognition and individual identities. The writers have, respectively, developed their own forms of political and cultural expression as a means of developing identity and combating the social integration system. The art practice is a way to articulate their own objective needs, aspirations and ask for more efficient institutions for deliberation and representation of their claims. Like the Berliners, the Brazilians have their aesthetic ambitions, even though they are embedded in different recognitional relations. The first group has a historical background of more egalitarian relations of recognition of social respect that pave their strategy to settle a specific moral conflict. Conversely, the result is that the two specific forms of experience of social suffering and search for self-realization, brings in the case of Brazilians, the tendency to push forward talents and artistic capabilities that empower their identities and the way they value themselves and their individual achievement. This process brings the vulnerability to accept asymmetrical relations of value attribution for the social inclusion of life styles of cultural groups, reinforcing the individualization of the experience of social living as well the main capitalist value of individualist ideology of achievement. The Berliners are focused in the ambition to earn respect for their identity claims. Their identity claim, is not justified by the aesthetic merit of their practices, it is a social struggle for the recognition for equal opportunity of the chances for self-realization, for that, they open the question that the institutional anchoring of equal rights affects and threatens their life projects and perspectives.

Forms of social inclusion in an adverse milieu: Undocumented Mexicans in New Haven, Connecticut

The aim of this paper is to present different strategies exercised by several social and political actors in a place where there is a relatively big amount of Latino population from almost all nations in Latin America. However in this paper my attention has been focused on a group of Mexican migrants from Tlaxcala, Mexico who live or have been living in New Haven, Connecticut. Based on field work practices in New Haven and in Tlaxcala, a good number of interviews were accomplished among migrants with the purpose of getting knowledge about the circumstances they have faced as documented as well as undocumented foreigners while in the United States. These interviews lead us to a number of social and political actors in the two countries who for different reasons have had some interest in the migrants' situation.

In this paper my intentions are: 1) to give an account of what may differentiate a "precarious status" from a non precarious one in the case of the migrants; 2) what have been the main social and political actors who have become involved with the migrants situation in the two countries; 3) why and how different actors in the two countries have been involved with them; 4) what have been some of the strategies followed by the different actors including the migrants themselves.

I believe that these kind of issues should be explored much more since they become an interesting window not only to look at the limitations which are imposed upon the migrants but also because they tell us about some of the different resources that exist in our societies to confront some harsh situations.

Producing CET - Uneasy alliances in the making of a new urban space

In this paper I propose to map out the emergence of one particular urban development on the riverfront in Budapest, which city elites purport it to be the first iconic architecture here. It is seductively named Central European Time, but it is largely known by the moniker CET, a play-on-words, which means 'whale' in Hungarian. What and whose vision does this novel post-socialist urban design articulate? What public as 'space' and as 'people' is produced?

I intend to build the argument along several levels of analysis: first I will approach this particular instance of urban intervention as an endeavor of turning value trapped in land into productive capital, that is, transforming a defunct industrial site into a service-led urban cultural venue. At this level of analysis the structural determinations and the political economic aspect will dominate. Second, I will finesse the analysis further and show how this urban development is defined and framed at the intersection of diverse interests, imaginaries and values. For this I turn to some urban policies and their materialization, at the way these are deployed by diverse agents. I will look at the meanings and practices mobilized to advance this project, at the power geographies that emerge. I map out the cultural politics of local economic and cultural urban development through the several phases of the project. I show the many contradictions, unexpected alliances and divisions among diverse actors, which challenge any facile binary divisions like global-local, fleet-footed capital versus place-bound state. This ethnographic account of one particular urban space is also a pragmatic inquiry into conceptual disjunctions (Graeber). What meanings, roles have the state, culture, economy and politics acquired in the post-socialist context given the global onslaught of neoliberal economic imaginaries?

Movilizaciones urbanas populares en el Santiago de Chile actual: ¿Hacia una metrópolis más justa y democrática?

La política urbana chilena de las últimas décadas ha sido tecnocrática y escasamente permeable a la ciudadanía. Ella se desenvuelve en un mercado altamente liberalizado, con fuerte incidencia del capital inmobiliario (Zunino 2006), un importante ámbito de reproducción del capital en el país. Como consecuencia, Santiago constituye una metrópolis fuertemente fragmentada y desigual, en donde la maximización de la rentabilidad privada genera continuamente transformaciones socioespaciales que redistribuyen regresivamente beneficios y problemas en la ciudad. En los últimos años, dichos fenómenos han sido crecientemente resistidos por residentes movilizadados colectivamente; generándose conflictos por la producción y apropiación del espacio urbano, en términos de sus procedimientos y resultados. Estos conflictos tienen especial interés en barrios populares, donde grupos con escasos recursos de poder han visto más o menos representados sus intereses en su resolución.

Así, la presente ponencia pretende analizar los recientes movimientos sociales populares en torno al espacio urbano en Santiago, y su relación con la actual política urbana chilena, en su amplio sentido. Se busca explorar respuestas a las siguientes interrogantes: ¿de qué forma estos movimientos despliegan contra-poder?; ¿cuál es el sentido de su discurso?; ¿cuáles han sido sus implicancias en la justicia social urbana y democratización de la política urbana chilena? Para ilustrar, se toman como casos de estudio los conflictos por Planes Reguladores Comunales en las comunas de Lo Espejo y San Ramón.

Como resultado se plantea que estos movimientos se basan en el "poder asociativo", el que transforma el espacio público (Allen 1999 y 2003); con un discurso que supera lo particular, apelando al interés común ("espacio abstracto" del capital vs. "espacio concreto" vivido (Lefebvre 1984)). En términos de justicia social urbana, los resultados han sido básicamente defensivos. Sin embargo, éstos han contribuido a democratizar la política urbana, modificando la subjetividad política; aunque con limitado impacto institucional.

Multiple embedded inequalities and cultural diversity in educational systems: A theoretical and empirical exploration

to social justice. Theoretical resources are drawn from political philosophy as well as from recent developments in social theory. It is argued that ethnic minority pupils face multiple sources of inequalities, of a social (redistributive) and cultural (recognition) nature.

The aim of the paper is to discuss how contemporary educational systems deal with 'cultural diversity' – and how they socially organize it. I will explore how and to what extent this social organization of social and cultural "diversity" contributes to the reproduction of educational inequalities. Research results drawn from several projects on educational policies regarding migrant pupils in Belgium and in other European contexts and on ethnic minority pupils' schooling experience and identity building, as well as a selective literature review on similar issues, will support my reflection.

The first section elaborates on Fraser's notion of "parity of participation" and on Sen normative framework on "capabilities", but aims to "socialize" these perspectives, arguing that these dimensions are made more 'durable' through institutionalized patterns of norms and routines. It draws upon recent development of the theories of organizational action focusing on the organization's 'rationality' and on the micropolitics of organizations, as well as Charles Tilly's contribution to the analysis of the relationship between inequality and organisational categorization processes, in order to discuss institutional discrimination and the production of social and ethnic inequality or segregation.

The second section develops:

- 1) the intermediate level of local schooling spaces of interdependency, where we scrutinize segregation and institutional discrimination as resulting from both urban segregation and schooling structural processes;
- 2) the micro level of single-school policies of difference, as the product of educational 'niches'.

We argue that these multiple embedded inequalities significantly determine pupils' opportunities, identity and 'capability' building.

Leisure, social and political accountability, democratic citizenship among Indians

The study reveals from the data of voting trend in India for social & political Accountability of democratic citizenship and the from the representative vision of the development for analyzing the Leisure, Social and political Accountability, Democratic Citizenship among Indians. The area of study randomly selected to Uttar Pradesh. A heuristic distinction between participatory and representative democracy is applied here to examine the relationship between leisure and democratic citizenship. Different forms of leisure support different forms of democracy. The concept of social and political accountability is proposed as a primary linkage between leisure and democracy. Leisure activity which generates social and political accountability is more conducive to greater democracy than leisure activity which does not. Recent examinations of the content of leisure in India suggest an increase in leisure activity that does not generate social Accountability and thus provides only weak support for democracy. Implications of this finding for leisure research and the of leisure services are explored, with the concept of social Accountability suggested as central to the trans-disciplinary analysis of leisure's political significance. It has been found in conclusion that the public and politician both are responsible for good or bad governance. It is required to aware the Democratic Citizenship among Indians.

Women's participation, empowerment and gender equality: A micro analysis

This article analyzed the outdoor participation potential of women; the process of women's empowerment; and the interrelationships of women participation, empowerment, gender equality and their functional dependency on age, education, income and caste. A sample of 90 grassroots level women workers were selected from Gilaula block of Sravasti district, Uttar Pradesh, of whom 35 were Community Based Distributors (CBDs), 35 were Anganwadi Workers (AWWs) and 20 were Women Pradhans (WPs). It was found that 60% of the sample was in the age group of 25-45 years, 22% were below 25 years and 17.7% were above 45 years. 72% women were educated till primary and intermediate level, 7.8% were graduates, 3.3% post graduates and 8.9% were illiterates. 80% WPs and all the sampled CBDs and AWWs had very limited income. Data showed that the CBDs were more articulate, mobile, active, and sent their children to schools. The AWWs were very vocal and authoritative. They participated effectively in decision making regarding income expenditure, children's education, family planning, etc. It was revealed that women in the 25-45 age group were more participative, vocal and active than women below 25 years and above 45 years of age. The CBDs and AWWs were equally participative whether they had higher or lower education. All the sampled WPs were illiterate, and low caste WPs who had limited income, wanted to overcome their illiteracy, by undergoing training and actively participating in outdoor political and economic activities. It was suggested that there is a need to provide empowerment training to all voluntary workers and local leaders. A strategy should be formed so that more and more women can be involved in outdoor activities, particularly those women who want to work, are educated and belong to low income, and low caste category.

Childhood in globalized India: A discursive discourse

Modern Indian Society is characterized by increasingly rapid social and technological change. Society's ability to coordinate change has exceeded its ability to reflect on the implications of the outcome. The ongoing globalization has created spaces not only for social interdependence but also for individuation. The issue is more multifarious and multidimensional. The concern is on the enormous changes it has produced in the lives of children- political, technological and cultural. Childhood as a 'uniform and universal' term is being reinstated by the multifaceted Childhoods, signifying the intricacies of growing up as it is incessantly being influenced by local, national and international factors.

The child is always in a state of conflict between the values learnt and the values communicated through the electronic and print media. Justifying childhood with innocence and androgynous with such exposure is becoming more complex leading to early identity formation. This paper is based on an ethnographic study of 30 children in the age group of 8-16, in middle class families in the city of Lucknow, India. It examines how the notion of independence, autonomy, agency, negotiation, identity and right to decision making which comes early with this exposure-constructive/destructive, is practiced and voiced in their daily social world. It also delineates structures for the children's understanding and adapting to changes in technology, marketplace, and their own families and attempts to look into their everyday world, the nuances of growing up in both- family and non family relationships with regards to their interpersonal and social experience.

It also addresses the issue of their gender construction with special reference to their body and sexuality in globalized India. Along with the changing contours of modern childhood, the paper also tries to examine how children place themselves in the given social space in Indian cities in local as well global context.

Women in higher education in globalized India : The travails of inclusiveness and social equality

As society becomes knowledge driven, higher education becomes the vehicle for success reflecting on socio-economic development of the country. With the shackles of the once worthy aim of socialist society giving way to new economic rationalism and crash consumerism, Indian society is in state of flux. With globalization, a model of advanced capitalist production techniques has begun to elbow its way into the entire fabric of its society. In such social formation, forms of social inequality are derived from class, cultural and gender domination. How higher education, in the backdrop of the structural changes of society, wrestle with the issue of equality, has been vital to the policy makers and academics. No doubt mass education in India has taken off, yet in practice reflections of cultural hegemony exist in the educational institutions.

Data drawn for the present paper is based on study of 100 students in University of Lucknow during academic session 2010-11. The main focus of the paper is to investigate the problem of social inequality with special reference to gender inequality in the Indian higher education. The main research question was to probe whether increased participation of women in higher education and market economy means enhanced gender equality? With this probing question detailed interview with the help of structured interview schedule were conducted with the female post graduate students of Lucknow University in different Master courses. Preliminary results of the study show that the impact of globalization has been paradoxical and complex and they continue to remain subjugated the marginalized in new ways in their social lives.

Fieldwork's praxis, production of data and interpretation: A case study of anger and nostalgia

Migration is a worldwide phenomenon in which emotions have been regularly overlooked. Moreover little is known about the specific methodology that has to be applied to better understand them during this process. The aim of this paper is to show how the "epistemology of fieldwork" is necessary to study emotions during the migration process. In order to show this, I undertake a chronological analysis of my research regarding the construction of the feeling of belonging of Argentinean migrants (1999-2003) in Miami (United-States) and Barcelona (Spain) through the study of anger and nostalgia. First, I will show that to have an understanding of anger it was necessary to go back and forth between discursive data (migrant's narrative) and participant observation. Indeed, presentation of Argentinean self during the interviews was not the same that during participant observation. To take into account only interviews would have led me to a misinterpretation of the rejection of Argentina by Argentinean migrants. Secondly, I will present how comparative fieldworks shed light on my interpretation and allowed me to add new insights to my understanding of the feeling of belonging. Indeed, while nostalgia did not appear in my fieldwork in Miami, this emotion was part of the feeling of belonging in Barcelona. Neither the "system of regulation of the sensations", specific to each context of destination, nor the difference between Argentinean middle class category in Miami and Barcelona could explain this difference. Indeed, the time elapsed between migrant's departure from Argentina and the two fieldworks in Miami and Barcelona were not the same. In conclusion, this paper emphasizes that to observe, register, analyze and interpret emotions, only the interdependence between the data collected through migrant narrative and participant observation across space and time allow us to reach a heuristic perspective.

Gender and timing of guilt within argentinean migration process

Between 1999 and 2003 Argentineans lived an economic, social and political crisis that lead some of them to migrate, mainly to the United States and to Spain. There are few studies on Argentinean migration and even less those taking into account emotion and gender during the migration process. The aim of this work was to understand the relations between genders, guilt and the aspiration to act within the migration process. In order to consider this, I undertake an analysis of the expression of guilt within the narrative of Argentinean migrants in Miami (United States) and Barcelona (Spain). In-depth interviews and participant observations were conducted in both cities among Argentinean migrants. Findings show that expressing guilt is a way to perform gender through feelings and the aspiration to act. Indeed, only women in Miami experience guilt. Guilt in front of their impossibility to fulfil their gender role. Guilt in front of the geographical distance with the family. In Barcelona, however, neither women nor men, expressed guilt. This difference cannot be explained by the "system of regulation of the sensations", specific to each context of destination, neither by the difference between Argentinean middle class category in Miami or Barcelona. Indeed, only the consideration of the time elapsed between migrant's departure from Argentina and the two fieldworks can explain the fact that part of the women in Barcelona express guilt as a past feeling. In conclusion, findings show that feeling and expressing guilt allow migrants to temporarily stay attached to their homeland in a gendered way.

Micro entrepreneurship and associations in developing peripheral countries

The presentation addresses the conditions of small entrepreneurs and associative groups' emergence and the requirements for its implementation, grounded simultaneously in solidarity and efficiency. The data were generated under the international cooperation project Micro entrepreneurship and Associations in Developing Peripheral Countries, carried out by three institutions in Brazil, Portugal and Africa. Empirical research in Brazil was based on visits to associative enterprises in rural and urban areas of the Rio Grande do Sul State. These economic organizations are characterized by collective format, small size and their importance in creating alternative production systems. Their institutional forms are presented as small, formal or informal associations and popular cooperatives. The enterprises surveyed were: three of the collection and sorting of recyclable waste (urban solid waste) segment, three of the rural segment and two of the microenterprise segment.

The concept of entrepreneurship entails the ability on leading the organization and management of productive, human and material factors of the enterprises towards achieving their goals. The solidarity economic enterprises, even with all the investment risks and with the conventional forms of production, are guided by the logic of self-management and associated work and the principle of building a solidary and sustainable society. It can be argued that the link between associative entrepreneurship and the Solidarity Economy is the role of the people in poverty in conducting an economic activity. Despite the specificities of each segment, the challenges to be overcome include the dependence on varying degrees of public funders and of the civil society training organizations. The difficulties arise from the disruption of public policy, conceived as government policies, and from the lack of adequacy of technical advice and of the resources to the Solidarity Economic entrepreneurs' reality.

Three levels of democracy : Polis, nation, transnational solidarities

Globalization processes and media connexions challenge the notion of public sphere as an arena for the exchanges of argumentation (Habermas, 1979, Habermas, 1994). These transformations questions not only the arena of debates, but also the political subjects who may address in the public sphere and the consistency of political culture (Eder, 2001)

The problematic of recognition intends to reinforce the individual rights, the cultural rights, the social rights (Honneth, 2001). The questions comes to examine the modes of recognition and the encounters inside the extended social networks, inside transnational social space. This methodology examine the dynamic of democratization as community of issues (Arendt), as politicization of common issues and common problems (Tassin, 2002, Beck, 2006), as interconnexion of issues.

We conclude to the constituency of three public spaces based on three encounters regimes (local, national, transnational). The analytical question comes on the modes of connexion between these three public spaces.

This analytical and taxinomic development will be argued also on case studies such as the anti crisis mobilizations in Europe (Greece ,Iceland) and the Arabic mobilizations for democratisation between different public spaces.

The creation and developments of an alternative market. The example of Fair Trade between Latin America and Europe

In my presentation I analyze Fair Trade as an example of challenge between the dominant international market system and an alternative practice aiming to mutate its hegemonic structure.

I ground my presentation on the empirical findings of a three years research with case studies of coffee producers in Mexico, Nicaragua and Peru and traders in Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom. I focus the analysis on the institutional change processes affecting the international commodity chain of Fair Trade coffee.

The explicit goal of Fair Trade towards 'market moralization' appears to have the potential to drive a change in the global market, challenging the practices and the basic assumptions of the capitalist system. Nevertheless, its success, boosted by consumers' interest, has already attracted the attention of large, conventional companies formerly indifferent to it. Their increasing influence over Fair Trade appears to mirror the attitude of capitalism to adapt to potentially revolutionary changes and subsume them.

I investigate the competition between the two governance systems institutionalized in Fair Trade: 1.the Alternative Trade Organizations' model, which represents the original alternative way of practicing Fair Trade; and 2.the Fair Trade certification model, which is used by corporations to step into the Fair Trade system. The competition between these two models expresses the tension that Fair Trade generates within the capitalist system.

The coffee market offers several clear examples that indicate a clear change in the institutionalization of transnational market practices. This on one side proves the potential Fair Trade has to drive changes in specific patterns of globalization on the other it makes visible the counter forces of the capitalist system tackling this possibility of change. The outcome of this dynamic will shed light on the future of the international commodity market.

Políticas universitarias y sectores productivos

En la denominada "sociedad de la información" o "del conocimiento" se modifica la misión institucional de las universidades agregando a las tradicionales funciones de investigación, docencia y extensión, la función de vinculación o transferencia tecnológica. Sin pretender establecer si se trata de una cuarta y "nueva" función de las universidades o de la reformulación de la "antigua" función de extensión característica del ámbito latinoamericano, en la actualidad se desarrollan en las universidades públicas acciones antes inexistentes o, cuando menos, no desarrolladas en forma tan sistemática. Entre ellas cabe mencionar el establecimiento de contratos de venta de servicios y conocimientos en los que la universidad es contraparte directa del sector privado, el patentamiento de conocimientos que transforman a la universidad en su propietaria o la gestión de incubadoras de empresas y parques tecnológicos.

El trabajo presenta la evolución de las políticas de fomento de la vinculación entre la universidad y los sectores productivos en la Argentina desde la vuelta a la democracia en 1983. Se identifican etapas en la evolución de dichas políticas tanto en relación a los discursos como a las prácticas desarrolladas por las universidades nacionales. Así, se analizan las estructuras organizacionales creadas para gestionar la vinculación con el medio productivo en el ámbito nacional y se indaga sobre la información empírica que es posible obtener en relación al desarrollo de dichas actividades para el conjunto del sistema de educación superior.

Entre los datos referidos a las actividades de vinculación se relevan: monto de los ingresos propios; dependencia institucional de las actividades de vinculación; año de creación de las mismas; existencia de listados de convenios y actividades de transferencia con el sector productivo; existencia de incubadoras, polos y parques tecnológicos; número de las resoluciones que norman las actividades; entre otros.

Teacher education - Implications in the evaluation of basic education - IDEB - A case study in the south region of Brazil

This paper has as a main focus the analysis of the situation of the teachers of the municipal school system trying to identify relations between the education and the results of the national evaluation of Basic Education –IDEB-. Previous studies have indicated that the objectives proposed by LDB-96 (Law of Guidelines and Bases of National Education) have not been achieved and that the attempts of doing it resulted in emergencial programs of low quality. The study looks a sample of municipalities of the three states of the South Region , Paraná, Santa Catarina, Rio Grande do Sul. Trying to identify the level of teacher education, the modality of the course done and the form of continuing education adopted by the municipality with the objective of relating it to the results of evaluation. The results indicated that the majority of the teachers have a higher education diploma (82.8%) this education was done in the presencial modality (75.7%) and activities of continuing education are common in the municipalities studied. These activities are not expressed directly in the results of the IDEB.

Inclusion/exclusion. the dynamics of Latin American democracies in the XXI century

Abstract The goal of this paper is to offer a model of inclusionary-exclusionary paths of democratic development, where electoral participation (the percentage of registered voters) has a significant effect in a) the design and goals of distributive policies, b) the efficacy of these policies). A set of important secondary issues are pertinent to the main argument. The first is explain the ascension of contentious effective left+right coalitions, the second, the instruments of the apparent success of these coalitions, and the effects of all these process in the formation of political cleavages. Other important questions are the effects on clientelistic politics, representation and party politics, state capabilities to build sustainable policies, and the construction of citizen autonomy. Since its "transition" to democracy, and after one decade of neoliberal reforms, income distribution deteriorated yet more; but at the beginning of the actual century this trend began to change due to the ascension of "leftist" coalition to political power. These coalitions are successful to bring distributive social policies. This essay offers a preliminary explanation to the different paths governmental strategies in Latin-American democracies. I call inclusionary democracies to these that are successful in to enhance distributional policies, and exclusionary democracies when its performance has been deteriorating the previous stage of socio economic inequality. The causal narrative locates the decisive political variables (inclusionary political institutions) to explain the different political patterns of response to the distributive challenge. The paper assumes some premises: a) socio economic impoverishment preclude social anomie and efficacy of the political system (perverse circle or democratic traps and state institutions inefficacy), b) the different patterns of responses are a multi factorial process and, as a preliminary conclusion, c) most Latin America Democracies have a good chance to overcome systemic traps to political progress.

Consumption in older age: Risks and potentials

The recognition of older people as a specific group of consumers is growing together with their increasing share of the total population. Some speak about the silver or grey market and about older people constituting a resourceful and well-off consumer segment. Others talk about age discrimination in the way older consumers are treated and how their needs are addressed in the market. Usually the importance of heterogeneity and, therefore, the segmentation of older people is stressed. This presentation is based on a representative survey of people aged 40+ carried out in November and December 2011 in the Czech Republic. The "Older consumers" survey covers a wide range of consumer related topics. In my paper I will concentrate on both general consumption patterns and specific risks older consumers have to face. I will show the importance of cultural and social capital with regard to consumption and inherent risks, and discuss the age discriminatory factors identified by older people in the course of satisfying their needs for goods, services and information.

Women and the criminal justice system: Drug mules, social selectivity and recent changes on the female incarceration in Brazil

The aim of this article is to analyze the recent changes on the patterns of female incarceration rate in Brazil, in the context of the social selectivity of the Brazilian criminal justice system, based on the gender studies proposed by critical criminology and the studies, on social science, about the particular role of the drug traffic on the Brazilian urban peripheries. The debate over the meaning of these changes, as all the questions concerning the relations between women and crime, is punctuated by two themes: the difference, now the central axis of contemporary French philosophy and; the exceptionality of the female deviation, within the general framework of masculine and feminine representations. The relevance of this study lies in to understand the causes that promote the increase in the number of women involved with the criminal justice system in Brazil, besides the need for reflection on gender relations with racial, class, ethnic, sexual and regional differences of identity discursively constructed, which are important for the understanding of the social selectivity of the Brazilian criminal system. On the one hand, the phenomenon reflects the trend of intensification of the punitive state, and on the other hand, within the framework of gender studies, lies in an intersection point of new questions about the sexual division of labor, female criminality and the feminization of poverty.

Kúme mongen: La reivindicación de la lógica ancestral del buen vivir mapuche para habitar territorios recuperados

Como una de las principales fuentes de recursos primarios a nivel mundial, Latinoamérica concentra su actividad económica en la exportación de materias primas. Sin embargo, la mayor parte de los territorios explotados se encuentran habitados por comunidades indígenas, históricamente marginadas en reducciones, previa usurpación de sus territorios ancestrales.

A diferencia de la lógica capitalista que valora a la tierra según la utilidad comercial que se le pueda extraerse, los pueblos indígenas se vinculan con el territorio que habitan en todas sus dimensiones materiales -como hábitat- y simbólicas -como espacio de reproducción de la pertenencia social y donde ejercer su soberanía como pueblo.

Frente a la falta de propuestas sostenibles desde el modelo hegemónico que satisfagan las demandas de los pueblos originarios respecto a sus territorios, algunas comunidades han optado por generar proyectos colectivos construidos en base a sus propias lógicas para entender y experimentar los distintos aspectos de la vida comunitaria. De esta forma, es rescatada la noción que cada pueblo ha construido desde tiempos inmemoriales para vivir bien, contraponiéndose a la lógica lineal capitalista que busca el progreso hacia un futuro materialmente mejor. El Buen vivir exige un cambio de lógica para pensar las relaciones espacio-temporales en que nos desarrollamos como individuos, como sociedad y como especie. Se enfoca en mantener las condiciones materiales y espirituales para que los ciclos de la vida se conserven y reproduzcan en forma armónica con todas las formas de vida con que se cohabita. En el caso mapuche, el concepto del Kúme mongen (o vivir en armonía) está siendo incorporado en planes de vida construidos por comunidades en proceso de recuperación de tierras reclamadas, en oposición al paradigma del desarrollo sostenido y los programas de etnodesarrollo, como es el caso de la emblemática comunidad de Temulemu, en el sur de Chile.

Multiplying diasporic identities and living intersected belonging: the making and shifting of transnational homes in Britain, Germany and the Netherlands since 1970

It is argued in this paper that regional, local as well as global identifications override national and mono-ethno cultural identities while shaping particular notions of intersecting hybrid identities and multi-layered belonging in three EU countries. Based on interviews with professional and academic key minority activists in Britain, Germany and the Netherlands the impact of 'New Integrationism' (Triadafilopoulos 2011: 864) that puts further pressure on visible minorities and diasporic communities to assimilate and express civic loyalty to European nation states on the one hand, and diasporic-transnational community identifications on the other, are explored. Deliberately individuals from different migratory cultural heritage (South Asian Brits; Turkish Germans and Moroccan Dutch) in the three countries were chosen in order to move the debate beyond an ethnification migration context. It is suggested that the positioning of "new" citizens in different European countries is at the forefront of 21st century transnational and cosmopolitan self perceptions. What matters foremost to the contemporary moment is the way diasporic identities are spreading across various migrating communities and taking roots as ongoing routes and routines in different places. If we regard this as a persisting effort it means that any generation of diasporic descent constructs multiple links to distinctive territories engendering new transnational and local social spaces.

First the different migration and citizenship regimes in Britain, German and the Netherlands are sketched, followed by a brief methodological introduction, also explaining the theoretical framework and then introducing the findings of the study[1].

The socio-economic phenomenology: A relational approaches

This paper wants to present a scientific interpretive basis for analyzing economic events such as human and social ones. For these reasons, it affirms that economic phenomena are above all human actions and as such presupposes a social meaning and intention, voluntary or not, visible or not.

For example, a company is born, lives and develops in a context that is nourished by relationships with others and with the surrounding environment. It's subject to national and international legal standards in a political and social order that defines it and surpasses it too; it's made up of workers with a social and human history themselves living in a context made up of individuals related to each other and the context; develops a social function because of the goods it produces to be used in a society by families to live and at the same time the families fed the same companies. A company has sense only in the social context that contains it.

How to interpret such intentions in its social meaning? How to allow such interpretations foremost social? If a socio-economic ratio is carried to its extreme results where you get? And this can help to understand the impact occurs in the social order?

Interpreting the ratio behind the socio-economic phenomena is the role of socio-economic phenomenology. In other words, it studies, analyzing and understanding, the economy in the human meaning that animates the actions and the impact they generate in the social order with its extreme consequences and essence.

The paper, as a result of these questions, presents the epistemologies categories by a relational approaches that can interpret these events and the processes that permit build an economy as mirror of human needs and identities, which is named "economic socialization".

Where did 'task' go in organization theory?

The concept of 'task' used to be of central importance to the theoretical understanding and practical management of organizations. There is no 'one best way of organizing' it was argued, instead any form of organization should be considered in relation to its primary 'purpose' or 'task'. However, 'task' has become a rare concept in organization theory, and in the paper we argue that this clear loss of interest coincides with a turn towards, what Ian Hunter calls, 'high theory', on the one hand, and towards the representation of 'change' as an abstract premise, on the other. After presenting bibliometrical data from organization studies journals showing that 'task' is no longer used in the sense of 'basic purpose', we discuss the concomitant rise of subfields within organization theory such as strategy, organizational behaviour and institutional theory. We argue that there is a connection between the declining interest in pragmatic concepts such as 'task' and the development of such subspecialties. We also argue that it has had some unfortunate consequences for the ability of organization theory to address the organization as a practical whole.

Selective migration flows and the production and reproduction of ethnic residential segregation

Recent increases in immigration have resulted in new patterns of ethnic residential segregation in many European countries. Clustering of immigrants has taken place in the major urban areas and often particularly in suburbs with low-cost rental housing. The patterns of residential segregation are well documented. However, less is known about the migration processes that produce and reproduce segregation. Drawing upon the experiences of the Helsinki metropolitan area, the capital region of Finland, this paper sets out to explore the intra-urban migration flows of the native and immigrant groups and the ways they impact on the production of segregated living areas. In particular, the role of selective migration of the native population is critically analysed. The data of the study is mixed: neighbourhood-level migration statistics are combined with the outcomes of register-based survey to analyse both the actual migration flows of households and their reasons for moving. The results of the study indicate that native out-migration from the emerging multiethnic neighbourhoods, together with the low level of in-migration, has greatly influenced the social composition of the neighbourhoods and speeded up the population transition in these areas. The results from the survey provide further explanation to the migration processes.

The nuances of agency: Latina survivors of gender violence and gatekeepers of citizenship in the U.S.

Generally, agency has been equated with resistance and assumed to be universal. Black and postcolonial feminist theories have emphasized the relevance of contextualizing and differentiating agency with the end goal of uncovering the complex dynamics of oppression and subordination, particularly in matters related to violence against women. In this vein, I share the experiences of Latina immigrant survivors of intimate partner violence in their search for autonomy and citizenship at a U.S. legal nonprofit organization in Texas. Based on two years of activist research, I discuss how both legislation and nonprofit organizations created to assist battered immigrants formally and informally frame survivors' agency, which is not only structurally and situationally constrained, but often compliant and unintended. By looking at the nuances of agency in this context, I reveal the ways in which certain women are able to negotiate the constraints and complete their citizenship application process successfully, while others, often the most destitute ones, tend to be weeded out of this process. At the same time, I analyze the agency of nonprofit workers in their role as what I call "gatekeepers of citizenship," as well as the power that advocates have had to push for policy change and further social justice within the battered immigrants' movement to this day.

Construction of young male identities: A research on engineering students

Esta propuesta consiste en presentar resultados de una investigación con estudiantes de ingeniería de tres universidades chilenas. Brevemente, lo que aparece en los discursos de estos jóvenes es el sentido de una identidad de fuerte arraigo individual donde la carrera elegida es fundamental para conseguir éxito en la vida, allí se refuerza un discurso de competencia que es central en los debates entre varones. El éxito y la felicidad están estrechamente vinculados al desarrollo personal, éste estaría siendo absorbido por categorías más concretas, por ello el desarrollo laboral y profesional son fundamentales en el logro de un estado de felicidad. Ambas categorías están fuertemente marcadas por un sentido práctico y material de la vida, pues el desarrollo profesional y laboral, y la sensación de satisfacción, siempre se definen por el nivel de ingresos que éstas reporten.

En este sentido es importante señalar que las trayectorias de los jóvenes chilenos resultan similares hasta que termina la educación media, posterior a este paso, el factor clase social u origen socioeconómico, va configurando trayectorias distintas. Para los jóvenes de clases medias y medias altas hay una prolongación en los años de estudio, mientras que los jóvenes de bajos recursos lo hacen menos años y entran al mundo del trabajo a edades más tempranas, por ello la medida del éxito es siempre diferenciada y desigual. El factor de clase social también incide de manera indirecta en la construcción de identidades masculinas: en los sectores de mayor esfuerzo éstas tienden a ser más colectivas a pesar de la falta de redes sociales, mientras que en sectores medios altos y altos, el sentido de la identidad es más individualista y práctica, pero cuentan con una red social (un colectivo de apoyo) que les asegura el logro de los estándares que la sociedad estipula como exitosos.

Multiple realities and contradictions within the transnational corporation

Traditional management is a sophisticated machinery of signals and incentives driving human beings toward the quest for what should be. The managerial Ideal is to obtain a perfect alignment between the strategy, designed by the headquarters' leaders and the operations conducted in the many industrial and commercial settings. The so-called "managers" are supposed to manage a "serious" organization that is an organization with clear boundaries, autonomy, rational and legitimate special purposes and a clear hierarchy, a well coordinated institution with a controlled structure (Niels Brunson, 1993). In fact, a large international company is made up of multiple realities and of frequently incompatible "working worlds," to speak like Alfred Schulz (1945). Invisible local transgressions of the managerial doxa make it possible for these "incompatible working worlds" to co-exist. Most such work consist in disconnecting the strategy and norms designed by the top executives from local operations. I will argue that this multiple and invisible work of decoupling (Karl Weick, 1979) is among the key innovations today, despite the fact that it is hidden. I will also argue that it is a signal of low resonance, not always easy to see or hear but which deserves to be interpreted carefully by academics in search of new philosophies for the private governance of corporations.

La vida económica de la nueva religiosidad en los sectores medios urbanos: Un análisis etnográfico sobre el movimiento the art of living en Argentina

Una corriente contemporánea de experiencias espirituales que subrayan la importancia del éxito económico, la prosperidad y una relación positiva con el dinero a alcanzado gran visibilidad en diferentes contextos de América Latina como parte de la difusión de recursos espirituales de bienestar económico de matriz norteamericana. Una verdadera cultura empresarial atraviesa fenómenos religiosos diversos, tanto desde corrientes cristianas reavivadas como en el horizonte de la llamada New Age, obligando a repensar la separación entre lo económico y lo religioso como "esferas" autónomas de la vida social y moral en las sociedades occidentales modernas. Este trabajo propone reflexionar sobre el pliegue entre religiosidad y vida económica desde una perspectiva etnográfica. Para ello se focaliza en las nociones y prácticas relativas a la prosperidad, el dinero y el emprendedorismo en The Art of Living, un movimiento de "crecimiento personal" que alcanza gran visibilidad entre los sectores medios urbanos de Argentina en la última década. Fundado por el gurú indio Ravi Shankar en los Estados Unidos, The Art of Living es un movimiento de alcance global que tiene como objetivos la paz, el bienestar personal y la lucha contra el "stress", pero asimismo una organización de tipo empresarial y un discurso centrado en la prosperidad económica. El trabajo es el resultado de un análisis etnográfico con participantes de dos centros de The Art of Living en Buenos Aires y se propone utilizar ese caso para analizar el lugar de la lógica mercantil en la espiritualidad contemporánea, mostrando los regímenes localizados de intercambio encarnados entre cosas, dioses y personas tal como aparecen en las formas de socialidad que el movimiento The Art of Living moviliza en el horizonte de un ethos igualitarista, individualista y centrado en la "libre elección" que caracteriza la cultura de los sectores medios argentinos.

Urban conflicts and institutional mediation. Public administration, roma settlements and normative polarization dynamics

The theoretical frame of the paper define the polarisation between Roma and non Roma in urban setting as an explanandum of the conflicts

(and not as an explanans), showing the role that political parties and activist groups play, and moreover the different roles Public Administration plays in ethnic polarisation processes at the urban level.

To verify the main hypothesis (i.e. the crucial role played by policies) the paper analyse data from a comparative analysis of local contentious interaction with Roma groups in ten Italian towns. The administrative side of State, especially at the local level is unnoticed in most of the literature on urban conflicts. Political opportunity structure is very important, but the main result of the research signals that policy instruments and the way in which are used have a deep impact in the dynamic of contention. When urban conflicts on Roma settlements produce non-negotiable identities, it depends also on public administrations' difficulties to manage compromises and adjustments among the parties. Irreconcilable positions and hard feelings of hostility against Roma and Sinti do not depend on cultural affiliations; they are the outcomes of an institutional environment with a lack of mediation.

The paper enables to situate the assumptions about prejudice and ethnic hostility, explaining them not only through exogenous factors, regardless of the multiplicity of urban contexts, but also taking into account the role played by the local administrations within the dynamics and the historicity of each local conflicts. It also permits to account for mechanisms of diffusion, escalation and scale shift in urban conflicts, trying to avoid the trap of a radical endogenous explanation.

Una lectura sociológica de la macroeconomía de los servicios en las zonas metropolitanas de Michoacán

Doctor en sociología por la Universidad de Alicante, España.

El objetivo del trabajo es analizar el comportamiento macroeconómico del sector servicios en las zonas metropolitanas de Michoacán (México), mediante el uso de conceptualizaciones, derivadas del pensamiento sociológico, acerca de las características que definen a la sociedad posindustrial o de los servicios en un contexto urbano. Por tal motivo, se usarán datos de los Censos Económicos mexicanos (1984-2006) ordenados de acuerdo con una taxonomía que permitirá, desde un punto de vista estadístico y descriptivo, observar la dinámica de su producto Interno Bruto (PIB), tanto de los servicios al productor como al consumidor; sobre todo, para poder determinar si un rasgo distintivo de las sociedades posindustriales es el predominio de servicios al productor, donde la ciencia y tecnología, es la que se ha transformado en la base de una economía terciaria. Esta idea general proviene de algunos estudios sociológicos que señalan la importancia de la ciencia y la tecnología para la constitución de una sociedad global y urbana. Sin embargo, esa idea puede perder su poder explicativo debido a las peculiaridades que presentan las zonas metropolitanas michoacanas, y al mismo tiempo, la sociedad mexicana.

Protest cultures in France and Germany

The terms "right to the city" or "right of housing" are used as an action-programme by many contemporary urban social movements acting worldwide to define their actions. While Lefebvre criticized the post-industrial city, the contemporary organizations use the "right to the city" to face problems of the neo-liberal city. These movements protest against the gentrification of city centres, want more civil participation and public facilities or defend housing policies. I would like to compare some case studies from two European countries, Germany and France.

Germany has an important tradition of the protection of the tenants and supportive tenancy law. This has created powerful tenant organizations with a strong political lobby. Privatization of social housing is a central issue that they are fighting against. As a initiator of a big network of about 50 initiatives, the "Recht auf Stadt"-Network in Hamburg is a representative example of German activism. I would present this and further examples of networks from Berlin and Freiburg consisting of different social groups (students, tenants) which claim the "right to the city" and act with regards to the question of housing.

France, particularly Paris is dealing with a deep housing-crisis. Social movements, like "Kids of Don Quixote" and "Jeudi Noir" are fighting for quality and affordable housing for everybody, from homeless to middle-class. With the "enforceable right of housing" (law DALO, 2006), a big step was achieved. But the concrete results are disappointing. I would report on housing struggles and present the activities of "AITEC" to illustrate the "right to the city" as a right to participate on the community life.

There are many French-German links about urban issues. With this comparison, I would like to highlight the particular French and German social movements.

Measurements of attitudes towards gender roles in cross-cultural surveys: Internal and external validity

Measuring attitudes towards gender roles in comparative researches is a difficult task, previous research pointing out the difficulties of finding a cross-national invariant indicator. This paper compares two scales one used by the International Social Survey Program 2002 and the other by World Values Survey 2005, testing for both internal and external validity of each, in order to see which of them is a more accurate instrument for measuring attitudes towards gender roles. We have employed Confirmatory Factor Analysis aiming to find an invariant measure for attitudes towards gender roles across countries. We have test for external validity using hierarchical multi-level models, which allow testing expected effects of theoretically relevant variables.

For the items used in ISSP 2002 the Confirmatory Factor Analysis confirmed the existence of two different factors, one tapping attitudes towards the traditional division of gender roles: male breadwinner - female homemaker, while the other indicating attitudes towards male involvement in domestic work and childcare. The measurement model is partially invariant in most of the countries included in the survey. The external validation pointed out that the first indicator is a robust estimator of attitudes towards traditional gender roles, but does not produce similar results for the second indicator.

World Values Survey combines one item that refers to private gender roles with items measuring attitudes towards equal involvement of men and women in public sphere (in education, employment and politics). The confirmatory factor analysis indicates the existence of one factor, tapping only attitudes towards equal involvement in public sphere. The external validation shows that this factor has weaker connections with variables measuring family context (like marital status or parenting), but it is well connected with indicators tapping political participation or employment.

Cómo se construye un partido político "nuevo": La emergencia del partido pro en el distrito federal de Argentina

Esta comunicación se propone analizar la génesis del partido Propuesta republicana (PRO), que gobierna la ciudad de Buenos Aires en Argentina desde 2007. Se trata de analizar, por un lado, los diferentes espacios sociales de reclutamiento del nuevo partido (partidos políticos, organizaciones de la sociedad civil, think tanks, mundo empresario), así como la manera en que sus principales cuadros dirigentes perciben su "entrada en política", en el caso de los nuevos ingresantes a la actividad, o su entrada a un "partido nuevo", en el caso de quienes tenían experiencia partidaria anterior. En definitiva, se trata de analizar los mecanismos sociales y morales de construcción de un "partido nuevo" y su presentación pública en términos de partido no ideológico en relación con las trayectorias y las visiones de los actores que lo componen

Emplaced en route: Multi-sensory perspectives on the city on the move

This paper explores the movement and positioning of bodies in urbanizing landscapes. In particular, it looks at the perspectives on the city that are born out of the sensory experiences of such movement and positioning. What urban, peri-urban or non-urban imaginaries are both derived from and attached to the environment in which these bodies are emplaced en route?

To answer this question, the paper draws on fieldwork in and around the neighborhood of Sierra Hermosa in Tecamac, State of Mexico, in the northern continuum of the metropolitan area of Mexico City. Bus rides and waiting time at informal bus stops, street vending activities and the daily walks to and from the school and to the market are carefully examined in relation to their inherent bodily, multi-sensory ways of perceiving and operating in socio-material peri-urban space.

A blessing or a curse? Migration and social policy in Central America

The relationship between transnational migration, remittances and social policy is of enormous relevance to understanding the functioning of contemporary societies. This is especially true in Central America, a region that leads many of the migration indicators, and furthermore very heterogeneous in its social policy and migration scenarios. Concerning the first, the region hosts countries with state led (e.g. Costa Rica), as well as informal-familialist (e.g. Nicaragua) welfare regimes. Concerning the second, it hosts net recipients (Panama and Costa Rica) as well as net expulsors of migrants (the rest). In all countries, labor migration has come to play a central role both in people's survival strategies as well as in economies' accumulation processes. Yet, we know surprisingly little about how migration and social policy interact in the region. In Latin America's welfare regime literature, migration does not have a prominent place. Much of the literature, for example, seems to assume remittances as a type of equivalent to development aid, destined for productive or de-commodification purposes. Yet, most studies on migration and remittances show they are used for daily expenditures. So, how does migration fit into Central America's welfare regime literature? And how do migration and remittances - transnational processes - interact with national social policy? This conceptual paper proposes to start answering these questions, first, by bringing together, revising and analyzing the available welfare regime and migration literature; second, by proposing a framework for analysis, and third, by making a careful first step in analyzing available data on migration, remittances and social policy for the region to test the framework.

Same same but different - Experience of discrimination, marginalization and exclusion

Experiences of discrimination, marginalization and exclusion differ not only between individuals regarding their multifaceted combinations of characteristics like gender, sexuality, visual nature, nationality, ethnicity, culture, social class, religion, East and West, level of societal development, settlement and so on. There can be also remarkable differences and distinctions in one and the same biography. "Where are you from?" does not matter and is or is not a source of discrimination, marginalization and exclusion experiences depending on characteristics of the context. Based on autobiographical-narrative interviews conducted with both female and male serial migrants from different nations, cultures, social backgrounds and political systems the role and impact of specific intersectional characteristic combinations as well as the effect of a variety of characteristic-context-situations can be demonstrated and analysed. What is the meaning of the different mentioned aspects and their specification for the experience of discrimination, marginalization and exclusion? Which role do the significant others, their accounts and attributions in otherness and othering play? How and which national, cultural, social or even institutional context makes individuals more or less visible and addressed as "the other" or perceived and associated with a certain frame of reference and stereotype. What are the impacts and effects? The group of transnational mobiles are notably qualified to explore biographical processing of experiences of discrimination, marginalization and exclusion meanwhile they offer new perspectives on intersectional research questions as well.

Can there be social justice and democracy without participation in economic self-management and political self-government?

The aim of this paper is to explore past, present and future relevance of participation, self-management and self-government theory and practice in the historical circumstances of global accumulation of capital systemic crisis in search for just and democratic alternatives to unjust, exploitative, oligarchic and ecologically destructive commodity market production with privatized means of production for private profit.

The main finding of the critical analyses of the past (ex-Yugoslavia) and present (Venezuela, Argentina...) economic self-management and political self-government attempts to overcome class division of labor between rulers and ruled at all levels of social life reproduction, identifies the main obstacle to realization of social justice and democracy in twofold activity of global financial oligarchy to perpetuate capitalist mode of production. The first activity concerns manipulation of formal participation of wage workers in corporations and citizens in parliamentary elections as an organizational technology for reduction of its management costs and domestication of the governed. The second activity concerns privatization and imperialist control of natural and social conditions of social life reproduction of the rest of humanity through violent recolonization process. The way for overcoming this obstacle to realization of social justice and democracy is found in self-managing and self-governing theoretical and practical activity of the rest of humanity based on drawing lessons from and avoidance of deficiencies of previous historical attempts to overcome class division of labor and capitalist mode of production.

Challenging multiculturalism: Interethnic violence in schools in Cyprus

This paper follows the work presented in an edited volume (Kassimeris and Vryonides, Routledge 2011) whereby aspects of multiculturalism have been addressed in a number of countries in Europe and North America. It will report on the preliminary findings of an empirical investigation of 600 students attending primary and secondary schools (12 and 17 year olds) on interethnic relations in Cypriot schools. The conditions of interethnic and interracial relations among children and youth across EU states are highly heterogeneous and require a multi-level approach. The situation in this field is changing rapidly and it is becoming even more complex due to EU enlargement, globalization processes, and diversification of migration flows. The paper is a product of an EU funded project which aims to address the implementation of children's rights and specific problems of the under-researched topic of interethnic and intercultural violence in the school environment. The general objective of the on-going project is to analyze the nature and extent of violence-related phenomena in the school environment in Cypriot schools that arise from xenophobic and racist sentiments and discriminatory practices. The concept of violence in the project is understood in the broadest possible sense as it refers to any kind of behaviour or treatment that poses a threat to human dignity. Any act of violence originating on the basis of ethnic sentiment that appears at the interpersonal or institutional level in the form of physical or psychological violence should be understood as violation of basic children rights. Although school children and youth are one of the most vulnerable social groups when discussing consequences of interethnic intolerance and conflicts, xenophobia, and racism, there are few studies that deal with this topic both in the Cypriot social context and elsewhere.

Social reproduction strategies and mass participation in higher education: The case of Cyprus

This paper discusses strategies for social reproduction in systems of mass participation in higher education. It makes the argument that in systems where participation is almost universal middle class families employ more refined strategies to secure advantages for their offspring. It focuses in the case of Cyprus, a country that in the past decade saw an unprecedented expansion of its higher education system. Even though, official statistics present a picture of relative openness in higher education, in the sense that it shows an increasing number of students (male and female) progressing to higher education, these figures do not shed light into the way young individuals and their families make their choices for their future and the social forms in which these are embedded. While more lower class students enter university, inequalities arise from the unequal horizons for choice making. Middle class students and their families engage in choice-making at higher education with broader options while lower classes have restricted horizons often stemming from mechanisms of self-selection and self-exclusion. These eventually produce stratification in the educational system due to factors that are not always educationally related. The paper will present the findings of a survey on parents and students and will look into their aspirations to enter higher education in specific fields of study. It will assess the extent to which the educational system operates as a "sorting machine" i.e. a mechanism of social selection something that is not widely recognized and appreciated as these processes do not always operate in an overt manner.

Legal culture and youth drug use: A multilevel model of the European Union

Though it has produced a high quality body of research, the study of substance use has remained highly individualized in its focus. This paper adds further sociological understanding to that research by examining substance use across the European Union, addressing whether the legal culture surrounding drug laws affects individual-level substance use net of characteristics of the individual and the region in which they reside. The paper builds on several theoretical and empirical traditions. At the national-level, institutionalism is used to justify the inclusion of measures of legal culture. At the regional-level, criminological theories that stress the importance of local context warrant an intermediate level between the individual and nation. Finally, the wealth of empirical research on individual-level causes of substance use guides which measures to include.

The analysis uses data from the original 15 countries of the European Union, including repeated Eurobarometer surveys asking young people about substance use, regional-level Eurostat data, and national-level European Monitoring Centre for Drug and Drug Addiction data. The latter measures of legal culture surrounding substance use include enforcement and prosecution, treatment availability, and decriminalization. The results of multilevel models that account for the variation at all three levels show that legal culture does indeed affect young people's substance use. For example, higher enforcement of low-level offenses results in higher last month marijuana use among young people, net of individual- and regional-level characteristics. In addition, higher levels of treatment within a country are associated with lower lifetime use of a drug other than marijuana. The models also indicate that local context matters, with net migration patterns, GDP growth, and population density affecting substance use. Both the findings concerning national policy and local factors remind us that a sociological account of legal culture and local contexts is crucial to understanding individual behavior.

Ethnic identity, European identity and European participation of youth in the eastern EU border region

European identity is neither a new phenomenon nor a new concept. Yet, after almost three decades of research, this area is characterized by a big variety of concepts and little empirical evidence. Existing studies in the area propose homogeneous concepts of societies and often disregard European identity among ethnic minorities and non-citizens. This presentation addresses the gap in the literature and analyses European identity among 12 minority groups living in Central and Eastern European countries, which already have become or might become EU members. The purpose of this study is twofold: to examine the choice of European identity and attitudes towards Europe in relation to other identities among respondents with an ethnic minority background and to uncover the relationship of these identities with political participation at the European Union level. The presentation addresses these two questions within the life-course perspective and examines differences in identity and participation levels between the younger and older cohorts of minority groups. Our results indicate a stronger level of European orientation among minority youth in comparison to adults. Moreover, the study shows that while minority youth manifests stronger level of European identity than adults, their levels of national and ethnic identity are significantly lower. While adults consider their national identity to be more salient than European identity, minority youth gives the two equal degree of importance. At the same time, for both youth and adults, the results illustrate a high salience of ethnic identity in constructing and managing their pro-European orientation as well as in increasing the likelihood of participation in the European Parliamentary elections. For our analysis we have used the unified ENRI-VIS data set as collected within the project ENRI-East (n=6800).

Elderly and value of children: Assessing the importance of children in old age security provisions in Nigeria

Elderly persons welfare has received increased attention in recent years and the importance of children in old security provisions is beginning to generate several public policy and academic concerns. This is addressed by examining children supports inform of financial support, housing, socio-emotional whether or not they live together. The study distinguished between children from monogamous family structure and those from polygynous family structure. In Africa, the care of older persons is falling on fewer children and those with least resources feel the impact. Hence childlessness in old age has been linked to isolation, ill health and poverty. Methods Both quantitative and qualitative were collected through individual-based questionnaire, focus group discussion and individual depth interviews. Multi-stage sampling procedure was employed to select local government areas, enumeration areas and individuals for the study. In all, 810 respondents were interviewed. There were also 12 Focus group discussion sessions & 10 in-depth interviews. Logistic regression model was used to determine the net effects of the explanatory factors on the welfare of the elderly. Findings The study found that while education, religion, and family size are significantly related to the perception of children as an important source of old age security in the male model, in the female model, only religion established similar relationship. The study also discovered that rural dwellers are more likely to see children as an important source of old age surety than their urban counterparts. Introduction The study concludes that the welfare of the elderly requires the strengthening of social security system, job provision for the working population, and development of community-based programmes.

Intergenerational households and well-being of the older persons' in Nigeria

Intergenerational household has been identified as an important determinant in the lives of older persons' in Nigeria. This study aims at explaining the patterns of intergenerational households and supports as well as its impact on older persons' wellbeing.

Multi-stage sampling procedure was used to select LGAs, EAs and individuals for the study. In all, 250 respondents were interviewed. Logistic regression model was used in the analysis.

The study found that some older persons actually live in intergenerational households. Education, income and religion are related to the formation of intergenerational households. Those with tertiary education are 1.2 times less likely to report improvement in wellbeing than those with primary education.

The study concludes that intergenerational household may be a panacea to dwindling wellbeing of older persons.

The Finnish and Swedish migration dynamics and transnational social spaces

This paper describes the dynamics of the migration flows between Finland and Sweden. These can be understood by the long-term development of a transnational social space. The paper argues that contemporary migration patterns are influenced by the post-war labour migration from Finland to Sweden. This created a Finnish diaspora, which today is involved in migration back and forth between the two countries, creating a regional transnational social space. The two countries provide a good case for studying the development of migration dynamics over time, since there has been a full freedom of movement for more than 50 years and migration is well documented in research and detailed official statistics in both countries. The paper is based on an analysis of these sources as well as interviews among Swedish citizens living in the Helsinki region of Finland. Although Finnish citizens have dominated the migration flows in both directions, the number of Swedish citizens involved in the transnational social space has steadily increased. This development can be described as a spill-over effect of the transnational social space and is related to a large rate of intermarriages between Swedish and Finnish citizens.

Tensiones entre movimientos sociales y gobiernos progresistas. Las disputas por el territorio y los recursos naturales del pueblo Guaraní en Tarija, Bolivia

A partir del conflicto acontecido en torno a la construcción de una carretera que atravesaría el Territorio Indígena y Parque Nacional Isiboro Sé-cure (TIPNIS) en la región subtropical de Bolivia se colocó en la agenda nacional e internacional la problemática de las tensiones existentes entre algunos movimientos sociales bolivianos –principalmente pueblos indígenas- y el gobierno del Movimiento al Socialismo (MAS). Este gobierno, encabezado por Evo Morales, es uno de los procesos paradigmáticos de los denominados "gobiernos progresistas" de América Latina. Sin embargo, estalló un conflicto en el seno de los movimientos sociales que apoyaban al gobierno del MAS. En este trabajo, además de realizar una reconstrucción del conflicto del TIPNIS nos detenemos a analizar los conflictos territoriales alrededor de las tierras habitadas ancestralmente por el pueblo guaraní donde se encuentran las reservas más importantes de gas y petróleo de Bolivia. De esta manera, tomando los procesos de negociación, diálogo y conflicto en torno a los territorios habitados por el Pueblo Guaraní en el departamento de Tarija daremos cuenta de estas tensiones entre los discursos y prácticas "neodesarrollistas" planteados por el gobierno del MAS y las lógicas productivas y culturales propias del Pueblo Guaraní en torno a los usos y sentidos alternativos que otorgan estas comunidades al territorio que habitan ancestralmente. En este sentido, analizar estas tensiones y desafíos planteados actualmente en Bolivia nos permitirán reflexionar acerca de uno de los ejes problemáticos que actualmente atraviesan a toda la región latinoamericana, es decir las tensiones entre movimientos sociales y "gobiernos progresistas" en torno al uso y sentidos que otorgan los distintos actores sociales a los territorios y recursos naturales.

Más desarrollo y menos dependencia? El actual proceso de transnacionalización de la burguesía Argentina

América Latina se insertó en la globalización mayormente a través de reformas de corte neoliberal que determinaron un cambio en el patrón de crecimiento de sus países. La industrialización por sustitución de importaciones dejó su lugar a economías abiertas tanto en términos comerciales como financieros. Si bien a distintos tiempos y niveles, estos cambios han implicado transformaciones en la composición de los bloques dominantes. Al respecto, hay dos procesos que se destacan y que, con distinta intensidad, se han dado en los grandes países de la región: por un lado, una creciente extranjerización de la economía y, particularmente, de las grandes empresas; por otro lado, una "internacionalización" de empresas locales.

La Argentina no ha sido la excepción a este proceso, aunque quizás se destaque sobre el resto por la intensidad y la rapidez del proceso de extranjerización vivido desde la década de 1990, más aún teniendo en cuenta que es uno de los países de la región que llegó a contar con una importante presencia de empresas nacionales. Como contracara de este proceso de extranjerización, unos pocos grupos económicos locales han consolidado estrategias de internacionalización con relativo éxito.

Los objetivos de este trabajo son, por un lado, dimensionar el alcance del mencionado proceso de extranjerización que sufrió la cúpula empresarial argentina en las últimas dos décadas y, por otra parte, analizar los casos de internacionalización "exitosa" por parte de algunos grupos económicos locales en función de ver sus principales características. La hipótesis que subyace a esta tarea es que la transnacionalización de las franjas superiores de la burguesía argentina renuevan y refuerzan los lazos de dependencia del país y que, a pesar de la exitosa inserción internacional de unos pocos grupos económicos locales, esta fracción del capital no parece poseer las características de una "burguesía nacional".

Democracy, social dualism, and the emergence of the bi-facial state

The paper examines the tension between liberal democracy and the dualizing societies in which the new democracies in Latin America and Central / Eastern Europe have been established. Most of these societies are divided into a civic pole, whose members are capable of autonomous articulation of interests and values, and therefore susceptible of independent organization; and a marginal pole, made up of the excluded or dependent segments of society. In this second sector, autonomous organization is harder to sustain. The paper makes two claims. First, that there is an elective affinity between this type of society and a bi-facial state, whose forms of articulation with society will vary: exchange of demands and supports for policies in relation to the civic pole, and exclusion, state corporatism and clientelism in relation to the marginal one. Second, this bi-facial state is the equilibrium regime of dualized societies. The mechanism that produces this outcome is the set of incentives and constraints that regulate the behavior of politicians, government officials and the major social groups in transitional societies. Finally, I discuss potential countervailing forces.

Argentina and Brazil: Insights and current postures against the nuclear nonproliferation regime

The following paper examines the current challenges and threats of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Regime in general and the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) in particular, and how this affects the perceptions and attitudes that Argentina and Brazil have on the Regime and the Treaty.

From the positions analysis of these two countries before the challenges of the Regime, it is visible the geopolitical vision that both countries have and seek to reach in the international context, as well as its actual nuclear policy guidelines. Thus, this study tries to understand whether the motives of both countries at the time of accession to the NPT in the nineties, are still valid in this new international context.

In summary, this study leads to the following conclusions: first, that the different geopolitical visions of Argentina and Brazil have influenced the different positions that both countries have maintained to certain recent events, produced in the international context in relation to the Regime, as for example, the Additional Protocol or the Nuclear Agreement between India and the U.S.; which shows that the support of both countries to the strengthening of the Non-Proliferation Regime was not equivalent. Second, the reasons and criticism that the two countries had at the time of accession to the NPT in the early nineties, remain valid in the present. Finally, the two countries seek greater autonomy, before the new restrictions in the nuclear field, and they are using as a strategy, the bilateral nuclear cooperation with each other, under the control of all regulations concerning non-proliferation. Thus, both Argentina and Brazil, even with some differences, agree on the importance of belonging to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Regime and consider that a partnership within the framework of these arrangements will be much more fruitful.

Effectively maintained inequality or sponsored mobility? The case of postgraduate education in the UK

Nearly all studies of higher education expansion and its effect on inequalities in access focus on initial entry to the academy. There is convincing evidence that despite absolute gains in participation by underrepresented groups, relative inequalities persist, particularly in terms of social class background. Various sociological theories aim to describe and explain this evidence. These suggest that inequalities are 'maximally maintained', meaning expansion at one educational level leads to inequalities 'passing up' to the next (vertical stratification). Furthermore, inequalities are 'effectively maintained', through differentiation within an educational level, such as across types of institution or fields of study (horizontal stratification). Additionally, different educational systems may be characterised as enabling 'contest' or 'sponsored' mobility.

Sociologists of education have, however, largely neglected the very highest level of education, namely postgraduate study (variously referred to as graduate school or second- and third-cycle study). Although in absolute terms postgraduate student numbers have not expanded as much as undergraduates, in proportional terms recent decades have witnessed exceptionally rapid growth and the playing out of an 'elite to mass' shift seen previously at earlier educational levels. As the bachelors degree becomes ubiquitous, the maximally maintained inequality hypothesis predicts increasing inequality in access to postgraduate education.

I will test these ideas on vertical and horizontal stratification using the British case of social class inequalities in access to postgraduate education. The UK is interesting for two reasons. First there is a strong emphasis on field-of-study specialisation at early transition points; and second, despite formal status equality between universities, there are widely-recognised informal hierarchies across institutions evident in student demographics among other things. British data suggest that access to postgraduate study is strongly conditioned by undergraduate field and institution of study. The broader implications of these patterns for social justice and for studies in other countries will be considered.

Feminism and the future of capitalism

The financial crisis is gendered not only in its causes and consequences but in the policy and political responses to it. The intensification of neo-liberalism is taking a gendered form in that the cuts in public expenditure fall disproportionately on the gains that feminism had achieved in many welfare state regimes. Gender budgeting analysis reveals the gendered nature of these policies. The developing political responses to the financial and economic crisis involve coalitions of gendered forces that vary between locations. The understanding of these processes requires rethinking the conceptualisation of capitalism so as to better include finance as well as the development of the conceptualisation of its intersection with gender regimes. The gendering of world-systems theory is necessary in order to theorise the financial crisis and its politics.

Participatory video, knowledge production and power in a South African shack settlement

Participatory video allows us to reflect, together, on the situation we are in and that surrounds us. Using participatory video can be a way to reflect on power, positioning and who controls knowledge, using our own position in the everyday world as a starting place. In this paper I explore issues around knowledge and power that emerged through video workshops with youth in a shack settlement in Durban, South Africa. I argue that participatory video must not be dislodged from either the local contexts in which the work takes place or from a critical position around the pitfalls of 'empowerment' within conscientization. Specific to the project I discuss in this paper, issues around violence for girls must not be underestimated, and approaches to this work should include responsive strategies for dealing with difficult, and sometimes traumatic, experiences that may emerge in the process. I argue that we must not neglect the ways in which issues like AIDS, rape, and gender-based violence become normalized in some contexts, and thoughtful, inclusive strategies to help participants work through what comes up must be included within project planning.

How can we use these tools while resisting the 'romance of community' and seeing beyond short-term impacts towards a view to a longer-term project of positive transformation? How do we deal with the power issues that are inherently present as researchers? What are the ultimate goals?

How is "political technocracy" possible? Economic expertise and politics in China and Latin America

Between technocrats and politicians, a hybrid group of elites, "technopols" or the "political technocrats," has emerged on the political landscape in Latin America, orchestrating its model of economic (neo)liberalization during the past three decades. In parallel, Chinese bureaucrats have also been busy turning themselves into economic experts, and increasingly betting the legitimacy of the ruling party on the successes won through the implementation of technocratic rationality. Though interestingly similar, these two trends have rarely been scrutinized in a comparative perspective with each other. Given the increased economic linkages between the two regions and their homologous positions in the worldwide backlash against neoliberal economics and politics, such an analysis would be especially intriguing.

This paper will address this issue and ask how political technocracy can be defined, how it is possible, and how it differs in the two contexts. It will undertake a sociological comparison of social positions, career trajectories and ideological convictions of Chinese and Latin American political technocrats in the fields of both politics and economics. Some of the differences between the two groups, I hypothesize, stem from different political configurations in authoritarian and (semi)democratic politics—essentially, what politics, both formal and informal, means in different party/state structures. In addition, different locations of the regions in the global diffusion of economic ideas, in particular in relation to United States' influence, likely also contributes to the variations. Case studies on the patterns of monetary policy making in contemporary China and Latin America will complement the general sociological mapping and illustrate the conceptualization.

Income and health in Latin America: Is there a gender gap?

The literature has shown that higher income is associated with lower levels of stress and better health. This can be explained through several factors, such as superior quality leisure time, non-monotonous jobs, as well as more power and control both in the labor market and at home. Nevertheless, very few papers have identified if there is a difference in this relationship between working men and women. Women have more work-related stress than men, since females possess less control and wages for the same types of jobs, higher probability to become unemployed, and fewer opportunities to ascend. In addition, working women have comparatively more responsibilities at home than men and obviously more stress. Therefore, one would hypothesize that higher income levels have a greater effect on women's health than on their counterparts. This paper provides evidence in favor of the latter, using data from 18 Latin American countries through the Gallup 2007 Survey.

Le travail en perspective: Identité et subjectivité

Le travail « moderne » va se construire dans un jeu de force entre dominants et dominés où se manifestent trois tendances : la rationalité économique; la recherche d'une intégration normative au mode de production capitaliste à travers l'instrumentalisation des travailleurs ; le surgissement d'une identité sociale ouvrière à travers l'action collective. A partir de la seconde moitié du 20^e siècle, émergent de nouveaux modes de production et de gestion entraînant des mutations significatives dans le monde du travail. Le travail et (ou) son absence sont objet d'insatisfaction, voire de souffrance. Le travail entre en crise.

Ces tendances ne manquent pas de se manifester également au Brésil. A partir des années 80, le contexte politique de démocratisation ne signifie pas pour autant la fin de « l'apartheid » social des travailleurs ni de la profonde fracture économique de la société brésilienne. Des formes de travail atypiques qui se veulent innovantes vont surgir et se donnent pour mission de trouver une nouvelle dignité au travailleur, base indispensable pour forger une nouvelle identité sociale qui lui permette de revendiquer plus de justice et de démocratie dans les relations de travail. La fin du 20^e siècle voit se développer de nombreuses formes de travail informel, notamment dans le cadre de l'économie solidaire.

La préoccupation, dans cet article^[1] est de savoir dans quelle mesure le travail, aujourd'hui, peut construire le travailleur comme sujet social et devenir l'expérience fondatrice d'identité sociale et d'action collective. Les deux concepts : identité sociale et expérience sociale, seront étudiés à partir des travaux de Claude Dubar et François Dubet.

[1] Deux recherches sont à la base de la réflexion développée dans cet article : l'une étudie l'action collective de camelots dans le sud du Brésil ; l'autre analyse les relations de travail dans l'économie solidaire, comparant des organisations françaises et brésiliennes.

Researching decent work in Gauteng, South Africa

In 2009 South Africa's President, Jacob Zuma announced that "the creation of decent work will be at the centre of our economic policies and will influence our investment attraction and job creation initiatives". This paper reports on research developing and applying a sector-based diagnostic tool and policy instrument to assist the government of the province of Gauteng progressively to realise the goal of decent work.

The term "decent work" is inherently vague: decency is a normative concept, which makes it difficult to measure and assess progress towards the goal of making all work decent work. The one comprehensive attempt by the International Labour Organisation (ILO) to measure decent work and present indices for over 100 countries was shelved when it was attacked by employers. Nonetheless, in September 2008, a tripartite meeting of experts on the measurement of decent work was held in Geneva and ten indicators or themes were agreed upon.

To meet the challenge trying to measure progress toward decent work in Gauteng, we decided to measure the experience of individuals in terms of these themes. We began by identifying three precarious sectors where the decent work deficit is expected to be high: private security guards, farm workers and the hospitality sector (restaurants and hotels). We then undertook parallel qualitative studies using in-depth interviews and focus groups among workers and – where possible – employers. This enabled us to examine variations in the different components of the "decent work deficit" across sectors. We found that, for example, in the case of private security guards the themes related to work benefits and to personal/safety concerns were most prevalent. On the basis of the priorities identified in this way we were able to make short-, medium- and long-term recommendations on how the goal of decent work could be progressively realized.

Professional specialization and traditional and new competences in judiciary courts of Buenos Aires conurbation

Work in justice administration in Argentina has involved a process of profound changes in social structures manifesting themselves more intensely since the last decade of the 20th century. This has impacted professional socialization in the judiciary courts and has involved a complex interchange of higher educational background, professional training and changes in working culture.

This paper analyses professional identities in justice administration in light of various changes, from the expansion of New Public Management concepts in justice administration to the growth of socio-economical marginality and poverty in the heavily populated areas of the Buenos Aires conurbation after the socio-economical crisis in 2001.

Through the analysis of the judiciary courts (as institutions), legal doctrines, legal cultures, and the organizational structure of justice administration, we investigate changes in law and transformations in social representations of judiciary workers and in the division of functions, occupations and tasks in courts of the Buenos Aires conurbation.

We observe how the needs of a population living in a social context characterized by poverty, marginality and precariousness (of work and life), together with an increase in professional specialization and requirements of both traditional and new competences related to economic and technological changes, influence identities, culture and forms of conscience of judicial workers in the judiciary courts of Buenos Aires conurbation.

Considering the context of social crisis, we observe the abilities of judiciary agents to respond to the difficulties of work in courts of the Buenos Aires conurbation with a population characterized by social exclusion and poverty. Since only a superficial view of daily routine of work in the judiciary organisms would consider this as a marginal or irrelevant problem.

Welfare regime trajectories: Latin America in perspective

Within the context of the emergent polycentric world-order, the reorganization of global capitalism and global markets has led to far-reaching transformations of welfare regimes, not only in the Global North but also the Global South. On a global scale, however, challenges and outcomes of welfare regime transformations differ considerably according to specific historical trajectories, path dependencies and critical junctures. Despite vast differences between the individual welfare regimes in the region, Latin American welfare regimes share some characteristics which differentiate them from East Asian models (relatively early foundation, narrow and biased tax base, concentration of benefits and rights on a small group of original stake-holders, insufficient redistributive capacity of the state among others). In contrast to much of the research which is concentrated on adaptations of Esping-Andersen's seminal work, the proposed paper borrows from historical institutionalism in order to explain foundational moments and critical junctures of Latin American welfare trajectories. We will show how international (timing and form of integration into the global markets) and national factors (extreme rates of inequality not only of income but also of access to central goods such as health, education and land, tension between high rates of social inequality and rather advanced democratic rights and institutions, incapacity of the state to tax the rich) shaped regional welfare regimes and their transformation/or reproduction through the decades, leaving a legacy of truncated welfare regimes based on small coalitions of stake-holders which make current reform processes towards more universal models of provision a difficult enterprise.

South Africa's system of social cash transfers: Towards collective social responsibility?

South Africa has one of the most sophisticated systems of social cash transfers (SCT) in the global South. There are seven different types of so-called social grants. They are provided with a comprehensive budget and based on a Constitutional right. Population coverage is high. This makes the case attractive for a comparative analysis and typology of social cash transfer schemes in developing countries. How might South Africa be analysed and classified?

I start from two assumptions:

1. In particular in view of the issue of universalism, it is necessary to look not only at single transfer schemes but at the overall arrangement of SCT in a country.

2. The issue of universalism is part of the wider concept of "social" policy and particularly of "collective social responsibility" by Franz-Xaver Kaufmann. This concept is based on the assumption that social policies are rooted in normative and cultural patterns prevailing in a given country.

Against this background I will inquire into the following question:

To what degree are the SCT found in South Africa institutionalized in terms of collective social responsibility, i.e.

1. in terms of constituting a collective social commitment? (Constitution, universal right and enforcement, benefit level, acceptance in society, government support)

2. in terms of implementing the (supposed) social commitment? (organizational set-up, administrative capacity)

The results suggest that the South African SCT scheme generally shows a high degree of institutionalization in both dimensions – with one crucial exception: the exclusion of all able-bodied citizens at age 18-59. This coverage gap heavily contradicts the hypothesis of a high collective social responsibility.

I am finally going to discuss the results and the contradictions, explicitly referring to the Latin American context. For this purpose I will address the issues of universalism, conditionality, rights as well as the political context and the historical legacy.

Loving carer or skilled worker: The social, political and economics construction of migrant care workers

Demographic developments have caused challenges to national arrangements for elderly care. In many countries one answer to these demands has been the employment of migrants in the field of care. The position of (mainly female) migrant workers employed in European care systems is defined and shaped by the intersection and interrelation of national social policy and migration regimes embedded in specific economic, political and cultural contexts. Care and migration regimes will be analysed in their conceptualisation of and consequences for migrant women working in the elderly care sector.

This paper adopts an explicitly intersectional approach to analyse the construction of the position of migrant care workers in three different European welfare states (Austria, Netherlands, UK). The situation can only be grasped by analysing the political, economic, social and cultural framework in which the employment is taking place. Critical Discourse Analysis in combination with Critical Frame Analysis will be utilised to identify the use of social categories and identities and in particular the interrelations of the various categorisations. For an analysis of political conceptualisations of social actors and social positions Nancy Fraser's work will be utilised. This approach draws on an essential incorporation of perspectives on the consequences of any social and political process, with regards to redistribution, recognition and political participation. The strength and the importance of Fraser's position lie in the recognition that both the economic situation and the status order in society determine people's life circumstances. Migrant care workers are confronted with demands, stereotypes and definitions which are based on an intersection of their status, gender, ethnicity, national background and work position. The paper tries to identify the consequences of policy constructions for the particular experiences in the relation to the work situation and citizenship status in social, cultural and economic terms.

The intersection of social and migration policies: The situation of migrant care workers

Care and migration are two of the most important issues of contemporary European welfare states. Demographic developments and changing family structures have fostered the employment of (mainly female) migrant workers in national care arrangements. The increasing demand for care workers and differences between the salaries in the destination countries and in the countries of origin are main motives for the increase in migration (Kofman et al. 2000; Sassen 2003). In some countries, they are mainly used as cheap labour in undeclared work or precarious forms of formal employment in private households, even if many of these women have a professional or academic background (Lutz 2008a; Pfau-Effinger 2009; Flaquer & Escobedo 2009). In other countries, migrant care workers might be included in the formal employment systems on equal terms with the native care workers. Thus, migration regimes and care arrangements are intertwined (Lutz 2008; Williams & Gavanas 2008).

This paper attempts an interdisciplinary and multi-national analysis of the intersection of care regimes and migration regimes in three European countries (Austria, the Netherlands, UK). Since it is assumed that the position of migrant workers employed in European care systems is defined and shaped by the intersection and interrelation of national social policy and migration regimes the challenge is to theoretically, methodologically and empirically grasp the (social) policies of both care and migration on the one hand and the moral, social, economic, political and cultural contexts on the other hand. To enable an operationalisation of the research project two conceptual frameworks will be utilised in order to capture the specifics of national regimes influencing the societal positioning of migrant workers: care regimes and migration regimes. The paper tries to provide a conceptualisation of the operationalisation of these concepts and its intersection in relation to migrant care workers.

Material standard of living and relative poverty of the elderly in Germany in comparison

The analysis refers to the current state and changes in the standard of living of the elderly (here defined as those 65 and older) with a particular focus on poverty in Germany. This analysis addresses the current public debate on the material situation of the elderly within the broader context of the sustainability of the pension system as well as issues of intergenerational justice. While some consider the situation of the elderly as privileged – particularly compared to previous generations – others warn against the upcoming of a new poverty among the elderly.

The analysis of living standards of the elderly focuses on income, but also includes expenditures and wealth. Relative income positions, indicators of overall inequality and polarisation are also in the scope of the presentation. A particular focus will be put on poverty in terms of income as well as expenditures. Our analysis systematically compares the situation of the elderly with two younger other age groups (20-54 and 55-64 years) as well as the general population. For the issue of poverty the situation in Germany will be compared with other European countries too. This study is based on German and European official micro data sets as well as the German Socio-Economic Panel Study.

Universalism and anti-poverty-policy: A question of power and dominance?

The concept of basic universalism claims to break with traditional exclusionary modes of Latin American social policy that reserve social benefits to employees in the formal economy (truncated welfare-regime). Debates in social sciences about these new policies predominantly focus on efficiency and, considering anti-poverty-policies, on Conditional Cash Transfer-Programmes (CCTs). However, they disregard primary income distribution through labour markets and their regulation. Departing from this lack of research, we focus on political regulation of labour markets in Uruguay and Brazil, which we discuss in the context of anti-poverty-policies.

Formal employment was extended under both governments of the Fr-ente Amplio in Uruguay and Lula in Brazil. Implementation of CCT-Programmes in Uruguay was accompanied by a reintroduction of Consejos de Salarios and a general increase of their coverage. Brazil saw an increase of minimum wages as well as the introduction of social and labour policies which extended the formalisation of labour relations. Nevertheless, both governments could not realise central reform proposals. Taking this failure as a point of departure, we want to detect barriers and veto points in reform processes which prevent and oppose changes towards universalism.

Our contribution differs from the majority of current studies in taking those social power relations into consideration that continue to facilitate the containment of disadvantaged societal groups' interests in Latin America. It is those power relations which stabilise an unequal status quo and which impede the realisation of universalism in social policies.

Following a "relational analysis of society" based on German sociologists Claus Offe, we therefore propose to understand recent reform programmes as focal points of power and dominance relations. Thus, we will consider whether current reform processes express universalising tendencies in regard to political and social rights or whether they must be interpreted as mere charity whose purpose is to legitimise existing power relations.

Academic experiences and plans for the future of young black women of low income families at the University of Brasilia, Brazil

This article presents the experiences of black female students admitted by the University of Brasilia through the quota system (affirmative action program). They attend courses in Engineering and Human Sciences and experienced different school socialization processes. Through group discussions and narrative interviews we had access to their experiences related to the difficulties of applying for highly disputed courses. But the admission exam was not the only difficulty. As students in courses were the majority of the colleagues came from higher income families, they have additional problems, because the grants offered to students of popular origin do not allow socialization and interaction with their peers outside the classroom. The university in general, is unprepared to receive young students of low income families. The establishment of the quota system is not sufficient to overcome social exclusion and reflects the necessity of an adjustment of the university system to the political and social requirements of the Brazilian society and its population.

Learning health policy lessons from other countries' experiences

Learning policy lessons from the experience of other countries requires knowledge about contextual factors. An analytical framework that measures the relevant institutional factors of the political environment on the basis of a standardized set of indicators is one way to satisfy this criterion. At the same time, however, these studies often do not include the results of health policy implementation. Many comparisons of healthcare systems have a similar bias. They focus on the institutional structure and do not concentrate on outcomes such as health status and health inequalities. If we want to learn more about improved practice in healthcare systems, studies need to include outcome measures. And if we want to learn about successful health policy implementation, we need both to define and measure health policy results. In our contribution we present frameworks for international health policy comparison that capture actors, institutions, and programmatic results.

Integration of online-based brand communities into value creating processes of firms

The emergence and growth of brand-based leisure communities represent a significant sociocultural phenomenon, especially in the automotive sector. A multitude of automotive clubs, associations, internet forums, internet-based community platforms, etc. can be observed. Due to innovative Web 2.0 social media and networking technologies, which have provided new opportunities for the interaction and integration of car consumers and automotive enthusiasts, online automobile leisure communities have experienced an enormous increase in quantity (and size) in recent years.

These so called Brand Communities (BCs) play a vital and essential role in the construction of brands and brand cultures. Hence, they are taking part in value creation processes of firms – they are co-creators of brand value. This results in great chances for companies on the one hand, but also implicates risks that have to be taken seriously on the other hand. Companies have to accept the role of BCs in value creation processes and learn to integrate these communities more actively into these processes in order to create competitive advantages and increase performance. It can be assumed that this is a great challenge for companies, especially because the landscape of the BC online-scene in the automotive area is supposed to be a very heterogeneous field and different (types of) BCs need to be treated differently.

This paper aims to take the heterogeneity of the field, the positive and negative consequences of BCs for companies, and the differences that arise of this collective phenomenon (in comparison to individual consumers) into account and tends to develop a typology of online-based BCs in the automotive sector. This typology will be based on theoretical concepts (Community and Brand Community Research, Service-Dominant Logic, Relationship Marketing) and empirical research (the data was collected through a quantitative online-survey and netnography of 50 (German speaking) BCs in the automotive sector).

Practices and emotions in online-dating - Alienated relationships?

Affects and emotions are a crucial component of love relationships. However, it is frequently argued, that relationships which derive from online-dating don't have the ability to evoke intense and romantic sentiments between the participants, which leads to the argument, that the internet contributes a lot to social experiences of alienation. Recent empirical studies are questioning this with good reason (Ben Ze'Ev 2004; Döring 2009). Therefore the aim here is to elaborate the ambivalences of online-dating, and to confront with the findings of the research on emotions and affects. Besides theoretical considerations, empirical material is provided through secondary data analysis as well as own observations of the cyberspace. Three assumptions will be presented:

1. The concept of alienation: Alienation is characterized by a peculiar ambivalence, as objects or structures may appear simultaneously as our own or as alienated. Hence, alienation typifies not a relation based on direct power, but one based on indifference (structural- or practical constraints). Alienation doesn't imply the absence of a reference to the world, but has a rather deficit relation to it (Jaeggi 2005).
2. Authenticity and deception: Online-dating and online- or offline relationships deriving from it don't lead automatically to alienation. However, the vulnerability of such virtual relations to deception and fraud is comparatively greater than in conventional offline-relationships. Nonetheless, research has observed the approximation of online- to offline relationships, which opens up an empirical field for the research of experiences of alienation.
3. Love relationships as experiences of affective resonance: Rather than eliminating them, the internet extends the possibilities for experiences of affective resonance. How emotions and affective moments are used and to what extent they play a decisive role, can be shown based on a close-reading of passages from chats and interviews.

The analytics of economic ethnographies

This paper outlines a new analytical strategy for ethnographies of economic life. This paper emphasizes timing and temporal order as well as dramaturgical scripts and real-time enactments of economic understandings. The paper reformulates Viviana Zelizer's concept of circuits in order to generate a framework that is most appropriate for ethnographic investigations. The reformulated concept of performance circuits takes seriously the dress, affect, and demeanor of buyers, sellers, suppliers, and distributors. Depending on how the economic situation is defined, there are sets of scripts that actors perform to accomplish the meanings of economic transactions. Zelizer defines circuits as 1) involving individuals with distinct social relationships with one another; 2) as sites where individuals participate in common economic activities through their social ties; 3) as accounting systems shared by members of the circuit to evaluate and categorize the transactions within the circuit; 4) as sites where similar moral evaluations of the transactions are generated; and 5) as sites where symbolic boundaries are erected through the dynamics of give-and-take among the different transactors. The concept of the performance circuit extends and reformulates Zelizer's original concept in order to capture three key elements: 1) Collective representations and local evaluative "frames" that help actors define the situations they are in and the appropriate behaviors for those types of situations; 2) the temporally ordered actions and protocols that the actors themselves often take-for-granted for specifically defined situations; and 3) the dynamic unfolding of situations as well as the props, costumes, and exchange media (such as money, chips, chits, bonus points, amulets, cloth, shells, nails, clothing, food, etc) that enable performers to accomplish their economic tasks. The paper presents three concrete examples of how the concept of performance circuits improves the analytical power of ethnographies that examine economic life.

Muslim women and girls: Searching for democracy and self-expression

The stories that we aim to tell are significant because historically, the voices of Muslim women have been marginalized in U.S. society. In California, particularly following the events of 9/11, we've seen an increase in stigma, discrimination, as well as a lack of understanding of Muslim women's experiences (Hopkins, 2007). Scholars have noted the increasing construction of hate, fear, and misunderstanding, as well as increasing incidences of "Islamophobia" through the construction of Muslims as "the other". Others have focused on Muslim women's negotiations of religious freedom and self-expression, concluding that they are either 'betwixt and between' or the synthesizers of two distinct cultures (Knott & Khokher, 1993). While many studies have focused on Muslim women's experiences, there has yet to be a study that incorporates art and visual storytelling to illustrate the experiences of Muslim women in California.

This visual media project aims to capture the stories of Muslim women and girls, and the ways in which they exercise religious freedom as a form of democracy and self-expression. The participants include women and girls of different ethnicities and racial backgrounds, between the ages of 18-65, who live in the San Fernando Valley, and who self-identify as Muslim. The purpose of this project is two-fold. The first involves giving Muslim women cameras to photo-document their lives, in order to understand how women express themselves as a form of democracy. After each woman takes her photographs, she will be invited to participate in an individual interview that will be videotaped, in which she will describe her photographs and the meanings behind her images. The second part of this project involves the creation of a short documentary film, based on the themes of the photographs, which will feature the women's voices, images and experiences.

The future, democratic practice, and learning for global citizenship

In the twenty-first century, ecological, financial and social events increasingly draw attention to interconnectedness of human activity and all life on earth. Amidst heightened concerns about the future, social justice and sustainability, the idea of the global citizen is gaining currency, with the catch-cry: 'think global act local'.

Recognising that no-one has been here before, and that none know with certainty how to make the shared futures work, within these emerging discourses all people might be positioned as learners. Evidence of shared confusion challenges long-held ideas like young people simply being citizens-in-the-making, ready to slot in to a ready functioning society. It also goes to the heart of long-running debates about the nature of education: about whether knowledge is transmitted in ready made testable packages, or co-created and life-long.

This paper is based within a 7 year partnership with Plan International Australia and a 3 year research project funded by the Australian Research Council. The project investigated young people and global citizenship, and models of learning for global citizenship. We positioned young people and all who worked with them (NGO, Uni students, schools, teachers, researchers) as learners. Young people engaged across national, religious, and language boundaries to discuss and act on issues which concerned them.

This work involved a series formalized partnerships to intentionally create spaces for youth-led learning, at times disrupting familiar patterns of student-teacher, school-NGO, researcher-researched. Borrowing a phrase from phenomenologist, Schultz, in this type of work we ask people to sustain 'thinking outside of normal'. This invitation became deeply challenging to all who engaged.

This is also about deeply held power relations. New ways of relating require new kinds of practical and conceptual work to support them, and there is promise in the work of specific sociological theorists. This paper will highlight these findings.

La manifestación de la media en el cuerpo de los niños

La investigación aborda la relación entre el juego y la programación infantil de televisión, centrándose en el aspecto corporal de los niños. Buscamos entender los procesos del significado del cuerpo que los niños sufren en tiempos de la enseñanza en la escuela. En este sentido, hay como objetivo identificar como los mensajes mediáticos son apropiados por los niños en sus manifestaciones corporales.

Por un lado, se entiende que cuando los niños entran en el mundo depende de lo que la sociedad espera de sus futuros miembros. La infancia no es sólo una etapa de la maduración biológica y desarrollo humano intermedio, sino también una categoría social importante. Desde esta perspectiva, sabemos que los medios de comunicación constituyen una parte importante de la educación cultural de los niños en la actualidad, siendo un importante tema de investigación.

La principal técnica de investigación utilizada fue la observación de la enseñanza diaria de dos instituciones de la primera infancia, que se encuentra en la región central de Brasilia, Brasil. Se observaron, aproximadamente, treinta niños, entre 5 y 6 años de edad. El periodo de observación tardó dos meses, siendo el trabajo de campo dos veces por la semana para cada institución. Además, pedimos a los niños para dibujar sus juegos e incluso el programa de televisión de su preferencia, así que pusieron las opiniones de los propios participantes del estudio.

Como resultado fue percibido que el lúdico de los niños es influenciado por contenidos y valores transmitidos por los medios de comunicación. Sin embargo, los juegos son vistos como simbólicos, a través del cual los niños experimentan y dan otros significados. Por el contrario, se encontró que las instituciones educativas no presentan un proyecto educativo sobre los medios de comunicación, demostrando, por lo tanto, la necesidad de capacitar los docentes para eso trabajo.

When drug journeys and life journeys collide: Biographies of risk and pleasure

Recreational drug taking provides an interesting case study for understanding the meaning of risk and how it is assessed in contemporary times. This paper presents data on drug taking and the decision making which underpins it, collected over a fifteen year period from adolescence into early adulthood, as part of the North West England Longitudinal Study (NWELS). From this study, the author has created a longitudinal qualitative dataset which has produced rich biographical data. An aim of the paper is to counteract the decontextualised accounts offered by sociological approaches (see Beck, 1992; Giddens, 1991) to understanding how risk is assessed in relation to everyday life using biographical data. In doing so, a cultural perspective, drawing on the work of Douglas (1992), is advocated which facilitates a more nuanced understanding of the ways in which everyday social and cultural relationships determine responses to risk. Furthermore, a life course criminology perspective (see Laub and Sampson, 2003) is applied which highlights how events, for example, gaining employment or becoming a parent, experienced on the journey to adulthood can lead to changes in behaviour. It will be argued that social and cultural relationships and life course events form the context against which risk is assessed. Through the presentation of individual case studies, the ways in which life journeys intersect with drug journeys and influence the decision making process will be revealed.

"Neoliberal diffusion of the social economy: The case for the solidarity economy"

In this paper, I explore the social and solidarity economies. The social economy has become the buzzword of the political and economic elite in response to the growing crisis of capitalism, the crisis of the state and in an effort to demonstrate their commitment to local development. But what is meant by social economy? What are its characteristics? Who are its proponents? Why at this point in history has it become so popular among governments, businesses, and development practitioners? I explore these questions, by comparing the social economy to the "solidarity economy." I argue that the social economy is ultimately about amelioration of the negative social externalities of a market economy in which the state has retreated from much of its social welfare role. I contrast this ameliorative approach to the transformative vision of the solidarity economy, which seeks to change the relations of power and wealth in the market economy/society. In short, the social economy is about social inclusion, while the solidarity economy is about social transformation. I begin by situating this discussion within a broader discussion of neoliberalism and the (dis)embeddedness of the economy.

Rural pension reform in China: Lessons from within and beyond Latin America

Over the last two years, China has made great progress in pushing forward its rural pension program that is projected to cover 60% of rural areas by the end of 2011. Currently, China's rural pension system has two components: the "basic pension" component financed by general revenue from central and local government and a voluntary funded individual account plan for rural participants. However, this new program faces challenges with respect to both the extension of pension coverage and the reduction of old age poverty. Our analysis looks at various social pension schemes within and beyond Latin America. Evidence from Brazil, Chile, Bolivia, South Africa, Namibia and Nepal is considered as part of our effort to draw lessons from pension models in other countries that may help improve the success of pension reforms efforts in China. The authors argue that China can afford to introduce a universal non-contributory social pension scheme. Relative to the model currently being introduced, our proposed alternative would be much easier implemented and would do more to reduce poverty in rural areas. To supplement the social pension benefits, a voluntary notional account plan in many ways similar to Sweden's NDC model is proposed to replace the current funded account component of China's current rural pension scheme.

Accommodation or inhabitation? New migrants, housing and the right to the city in Sydney, Australia

This paper explores the applicability of the concept of the Right to the City and forms of urban citizenship in relation to new migrants' housing pathways in Sydney, Australia. In particular, it focuses on the extent to which new migrants' sense of belonging - as a sense of entitlement to claim participation in urban space - is shaped through access to housing, and also how this is mediated in relation to local housing advocates and authorities. This is particularly relevant in Sydney where the neoliberal urban policy and a lack of stable and affordable housing is rapidly exacerbating socio-spatial inequalities and injustices in the city (Stilwell, 1998). Drawing on the framing of the Right to the City as a practice of inhabiting (Isin, 2000; Purcell, 2000), the paper is based on qualitative research with new migrants in Western Sydney, and explores their everyday practices of inhabitation in relation to housing and their neighbourhood environment, and how this shapes, and is shaped by processes of social transformation across multiple socio-spatial levels. This analysis is situated within the broader context of formal citizenship rights, multiculturalism and national identity in Australia, in which property ownership and the 'Australian suburban dream' are key tropes informing the notion of the 'good citizen'. While acknowledging the argument around the appropriation and 'watering down' of Lefebvre's original concept of Right to the City, the paper argues that the concept may be useful for exploring the possibilities inherent in the informal, everyday and banal practices of migrant engagement in urban space and housing as examples of urban citizenship claims, and how this may produce important spaces for social transformation.

Operationalising the study of social transformation and international migration in the 21st century

While policy-makers and scholars concerned with international migration often see it as abnormal and inherently problematic, this paper starts with the assumption that human mobility is a normal part of social life. At times of rapid change, such as the current epoch of neoliberal globalisation, international migration tends to grow in volume and to become an increasingly important factor reshaping societies. In this context, migration is not just the result of change, nor the cause of change, but constitutes an integral part of social transformation processes.

This paper argues for the need to develop an appropriate empirical approach to the study of these processes. It discusses this in relation to the 'Social Transformation and International Migration in the 21st Century' project, which draws on quantitative and qualitative research conducted in four countries that have experienced significant transformation and migration since the beginning of the phase of neoliberal globalisation around the mid-1970s: namely South Korea, Mexico, Turkey and Australia.

This paper focuses on how key methodological and epistemological issues regarding the study of social transformation and migration can be addressed in practice. This paper argues that only an interdisciplinary approach that deploys mixed methods could analyse the extent to which global factors have varying effects in different places at different scales, mediated through local and national historical experiences and patterns. Ultimately, this paper seeks to answer the questions of how to operationalise our two key concepts - social transformation and international migration - and how to establish theoretical and empirical links between them. For this, it suggests an empirical framework which identifies the key analytical dimensions, units of analysis, and a set of possible strategic indicators.

Exploring family norms and the construction of young people's identities through multi-sensory research

This paper draws on current research which focuses on sensory experience in how young people maintain and (re)create identities and a sense of belonging (or not) in 'home-like' environments, when not living with their biological parents. This research builds on previous work on young people's family life in the context of parental substance misuse (PSM) that pointed to the ways in which sensory experience, particularly in deprived circumstances, contributes to a sense of ambivalence or not belonging in the home. Notably, respondents' accounts of PSM often explicitly or implicitly contrasted what they saw, heard, smelt and felt at particular times with their understandings of a proper 'home' and family environment. Their experience and associated sense of self were contrasted with what might be termed a normative sensory-scape drawn from cultural notions of the 'home' as a secure, private retreat (Mallett 2004), notions which are strongly associated with normative ideologies of family practices and rituals. These contrasts were difficult to negotiate, affecting young people's self-identification at a time when fewer other sources of identification may be available. However, the importance of sensory experience in young people's accounts of PSM was missed in an initial data analysis informed by funders' concerns. Learning from this experience, from secondary analysis of Qualidata archives, and from work suggesting the importance of sensory experience to creating and sustaining ontological security and self-identity (DeNora 2000; Mason and Davies 2010), the current research, employs visual and aural methods to place the sensory construction of domestic spaces, and of relationships in those spaces, centre stage. Drawing on an analysis of the sensory data produced (including photographs and audioscapes) this paper discusses participants' strategies to (re)create environments in which they can feel 'at home' across multiple spaces, and the fragility of the resources available to them to do so.

Democratisation through school choice? Rhetoric and reality in the Australian 'education revolution'

The Australian government, under the guise of a self-proclaimed 'education revolution', has taken steps to encourage schools to compete with each other for students, and families to pick and choose between schools. This has been framed as a democratising move in two ways: firstly by providing a new 'right' to choose between schools, and secondly by forcing up the quality of schooling system-wide through scrutiny and elimination of underperforming schools. However there is, to date, little evidence as to whether families are taking up this democratic right to choose, and if they are not, what is preventing them. This paper places under empirical pressure the claim that market-based educational provision eliminates boundaries to access. A survey of families with a child undergoing the transition from primary to secondary school (n=666), and interviews with parents and school transition co-ordinators, provide the basis for identifying boundaries structuring access to secondary education in Australia. The research investigated school selection strategies, the ways in which families made decisions, and the constraints under which families made these decisions. The findings show that school choice is a reality for a minority of families, with more than half contemplating only a single secondary school. For many, geography provided another important boundary, while price added further restrictions. The process of school choice provides an important opportunity for the construction and reproduction of class identities and boundaries, represented symbolically in a hierarchy of schools and school sectors. We conclude that policies emphasising the importance of school choice as a form of parental involvement give disproportionate weight to the symbolic boundaries of between-school and between-sector differences. The weight of these symbolic boundaries is subject to cross-cultural variation, and families with different cultural and migration histories read these signals in contrasting ways.

Norwegian police students' perception of what police work is and their comprehension of what characterizes good police work

The proposed paper examines the extent to which, and in what ways, police students' social background influences their perception of what police work is and their comprehension of what characterizes good police work. The analysis will be based on in-depth interviews with students. A number of studies of police occupational culture in modern, capitalist-democratic societies describe police culture as having a primary focus on "real police work", where traditional Machismo, predilection for action and use of physical force dominate both the "canteen culture" and actual operative interventions on the streets. In this culture, clear bulkheads are drawn between "them" and "us" - in short, police culture is a culture where prejudices grow (and thrive) and where stereotypes are reinforced and cemented. To some extent, this culture has been explained on the basis of who policemen actually are, and several studies have made the point that there is a correlation between this culture's "core characteristics" and the persons who are recruited for this particular profession: white working-class men, who have spent only a few months in police training. In this perspective, Norway may represent a contrasting case:

Norwegian police education provides the academic degree of bachelor, and police students are recruited primarily among young people with a middle-class background. The vast majority of police students have parents with higher education degrees, grade requirements for admission to the programs are relatively high and about 40 percent of the students are women. Possible consequences of this composition of the student population will be examined.

A Canadian anomaly? The social construction of multicultural national identity

Whereas, in recent years, many Western immigrant-receiving societies experienced a "retreat" from multiculturalism (arguably less in practice than in dominant discourses), in Canada, support for multiculturalism merely "dipped" in the early 1990s and reached unprecedented heights in the subsequent years. As a normative principle and popular representation of national identity, multiculturalism became dominant not only among academics but also in government discourses and the Canadian media. Indeed, as Rainer Bauböck has put it: 'No other Western country has gone as far as Canada in adopting multiculturalism not only as a policy towards minorities but also as a basic feature of shared identity' (2005: 93). How can we explain this comparative strength of Canadian multiculturalism? And has it been sustained in the new century?

This paper unpacks the dominant discourse of multiculturalism in the 1990s: What does "multiculturalism" mean? Who is included in the multicultural Canadian "we", who is excluded? By doing so, the paper dissects this discourse's constitutive segments. The empirical analysis identifies three types of discourses -- English-Canadian nationalism, pluralist multi-national federalism, and liberal immigrant multiculturalism -- that respond to, reinforce and contradict each other mutually. Within this polyphony of voices, a vaguely defined multicultural pan-Canadian identity gains political influence as the by-product of a shared opposition to Quebec's allegedly "ethnically nationalist" separatism. While the multicultural transformation of pan-Cannadian "national" identity was indeed dominant until the early years of the new century, it is best viewed as a fragile compromise between otherwise highly conflicting views of what it means to be Canadian. In the past couple of years, however, as the balance of powers has shifted, the pro-multiculturalism coalition is weakened, and it looks as if Canada is joining -- albeit as a latecomer -- the widespread trend of countries that are re-nationalizing their approach to immigrant inclusion.

'Not too many ladies, but too few men': On the gendered co-construction of social science and its publics

Questions about the different roles of the public have been much debated within sociology of science in general and within the subfield of public understanding/communication of science in particular. However, not very much attention has been paid to the gendered aspects in these discussions, and most often the public has been represented as the passive and consuming part in the complex relationship between science and its publics. This paper argues for a contextually broadened and more circular perspective (Jasanoff 2006), which emphasizes the active role of the public (Bucchi 2008) and the gendered cultures of science (Schiebinger 2001) in the practical making of social scientific knowledge (Carnic, Gross & Lamont 2011). Empirically, the paper is focused on the early formation of academic social science in Sweden. More specifically it is centred around a specific historical event in 1888, when the Russian Professor Maxime Kovalevsky visited Stockholm to give the very first series of public social science lectures at the then recently established Stockholm University College. According to a traditional "linear model"-understanding, Kovalevsky's public lectures may be seen as a successful event. In its own time, however, the lectures were described as a failure since they attracted and were peopled by the "wrong" audience or, as one of the contemporary critical voices explained, "not of course by too many ladies, but by too few men". In order to understand, first, why the lectures attracted more women than men and, secondly, why this was conceptualised as a problem at all, it is necessary to take both the role of the public and its gendered aspects more seriously, and to sociologically problematize the dominant historical narratives on the rise of academic social science as a predominantly male phenomenon.

Rights to the city: A pluralist analysis of housing controversies in Mumbai and Hong Kong

This paper starts with a discussion of the work of various authors on the 'right to the city'. We argue that this work is highly relevant for the contemporary discussion of social justice in cities under globalization, but at the same time we observe an implicit tendency to frame the 'right to the city' in non-pluralist terms. However, many different groups assert their rights in cities and while the political economy of cities structures their possibilities, at the same time the specific outcomes of urban controversies is determined within local settings. Therefore, we stress the need for empirical research into urban controversies from a pluralist perspective: whose right is ascertained in which situation?

We apply this framework to three housing controversies in two Asian cities: Mumbai and Hong Kong. Specifically, we will discuss the Tardeo Towers project in Mumbai, as well as the Lee Tung Street redevelopment and Midlevels redevelopment in Hong Kong. We will show that in each of these controversies different groups are involved, that each of these groups feels that their right to the city is at stake, and that diverse coalitions of elites and underprivileged groups can both win and lose. Adequate policy responses have to be based on adequate knowledge of such local circumstances.

Gender consciousness in the classroom generates social justice and democracy outside it

In order to reflect about methods that can generate social justice and democratization, this article emphasises on practical implementations, connected to gender pedagogy. Gender pedagogy aims to overcome the myth of objectivity, and by questioning through teaching what is considered as common sense and 'normal'. Doing gender in the classroom entails thus, to act and reflect on breakthroughs, for example about an understanding of how gender codes influence everyday instances as well as working life. The collected data is based on narratives from alumni students who were asked to memorise and reflect on their gender studies and particularly about how useful this type of knowledge is in connection to their everyday and working life - as politician, lecturer, IT-manager, doctoral student etc. The aim of this article is to focus on how teachers support students to be gender confident and as a consequence of that, becoming gender actors outside the university, in working life. Some central questions are: how are gender issues represented and integrated in the different areas of studies; what can teachers do in order to generate equality in the classroom; in what way and how are students given possibilities to understand, internalize and discuss gender issues. Our experiences as lecturers, especially in gender studies, play a central role.

Changing conceptions of individual and public responsibility for natural resource management: A study of the views of Queensland landholders 1990-2007

Some contemporary views of ecosystems, resources and 'the environment' generally as public goods pose direct challenges to traditional understandings of private land ownership. In Australia, policies aimed at limiting individual resource use to protect public good values are juxtaposed with an inherited framework of private land ownership and have consequently generated a growing discourse on the rights associated with land and natural resources. In the various arguments for individual 'property rights' and other perceived 'rights' a corresponding discourse of responsibility is lacking. While responsibility is often inferred by governments and others, meanings of responsibility are rarely defined and thus it remains an underdeveloped concept in natural resource management literature.

This paper documents the evolution of rural landholders' understandings of private and public rights and responsibility for land and natural resource management in Queensland, Australia. A discourse analysis of submissions to five major public consultations initiated by the Queensland government in relation to land use policy between the years 1990 and 2007 is examined.

The analysis found that landholders' conceptions of their role have broadened from responsibilities for food and fibre production and economic contributions to the public good to include responsibilities for sustainable resource use, risk management and environmental protection. However, the allocation of public rights with no commensurate responsibilities to third parties and the increased burdens of individual responsibility to landholders with no public acknowledgement have created an injustice that acts as a disincentive to landholders for both participation and cooperation in the creation of policy. Additionally, the increasing transfer of public responsibility to individual responsibility acts against capacity building and creates a disconnect between rural and urban societies. The solution lies in the rediscovery and implementation of principles of fairness.

Determining the 'public interest' in contested landscapes: Who determines what it is and how it is determined?

Contestation over land rights and expectations of use can reflect a broader lack of understanding about how multiple and potentially competing rights are represented within legislative and planning frameworks. For example, the rights of multiple stakeholders to access and exploit both surface development and underground mineral rights in a contested landscape. In Australia, intensification of competition for land use between the resource extraction and agricultural industries led the Queensland Government to release a policy framework for protecting the state's strategic cropping land for public comment in August 2010. The intention of the policy is to protect land identified for strategic cropping use from any development that may alienate it or diminish productivity, except in "special circumstances" where there is a "significant public interest benefit". Many of the submissions to this process questioned not only the concept of public interest in land but also who determines what the public interest is and what decision making frameworks would be used for calculating trade-offs between different land values. In this paper, we adopt the novel approach of examining the public submissions to the 'Strategic Cropping Lands' policy development consultative process and the Queensland Government's responses to the concerns raised. Using this information we explore how public participation might be better integrated into the policy development process in order to determine 'best' value land uses in the case of current conflict between the extractive industries and agricultural cropping activities in Queensland, Australia. Thus we use this recent policy example to explore a mode of environmental citizenship that might use public participation to mobilise more deliberative forms of engagement that have greater capacity to deal meaningfully with issues of knowledge, risk judgements, cooperation and trust that underpin these land use conflicts.

Materialities of (urban) space: Emergence and sensory perception in social processes

In our paper we discuss our theoretical and methodological approaches to sensory perception of (urban) space and materiality, i.e. the material elements of life-worlds. We conceptualise "culture" as the sum of institutionalised and hence materialised actions in a social field – not only in the Durkheimian sense of "social facts", but also in a manifest-physical way. On the one hand, materialities are therefore manifestations of past actions; on the other, they are perceived by the actors in the continuing social process and attributed by them with meaning. Materialities effectively provide the context for their present and future actions. For the reconstruction of interpretational and interactional patterns it is then inevitable to take into account the (mobile and immobile) spatial surroundings.

These ideas are significant for all social spaces, yet, in the geographical area of Palestine/Israel they are constantly and decidedly stressed. Not only are nearly all materialities as such disputed and often ideologically charged in every phase of the social process (emergence, preservation, destruction), also their perception by actors in everyday life is.

Our questions are: Which constructions of meaning materialise? Which conflicting attributions of meaning to the materialities exist? Which attributions of meaning are suitable within different groupings? How do sensory perceptions correlate or clash with certain political-ideological goals? How do attributions of meaning change? Etc.

By contrasting examples of Jerusalem's Old City and Haifa's quarter Hadar we want to show how these processes can be grasped by combining several methods of interpretive social science.

Our empirical findings are part of a joint German-Israeli-Palestinian research project, which deals with present-day social constellations and the dynamics of interaction between members of different social groupings in Israel and Palestine. It is funded by the German Research Foundation and headed by Prof. Gabriele Rosenthal, University of Göttingen.

Mitigating risk or creating new ones? The role of technology, environment and institutions in framing risk in India's nuclear power sector

In spite of the Fukushima nuclear accident, nuclear power has grown as a strategic policy goal for India. As an emerging economy, India has to balance rapidly growing energy demand from a booming population with key vulnerabilities to climate change. The dual imperatives of environmental and economic needs have led to the recasting of nuclear power as a beneficial, green technology to meet base load electricity demand while mitigating the risk of climate change. However, nuclear power also produces toxic waste and thermal pollution that has huge impacts on eco-systems, which will eventually feedback to social and technological systems. These contradictions raise new questions about what risks are involved; what risks are being mitigated at the expense of exposure to other risks; and how they influence the way technological systems are designed to ensure safety. While much of the current literature on risk and nuclear power focuses on expert-vs-lay risk perceptions and the cultural construction of risk in developed countries, less has been done on the influence of non-human actants, particularly in key institutions in a developing country like India, which faces different forms and magnitudes of environmental and technological challenges. Using a combination of Orwin Renn's Social Arena Theory and Latour's Actor Network Theory (ANT), this paper will attempt to address 1) the processes of interaction between technological, environmental and social actants, 2) their influence on the construction of risk in key institutions, and 3) the implications for operational safety best practices in the industry. Renn's Social Arena metaphor provides a good framework for analysing non-linear interactions between agents and structure – i.e. arena rules – within institutions. His theory however, does not include non-human actors, which is where Latour's ANT can provide new insights by examining human-non-human networks of relations in the simultaneous production and construction of risk.

An indicator of the social and civic integration of migrants in Canada: The development of an immigrant integration index and some findings

This paper reports on a research project that utilizes a large quantitative data set in Canada to measure the "well-being" among immigrants in Canada. More specifically an index is developed as an indicator of social and civic integration of immigrants in Canada taking into consideration variables related to civic participation, political participation, feelings of "comfort, trust, and belonging to Canada" and experiences of discrimination. The paper first reviews the literature and examines the various attempts in some other countries to develop an immigrant integration index using individual level data. Then it explains how, using factor analysis, an immigrant integration index was developed for Canada and describes the process used. As a statistical tool it can be argued that this index is measuring in a composite way some aspects of immigrants' quality of life in Canada. Finally the paper applies this index to some specific groups in Canada. More specifically this last part of the paper presents index scores and analysis for: 1) nativity (immigrants/ native born); 2) generational status; 3) visible minority/racial status; and 3) nativity by generation and visible minority/racial status.

However in order to understand the increasing convergence of strategies, one must understand the operation of such professional organizations within changes to global political economy.

WOODMAN, Dan* (University of Melbourne, dan.woodman@unimelb.edu.au)The young precariat: How the rise of precarious employment is reshaping youth inequality

Precairous employment (casual, insecure and with variable patterns of work) is increasing across the developed world. Young people are amongst the most likely to find themselves part of this growing sector of the labour market (Furlong and Kelly 2005). Drawing on interview and survey data from the Life Patterns study, a 20 year longitudinal study of the post-secondary school transitions in Australia, I explore how precarious employment (often mixed with study) impacts on young people's lives and relationships. While many participants found themselves in casual work with poor conditions, this was only experienced as precarious for some participants. Many participants only spent brief periods of time in this type of employment before finding more secure positions and had the financial and other resources to manage its consequences. Some participants remained in 'dead-end' jobs with poor conditions for extended periods of time. This second group can be conceptualised as part of the 'Precariat' class (Standing 2011), as this engagement in the labour market made it difficult to develop a secure sense of career and to maintain relationships. The central mechanism through which precarious work impacted on relationships was through the scheduling of work time. Some participants spent years in work where the hours varied, sometimes each week and often with little notice. This shaped their lives in inconsistent and singular ways that made it challenging to find the regular periods of time together to maintain the strong relationships that can provide coping resources and a sense of identity. The growth of precarious employment means that control over time is functioning in a new way in the reproduction of inequality.

WORMALD, Guillermo* (19931, GWORMALD@UC.CL) and TREBILCOCK, Maria (19931)Cultura de cohesión e integración en las ciudades Chilenas

Esta investigación plantea que el grado de proximidad espacial y de contacto social entre personas de distinto nivel socioeconómico, moldea las formas de cohesión social, es decir, las normas y valores generadoras de actitudes y comportamientos más o menos favorables a la supervivencia y desarrollo de una sociedad. En particular, esta investigación se pregunta por las posibilidades para el fortalecimiento de la cohesión social que ofrecen a) las actuales formas de integración y convivencia en los distintos espacios urbanos públicos e institucionales, b) las disposiciones a un mayor nivel potencial de contacto social y c) las valoraciones culturales de las oportunidades existentes de contacto. La hipótesis subyacente es que una sociedad que ofrece altas posibilidades de contacto entre grupos y que además son altamente valoradas, tendería a ser más cohesiva bajo una lógica menos conflictiva, en la medida en que los grupos sociales estén dispuestos a tomar estas oportunidades.

En una aproximación exploratoria de tipo cualitativo, se observa que la experiencia que poseen las personas en relación a otros de distinta condición socioeconómica es bastante limitada (en general, los contactos diarios pueden ser clasificados como de tipo intra-clase). Más aun, la experiencia de heterogeneidad se da mayoritariamente en espacios públicos fuertemente normados y la expectativa es que este contacto será incó-modo y conflictivo. Por ello la actitud que predomina es la indiferencia. La experiencia heterogénea no es un resultado deseado sino consecuencia de otras decisiones, por ello, la disposición a la convivencia está influenciada principalmente por la búsqueda de igualdad de oportunidades.

WORMALD, Guillermo* (19931, GWORMALD@UC.CL) and TREBILCOCK, Maria (19931)La revalorización del trabajo como fundamento de cohesión social: Tensiones, paradojas y desafíos

Este trabajo está elaborado en base a los desarrollos del proyecto de investigación, "cultura de Integración y cohesión social en las ciudades chilenas" (Soc-24, financiado por Conicyt) actualmente en curso El análisis apunta a destacar que en el marco de una sociedad de mercado crecientemente globalizada -como la que se ha venido desarrollando en Chile durante las últimas décadas- la flexibilización, exclusión, individualización y segmentación de las oportunidades de empleo tienden a debilitar la cohesión social entre los trabajadores. Sin embargo, la contracara ha sido un robustecimiento de la cohesión social fundada en una revalorización del trabajo y del trabajo duro en particular. La sociedad urbana actual se constituye como una sociedad cohesionada en torno al valor del trabajo y de un proyecto común de movilidad social fundado en el trabajo. Es el desarrollo combinado de ambos procesos el que genera las tensiones, paradojas y desafíos que enfrenta el trabajo hoy como fundamento de cohesión social.

La estructura del trabajo es la siguiente: En la primera sección presentamos las nociones conceptuales que fundan y especifican nuestro problema de investigación. En la segunda, abordaremos el impacto de los procesos de exclusión, individualización, flexibilización y segmentación de las oportunidades de empleo sobre las condiciones de vida de los trabajadores urbanos. En la tercera, analizaremos la centralidad que adquiere el trabajo en la vida de las personas y su impacto sobre la cohesión social y, por último, avanzaremos sobre algunas paradojas, tensiones y desafíos que plantea el mundo del trabajo (su organización y valoración) a la cohesión social de los propios trabajadores en el ámbito urbano de Santiago.

WORTMAN, Ana* (Instituto Gino Germani, awortman@gmail.com)Consumo de cine y música: Tiempo, espacio y aura

En las sociedades modernas del capitalismo fordista, el consumo cultural estaba asociado a una pausa con el trabajo. La gente iba al cine o escuchaba música en lugares especialmente destinados para ello, actividades que demandaban de una planificación y un espacio determinado de realización. Con el desarrollo de los medios de comunicación, cine y música se difunden y se consumen cada vez más en el hogar y más recientemente, con las nuevas tecnologías, ya no se requiere de una larga pausa para consumirlos. Podemos escuchar música en cualquier momento y junto a otra actividad y el cine también. No solo consumirla, sino el acceso y disponibilidad a ellas se ha multiplicado. Sin embargo en este nuevo contexto de difusión, exhibición y consumo, se siguen manteniendo las prácticas del consumo de cine y música en los espacios públicos. Nos preguntamos entonces ¿quiénes son los que consumen cine y música en los espacios públicos, son siempre los mismos, disponen de un capital cultural diferente? ¿Qué tiene de particular la exhibición del cine para aquellos que continúan yendo al a la sala de cine? Lo mismo nos preguntamos en relación a la música. Si cada vez más podemos acceder a la música a través de dispositivos digitales, ¿qué es lo que hace que cada más la gente vaya a espectáculos en vivo, no sólo del mainstream sino de nuevos grupos y bandas? Luego de cierta mirada apocalíptica sobre el impacto de los medios de comunicación sobre las formas de consumo cultural en términos individualizados y privados, nos proponemos indagar en torno a la cultura en esta escena social del siglo XXI a partir del cine y la música.

Intractable violence in everyday life and the 'big conflict' in the Middle-East

The phenomenon of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict generates global discourses and images which are oftentimes far away from the everyday experiences of those who are living in stigmatized neighborhoods and entangled in criminal networks in the region. At the same time, they have to deal with the images from outside as every step of interaction is 'under observation' by international media.

People living in poor districts of so-called mixed cities like Jaffa and Haifa have to deal with this contradiction between discourses about the Middle-East conflict on a global level and concrete practices of 'back-alley struggles' on a local level. Their life-world is characterized by violence as part of discourses and practices in a complex way.

In our paper we will show how discourses are narrated officially and internationally on the one hand and how people narrate their biographical first-hand experiences of violence on the other.

We will present ethnographic case studies on 'urban backyards' in Haifa and Jaffa; these studies are part of a trilateral Israeli-Palestinian-German research project funded by the German Research Foundation. In particular, we want to highlight how to link discourse material (like films and articles about violence and conflict) with biographical life stories and participant observation.

The analyses show that personal life stories are often reshaped into 'presentable representations'. Furthermore, according to what we researchers expect 'from outside' during the interview, personal narrations are often turned into a kind of political speech for an international audience emphasizing discrimination and expressing claims for social justice. In our intercultural interview-settings, it needs considerable sensibility in order to show the interviewee that we are indeed interested in their 'trivial' and personal experiences and not in the 'big global conflict' and that we do not judge when and why violence is accepted.

Othering and territorial claims in the Palestinian-Israeli context

The social construction of belonging generates boundaries of groupings, life-worlds and (social) spaces by excluding 'the other' in order to claim 'the own'. 'Othering' takes place in everyday life by performing the 'we-group' as the powerful one and by appropriation of space as the territory the group belongs to.

In the Israeli-Palestinian context, appropriation of space and 'othering' is part of the discourses and practices of everyday life in a complex, entangled and condensed form. Here, different groupings which form established-outsider figurations, are trapped and mobilized at the same time.

In our paper we will show how belonging and the hierarchies between groupings on the one hand and claims for territory on the other are interrelated in everyday interactions and social relations. We will present a comparative analysis of three ethnographic case studies on Haifa, Jaffa and the Old City of Jerusalem which was carried out in the context of a trilateral Israeli-Palestinian-German research project funded by the German Research Foundation.

For the urban context we will demonstrate the processes of 'othering' and spatial appropriation on different levels: on the level of historical, hegemonic discourses (narratives and nation-building), on a socio-economic level (gentrification processes), on the level of state-institutional regulations, and on the level of demographic transformations in terms of spatial mobility and migration.

The results show that on each of these levels, appropriation of space (occupying, owning, developing space) generates specific dynamics of exclusion and power relations within established-outsider figurations. We argue that 'othering' and appropriation of space are the reification of territorial claims and ideological hierarchies in the everyday life in conflict zones in general and in the Israeli-Palestinian context in particular.

Young people, place and identity: Young Australians in relation to rural settings

Drawing on longitudinal data for two generations of young Australians, this paper challenges urban-centric conceptions of youth and youth transitions. New landscapes of production, consumption and protection, including the casualisation of the youth labour market, powered by three decades of neoliberal policies have impacted on young people's opportunities and choices in rural settings. Understanding the relevance of place in the construction of youth identity means identifying the ways in which people and places are interconnected, and the ways in which local and global processes interact. This signifies that young people's lives in rural settings need to be comprehended with a framework that acknowledges individual transitions (from youth to adulthood) as well as social and economic changes. Our analysis draws on a relational concept of youth that locates the meaning of age within historical, economic, social and cultural processes rather than biological and psychological developments. We draw on individual narratives of life that span twenty years as well as data on the patterns of transition and life experience for two longitudinal cohorts of young people to provide a more nuanced understanding of young Australians in relation to rural settings. Our research shifts the focus from a view of rural youth as homogenous and disadvantaged to an understanding of the ways in which young people construct lives and identities over time, intersecting with rural locations that are themselves undergoing significant transformations. Our approach challenges neoliberal accounts of post-school transition that equate youth as human capital that fail to account for the variety of local and global economic, political, social and cultural forces that constrain or produce opportunities in their post-school transition. The narratives offered by these young people highlight how young people in rural spaces negotiate their transition to adulthood and the relevance of place in relation to the construction of identity.

Electoral behavior: Rationality, identity and personalism in Lula da Silva's vote in Salvador

This study attempts to address the process that culminated in the reelection of Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva in 2006. It is based on a case study carried out in the city of Salvador, Bahia, as well as on analysis of secondary data. We employed a qualitative methodology using data collected through focus groups. Our findings indicate that voters tended to act largely on the basis of rational, retrospective evaluation of government performance, but were also informed by identity issues and personalist tendencies.

Women's experiences of traumatic bereavement following the death of a child in the Sichuan earthquake 2008

Natural disasters and bereavement of a child are severe adverse life events that carry an increased risk of long term psychological problems including depression, anxiety, post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and prolonged grief disorder (PGD). Women who have faced these circumstances simultaneously through losing a child in a disaster therefore have high vulnerability to chronic mental health morbidity. Adequate social support, receiving professional intervention, having other living child and seeing child's body could be protective factors for them. But the effect of having a subsequent baby is unknown. The aim of this study was to investigate the prevalence of anxiety, depression, PTSD and PGD in women 30 months after they had experienced the death of a child in the May 2008 earthquake in Sichuan (China).

The research took a quantitative approach by using face-to-face structured interviews with existing standard instruments. A comparison was made between women who had given birth to a baby since bereavement and those who had not.

Of the 226 participants, 82.3% (186) had clinically significant symptoms of depression, 82.3% (186) of PTSD, 88.9% (201) of PGD and 33.6% (76) of anxiety. Overall, 85.4% (193) of the women were experiencing more than one psychological problem. The most prevalent co-morbidity was co-occurring symptoms of depression, PTSD and PGD (103/226). Women without a subsequent baby showed significantly higher vulnerability of having the symptoms of anxiety, depression, PTSD or PGD than those with a baby, even after controlling for social support, marital relationship and violence, having professional intervention and seeing children's bodies.

Overall, women who faced disasters and child loss simultaneously were at high risk of having long-term psychological problems, especially symptoms of depression, PTSD and PGD. Having a subsequent baby after disasters was significantly associated with lower rates of psychological problems, but mental health morbidity remains high among them.

Mothering experiences and public health institutions. An attempt of application of institutional ethnography in Mendoza, Argentina

This paper seeks to share some of the findings and challenges of an attempt to use institutional ethnography to explore the relationship between the mothering experiences of low-income women and the institutional regulations and practices of the public health system during the processes of pregnancy, birth and puerperium, in Mendoza (Argentina), from 2001 to 2011.

This research project draws on Adrienne Rich's distinction between motherhood as experience and motherhood as institution. Despite the progresses regarding sexual and reproductive rights and technologies that Argentina has achieved, I believe there remains a persistent gap between the social meanings attributed to motherhood and the experiences of concrete women. My inquiry focuses on the forms of institutionalization of motherhood that are crystallized in the public health system, for it is during the processes of pregnancy-delivery-puerperium (that is, when motherhood passes through women's bodies and puts them in contact with "experts" regarding their condition) that social meanings attributed to motherhood become noticeably evident and intense.

Some of the preliminary findings regarding mothering experiences reveal that pregnant, laboring and puerperal women perform a corporeal work that goes mostly unacknowledged by health institutions. As for the institution of motherhood, it is produced and reproduced by discourses and practices that naturalize or medicalize the processes of pregnancy, birth and puerperium according to the needs of health institutions -which are determined by economic restructuring and social policy trends- and/or to the personal beliefs of health professionals.

The paper also seeks to raise some of the unresolved questions that emerge when trying to apply institutional ethnography in a context where public institutions are not as coherent as they seem to be in other parts of the world -with factors such as religious fundamentalism shaping institutional practices- but are all the same subject to translocal ruling relations.

Lo "otro" de los movimientos sociales: Hipótesis para pensar el estado hoy

La situación actual de los países de la región suramericana invita a reflexionar, entre otras cosas, sobre la relación de los movimientos sociales con los gobiernos en particular, y con los Estados en general. Sobre todo cuando dicha situación se pone en contraste con los acontecimientos de una Europa en crisis. Si durante la época neoliberal la oposición y la resistencia parecían ser las únicas y naturales opciones, en la actualidad eso está, por lo menos, puesto en cuestión. En esta ponencia se tratará de reflexionar desde una perspectiva teórica sobre el Estado y el ámbito institucional mostrando, en primer lugar, la necesidad de revisar sumariamente algunas perspectivas marxistas (las que sostienen una visión del estado como aparato, como forma, como relación social, las que proponen la noción de autonomía relativa), para así, en un segundo momento, presentar algunas hipótesis sobre la arena político-institucional que nos parecen más productivas para comprender las situaciones actuales. De este modo se trata de contribuir a reflexionar sobre ese "otro" de los movimientos sociales con el que establecen una, o mejor, varias relaciones, dinámicas, cam-biantes, que ya no pueden ser conceptualizadas simplemente en términos de cooptación o autonomía.

Foreign workers in the atomic disaster: A type of exclusion in Japan

The unprecedented gigantic earthquake on March 11, 2011 happened in Tohoku, Japan, which caused indescribable disaster including the breakdown of the Fukushima atomic power plant. Focusing on the situation of foreign workers faced with the accident of the Fukushima power plant, this paper clarifies a type of exclusion in Japan.

First of all, this paper reviews the characteristics of the immigration system and the current situation of foreign workers in Japan, and examines training system for foreign workers and its drawbacks in Japan. Secondly, this paper overlooks various sufferings primarily in Tohoku region, especially for those of foreign workers, stemming from the Fukushima accident: returning home, unemployment, and so on.

Thirdly, this paper asserts that the Fukushima accident made explicit a type of social exclusion in Japan. In the Fukushima accident many foreign workers including dispatched trainers were forced to return home and lose their jobs. On the other hand, their returning home also caused various industries such as agriculture and the restaurant industry to lose their valuable labor forces and decrease their productions or commercial activities in Japan. This means that foreign workers are not only required in Japan but socially excluded. Foreign workers are not at all included in Japanese society because they are so precarious in employment and welfare. The serious disaster can expose the hidden role of foreign workers in Japan.

How has the labor movement been caring for foreign workers after the disaster? Fourthly, this paper confirms that labor unions in Japan have not necessarily executed required activities for foreign workers except small unions with personal membership. However, it also asserts that various labor NGOs and voluntary organizations have supported foreign workers after the disaster. Lastly, this paper addresses the current situation and difficulties of such supporting activities.

The restructuring of a Japanese style hotels' workforce at the periphery of the Tokyo metropolitan area

Hot spring tourism areas in Japan assemble genderized and marginalized reproductive labor. Lots of casual workers which are not only local female workers but also migrant workers from rural area in Japan who use company dormitories are mobilized in the areas. There are lots of unstable jobs and poverty in the segregated urbanized spaces. We would like to point out that there is a flow that people who stay in company dormitories tend to become an unorganized and unsettled urban underclass. This article will explore the mobilization of a workforce and reintroduction distinction with globalization in the case of one hot spring tourism area in periphery of the Tokyo metropolitan area. In the Japanese style hotel in this case, tourists drastically increased from metropolitan area after the building of a railroad in the 1920s. It became an urbanized and bright-lights district with many shops and hotels. As the area had a workforce shortage, migrant workers from periphery and temporary female laborers from the local area were mobilized. Recently, however, the Japanese hotel has promoted streamlining, controlling and outsourcing. As a result, regular workers have become better geared for employment. At the same time, female trainees from other Asian countries, young dispatch workers, and female part time workers from the local area have been mobilized as marginal laborers. On the other hand, elderly migrant workers were excluded from the labor market. This restructuring of the workforce shows an age distinction in addition to keeping the unequal gender ratio. It has a relation to characteristics of the service industry which is not only for costs but also for a good image for "Omotenasi" (hospitality) unlike in the case of the manufacturing industry. Globalization of the reproductive sphere is progressing most in the marginalized female service sector, and competing with other marginal workers.

A comparison of determinants between married children's coresidence with their fathers and with their mothers in Japan

[Background] As the population ages and insufficient public funding for supporting older people causes concern, the importance of the public-private welfare mix (joining the various public and private welfare resources) attracts wider attention. For the welfare mix to function effectively, it is important that the policy presumption of the family conforms to actual family relationships. Social policy in present-day Japan, which is informed by post-war male breadwinner model on the one hand and traditional culture of intergenerational coresidence on the other, presumes that older women are to live with and be supported by their spouse and adult child. [Research question] This study examines whether this policy presumption conforms to actual family relationships in present-day Japan. [Data and method] The determinants of married children's coresidence with their older father and mothers are analyzed. The data used in this study was obtained from the 3rd National Family Research in Japan conducted in 2009. Data of married adult children with at least one living parent or parent-in-law are analyzed. [Results] According to the results, both the norm of coresidence and the adult daughter's higher socio-economic status (as a proxy of her negotiating power) increase the likelihood of coresidence with the older mother if the mother lives with her spouse, whereas the effects of those factors are significantly weaker if the mother is widowed. For the coresidence with the father, in contrast, those determinants always have positive effects regardless of the father's spousal relationship. Consequently, Japanese widowed mother is more likely than other types of parents to live in a single household. This result reveals that the reality of family relationships is inconsistent with the policy presumption. [Conclusion] It is argued that the current policy presumption should be changed and various measures for supporting older women in the single household are required.

Prevention of fatal child maltreatment

Public reaction to deviance and specifically to its severe form such as child abuse is a complex social-cultural process based on changing definitions, societal interests and professional expertise. Each of the 50 states in the USA have passed laws defining child abuse and determining when intervention is required, and have established administrative structures to deal with verified child maltreatment. However, caseworkers have to make final critical decisions regarding adequate interventions to prevent further harm to the child. Mistakes in risk assessment or provision of ineffective intervention can result in serious injury to the child or death. Research has shown that for many children who had been reported as being maltreated the efforts of the child protection system have not been successful in preventing subsequent victimization including death. Annually about 1500 children die of child abuse and neglect in the U.S. To effectively prevent severe child abuse or child fatality, accurate assessment of the risk for future harm in families who become involved with child protection agencies, is required. In an effort to better understand risk factors for the perpetration of the most serious child maltreatment (fatal or requiring immediate medical care,) this study examined various contextual and perpetrator characteristics using multiple administrative sets including Florida child welfare information system, Medicaid claims, Florida Law Enforcement management data sets, and Florida Substance Abuse and Mental Health records. The findings have shown that caregivers who were not natural parents of their victims were almost 17 times more likely to commit a fatal assault compared to those who were biological parents. Additionally, males, caregivers with a substance abuse history and perpetrators with a history of juvenile justice involvement were more likely to fatally maltreat their children. The implications of the findings for prevention will be discussed.

Gender and social justice in Iran

The sense of injustice has a huge impact on all aspects of everyone's life and significantly alters and administers his/her activities as well as decisions. As a historical fact the feeling of social injustice is more common among women in comparison to men, although it is considerably dissimilar in developed and developing countries. Thus, assessing this sensation regularly has a great importance especially among developing nations.

Some give credence to the hypothesis that differences between women and men are due to imbalance in accepting evolutionary and secularist ideas to each of two genders. Therefore, it is asserted that if women's acceptance of new evolutions accelerates, this contrast will fall off steadily and will end in a more just, balanced and equitable society.

This study wishes for try out this assertion in Iran by taking advantage of some statistics which are based upon some researches held in the years of 1975, 1996, 2001 and 2004 that have studied the trends in women's and men's judgment of social justice in a nearly thirty-year period of time. Also some newer studies are incorporated into the mentioned ones to make this study capable of giving a more accurate explanation of the relation between gender and social justice.

By making use of different factors such as individual satisfaction, sexual satisfaction, patterns of division of labor, sense of gender equality and possibility of equal opportunity to work, a compound indicator is made to measure the sensation of justice in both genders.

At the end, some notable results are the existence of a continued gender injustice in the society with consideration to its reshaped forms and replaced settings, also giving some remarks on possible reasons which can justify this trend.

¿Oportunidades? Impacto del Programa Oportunidades sobre la movilidad social en México

El Programa Oportunidades ha sido el eje de la política social focalizada del gobierno mexicano desde 1997. Su diseño institucional y operativo, así como los impactos positivos que ha tenido sobre distintos indicadores relacionados con el bienestar de la población en condiciones de pobreza extrema lo convirtieron en un modelo a seguir. Bajo el nombre genérico de Programas de Transferencias Monetarias Condicionadas (PTMC), se han diseñado numerosos programas a semejanza de Oportunidades en distintas regiones del mundo.

Las evaluaciones de impacto que se han realizado sobre Oportunidades se enfocaron en sus efectos a corto y mediano plazo, principalmente sobre indicadores relacionados con el desarrollo del capital humano de sus beneficiarios. Más recientemente diversos estudios comenzaron a explorar sus efectos sobre indicadores de más largo plazo relacionados con el fin último del programa que es contribuir a romper la transmisión intergeneracional de la desigualdad y la pobreza.

Esta investigación pone a prueba el supuesto de Oportunidades que establece un vínculo directo entre el desarrollo del capital humano (principalmente la educación) de sus beneficiarios y el aumento de la igualdad de oportunidades. Para ello, se estimó el impacto de Oportunidades en la movilidad ocupacional intergeneracional de jóvenes de 18-24 años pertenecientes a la primera cohorte de familias rurales beneficiarias. Se presentan resultados sobre las características de la inserción laboral de dichos jóvenes, así como el efecto de Oportunidades sobre su logro ocupacional y la desigualdad de oportunidades a la que se enfrentan en su ingreso al mercado laboral. Los hallazgos señalan algunas limitaciones de Oportunidades, pero principalmente de la estrategia de la política social, para enfrentar la reproducción de la desigualdad y la pobreza en México. Estos resultados aportan a la discusión sobre los alcances de los PTMC para contribuir a modificar la transmisión de ventajas y desventajas entre generaciones.

Ethnicities from food: Food culture of immigrants in a multiethnic area in Japan

The purpose of my presentation is to describe representations of ethnicities and memories of immigrants in a multiethnic area in Japan. Especially I focus on ethnicity brewed through food.

Global immigration has produced many multiethnic areas in Japan. Most of ethnicity studies in Japan have observed only 'single' ethnic group like Koreans or Brazilian in Japan. However, this traditional perspective is not useful to study the areas where 'plural' ethnic groups live together. Being directed dual diagram of host-guest relationship, traditional perspective also fails to understand multiethnic relationship. From micro-anthropological perspective, "eating" (here signifies not only food and its consumption, but also cuisine and selling grocery.) can be understood as a typical everyday practice. Moreover, food is strongly connected with the culture of immigrants. For these reason, my presentation focuses on the relationship between food and people.

This study is based on fieldwork in Tsurumi ward, Yokohama city, where historically many ethnic minorities including Okinawan, Korean, Chinese and Nikkei Latin American (Brazilian, Bolivian and Argentine etc.) have lived. In this multi ethnic area, I conducted participant observations to some ethnic groups (Okinawa Association, Brazilian NPO etc.). Also I conducted in-depth interviews with some families who have multiethnic backgrounds and experiences in order to understand their ethnicities and changes in the migration process through food.

My presentation describes transformation of ethnicity of migrants based on food from a global historical and spatial angle. From this ethnographical research, food can be understood as an integral of three codes; society, situation, and history. 'Society' code corresponds to an entangled country and the area. 'Situation' code means a commutative situation according to time, place and occasion. 'History' code is aimed at a family's experience inherited among parents and children. Through this understanding, ethnicity is described as an arena of essentialism, hybridity, and flexibility.

Migración transnacional, paternidad transnacional y solidaridad familiar en la ciudad de Cochabamba

Este artículo, aborda el tema de la paternidad transnacional y la solidaridad transgeneracional entre migrantes cochabambinos y sus familias. La perspectiva de estudios transnacionales encuentra en el análisis de la paternidad transnacional una excelente veta de comprensión de las prácticas familiares de carácter transnacional desarrolladas en el marco de la globalización de los procesos de reproducción social.

Dentro del proceso de urbanización boliviano, resalta la ciudad de Cochabamba, por la acelerada expansión de su mancha urbana, la ausencia de planificación y los alarmantes niveles de inequidad y pobreza. El propósito de esta comunicación, es dar cuenta de la solidaridad intrafamiliar y de la respuesta de los hogares ante la ausencia de uno de sus miembros en el espacio urbano de Cochabamba. Se tomará como base explicativa la interacción simultánea de seis dimensiones analíticas: la situación Socioeconómica en el país de origen, las características del Emigrante en el país de destino, la Comunicación en la maternidad/paternidad a distancia, el rol de las remesas, la participación política y el cambio de roles en la familia que quedo en origen. El procedimiento de análisis multivariado de reducción de datos por medio del análisis generalizado de correlación canónico (GCCA), nos permitirá demostrar los múltiples arreglos de la maternidad/paternidad transnacional y la solidaridad de las redes familiares vigente en Cochabamba. Este trabajo será completado con entrevistas en profundidad en origen y destino.

The effect of educational and occupation status on adolescent depressive trajectories in Taiwan

The transition from adolescence to adulthood is often accompanied by high uncertainty and anxiety. In East Asia, the most significant structural determinant accounted for the diversified youth development is the competitive educational system. Previous literature has documented that the entrance examination to senior high school and to college results in corresponding effects on the mental state of youth in Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong. The overall salient bi-polar trajectory deviates from the biological maturation model of their western counterpart. Hence, this study intends to further explore the potential impact of educational and occupational experiences on the developmental trajectory of East Asian youth by using Taiwan as an illustration.

This research aims to take the life-course approach to delineate the association of adolescent educational and occupational status and the psychological well-being. A scale of depressive symptoms as well as a four-category, time-varying adolescent status variables (stay in general educational track, stay in vocational track, have a job, and currently with no job nor study) are used to explore adolescent developmental trajectories. We use the panel data from Taiwan Youth Project that followed adolescents from age 15 through age 22 and employ series of group-based trajectory modeling. The preliminary analysis confirms that various adolescent statuses do produce significant effect on the diverse depressive trajectories overtime. Specifically, we identify six developmental trajectories for adolescent depression. Among them, four trajectories have clear linkage with the educational and occupational status of youth. Compared with youth in the general educational track, the majority in the vocational track are more likely to report less depressive symptoms. However, the effects vary depending on the specific trajectories revealed. Therefore, in addition to the educational influence, its interplay with the occupational experience needs to be taken into account in explaining the psychological well-being of young adults in East Asia.

Sociology of the political movies in new Turkish cinema after 2000

In this study the movies "One The Way The School" (Yki Dil Bir Bavul, Orhan Eskiköy and Özgür Dogan, 2009), MinDiT (Miraz Bezar, 2010), "Press" (Sedat Yılmaz, 2010) and "Future Lasts Forever" (Gelecek Uzun Sürer, Özcan Alper, 2011) will be examined as these movies perfectly fit into the framework mentioned above. These movies were shot by directors who were in their early youth in 90s and witnessed the oppression on the vital rights of the Kurds such as education in the mother tongue, their armed and political organizations, and the murders by unknown assailants which reached a climax in 90s. These directors who were also the subjects of the issues they addressed used methods of sociology in their movies, based their artistic productions on realities, and recorded the historical and social process experienced. In this study, how methods of sociology were used in the themes and narratives of these movies and how sociological data were presented will be examined, and efforts will be used to decipher the connection of cinema with sociology.

The movie "One The Way The School" shows the necessity of education in the mother tongue and the efforts (hardship) of a Turkish teacher who cannot speak Kurdish to teach reading and writing to Kurdish children in Urfa. The movie "MinDiT" that was shot in Diyarbakır where predominantly the Kurdish people live shows murders by unknown assailants backed by the government in 90s. The movie "Press" documents the pressure on Kurdish people at first hand and the closure of the newspaper Özgür Gündem printed in Kurdish-Turkish after the assassination of many of its correspondents by the government. The movie "Future Lasts Forever" adopts the oral history method to present the murders by unknown assailants in 90s with the stories of witnesses.

The global climate debate and civil society

This paper looks at the public debate on climate change in five countries: India, Russia, Finland, France and the United States. We focus, in particular, on the role of civil society in media debates taking place during global climate summits. We use a method we call Public Justifications Analysis (PJA), based on the justification theory of Luc Boltanski and Laurent Thévenot, to analyze the media debate around the UN COPs from 2007 to 2010. In addition to mapping the contents of the climate debate in different countries, using PJA to study the media-transmitted conflict over climate politics sheds light on the moral grounds of the debate. By examining the moral justifications that different actors give to their arguments on climate politics, we aim at understanding the similarities and differences in the ways in which the idea of climate justice is understood in different national contexts. These understandings, in turn, have implications on the attempts at forging global climate agreements. Through the comparison of debates in national media of these very different players of the international climate negotiations we bring forth central dimensions of the global climate debate, and analyze the globally oriented, yet in many ways locally and nationally bound grounds for argumentation that directs the debate.

Post-Fukushima: Regulatory challenges to nuclear power industry

The paper will concentrate on international regulatory experiences, conclusions and innovations after the nuclear power accident at the Fukushima Daiichi plant in Japan. The aim is to analyse how the societal-institutional nuclear safety regulation systems have reacted to the largest nuclear accident since the 1986 Chernobyl disaster and what kinds of societal-institutional learning processes have taken place or are evolving. The study compares the societal-institutional regulation of nuclear power industry in Finland and in the UK.

A 'dominant co-operative scheme' (Buchanan 1996) provides an analytical frame to examine the societal-institutional regulation. The dominant co-operative scheme refers to a legitimized allocation of abilities and inabilities connected with socially relevant tasks, with related distribution of material and immaterial goods, rights and duties. It defines relevant knowledge, competent actors and sets limits within which it is possible to discuss about means and goals related to regulation of nuclear power industry. Moreover, the scheme affects to societal institutional learning either enabling or limiting it. We are particularly interested in different dominant co-operative schemes between countries and problems, risks and social tensions that have been externalized or downplayed by those schemes.

The data consist of reports of international organizations (IAEA, OECD nuclear energy agency, EU) and those of national nuclear safety agencies (Finnish Radiation and Nuclear safety Authority and Health and Safety Executive in the UK; as well as interviews with regulators, engineers in nuclear power plants and NGO's representatives. The method of analysis is discourse analysis.

Industrial democracy versus union democracy? Organizational responses to the reform of the trade union recognition process in France

The French Labor movement is currently facing an important transformation of the industrial relations system. Since August, 2008, union recognition is based on the results of the elections for works councils' representatives, instead of being given by legal provisions. Whereas several Trade Unions opposed the reform, the main Labor and Employers organizations (CGT and CFDT on one side, MEDEF and CGPME on the other) supported it, for they saw it as a means for union revitalization and the reinforcement of industrial democracy. What are the consequences of that legal reform on trade union practices and repertoires of action? More specifically, does that change regarding the game rules of industrial relations affect union democracy? Based on a two-year, collective research based on monographs, our paper will address that question in two steps.

First, we will describe how trade unions, both at the workplace and geographical level, do or do not develop innovative tactics and devices in order to tackle the electoral process and its consequences. Thus, we will question whether the reform actually works as an external leverage for union development, especially towards groups of workers not represented yet. We will stress the fact that trade unionists adjust to the new legal framework by interpreting it with the cognitive frames and practical tools they are provided with, notably through each specific union organizational culture. Second, we will analyze how new tactics and devices shape the deliberative and decision-making process within unions. In particular, we will question whether the new electoral constraint leads to an increased rationalization, professionalization or even "managerialization" of French trade unions. In that way, we will study how the reform, in return, indirectly alters organizational cultures.

The challenge of internationalizing Japanese higher education amidst population decline

Since the beginning of 1990s, Japan's higher education system has struggled amidst continuous demographic decline of the population of university-age youth, and is expected to face an acceleration of this decline after 2020. Adding to the saturation of the domestic youth student market in higher education, the expected shrinkage of the overall consumer market through ageing places significant pressure on Japanese enterprises to expand sales in the global market outside Japan. At the same time, successful Japanese companies have already transformed themselves into multinational enterprises that do not limit their human resources and operations to Japan. Similarly, under these conditions, Japanese universities, heavily reliant on the national language and culture, are facing pressure to internationalize their outlook and operations. Adding to a plan to invite 300,000 international students to study in Japan by 2020, the government, universities, and industries are now encouraging Japanese youth to study and work abroad. On the other hand, partly because of the continuing inward-oriented preferences of top Japanese students toward traditional career mobility inside a Japanese company, the issue of brain drain is not yet actively discussed. However, considering the cases of neighboring countries with more internationalized higher education systems such as South Korea and the Philippines, the improvement of competence in the English language among university graduates certainly accelerates the movement of talented human resources away from their home countries, and further decreases the productive, working age population in the end. One possible solution to this dilemma would be enhancement of mutual exchange of students, academics, and workforces within and across the Asia-Pacific region. Although such efforts have already begun, it remains questionable whether Japan could serve as a hub of such a circulation of students and regional labor forces.

Convergence and divergence in immigration policy in northeast Asian countries

In this paper, I attempt to examine and compare the progress and characteristics of immigration policy of Japan, Taiwan, and South Korea. Main argument is as follows. The three Northeast Asian countries showed convergence in immigration policy, especially in foreign migrant worker policy, in the late 1980s and early 1990s because of urgent economic interests and the lack of experience in dealing with foreigners. Japan and South Korea implemented the trainee system under which foreign migrant workers entered and worked as trainees although they performed similar work as native workers. In the mid 2000s, however, South Korea achieved significant reforms in immigration policy such as granting the rights of workers to foreign migrant workers and supporting marriage immigrants and their children. Taiwan made improvements in the protection of migrant workers and support of marriage immigrants. By contrast, Japan have remained inactive and passive in immigration policy reform. These differences among the three countries are explained by the presence or absence of policy alliance between the government and civil society. When progressive government and civil society join their forces together, they can achieve reforms in immigration policy more quickly.

Mujeres y agencia en Chile: Implicancias para la percepción del tiempo libre

El tiempo libre ha adquirido una significación sin precedentes en la sociedad moderna. Entendido como un tiempo autónomo del sujeto para sí mismo, el tiempo libre ha sido tematizado como un aspecto central para el desarrollo subjetivo y el bienestar individual. Sin embargo, la reconfiguración del tiempo social ha definido mayores niveles de complejidad en la articulación del tiempo libre de los individuos. En el caso de las mujeres, esta complejidad en la configuración del tiempo libre se ha articulado con mayores posibilidades en torno a los procesos de construcción biográfica, y con la necesidad de desplegar esfuerzos de coordinación de roles sociales cada vez más complejos y diferenciados. En esta ponencia se argumenta que el desarrollo de capacidades en las trayectorias biográficas de las mujeres en Chile, tiene importantes implicancias para la configuración de su experiencia del tiempo libre. A partir de análisis estadísticos multivariados de los datos de la encuesta del Informe de Desarrollo Humano 2012 del PNUD Chile, se discute la tesis de que la percepción de tiempo libre de las mujeres en Chile no depende sólo del tiempo objetivo del que efectivamente disponen, sino también de la capacidad de agencia que despliegan en su vida cotidiana. Se presenta el argumento de que la capacidad de agencia en mujeres posibilita el desarrollo de un trabajo temporal que les permita configurar sus experiencias temporales a partir de sus propios deseos y preferencias. Estas articulaciones entre el desarrollo de capacidades y la percepción del tiempo libre, permitirían constituir la plausibilidad de una reflexión sobre la centralidad de la capacidad de agencia para el bienestar subjetivo de las mujeres en Chile.

Políticas sociales para el futuro: Una reflexión diacrónica sobre el sujeto desde el enfoque de las capacidades

Las políticas sociales en Chile han relevado al sujeto como agente central en la satisfacción de sus necesidades, sin embargo, no han logrado consolidar una preocupación sistemática por su futuro. En base al análisis de la noción de sujeto en dos políticas sociales en Chile, el "Programa Orígenes" y el "Fondo Solidario de Vivienda", se argumenta que los esfuerzos por desarrollar una lógica diacrónica focalizada en el fortalecimiento del sujeto a través de los procesos de "habilitación" e "instalación de capacidades", no han logrado generar las condiciones propicias para incentivar el despliegue de procesos subjetivos que trasciendan la satisfacción de una determinada carencia o necesidad. Se argumenta que la prevalencia de este modelo sincrónico en la implementación de las políticas sociales en Chile, ha perpetuado la ausencia de una práctica sistemática orientada a proveer de sustentabilidad temporal a las condiciones sociales que buscan poner términos a la situación de vulnerabilidad social de las personas. En base a los aportes del enfoque de capacidades de la teoría del desarrollo humano, esta ponencia propone una discusión exploratoria sobre cómo construir políticas sociales en Chile que logren dar cuenta del futuro del sujeto. Esta reflexión diacrónica posibilitaría no sólo proponer nuevos modelos que, por medio del fortalecimiento de los procesos de desarrollo de capacidades, permitan a las personas enfrentar una nueva situación de vulnerabilidad social en el futuro, sino que también contribuye a una re-inserción del futuro como categoría significativa en la discusión sobre las políticas sociales en la sociedad chilena.

New concepts of belonging in a globalized world

The study of collective belongings such as ethnic and national belonging and the associated politics of belonging have engaged scholars of social sciences during the last decades to study why people in certain situation resort to essentialist notions of collectivity.

Space-sensitive studies on migration and globalization have recently challenged conventional notions of collective belongings and have provoked a conceptual shift from categories with inherent spatiality, territoriality and boundary making to concepts based upon movement and flow. In this context, a new concept of belonging reflects the complex relationships that individuals have with changing social, political and cultural landscapes, realities as well as human and non-human beings.

Such an understanding of belonging stresses the multiplicity and situatedness of individual attachments, which may be of social, material and sensual nature, and that are constantly re-articulated and re-negotiated by actors in their day-to-day practices and experiences. In such a reading, belonging overrides any form of legal legitimacy and regulation, and comes into being as a result of events and through individual life stories. In times of constant exchange through travel, mass media and communication technologies the concept indicates the compatibility of difference and thus stresses the permeability and not the establishment of social boundaries.

A more mobile theorization of social relations and belonging, exemplified at the case of a neighborhood in Madrid, Spain, where highly heterogeneous actors re-appropriate the urban space, opens up the possibility to go beyond the analysis of naturalized collectivities and their relations and to bring forward new findings of collectivization, social mobilization and change.

Street art and new forms of urban belonging

Street and action art has become an important resource for those who are widely excluded from hegemonic social, economic, political and cultural participation. Alternative cultural expressions are nowadays synonyms for the countervailing power of the subalterns. This was nicely documented at the example of the symbolic re-appropriation of North American cities since the late 1960s through Graffiti. While Graffiti has been used mainly by young artists to allow for the articulation of political and other forms of self-manifestations, there are nowadays different forms of street and action art used by activists and migrant groups to escape from voicelessness, to articulate exclusion and the lack of rights and access to resources. By that means new forms of individual and collective identities are reconstructed, new forms of urban belongings are produced, and citizenship is enacted by those who are not seen by the polity.

There is no space where individual and collective identities of migrants can better be studied than in the urban space. Recent migration flows to Spain have transformed the urban space in Madrid into a playground for the articulation of migrants' position and positioning in the world. Here, the cultural expressions may evoke both, the re-affirmation of naturalized collective identities and belongings or the breaking up of pre-defined social boundaries in favour of new collectivities.

Giving the example of an immigration neighborhood and a self managed social and cultural Center in Madrid it will be shown in how the symbolic re-appropriation of the urban space counteracts rehabilitation programs to commercialize and control the city and thus repel heterogeneous urban and migrant livelihoods.

Cities and climate change in the context of social and environmental justice in Brazil

This paper presents four studies cases (on the Brazilian metropolitan regions of Curitiba, Baixada Santista, São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro) about the interactions of urbanization and global climate change through the frameworks of social and environmental justice. The increase of intensity and frequency of extreme events such as storms, heavy rain and heat waves have significantly provoked the vulnerability of the population in metropolitan regions of Brazil. These studies have as a main focus the transformations in the landscape due to the urbanization process and the consequent environmental degradation. Most of them involve the use of GIS (Geographic Information System) with methods of integrated analysis. The data about the environment and socioeconomic aspects were collected, stored and organized; extracted from institutional sources and satellite images. In these cases, risk is associated with society's susceptibility to environmental changes, seen not only as a result of a certain climate event, but also as a consequence of a social process related to structural urban issues that are linked to political decisions and measures implemented in the course of history. We examine different dimensions and complementarities of territorial planning and the environmental changes caused by alterations in the dynamics of the local landscape.

Professionalisation, inequity and power – The professionalization of health promotion workers in Australia

The Health Promotion workforce, akin to a number of other health and non health work groups in Australia is seeking to gain accreditation. That is recognition of qualifications and authority to gate keep the boundaries of their "profession" via such things as industrial recognition and the ability to dictate the training requirements needed for membership in the profession, including the ability to apply for and be paid to undertake "health promotion officer" positions.

These moves can be seen as classic professional turf development and management, and strategic pathways that many other health professions have successfully undertaken. However health promotion as a professional grouping has a particular commitment to recognising and redressing the social determinants of health. That is the social inequities and injustices that are structured into particularly modern western societies and largely hinge around the inequitable distribution of wealth, power and resources. Hence health promotion as a discipline can be seen to be seeking to establish itself within the heart of the inequitable structures the discipline perceives as needing change in order to promote a healthier society.

This paper is an exploration of this conundrum, seeking to tease out nuances, explore complex possibilities such as whether the betterment of one social group inevitably leads to negative impacts on those with lesser power. Or does this aim to gain ground via professionalization and industrial categorisation actually provide a means of redressing some key social inequities such as gendered pay differentials?

Requiring health professionalization in a neo-liberal country (Australia)!

Australia is one of the key neo-liberal nations on the globe at this point in time. With a focus on free markets and economic expansion unhindered by government "interference" it would seem contraindicated to know that since 2008 the national federal government has initiated a raft of professional health group registrations.

The first round of registrations included physiotherapy, optometry, nursing and midwifery, chiropractic care, pharmacy, dental care (dentists, dental hygienists, dental prosthetists and dental therapists), medicine, psychology and osteopathy and Podiatry. A second round is to occur with occupational groups to be assessed against six criteria which hub around notions of risk of public harm and the practicality of registration.

This active move by government on the surface contradicts the broader neo-liberal framework of Australian governing over recent decades. It is also fair to say that the overall leanings of government have not shifted markedly from a belief in free-running markets and economic bottom line policies. While the economics of "risk" may be seen to be a coherent driver to such moves, an alternate theoretical understanding would suggest that agendas of control could also be seen as current influences on these actions of government. It is possible to surmise that agendas of "health reform" particularly underpinned by concerns regarding the escalating cost of health care servicing have reduced government resistance to notions of market interference and raised interests in strategic control of health professionals.

This paper will explore these changes in Australian health workforce policy, making connections to theoretical ideas which may give insights into the machinations, and potential future pitfalls (for all players) of these new directions.

Process-oriented methodology support to social interventions: The use of Deleuze's theory of assemblages

Dealing with 'the social', Deleuze and Guattari (1987) proposed the concept of an assemblage that is only grasped in the dynamic relation between the strata (e.g. the plane of organizations, organisms, signs and subjects) and the plane of immanence (where everything is in a state of transformation). Exploring the complex relationship between 'the social' and its assemblages, we argue that process-oriented methodology should be conceptualized as critical action research that is required to produce the 'process-generated data' in the form of Deleuze's sense of an event during the process of social intervention which includes 'judgement systems'. Such judgement systems are necessary for generating knowledge that supports social interventions in order to make or produce 'events data', which are developed from a collective whose members appreciate which value to assign and select in the process of decision-making towards the democratic process of social intervention.

Researcher's ethics in multi-authorship papers in natural sciences at Japanese universities: The intersection of harassment and scientific misconduct

This paper examines professional ethics regarding authorship in writing multi-authored papers in natural sciences at Japanese universities. In order for universities to take initiatives to promote professional ethics in society, we believe it imperative to discuss misconduct within universities. By focusing on authorship, we explore how Japanese researchers understand research ethics.

As to the violation of Uniform Requirement by International Committee of Medical Journal Editors, known as a global criteria of authorship ethics in many natural sciences fields, two points are especially noticed: "gift authorship" (people indicated as authors, often senior researchers, do not actually contribute to the work) and "ghost authorship" (people, often students or researchers in lower position, are not properly represented in the paper even though they make essential contributions). We also note the recent complaints by junior researchers about these violations, which are claimed as "harassment with power differences".

Our survey of researchers in natural sciences at 15 top Japanese universities as well as intensive interviews show that few researchers (14.1%) actually meet the global criteria of the proper authorship, and about half think that the violation might be condoned. The data is analyzed with particular local contexts being taken into consideration. Traditional Japanese universities consist of small pyramid-like units where the "boss professor" has strong power over subordinates. Also, researchers are expected to learn how to write research papers only through situational learning within each unit, rather than through systematic education.

Thus, we argue that most natural science researchers in Japan are either confused about or struggled with the situation where strict global criteria conflict with local peculiar cultures which often condone gift/ghost authorships. Those who are already socialized in the local cultures take unethical authorships for granted, while others view it as the intersection of harassment and misconduct.

Ethnography study of informal economic activities of rural women in South-West Nigeria

The focus of this paper is to carry out ethnography survey of rural women informal economic activities with a view of getting first hand information pattern and types of informal economic activities of rural women in Nigeria. The generation of the data is important for sustainability of women economic activities and towards rural development in Nigeria. In recent years, the informal economy has played an increasingly vital role in job creation, service provision, and productive organization in industrialized as well as developing economies. In developing in particularly, studies have revealed the increasing percentage of women in informal economy. Among the larger percentage of women in informal economy are the rural women. Yet, development studies, and social sciences have neglected women informal economic activities in rural areas. Most studies concentrated on rural women's role(s) only in agriculture. The research question that underlie this paper is what are the informal economic activities rural women in west-south Nigeria engage in. what are their types, patterns, access to resources, motivations and challenges. To achieve the state objective, the research instruments for collection of the data will include, participant observation, Key-Informant Interview, Focus-Group Discussion, and In-depth interview. Information collected will be tape-recorded, transcribed, sorted, and processed with computer qualitative data analysis (Nvivos8). The other method of analyzing data will be through ethnographic summaries and content analysis for pattern explorations. The research report will therefore provide a comprehensive report from responses from all the methods of data collection. It is expected that the findings will give us and improve our knowledge on the Informal economic activities of rural women in Nigeria.

The challenges and constraints of rural women informal economic activities in Ogun State, Nigeria

The introduction of structural adjustment programmes in 1980's coupled with austerities of neoliberal economic reforms, the globalization of culture, capital, and information have had a significant influence on the informal economy. Women in rural areas, including female-headed households who would ordinarily be homemakers alone in their own right and locality are increasingly forced by economic downturns to participate in informal economic activities in search of income to support their families or even to become breadwinners. Yet, there are certain environmental, economic, and socio-cultural factors that hinder them in their informal economic activities.

The focus of this paper therefore is to examine various socio-cultural, economic, and environmental challenges of informal economic activities in the development process of rural areas by rural women in Ogun State, Nigeria. In addition, this paper aims to identify the types of economic activities engage in by rural women and to identify the challenges and constraints faced by women in their economic activities. The significance of this research work is that we will be able to obtain better insights into the dynamics of persistent gender inequalities and the challenges of the rural informal economy in Nigeria. The study will be anchored on feminists' theory. 1000 respondents will be selected through multi-stage sampling technique. The study will involve triangulation of method of data collection. The quantitative method will involve the use of questionnaire, while qualitative method of data collection will involve observation, and in-depth interview and Key-Informant interview. Information collected quantitatively will be analyzed using SPSS, while qualitative data will be analyzed through content analysis and ethnographic summaries. It is hoped that the research will revealed the constraints of rural women in informal economic activities so that better recommendations that will be geared towards the improvement of rural women's work in the informal economy will be made.

Idioms in the chechen language (on the example of the semantic field "work")

Idioms are language units, reflecting the correlation of the image component and actual meaning, knowledge and use of them in speech is one of the indicators of a high language proficiency level. The study of idioms functioning in speech reveals the peculiarities of their semantics, gives an idea about the language situation in republics. Key words: Language, semantic, Idioms, social values, social memory Methods of research. Psycholinguistic inquiry, sociological, statistical and semantic analysis. Results of research. The use of idioms in a bilingual society is conditioned by linguistic as well as social factors. The language situation in the Chechen Republic is characterized by penetration of the Russian language into the communication sphere, mixture of the Russian and Chechen speech. According to the data of the psycholinguistic inquiry, the use of idioms is closely interwoven with the language situation, construction of the social and cultural values. Idioms with opaque semantic structure are not recognized and rarely met in contexts. The meaning of such idioms was defined with the help of their component structure and inner form. The most active in use are transparent idioms, particularly in the contexts, reflecting an instrumental type of attitude to work as a means of earning that is connected with the influence of forming social values on the vision of work. Conclusion. The language situation determines the idioms functioning in a bilingual society, the research of this stratum of lexicon in minor languages, coexisting with the official language of the state demands a complex approach, taking into consideration language and social factors.

"Adaptation from below" to climate change: Lessons from field surveys in Benin

Adapting to climate change in developing countries is often seen in international policy through the lenses of increasing funds. It is true that financing adaptation raises essential and controversial questions of responsibilities about who should pay for the damage induced by excessive GHG emissions. However, even if those questions would be adequately fixed, how will developing countries deliver the financing support to the populations in need for it?

In those countries institutional instruments such as National Adaptation Plans (NAPAS) are considered as privileged vehicles of such aid. Support is also delivered with the collaboration of various NGO's, be it international, national or local. However, altogether there are very few intermediary agents able to provide villagers with technical support, not to mention the political context, often too weak to deal with new impulses to be given.

After a project of several years, including field survey in Benin (West Africa), we would like to present both empirical work and analyses on the realities of "adaptation from below" to climate conditions, including insights on its potential to be extended in the context of further climate change.

The field survey includes observations in South Benin on how agricultural villages do try to cope with the actual climate variability. First, by mapping factors of social vulnerability, we present results relating to endogenous strategies of adaptation. Second, we analyze the profile of local aid "projects", with a view on their potential contribution to adaptation to climate change. Third, and more generally, we check the actual support that those villagers receive in these matters, from local, national, and eventually international sources of funding.

We conclude by stating that the weakness of transfers from the international or national spheres to grassroots realities remains an essential component of any policy on adaptation to climate change in developing countries.

The life of image as mediation. A sociological reading of Marion Milner. La vie de l'image comme médiation. Une lecture sociologique de Marion Milner

In the book « On not being able to paint », Marion Milner explores the way imagination has to transform to be able to sustain the meeting of an external world in a vital and open way. In doing this, she studies the work that activate the use of cultural mediations, living mediations that enable us to meet ourselves, others and our environment. In this paper we will remind some of these results and discuss them in a sociological way, in particular considering Richard Sennett's approach of cultural mediation.

Dans son ouvrage, « On not being able to paint », Marion Milner explore, à travers l'expérience de la peinture, le trajet que l'imagination se doit d'accomplir avant d'être en mesure de soutenir la rencontre d'un monde extérieur à soi, dans un rapport à la fois vivant et ouvert. Ce faisant elle interroge le travail qui sous-tend l'usage des médiations culturelles « vivantes », dans ce qu'elles autorisent comme expériences de soi, des autres et du monde. Nous rappellerons les éléments saillants de cette approche avant d'en dégager certains enjeux sociologiques, notamment en dialogue avec les analyses de Richard Sennett.

Prioritizing violence against women: The new agenda-setting of women's organizations' in Greece

Since the 1995 UN Conference in Beijing, violence against women became a "common advocacy position" of women's and human rights movements. As the previously separate transnational networks began to converge and mutually transform each other, women's rights were reconceptualized as human rights. The new "master frame" united formerly divided organizations in the West and the developing world and enabled activists to bridge cultural differences and build transnational campaigns aiming at increased global awareness. Shifting their original focus of orientation through various adaptations, most women's organizations in Greece "localized" this "global frame" and became instrumental in defining violence against women as a major social problem of the Greek society. This paper explores both organizational and substantive aspects of this recent transformation. The first involves the impact of national/ transnational fora and committees in which organizations' members participated, the successive frame utilization within state/society parameters, the implementation of EU directives on gender mainstreaming, the critical role of the General Secretariat on Gender Equality in developing the "National Programme on Preventing and Combating Violence Against Women", the institutional involvement of the Ministry of Justice, Transparency and Human Rights- the cooperation of women's activist groups, the establishment of special agencies. The substantive dimension emphasizes the elimination of violence against women as a constitutive cultural and social canon, its reconceptualization from civil to human right, the reexamination of the public/private divide, the redefinition of violence to incorporate all forms (physical, sexual, psychological, verbal) and types (physical abuse, sexual harassment, rape, trafficking), and more than anything else, an attempt to raise public awareness on domestic violence. With basic targets being law improvement, the legal support of victims, the development of counselling centers and shelters, the prioritization of violence against women as a violation of human rights was perceived as a prerequisite for substantive gender equality.

The impact of economic recession on Albanian female immigrants in Greece

Following the initial phase of massive immigration Greece (1990-2000) during which Albanian women worked as domestics, babysitters and care takers for the elderly-despite discrimination and exclusionary state policies- second generation immigrants, emerged in the years that followed (2000-2008) as small entrepreneurs, store keepers and service employees enjoying social security and health care benefits. Their efforts towards economic advancement coincided with claimsmaking for social and political rights and participation in migrant associations. Acting as pressure groups, these associations promoted political goals in pursuit of naturalization rights. However, the increased unemployment rates and curtailment of welfare state benefits due to global recession and the recent Greek economic crisis, rendered their former expectations for social mobility dimmer. Overburdened by their family's financial insecurity and their husbands declining incomes, due to the economic recession on the building industries in which they were mostly employed, many women - are now forced to return to earlier forms of unskilled employment. As their struggle for survival does not allow for political pursuits, immigrant women who barely make ends meet as the principal family breadwinners, they have fallen back on the grim realities of the first years in the host country. As a follow up study of our past research on Albanian immigrant woman and migrant associations, this paper aims to offer a comparative frame for their changing position in the Greek society and their shifting expectations before and after the recession.

sion. Our study seeks to examine the consequences of economic crisis on four levels: (a) the familial web (b) the civil sphere, (c) the welfare state and (d) the individual action orientation. In addition, through this study we wish to demonstrate not only how immigrant women, cope with the current crisis but also their search for viable alternatives in an increasingly globalized world.

Hacia la construcción de políticas interculturales en la Universidad Nacional de Salta

A partir del año 2006 la Cátedra de Investigación Educativa de la Facultad de Humanidades desarrolla una serie de proyectos de investigación e intervención sociocomunitaria en el Noroeste Argentino. En un principio se trabajó con las y los jóvenes de las comisiones carnestolendas de la ciudad de Salta y municipios lindantes y después con las comunidades Wichí de La Puntana y La Curvita de Santa Victoria Este de la Provincia de Salta. A partir de las acciones desarrolladas se posibilitó la llegada de jóvenes de las comunidades a la Universidad Nacional de Salta para estudiar las Carreras de Ciencias de la Educación y Filosofía en la Facultad de Humanidades. En este sentido, el presente trabajo tiene por objetivo dar cuenta de la falta de preparación de la Universidad para recibir a sujetos pedagógicos postergados/excluidos/invisibilizados a lo largo de la historia de la educación argentina. El eje vertebrador es el proyecto de tutorías llevado adelante para favorecer la permanencia de los jóvenes en la institución educativa. Es así que el trabajo se inicia con el acompañamiento en el Curso de ingreso a los estudios universitarios en primer lugar, y después en el cursado de las materias de primer año de las carreras. Este proceso no sólo se limitó a metodologías de estudio sino a la necesidad de visibilizar la cultura Wichí en el ámbito académico. Tanto los proyectos de tutorías como las actividades académicas y culturales, el Programa de Coinvestigación, junto con las desarrolladas en las Sedes Regionales de la Universidad en Orán y Tartagal con jóvenes indígenas, permitieron vislumbrar la posibilidad de un primer paso en la institucionalización de una política dirigida a la permanencia y retención de estudiantes indígenas que nos condujera hacia una mirada intercultural en Educación Superior.

The growth of "militias" in Rio de Janeiro

The most notable happening in the security arrangements in the city of Rio de Janeiro is the growth of the so called "militias" in the favelas situated firstly in the West Zone (Planning Areas 4 and 5), the areas with lower demographic concentration, and now already occupying the more populated and equally poor Suburb (Planning Area 3), where most of the favelas dominated by traffickers are. The richest part of the city (Planning Areas

2 and 4.1, as well as 1- the Center), has received almost all of the Units of Pacifying Police. The militia started as an extermination group called "policia mineira" in the favela of Rio das Pedras (AP4) with the support of dwellers who paid for their security against robbers and traffickers at the end of the 1970s. Recently, especially since 2002, militias started spreading quickly, exploring other local business (pirate cable TV, informal transportation, etc), especially real estate exchanges. Militias can be constituted by local dwellers only to give security, but the most tyrannical ones are those that group policemen, prison guards, and ex-military that discovered a new and more lucrative way of exploring favelados. They also discovered that, by advising migrants, who constitute the majority of dwellers in those favelas, to bring their electoral card to Rio de Janeiro, that could also elect candidates to the Legislative and the Executive, therefore gaining a surplus of impunity and protection for their illegal business. The militias have grown more than the UPPs, as shown in the maps that resulted from the survey made between 2005 and 2010 by the NUPEVI team.

UPP, social UPP and local associations

The Units of Pacifying Police, which were developed as a new security policy in Rio de Janeiro, have been successful in disarming traffickers and re-conquering territories dominated by the latter beforehand. Nevertheless, some issues have appeared that point to the structuring of the Military Police Force in Brazil and the ethos or practical logics of their new policemen supposedly prepared to confront the new challenges of the UPPs. In order to gain the neighbours' support, military policemen have been involved in teaching sports and music to children and adolescents in favelas of the richest part of Rio de Janeiro. Even in those where dozens of NGOs and long-standing neighbourhood voluntary associations have been doing this job. Complaints about marginalization of the latter's work with children and youths as well as criticisms on the military methods employed by policemen in their training activities constitute a major obstacle for the acceptance of this new policy in the city. Although it is said that governmental officials would listen firstly to the local dwellers and their communitarian leaders, a further difficulty in their dialogue has increased the consolidation of UPPs. Trafficking continues and the threat of corruption is still present in the pacified favelas.

'This is a good time for ageing' - Images of old age from social workers and private health care providers

Enhancing the provision of home-based care is crucial in a time of population ageing and growing diversity in old age. For two projects on the role of ICT in new business models for delivering home-based care, focus groups and short questionnaires were used to collect data from two types of stakeholders: (1) social workers carrying out home-based, face-to-face interviews with elderly people who request public, home-delivered care services; (2) and private providers of home care services. The field work was carried out in 2011 in San Sebastian, Spain.

This paper draws on the images arising from discourses of these social workers on what ageing is, what a dependent, elderly person needs and how care should be provided for them, and on what a non-dependent elderly person is and how they should be taken care of. Likewise, the paper analyses the images of the surveyed private providers on what an old person is, what their work is for and on how they are dealing with population ageing and diversity in old age.

Although grounded on their close contact with daily life situations of older people, the images emerging from the discourses of both groups are aligned with a normative view of ageing, including a gender bias for service delivery according to their images of what people need as care, and a view of how the use of ICT by older people should be like.

Making these images visible has contributed to designing more coherent recommendations for both projects on new business models for new home-care products and services, but has also enhanced the research group's understanding of how images and perceptions around old age work.

Childless older people and LGB elders: Health, life course transitions and care

Population ageing is making diversity in old age more visible. Lesbian, gay and bisexual (LGB) individuals are increasingly becoming subjects of ageing research as they age in so unique and particular processes. Despite the growing recognition and protection of LGB parenthood, currently most LGB elders age as childless individuals. Hence, they share many common aspects with their heterosexual peers who also age as childless older persons: (a) they are usually expected to be highly involved in providing care to members of their families of origin because they are perceived as having less family responsibilities; (b) their support networks in old age are potentially smaller than those of persons with children; (c) their health behaviours are specific in, for instance, care seeking behaviours and other self care practices; (d) they have learned to manage stigma and develop coping strategies to deal with their ageing process at early age.

Both groups, childless and LGB individuals, confront the normative ageing process. This paper draws on the analysis of data from wave 1 (2004) of the Survey of Health, Ageing and Retirement in Europe (SHARE), which includes information on more than 31,000 individuals aged 50+ from twelve countries. The paper particularly considers 2,794 individuals who were either ageing as childless persons or ageing with a same-sex partner. The interactions of social and family support networks, care-giving arrangements, care expectations in old age, gender norms and health behaviours are analysed and complemented with 10 in-depth interviews with LGB individuals aged 50+. Since demographic changes and diversity in old age challenge heteronormative assumptions that have ruled theory and practice in relation to old age, the paper argues that investigating non-normative ageing can inform policy recommendations on care for all individuals.

Rosario City, Argentina, internal migrations: Social injustice

Nowadays we can see how increase people that live in "slums" around the city, unemployed people. We can see how begging and crimes increases, and how the government assistance for these people that do not stop increasing it is necessary.

Most people have come to Rosario from other parts of our country, some times looking for any kind of activity that let them survive, some times because big companies have expelled the local people to use the land where they lived for centuries.

These people are out of the productive and social system.

As the market rules are not capable to correct all these problems, it is necessary the state intervention.

In this frame work, it is essential to define how sociocybernetics can help to analyze the system and to choose an alternative (make a decision).

First of all, with a sociocybernetics analysis we include the government ideology that is an essential start point (second order cybernetics). In the next step we analyze the problem as something that is produced as a consequence of systemic relationships (circular causalities relationships considering the dynamic of the system). Last but not least what is more important, we can introduce the government concept (feed forward) rather than the control (feed back).

This paper will present a model where it is possible to have an answer to the question "what would happen if ...?". So we can test our hypothesis without affecting the real system. It is a model of an interesting health policy we have in the city of Rosario.

Marco analítico sociológico de las organizaciones transnacionales en la diplomacia cultural pública. El caso de las redes culturales de la diáspora:

Este trabajo desarrolla un modelo de análisis sociológico de las organizaciones transnacionales, particularmente adaptado al estudio de aquellas redes que se enmarcan en la diplomacia cultural pública.[1] Persigue ampliar los esquemas analíticos establecidos por la teoría de las relaciones internacionales para este ámbito, especialmente por aquellos estudios sobre la diplomacia cultural orientados desde el realismo teórico. En este marco, las organizaciones transnacionales han sido abordadas como "redes de interdependencia", y conceptualizadas como organizaciones sin mayor influencia sobre el "poder duro"; estatal y económico.

Cimentados en esta lógica, múltiples estudios del accionar cultural exterior consisten en una descripción sobre los grandes ejes de la política. Abordan sus dimensiones legales, organizacionales, programáticas y de acción, sin considerar las formas de participación y de inserción sociales de la cultura en el territorio, ni las formas de negociación y acumulación de poder mediante los procesos simbólicos en el conjunto de la estructura.

Por lo tanto, en esta comunicación buscamos diseñar enfoques que permitan entender las problemáticas y procesos particulares de la difusión cultural exterior, desde una perspectiva construida a partir de distintas perspectivas sociológicas sobre las formas y los procesos globales. Se trata de evitar el "nacionalismo metodológico", para poder comprender estas formaciones sociales como espacios sociales transnacionales. Desde esta matriz compleja, que tiene en cuenta los distintos niveles, actores, instituciones y los modos de acción e integración territorial y sistémica en esta forma de interacción social, es posible pensar modelos teóricos operacionalizados hacia el trabajo empírico; terreno, como indica Saskia Sassen, aún poco explorado.

An analysis concerning the effectiveness of creating spaces of transnational dialogue, between feminists/Latin-American movements in human rights actions

The Latin-American feminism consolidates, in their distinct cultural and historical contexts, in the common struggle against the dictatorial and militarized regimes. Nevertheless, other targets of the Brazilian feminist struggle in particular, but also from Latin America as a whole, are components of a backbone structure called patriarchy in its inseparable intersection with capitalism and racism), reveal the political, transversal, transnational and horizontal movement shape: male hegemony, sexual violence and the right to pursue pleasure. These characteristics distinguish the contemporary Latin American feminism from those with European / Western / monolithic origin, because its carries historical, colonial and socio-economic underdevelopment stigmas, poignant to the regional struggle for human rights. Thus, this work focuses on analyzing the practical results of the important creation of spaces for intercultural and "intermovements" dialogues as a strategy of transversality of the feminist movement in Latin America in search of guaranteed human rights of women as diverse, but that shares everyday oppressions arising marginalized categories of class, ethnicity, race, gender, sexuality, culture and generation. These spaces of dialogue (as the Latin American and the Caribbean Feminist Meeting, the Meeting of Rural Women in Latin America, the Latin American Interdisciplinary Conference on Human Rights and Citizenship, among others) are fundamental, not only for the construction of a solid agenda for common actions aimed at ensuring the human rights of Latin American and that this work will gain attention through examination of the effectiveness of such actions and their results, but also to the confluence of ideas from the joints of the global south, through the meeting of feminism and social movements that transcend the national and the binary view of theories of the global north (and its academic disservice in contending to be universal) and its representations, exporting an ahistorical, conservative and distorted Latin America, without due reflection of local realities.

The interface between private security and the police

The vast expansion of private security services, seen in several countries, especially from the mid-twentieth century, brought to light important issues concerning the contemporary transformations that are occurring in the exercise of policing. These changes has reflected, especially, an economic logic of the expansion of this kind of services, which is creating important changes in the regulatory framework, in the authorization and provision of the policing and in the spaces under jurisdiction of the police. In Brazil, since their official beginnings in 1969, the private security services have presented linear growth in this country. Their main period of expansion has occurred since the 90s, and has been characterized by the increasing number of private security companies, of the number of watchmen on the streets and the evident development of the electronic security device industry. From a critical comparison between the regulatory framework and the practical aspects of these services in their context of action, particularly in interface between public policing and private policing, this article seeks to discuss and clarify some of the issues that are at stake for understanding the impact of the private security sector on policing.

Comunidades de software libre en Argentina: Algunas exploraciones y vectores de análisis

El trabajo presenta avances de investigaciones en curso que problematizan algunos aspectos referidos a comunidades y grupos de usuarios vinculados al software libre en Argentina. Pretendemos comprender estas formas de organización como parte constitutiva de un movimiento social que se constituye en el marco del capitalismo informacional actual y articula en él sus demandas. Sus propuestas giran en torno a formas alternativas de concebir las tecnologías en este dominio particular, centradas en valores libertarios, trabajo colaborativo en redes y la circulación ampliada del conocimiento que subyace a la escritura de código. Nos aproximamos así a una consideración de las tecnologías informacionales como bienes comunes o formas de tecnología social, que trascienden las finalidades estrictamente mercantiles y extienden la diversidad de motivaciones de creación y desarrollo de software hacia otros dominios.

A partir de allí nos interesa explorar la configuración de algunas de las comunidades del movimiento software libre en Argentina. En base a entrevistas realizadas a miembros de estos colectivos y documentos generados en tales espacios, buscaremos reconocer cuáles son las formas de organización que se presentan, cuál es la participación de los nodos locales en redes globales más amplias, cuál es la inserción de estas comunidades en el medio local y cuáles las vinculaciones que se trazan entre sus participantes y otros actores e instituciones pertenecientes al sub-campo de la producción de software. Al mismo tiempo indagaremos acerca de las disputas específicas que se plantean en el medio local, así como las diferentes motivaciones que reúnen a las personas involucradas en este tipo de iniciativas.

Buscamos así trazar algunos vectores de análisis que orienten la indagación dentro de un terreno de investigación aún relativamente inexplorado en la región.

Contentious collective action and social spending in Latin America, 1970-2008

The last decade has been marked by an increasing interest in the political economy of social policy outside OECD countries. Most of this body of research builds on theories of the welfare state in advanced democracies and has focused its theoretical and empirical attention on the determinants of education, health and social security spending. Among the driving forces of social spending in the developing world, regime type and globalization have been the common subject of much empirical work. So far, this literature has been largely muted with regards to collective action efforts aimed at challenging national policies. Though prior research has shown that economic liberalization reforms in developing countries led to higher levels of protest, the effects of these collective action efforts remain unknown. This paper focuses on the effect of different forms of domestic dissent on social spending in 18 Latin American countries from 1970 to 2008. I argue that citizens power to influence social spending critically depends on their organizational capacity, their learning from past experience with collective action, and on the costs they impose to political leaders when ignoring their demands. The results show that protest has differentiated effects on social spending with labor-related protest having a strong positive effect on social policy, particularly on social security spending. Results also confirm previous research that has found a positive effect of democracy on human capital spending. Overall, this paper contributes to the growing literature on the determinants of social policy in developing countries.

Human-computer interaction: Between sociological theory and ethnographic data

The field of interaction between human and computer provides at least two areas of consideration, and methodological points of view respectively. On the one hand, this kind of interaction is conceived as a separate subject for ethnographic research. On the other hand, vocabulary for re-describing of the processes is adequately provided by Science and Technology Studies (STS). My claim is that these two points should not be treated as separate, for the following respect: human-computer interaction serves as a good case to provide some insights to my point.

Human-computer interaction (HCI) as an interdisciplinary field mostly works with practical domain. Researchers and practitioners normally act as ethnographers while conducting their research and collecting data related to specific and concrete phenomena. However, most of them unavoidably face theoretical problems. In this way, there is a wide range of issues at HCI for ethnography as well as for sociology of science and technology. Nevertheless, whether authors are aware of it or not, every research or practice presupposes a specific theory.

At the same time, there is a diversity of approaches which give rise to further conceptualization and operationalization. Reinterpretation of the relations between human/computer (as a special case of the ratio of social/material) is implemented in a different way in STS, because it represents a field of different studies concerning diverse aspects of science development and changing technology. Human-computer interaction is a rich resource for finding opportunities to link the concepts with the data and especially when description and interpretation is already subsumed under a theoretical logic.

Public spaces as spaces of fear and alienation? Youth in public spaces in St. Petersburg, Russia

One of the problems Russian cities encountered in the post-socialist period is the lack of public space, and 'fencing in' of open spaces within the residential districts. The alienation of public spaces corresponds with the general alienation of the public life and participation. The paper focuses on the negative effects of the public space in a city in transition, such as social exclusion, and xenophobia among young people.

Our research in two neighborhoods in St. Petersburg (Kupchino – soviet era 'sleeping district', with huge open areas, Obvodny Kanal – residential area from early 20th century with dense construction and small open areas, mainly internal yards) had a goal to investigate the possible difference in place perception and use among young people with different social background, as well as the impact of the built environment and planning system on the public space perception. On the basis of observation in public spaces and the interviews with local youth we found out that in case of Kupchino big open spaces and permanent encounters with the 'Others' correspond with the perception of the neighborhood as hostile and with xenophobic moods among young people. The open public space allows people to observe social / ethnic diversity; however, that doesn't engender any sense of community. On the contrary, in the anonymous space of the district it increases the fears. In case of Obvodny where the deficit public spaces are divided between different groups that avoid contact the neighborhood is described as more 'cozy' and friendly.

The socialist legacy can partly explain the preference given to semi-private spaces by the city dwellers: open 'public' spaces are perceived as something alien and belonging to the state, not to the inhabitants. Only the separation and privatizing of the space can provide young people with sense of belonging to the place.

A study on quality of life of the urban community elderly people

With the in-depth development of China's reform and opening-up, providing for the aged and taking care of them have gradually become grave problems in our country. The traditional mode of healthcare for the aged has been weakened, and the social old-age pension is also facing a predicament of funds shortage. Therefore, the community-level old-age service is the China's expedient choice in the transitional period, while improving the old citizens' quality of life constitutes the essential objective of addressing the aging problem. Based on the database of China General Social Survey 2006 (CGSS 2006) as the information source, this research has discussed in detail both the status quo of current elderly people's life quality and the influencing pathways of objective and subjective factors pertaining to their quality of life.

By means of statistical analysis, this study has shown that the old people's quality of life has been influenced by individual characteristics, family economic conditions, the degree of life richness and the crisis consciousness. The main conclusions are as follows: (1) Marital status, political status and pension insurance significantly affect the old people's sense of well-being; (2) Gender does not have obvious effects on quality of life, whilst higher education level does not guarantee the evident sense of happiness; (3) The family economic conditions of the old people markedly influence their subjective satisfaction towards everyday life; (4) There exist positive correlations between pairs of family economic conditions, the degree of life richness and the crisis consciousness; (5) The number of old people feeling strong sense of well-being is smaller than that of the aged who possess the weak sense of well-being, which reflects the fact that the status quo of elderly people's life quality is not as good as expected.

Los usos sociales del tiempo libre: Una comparación entre mujeres con hijos y sin hijos en los sectores medios de la ciudad de Buenos Aires

La ponencia indaga los imaginarios y experiencias que construyen la noción de tiempo libre para las mujeres de los sectores medios de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires. A partir de un abordaje de tipo cualitativo, mediante entrevistas en profundidad, nos interesa explorar las diferencias entre las mujeres con y sin hijos en su caracterización del tiempo libre, sus representaciones y prácticas vinculadas al ámbito recreativo y, en el caso de las mujeres con hijos, los modos en que compatibilizan (o no) los espacios de ocio con la crianza.

Junto al avance en los procesos de emancipación de las mujeres (su ingreso y afianzamiento en el mundo del estudio y el trabajo, la obtención de derechos, la separación entre sexualidad y reproducción) la maternidad se ha resignificado y, especialmente en los sectores medios, ya no aparece como la única vía de realización. En la actualidad el proyecto de descendencia convive con otro tipo de proyectos, con un nuevo paradigma –relacionado con la "modernidad líquida" (Bauman, 2003)– según el cual las responsabilidades por tiempo indefinido, como los hijos, son percibidas como una pérdida de libertad y autonomía, que impiden aventurarse a otras opciones. Dichos cambios culturales se dan en un contexto social de modificaciones en el mundo del trabajo (con pocas certidumbres a largo plazo) y de afianzamiento de tendencias individualistas, consumistas y hedonistas (Lipovetsky, 1999; 2006; Sennett, 2000; 2006; Bauman, 2005). De allí el surgimiento del término dinkies (double-income, no kids: sueldo doble sin hijos) con el que el marketing se refiere a las parejas sin descendencia interesadas en mantener cierto estilo de vida, que creemos también implica un uso diferencial del ocio para las mujeres. En este marco, indagaremos cómo los nuevos modelos culturales, operan en las mujeres con y sin hijos en relación al tiempo libre.

Comparing the socioeconomic status - Health gradient among adults 50 and older across rural and urban Thailand in 1994 and 2007

This paper examines associations between three indicators of socioeconomic status, education, income and bank savings, as well as one composite of these three measures, and self-assessed health for adults aged 50+ across rural and urban Thailand, comparing 1994 and 2007. Between 1994 and 2007 Thailand experienced rapid social changes that could impact on health overall and across groups, including population aging, socioeconomic development and changes in health policy. This provokes testing whether overall health has improved as a result and whether the SES health gradient has changed. The data come from comparable survey sources from over seventy-thousand respondents, collected by Thailand's National Statistical Office. Generalized proportional ordered logit models run that include up to three-way interactions of SES by year by rural/urban residence are run. The three-way interactions allow for testing and of whether changes over time are due to complex intertwined effects. Results indicate that a) there has been improvement in health among the 50 and older population in Thailand; b) there has been a flattening in the SES – health gradient in rural areas, and c) there has been little change in the gradient in urban areas, and if anything, there has been a widening of the relationship between income and health in urban Thailand. Divergence in the way the gradient has changed across rural and urban Thailand may point to the impact of social policy that has been aimed at poorer rural residents.

Constructing the "enemies within": Muslim youth and the racial politics of Canada's 'home grown' war on terror

International security and intelligence communities have identified the radicalization and 'jihadization' of Muslim youth as the greatest threat to global security. As a result many western nations have implemented draconian immigration and security policies that have targeted Muslims immigrants and citizens. As a result Muslim bodies are coded as potential risks to the nation and the safety of citizens. New ontological categories such as the "radical," "terrorist" and the "jihadist" are created that further demarcate Manichean divides and serve to justify imperialist policies and practices that operate within what Agamben notes is a 'state of exception' where civil liberties are eroded to safeguard national security interests galvanized by a culture of fear and national paranoia.

This paper will examine the dynamics of racial securitization in Canada's "home grown" war on terror and examine the impact of these policies and practices on Muslim youth labeled as potential threats to public and national safety. In Canada the arrests in 2006 of 17 youth and one adult under the Anti-Terrorism Act and the case of the "disappearing Somali youth" who have been allegedly recruited to fight with Al Shabbab will serve as case studies to examine how in a climate of heightened fear and risk, Muslim youth are constructed as the new "enemies within" and are central targets in the "home grown" war on terror.

The paper will draw on qualitative responses from Canadian Muslim youth to provide a narrative analysis that situates their experiences as part of the '9/11 generation' who are growing up in the shadows of this tragedy and the ongoing politics of imperialism, global militarism and racial securitization. The connection between these factors, rampant Islamophobia and the 'radicalization' of some groups of Muslim youth will be examined to redefine where the conditions of "risk" actually reside.

Nation, citizenship and belonging: Negotiating Muslim cultural politics in Canada

Muslim communities have become increasingly salient in the social, cultural and political landscape in Canada. This has been largely due to the aftermath of 9/11 and the racial politics of the ongoing 'war on terror' that has cast Muslims as the new "enemy within." The narratives of citizenship, nationalism, and security have become inextricably linked in public discourse and policy-making in ways that disproportionately target Canadian Muslims as potential threats to public safety and compromise their civil liberties. Driven by media sensationalism, narrow and limiting constructions of Muslims are commonly purveyed reproducing Orientalist archetypes of illiberal and anti-democratic foreigners that test the limits of Canadian multiculturalism. Islam has become a permanent feature in the Canadian hinterland and Muslim cultural politics have become prominent flashpoints in the social and political landscape.

Increasingly Muslims figure prominently in contemporary public debates that shape the Canadian national consciousness and public policies from security certificate detainees, the arrests of 18 Muslim youth in Toronto on charges of 'home grown terror', racial and religious profiling and the debates over shari'a tribunals in Ontario to Quebec's questions of 'reasonable accommodation', the banning of Islamic headscarves and face veils and xenophobic "citizens codes."

This discussion will focus on how Muslim cultural politics in Canada is being negotiated in ways that determine the boundaries of nation, citizenship and belonging. The current debates over the banning of Islamic face veils in Quebec as well as during citizenship oath taking ceremonies will be discussed to highlight the way inclusion and exclusion from the imagined spaces of national belonging and the legal requirements of citizenship are being shaped by xenophobic and Orientalist narratives and how women's bodies have become a battleground upon which the image of the multicultural nation is being re-defined in a post 9/11 context.

After the financial crisis - Towards a 'Melbournian approach' to social policy

This presentation will reflect on issues related to key concepts (risk, social inclusion, life course) in the debates on social policy. After the last financial crisis (which was relatively mild for Australia for a number of reasons) Kevin Rudd (the former Prime Minister) and left wing social policy researchers suggested that the time is ripe for a new approach to social policy in Australia which goes beyond the neo-liberal dominance of the recent decades. However, it is unclear how such an approach could look like and what key elements might be.

The presentation will report from a group of academics and practitioners from Melbourne which have started in 2010 to discuss perspectives for a new approach to social policy in Australia. Starting with key concepts such as 'risk', 'social inclusion' and the 'life course' I will show how these and related concepts frame discourses and social policy practice (e.g. social inclusion, activation). However, it is not only conceptual but also institutional normativity which influences social policy practice and outcomes. Social policy response to new social risks is still shaped by Australian's unique tradition of the 'wage earner welfare' state (Castles 1989) and the persistence of the male breadwinner model (even though now in the shape of a one and a half earner family, Lewis 2001).

Towards an interdisciplinary understanding of voluntary risk taking

The importance of risk-taking for present day societies might be uncontested; however, explaining the sources or the reasons for risk-taking activities is complex. This presentation will review contributions from a number of disciplines, in particular, psychology, economics, biology and sociology. These understand (voluntary) risk-taking as rooted in the nature of the human being (e.g. as a drive), in individual personality characteristics, genetic dispositions or as influenced by developmental stages while they indicate at the same time that such explanations are limited to understand common risk-taking phenomena. Attempts to explain risk-taking on the basis of instrumental rationality has also proven its limited power to understand (voluntary) risk-taking in everyday life and professional practice. Each approach remains incomplete if not considering socio-cultural and socio-structural factors.

Following a sociological perspective, this article will argue that risk-taking is a historically developed way of framing the social world linked to Western modernisation which has been particularly emphasised in the decades after WWII. However, the focus on new risks, institutional individualism and individualist values in sociological theorizing has supported that underlying socio-structural, psychological or developmental factors had been neglected. The edgework approach on voluntary risk taking follows this tendency though highlighting the emotional attraction of high risk-taking activities themselves.

This presentation will argue towards an interdisciplinary understanding of voluntary risk taking which might be better prepared to understand a broad range of risk-taking activities.

DDHH en Colombia 2007-2011: Las violaciones siguen pero las percepciones cambian

Aunque las cifras de violaciones de los Derechos Humanos en Colombia no se modificaron sustancialmente en el último lustro, en ese periodo hubo un cambio en el tratamiento que en las discusiones de la opinión pública se dio a los temas de DDHH y Paz.

En buena medida, esa modificación fue el resultado de la llegada de un gobierno nuevo. Al contrario del anterior, en cabeza de Álvaro Uribe, que había declarado "por decreto" que en el país no había conflicto armado, el gobierno de Juan Manuel Santos se ha referido en los medios de comunicación y en sus discursos oficiales de un modo menos beligerante a los defensores de DDHH y ha tratado de no identificar ese tema como sinónimo de protesta social.

En este trabajo se hace una radiografía de la percepción de los colombianos sobre los DDHH, las principales organizaciones que trabajan en su defensa, la acción del gobierno en ese ámbito y la de los grupos o individuos que los violan. Para el estudio se realizaron dos encuestas de carácter nacional sobre el tema (con muestras de 1.055 colombianos mayores de edad, en la primera, y de 610, en la segunda). También se efectuaron cinco grupos de discusión con 60 representantes de diferentes sectores de la sociedad colombiana, así como entrevistas en profundidad.

El trabajo analiza el papel que juegan los medios de comunicación convencionales y nuevos en la formación de opinión pública y evidencia un cambio en las arenas y en los sitios donde se realizan las discusiones de la opinión pública sobre DDHH en Colombia.

A good employee is a learning employee: The textual construction of 'employees of choice'

To be or not to be an 'employee of choice': that is the question this paper will address. To be explored are the mechanics of a text-based work process known as employee development planning. The paper will focus on the organizing power of texts associated with the work process to align employees' consciousness and actions with corporate expectations about the way in which and the extent to which they are to 'perform' as work-related learners.

Of particular interest are the inscriptive practices upon which the work process depends – in other words, those practices of working with, working from or working to produce various texts by which employees' work-related learning is officially planned, implemented, reviewed and rewarded. It is through these inscriptive practices that employees are enlisted to become 'employees of choice', a term that organizes and standardizes the idea that those who are willing and able to meet corporate expectations of their 'performance' as work-related learners are more valuable to and valued by their employer than those who do not.

In the textual construction of 'employees of choice' marginalized by lower pay and a perceived closing off of opportunities for advancement are those employees whose performances are deemed not to have met corporate expectations. Clearly fitting within the stream of IE research that addresses the private sector, this paper draws attention to the active part employees play as co-constructors of the textual circumstances under which it is possible for them to be distinguished as being or not being an 'employee of choice'. The author will argue that there is room in IE for fuller exploration of the text-based work processes by which employees implicate themselves into 'competitiveness projects' through and by which corporations give primacy to using human capacities within the social relations of capital (Darville, 1999).
